* VISITING ARTIST

Stone Church congregation, Independence, had a fine experience in hearing Mrs. Mattie J. Willis, a member from Battle Creek, Michigan, sing at the two Sunday morning services on March 27. Sister Willis has attained distinction as a concert oratorio and radio artist. She came here to sing on the preceding Friday night at the Paseo Baptist Church for a meeting of the National Association of Negro Musicians. Her numbers at Stone Church were, "O Divine Redeemer" (Gounod) and the spiritual, "Were You There?" On Sunday, she also sang for other of our Independence congregations. There was great appreciation for the beauty and power of her singing.

* VOICE OF THE CITY

They are repairing the streets, pitted and pockmarked like a battlefield by the winter's snow and traffic. Outside the editorial windows, those sturdy mechanical woodpeckers, the air drills, are chipping away at the craters and chuckholes in the pavement, "Br-t-t-t-t-t-t" — "Br-t-t-t-t-t-t!" or "Clunk-k-k-k-k-k," according to the tool and material. It is strange how a pocket full of snow can make a street disintegrate into dust and gravel, but when you try to take it to pieces, it is tough as granite. Sitting in our offices, trying to write about "the peaceable things of the kingdom" with firecrackers going off under the chair, gives you an idea of how it is. The staccato noise of the drills remind one of Macbeth's line, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

* NEED

You have already made the acquaintance of our charming contributor, Jean Barnett, at the R.C.A.F. Station, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, Canada ("Herald" of February 12). She reports happily that her Sunday school has reached an attendance of eighty-two, and she is looking forward to a special Easter service which will bring a better understanding of the work to the townspeople. Always seeking divine guidance in her work, she says in a recent letter:

"It seems now that we just shouldn't dare to attempt to start out for the day without getting down on our knees and asking for grace [because of trials and difficulties]. This morning I saw the bus on the way . . . and said, 'I'm afraid we won't have time even for our prayer this morning,' as I began to sort out windbreakers and rubbers. 'But, Mother,' said Ronnie, 'we must have our prayer, at least.' I knew he couldn't face the day without the strength and courage he derives from our early morning communion. . . . What in the world do people ever do without God? I think it would be like trying to walk a tightrope over Niagara Falls without a balance staff. I'm sure I'd be scared to death."

This contains the 16-page service, "Follow Me," and 24 pages of well-chosen miscellaneous materials, playlets, poems, stories, articles, and songs. Price, 30c each.

SUMMER'S FESTIVAL OF PRAISE

By Mattie B. Shannon

A nature pageant with scriptural application for kindergartners, primaries, juniors, and junior highs. Cast may vary. Price, 35c each; $3.60 a dozen.

THE GOLDEN CHAIN

By Martha Bayly and Roy E. Nolte

This pageant for kindergartners, primaries, juniors, and junior highs, is the story of two children sent into the garden by their mother to learn Bible verses. In an interesting way they are shown the value of co-operation for both individuals and nations. Cast may vary. 1 hour. Price, 35c each; $3.60 a dozen.

A CHILDREN'S DAY DREAM

By Lucy King DeMoss

A sixteen-page play to be used in preparation for a missionary offering. The two leading characters may be taken by senior boys. Other characters are a group of junior and junior high boys and girls, and another group of children who are brightly costumed and represent different nations. The general conversation of the play is interest in the welfare of each nation and how to spread the gospel to all. Price, 10c each.

Church School Service

FOLLOW ME

By Lucy King DeMoss

This playlet (also included in Standard Children's Day Book No. 2) tells a missionary story in which the young people portray interesting scenes in connection with Moffat, Livingstone, Grenfell, Africaner—the old chief—and a number of others. Price, 10c each.

INDEPENDENCE SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL DAY

Sunday, April 24, 1949

NEWS AND NOTES

Think of the Sanitarium in human terms . . . Thousands of church members, young and old, have gone through its doors since they opened on December 15, 1909. They went in sick, helpless, and suffering. Most of them were returned to their families—well, strong, and happy. The few who could not be healed were comforted in their last days.

The Sanitarium has been a merciful mother to the people of the church. It has given much. Now it asks the people to give something back in order that it may continue to serve and heal.

Because of the shortage of nurses, the Sanitarium needs help with the training program of its School of Nursing. It is asking church people to help by contributing $15,000 this Sunday.

When you open your purse as the collection plate comes your way, try to think of your gift in personal terms: a young nurse working to learn her profession for a service of mercy; a mother, expecting the miracle of new life, waiting for her baby to come; a father recuperating in the hope of supporting his family; a suffering child, needing a nurse to tend his wants; a victim of accident being healed.

Think of the Sanitarium in human terms today, and give.

Introducing . . .

CHARLES F. GRABSKE, M.D. (page 5). The doctor may not be the busiest man in town, but he is one of the hardest to get an article or biographical sketch from. He was graduated from Rosedale, Kansas, high school in 1909, from Graceland in 1913, and the University of Kansas in 1915 with an A.B. degree. He was a public schoolteacher and administrator for several years following his graduation. Then he decided to study medicine and returned to the University of Kansas in 1922. He received his M.D. degree five years later and has been practicing in Independence ever since.

Mildred A. Bowman became his wife in 1919. They have two sons: Charles F., Jr., M.D., and Robert Jerold, age 12. Dr. Grabske is Physician to the Church, member of the Board of Trustees of the Sanitarium, member of Graceland College Board, and member of the Standing High Council.

A. NEAL DEEVER (page 6) was born at Webb City, Missouri, in 1908. He was graduated from Graceland College in 1932, and from the University of Chicago, B.A., in 1934. He majored in business and hospital administration. Last year he returned for a short course in hospital administration.

Daisy M. Black became Mrs. Deever in 1936. They have two daughters: Marlene, 9; and Lynette, 5. Their present home is in Independence.

From 1934 to 1947, he was Business Manager and Director of Public Relations of Graceland College. Then for a year and a half he managed a store at Oskaloosa, Iowa. Last September, he became Assistant Superintendent of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. He is a high priest.

HARLEY A. MORRIS (page 10), a journalist and psychologist of Chicago, Illinois, was born in 1906 at Haley, Idaho. He took three years' work at Oregon College of Education, then transferred to University of Oregon from which he was graduated (B.S. Psychology) in 1945. He moved to Chicago that same year and became the child psychologist for the Illinois Institute for Juvenile Research. He also took graduate work with the University of Chicago for two years. In 1947 he became Consulting Psychologist at the Chicago Latin School for Boys and Bateman School. He is now Child Psychologist at the Rock County Child Guidance Clinic.

Margaret C. Litton became his bride in 1936. They now have three children: Carol Jean, twelve; Margaret Kathleen, eight; Harley Andrew, Jr., five. For twelve years (1928-1940) Brother Morris followed the journalistic profession and was editor of three different newspapers. He is an elder.

RUBY E. PARFITT TINKHAM (page 12) is the mother of two girls: Shirley Beth, 13; Sandra Ellen, 5. Her husband is Joe E. Tinkham, and they live in The Plains, Ohio. She was born in 1912.

Sister Tinkham teaches an adult class in the church school. She enjoys writing for the publications of her church. Her previous contributions this year appear in the Heralds of January 15, February 19, and March 12.

THE CHURCH IN EUROPE

Apostle D. Blair Jensen reports that as of March 15 there had been fourteen baptisms in England since the beginning of the year, and another baptismal service was scheduled for March. There were forty-three baptisms in England during the whole of last year. The general trend is upward, and the beginnings of revivals in Wales are quite evident.

Baptisms in Holland last year were approximately 10 per cent of the total membership, and prospects are excellent for this year.

NEW GRACELAND ALUMNI PRESIDENT

Jack Burlington of Kansas City, Missouri, Assistant Advertising Manager of Trans-World Airlines, has been elected president of the Graceland Alumni Association. He visited the Graceland campus on March 23 with Charles V. Graham and Carl Mesle of Independence who went to the campus to recruit members of the camp staff for the youth camp at Excelsior Springs, Missouri.

McDOWELL IN IOWA CITY

Dr. F. M. McDowell was in Iowa City, Iowa, on the week end of March 18-20, ministering to the people of that group, particularly the fifteen or so young couples attending the State University of Iowa. Four of the staff and faculty of that school are church members: Dr. (Evangelist) Walter Daykin of the School of Commerce, Dr. Voas Meredith of the Department of Child Welfare, Dale Ballantyne, instructor of Art in Advertising, and Gene Oliver, assistant to the comptroller of the university. The Iowa City group meets every Sunday morning in the Y. M. C. A. room of the Student Union.

SOUTHERN NEW ENGLAND DISTRICT

March 27, this district met in conference at Providence, Rhode Island, with an attendance of 274. Dinner was served to over 230 persons. Elders Sanford L. Fisher and John W. Foster were approved as counselors to the district president. The following were approved for the priesthood: Elders: M. C. Fisher, Jr., Urban Black, and Eugene P. Carter of Boston; Ralph Candage of Springfield, and Gilbert Hambleton of New London; Priest: Leonard Garlick of Providence; Deacon: Norman Grange of Providence. The speakers were Elder A. W. Sheehy and Bishop D. O. Chesworth. Authorization was given to support the raising of funds for a commissary for the Onset Reunion: Over $300 was contributed immediately.

BRECKENRIDGES IN PAPEETE

Advices from Papeete indicate that Brother Allen Breckenridge, wife and baby, arrived safely on the last day of February. They were met by a large representation of the Saints, and they greatly enjoyed their introduction to the Island members.

OPERATION FOR EVANGELIST CURTIS

Evangelist J. F. Curtis underwent an operation in the Spokane, Washington, hospital on March 29. Elder Curtis had been on a missionary trip with Seventy Arthur Gibbs when he became ill with the flu and after three weeks' illness developed severe pain. He went to the hospital where X rays indicated the presence of foreign matter, and he underwent an operation. A letter from Sister Curtis tells that he is doing nicely.

Easter Makes a Difference to the World

The Angel's Message

When the two Mary's came to the tomb, seeking the body of Jesus, whom they presumed to be dead, the angel informed them of the Resurrection:

He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay.—Matthew 28: 6.

Thus the good women who had come with spices, according to other accounts, to embalm the body of Jesus were the first witnesses of the Resurrection. They had come to participate in a memorial of death and received, instead, a testament of the glorious truth of eternal life.

The Difference

In a discussion of Easter, a man once asked, "What difference does it make whether Christ rose from the dead or not?" He dismissed the matter, with a little contempt in his tone, as if it were of no importance. I think he intended, by that statement, to put Christ out of his life; he did not know that he was putting himself out of Christ's life—a very different thing. It makes all the difference in the world whether Christ rose or not.

Saint Paul gave an answer to this question that is as good today as it was when he said it:

If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.—I Corinthians 15: 14.

If Christ did not rise from the dead, there would be no hope of eternal life for us. He would have been a prophet, a great teacher who lived his day and passed on. But he could not have been our Savior.

Paul was very positive about it:

But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man also came the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.—I Corinthians 15: 20-22.

If Christ was not resurrected, we are brothers to the animals, and our death is like the blowing out of a candle, with a tiny spark glowing for a moment in the wick, a plume of white smoke rising, and after that darkness and silence forever.

Since Christ did rise from the dead, our earthly lives are incomplete in themselves; they are only the preparation for eternal life. It makes a difference whether your life is sixty years or sixty million. It should make a difference in the way you live now.

The Resurrection made Christ unique in all history. The triumph of the gospel is dependent upon the truth of this event. Christ made his sacrifice upon the cross, but he won his victory for us—the promise of eternal life—by rising and leaving behind him the empty tomb.

The Resurrection Message

Why did Christ return to the disciples after the Resurrection? Both Matthew and Mark record "the great commission," which reveals the divine purpose in this miraculous event. These are the words of the risen Christ:

Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature.—Mark 16: 15.

Though Luke omits the specific commandment, he uses the statement that Christ had died and risen again "that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations," which conveys the same meaning. And John records Christ's admonition to Peter to "feed my sheep" signifying the same great purpose.

So, according to the four Gospels, the return of Christ after the Resurrection was not only to demonstrate the truth of eternal life, but to send the disciples out into the world to preach the gospel to all men.

The great commission could not have meant as much before the Resurrection as it did afterward. The disciples were given a new and wonderful message. Before, the hope of eternal life was only a promise; afterward, it was a reality. Not until then could they know and testify of the great central truth of the Christian message. Then they rose to their full stature as witnesses.

The Skeptics

We are told that when the resurrected Christ appeared to the disciples, "they worshiped him: but some doubted."

Cynics have said, "Some people will believe anything." And a realist must reply to them, "Yes, and some people will doubt anything." It takes a certain kind of deficient mentality to go the limit in either direction. An intelligence that cannot be reached by the truth does not serve the expected function of intelligence. That is why Jesus said, "He who does not believe will be condemned." He will be lost, because he chooses not to be saved.

Millions of people in our country and in the wide world are living for time, and for a rather little bit of time at that. Some live for the day, some for the week, some for the year. A few far-sighted individuals may even plan their lives ten or twenty years ahead.

But the Christian has a great advantage over all these people. He is living for eternity, he is planning his life for immortality. He knows that the "three score years and ten" are only the beginning. Christ has given him eternal life!

Let us bear witness to the message of Christ to bring his salvation to men.

The Appointment of District Historians

INSTRUCTION TO DISTRICT PRESIDENTS

In every stake and district of the church there should be an active local historian who is both qualified and willing to gather and report its activities to the General Church Historian according to instructions received.

PROCEDURE IN APPOINTING DISTRICT HISTORIANS

Pursuant to action of General Conference, the following procedure in the appointment of a district historian is approved: Where no district historian has as yet been appointed by the General Church Historian, the district conference should be requested to approve and recommend to the Church Historian some one known to be both qualified and willing to serve as district historian. This recommendation should be sent to the Church Historian, including the name, address, and date when approved by the conference, so that the one thus recommended may be notified of appointment by the Church Historian and proper instructions be issued for the work to be done. This procedure conforms to General Conference action which authorizes the Church Historian to appoint all local historians in the districts.

In making appointments of local historians recommended to him as above, the Church Historian will issue a circular of instructions and suggestions in regard to gathering, preparing, and reporting the historical data that is desired for filing with the Historical Department of the church, copies of which should also be on file in the district for reference as needed.

Notice Regarding the Sending of Church Books and Literature to Persons in the British Isles

Our attention has been called to the possibility that there may be a number of our members who have either member or nonmember relatives or friends living in England to whom they would like to send church books and literature to further interest them in the church.

Arrangements have been made between the Presiding Bishopric and our church representatives in England whereby such orders will be filled from the bookstore stock in England, providing remittances to cover have been sent to the Presiding Bishopric. Therefore, please note carefully the following instructions:

1. Address your order to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.
2. Furnish full name and correct mailing address of person to whom order is to be sent.
3. Enclose your remittance to cover, making it payable to The Presiding Bishopric.

We hope that many will take advantage of this opportunity to advance the missionary work in England.

Concerning News From the Branches

The Herald editors are trying to use more news items even though we cannot, in the foreseeable future, increase the number of pages in the Herald. Perhaps the branch reporters and pastors can co-operate with us better if we call a few things to their attention.

That which is sent in for publication first of all should be of general significance, giving sufficient of the happenings, time, and persons so it will be complete. Do not reach back too far. To merit space as a news item, it must be recent enough to still qualify as news.

The reporting of the happenings

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Excerpt from letter from E. A. Theys, dated March 18, 1949, from Bunde, Germany:

This is to report that Apostle Jensen and I have arrived at our first stop here in Germany. We arrived yesterday evening.

We spent a very pleasant evening with the head of British Religious Affairs, who most graciously opened the way for us to fly into Berlin and look into matters in that part of the mission. We will be flying into Berlin on March 30 and hope to return April 4, but return passage is always with a question mark due to weather and demands made on express. This trip will call for a slight shift in our schedule, but we will be back on schedule again in Offenbach and continue to be from there on out.

Brother Jensen suggests that you make no changes in his mailing except for Offenbach, and pass that place up for sending in mail. He suggests that you notify the Presidency and Twelve of the change in this one address.

Elder William E. Williams, appointee-guide at Kirtland Temple, reports as follows respecting Elder G. T. Griffiths:

Just a note to let you know that Brother Griffiths has improved a little but is still very ill. I believe he is to come home next week.

of a branch is a trust as well as a privilege. In efforts to condense the article, it is easy to overlook someone who might be hurt by the omission of his name. It is recommended, therefore, that the pastor read and initial the report before it is sent to us. This is an added precaution which will help the editor to feel the report is representative of the happenings in each branch.

Again, let us urge that while we want the news from the various groups throughout the church, we must ask that reporters give us the names and facts without attempting to editorialize or explain them. Remember, the Herald is an organ of the whole church, and we want to make every bit of it good. In Christ's service, only the best should be offered.

The Mission of Our Sanitarium

By Charles F. Grabske, M.D.

Church Physician

MORE THAN FORTY YEARS have elapsed since the Spirit spoke to the church in these words:

It is the will of the Lord that a sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church at Independence, Missouri, as my servant Joseph Smith has already stated to you. . . . It is also expedient that these should be assisted by the advice and counsel of one of my servants who is acquainted with the laws of health and the practice of medicine. . . . It is in accordance with the instructions given to my servant Joseph Smith that my servant Joseph Luff, who has been giving his attention to the study of medicine and has been preparing himself for usefulness in this direction, be associated with this sanitarium as a medical director and physician to the church.—Doctrine and Covenants 127: 1, 2.

Consequent to this direction, we built in the Center Place the institution of the church we now know as the Independence Sanitarium. Through all this time it has been the definite and explicit intention of the various physicians to the church and the board of trustees of our Sanitarium that the will of the church be kept in direct accord with the direction that this institution be a place of refuge where the afflicted "may be removed from the influences and environments unfavorable to the exercise of proper faith unto the healing of the sick."

It was in 1910 that this arm of the church began to function in the "Latter Day Work." At that time, Independence was a somewhat isolated and relatively small community, and the membership of the local branches was small. There was no hospital in the community. Since that time Independence has grown to be the fifth largest city in the state of Missouri, and the congregations in and about Independence have grown to number some 10,000 souls. Almost immediately after its erection, we were petitioned by the citizens of the community for permission to use our "place of refuge" for the care of other sick than our own who were in need of help. However, the Sanitarium never denied care to nonmembers. It daily cares for between one and two hundred patients, both local members and those who come from afar to the Center Place for the benevolence of their own institution. The Sanitarium also serves those of other faiths who live in and around Independence.

SINCE THE DAY of its opening, tremendous advances have been made in the scientific care of those not well. The antitoxins ushered in a new era for mankind. We now have the sulfonamides, and other antibiotics: penicillin, gramicidin, tyrothricin, streptomycin, and in late moments, aureomycin. Refined care in parturition has brought relief from suffering and safety to the child-bearing, and refinements in surgical techniques have brought life and health to thousands. Now with lengthening years coming to those who live in this period, there is a growing interest in geriatrics and the diseases that afflict those who live into their fifties and sixties. Certain kinds of heart disease and their control with the anticoagulants, heparin, and dicumarol, have come to require the attention and knowledge of our workers. With skillful use, such aids extend health and life for years.

With all of these advances in surgical and medical care, there have arrived responsibilities that require learning from the best books and training from those skilled in the arts and techniques of this modern period. There come to us from devoted homes in all parts of the land young women filled with the ideals of the families who have sent them to help carry out the primary objectives of the Sanitarium and, moreover, to become skilled nurses. Here they come under the training of specialists, some of whom are authors of articles appearing in this symposium of the Herald. Among these are Miss Gertrude Copeland who has built the place up to its present stature during the last quarter of a century; Miss Nelle Morgan who has vitally promoted the training of student nurses in the past five years; and Miss Vida Butterworth, Director of the Training School, who has, with great devotion, prepared herself for most excellent service by seeking the training of the greatest colleges of nursing in our land. Mrs. Grace Tousley, a faithful friend, has developed and is now in charge of the Sanitarium's excellent library. Elder Don Lents, the present chaplain to the Sanitarium, has been of great influence in keeping before our nurses as well as the patients the basic purposes of the church.

ALL OF THIS DEVELOPMENT has increased our need for equipment and apparatus, laboratories and books, scholarly and skilled directors so our student nurses may measure up to the high ideals set for them. They have worked faith-

The "San" Belongs to You

By A. Neal Deaver

THOSE OF US who are most intimately connected with the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital speak of the institution as the "San." This name has a magic meaning for us. We are all also conscious that this institution called the "Sanitarium" for so many years really belongs to you and you and you, for it came into being as a result of special instruction to the church. Because the church accepted this as divine instruction, it seemed to have a future already assured. Thus it has gradually but surely become a part of us. Understanding, then, this strong feeling of "possession" on the part of our church people toward our own church hospital and its school of nursing, it was decided that our hospital School of Nursing Day throughout the church should be called "Sanitarium Day."

WHY SANITARIUM DAY?

There was once a time when thirty-five to forty patients was a houseful in the old Sanitarium building, and only a minimum number of nurses were required to give adequate care. Today we reviewed figures which tell us that over 7,000 persons were treated a total of over 45,000 days in our church hospital the last year. Many of these were members of our own denomination. With our larger hospital serving so many more who are needing medical care these days, we are faced with the need for many, many more young nurses to adequately care for them. Pressure automatically falls on our own School of Nursing, which over the years past has furnished the majority of those educated in this field, who in turn have given their services to the Sanitarium.

Some ask, "Why should the church maintain a school of nursing?" The answer to this question is twofold. In the first place, we are witnessing an expansion in population in this country at a rate far beyond that of past years. Then there is an ever-increasing number of persons asking admittance into our hospitals which is causing a greater and greater demand upon graduate nurses, and the present number of graduates available is entirely inadequate. In the second place, a young Latter Day Saint nurse trained to care for the sick with understanding, patience, love, and sympathy can minister in a way which expresses sincere interest in the patient that not only symbolizes the ideals of the church but speeds the recuperation of the patient. We must have a place, then, for our nurses to be schooled in the "Latter Day Saint way." This brings us to the point of our problem.

SHARING THE SCHOOLING COSTS

At present the young nurse who enters the Independence Sanitarium School of Nursing pays only $349 to apply on her schooling expenses for the entire three-year period. This sum is less than half that amount required to furnish her meals, uniforms, room, textbooks, supplies, and many other items incident to her three years of schooling. Yet, over the period of thirty-nine years of operation of the School of Nursing—during which time 381 nurses have been graduated—the church has at no time been asked to supplement hospital funds for the operation of the school. Today, with ever-increasing costs in school operations, and in the face of new and urgent demands for more graduate nurses schooled in the "Latter Day Saint way," we have asked that our needs be brought to you on this "Sanitarium Day." The more nurses we train, the more money we need for their education!

At present there is a total investment of over $758,000 in our School of Nursing, the hospital and equipment. This sizable sum represents funds set aside by the church from time to time for building purposes, as well as grants of money from the government during the war years, together with the help of other citizens, groups, and friends. This sum

"A Place of Refuge and Help . . ."

By GRACE PENNELL TOUSLEY

THERE SEEMS TO BE A question in the minds of Latter Day Saints concerning the place of the Sanitarium in the whole church program. This mental unrest is evidenced by the constantly recurring references in church literature to the enlarged future of this church-owned and operated institution. Too, questions are often asked of those engaged in Sanitarium activities about the ways in which it is fulfilling its divinely-set purpose.

It is not an easy thing to determine if the Sanitarium is living up to this aim in the highest possible degree. It does receive, year after year, the approval of two hospital standardization agencies: the American Hospital Association and the American College of Surgeons. The approval of these associations is not lightly given. It is given only after the annual survey which covers the physical plant, administration, medical staff organization, nursing service, nursing school, and all other departments of the hospital. The scoring reports used by the surveyors are based on what is today considered minimum, adequate provision for good hospital service to the sick.

The Sanitarium School of Nursing is accredited by the Missouri State Board of Nurse Examiners. Its director, Miss Nelle Morgan, and its educational director, Miss Vida E. Butterworth, are both active in state and national nursing organizations.

It is of prime importance to the patient in the Sanitarium that this church institution does meet these basic specifications for good hospital service and for good nursing education, for he is thus assured of the best of care while he is hospitalized.

IT IS ALSO IMPORTANT to the whole church program that the Sanitarium is keeping pace with other good American hospitals, for therein is assurance that any financial allocation made by the church will be wisely spent in the saving of human life. The respect for the church, which is developed locally because this church institution is approved nationally, is no small matter.

The Sanitarium enjoys good community relations which have been built up through the years. Press relations, invaluable to the success of any hospital, are exceptionally pleasant, and the local papers respond with favorable publicity by way of straight news, pictures, and feature articles. One paper prints daily a list of patients admitted and discharged. Ministers of all faiths are given every opportunity to visit with and minister to patients from their congregations. Nursing students are given instruction in the proper ways of helping ministers or priests to carry on the routine prescribed by their different faiths in administering to the sick.

Thus saith the Spirit unto the Church:

It is the will of the Lord that a sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church, at Independence, Missouri.—Doctrine and Covenants 127: 1.

Such good public relations are not obtained by chance but by intention. The administration is to be commended for its far-sighted policy of making friends for the Sanitarium, and through it, for the church.

In 1948, more than 7,000 patients were admitted, seventy-five per cent of this number being nonmembers. One thousand of these nonmembers did not indicate any church preference. These figures seem to prove that local nonmembers prefer to be hospitalized in the Sanitarium, even though there are equally good hospitals in Kansas City, a fifteen minute automobile drive distant, and many of the physicians and surgeons on the medical staff of the Sanitarium also have membership on the staffs of these Kansas City hospitals.

Now that the Sanitarium has a full-time chaplain, Elder Donald V. Lents, there is opportunity for unobtrusive missionary work among these nonmembers. Each issue of Chaplain Lents' new bulletin "Your Sunday Morning Visitor," carries a summary of Latter Day Saint belief. His cheerful, daily visits to each patient create a pleasant impression of the Sanitarium and the church, which is increased by his ready response to a patient's need for counseling. Relatives of patients find in the chaplain a source of comfort when he serves, as he often does, as guide in difficult situations.

Nonmembers, as well as Latter Day Saints, so often express surprise and pleasure in the graciousness and skill of the medical and nursing staffs, and of the courtesy and interest of hospital personnel, that it appears there is a spiritual influence at work in the Sanitarium which is not common to other hospitals—something which makes them wish to go beyond their professional routines.

AT THIS POINT, the thoughtful Latter Day Saint is asking: "If the benefits of the Sanitarium are only of approximately local extent, why should the whole church be concerned with its financial support and progress? Is there a larger work for the Sanitarium to do that it is not now doing? Can the Sanitarium give aid to the Zion program which no other church institution can give?"

The Sanitarium superintendent, Miss Gertrude E. Copeland, is aware of this questioning attitude among Latter Day Saints. In a recent interview, she said, "Only the church as a whole can answer the question as to the part the Sanitarium can and should play in the Zioniac program. It can go only so far in this larger program as the church membership decides."

One key to understanding why there should be any questions raised as to the scope of the Sanitarium's work lies back in its history. At the time it was established by divine revelation, the policy governing its administration was to provide a place for Latter Day Saints away from the world, where, primarily, spiritual healing could take place. The Sanitarium was to be a spiritual ivory tower, even though provision had been made for a skilled physician to head it.

The community said "No!" to such a narrow interpretation of the divine command. In 1910 Kansas City with its great hospitals was not so near in point of time as it is now. Motorized ambulance service had not yet been established between the two cities nor did the average family own an automobile to provide quick transportation in case of illness. Patients of all faiths in this locality backed up by their physicians and by the mayor of Independence demanded admittance to the Sanitarium. With such a beginning forced upon it, the Sanitarium became, as the years passed, more and more of a community asset.

THE CHURCH'S CONCEPT of the Sanitarium's purpose has varied with the years and with the personalities in administrative positions in church and hospital. This is understandable when one considers that living organizations either change with the passage of time, or they die. The Lord's directive in section 127 of the Doctrine and Covenants which was given in 1906 allows the church to guide the Sanitarium's work according to understanding and need. There is nothing in the revelation which limits the scope of the Sanitarium in providing this place of refuge and help. Provision of the place is basic; variations in therapeutics must be made according to individual needs as interpreted by those skilled in the healing arts.

For example, the physician's understanding of the unity of mind and body is becoming clearer all the time. "Psychosomatic medicine" is a term used today to denote that branch of medical knowledge which deals with the ways in which the mind and body affect each other in sickness and in health. It is a new term for a condition recognized by physicians hundreds of years before Christ's time, almost forgotten for centuries, and revived in comparatively recent years. Actually, all medicine is psychosomatic medicine, but for the present the new term is used in order that psychosomatic aspects will not be overlooked in diagnosis and treatment.

The Sanitarium recognizes this interaction of mind and body, and the physical environment has been planned to help in the healing process. The room furnishings and color schemes have been selected primarily for beauty, with utility a close second. Any psychiatrist will support that basis for selection, for he knows that people actually do become ill from ugliness and disorganization in their surroundings.

A sound foundation has been laid by the Sanitarium for any further expansion in either hospital service or in aiding the church in its program. Without this foundation, the hospital could be of no help in the establishment of Zion.

THE LATE President Frederick M. Smith had a panoramic view of the Sanitarium of the future. He saw it as a superior institution of healing, and also as a research and educational center with medical and nursing schools, with standards far beyond those by which the world measures its hospitals and schools. He saw it as a mighty force in the Zioniac program. From this center would come discoveries in the prevention and healing of disease which would focus the attention of the world on this church and its work; from the schools would come highly skilled practitioners of medicine and nursing with service to man as their goals.

Whether the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital becomes the complete reality of Frederick M. Smith's ideal or whether it remains what it is today—a good, up-to-date hospital with an excellent nursing school—can be determined only by the church. The Sanitarium is ready to go ahead if that is the will of the membership; it is functioning happily and helpfully on the present basis and only occasionally asks for a "lift" from the whole church organization.

fully and well, and everywhere our nurses—graduates of our Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing—have shown by their acceptance of the highest standards of fine nursing and by their skill in carrying out the methods and techniques of skillful nursing that the training has availed them much.

I hope the people of the church everywhere and the branches of our people located throughout the world will show their interest in this phase of the church's work by liberally providing the necessities that our school of nursing must have in order to develop our girls to the plane which they truly represent in their sphere—the Church of Jesus Christ operating in the lives of nurses to the sick and afflicted.

The Human Side of the Hospital

By DONALD V. LENTS, Chaplain

PERHAPS YOU have passed the hospital in your community many times and given little thought to the human drama taking place within its portals. The various activities of hospital life often have to do with heart-rending tragedies; at other times, situations of a humorous nature occur.

In circumstances surrounding illness or accident, the fine characteristics of people often come to the fore. This may open the door for ministry which will result in the Christian teachings bringing about important changes in the lives of those being ministered to—and those ministering. There are those who are frightened into seeking the ministry of Christ, and, when their fear passes, their desire for such help also passes. When people are faced with the possibility of life or death, they are very anxious to receive any ministry for the moment.

Those who are facing death are eager for any word of consolation and help. When people are quietly resigned to dying, they offer a privilege and often an inspiration for those near to walk the last mile with them.

One of the most touching experiences during my ministry at the Sanitarium was that in which a dying father refused aid until his injured son was cared for. Father and son were both critically burned—the father much more seriously than the boy. In his extreme suffering, the father insisted that his son be treated first . . . and in the course of his unselfish waiting, he gave his life for his son. Perhaps he would have died even though he had been given treatment first . . . but he gave of himself that his child might live. This is but one of the tragedies which occur many times to touch the heart of humanity.

On the other side of the picture,

I recently called on a patient and informed him of the nature of my visit. Upon learning that he was receiving a call from the chaplain, his first remark was, "Good night! Am I that far gone?" Humorous as this experience was, it also is an example of the only type of ministry some patients expect the chaplain to offer . . . that is, to administer last rites in assisting him to the "other side."

All of hospital life is not concerned with illness and disease, however. At the Sanitarium, one can always find happiness and cheer as he enters the maternity floor. It is not an uncommon sight to see nervous fathers break into happy smiles as a cheerful white-gowned nurse brings the happy word that mother and daughter (or son, or both) are doing fine. And mothers bask in the joy of their motherhood when assured that they have given birth to a beautiful baby. Thus it is that life also begins within the confines of hospital walls.

The human side of the hospital does not begin and end with the patient, however. There are the nurses who have given of their time, energy, and emotional strength far beyond the call of duty to help ease the suffering of others. Far more times than we realize, behind the cheerful smile of a nurse may be heartache and worry of her own. She may be enduring physical exhaustion, discouragement, and heart-sickness because of the experiences with which her days and nights are filled. Yet the smile and efficient service continue, because there is no greater satisfaction to her than that of assisting a patient to renew his spirit by helping his physical body to recover from injury or disease.

Then there are the doctors who remain in the operating room and on the floors serving until it would seem they could no longer stand, only to leave for house calls and an office full of trusting patients.

The Sanitarium, as all hospitals, is a beehive of activity and industry twenty-four hours a day. Even while the patients sleep, preparations are being made for their continued care on the next day.

Cheerfully the maintenance crew, the kitchen workers, pages, Gray Ladies, those who work in the laundry, the business office staff as well as doctors, nurses, nurses aides, technicians, and chaplain go about their tasks with the satisfying knowledge that they are doing their bit to relieve part of the world's suffering.

This, then, is a small part of the human drama being enacted on the stage of our hospital.

Christ's Ministry

The ministry of Jesus was ushered in by his individual seeking for men who were to be his disciples, and through whom he should send his life-giving message to the world steeped in sin and wandering far from his Father. But his dealings with individuals did not stop with the calling of the first disciples. One of the most enthralling studies in the New Testament is to follow through the four Gospels Christ's dealing with other individuals. They represented all classes socially, and all classes as far as their need was concerned. The educated Pharisee, the wily Sadducee, the keen scribe, the inquiring Greeks, the lepers, the blind beggars, the palsied sufferers, the women (some pure and some impure), the rich, the poor, the demon-possessed and the sane, the seeking and the critical: in fact the whole world is represented there.—E. R. Fletcher, The Effective Evangelist.

The Three Decisive Acts of a Christian

By Harley A. Morris

IT WAS A DESERT LAND. For miles in every direction, the restless sands revealed in delicate tracery the writing of the wind. A single spot of green lightened the monotony of the landscape—brave witness to the presence of life-giving water. Under the shade of a solitary tree, a young man arose from his prayer and turned his face toward a brave, new world—not a world that was—but a world that was to be. The gleam of a noble vision lit his eyes. The rapture of the vision stayed for a time and then, as his consciousness absorbed reality, the deprivation of the long fast pressed her claim, and Jesus was “an hungered.” He looked about him at the seclusion of his camp—ideally suited for the forty days with God, but now, ill-stocked to fill the man of hunger. His vision faded, and Jesus stood alone—alone with the Devil.

In the fervor of his seeking, Jesus had laid aside the tools of his occupation. In the sublimity of his worship, he had found a new at-one-ment with Divinity. In the clarity of his vision, he had discovered his destiny in the world of men.

But now, alone with the Devil, the carnal call of appetite drove out his holy passion and strove to claim him. With materialistic logic, the Devil flung the challenge: “Why trust the testimony of spirit,” he asked, “when at your hand you have a means to test scientifically this power you feel is yours?” If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.

And Jesus answered!

ON SPIRITUAL WINGS he fled the barren sand and found himself atop the holy temple. His memory’s brush redrew a childhood pilgrimage. He felt again the adventure of the long trail that wound around Judean hills from little Nazareth. He caught the awe he knew when first he viewed the temple, thronged with the heroes of a noble history. He tasted the sweetness of that truant visit with the doctors. Jerusalem—the Holy City because she held the temple of the Lord!

It was like the Devil to lift him above all this he held sacred—to dare him in the moment of exaltation to challenge what tradition hallowed. It was like the Devil to tempt his pride and offer him an easy road to glory. The second trial was founded on the first. If spiritual food surpassed the corporal, surely Jesus with his power of spirit could defy the laws of nature! The Devil spoke. His silken words concealed a deadly blade. If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down.

And Jesus answered!

A MIGHTY MOUNTAIN reared her head against the sky, her wind-swept crags bereft of soil and vegetation. Alone, a silhouette against the heavens, stood Jesus—alone, with but the Devil. Before Jesus spread a majestic panorama. He saw the Inland Sea—Gibraltar to Bosphorus—bearing up the fleets of mighty Rome. He saw the far-flung empire from Spain to the distant Indies. Who knows—perhaps his vision bent around the earth and saw the teeming millions in a new world—stoning their righteous prophets and following wicked kings into corruption. He saw them all and felt them calling him. His soul responded as he felt the weight of responsibility upon him. He was a son of David—a lineage born to rule. For a moment he felt the surging of a great desire challenging him to bring peace and security and right relationships into a world damned with corruption in high places. His power was in his hand. The legions of heaven were mightier than the legions of Rome! What if it took the sword and scourge of war? The end justified the means.

The Devil voiced the thought: All these are yours if thou wilt worship me.

And Jesus answered.

THREE TIMES he answered—confounding temptation with his great spirit.

He met the temptation of appetite with an avowal of spiritual supremacy, “Man shall not live by bread alone.” There was more to life than a gratification of physical desire.

He met the temptation of pride with an avowal of humility. Though he were a son, he would yield to earthly laws and live as other men—a Jew of the Jews. If through his life he was to strike at the roots of tradition, he would await the proper moment, lest impatience wreck his mission.

He met the temptation of power with an avowal of devotion to God. No force or dictatorship would play a part in his conquest. To him, only God was supreme. God’s plan must follow through.

Three times Jesus answered, and in his words he mirrored the first decisive act of a Christian—the act of renunciation.

* * * *

A TRINITY OF YEARS has sped by. It’s nighttime in a garden. A sallow moon peers through gnarled, olive branches—paled with the forethought of what she would soon look upon. Beneath an ancient tree, a solitary figure kneels in prayer. He is alone—yet not alone—near by are others, but they are wrapt in slumber. Even the knowledge of their Master’s deep concern cannot deny tired eyes their needed rest.

Because he sees tomorrow and shrinks from his suffering, Christ has brought apart with him three friends. He needs them to strengthen this night’s resolve. How human to reach a groping hand toward those you trust when foundations threaten to collapse! How disheartening to see those hands brushed aside by human claims and earthly cares, and find oneself alone to face life’s tragedy! He bears the night alone as he must bear the morrow. Alone he feels the cutting edge of fear—fear of sharp physical pain tearing apart the bond that holds body and spirit together. The friendly night becomes a threatening menace, hiding in her sombre shadows a traitor and a tyrant’s band. He sees the dark angel reaching toward him the goblet of hemlock, and sweat of ruddy hue stands out upon his brow.

He thinks about his mission. There had been an elation in those first years when thousands ate from his bounty, and the sick and desolate revived to his touch. If he saw it at all, the tragedy of tonight seemed far away. But now—now it was upon him. His eyes seek out his sleeping friends. One time their protestations of loyalty were reassuring. He felt a certain confidence in trusting to their hand the unfinished task. He looks at them again. The darkness cannot hide their infirmities.

He turns to God.

His God is not a figment of superstitious awe. His God is real. They share a common speech, a common message; together they had trod Galilean hills—Father and Son sharing a fellowship of service. But tonight—tonight when the black shadows of hell creep close around, tonight when human friends have deserted and raised a traitor’s hand, tonight God seems far away.

Something is happening in Gethsemane this night. Something is changing Jesus the man into Jesus the Master. The mystery of it never fades. With all the urgency of life, Jesus shrank from death, but now, through some mysterious alchemy of spirit, he throws off the shackles of fear, and in an act of surrender, lays himself at the feet of God—not pleading mercy, not demanding protection, not shouting the claims of a favored son. In humble self-abnegation, he voices his final choice: "Thy will be done."

With these words, he performs the second decisive act of a Christian—the act of surrendering.

THE VULTURES CIROLED HIGH above a skull-shaped knoll. Three trees grew on that knoll. Planted in the morning, they already had borne their ghastly fruit.

Hard-faced sons of Rome had long since harvested the crops of two, only to cast them into a common ditch. As the dark legions of hell joined forces with the night, two other reapers climbed the hill to claim the harvest of the third. They were ill-chosen for the task—noblemen, Sanhedrinists, who last night had lacked the courage to defend the Nazarene. They came tonight in tardy repentance, bearing the writ of spineless Pilate. Together they placed the ladder against the cross, drew out the nails, and lowered the body to the ground. With the aid of faithful women, they bound his head in a napkin; and when they had anointed his wounds with myrrh and aloes, they bound him about with a white winding sheet and covered him with a linen cloth. Then gently, reverently, they carried him to a new tomb carved from the rock. It was to have been the final resting place of Joseph of Arimathea; but Joseph took no thought of that now as he and Nicodemus laid down the body of Jesus, and with the help of Roman guards, rolled the mighty stone against the door.

The dark legions of hell had triumphed, scattering to attic and cellar the apostles of a bright new world. The reign of convention was entrenched upon the throne. The next day was Passover Sabbath. Again a sacrificial lamb was selected by the priest and slain—a sin offering for the people.

Tradition was served. The people stayed indoors, save for a pair of Roman guards who loafed in boredom at the tomb, dreaming of the gay life in the capital and cursing the fate that sent them to this desolate post.

The Sabbath passed.

OUT OF THE EAST came the heralds of a new day. Out of the city, faithful in their duty to the dead, came the women, bearing in their arms traditional ointments to complete the burial rites. And as they walked, they talked in hushed sorrow, wondering if the guards would help them roll the rock away.

YOU HAVE HEARD a hundred times the tale of that eventful morning. You have caught in song and story the ecstasy of joy that finally came when certainty vanished doubt. You have felt the thrill of new courage when the truth of that event became pertinent to your own grief or fear. The question of the angels of the tomb has rung down through the centuries. It challenges us today. It calls us to the third decisive act of a Christian: "Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

The body Jesus wore in life arose from that stone bench. The winding sheet, and linen cloth and napkin were laid aside. His body, pierced by nail and spear, came forth. The glory of that act, banishing death and bringing life, lifted cowards to the stature of heroes and sent an errant discipleship out to the ends of the earth with a compelling message.

YET MORE THAN A BODY came forth from that tomb. There was born that Sunday morning a militant truth. In Jerusalem, in Rome, in a thousand other places, men have pitted their wits and pens against that truth and written tons of explanations. Those who wrote are long since forgotten, yet the truth lives on: the truth that there is no death, that there is in man an immortal essence—a spiritual consciousness that lifts this temporal experience into a new dignity by identifying it as a segment of eternity.

More yet came forth from the Arimathean's tomb. There was born that day in Jerusalem a new purpose—a great commission—a task so magnificent, so challenging, so extensive, that only the courage born of a great victory would be adequate to its demands.

"Why seek ye the living among the dead?" Why hold on to the shallow satisfactions of physical gratification when there exists before you the untried banquet in the household of God? Why be satisfied with a pointless striving for things that have never satisfied, when just ahead lies the road to new adventure with a risen Christ?

WITH DEADLY MONOTONY we turn again to stultifying escapes in movie theaters, cheap fiction, and pointless gossiping while men and women and children are being warped by their ignorance of Christ. The years pass, and they and we pass with them, because there never was life in the goals we sought.

"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

Why trust your treasures of faith and hope to institutions long since separated from all that gives vitality and future to life—a living, loving God and his risen Son?

"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

Why build your life on philosophies that deny with materialistic logic the continuity of life? It may not be logical—it may not be scientific, but Jesus lives. He lives and rules in subtle ways the affairs of men. Other men have lived and ruled. Great Rome had many emperors who ruled most of the world—but who remembers them now? Jesus lived in a smaller world than theirs. He trod the little road from Nazareth to Jerusalem and back again. But now he lives in all the world and bids us share it with him.

"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

How can we hope to find eternal satisfaction in the little selfish goals we set for ourselves? Jesus calls us to a nobler task. He challenges us to rebuild our world—to seek with Abraham "a city whose builder and maker is God," to share with Isaiah the task of casting up a highway for the people—a highway that leads to the city of righteousness.

The call of the Risen Christ is ringing in our ears. It calls us to the third decisive Christian act—the act of regeneration of self and society. Jesus answered the call with a victory for all mankind. What will your answer be?

Easter Challenge

By Don Booz

If I were to stop and think how many times previous to this writing I have seriously pondered on the significance of Easter, I would have to admit the occasions would be limited.

In my adolescent years, Easter meant a spectacular search for gaily-colored eggs and a day of overindulgence at the family dining table. Now it seems my early impression, though modified, is carrying on as my philosophy of Easter.

Historically speaking, Easter is a Teutonic word which evolved from the name of the goddess of spring. And it is easily associated with spring. It introduces a new season after a period of dead, winter atmosphere. There is, however, something more spectacular to Easter than the season of the year or brightly-colored eggs. It is the celebration of Christ's resurrection. His death was a way in which a sinful world could be warned and raised to God's standard. Through the Resurrection, he proved to the world that there is such a thing as life after death. This is a challenge to people today, especially young people, to live lives of virtue that cannot die.

In the Shadow of the Cross — By RUBY TINKHAM

THE DISCIPLES flung their restless bodies down on the steep hillside and waited impatiently while the Master paused quietly afar off. Unanswered questions hung in the hot, dusty air, as they cast inquiring glances first at one another, and then, as always, back to him. How could he sit there so composed knowing that Jerusalem was seething with opposition toward him? Couldn't he see that coming here now was a dangerous mistake?

On the road below, small groups of happy pilgrims formed an endless parade, intent on making this Passover week one of joyful reunion. Peter kicked a small stone boyishly, and then stood up eagerly—the Master was beckoning; maybe he had changed his mind. John followed Peter, and the others waited, alert for any sign that they were to resume their journey.

Only Judas watched with growing animosity as the Master gave instructions and the two hastened to obey. The others settled back reluctantly against the hillside and then later straightened up in surprise. Peter and John were returning, and they were leading a colt—a young, unsaddled colt. Seeing that the Master fully intended to ride, they generously threw their cloaks over the animal and then stood back proudly, waiting for the gentle smile that always revealed their Master's pleasure whenever they anticipated his needs.

Back on the crowded highway, with the Master leading, the men took their places soberly in the gay procession that was winding its way down to Jerusalem. Around and ahead of them the news was traveling like wildfire that Jesus was coming! Those who had heard of his marvelous deeds joined enthusiastically with those who had felt his miraculous healing power. They threw palm branches in his path and sang, "Hosanna to the Son of David: blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest!"

The disciples looked at one another in delight. Why he looked like a king riding regally into the royal stronghold. And they had been afraid—afraid when the very prophets themselves had said, "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion, shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation: lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass."

Even Judas felt his spirits soar. At last the Master was accepting homage, courting that vast field of public opinion which would play such an important role later on when he was ready to strike for the kingdom. Judas smiled in anticipation, and his sensitive fingers lovingly caressed the little bag that hung at his side. This was more like it! Those Pharisees, now—they had wanted Jesus to quiet the multitude, but he hadn't. The Master had held his own this time and replied firmly, "I tell you that, if these shall hold their peace, the stones will cry out."

Then Judas felt the flick of anger seering into his soul. Those Romans—vile, insufferable swine—they wouldn't be standing around here much longer, jeering and tossing crude insults, laughing scornfully at his Master. Jesus would show them; he'd grind their proud military might into the dust and they'd learn the real meaning of "King of the Jews."

On to the temple pressed the little group, and there an eager crowd waited happily to acclaim the Master. They jostled one another good-naturedly in friendly attempts to get closer to him and miss none of his teaching. They were impressed by such simplicity in one so famous. On every hand exclamations of approval were heard: "How marvelously he teaches"—"Why, even a child could understand." And yet, here and there were those held thoughtful and less complacent as if, underneath that gentle kindness, they detected a note of warning.

THE NEXT DAY expectant groups of people made their way joyfully to the temple, hoping to find Jesus there. They were amazed to find the streets full of excited people and frightened animals. Even the priests seemed to have lost their precious cloak of untouchability and were seen mingling freely with the crowd. Some were smiling, and they spoke in low, exultant tones, "You should have seen him—he was like the prophets of old!" Others were angry and spoke menacingly, "He said we had made the house of God a den of thieves." And the elect were venomous with, "He has no authority; he must go!"

The disciples were distressed. It was evident the majority did not understand that the Son of God had the moral right to cleanse his own Father's house. They looked around them worriedly. Couldn't these people see that they could not buy and sell with God, but that every sacrifice must be one of love from the heart? Would they ever believe that this thing was not done in anger at their treatment of him but to show disapproval of their methods of sacrifice?

Dejection followed quickly on the heels of their recent exhilaration, and they hovered anxiously around their beloved Master when, early the next morning, they saw a group of Jewish rulers push their way arrogantly through the crowd. The disciples glanced at one another meaningfully, filled with the same baleful thought: "Here they come, sons of the devil, to trap our Lord."

A smooth, oily voice emerged, "Tell us by what authority doest thou these things?"

Peter, under the quiet scrutiny of his Master, held a rigid check on his temper, but anger swelled the cords in his neck, and he was fairly bursting to shout, "Oh, you fools! How dare you question his authority!"

But the Master replied with serenity, "The baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men?"

The disciples grinned, for they read consternation on the faces of those ingenious oracles of great wisdom. There was no doubt about it—they were confounded by the simple, artful question that deftly led them back through the maze of their own trickery. They were trapped!

But they didn't give up. Back again they came, and this time asked casually, "Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar?"

The crowd gasped in astonishment. Surely the Master would never be able to get out of this one! But he answered quietly, "Render, therefore, unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's and unto God the things which be God's."

The disciples heaved a joint sigh of relief, for it was evident that their Master needed assistance from no man. Besides, it was good to see these sly foxes crawl back into their holes. Peter would have liked to slap his leg and laugh uproariously, but the Master wouldn't like that, so he contained himself with great effort.

John, who had edged closer and closer until he could reach out and touch the Master, asked himself, "How can he sit there so quietly and wait so patiently for the crowd to cease murmuring?" The Master raised his eyes and held John's in a long look of understanding.

When one of the scribes asked, "Which is the first commandment of all?" the Master's voice rang out clear and strong, vibrant with love and power as if in answer to John's silent question. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." And then, in the dramatic silence that followed, he held them all spellbound while he continued, "And the second is like unto it, namely this, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The crowd, disciples and all, was held in a disturbing mood of silent contemplation. "And no man after that durst ask him any question."

PHILIP WATCHED THE MULTITUDE disperse with a feeling of despair. Every day now there were fewer of them. Why hadn't the Master accepted the invitation from those Greeks this morning to visit their country and teach? It would be safe there, and he could come back here later after he had achieved success abroad. But, no, he had refused to see them. Philip shook his head worriedly and looked at Andrew, but Andrew was puzzled too. Both of them were remembering what the Lord had said, "The hour is come, that the Son of Man should be glorified."

How did he mean glorified? Didn't he realize that many were not coming back to hear him teach? Only this morning Peter had an argument in the market place because someone had called the Lord a blasphemer and a perverter. Judas was sullen and thought they should be secretly recruiting forces for the conflict ahead. James advised caution, and Matthew said it was the loss of revenue at the temple that was really causing the trouble. John was busy, as always, smoothing out ruffled feelings so the Master could work in peace.

Philip spoke up anxiously, "Do you suppose he knows how people have turned against him?"

Judas flared up in anger, "Of course he knows; he'll do something when the time is ripe." And then bitterly, "And we should be helping him."

Andrew interposed quietly, "I don't think the Master intends to use force, Judas."

Judas sneered triumphantly, "You heard what he said when we were walking with him in the temple this morning, 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, which shall not be thrown down.' What do you make of that?"

Matthew spoke up firmly, "That was a prophecy, Judas. The Master never destroys." Then Matthew turned his eyes lovingly upon the temple standing majestic and solemn in the radiance of the afternoon sun. The Master had been very sad when he delivered that prophecy, and no wonder. This was the earthly representation of his Father's house. Here was the rich storehouse of all the beautiful traditions in Jewish history. What memories it held for him—his pilgrimages here as a child, his early teaching here with the scribes and wise men. Matthew sighed. He wished he might ask the Lord some questions concerning that prophecy. It bothered him.

Peter, who had been gone, burst excitedly into the group. He towered over them, his huge fists clenching as he talked, "Do you know what they're saying down there? Why the whole city is mad—crazy I tell you! They're yelling, 'Get rid of this blasphemer!' 'Kill the traitor!' 'Destroy Christ!' It's awful, I tell you."

They looked apprehensively at each other, and none noticed that Judas had unobtrusively left the group with a look of determination on his handsome face. His footsteps carried him to Caiaphas' house where he conceived a plot that had been festering in the deepest recesses of his mind for some time. As he left the house of the high priest, he thought to himself, "I could have had much more than thirty pieces of silver had I chose to do so, but that is enough, for soon the Master will have to call on his legions of angels to save himself. Then we shall all be rich. Perhaps I shall even have an opportunity to put these sniveling Galileans in their places."

EVENING CAME QUICKLY, and the disciples felt safe and reassured in a secret room with the Master close by. Never had he seemed so radiant. Even when they quarreled among themselves about who would be greatest, he gave no reprimands. He simply arose quietly and took a basin of water and towel and washed each man's feet. Shame was written on their faces, and when he came to Peter, who could no longer stand this lesson in humility, Peter cried imploringly, "Thou needest not to wash my feet."

But the Master replied with authority, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me."

Under the spell of this lesson, the Master went back to the table and turning to Judas, so that none could hear, he said sadly, "That thou doest, do quickly."

The Master looked on his disciples with love and compassion. They needed so much, and there was so little time left. Words of great beauty, comfort, and truth fell from his lips. He told them they must pray the Father in his name. He called them friends rather than servants. He said they would be inspired, directed, and strengthened by another comforter which he would send. Peter, anxious to reaffirm his love for his Master, hastened to protest earnestly, "Lord, I am ready to go with you, both into prison, and unto death."

The Lord answered him warningly, "I tell you, Peter, that the cock shall not crow this day, before you will thrice deny that you know me."

Then out into the thick darkness the little band made its way to the Mount of Olives. It was easy to see that the Master was exceedingly sorrowful, and those who followed were filled with a sense of foreboding. They watched him go on alone, and they knew he was praying.

It was difficult for them to keep their eyes open after such a strenuous day, and they dozed fitfully. Peter felt sure the Master was greatly disappointed when he returned to them for encouragement and found them sleeping—not once, but three times!

John awoke and was horrified at the sight of his beloved Master suffering such untold agony. There were great drops of blood like sweat on his forehead, and, in the quietness of that garden, there was the constant reverberation of, "Not what I will, but what Thou wilt."

Finally into the gloom of that quiet garden, Judas came stealthily, followed by a mob bearing torches and armed with swords and staves. The Master stepped forward protectively, and Judas rushed up and kissed him! Oh, the revulsion, the sickening horror of that kiss! Even the Master looked shocked.

Peter, always the impetuous, drew his sword and cut off an enemy ear. The Master shook his head in gentle remonstrance and replaced the ear with his usual kindness. The disciples glanced at one another inquiringly; they were only beginning to understand that they were now never to use physical violence in his behalf, for they were his representatives before the world. Then, with increasing premonition of the ordeal ahead, they fled!

JESUS WENT WILLINGLY, first to Annas, who was father-in-law to Caiaphas, the high priest. This was merely a preliminary questioning to discover what his defense would be, and he did not deign to answer their insulting questions. Peter, who had followed timidly afar off, felt his heart swell with pride at his Lord's composure and complete mastery of this heinous situation. He moved closer to warm himself at the fire and knew immediately that he had made a mistake. Now they were all watching him and casting questioning glances in his direction.

Laughingly they pointed him out as a friend of the Master's, and Peter, terrified in that air of legal mockery and derision, shouted hysterically, "I know not this man of whom ye speak." Three times Peter raised his voice in denial, then lifting his eyes to the Master, he caught the glance of sorrowing reproach, and Peter rushed out into the night weeping bitterly.

At daylight, they took Jesus before the chief priests. In this pious atmosphere, surrounded by false witnesses, there was the feeling of frantic urgency and scheming haste. They plied him with malicious questions, hoping to incriminate him on some charge, but he remained silent until one of them asked, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God."

Under the magnetism of his luminous personality, the whole room seemed to grow smaller as he replied, "Thou hast said."

Around him, meaningful glances of scornful superiority were exchanged; the air was charged with smug complacency and evil conspiracy as Jesus was hauled off to appear before Pilate.

Pilate was worried. Besides the dire warnings from his wife, his Roman sense of justice shied away from condemning this quiet, composed Nazarene who in no way resembled a fanatic or zealot. He fluttered weakly against the pressure of the powerful Sanhedrin and muttered, "I find in him no fault at all," and sent him on to Herod.

Herod was exultant. At last he had a chance to meet this itinerant prophet, this second John the Baptist! Perhaps he could even goad him into performing one of his miracles. Taunts and insults were followed by the soldiers' arraying Jesus in gorgeous apparel and plaiting him a crown of thorns. Then, tired of their sport or shamed by his courageous silence, he sent him back to Pilate.

THE FEW FRIENDS the Master had left were huddled hopelessly together. They were aghast at the spectacle of the bloodthirsty multitude waiting outside Pilate's court for his decision. The priests and scribes had done their work well, for hysteria and hatred had combined forces to work the people into a pitch of excitement necessary for an act of violence. There was the fetid smell of madness in the air, and the insane desire to kill mounted higher and higher with each screaming voice: "He is a blasphemer!" "He ought to die!" "It is better for one man to die than for a whole nation to perish!" "He'll bring Rome down on us!" "Crucify him!"

Hurry, hurry, hurry . . . if they stopped to think, they might remember how he had healed their sick, blessed their little ones, opened their minds to the truth, and even raised their dead. Hurry, hurry . . . "Release unto us, Barabbas!" But Jesus, the Son of God, "Crucify him!"

So Pilate weakly acceded to their murderous demands, and an innocent man suffered the most cruel death human barbarity could devise.

JOHNS COULD HARDLY BEAR to raise his eyes and see him hanging there on the cross. Every wound in that unresisting flesh was a lash laid across his own back. Every jeer and taunt echoed in his ears until a kind of madness made it sound as if it were coming from his own lips. How could Jesus stand it? And yet he refused anything to lessen his pain.

Then John felt the Master's eyes upon him and saw a weeping woman beside him. John moved closer to catch the words of love and compassion, "Behold thy mother!" John's heart leaped . . . the Master still loved and trusted him.

Then Jesus turned to the thief beside him, and it was evident from the look of peace on the man's face that the Master had given him some wonderful promise.

Could there be any more? But wait, now he was watching the Roman soldiers who were drunkenly shooting dice for his few clothes. John leaned forward in amazement, for the Master was saying, "Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do."

Then, "It is finished." Darkness smothered the land and thunder and lightning created havoc. Great rocks were split asunder, trees were uprooted, and, as if portending the impending disaster, the temple veil was rent in twain. There was weeping, wailing of remorseful hearts, and anguished minds condemned themselves with, "Truly, this man is the Son of God."

They took his body down gently, wrapped it tenderly, and laid it away. Then the real darkness descended. Deepest despair settled on those who loved him most.

MARY MAGDALENE was heartbroken. He who had made life so precious to others had sacrificed his own, and now there was nothing left. What would they do? Where would they go? Whom could they turn to? Sleepless, she hurried through the gloom of early morning on the first day of the week, finding comfort in another trip to the tomb where her Master lay.

Her feet were bruised against the stones, for she traveled rapidly, a strange anticipation pounding wildly in her heart. Breathless, she stopped in amazement, for the stone was rolled away! The Master was gone! They had taken him away!

Great, racking sobs shook her body and, turning to leave, she saw a man she thought to be the gardener. Raising a tearstained face, she faltered, "Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away."

The voice came softly, tenderly, filled with illuminating radiance, "Mary, Mary."

Instantly she fell at his feet, and cried joyously, "MASTER! MASTER!"

"Angels of Mercy"

By Eleanor Russell

HOW OFTEN we have heard someone say, "Be a nurse? Never! I can't stand the sight of blood!" Not long ago I silently thanked my heavenly Father that two splendid young women had been able to "stand the sight of blood" and to go through three years of rigorous training in order to bring relief to the suffering.

A loved one in my sister's family was dangerously ill. The time came for a serious operation. Nurses were scarce—in fact, there were no special nurses available. Everyone turned in confidence to the older daughter of the family, a registered nurse. The rest of us could only watch and pray, but here was one who had been trained to care for the sick, to make them comfortable. I often think yet of Aliene's soft voice saying as she brought her father a hypo, "I'm going to 'stick you,' Daddy," and of her father's look of pride and faith. Then I remember the anxious hours during the long and grueling operation, an operation so rare that there was just one chance in a thousand of survival. Literally hours of waiting went by. When we thought we could bear the suspense no longer, Aliene appeared with a faint, reassuring smile, to tell us that only the first phase of the operation was over, but that thus far all was well.

The patient eventually was brought back to his room. By some miracle, another nurse was secured. Blood transfusions were given. We watched more than twenty pints of blood plasma disappear into the sick man's veins. Did any of us say, "Take it away; I can't stand the sight of blood!"? No, we did not. Those bottles of plasma meant life to one of our family.

Two hours past midnight, the night nurse was urged to go off duty for a rest. Shortly thereafter the doctor came, carefully examined the patient and said, "This may be the crisis." We didn't know how it happened, but the extra nurse reappeared as if by magic. She stayed the remainder of the night. The help she gave will never be forgotten. As I watched those two nurses work quietly and effectively through the anxious hours that followed, again and again I thought, "Angels of Mercy." No other term could begin to describe them. No angels could have looked more beautiful or have been more welcome to us than those white-uniformed nurses. And only "mercy" could describe the compassion they had for their patient.

Even though we had to eventually

The Significance of Easter — By RAYMOND GRIFFITH

OF ALL THE HOLIDAYS in the Christian calendar, one in particular is outstanding. This day is Easter. The significance of Easter cannot be over-rated, because if Easter loses its meaning, all Christian religion becomes meaningless.

Christmas, with its joyousness, its eager anticipation, and quiet mysticism, is in celebration of events which changed the whole course of man's religious experience. Yet, Christmas emphasizes only the beginning—the alpha—the first in a chain of related events which constitutes the plan for man's redemption in actual operation.

Christmas celebrates the events which opened the door that man might re-enter and partake of those things provided for him in the beginning. Easter represents the culmination of all these events, the climax, the glorious fulfillment without which all Christian religions lack foundation, and all hope and faith in future life is vain.

Christmas brings to mind the Christ as a babe, possessed of those lovable characteristics of all children, physically weak and wholly dependent on his parents for his very life; yet, full of promise and glorified by the effect of those particular circumstances surrounding his birth.

The first Easter reveals Christ at the peak of his mental and spiritual powers, the result of years of preparation for the particular occasion. It shows him at the accomplishment of the very purpose of his earthly existence.

He is no child now, but victor over the greatest forces his enemies could muster against him. He assumes proportions and qualities never before nor since accorded to mortal man. His every word on that great occasion echoes and re-echoes down the corridors of time, reiterating the magnitude of the event.

IN THE SPRING of every year, seed is planted in the earth and begins to grow. This fact, through its annual repe-tion, tends to be accepted as a matter of course. Yet, if we will but pause for thought, it becomes evident just how omnipresent the principle of resurrection really is.

We have seen how the seed must die before new life takes place, as exemplified by the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ. So, with every year, through the rebirth of leaf and bud and ear, we are brought face to face with evidence in proof of the great significance of the events which Easter commemorates.

Science has, to a large degree, accepted and verified the Biblical account of the creation of the world, and most historians agree that such a person as Christ really lived and performed great works. But, neither science nor history nor all the other accumulated wisdom of the ages can explain completely the annual miracle of renewed life and growth in field and tree. These things are symbolic of those great events of 1900 years ago and can but remind us of their great importance to all men who have lived, who now live, and who will live on this earth.

The many great miracles performed by Christ during his earthly ministry pale into insignificance when compared with his resurrection. The importance of his resurrection is not due alone to the fact that he was able to lay down his life and then take it up again, but rather because he had made it possible for all men in due time to do likewise, and because he had proved beyond all doubt that man can look forward to life beyond the grave and to an existence far superior to that which we now know.

Once again at Easter time, it behooves all men to pause and consider those happenings and principles which are brought so vividly to our attention by the observance of this holiday in commemoration of the greatest event in all world history.

God is working to redeem the world, not merely waiting to receive the refugees of an unredeemed society.

The Witness of the Church in Home and Pulpit

By APOSTLE ARTHUR A. OAKMAN

Minister in charge of North Central States

IN LINE with the insistent and oft-renewed emphasis in the Quorum of Twelve that missionary work should proceed from large centers outward, and that branches of the church should be built to the point of rigid stability, we organized a missionary campaign in Detroit.

Elders Blair McClain and James Daugherty, under the direction of the minister in charge, were responsible for the planning and execution of the effort. They were assisted by Brothers Ray Ashenhurst, Luther Troyer, and Wallace Jackson. The results were very satisfactory.

The project was discussed some four months ago, and Elder McClain canvassed his large and populous district for cottage meeting opportunity and nonmember prospects. These were brought together under his able leadership so that at the end of January, Brother Daugherty went into Detroit with the others named and supervised the actual presentation of the message and the use of visual aid equipment.

First of all, there was a general meeting of the pastors and priesthood of the area. These men were addressed by Elder Daugherty with deep feeling and moving inspiration so that their co-operation and spiritual support were adequately secured. All during the next five weeks these men worked indefatigably in their spiritual exercises in support of the effort.

Every morning Elder Daugherty and the other appointees mentioned went over their lectures which were to be delivered in the cottages in various parts of the city. On the last morning they met, a rich endowment of the divine Spirit was experienced, although only five or six men were present. At these morning meetings, slides were arranged, the men talked about the various experiences they had in the meetings from night to night, and questions of nonmembers were discussed. These missionaries supported each other with confidence and mutual regard. Under the able direction of Elder Daugherty, they captained a team each night supported by a member of the local priesthood.

The lectures used in the series were: "Birth and Life of Christ," "The Building of the Church," "The Influence of Christ in Pre-Columbian America," "The Apostasy and Restoration," and "The Coming Forth of the Book of Mormon."

IN ALL, 217 nonmembers attended these cottage meetings with enthusiastic interest. The doctrine of the church was readily received by them, and the door of the church was opened effectually.

One of the interesting things to note was that nonmembers would frequently speak appreciatively of the outstanding merits of good church members who were trying to live the gospel. Many of the prospects were Roman Catholics who would not attend a formal church service but were anxious to hear and gladly attended cottage meetings.

Uninterested nonmember husbands and wives manifested a new warmth toward the church because there was able representation on an intensely personal basis in the home.

Of the 217 nonmembers who attended these cottage meetings, thirty-seven were baptized, twenty-eight of whom were adults. As a result of the total effort, over 150 favorable prospects remain in the area for further follow-up work. It is certain that the church will be receiving them through the ordinance of baptism for months and months to come.

The cottage meetings were climaxed during the week of February 27 to March 6 by intense preaching ministry. Elder Luther Troyer gave a very fine series at Goddard Road; Elder James Pycock preached at River Rouge; Elder James Daugherty spoke at Windsor; and the writer preached a series following a dedication at the new Royal Oak church.

March 6, when the candidates were baptized, was a great day.

IT IS DIFFICULT to assess or credit different members of the ministry with a certain number of decisions each; we will not attempt to do so but leave the probable record of this for the files of the office. We deeply appreciate the excellent ministry rendered by all who participated and are grateful to Apostle Percy Farrow for permitting Ray Ashenhurst to help. He did an outstanding job among a very fine and cultured group of people.

Cottage meeting missionary work with the use of visual aids climaxed by an intense preaching witness has paid off in large dividends. Although five weeks were expended in this one effort by five appointees, the benefits in training and mutual helpfulness seem beyond calculation. Elder McClain, the presiding leader in Detroit, writes that the missionary effort has permeated the entire area, and increasingly eager missionary expectancy has been created in the heart of every active Latter Day Saint.

Is your child GETTING READY FOR BAPTISM?

"This Is Jesus' Church"

A PRE-BAPTISMAL MANUAL

This booklet of 72 pages is offered to help prepare the children eight to eleven years to take their place in our church. It presumes that they have had religious training in their homes and in our church schools. It is a summary course and a new approach to build intelligent loyalties to the kingdom of God ideals. There are 7 lessons which may be taught to a class, preferably by the pastor, or they may be taught by parents in the home.

BRIEFS

Pastors or branch correspondents are encouraged to write to the Saints' Herald News Editor, Herald House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri, for a list of helps for news reporters.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—The four Oriole circles of the Stone Church area presented their third annual First-Nighter program on Friday, March 18, in the Little Theater of the Stone Church. Some sixty Orioles took part in the event which was given to help the girls increase their funds for Oriole camp next summer. Included was a showing of a colored movie taken by Mrs. Pearl Wilcox, portraying exhibits and the work of Orioles in attaining their badges.

The student nurses of the Independence Sanitarium School of Nursing presented a variety show on March 10 at the Stone Church Little Theater. This program helped raise funds so the girls could publish Ish, a yearbook, next year. The "Ish" stands for the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

The Boy Choir of Stone Church gave its first performance under the directorship of Glenn Fairbanks at the early service on March 13. About forty boys, third through eighth grade, sang in the choir.

Mrs. Mattie Willis, from Battle Creek, Michigan, while coming to Kansas City for a concert at the Paseo Baptist Church, was the guest soloist in several Independence churches on Sunday, March 27. She sang at both the 8:15 and 11:00 o'clock services at Stone Church. At 9:30, she sang in the Enoch Hill congregation. At 7:30 in the evening, she sang at South Crysler. The following Tuesday she sang at the Campus Shop for the workers in their morning worship service. Mrs. Willis was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Amy Robbins. Mrs. Willis is a lyric soprano and has done considerable concert work in the middle west.

The Zion's Leagues of Independence celebrated the Restoration Festival Week with several outstanding events. On April 3, at 8:45, in the Stone Church upper auditorium, students of Graceland College, under the sponsorship of the Stone Church Senior League, dramatized an "on the spot" broadcast of the martyrdom of Joseph Smith with a program called, Carthage Jail—1844.

On Wednesday night, April 6, the Leagues met in four separate groups for fellowship services.

The Festival Banquet was held on Friday evening, April 8, at 7:00 p.m., in the South Crysler gymnasium, with President E. J. Gleazer, Jr., of Graceland College, as speaker.

The week was climaxed on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 5:00 p.m., in the Walnut Park church with a pageant, "The Solid Rock."

The Zion's Leagues of Stone Church have been making special drives to help the building fund. The teen-age League presented $30 to the pastor, and the senior League presented $500 as a result of a chili supper and personal contributions.

All congregations united with all other Christian churches in Independence in observing the last week of Christ's life. In the Reorganized Latter Day Saint congregations on each evening beginning with Palm Sunday and ending with Easter, services were held. The same themes were used in all congregations. Speakers included: Donald Lents, Englewood; Samuel Balsler, Enoch Hill; W. E. Wakeman, East Independence; D. B. Sorden, Liberty Street; Henry Schaefer and William LaGrece, Mount Washington; A. K. Dillee, Second Church; A. C. Martin, Slover Park;

Lewis J. Richards, South Crysler; Glaude A. Smith, Stone Church; C. V. Graham, Spring Branch; Clyde Baker, Sugar Creek; Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Walnut Park (combined with Guggell Park and Eden Heights).

ALBUQUERQUE, NEW MEXICO.—Apostle Charles Hield stopped with this group for two evenings en route from Los Angeles to Independence. On March 10, he preached a sermon and showed slides of Hawaii. On March 11, he showed slides of Southern Mexico ruins and lectured on the Book of Mormon. This group of five or six families meets once a week for study in the homes of the Saints and on the first Sunday of each month for the Communion.

The Saints of Albuquerque will appreciate visits from other Saints and from traveling ministry. Contact A. A. Barrett, Route 3, Box 181; phone 3-9502.

BISHOP DELAPP IN ANN ARBOR.—Bishop G. L. DeLapp met March 12 and 13 with a group of young college people at Ann Arbor, Michigan. They were students from the University of Michigan, the University of Chicago, Wayne University of Detroit, and from East Lansing.

ELDORADO, KANSAS.—Mrs. Pauline Arnsion, chairman of the general department of women, was in Eldorado for the Kansas District Women's Institute in early March. Approximately ninety women attended. Clyde Shannon, district president, Hazel Gose, district women's president, and Mary Robinson, district music leader, carried heavy responsibilities in the successful institute.

MARLIN, TEXAS.—Arthur Rock is the pastor of this congregation while he is attending school. He preaches each Sunday evening at 7:00 p.m. to a large congregation on the subject of the Restoration Movement. The junior choir rehearses each Sunday at 5:00, in preparation for an Easter program. Wednesday night prayer services have an average attendance of about twenty-five. Each Friday night a fellowship group meets to study. Their text is Book of Mormon Studies. On the fourth Friday of each month, they have a social evening.

PONTIAC, ILLINOIS.—Evangelist Ray Whiting of Independence, Missouri, completed a two weeks' series of missionary services on Sunday, March 20. Four were baptized: John Leathers of Forrest, Illinois; Miles Brown of Chenoa, Illinois; George Dennerwitz, Chatsworth, Illinois; and Dorris McKinney, Cornell, Illinois.

DEKALB, ILLINOIS.—On Friday evening, March 4, the men of this branch gathered at the home of Pastor Roy F. Healy and organized a Men's Club. This club is organized for cultural and social purposes, as well as making a contribution to the welfare of the branch. They will meet on the first Friday of each month, and part of each evening will be given to cultural activities followed by a social and business period. They meet in the homes of members. The president elected is Edwin Whitney; secretary-treasurer, Harold Powell; and advisor, Roy F. Healy. Among the first projects at hand is the planning of the rehabilitation of the local church.

COLUMBUS, OHIO.—The annual district conference was held at First Church in Columbus, March 12 and 13. Missionary Loyd Adams preached the opening sermon on Saturday evening. Apostle P. E. Farrow preached the sermons Sunday morning and evening. In the business meeting, High Priest F. T. Rockwell was re-elected district president. His counselors for the coming year are High Priest John Booth, city pastor at Columbus, and Elder A. H. Griffen, pastor of Lancaster Branch, southern Ohio District. Some 300 persons attended the 11:00 o'clock service on Sunday morning.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—A group organized last fall in the west part of this city has increasing attendance. The pastor is Wesley Evans. The east side group, under the pastorship of B. Scott Liston, indicates steady growth.

COLUMBUS, OHIO.—A mission on the west part of the city has been organized and meets in the home of Elder C. H. Hamilton. The attendance over the past three months averages about forty. About seventeen of this number are nonmembers.

"Beautiful Hands Are Those That Do"

A tribute to Elder Ernest Roberson of Independence, Missouri, who died at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital on February 22, 1949.

YESTERDAY we buried my father. Yesterday I looked for the last time upon the face of him whose presence has no beginning in my memory. He was always there. My father looked younger in death than he did the last years of life. The wrinkles of age were smoothed out; the hollows dug by the suffering of his last illness were filled in, and he lay peacefully at rest in his narrow bed.

As I stood at my father's side and tried to fix in my memory every detail of his appearance for future thought and personal comfort, my eyes sought his hands. I have always thought that hands tell much about a person; they speak eloquently of the character which activates them. Dad's hands were no exception in this respect.

His hands were always fine hands to me. They were short, well-shaped, and strong—strong, but gentle too. No woman's hands could be more soothing in helping to relieve childish pains and discomforts. One day as I attended him during the weeks of his hospitalization, I held his hand in mine and reminded him of the way he used to rub his hands together to warm his palms before rubbing my head to relieve the ache which made me uncomfortable. I remembered, also, though I did not tell him, of the times I had felt his hands on my head as he anointed me with oil and asked God to bless and heal me of some pain or illness.

I remembered the times he took my hand in his and walked with me the mile and a half over frozen roads to school. It was too rough for the horses, and Dad was afraid I should freeze if I walked alone. Nothing but our own illness ever kept us children from school. Dad would halt his farm work any time (and he was a diligent and industrious worker) to take us when weather conditions made it impossible for us to go alone. I hold in memory, too, the times he would pause in the long trek to lift the scarf which covered my face to protect me from the cold and with gentle but competent hands help me wipe my nose. Tenderly and thoughtfully he watched out for my comfort. When I was thirteen years old and ready for high school, we left the farm. Dad was willing to make the vocational adjustment in order to make it easier for his children to get an education.

The strength of Dad's hands was never more manifest than in the business of administering a spanking. He did it with dispatch and complete thoroughness. Even at such times, however, we never felt shut away from his love. Or if, perhaps, we felt some small resentment, it was soon forgotten, because Dad himself seemed to forget it immediately. We were not eager, however, to repeat the offense, because we knew punishment would come swiftly and surely.

BOTH MY PARENTS were completely saturated with the belief that the kind of home life they established and maintained determined the kind of children they gave to society. Evenings at home when I was a child are a part of my most treasured memory. I have spent a good many years of my life in pursuing education and acquiring the doubtful honors which come with college degrees, but when I analyze my experiences, I know that by far the most valuable part of my education was acquired in my childhood home.

I am glad I did not neglect to tell Dad of the appreciation I have for my early home life while he was yet with us and could feel proud that his efforts had been rewarded with understanding and gratitude. In our evenings at home, Dad's hands held the hymnbook while I sat on the arm of his chair. Mother and the other children were always near by (there are seven of us). Our circle was close and warm, and we sang the songs of praise and worship with unaffected joy and satisfaction. Dad's hands supported the Bible, Autumn Leaves, Zion's Ensign, or Saints' Herald as he read aloud while we all listened. Mother was a superb storyteller and would often have a child on each arm of the rocking chair and one or two in her lap as she recounted the thrilling adventures of various storybook folk and Bible characters. For some reason, we liked the Bible stories best. It may have been she told them better—they were so close to her heart.

Our evenings around the family hearth in our small house did not always take the same form, but they were almost always religious in character, and they always ended by the entire family kneeling in prayer. These experiences were not an ordeal to get through and be done with; they were our most enjoyable experience of the day. We children would never have permitted the day to end without family prayer even if our parents had, on occasion, forgotten. It was as much a part of our living as going to bed at night and getting up in the morning.

NOW, DAD IS GONE, but I remember him in his days of physical vigor when, on numerous occasions, a home column feature

Tidings From Women's Groups

I have seen him stand with one hand on those of a new convert and the other raised toward heaven as he would say, "Having been commissioned of Jesus Christ, I baptize you" At other times, I have seen these same hands laid upon the head of one to be confirmed a member of this church and heard him say, "By virtue of the authority vested in me" His hands have served the bread and wine. His hands received little children to be blessed, and his hands helped to tell the gospel story as he stood in the pulpit and preached with power and much assurance. I have known many preachers, but I have never known one with such a comprehensive knowledge of the Scriptures as my father had. Neither have I known anyone with a stronger conviction concerning the mission of the gospel of Christ.

I remember Dad, also, during the last twenty-seven months of his life when his health was not good and he could not live the full and vigorous life he had hitherto. The last time I visited my parents before Dad was stricken by his last illness, we sat and listened to him read an article he had hoped to get published in the Herald. His hands trembled and shook both in frailty and in fervor as he read, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." He never finished the article, but he brought a message to our hearts that evening.

Truly the work of the hands is activated by character. That is why I remember with love and pride my father's hands in work, in play, in affection, and in churchly duties. If he could speak to us now, I think he might raise his eyes toward heaven, extend his hands toward us, and say, "The Lord bless you and keep you; the Lord make his face to shine upon you . . . and give you peace."

A STORY THAT HAS NO END

by Kate Ward

Here are seven short stories for primary children, each of which illustrates one aspect of the nature of love. 65c

SISTER BESSIE SHUMATE, women's leader of the Northwestern Iowa District, sends her appreciation for the "knowledge and inspiration gathered from the balanced women's program at General Conference." Then continues, "November 7 was the earliest date on which we could have our district women's department cabinet meeting. This cabinet consists of leaders and many assistants. A booklet presenting fourteen minimum standards of excellence and sixteen objectives was prepared and presented to them for their consideration. This had first been approved by the district president and by my three assistants. The cabinet adjusted them to the needs of the groups in the district. The idea for this booklet was suggested to me after reading the pamphlet, A Functioning Women's Department in the Branch, and the objectives prepared by the leaders of the Far West Stake."

Two programs of institutes were enclosed also. It was decided that regional institutes would reach more women than one general meeting, so representatives from five branches assembled at Logan, and those from the remaining four branches met at Dow City. At each institute, the same outline of activities was followed but with different themes and leadership. The two themes were "Our Stewardship" and "Labor Together With God."

THEME: "Our Stewardship"

PROGRAM

9:30 A. M.	Registration and Organization
9:40	Worship Service
9:55	Prayer Service
11:00	Classwork
12:00	Lunch and Social Time
1:30 P. M.	Young Women's Interests
1:45	Classwork
3:00	Consecration Service

SISTER SHUMATE also sends out report blanks to each leader quarterly. These reports ask questions such as:

Name of branch
 Number of women in branch
 Number of meetings held
 Number of home visits, et cetera
 What church literature given out, et cetera

Of additional interest are these which are listed on the blank of the first quarter:

Food and clothing for Saints in Europe
 Letters written—local, abroad
 Youth organizations in branch
 Number of girls in Blue Birds and Orioles, and the number of young people in Scouts, Cubs, active in Zion's League.

In the second quarter blank, these are added:

Have you adopted a family abroad?

In what may I be of help to you?

The leaders are also requested to send in suggestions for themes for the monthly "Nine O'clock Hour of Prayer." The Sioux City group submitted this one, "Seek ye earnestly the best gifts, always remembering for what they are given" (Doctrine and Covenants 46: 4).

The General Department is pleased to pass on this interesting account of activities in the Northwestern Iowa District.

Regret

A golden moment came and I Stood heedless as it passed me by;
 A call to serve came challenging,
 Yet I delayed, unanswering.
 Some trifling thing stood in my way,
 While opportunity sped on,
 And then I found, to my dismay,
 The one I could have helped was gone;
 Departed for that distant shore,
 From whence no traveler can return,
 And deep within my inmost soul,
 Regret, remorse and sorrow burn.

Oh, Lord, forgive the thoughtless one
 Who left this day a task undone.

A Latter Day Saint Looks at the Cross

By WARREN H. CHELLINE

Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me.—Mark 8: 36.

Two thousand years ago, the cross was an instrument of shameful, ignominious torture. The convicted criminal who went to the cross knew his death would be slow and extremely painful. But when the Lord Jesus went to the cross, convicted of the “crime” of claiming to be the Son of God, he made of it an instrument of glory and a symbol of his mission to all the world.

WE DO NOT LOOK on the cross as an item to be venerated; neither do we believe its inclusion in architectural or decorative features creates any mystic alteration in the surroundings. We fail to see any magical aura about the sign of the cross. But, when we understand it correctly, it denotes our whole responsibility to the gospel of Christ.

But just think what that means—“our whole responsibility to the gospel.” In this light, the cross is so much more than a gilded bauble or an automatic gesture. Its message fills our entire lives, just as Jesus intended it to do. Is this any less of an emphasis than we see in the institutions around us? We think not. In fact, it seems to be so much saner, so much more in keeping with the teachings of Jesus, to make the cross a hearty challenge rather than an amulet or a morbid advertisement of religious interest.

There are some very real dangers that always seem to appear when people take this larger, fuller view of the cross. First of all, there is the tendency to eliminate all signs of the visible cross from our church buildings, publications, and ornaments on the ground that such displays are “too much like” some of the more liturgical religious institutions around us. This is unfair to our people. We need the beauty of the symbol of the cross in our environment, just as we need to sing the gospel hymns often to bring us closer to our real purpose by making us feel the lift of God’s love.

Many of our attractive Latter Day Saint chancels emphasize a simple cross, sometimes over a central altar. The effect of such an arrangement seems to help us center our attention where it belongs and to make the most of the experience of worship. No, the sign of the cross cannot teach us anything—we must go elsewhere for instruction—but it can help us feel the urgency of our calling.

We are people who need constantly to be reminded, even about things as important as our saintly duties. The Boy Scouts have portions of their uniforms specially designed to remind them to “do a good turn daily,” and a Latter Day Saint with a tiny cross in his lapel is not going to be any the worse for the wearing of it. Indeed, the experience of some of us seems to indicate—all other things being equal—that he might be considerably better.

THERE IS ANOTHER dangerous attitude that sometimes develops when a Latter Day Saint looks at the cross. He may slip into the habit of associating every one of his major burdens with his bearing of the cross of Christ. This is especially bad when he calls his unavoidable handicaps his “crosses.” Many times we hear people resignedly sigh, "Well, I guess that is just my cross to bear," when referring to some personal handicap. This attitude is wrong on both counts: the cross of the gospel of Christ is not a personal burden, neither is it a handicap.

I AM A LATTER DAY SAINT, and I “cherish the old, rugged cross” as much as any Christian who has ever sung that well-known hymn. But, because I am a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, my view of the cross of Christ is distinctly different from what some of my friends might consider orthodox. Many times the questions have come: “Do you have the cross in your churches?” “Do you believe in the cross?” “Do you use the cross?” I cannot just say, “Yes,” without trying to make it as clear as I can.

First of all, when a Latter Day Saint looks at the cross, he sees that it is an empty cross. There is no dead body of the Christ attached to it, because a Latter Day Saint knows Jesus has risen triumphant above that cross. He lives, and it is surely contrary to our central message to portray him as forever pinned helplessly to the cross.

Let me explain about the "handicap" mistake. A blind man does not choose his blindness—at least I have never heard of one doing so. Yet, Jesus did definitely choose—he was not forced into anything—he deliberately chose to go to the cross, because he knew that to be the best way, and he hoped we would better understand his message through that action. Is it not inaccurate, then, for the blind man to label his affliction his "cross," when actually he has had nothing to do with its acquisition?

I am not blind, but I do have astigmatism in my left eye. Because of it, I need to wear glasses most of the time to keep from getting headaches. Would I be right in saying, "This handicap is my cross to bear"? Certainly not! When I was a very small boy, I inadvertently contracted the measles. As a result of that childhood illness, my eye became astigmatized. I didn't ask for it. I wasn't even consulted. It just happened to me. But when Jesus talks about the cross, he uses words like these: "Come—deny yourself, take up the cross, and follow me." Those are transitive verbs—"action verbs" as we used to call them in school. Evidently I must volunteer to bear the cross of Christ with a definite denial of conflicting influences and a conscious selection of his directions. The Lord Jesus is not going to force any one of us into the circle of his disciples, any more than his Father forced him to come to earth and minister to us. But it is the best way, and both the Father and the Only Begotten Son, as well as all the heavenly hosts, are hoping we will choose to lift high the cross.

NOW LET ME TRY to explain what is wrong about bearing the cross in a "personal" way. The closer a sinner comes to the cross, the less he uses that word personal. And a real Latter Day Saint knows there is no such thing as "personal salvation." Just look at those two words, personal and salvation. If I know anything about words, they do not even belong together. Was Jesus thinking of himself when he carried the cross to Calvary? Was it a "personal" trip? Did he allow those Roman soldiers to spike him to the cross merely so he could see over people's heads? Of course not. He did it for others—for you and me.

It is equally silly for any of us to think we are truly bearing the cross if we are primarily interested in our own soul's salvation. The poet, Henry Van Dyke, says it perfectly in his introduction to The Story of the Other Wise Man:

Who seeks for Heaven alone to save his soul,
May keep the path, but will not reach the goal;
While he who walks in love may wander far,
Yet God will bring him where the blessed are.

I think I know what people mean when they talk about "personal salvation." I think they are trying to express the idea that God is interested in us individually, not just collectively. But I wish they could find a better way of saying it and not use such obviously contradictory words as "personal" and "salvation." One of our missionaries presents the idea remarkably well by saying, "God not only loves all of us, he loves each of us." Surely God is interested in us as individuals, but we cannot serve him as individuals. Only as we are primarily interested in the welfare and salvation of others can we qualify to take up the cross. Only as we express our love for others and make that love the central theme of our lives can we ever hope to be true followers of Christ.

AND NOW here is one more dangerous pitfall to avoid as you look at the cross. Do not think you can determine in advance just where it will lead you. Although you may have chosen to take up the cross, once having made the choice, you should follow the Lord's instructions as to the bearing of it. Don't be surprised if those instructions are not precisely what you had in mind. Joseph Smith went into the woods to pray for wisdom in making a particular choice—which church to join. Having placed himself fully at the disposal of his Lord, he was shocked at the revelation that he should join none of them, but that he would be used as an instrument in the divine restoration of the true church of Jesus Christ. Similarly, when we receive direction, we often may be dumbfounded, because, in our comparative ignorance, we can never attain the inclusive perception of God.

Here, then, are the words of the Christ, as he tries to enlist our services: "Come, deny yourself, take up the cross, and follow me." He begs us to forsake the entanglements of selfishness, then, in the humble spirit of love—for God is love—consciously to make the choice of the way of the cross. Having so chosen, we can expect the heartening, flaming presence of his leadership as we follow him.

Look at that cross; love it and cherish it. And above all, assume the duty it symbolizes. There is no greater triumph nor grander service than that which is so powerfully portrayed in the sign of the cross.

thus far represents a sizable investment in the health of the church and the community.

During this current year, it will take over $84,000 to maintain and operate the Sanitarium School of Nursing alone. After the hospital pays the school for those nursing services rendered by student nurses, there is still a sizable deficit. On behalf of the School of Nursing and those many young women who will be coming to our halls next September, we are asking our friends throughout the church to help us raise $15,000 on Sanitarium Day. In no way can this amount of money be spent for greater benefits to our patients, the church, and those who may become interested in the church.

We are depending upon every branch for an offering as large as each member feels he can possibly give to make the work of the Independence Sanitarium School of Nursing a real work of service to humanity.

Message of Thanks

Sister J. F. Garver wishes to express her thanks to the many friends who have written cards and messages in connection with the passing of her husband, the late President Garver. She appreciates very much the kindness and concern of those who have written and regrets there are so many that she cannot answer them individually. She asks her friends to accept this acknowledgment and word of thanks.

RESOURCES FOR WORSHIP

This is fifty brief scripture interpretations developed for chapel talks. They are marked by stimulating insight into great Bible truths and practical ability to relate these truths to the problems of everyday living. Concise and brief, they offer a wealth of material for brief talks on Biblical themes and for private devotional readings. $2

Golden Wedding Anniversary Celebration

Mr. and Mrs. James H. Davis who live near Independence, Missouri, celebrated their golden wedding anniversary on March 2. Their six children: Mrs. Opal Hands, Mrs. Violet Zimmerman, Alma and Ammon Davis, Mrs. Ruby Curtis, and Mrs. Beulah Lambert; nine grandchildren and three great-grandchildren were present for the occasion. Brother Davis has held the priesthood since he was a young man and has served as pastor of the Columbus, Kansas; Fairland, Oklahoma; and Bates City, Missouri, congregations. All of his descendants who have reached the age of eight are members of the Reorganized Church.

Elder George Beebe, who performed the wedding ceremony on March 2, 1899, at Columbus, Kansas, was also present for the celebration.

ERRATA

On page 11 of the April 9 issue in the article, "The Great Springtime of the Restoration," by Hubert Case (next to last paragraph), the number of converts should read "four preachers and thirty-two members" rather than "a thousand people."

Observe Diamond Wedding Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. Ira Kinsman of St. Thomas, Ontario, observed their diamond wedding anniversary on March 20 with an informal tea and reception at the home of their daughter, Mrs. Fred Cosen. Fifty-two members of their family, including five children, sixteen grandchildren, and sixteen great-grandchildren, were present. Mrs. M. Heyden, Mrs. Kinsman's bridesmaid, also attended the reception.

Mr. Kinsman, a retired stationary engineer, is eighty-six years old and has been a member of the Reorganized Church since August 18, 1897. Mrs. Kinsman, the former Sarah Ann Skelding, is seventy-six years old and has belonged to the church since May 17, 1896. Elder Albert Cordery presented a gift of money to them from members of the St. Thomas Branch on their anniversary.

BIRTHS

A son, Dennis Leroy, was born on December 30, 1948, to Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Fleming of East St. Louis, Illinois. He was blessed on March 27 by Elders H. W. Bounkhorst and Charles Fletcher. Mrs. Fleming is the former Helen Hillier.

A son, Richard Frederick, was born on February 7 to Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Purgahn of St. Charles, Missouri. He was blessed on March 20 by Elders F. E. O'Bryan and David Lehman.

Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Cawfield of Warrensburg, Missouri, announce the birth of a son, James William, born March 21 at the Independence Sanitarium. Mrs. Cawfield is the former Jane Stone.

A son, James Allen, was born on March 27 to Mr. and Mrs. Albert V. Burdick of Sacramento, California. Mrs. Burdick is the former Dorothy May Cline of San Jose, California.

DEATHS

McKINDSEY.—William E., was born on March 31, 1875, in Dillhi, Canada, and died on September 25, 1948, at his home in Detroit, Michigan. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 20, 1908, at Kirtland, Ohio, and was a faithful member throughout his life.

He is survived by his wife, the former Alpheus Roberts; a granddaughter; and three great-grandchildren.

BURGE.—Cora A., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Van Ransler Brundage, was born April 27, 1895, in Inland Township, Benzie County, Michigan, and died March 11, 1949, at Mercy Hospital in Cadillac, Michigan. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1911 and was married to Wiler Park in 1915. Following Mr. Park's death, she was married on November 7, 1926, to Amos Burge, who passed away on December 9, 1948. One son also preceded her in death. Sister Burge, an active worker in the church, was serving as leader of the women's department in Marion, Michigan, at the time of her death.

She is survived by a son, Donald, of the home; three sisters; and three brothers. Elders Byron Doty and Alvin Ellis conducted the funeral service. Interment was in the Middlebranch Cemetery.

PENTICUFF.—Clarence M., was born in Clinton County, Kentucky, on April 18, 1895, and died in St. Paul, Minnesota, on March 5, 1949. He was an employee of Armour and Company in Kansas City, Missouri, for twenty-nine years, before being transferred to St. Paul in 1940. On January 1, 1919, he was married to Jessie Crow, and in August of that year was baptized into the Reorganized Church.

He is survived by his wife, Jessie, of the home in St. Paul; a son, Dr. C. M. Penticuff of Minneapolis, Minnesota; two daughters: Mrs. Nancy Lee Buttrick of Atchison, Kansas, and Mrs. Nadyne MacDonald of Austin, Minnesota; three brothers: George of Wallula, Washington; Parry of Nevada, Missouri; and Ad L. of Mattoon, Illinois; three sisters: Mrs. Minnie Hook, Miss Sarah Penticuff, and Mrs. Violet Woodson, all of Kansas City, Kansas; and two grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Grandview Reorganized Church in Kansas City, Kansas, Elder Evan A. Fry officiating. Burial was in Memorial Park Cemetery.

MILLER.—Alice Victoria, daughter of David E. and Mary Ann Scott, was born December 14, 1861, at Scottsville, Indiana, and died March 21, 1949, at her home in Independence, Missouri. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on December 15, 1878, and was married to Granville Beeler Miller on December 19, 1882. Five children were born to them. The Millers moved to Independence in 1912, and for twenty years Sister Miller sang in the Stone Church Choir. She was preceded in death by her husband, who died May 1, 1935, and a daughter, Zora Bertha, who died May 23, 1887.

Surviving are two daughters: Mrs. Effie Pearl Countryman and Miss Myrtle Miller; and two sons: Robert and George, all of Independence; two sisters: Mrs. Nancy Kelley of Independence, and Mrs. Kathryn Walls of New Albany, Indiana; two brothers: David E. Scott of Louisville, Kentucky, and C. W. Scott of Chicago, Illinois; five grandchildren; and seven great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Roland Speaks Chapel, Elders Glaude Smith and Fred O. Davies officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

 ELDERS' BANQUET

The quorums of elders in Zion met for their annual banquet on Monday night, April 4, at the Laurel Club dining room, with Ralph Freeman in charge. There were 109 elders present, whose service added up to 1,649 years. Oldest elder present was Brother James Laughlin, age eighty-one. Youngest was Harley Nagel, twenty-seven, who was ordained last year. One man was present who had been ordained only a few days. Many present, both elders and their wives, had grandfathers who were elders in the church. Two had great-grandfathers who were elders in the church. And one elder, C. E. Martin, had a great-great-grandfather, Elder Harvey Whitlock, who is named for a mission in Doctrine and Covenants 52: 6.

President F. Henry Edwards was the speaker of the occasion. Among many good things he said, these were recorded: "The work of the church does not rest on the appointees. It rests on the local elders." "We must never have a professionalized ministry." "If we will, here in Independence, we can do marvelous things." He went on to outline good citizenship, adult education, craftsmanship, and others. "Let us exercise the franchise [in voting] in the fear of God, but in the fear of nobody else." "Let us make this place look like the place we say it is." "The time is ripe; it is overdue. We need a revival of the study of the word of God." "We have lost to an extent, and we need to regain, the art of prayer. We must teach our people to pray." "We need to learn how to bear our testimonies. Nothing is more important than introducing men and women to the Lord Jesus." "We need a revival of spiritual power."

 A FRIEND IN JAPAN

One of our fine young people on the "Herald" staff has established a friendship with a Christian girl in Japan. They write often, and frequent packages of food, clothing, and supplies are sent across the Pacific. In appreciation, Nobugo Fukada writes: "I received your packages. Thank you very much indeed. I am really grateful for your kindness for my little nephew. I didn't expect to get so many things. My brother asks me to say a thousand thanks to you. I used to hear about macaroni, and now I saw it. I opened a can of corn. It was very good. It was also the first time to taste corn meal for me. White flour, sugar, oats, canned meats, vegetables, shortening are all very valuable for me. I am sure everything cost you a lot. I found pretty combs, soaps, tooth powder—they are wonderful.

"We had three snowfall days in two months—the warmest in twelve years. Many spring flowers are already out, and larks are singing. We like warm weather because we can conserve charcoal, but farmers are worrying about damage to crops."

As an American girl gives, and a Japanese girl receives, something is done to unite the world.

Records Are Important

MANY PASTORS and other members of the priesthood are taking seriously the request of the general officers that this year shall be a year of intensive missionary activity. Perhaps it is because of this that we are receiving so many comments indicating that local statistical records are sometimes not kept with serious care. Notably, there are many places where the addresses of nonattending members are quite unknown.

Members of the priesthood holding office as teachers, and others who may be available, might well work under direction of their branch presidents in seeing that these records are brought up to date. Alert branch presidents will then see to it that periodical visits are made among nonattending members. There is a good possibility that many of these so visited will receive them and may yet be reclaimed to activity. Work of this nature calls for devotion and persistence, but there are many families who are active in the work of the church because someone made a specific effort to revive them when they might otherwise have drifted away.

Introducing . . .

THE COVER PICTURE—was taken by Warren H. Chelline. He gave the title to it of "The Song That Angels Know." It shows Vivian Frizell, daughter of Evangelist and Mrs. John R. Grice, playing the organ in the Port Huron, Michigan, church.

ROY A. CHEVILLE (page 8) has been a member of the faculty of Graceland College since 1923. For over a quarter of a century, he has helped channel the educational, emotional, and spiritual lives of the youths of the church and their friends. Religion, sports, music, sociology, romance—all things youthful or human were his concern.

His educational career took him to Graceland, Drake University, Des Moines University, Iowa State Teachers College, University of California, and University of Chicago. From the latter he received the following degrees: Ph.B., 1922; A.M., 1923; B.D., 1925; Ph.D., 1942. He went out under missionary appointment in 1918.

Christmas of 1929 brought him life's choicest gift, a wife, the former Nell Weldon. They have two children: Dick, 17; Charlotte, 12. Roy has been officially active in branch and stake affairs for many years. He is a high priest.

VERDA E. (BILGER) BRYANT (page 10) was born in Norfolk, Nebraska, January 28, 1910. She was graduated from Omaha, Nebraska, Technical High School in 1927 with honors. In 1930 she was married to Stele A. Bryant. They have two children: Blair Burt, 17; and Barbara Beth, 14.

Sister Bryant is the author of Between the Covers of the Book of Mormon, and has contributed frequently to church periodicals. She is active in girls' work and particularly with the Blue Birds.

RAYMOND GERALD GABRIEL (page 11) was born in Kennett, Missouri, February 5, 1916. He was graduated from Graceland in 1936, and from University of Missouri (B.S. in Agriculture) in 1948.

Doris Talcott became his wife in 1938. They have two children: R. Gerald (Jerry) Jr., 7; and Cherie Norene, 5. Brother Gabriel is a priest. He is especially interested in agriculture and rural church problems. He has written other articles in this field which were published in 1947 and 1948. He lives in Liberty, Missouri, where he is employed by the County Extension Service.

MAY (MRS. S. C.) BETHEL (page 13) has been a contributor to the Herald since 1932. Recently she has written articles on the religion and people of Japan. Her son, Dayle, was in service with the American forces in Japan and she once had two girls of Japanese ancestry living in her home. Sister Bethel was born May 20, 1900, in Toledo, Ohio. In 1922 she was married to Simpson C. Bethel. They have one daughter, Pearl, and three sons, Dayle, William, and Clifford. All are adults except Clifford who is 15. Mrs. Bethel was graduated from a Toledo high school and had three years at the Toledo Conservatory of Music.

NEWS AND NOTES

ENROLLMENTS BEGIN

Now is the time to apply for admission to Graceland College for the school year of 1949-50. One hundred students have already been accepted, and dozens of applications are coming in every week.

This year it will not be necessary to turn down applicants on the basis of lack of room. Graceland expects to be able to accommodate all qualified applicants.

Graceland is the oldest and largest junior college in the state of Iowa. It is the only college sponsored by the church. Graceland is fully accredited, and Graceland's graduates are actually sought by many institutions of higher learning because of the excellent records made by Gracelanders in these institutions.

Every year hundreds of students from most of these United States and from several other countries and territories enroll for the rich educational experiences which are offered at Graceland. Most of these go on to graduate and to begin to make their marks in society, or, after graduation, transfer to other schools to continue preparation for service. Most of them, ever afterward, speak of their Graceland education as one of the richest experiences of their lives.

Graceland is proud of her role as the educational institution of the church. She is challenged by the opportunity which is hers to be the home of so many of the fine young men and women of the church during two of the most important years of their lives. She is glad that today she can open her doors to all qualified applicants.

If you are interested in information about Graceland, or if you desire to apply for admission, write the Director of Public Relations, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa.

APOSTLE AND MRS. MESLEY ON TRIP

On March 11, Apostle and Mrs. George Mesley started on a 4,000 mile trip covering much of southern United States. They held joint institutes for women and for priesthood at Tulsa, Oklahoma; Houston, Texas, and Mobile, Alabama. In twenty-four days, they participated in thirty services and visited many isolated Saints. Wherever they went, they found splendid response. Brother Mesley reports that the whole outlook of various areas of the United States has been changed by new industrial developments. This should be drawn to the attention of the Saints. Among these areas are the Tennessee basin, the Columbia River basin, and Texas.

SCHOOLS OF EVANGELISM

Apostle George Mesley and Seventy Arthur Gibbs spent part of January, all of February, and part of March in leading several Schools of Evangelism in the Pacific Northwest. Each school was a week long and had three classes a night. The attendance was a record. Branches in which these schools were held included Spokane, Seattle, and Tacoma, Washington; Portland, Oregon; and Vancouver, British Columbia.

Apostle Mesley reports that as a result of two series in Oregon District during March, by Seventy Gibbs, there were nineteen baptisms.

SISTER TEEL DIES

In a telegram received by the First Presidency from John W. Rushton, the church is advised that Sister Ida May Teel died during the evening of April 13 in a Glendale, California, sanitarium, after a painful illness. She is the wife of the former church physician, Dr. A. W. Teel.

The Miracle of Rebirth

Words of Life

Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.—John 3: 3.

DAYS OR WEEKS ago, according to where you live, the snow was melting, and little patches of green began to show in the brown carpet of dead grass that covered the soil. Buds that survived the winter's cold and sleet thickened and grew feathery at the tips. The trees, lords of all rooted things, made subtle but unmistakable changes. There was a pleasant difference in the air. Nature was making ready for the annual miracle of rebirth.

Rebirth, the capacity for renewal, seems to be a fact of universal law. Radium has its regenerative power. The sun consumes itself to give light and warmth to the planets, but it does not burn out to a cinder; it has something of the character of atomic fire and will keep going for hundreds of millions of years. Here on the earth, all old products find use for new purposes, so that what is waste for one process is raw material for the next, and matter goes through many transformations in its cycles. And, as scientists consider the cosmic ray which filters through all the infinite reaches of space, they suspect that no energy, regardless of where or how it is expended, is ever utterly lost; for the cosmic rays seem to have power to create energy or receive it from sources that have not been apprehended. Everywhere, we see the drama of renewal enacted many times.

Born Again

Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever.—I Peter 1: 23.

Witnessing the miracles of rebirth in so many parts of the natural creation, it is not so difficult to expect the operation of the same law within ourselves and among the people about us. We have all had the pleasure of seeing our friends participating in amateur plays, and have been amazed and delighted at their power to play other roles, to present different characters on the stage, and, in a sense, to live other lives.

During our lives, too, we have experienced many changes of mind and personality; as Shakespeare says, "one man in his time plays many parts" on the stage of the world. Some parts are good, and some are bad; and if it happens that someone displeases us, it may be for the part he is playing at the time, rather than for any fundamental quality of his character. Thus it was possible for Jesus to condemn the sin without damning the sinner, knowing there is a capacity in all men for a better way of life.

Leaving the Past

Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.—II Corinthians 5: 17.

One of the conditions of rebirth of any kind is that the past is left behind. The child emerges into the world as an independent individual, eating, breathing, and living for himself for the first time. He can never return to the old protected condition. When the time to be born comes, he must begin his own life; for to remain unborn would mean death.

There is a stage in our spiritual experience, too, when it is time for us to be reborn. To delay the action brings spiritual death. We must leave behind us the old blindness to light and truth, and we must see the fuller implications of life with the new powers that are given to us.

The Gospel of John contains a splendid collection of the great declarations of Jesus, a library of spiritual wisdom. Our text is one of those choice jewels of religious literature. Jesus saw that earthly selfishness and carnality were entirely incompatible with the great spiritual order of the universe. When men step upward to the kingdom of heaven, there are some things of earth that must be left behind. Rebirth cannot endure them. Men cannot walk with one hand in the hand of God and the other clinging to the sins of earth.

Into the Future

Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.—II Peter 3: 13.

Rebirth belongs definitely to the future. It turns its back upon the outmoded, inferior past. It climbs from the misty shadows and darkneses of the moors and valleys to the clearer moral and spiritual atmosphere of a superior way of life. C. S. Lewis expressed this idea beautifully and elaborately in his book, The Great Divorce, an allegory dealing with the difference between good and evil.

Our own future depends upon the way we enter into the new life opened before and revealed to us in the new birth. There are, among the domestic creatures, little chicks that never peck their way out of the confining shell, colts and calves that can never stand upon their own legs. Too weak, they die. There are people, too, who cannot survive the rigors of spiritual rebirth. Shocked by the first contact with the new environment, they fearfully recoil and try to go back, only to die.

Every journey completes a circuit and returns to its starting point, unless some accident or tragedy breaks it off. Our souls had their beginning with God. Our earthly experience is an excursion from which, in due course of time, we are expected to return to our home in God's kingdom. On the way, many things should happen to us, and one of them is the experience of rebirth.

The "Daily Bread" Habit

COMMENTS coming to the desk and personal contacts at the Center Place and in the field indicate that Daily Bread is meeting a wholesome reception. The subscription list is enjoying a healthy growth month by month.

Members of the Presidency are of the opinion that all of us need to cultivate our devotional life. With this in mind, we are quite anxious that the use of Daily Bread shall be built into a family devotional habit. This can be done only as someone takes care to see that no exceptions to the habit occur until the practice is well-established.

While in the field recently, we learned that there are some who read Daily Bread as they would read a tract, then lay it aside with a satisfied feeling as though they were saying, "Well, that's done for another month." We strongly recommend that the material shall be used on the day for which it is set apart. Ten minutes used each day in this manner is likely to keep us much nearer to our heavenly Father than a whole hour once a week.

The Herald House endeavors to get Daily Bread ready in time for copies to be mailed to subscribers in missions abroad six weeks in advance of the month in which these copies are to be used.

Recently, through a clerical oversight, all of the May issue was mailed in advance rather than just to the subscribers at distant points. We hope no one will think that this indicates a change in the plan of using this devotional material. The month printed on the cover and the date printed at the top of each service should direct its use. This mailing error is not serious, though it has brought in several inquiries. We hope the priesthood members, particularly pastors and district presidents, as they travel among the Saints will help them to understand

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Sister V. D. Ruch, Council Bluffs, Iowa:

I received your letter of the twenty-first. In the rush of the building fund dinner, I have neglected answering. I am sorry. We had such a wonderful experience at this dinner, and it proved to be financially successful. We reached a high mark that night—about $27,000. The spiritual experience was an outstanding one and will be a milestone in the lives of many of us, even some of the nonmembers who were there. We are all very happy and grateful for it.

From Elder A. Orlin Crownover, April 5, 1949:

We have just finished one of the busiest and perhaps most fruitful week ends in the history of the Gulf States District. The regional school of priesthood training held here over the week end was attended by men from Biloxi, Mississippi, to Miami, Florida. One and all proclaimed it the finest experience of their lives.

Assisting Brothers McDowell and Smith were W. J. Breshears, Franklin Steiner, R. L. Booker, and myself. On Sunday morning, we participated in a beautiful and inspiring Communion service which was attended by 261 people, the largest attendance since I have been in Mobile. In the evening, Brother McDowell preached a powerful sermon to 164 people, the largest number that has attended a preaching service since I came here. We trust that something of lasting good was received by many of those who attended these services.

The Zion's League is sponsoring a Restoration Festival Banquet tomorrow evening, with Brother McDowell as guest speaker. They are thrilled with being able to have such an affair on the church's birthday.

the purpose and best use of this worship material.

The Herald Manager informs us that all subscriptions received before a month is half over are applied to the current month. Otherwise, they are applied to the following month. Some of the earlier months' supply have been exhausted and will not be available.

Notice of Appointment of Bishop to Ontario

At the General Conference of 1948, Bishop Joseph Baldwin was appointed to Ontario, Canada. Since that time, he has spent most of his time in the office of the Presiding Bishopric, and is now in a position to assume full-time responsibility in the appointment given. He is to assume the duties of this responsibility May 1, by which time he will be located in Ontario.

We are asking all Bishop's Agents and solicitors in the Chatham, Toronto, London, and Owen Sound Districts to send their reports with remittances for the month of April and subsequent thereto to Bishop Joseph Baldwin, Box 70, St. Thomas, Ontario, Canada.

All other agents and solicitors in Canada who previously have sent remittances covering their monthly reports to Bishop Dent are requested to mail these funds to Bishop Baldwin at the above address.

The present arrangement will result in the release of Bishop John C. Dent of Chatham District, Brother J. L. Prentice of Toronto District, Brother C. D. Weeks of London District, and Brother Kenneth B. Rowe of Owen Sound District.

We take advantage of this opportunity to express our deep appreciation for the fine services that these brethren have given over a period of time and commend Bishop Baldwin to the Saints for their favorable consideration and support.

Respectfully submitted,

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC.

Travelogs Again

WE ARE UNDER some self-condemnation with commensurate regrets that we have failed to chronicle for this column some of the visits made to various places during the past year. In trying to recall those of rather recent date, we realize that the accounts of visits prior to the last General Conference perhaps would be untimely. However, as I ride a modern train across the state of Missouri en route to Louisville, Kentucky, to help celebrate the opening of a new church, I shall review in memory, as best I can, and relate within my powers of narrative some very pleasant experiences since General Conference.

MEN'S CLUB, DES MOINES, IOWA

By invitation from Marion Pease, president of this group in the Iowa capital, in company of my companion, I drove to Des Moines, stopping overnight as guests in the home of Brother and Sister Moroni Traxler, at Lamoni. Mrs. Traxler is my wife's sister.

A large meeting of club members and their wives greeted us. A splendid meal was served, good music provided, and a memorable program presented under the very capable leadership of Brother Pease, who by the way, is a professional photographer on the staff of Look Magazine. I wish I had more samples of his work. Herald readers will long remember his "Hands" used on the cover of the issue of November 27, 1948.

Here we met the genial Des Moines pastor, Herbert M. Scott, and wife, both still beaming with joy because of the advent last year of a fine girl whom they are quite of the mind to keep. She will be much loved, indeed.

Here also we renewed acquaintance with Ralph Wicker, district president; the ever genial Bishop Stephen Robinson, his good wife and interesting family, and others. We left at a late hour and returned home, stopping en route for the night at Lamoni.

DES MOINES FINANCIAL DAY

On January 30 I was again en route to Des Moines where, with Bishop DeLapp, I assisted in the "Financial Day" observance, speaking at the evening service. I had planned to be present at an afternoon meeting, but engine difficulties delayed my arrival on the "Rocket" about three hours.

Financial Day at Des Moines for the Des Moines District is quite an occasion, and this one met every expectation. Again we met Elder Wicker, district president, and Bishop Robinson, and their families, also Pastor Scott, and wife, and many of the district from various points.

During the afternoon, a call was received from President Edwards that Apostle Paul M. Hanson had been injured in an automobile accident and was in the Municipal Hospital at Clarinda, Iowa. After consultation with Bishop DeLapp, I canceled my rail transportation and, after spending the night at Bishop Robinson's I left early the following day with Brother and Sister DeLapp for Clarinda.

There we found Brother Hanson somewhat bruised but already on the way to an early recovery. Much relieved, we left for home by way of Lamoni, where Brother and Sister DeLapp had a short visit with their daughter, Patricia, a Graceland student.

ROYAL OAK—NEW CHURCH

My next out-of-town trip was to the Detroit area. Elder Blair McClain, president, had perfected arrangements for the initial meeting in the new church at Royal Oak on Sunday, March 27.

Apostle Oakman, who was associated with us in ministry for the day, and I arrived at Detroit early in the morning where we were met by Brother McClain. A somewhat hurried breakfast at the station inaugurated a day long to be remembered and filled with activity until I boarded a train at Flint at midnight to return home.

There was a baptismal service first at the Central Church when five men, the husbands of members, were inducted into the kingdom by Pastor Ralph Moore. This makes thirteen families recently "united" in the Detroit area.

At the morning hour, assisted by Pastor Moore, I occupied at Central Church, speaking on the Book of Mormon to a well-filled house. This was followed by an hour or more of relaxation at the hospitable home of Brother and Sister McClain. We had lunch with Ed Williams and a "team" of missionaries—Apostle Oakman, Seventy James Daugherty, Elders Ray J. Ashenurst, Luther S. Troyer, and Wallace Jackson, all of whom had been prosecuting an intensive missionary campaign in the area which resulted in something like thirty-five baptisms. Later advices indicated that four more were inducted as a result of a series which Apostle Oakman began on the day I was there.

At three o'clock, the great event of the day began—the opening services in the new church at Royal Oak, one of the congregations making up the Detroit Branch or area.

This fine church home is the result of the combined and united efforts of the entire Detroit membership. Such is the fruitage where the "community idea" takes root. Ground was broken on October 3, 1948, and already a structure capable of adequately caring for the growing needs of the group has been completed. I say "growing needs" because the membership at Royal Oak has increased marvelously within recent years.

With Pastor McClain presiding with efficiency and dignity, a well-planned program was carried out in the presence of a capacity congregation in both the upper and lower auditoriums. A public address system brought the proceedings to those who could not find room in the upper auditorium, and there were many who stood outside the building. The day was warm and the doors were left open.

At an appropriate place in the program, Bishop Carl O. Carlson was presented, who gave an account of his stewardship in connection with the building project. He paid tribute to some of the leaders in the Detroit area, notably to Blair Jensen, now apostolic supervisor in Europe, through whose vision and foresight the community spirit had been inaugurated. This work so well started has been brought to the present status under the presidency of Elder McClain. Bishop Carlson is to be commended for carrying a great responsibility in church matters while discharging like heavy duties in connection with one of the great automobile manufacturing companies of Detroit.

Apostle Oakman gave a beautiful prayer of consecration.

Brother McClain's counselors, Elders Eldon Osborn and Clarence T. Heaviland, took part in the services.

Elder Rigby Leighton, present pastor at Royal Oak, and Elder Harold E. McAllister, a former pastor, also addressed the congregation.

The Saints were honored by the presence of Mayor Hayward of Royal Oak. He was presented by President McClain and responded with a fine tribute to our members at Royal Oak.

Time was limited after the close of this service, but we met as many as was possible. Numerous old friends were greeted, new ones met, pictures were flashed, and at 5 o'clock I was taken by Elder Harry J. Simons for a fast ride to Flint, Michigan.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

"Together We Grow"

LIFE FOR THE STUDENT NURSES at the Sanitarium School of Nursing is a combination of study, service to the patients, and living together. For three years, the student proceeds from one phase of nursing education to another, each phase more advanced than the previous one. Friends make this process of education and growth an enjoyable, pleasant experience. The present fifty-two students enrolled come from thirty-seven states and Hawaii. The following paragraphs written by nine of these students, who represent a 15,000 mile chain of friendship, relate the processes of their life and growth while they are in school.

Spiritual Phase

When I boarded the train to come to Independence, I wondered how my life was to be affected. It would be my first time away from my family, friends, and branch. What would my day be like—all work, all study? Or would I have time and opportunity to meet new people, see new things, go to church? Most of all I wondered about church and what part religion was to play in my life.

I soon found that religion was a very important part of being at the San. Our day is started with the blessing at breakfast, followed by a fifteen-minute chapel period. We have ample opportunity to attend prayer and worship services held in the evening either at the San or at any of the surrounding branches. The young people of Independence carry on an extensive worship program with the nurses playing an active part.

We have a full-time chaplain who is never too busy to listen to or help with our problems. Here we have not only the same religious opportunities as we had at home but many, many more. We have the opportunity to grow with the youth of our church.

Elizabeth Jahn, Junior,
Ecorse, Michigan

A Missionary's Daughter Speaks

Training at the Sanitarium is more significant than merely making preparation for a living. It carries a religious connotation that is probably more personal to me than to many others in view of the fact that I am a missionary's daughter. From earliest childhood, teachings in our home carried as an undertone the spirit of cheerful service. It often seems that there is divine guidance in matters as important as the choice of one's life work, and I feel this is so in my case.

When I was trying to decide on nursing, I thought of hospitals in which to secure education. It would have been so easy to go to school in a hospital closer home, but I felt there were advantages at the San which would compensate for miles. The moral caliber of our students is deeply influenced by the integrity of those to whom we are entrusted.

Jo Ann Breshears, Junior,
Pensacola, Florida

The Freshman Speaks

I had planned, during the latter years of high school, to enter nursing and therefore had the advantage of selecting my subjects with this in view. This made things much easier—chemistry for me was not some unfamiliar world of test tubes and Bunsen burners; equations were, after all, equations, and not a cause for packing my bags.

After a few months of preliminary training, came that first day of floor duty. I remember the way I envied the ease and confidence of our upperclassmen in performing their duties. Looking back, I realize this was part of the necessary adjustment that must be made to fit us for service in our chosen profession. Fully aware that there are more difficult and discouraging periods ahead, we Freshmen nevertheless look to the future with confidence.

Mildred Sparks, Freshman,
Sweet Home, Oregon

Appreciation for Influencing Factors

I wanted to be a nurse. Where could I receive my education? I was not a member of the Latter Day Saint Church and had not even heard of Graceland College. However, there were some Latter Day Saints in my home town, and as I became better acquainted with the church, its doctrines, and associated institutions, I definitely decided to become a member. Later I went to Graceland and took the pre-nursing course there. I feel that I gained a certain maturity there which enabled me more easily to cope with the often difficult adjustments to be made in nursing.

It is entirely different from any other life I have ever known, and its responsibilities are much greater than I have ever had to assume before. Folks at home continue to encourage me. Advancements follow in swift succession, and it is difficult to keep up with this vigorous pace without the reinforcement and enrichment of the more or less well-defined philosophy Graceland offers. The transition from high school to Nursing School is more gracefully and easily performed after a year at Graceland than by going straight from the shelter of the home into the intense emotional drama of the hospital.

Hilda Norton, Freshman,
Derry, New Hampshire

Return From Affiliations

It is good to be back home after eight months of affiliation. Sanitarium students have three affiliations: pediatrics at Children's Mercy Hospital in Kansas City, Missouri; psychiatry at the State Sanitarium in St. Louis, Missouri; and Communicable Diseases at Robert Koch Hospital in Koch, Missouri. These hospitals with their individual philosophies, organizations, and techniques help the student develop that adaptability and finesse which is expected of graduates.

In our home school, we are taught the fundamentals in medical and surgical diseases, psychiatry, psychology, and nursing arts. This enables us to spend our study and duty hours on affiliation, learning the details and fine points of the specialty, rather than having to spend them getting acquainted with the subjects.

After affiliations, I can view the three-year period from a more objective vantage point than was possible during the first grueling experiences—and they are often just that. Duty hours are much more pleasant, because it is usually easier to make intelligent adaptations of procedure to fit individual situations, and much of the emotional charge that naturally accompanies one's first attempts is gone. The mere fact that one gets stomach ulcers from sheer fright those first few days in the new hospitals in no way neutralizes the values obtained from these respective places. The months spent at other hospitals encourages the student to rely more and more on the whys and wherefores behind routines and to realize that while they are somewhat different, all can be effective. Probably many progressive changes come to our home hospital through these channels. I feel that our students are exceptionally fortunate in having so thorough an educational program.

Nettie Alford, Senior,
Columbia, Alabama

Note From the Council President

Self-government is a mark of maturity. Toward this mark the student council strives. Student body officers and representatives from each class, with two faculty advisors, form the council. This group—always open to suggestions and help from the other students—plans recreation, carries on student business, and fosters closer co-operation between student and faculty.

In these meetings, we learn to adapt our thinking for the good of the group with personal interest put aside. Each member brings the suggestions of her classmates, and we indiscriminately consider, reject, or fully approve them.

Student body meetings are held every three months, and outstanding business is brought before all the students. Each is entitled to her vote and her own opinion.

Self-government prepares each of us for a future place in society, for our position will be an important one and our influence widespread. We must be prepared to think for ourselves and to form mature opinions. Through self-government, we follow the tradition of our church, our community, and our nation.

Betty Buckley, Senior,
Nucla, Colorado

The Center Place Offers Welcome

My home here in the "Center Place" has been endeared to me by my experiences in nursing. Meeting each student has widened my cultural and religious background.

I find it difficult to express my gratitude for the opportunity of living with girls from scattered points of the United States and Hawaii. Girls have come from these widespread areas into the melting pot of this School of Nursing, and each has gained from her contacts with the others. The joys, discouragements, downright disgusts, and uplifting inspirations that are inevitably born from multiple human relationships seem to evolve into a tolerance and understanding possible only after sharing the highs and lows of our daily existence.

Extra-Curricular Activities

Nurses, perhaps more than most people, need recreation which truly recreates. I have found that the extra-curricular activities at the Sanitarium do just that. They vary from eating crackers and peanut butter in the recreation room to attending candlelight fellowships, and informal "gab sessions" occupy no small portion of the twenty-four hours.

Activities are distributed throughout the year: freshmen reception, Halloween party, Christmas festivities (including Miss Butterworth's candy party), variety show, May festival, and faculty dinners on the lawn.

There are hours of work and study, but there is still time for a busy, active life outside the hospital walls.

Hawaii Speaks

People frequently ask me why I chose to come to Independence for a nursing education when there are any number of schools I could have entered in Hawaii. I have several reasons—all valid to my way of thinking. To travel is to have one's eyes opened to the bigness, "busyness," and friendliness of other people besides one's own. Two years at Graceland convinced me that education should be a balanced thing, with enough emphasis on the physical, spiritual, and mental sides of life and not too much on any one of the three. I knew I could expect to find a balanced curriculum at the San. I wanted instructors who taught more than book matter; I wanted contacts with girls from everywhere, not just one place; I wanted to be close to members of my church . . . I am thousands of miles from home, but I am not lonely. I am among friends.

The Graduating Class of 1949

The three years at the Sanitarium are almost completed for twelve young women, senior students, who will become graduate nurses in the fall of this year. These girls have worked, played, studied, and lived together. They have made friendships with each other which will be lifelong. They have experienced the thrills of the first introductions to nursing and medical science. They have been made thoughtful by some of their contacts with the sick and the suffering. They have been lifted up by the knowledge that their skills have helped a new life into the world and many a patient to become well and strong.

They are looking forward now to securing positions as graduate registered nurses. Their opportunities will be numerous, and their choices will be varied. Some of them will go on to college or to the university and continue their studies, then some day return to the Sanitarium and help make an even better school for future students of nursing. Others will take on the responsibilities of a nursing position and make a contribution of service to their community.

The graduating exercises this year will be held on May 29.

An Authorized Church

By ROY CHEVILLE

This is one in the series of five presentations made in January and February to the Graceland College congregation by five ministers of the church under the title, "A Church for These Times." These sought to interpret the message and mission of the church in terms of contemporary life and thought.

A FEW DAYS AGO, I walked into a classroom and saw written on the blackboard the words, "No Class Today." A student looked at it and observed, "Who said so?" This simple incident illustrates how the question of authority concerns us every day. I saw it again yesterday when two students read an announcement on the bulletin board, and one asked the other, "Is there any signature to it?" When the transcript of your academic credits goes to another college or university, it is necessary that the signature of the proper official of our college be attached and the seal of the institution be affixed. We cannot escape considerations of authority.

We require more than official sanctions. We insist on the authority of competency. Not long ago I read an account of the experiments with use of atomic energy at Bikini. I glanced over the article and sought to discover who was writing the review. I wanted to know if the commentator knew the field and had witnessed the experiment. Today we insist on the authority of competency. And all this goes for religion in this contemporary world of ours.

I clearly remember the first time I left New York state and crossed into Canada at Niagara Falls. There stood an official in a uniform slightly different from the ones used in "the States." His helmet looked like those I had seen in books. Over me waved the Union Jack. I realized that the policemen of Chicago, whence I had come, were effective in their sphere but would not be recognized in Ontario. I sensed then, as I have many times since, that an official with authority is recognized only in the field of his operation. I have been reminded in recent years that a baker may know little about atomic fission, and a gardener little about archaeology. "Each in his own tongue" applies to authority.

AN OLD, OLD QUESTION

Considerations of authority are as old as organized religion. Even Jesus was confronted with direct queries. The priestly leaders of Jewish religion, ever jealous of their prerogatives, put blunt questions to him, "By what authority doest thou these things?"—Matthew 21:23. Over and over Paul had to explain his right to be an apostle. When the Corinthian congregation took up the issue, he made this reply, "We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."—II Corinthians 5:20. To the church of Colossae he declared this authority, "He is the head of the body, the church . . . whereof I am made a minister."—Colossians 1:18, 25.

Through the centuries, then, such questions as these have persisted. Authority for what? By what credentials is it verified? From what sources is it derived? Back and forth, emphasis has shifted, but considerations about authority have persisted. Moderns like to say they have risen above such limitations.

They have only changed thinking about bases of authority.

DISPUTATIONS ON AUTHORITY HAVE TURNED THE COURSE OF HISTORY

Arguments over the right to give decisions have split peoples and turned the direction of events. In 1053, Eastern Christianity, centered at Constantinople, and Western Christianity, headed at Rome, split apart over the right of final authority. Did the patriarch or the pope have supremacy? Nine hundred years later, the breach is unhealed. In 1520, Martin Luther nailed his theses on the church door of his parish. Thus he began the course which was to lead to his repudiation of the authority of the pope and the lifting up of the Bible as the source of authority. The cleavage still holds. In the seventeenth century, the Separatists of England denied the ecclesiastical authority of the bishops of the Established Church and declared each congregation held its own authority. The persecutions that followed carried the "Congregationalists" to America. The Quakers denied the authority of creeds and Scriptures in favor of the "inner light" which every man might experience. Then in our century, scholars rose up to challenge the dogmatism of Bible believers and to substitute the science and scholarship data. Authority has kept bobbing up to demand consideration.

IF SOMEONE REPRESENTED YOU

Authority calls for more than a card bearing credentials. It demands the ability to represent the one for whom we speak. If anyone is going to speak in my name, he needs more than a license card. He must live with me until he understands my mind and catches my spirit. He should be able to sense what I would do and think in certain situations. It is said that one of the greatest tragedies in life is that of being misrepresented by well-intentioned friends. Alfred Balfour once commented, "I am more or less happy when praised, not very uncomfortable when being abused, but I have moments of uneasiness when being explained." We want our ambassadors to know us well enough to speak for us.

How uneasy God must get! Think of the thousands of men and women who speak out in his name, as if authorized to represent him! The key to authority for Christ rests in vital communion and growing association with this Master Teacher. He who lives near to God senses the mind and the heart of the Divine.

THE RESTORATION RESTORED THIS CONTACT

In 1820, ministers were getting their authority from conferences, from creeds, from Scriptures, from congregations, from colleges. A youth dared to affirm that he had received firsthand contact with a living Christ. The church began not with a dogma of revelation but with an experience of it. It sensed that he who lives with this Christ becomes equipped to speak for him. Christ then commissions a man to the degree that he can sense the will of God. The scripture that representatives ought to know that Jesus is Christ is more than proof-text. It gets at the heart of authority. It says that one has a living acquaintance with him he represents.

Such a communion calls for moral fitness and growing competency. Only as a man is clean can he know the cleanness of God. Only as a man is wise can he be aware of the wisdom of God. Only as a man loves effectively can he feel the all-inclusiveness of God's love. Only as a man is creative can he appreciate the creativity of God. Those who apprehend these qualities of God can truly speak for God. Out of such fitness, God can commission his ambassadors.

THE URGENCY FOR SUCH A CHURCH

Our times are not calling for more clubs, lodges, and fraternities. Our country has plenty of these and to spare. If that is all a church is, we have enough. Our time does need a church that is authorized. The authority will not be derived from quotations from the past, from rearrangement of Scriptural passages, from inherited doctrine. It must come from a "nextness" to God that will make possible a "Thus saith the Lord." The revelation for our day must speak in the language of our times, in response to the needs of our times. It will see what God sees. It will look in the microscope and the telescope. It will gauge by metric measurements and logic. It will explain God's universe from atoms to light years. It will rise above color lines and national boundaries. It will see God at work in his total universe.

Such a church will speak to give "consent" to the revealed insight. Legislative vote expresses this high authority. It does not provide the basis. That comes in the revelatory experience itself. Yet, a body ecclesiastic needs to give assent for the democratic development possible therein. Our times needs this church that is qualified to say, "We are ambassadors for Christ." Seven hundred years ago, Roger Bacon wrote of stumbling blocks to truth. The first he mentioned was "the influence of fragile or unworthy authority." Effective authority does not come through bellowing voices or ecclesiastical edicts. It comes through "the sure word of prophecy." And prophecy means speaking the mind of God. Our theologically bewildered age needs this authoritative voice. The time bids you youth to develop the consecrated competency that will permit us to make such an authority come true. It is not enough that we hark back to 1820. A present-day church will still have "a voice commissioned from on high."

Church-Centered Youth Programs

BUILDING MEN FOR TOMORROW, TODAY

The priesthood for tomorrow's branches are in our church schools, scout troops, and Zion's Leagues now. The twenty-five-year-old appointees of 1959 are the fifteen-year-old boys in our branches today. To forget that simple truth and its meaning for us is to fail the church of tomorrow unardonably.

SCOUTING PLUS THE GOD AND COUNTRY AWARD

Scouting for boys has met the acid test of a generation. It does build stalwart manhood; it does lead the way to good citizenship.

Add to scouting the requirements set up by the church for the God and Country Award and you have an excellent means of building men for God.

The requirements for this award include, in part:

- 150 hours of service to the church
- Compliance with the financial law for at least one year
- Regular attendance and participation in church services
- Ability to pass special examinations in church history, doctrine, standard books, etc.

If training for priesthood is, first of all, training the man, our church program for boys is basic.

ZION'S LEAGUE BUILDS FOR LEADERSHIP

"The youth of the church united in action for Christ"—that's Zion's League.

In the League, our young people seek: to learn the heritage and program of Latter Day Saintism, to share in its spiritual fellowship, to participate in its creative work, and to witness of its power.

For that purpose, they explore together month by month the highways of worship, study, recreation, and service.

THE PROOF OF THE PUDDING

Here is a true story in brief outline: One of our branches—a skilled church school director—a class of twelve junior boys—a teacher (member of the priesthood)—a classroom of their very own—a round-the-week activity program—regular participation in church services—program maintained for ten years.

Sequel: eight of the twelve boys ordained to the priesthood—five attended Graceland College—three attended nearby university—one a general church appointee—one the pastor of his branch—several local church leaders—all active in the work of the church.

A Shorthand Supplement - By VERDA BRYANT

The Herald of December 4, 1948, carried an announcement to stenographers using the Gregg system. The following article explains the need for additional helps to the Gregg Manual for mastering religious terms. The author tells how this Gregg Shorthand Workbook happened to be developed. "We have considered our work on this project as a service to God and the church," she says.

A very limited supply of workbooks is available at the bare cost of materials in it. Order direct from the authors.—EDITOR.

WE LIVE in a highly mechanistic world, so much so that we occasionally wonder if someday the need for all manual labor will be reduced to a nonentity. Among the recent inventions to invade our lives are the wire and tape recorders. The fact that a wire or tape can be used over and over again makes the operation cost almost nothing after the initial investment.

These portable boxes are making an ever-increasing appearance at preaching services, prayer meetings, offices, classrooms, and wherever there is a desire to record the spoken voice. Even in homes their easy and inexpensive operation makes them a popular form of entertainment which can prove highly educational.

Through them we are finding out just how we sound to others, for we never know when someone will have turned on the tape recorder which picks up sounds from the basement to the attic. We have found many enjoyable periods in recording an evening's activities, Scripture readings, poems, worship services, radio programs, piano playing, or just the casual conversation of our friends.

Now I learn that, with the addition of a gadget which enables the operator to stop, start, and reverse the machine, the wire recorder can easily be used in place of the more expensive dictaphone. Because the recorders are small and portable, there seems to be little doubt that they will be making their appearance at all kinds of church services, reunions, and classes; and their use will preserve more accurately the words of blessings, confirmations, ordinations, and sermons.

In time, the use of these recorders may do away with the need for stenographers who can take dictation of religious matter accurately; but until that time comes, there is still a dearth of such stenographers.

DURING THE DEPRESSION, when I needed to work to increase the family income, I attended a business college for a few weeks and began to learn shorthand. However, I never completed the course because a lucky break gave me a job where I didn't need shorthand. Often in the next ten years when something would come up where a stenographer was needed and I would try to do the best I could to take notes, I would wish I had completed the course.

About two and a half years ago, I expressed to Esther Brockway a desire to complete my shorthand training so that I could be used as a church stenographer. Esther, having taught shorthand and typing in high school, offered to act as my tutor. That was the beginning of a long series of lessons. All that fall and winter, I took three lessons a week and spent at least an hour each day practicing. In the meantime, Esther worked on increasing her speed on religious matter, using the Book of Mormon as a text. We worked together. She dictated to me from a Gregg textbook, and I dictated to her from the Book of Mormon. Both of us were interested in religious rather than business words and phrases, so we began to make outlines for the words and phrases commonly used in the church. We bought little notebooks with alphabetical tabs and whenever we worked out a good outline, we inserted it in our dictionary.

ONE DAY I sat next to a stenographer who was trying to record a talk made by a prominent church woman. I could tell by her ease at the notebook and her smooth-writing pen that she was a good stenographer, but I could not help noticing that often she was thrown from the thought by an unfamiliar word or phrase for which there is either no Gregg shorthand equivalent or the outline is so complicated as to make it impractical for speedy use. It was then I realized the application to a stenographer of the old saying, "He who hesitates is lost." In taking dictation, a stenographer may retain whole sentences in her mind so long as the outlines come naturally to her. If a word comes up which she has to puzzle how to write, she is lost; the whole thought is gone from her mind, and her speed is greatly reduced. I mentioned this experience to Esther, and we decided that perhaps something should be done about sharing with other stenographers the words and phrases of our dictionary.

The press of other activities made it necessary for me to discontinue my practice before I reached a speed necessary for a church stenographer. My study of shorthand has taught me some lessons the hard way. I have learned that while one never forgets the outlines, in order to retain speed, it is necessary to practice daily. A stenographer in an office can do this, but a housewife rarely has the opportunity. So I speak as one who is not a qualified church stenographer, but wishes she were.

ALMOST INVARIABLY when a prophecy, blessing, or ordination has been given, someone says, "I'd like to take up shorthand. I'd like to learn just enough so I could take down these good things I'd like to keep."

One may learn to type a little, to play golf a little, to sing a little, or to play the piano a little for his own amusement; but no one ever learned shorthand a little to take down blessings and prophecies. In order to use shorthand as a hobby in the church, one has to be better than a professional.

A business stenographer may take shorthand at a rate of 100 to 120 words per minute and be a crackerjack; whereas in taking religious matter she may be able to get only the high points. (The Federal Government, I am told, expects stenographers to write only eighty words per minute to pass civil service.) While most ministers speak at a speed of about 120 to 150 words per minute, now and again, when some are speaking under the influence of the Spirit (and then we would really like to get all they say) they may be talking at the rate of 150 to 200 words per minute, using many terms unfamiliar to the shorthand vocabulary of a business stenographer. It is then that the wire recorder is the only means of getting every word of the minister.

A FEW MONTHS AGO, Esther Brockway called on President Israel A. Smith and showed him the work we had done on a shorthand dictionary of religious words and phrases. He was interested and suggested we prepare it for distribution. Esther also wrote the Gregg Publishing Company and received permission to use the outlines.

We have now completed and have ready for distribution 100 copies of a "Gregg Shorthand Work Book" for the use of stenographers in our church. We have included approximately 700 words and phrases common to our religion, and (with President Smith's approval) some practice material taken from actual blessings, confirmations, and ordinations. This book consists of fourteen 8½x11 pages printed by "Ditto." We have considered

Land Tenure and the Rural Church

By GERALD GABRIEL

IN 1940, 42 per cent of the farmers in the United States owned no land, 10 per cent owned only part of the land they cultivated, and some 47 per cent owned all the land they tilled. Forty and one-half per cent owning part or all the land they operated had it mortgaged. The period from 1940 to 1945, war years, showed some favorable trends. The average-sized farm increased from 174 acres to 195 acres; however, the number of farms decreased by 220,000. Approximately 6,800,000 people left the farm to go to war or to work in industrial plants during this period. The number of adequate-sized farms increased from 1,400,000 to 1,700,000; the number of full owners and managers increased from 3,120,000 to 3,308,000; the number of part owners increased from 615,000 to 668,000; and the number of tenants decreased from 2,361,000 to 1,901,800. However, the top third of the farms marketed 84 per cent of the farm products. During these lean years, nearly half of the farmers did not have a chance for the labor of the farm family to be applied productively nor to live well.

Land tenantry exists in rural America as an endured evil. The first evil has been an almost continuous rise of land prices, resulting from speculators bidding against one another or against prospective owners. The second evil is that a farm is required to pay for itself once in each generation. If one child inherits, he must pay his brothers or sisters for their part. The interest paid on these farms every five or six years would completely modernize the home. The third evil is that our most productive land is cultivated by tenants who receive only a small share of the profits, while the landowner receives returns for little effort. In these communities are found the most children with few and inefficient churches and schools. The fourth evil is that on the lowest productive land we find the largest percentage of owners—owners living on soil that is neither productive nor having the possibility of ever being so. Many of these farms will not support the owner with even a moderate standard of living. The fifth evil is the poor relationship that exists between land owner and tenant which results in migration—about 33 to 34 per cent of Missouri farmers move every year in hopes of finding better soil, a better home, and a better landlord. This does not allow time for the tenant farmer to set up a cropping system or plan the farm for more than one year. The family moves so often that the children are not given time to adjust to one school nor take part in youth organizations. The family cannot plan improvements for the farm—they do not know where they will be from one year to the next. Such farming results in draining as much from the soil as is possible to do in one year. Landlords are sometimes dictatorial about everything that is done on the farm. Cash crops (soil deteriorators) too often prove the best for the migrating farmer. He does not have livestock and feed to move. His family is never settled long enough to become a part of the community nor its institutions, including the church.

THE WRITER visited four different counties during this study. The first county was in southeastern Missouri. In this section, we have some of the most fertile soil in the state. The land of the communities studied had been in crops less than twenty years. Cotton was the chief cash crop. More than 90 per cent of the land was farmed by tenants. It was in large holdings—insurance companies and other loan agencies had foreclosed after the timber had been cut off by its former owner (usually large lumber companies) and then returned to the hands of these companies either through foreclosure or delinquent tax sale. These communities were built up by the companies erecting shacks on each "forty acres." They gave one or two years' crop to the tenant for clearing the land, and then the tenant started renting the land either for cash or for a percentage of the crop. The homes are unpainted, poorly constructed, and ill-kept. Sanitation is extremely poor. In this area, there were no strictly open-country churches. The few churches were in the villages and rarely attended by the tenants or their children. Emotional types of services were held in tents or "brush arbors" in the fall months when the weather was agreeable and cash was available at harvest time.

In northeastern Missouri was found medium to low productive soil with two-thirds of the land tended by tenants. In this country much of the land was once held in the hands of the farm family with the owner tending it. Numerous churches dot the countryside—one every four or five miles—and more than two-thirds of the open-country churches were closed; those remaining open were poorly kept. Tenant farm families did not attend the church nor support it financially. From eight farm account books of tenants, only one recorded any contribution to the church—this was less than a dollar for the month. The village churches also suffered, and many were vacant or used for purposes other than church services.

In central Missouri, the situation and the results were about the same as in the county in northeastern part of the state.

In a county in west central Missouri, the land is highly productive. The soil is largely Marshall Silt Loam, Wabash, and Knox. Unlike many fertile areas, this county has less than one-third tenants. The people were largely of German extraction, and the farms had been in the same family for years. Most of the renters were sons of retired farmers whose land they will inherit when the parent dies. Corn is the chief crop, and much of it is fed to livestock, which is their main source of income. In this county, we find more balanced farming rings than in all the other counties combined. In searching the county for three months, looking for closed churches, we found forty-seven live churches and only two dead ones. One of the dead churches was in a small village—now replaced with a modern edifice. The other, an open-country church, was located on the least productive soil of the county.

Year	Percentage of Tenants
1900	30 plus
1910	30
1920	29 plus (Due to World War I)
1930	34

Missouri Bulletin 167 and reveals some of the effects of farm tenancy.

	272 Owners	179 Tenants
Average Capital Invested.....	$12,555.00	$1,547.00
Acres farmed	135.9	133.5
Farm Income (Net).....	$942.00	$578.00
Corn yield per acre, bu.....	38.3	32.9
Total animal units*.....	20.5	15.0
Receipts from crops, per cent	26.2	51.2
Crops sold, returned in feed bought, per cent	49.0	18.7
Children completing district school, per cent	37.2	12.7
Church contributions, per farm	$11.62	$ 4.47

*An animal unit is one work horse or its equivalent in other livestock, based on the amount of feed consumed in one year.

The farms noted here are about the same size, but the income of the owner is about 48 per cent greater, with a corn yield about six bushels greater. The tenant sells almost twice as much cash crop taking more from the soil. Note, too, the difference in school completion. Also the owners' contribution to the church is almost three times as much.

The following is taken from The Church and the Land by Ralph A. Felton.

Items indicate the standard of living and the percentage of the family having one each.

WHEN IS TENANCY DESIRABLE?

EDMUND S. BRUNNER reports in his book, The Town and Country Church in the United States, "The church reaches the owner and the tenant farmer with equal success until the proportion of tenant-operator rises above one fifth."

Normally in areas where young people are climbing the agricultural ladder, nearly one fifth of the farmers are tenants. It is, as a rule, not too difficult for a young man to obtain enough capital to equip himself for farming. If he can rent a good farm with a good landlord-tenant lease, he may profit from the advice and guidance of the landlord and from experience gained on the farm. Effort spent toward the improvement of tenant-landlord relationship will make a significant contribution toward the solution of the problem. Good leases help to make this relationship more desirable. Missouri Bulletin 409 gives the following adequate agreements: "First, a clear statement of the intentions of both parties; second, provisions for the division of income between the landlord and tenant in proportion to the input of each; and third, incentives and provisions conducive to good husbandry practices and systems." The lease need not be lengthy nor written in highly technical terms. Long-term leases have definite advantages to both parties. A farm plan can be set up which is more conducive to soil improvement and also gives higher yields. Under such leases, the tenant should be encouraged and receive compensation for improvements when he moves off the farm. Of the 160,000 farms for sale in 1939, nearly one half were low-income farms producing less than $600 worth of farm products annually. This type of farm would be unprofitable to own. The average farm man is in full physical vigor for only about twenty years. After the age of forty, his ability to do hard work declines; however, his managerial ability and judgment may improve. With this in mind, it would be unwise to purchase a farm at the age of twenty-five if it is going to take sixty years to pay for it. It would be far better to rent for a few years until sufficient capital can be saved to purchase a productive farm that can be paid for in twenty to twenty-five years. Rochwell C. Smith in The Church in Our Town writes, "In general, tenancy which permits the tenant to operate the land with independence and ingenuity, which makes him secure in the enjoyment of improvements he introduces to the farm, which does not regulate him and his family to a low social state in community affairs, and which is a doorway to future increasing independence—such tenancy may be regarded as socially valuable."

WHAT THE CHURCH CAN DO

A NUMBER of rural churches are working on this problem with some success. The church homestead plan is quite widely adopted. Calvin Schnuckner, pastor at Titonka, Iowa, developed his program by helping worthy young people to get loans and advice on prospective farms. Several denominations have a revolving fund. With this, young people serve on a farm for two years under a good manager, learning modern, scientific methods. At the end of this extensive training period, they are helped to purchase a farm. As they pay for their place, the fund goes on to help others. Co-operative farming has been adopted with some success where conditions are favorable. This type of farming has many pitfalls, and these should be known by officials in charge of such projects before they are started. It does hold great promise if properly managed.

The church can encourage desirable relationship between landlord and tenant. This can be a step toward ownership. The father-and-son farm partnership also holds great promise. Wisconsin studies on dairy farms with this type of partnership have shown a marked stability of size and intensity, and they do not run down like a clock geared to the live energy of one man. The passing on of the family farm to successive generations is another way of helping solve this problem. This may be managed in a number of ways: (1) Parents may hold title as long as either live. In such case, the son will rent the farm and remain a tenant until well into middle age. This delay may handicap him in assuming the risk of ownership. (2) The parents may convert their ownership or equity interest in a farm into a mortgage interest by transferring title to the farm to a child and using the interest on the principle as a source of income. This has the advantage of giving the purchasing children the responsibility and freedom to exercise their own judgments with assurance regarding their status on the farm—if they meet their financial obligations. (3) Parents may transfer title of the farm to a child and convert at least a part of the capital value of the farm into an annuity income, by which method the parents may line up systematically such part of their accumulations.

THE CHURCH can help to establish co-operatives to increase the buying power of its members. Saving and credit unions serve the purpose well; marketing and purchasing co-operatives will increase, decreasing expenses and giving members good experience in working together. The church should, above all, encourage stewardship in regard to the land, farming, and community living.

The development of land settlements where large tracts of land can be purchased from large land holders and resold in family-sized farms to members to build communities should be fostered. Where these tracts of land are not of community size, they may be purchased and rented to tenants with the provisions for returning a portion of the rent paid in when buying an approved farm. This type of venture would naturally call for highly productive land, and a good manager who is also an excellent teacher to train the prospective owners in good farm management.

Further discussion will be given to this subject in the article, "Helping Men Own Farms."

Christianity in Japan

By MRS. S. C. BETHEL

CHRISTIANITY was first introduced into Japan shortly after Commodore Perry made his voyage there in 1853.

Those who accepted the way of Christ at that time saw a vast opportunity in this new way of life. They gave unstintingly of their time and energy to the spreading of the good news of the gospel and set an example in work and prayer that was stronger than words alone. Christianity found root in the hearts of many Japanese then in spite of the strength of Buddhism, the predominant religion of the people. Christianity had its beginning in what is more recently known as the Kaigan Church.

The Kaigan Kyokia (Beach Church) was founded in 1871 by Dr. S. R. Brown and Dr. James H. Ballagh, two Dutch-Reformed missionaries from the United States. Dr. Ballagh baptized eleven converts and officially organized the first Christian church in Japan. They had no denominational affiliation. The church was called "Christ's Public Church."

At the outbreak of World War II, there were 500,000 Christians in Japan. Of that number, 150,000 were Catholic and 350,000 were Protestant.

There are about 4,000 organized churches; 500 of their buildings were destroyed by bombings. The atomic bombing of Nagasaki resulted in the almost total obliteration of churches at that point, one of the strongholds of Christianity in the islands.

Contrary to the public conception that the Christians were persecuted by the militarists, most of the churches were permitted to continue their work. The police and government agencies maintained a close vigil on the churches, fearing that they were propagandizing their members with anti-government attitudes, but their reports to their superiors were always negative.

THE PROGRESS the Japanese Christians have made during the short period of seventy-five years proves their loyalty to the faith once they accept it.

Christianity will live on in Japan. Progress will be made, for the Japanese people are in need of the help that Christianity alone can give them. But who will play the major role in this work of spreading the gospel in Japan?

When once a Japanese receives the Christian message, he is eager to pass it along to others of his countrymen. No sacrifice is too great for him to make for the work.

I have before me a clipping telling of the eagerness of a young man, Ye Yun Ho, to tell others of the Christ. He became a Christian at the age of sixteen as a result of a Saturday evening Bible class held at the home of a Methodist missionary. He attended Korea's Presbyterian Theological Seminary. One day, he went for a walk along the River Han. On the broad flats where U. S. Army trucks dump the city of Seoul's garbage, he stopped to watch a lot of noisy, ragged youngsters clawing over the piled-up refuse. They were looking for any scrap of tin or paper that could possibly be sold. He returned day after day and made friends with this lot of poor youngsters. While they waited for fresh loads of garbage to arrive, he told them Bible stories and taught them to sing a few hymns. After a while, Ye Yun Ho, twenty-eight, came to live at the dump. Like his new friends, he found a packing case and moved in. He shared his food with them. On Sundays, he gathered them together on the flats for simple services. When the chilly autumn winds began to blow, he built a church. To raise money, he painted oil and watercolor portraits for G.I's. A U. S. Army chaplain helped him get secondhand tin for his church roof. Where could you find greater eagerness to point the way to Christ?

WHEN THE JAPANESE asked General McArthur for advice, he told them, "You can't have democracy without Christianity." He also issued a call for 1,000 Christian workers to hurry the job. According to figures published by Religious News Service, the Roman Catholic Church responded, but Protestantism lagged. In Japan there are now 1,120 Catholic, but only 220 Protestant missionaries.

From Christian Century I quote: "Nothing could reveal more clearly than these figures how appalling is the Protestant failure to rise to the opportunity presented by postwar Japan. American Christianity is utterly failing to rise to the mandate which the Great Commission lays upon us. We deserve the verdict history will pass upon us. Can there be any doubt what it will be?"

Christianity is spreading in Japan in spite of this failure to rise to such an opportunity. "I have another clipping which tells that Christianity is spreading to the rural sections with 2,000,000 converts. Evangelists are pushing a large-scale movement in rural areas with hoe in hand preaching the gospel.

With 2,000,000 converts to Christianity, the teaching of Christ is spreading over all the country. Under the leadership of the Japan Christian Federation, large-scale evangelical work is being conducted throughout the country. On one particular day, some 500 were converted at Shizuoka, 400 at Wakamatsu, and 400 at Tokushima. Sounds like the results of Peter's preaching at Pentecost, does it not?

This rapid increase is not due entirely to the work of the missionaries sent over there. Once a Japanese hears the story of Jesus, he receives it with such eagerness that he tells it far and wide among his friends and neighbors. Once a Japanese is warned, he does a good job of "warning his neighbor."

JAPANESE CHRISTIAN YOUNG PEOPLE especially see the greatness of this message and the unusual opportunities it provides for them. In letters we receive from Japanese youth, we read, "Tell us all you can about Christian young people in America."

Japan's future depends largely upon its youth, and these young people are eager to learn all they can about democracy and Christianity. With such eagerness, they will progress. Are we ready to help them?

At this last General Conference, the call came once more to evangelize the world. We were again admonished to take more seriously our responsibility as a divinely-commissioned church. We need to be mindful of this grave responsibility. Perhaps never again in the history of Japan will our opportunity be greater to help these people to see the light of the gospel as we know and understand it. The time is now. Can we afford to pass this opportunity by—neglect so grave a responsibility?

Your Girls and Mine

By VIDA KRAUS

THIRTY-FOUR YEARS AGO this month someone had the vision to plan a program of activity for girls of the church. Today it still reaps benefits, still serves our youth. This program is the Oriole movement.

During the last week of April, the Independence, Missouri, Oriole girls and their little sisters, the Blue Birds, celebrate the anniversary of this founding. The girls' organizations of the city instituted Blue Bird-Oriole Week last year as a promotion and activity week for the girls of Independence, and no more fitting time could be found than the week during which we celebrate the origin of the Oriole program. Several out-of-town groups joined with Independence by planning their award services to be held on the same dates as the Independence services.

Starting with very small numbers, the two organizations have grown until at the present time, throughout the church, approximately 350 girls are enrolled and working in the Oriole program. There are about 500 active Blue Bird girls. We must say "approximately" for not all bands and circles keep their registrations with headquarters up-to-date, and probably some have never registered at all.

Blue Bird girls are from seven to ten years of age inclusive, and the program intends to keep their activities church-centered during those years when the girls are becoming socialized. Oriole girls are from eleven to sixteen inclusive, although there is no rule on the top-age limit. Any girl may remain in the organization longer if she desires. The Oriole program attempts to keep the girls' activities church-centered during the all-important teen-age years. By church-centered, we mean that all activities are permeated with the ideals of the church. Parties, games, hikes, studies, camping, and all other activities are conducted in such a way as to develop in these girls Christian characteristics. Both are designed to assist, not supplant, the home.

In order that these things may be rightly taught, Blue Bird and Oriole leaders of sterling quality are sought. When a girl goes to camp or participates in other Blue Bird or Oriole activities, the mother may rest assured that the leaders will be setting a good example for her daughter.

GIRLS WHO FOLLOW THROUGH with the Oriole program broaden their interests, deepen their understanding, and attain skills in a satisfying manner. By the time they have completed First Rank Builder (the highest rank) they have learned something about home-building, religion, nature, skills with their hands, healthful body-and-soul-building recreation, and a number of other things. There is a variety of forty-three honor fields, only twelve of which are required. Each girl is encouraged to complete more than the required activities. Her tasting of these fields often leads to an interesting and worth-while hobby or may even be the beginning of a vocation. Barbara Bryant of the Orinzi circle in Independence has earned a badge in all but eight of these fields, and is now working on those. This sets a record.

Any number of worth-while outside activities may be added. One circle sends monthly a package of food and clothing overseas. At Christmas, the girls took fruit to the county home for the aged, and sang carols to the inmates there. At another time, they sang hymns for the Communion services in the rooms of the church members there. Another circle sings carols each Christmas at Rest Haven.

The highest rank in the program is not easy to attain, and girls who earn it know they have accomplished something. Last year there were seven First Rank Builder awards granted in the Oriole program, six in Independence and one in the Plymouth Branch, Detroit, Michigan. Ten Blue Bird girls of Independence and thirteen from other branches received their highest rank, the gold band.

An award, entirely religious in nature, was instituted in our church in 1946 for girls of all organizations. The minimum time required to earn this honor is one year, although it usually takes longer. It stresses our basic beliefs and growing Christian conduct, requiring 150 hours of actual service to the local church. Seven of these Light of Life pins have been awarded, four of them to Oriole girls: Mary Cooper, Gwendyl Grigg, Delores Tandy, and Lorena Steffens. Quite a number of girls are enrolled now. The "enduring to the end" will be the test.

PAGING SERVICE at the Sanitarium is a very popular project with Independence Orioles. Two girls are on duty at a time (none under twelve years of age), running errands, delivering mail, newspapers, or flowers, doing elevator service, taking messages or articles from floor to floor, folding linens, and so on. Last year six bronze pins were awarded for 100 hours of service and three silver pins for 200 hours. There is a gold pin for 300 hours, but none were awarded last year.

Outdoor life is and should be an integral part of the girls' programs. In keeping with this idea, camps for Independence girls have been sponsored at Gardner Lake. Oriole camps have been held for ten years, and separate camps for the Blue Birds, three years. There are five sessions planned for this summer—three for the Blue Birds and two for the Orioles. Two hundred eighty-eight girls, exclusive of leaders and staff, attended these sessions last summer. Most of the girls were from Independence, although there were individual and group visitors. The Dow City Orioles attended camp last year and plan to do so again this year. In Des Moines, Iowa, new Blue Bird and Oriole groups have been organized. They are making plans for attendance at the camps this year. (Incidentally, the Des Moines girls must be quite active, for recently they were awarded ninety-three honors.) At camp, the girls learn from participation in group life. Besides swimming, boating, archery, handcraft, dramatics, nature, or whatever fields are chosen for any one camp, the girls have a chance to learn co-operation, consideration, kindness, and the many characteristics which must be learned before any people can live together in a Zion.

BOTH THE BLUE BIRD and the Oriole organizations are designed to encourage girls to more perfect and useful lives. In Independence alone, there are probably 170 Oriole girls. Think what it would mean if everyone of these girls truly demonstrated what Christian girlhood is! This influence certainly would reflect in the improvement of a great many homes. Zion would be much nearer than it is now.

What is being done in your branch for your girls? If there are as many as five in either of the age groups, you have the beginning of a band or circle. Girls who are not members of the church may also wish to join. Thirty per cent of the girls in the largest circle in Independence, the Orinzi circle (which means Orioles in Zion), are either members of other churches or members of no church.

Are you capable of leading girls? It is no easy job, but it is a most worth-while opportunity. Nothing important is ever accomplished easily. The light of the Spirit of Christ shining in the lives of girls will be your reward.

Experiences of a Mother

After I was married, I did not attend church regularly as I had before. During my childhood, I went to services three times on Sunday and several times during the week with my father and mother, who were members of the Methodist Church. Since my husband was not interested in religion, I quit going until my children were one, two, and three years of age. The first Sunday I decided to go back to my parents' church, I took the streetcar to that neighborhood but, for some reason, got off before arriving at the church. As I walked along the street, I passed the Reorganized Church and remembered that some of my friends attended it. Partly because I wanted to see them again and partly out of curiosity, I decided to go there instead. The sermon was just what I needed and the fellowship what my heart longed for. The pastor and his wife visited me often after that and explained the church doctrine to me. I read the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants and was convinced I had found the true church, but I did not request baptism.

One night in a dream or vision, I saw a crescent of brilliant light over the Three Books which I kept on the mantel in the living room. It seemed I called my husband's attention to it, but he said there was no light. Again I mentioned it, but he scoffed at the idea. The third time I tried to get him to see it, it circled my head and descended, then disappeared. The following day I asked some Latter Day Saint friends of mine what it could possibly have meant, and they explained that it was the light of the gospel. I soon was baptized and had my three children blessed.

About a year and a half later, I was alone with the children when I became very ill. All during the day I tried to care for my little family, but by evening I had to remain in bed. Before my husband returned from work, someone knocked on the door, and my daughter asked him in. It was one of the elders who said he felt that I needed him, and so he came. He administered to me and then called in a neighbor to stay with me until my husband came. Late that night I was taken to the hospital where it was discovered that I had double pneumonia. Early the next morning the pastor came and administered to me, and by the following day I was so much better the doctors were amazed; they had been afraid I would not recover when I first arrived at the hospital.

Several days after my fourth child was born, I again had pneumonia; however, I received another blessing and recovered from it. This son has brought much joy into our home and is now assistant to the junior church school leader. My two daughters are active workers also. Betty is church school secretary and Zion's League treasurer; Lois is social convener of the League. I teach a church school class and am a member of the choir and women's department.

My prayer is that I may ever be able to help my children remain true to their faith and that our services may be acceptable to God.

Sends "Daily Bread" to President

Please send Daily Bread for eleven months to President Harry S. Truman. My people in Germany are very fond of him and, although I am a Republican, I was glad he had another chance. I feel if he puts his trust in our Lord and reads Daily Bread, he has a good start every day to govern this great country.

I have lived in America since 1905, and the longer I live here, the better I like it. I am so thankful to God that my two sons and three daughters were born in America and escaped the terrible war in Europe. I found this church in Council Bluffs, Iowa, as I was visiting at P. T. Andersen's home (Mrs. C. A. Skinner's parents); my youngest daughter married their youngest brother, Earl Andersen. I attended prayer meeting with Mrs. Andersen and, from that time on, I studied the Doctrine and Covenants and Book of Mormon. In the month I visited there, Brother Hunker held a series of meetings, speaking on the twelfth chapter of Revelation. I was convinced of the truthfulness of this gospel through the Spirit of God, which I felt burning in my heart. Although I was a member of the Lutheran Church, I felt I had to belong to this great work. It means as much or more to me than my citizenship in America, of which I am very proud. I have felt from the time I was baptized on September 30, 1933, that I would rather die than give it up.

I am sending Daily Bread to President Truman, first, because he comes from Independence. I understand he has spoken in our great Auditorium and knows President Israel Smith and many others of our fine men. Second, I feel if he will read it every morning, it will give him strength and wisdom to start his day, for with God on his side, "whom shall we fear?" I sent him the January copy before his inauguration and had a very pleasing reply from his secretary. I also sent some to my children and friends.

I must tell you of an experience I have had since I came here from General Conference. This place was our home town, 1914 to 1927. I recently heard that the farm which we sold in 1927 was for sale again. I brought someone from Iowa down here who wanted to buy a large tract of land, and he looked it over. I stayed and attended church at the old Lutheran Mission where my children went to Indian Mission school.

When the pastor, who has known us intimately, found out I had joined the Latter Day Saint Church, he told me I had to get up during the service and denounce this church. Another minister was preaching, and the choir sang my confirmation song from Germany, "Now thank we all our God." I did not get up and denounce my church, but told the pastor that evening in his home, as I was a guest there for a few days, that I could not do so even if it severed our friendship. I broke into tears as I was ready to leave, and he too turned pale; then his sweet wife asked me to stay and give a talk to the women that week. Many of the old Cherokee Indians were happy to see me, and some asked me to stay at their homes. The minister's wife still calls on me when she comes to Siloam Springs, and has invited me to come to their women's meeting at Oaks, Oklahoma, the Indian Mission.

I want to live such a life that I can bring many to this church to help build the kingdom of God on earth. I was willing to give my diamonds to help build Zion, but was told I must file my inventory and go according to the financial law. I have done so now, but have been ill for over three years with a nervous breakdown and have not been able to contribute much. Thanks be to God, I am better now than I have been in forty years, and I will spend the rest of my life serving our God and this church.

Report From Wichita Branch Solicitor

Desiring as large a percentage of financial statement filers as possible, we chose the theme, "We Take Inventory," for January. People seemed quite willing to take inventory of their lives as stewards for Christ. The stewardship program was presented in detail at priesthood meetings, where 100 per cent participation was pledged by men of the ministry.

A Sunday evening in January was set aside as a "Laboratory of Stewards" meeting. The pastor, district bishop's agent, and branch solicitor drew up some examples of a typical family, and copies of a sheet from the Income and Expense Record Book and an Inventory and Annual Tithing Statement blank were put on large backboards. During the service, examples were cited and the blanks filled in, showing the congregation how to keep accounts and file financial statements. Following each speaker, time for discussion was allowed. At the close of the service, those who desired help in filing their statements and those who wanted statements from the Presiding Bishopric for the total amount of tithing they had paid left their names with the men in charge. This was to help members who had paid tithing previously but had not filed statements regularly.

Inventory Day was observed on February 6 as a part of the communion service. Special envelopes were provided for each person in the congregation. These were designed to serve all purposes: if one desired to enclose a statement, he could do so and check the appropriate space. Space was also provided for those who were waiting for statements from the bishopric. As a result of this effort, 135 persons filed their financial statements; this includes nearly 100 per cent of the Zion's Leaguers and some nonmembers. Indications are that the final number will be near 175.

We have stressed throughout the entire endeavor that the primary purpose of keeping the financial law is the spiritual help it gives the individual. The testimony of many proves this assertion correct. Many who had not previously filed their inventories and some who had let their annual statements lapse expressed appreciation for the special service which drew the matter to their attention.

We feel that our branch is in a better spiritual condition as a result of this stewardship program, and we are looking forward to a new church construction plan in which the men of the branch will contribute much of the labor. This will provide another way in which we can express our stewardship.

The Power of the Holy Spirit

I am pastor of the Sheridan, Wyoming, Mission, far from the Center Place. We have twenty members here, but I am the only one belonging to the priesthood. We are having notices of our services published in the local paper. One family, seeing the notices and wishing to know more about the church, called me and arranged for an appointment. I went alone to visit these people. Before going in, I stopped and prayed that God's Spirit might go in with me. I was a different man after that visit. I have had this same spirit help me as I preached. When my thoughts were disorganized, it has sharpened my understanding and made the message clear. I believe God is willing to send his spirit to every member of this church who will prepare to receive it.

About eight years ago, when I lived in Kansas City, Missouri, I was told to prepare myself for the priesthood, but the office was not made known. Using this as an excuse, I did not take advantage of the opportunity that was mine. When I could have had plenty of help from men who were servants of God, I neglected to take it, and now I have to learn by myself. But God is merciful and forgives our blindness when he sees we are truly repentant. I was called to the office of deacon on May 9, and, after serving in that office five months, I was ordained a priest. Now I am studying in all my spare time and ask the prayers of the Saints that I may remain faithful to my calling.

Our prophet, like the prophets of old, can give us only the word of God. It is up to us to live in such a manner that the divine will is manifest in our lives. We shall then have the power that Christ had in his church. Some of us have experienced this power working in our lives, but we are not living in a fullness of that power, for we have not the fellowship of God.

Helped By Administration

I was recently blessed with an experience I should like to share with Herald readers. For a number of years I had a serious affliction, but because my husband was in ill health (he died last May), I delayed seeing a doctor. When I did go, he ordered me to the hospital immediately. I called the pastor of my home branch in Wheeling, West Virginia, and asked for administration. When I went to surgery, I felt no fear at all, and the operation was successful.

I am thankful for a faith that makes such blessings possible and for the ministry of those who represent God here on earth.

A Tribute to Ernest Roberson

Elder Ernest Roberson, former president of Southern Illinois District and staunch defender of the faith, died at Independence, Missouri, on February 22 from a heart ailment that had confined him largely to his home at 501 Aberdeen for a period of approximately two years. The death of this good man will be of but passing interest to the church at large, but to the people of the district in which he devoted years of unselfish service, to his many friends in Independence, and particularly to his family, it is a grievous loss.

Brother Roberson was particularly well informed on the doctrines of the church and baptized as many as twelve converts in one series of meetings he held. His love for the gospel and his zeal for sharing it with others caused him always to regard his duty as a minister his first obligation.

The marked respect with which his children regarded him is the highest tribute that can be paid to a parent. Through the appreciation that he and his devoted wife had for the value of education, every sacrifice was made that their children might have opportunities which they had been denied. There never came a time, however, when those children were not eager to sit at the feet of their father to listen to his mature and wise counsel even after they had earned recognition for themselves in their chosen fields. It may not be too important, but it is a matter of family pride that among the five sons-in-law, two sons, and five daughters, there is not one who uses tobacco. Neither did his father nor his only brother use it.

Ernest Roberson was a man of integrity, intelligence, high moral standards, good citizenship, and, above all, he was a devoted ambassador for Christ. His funeral is being preached in Independence, Missouri, as I write this tribute, and as one of those who cannot honor him by personal presence at these last rites, I would like for Dad Roberson, his family, and friends to know that his son-in-law is thinking about him today.

The Urge to Pray

Recently on a bright, sunny morning after many dreary, cold days, I started my family wash—an extra large one. I had just begun when I happened to remember that I hadn't offered my morning prayer for the day. But I was busy—too busy to pray, thought, and went on with my work. Later, when I had my first line of clothes hung up, I went to the window to look at them . . . and they were down in the mud. My husband helped me fix the line, and I washed them over, but my mind was filled with thoughts of self-pity. After hanging them out again, I went on with my other work only to look out and see that the other end of the line had broken. I could restrain the tears no longer. With a heavy heart, I gathered up the mud-stained clothes and brought them back for a third washing. That evening as I took the dry clothes from the line, I again remembered that I had not offered my morning supplication for a "shield" throughout the day, and I wondered, if I had prayed, if my work would not have gone more smoothly.

God requires something of us. Whether we recognize it or not, God helps us do any task better if we ask him to. Now when I feel the urge to pray, even though I am very busy, I stop my work and respond to that urge. Who knows how many lives may have been saved, how many souls helped to overcome some temptation, by the prayer of a friend or loved one? There is a constant demand for alertness on our part to the needs of others. The sooner we realize this responsibility, the sooner we will accomplish God's work.

Whether or not we recognize an answer to our prayers, we should hold no task so important that we cannot take time out to pray. God is a jealous God—and why shouldn't he be? All we have belongs to him. He should expect something of us and not be disappointed.

A Life of Ministry and Service

ELDER JOHN J. OLIVER of Central Chicago Branch in Chicago, Illinois, was eighty years old on March 2. He served two years as branch president in the twenties and has been counselor to nearly every branch pastor who has held that office. He can be depended upon at all times and particularly in cases of administration. Many times, at all hours of the night, in good weather or blizzards, when asked to go administer to the sick, his answer has been always the same, "All right, I'll be ready to go." He probably has blessed more babies than any other elder in the city of Chicago. His simple faith and devotion have endeared him to the hearts of the Saints.

Brother Oliver was born at St. Catharine, Ontario, on March 2, 1869. He first heard the Restoration Message while attending a meeting in Canada at which Elder R. C. Evans preached. He married Ruth Strange of St. Thomas, Ontario, September 13, 1892, and in 1894 they went to Chicago. He was baptized by William Strange in 1903. He has held practically every office in the branch at one time or another except pianist and choir director. This included the office of church school superintendent for twenty years. He retired from his trade of sheet metal foreman for the Chicago Park District when he was seventy-three years old. He had held this position for thirty-one years. The outstanding thing to Brother Oliver is the fact that the gospel has been restored, and that it has been revealed to him. His son, James C. Oliver, says of him, "He is somewhat like Will Rogers, holding no evil thought toward anyone."

our work on this project as a service to God and the church, but have found that there has been quite a bit of expense involved and, therefore, have found it necessary to charge 25c each to cover the cost of materials and postage.

Until wire recorders become as common as radios, there will be need throughout the church for stenographers who can efficiently record religious matter. It is our hope that this little booklet will help take the hesitancy from the pens of these workers.

IN THE BEGINNING

by Robbie Trent

Seven carefully selected stories from the Old Testament suggest the importance of choosing right conduct—of using one's freedom in accordance with God's will. Colorful illustrations make the Biblical events real to the child. 65c

Small Beginnings

I have greatly enjoyed the series of meetings recently conducted by Pastor John Blackmore. In closing each evening, he would say, "Sing at least one verse of 'We've a Story to Tell to the Nations.'" This is something each of us can do—tell the story. Perhaps it seems that we are not making much progress, but I do believe the church is advancing. Many good people are learning to put first things first, and God is blessing them for their effort.

Let us do what we are asked to do for the church, although it may be a very small task. Nothing is so small that God does not notice. Let us work together for the building of his kingdom.

Teaches in Christian Church

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1918, and I love to tell the gospel story. I am living too far from a branch of our church to attend services, so I have been going to the Christian Church. Here I have been asked to teach a class of older ladies. God has helped me in supplying the right answers to their questions, and they have marveled at the points of doctrine I present.

I have a serious throat ailment, however, which hinders my work. I shall appreciate the prayers of the Saints for my recovery so I can continue to tell of the restored gospel.

IT TAKES SO LITTLE to please a child, and I think as a mother, I have failed many times in devoting sufficient time to my children. Being a room-mother at school and a teacher at church school has challenged me often.

Our oldest girl's birthday party was a dreadful day in November. The refreshments were all ready, but never once had I thought of favors. So with a couple of oranges, an apple or two, and a few other household items, I started experimenting. The finished product was a Pilgrim maid. On an orange I drew a face with crayola, then took a piece of colored paper and Scotch tape to make the hat—the result was typical of 1620. Setting it up was a problem, but a quick look in the cabinets brought me the idea of using a paper baking cup turned upside down. This served as a stand and also looked like the big white collars worn by the Puritans. It was fastened in place by sticking it onto the bottom of the orange.

For either Thanksgiving or a Founders' Day party, take a plump prune and stick a red cranberry on a toothpick on one end to make the head. On the other end, go to any empty candy box you've been saving and get a brown paper cup. Cut this in half and fasten to the prune to make the tail. These may be set on a paper baking cup turned upside down.

At Christmas, I was wondering what the children at church school could make for their mothers, as children always enjoy making things themselves. At home, our Christmas tree already had taken its place in the living room. A quick glance, and I saw that I could trim the limbs on the bottom and backside where it wouldn't be noticeable. I clipped two pieces about three inches long for each child. With some red ribbon, stove-pipe wire cut in three-inch pieces, Scotch tape, and a handful of cranberries my problem was solved. Each child could easily thread the cranberries on the wire, bend in a circle and fasten with the tape. To this we placed the two pieces of evergreen and about an inch from the bottom tied a dainty bow. It was finished—a Christmas corsage for mother.

All of us have empty medicine droppers which we discard not knowing of any use for them. To keep spring flowers crisp and fresh on your Easter outfit, take the glass part of one of these droppers and a piece of green ribbon.

Close the tiny hole at the bottom with tape, glue, or fingernail polish. Cover the outside with glue and, starting at the bottom, wind the ribbon neatly around to the top. Near the top tie a bow. To keep your favorite flower fresh all day long, fill this with water and pin to your lapel. Children enjoy surprising their teachers with the first spring flower in this miniature vase.

Cooky making is always a time of fun at our house. If you never enjoyed rolling out cookies and cutting them, maybe your cooky making equipment is limited. With the amount of different cutters on the market today which sell for a few cents each, children can make cookies by the hour and never tire. Until a few months ago, I had never owned a cooky sheet. Since I'd never owned one, I didn't know what I was missing. If you have all this, and still do not enjoy making cookies, go to the nearest hardware store and ask for a cooky press which sells for less than a dollar. With this the time is cut in half as it eliminates rolling and cutting. Cookies may be decorated with red hots or chocolate chips. On St. Valentine's Day, go to the dime store and get a heart-shaped cutter. With a little experimenting, again using red hots, you can make faces of every kind. With your press, you will probably get a cake-decorating outfit. Cover these heart-shaped cookies with pink frosting, then use your decorator to write the name of each child on a cookie. Use your cookie press to make fancy shaped candy, too.

If your children are having friends home after school, or if you are planning a party, buy a ten-cent package of crepe paper to make tablecloths. One package will make several. Cut two strips as long as necessary, allowing a little to overlap. Take them to your sewing machine and stitch them together, using your imagination to later decorate the corners. I used these at a St. Patrick's Day party as I was unable to find any suitable ready-made ones. In keeping with the occasion, I pasted green shamrocks in each corner. Hearts could be substituted for valentine's day.

The next time you are invited to a bridal shower, why not take "the bride"? That's what I did several months ago. Did you ever purchase an odd-shaped gift and wonder how you were going to wrap it? That was my problem. I had purchased a step-on garbage can, but there was no way to wrap it to make an attractive gift. In the linen closet, I found an extra package of white crepe paper. I gathered this on the sewing machine to make a full skirt. Placing it around the can, I secured it with tape. To make the bride's waist, I found an empty tin can (No. 2½ size) in the trash and covered it with some of the crepe paper, placing it on top of the other I had fixed. Two strips of paper were quickly gathered and sewed up the side, then turned right side out. The result—raglan sleeves. I fastened these to the sides of the small can. A grapefruit seemed the appropriate size for a head, so with a black crayola and lipstick, I drew a face. Each piece must be fastened together with tape. She was complete except for one thing—a veil. If you have any big paper lace doilies they make wonderful veils, but I had only a package of small ones. When these were fixed together and fastened on the grapefruit, "she" was almost as beautiful as a bride. A little bow of blue or pink will add to her appearance. You see with a little experimenting, any package can be wrapped uniquely.

Anyone, in the eyes of her children, can be an inventor right in her own home. Try it and see. It's fun.

A Thought for the Week

TEMPERAMENT

Temperament is a convenient name for the balance of qualities of head and heart, of the thinking and the feeling "you" that goes into your work and no less into your play. It is a social as well as a personal reaction.

Personality is temperament plus. Every person and every animal above an oyster has temperament.

Character is temperament under control. Temperament is close to the emotions—how you feel and take things; it is also the emotional support of your work whether mind work or muscle work. It supplies the zest for doing what you decide to have your mind and muscles do. Temperament is your mental climate. —Joseph Jastrow in Keeping Mentally Fit.

The Magic of Cookies

By LOUISE WRIGLEY

DO YOUR COOKIES have magic in them? Are children drawn irresistibly to your house? Then you have one of the most precious gifts God ever gave to a mother . . . that of understanding and liking children—not just the spanking clean, well-behaved ones, but the grubby, underprivileged ones as well.

Cookies in the oven, cookies in the cookie jar . . . these things make such wonderful memories, such solid things to fit into a child's background. Of course they are only a symbol of generous giving, of the sense of being wanted and welcome. Yet what an important thing this is to your children and their friends. For when you proffer cookies with a friendly smile and a "Glad you're here," they will come again and again to your house through the years, growing up under your wise and watchful eye, finding a haven of security in an unsettled world. No juvenile delinquents these!

Maybe you hadn't thought of "ministering" to the lively, noisy youngsters who tear through your house every day. Maybe you hadn't realized that you can direct their youthful exuberance into useful channels . . . that you have an advantage "because anyone who can bake such good cookies is bound to be someone you can take your troubles to!" Children sense these things much earlier than we realize. They recognize and classify the adults who "care," who "don't care," and who "resent" them.

They are uncomfortable with the grudging mother who never quite opens up, never quite accepts "that grubby little Walters boy" even though he is intelligent, has an infectious grin and honest, trusting eyes.

To many mothers the sterile beauty of clean, cold rooms, furnished with very breakable furniture, is more important than the warm, living beauty of childish smiles and the knowledge of little souls close to your own.

Since we can only strive for perfection, there are times when childish shouts seem too much to bear, the mess and noise impossible. Let us try to remember always that they are growing every minute. We wouldn't want to stop that process if we could. We can't expect them to be normal adults if we stifle every normal impulse they ever have.

AS I WRITE THIS, there are four children in Johnny's playroom, and it sounds as if they might be tearing the house down. They aren't really . . . just moving the chairs around to make a train. Their train goes to Memphis, Albuquerque, St. Louis, Denver, Tacoma, Seattle, and Independence, Missouri (in that order). It's a game of all chiefs and no Indians . . . there is a conductor, engineer, porter, fireman, and Becky, the baby, is the caboose.

Yes, and there are cookies in the oven. Probably the first one to smell them will be five-year old Eileen who will come wandering casually out, her hands behind her back, asking "Whatcha baking?" And maybe while she is hopefully watching the cookies cool, she will tell me something that needs to come out in the open.

At least I hope my cookies have magic in them. Every time I bake them, I try mighty hard to put a little of it in.

Spring Is Here

By Nettie C. Lake

THE REDBUDS are blooming. That is always news to people who live where they grow. You wake one morning, and through the wintry boughs which, as yet, show no hint of green, there gleams the bright embroidery of the pert little redbuds—and your heart swells. Spring is here at last.

The birds are happy, too. After a long silence, which holds only the sleepy chirp of the sparrows, the mornings are filled with song. After that first wild burst of joy, the pretty creatures flit about busy at the business of nest-building.

We turn from our newspapers and radios to look at the familiar trees with their swelling buds, at the newly sprung jonquils, and the gay, surprising hyacinths. In one day, a thousand shoots can appear. Where yesterday you saw only a bush, half-naked, today there are lilacs nodding at you.

How sweet it is to see the beginning of another spring! How good for the spirit of man to leave his worries and fears and watch while Nature puts on her make-up.

This is a time when each of us needs healing contacts with the out-of-doors. Our hearts are heavy with great events about which we can do little. So much is happening in the world today that we sometimes feel we never shall attain the peace we have sought these many years. Moments come when we cannot bear to look or listen any longer. Then it is easy to find comfort under the open sky.

Whatever mortals do, God surely walks among redbuds. His mark is set upon the greening hills, and he beckons from the valleys where the fragile dogwood blooms. His promise is as old as earth and fresh as spring: Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

with resentment. The tall man picked up the gavel and struck the table twice for order. Roy's eyes left his father's familiar face for a moment and traveled swiftly down the row of seated figures.

They were a strange and forceful-looking group. Per-viewed the experiences of the past two years of reporting conventions, board meetings, and mergers. Many things had been done and said in his presence to shatter his youthful ideals.

In his mind, he began to marshal the facts he already knew about these men who sat before him. They were all employed by the same great syndicate. It was a legitimate, respected, and expanding organization. It counted its wealth in the hundreds of millions. His father was one of the "profitable servants" of this huge organization.

He thought, sadly, of what his father used to mean to him—a man whose personal life and habits were beyond reproach. Something of a stoic and an iron man, he was now caught up and owned by this cold-blooded, steam-rolling, money-mad machine. A picture of his mother's patient but tired face flashed across his mind . . . the evenings of overtime for the firm . . . the many business trips taken by plane from city to city . . . all had added to her worries. "And for what," mused Roy, "so that the world's largest grain syndicate could make more and more money." The words of the song came again unbidden to his mind.

And would he with an iron will,
Subdue the war lords, they who drill
God's children all to hate and kill.
If Christ came back today!

ANOTHER ASSIGNMENT to cover a stuffy convention," mused Roy as he strode across the lobby of Big Town's best hotel and made his way up the broad stairs to the private dining rooms above. He stopped before the gilded directory at the head of the stairs; as he read the name of the convention's chairman, his blue eyes snapped wide open and then crinkled at the corners.

"It's the long arm of coincidence again," he thought as he walked into the spacious dining room and seated himself at one side with a good view of the proceedings. All the smaller tables were vacant, but the long table in the center of the banquet hall was fully occupied.

There were sixteen impressive-looking men seated around it, but the most impressive of all was the tall, graying man who stood at the head of the board. As Roy's gaze fell upon him, his eyes took on a strange expression of pride mixed haps he could write that they were a typical group of American's self-made, ruling class. Surely they were men of responsibility and importance. He took a penknife from his pocket and expertly sharpened a soft copy pencil. He placed it beside his notebook on the snowy tablecloth before him, then he settled back into his chair expectantly. What he needed was an angle, and he hoped one would occur to him soon. His mood was sardonic and cynical, but his mind was vividly alert. He suddenly remembered a verse of a wonderful song he had heard sung the previous Sunday.

God, thy children now behold.
They worship still the calf of gold.
If Christ came back and saw men's greed—the vicious word—ignoble deed

HIS DISILLUSION with Big Business filled him with a sudden consuming sadness. Rapidly he re-

BUT THEN his attention was riveted upon the speaker's table. His father had risen and was introducing a man who was seated to his right. His father looked tired; the introduction was courteous but short. "Gentlemen, at this our last meeting, we have the great pleasure and honor to introduce the president of our company who has flown here to be with us."

Even Roy sat a little straighter and craned his neck to get a better look at the man who was president of the great empire which controlled countless elevators filled with grain which these men managed—shipping and controlling the flow throughout the world. The president was a short, stocky man, immaculately dressed. Roy liked him even before he spoke.

"Gentlemen! It is I, who am honored," he began. "I came here, as some of you already know, to honor the chairman of your convention and to make him a proposition. He has given of his time and energy unstintingly. That is why we honor him today. But more important, I want to ask him if he will consider leaving soon for the other side to represent us over there. He will work with the representatives of the government, the state department, and the Army. We are proud of our part in this worth-while project, and we want Henry here to continue the work overseas that he has so ably done here in America. How about it, Henry?" And Roy saw him place his hand affectionately upon his father's arm.

It was a tense moment, and in the second before his father replied, the whole picture before him, which had been hazy and chaotic, came into full focus. These men and his father . . . why they were on the right side after all! The air lift was one of the greatest acts of Christian love in history. He should have known that his father would have had a part in it. He had been spending himself all this while for an ideal, and Roy had thought of him as just another greedy American dollar-chaser. Yes, this ideal of brotherhood and compassion fit the character of his father as Roy had always known him. It was true . . . and now he understood his father's dedication to his job. Again the words of the song rang in his ears:

O may we end our bitter shame.
And fight for him, his love proclaim.
For he would save us, if he came.
If Christ came back today!

Where Credit Is Due By NAOMI RUSSELL

PEOPLE WHO ARE UNWILLING to assume any responsibility for their actions often ascribe the inevitable result of those actions to the whimsey of God. I do not doubt the influence of his will in many things, but I consider it a gross injustice to "accuse" him for the misfortunes we bring on ourselves.

The mother who feels she is being punished for having taken her children to the movies as she sees Junior and Mary break out with measles is misinterpreting the law of God. True, there is a law which makes it necessary for Junior and Mary to suffer the measles when adequately exposed (unless they are naturally immune or have had them previously) but it is not a law of divine punishment.

The man who speeds along the highway at an even eighty is flirting with death. If he has a blow-out or fails to make a corner, it doesn't matter much whether he is a minister or an escaped convict—he is in for a nasty accident. This, too, is the result of a law, but it's not the work of heaven that the careless speeder has an accident at any particular time on any particular stretch of highway.

I knew a lady once who needed a job. She was down to her last few dollars, and she was worried. She was trained to do several types of skilled work, but because there were no openings in fields right at her fingertips, she prayed, "God, help me to find work just anywhere." The next day she applied at the local cannery, and was told to report for work at seven in the morning. She happily confided to me that she knew God had arranged this job for her, and—although the people weren't the kind she usually worked with—she knew all would be well because this was "meant to be." Two days later I met her again and asked her how she liked the new job. "That place!" she said indignantly, "I wouldn't be caught there again. I quit the first morning."

SOME PEOPLE are like that about marriage, too. They pray to be guided in making a choice, decide for themselves, and give God the "credit." I have no doubt that the Almighty is interested in the creation of happy homes, and I sincerely believe many persons have been directed in making wise choices, but not everyone who prays gets an immediate answer. Too often the enamored man or woman pleads, "God, tell me what to do," and then mistaking the warm glow of infatuation for the leading of the Spirit decides, "God must approve of this person, or I wouldn't feel this way."

Then there are those who analyze the will of God by negative factors. For example, Janie who came to Independence to find a Latter Day Saint husband. After six months and still no prospect for a man of her faith, she became intensely interested in an atheist. Blinded by romance and tired of waiting, she made her decision. "I've given God six months to find a Latter Day Saint for me, and he hasn't, so that must mean it's all right for me to marry Bill."

Isn't it unfortunate that we find it more pleasant to be intellectually dishonest than to face the facts? It is easier, somehow, to pretend we are irresponsible pawns on God's chessboard than human beings with the divine right of free agency. Then when the moves are wrong—God's to blame.

Let's be fair about it. Measles or matrimony, let's admit we are responsible for our own exposure and our own decision.

Mr. and Mrs. Irving H. Cook of Providence, Rhode Island, announce the birth of a daughter, Elaine Joyce, born March 28. Both parents attended Graceland College. Mrs. Cook was formerly Joyce Wilcox of Shenandoan, Iowa.

Mr. and Mrs. Ray V. Trimble of Gueiph, Ontario, announce the birth of a daughter, Carolyn Marie, born March 21. Mrs. Trimble, the former Betty Marie Hutchins, is a graduate of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing, class of '46.

DEATHS

CRUM.—Joseph M., son of Jacob and Martha Crum, was born March 30, 1873, at Sinking Spring, Ohio, and died on March 19, 1949, at the home of his brother in Springfield, Ohio, where he had resided for a number of years. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on June 22, 1889. He was never married.

Surviving are a brother, Jacob O. Crum, and a sister, Mrs. Ambrosia Turner, both of Springfield. Two other brothers and three sisters preceded him in death. Elder Orval M. Hooten conducted the funeral service at the Reorganized Church in Sinking Spring. Interment was in the Sinking Spring cemetery.

BARDWELL.—Clara G., daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Richard Anderson, was born September 25, 1882, at Girard, Minnesota, and died March 9, 1949, at the Montana Deaconess Hospital in Great Falls, Montana. She was married to Bert O. Bardwell in December 1902; five children were born to them. Mr. Bardwell preceded her in death in 1939. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 22, 1901, and remained a faithful member the rest of her life.

Surviving are three sons: Vernon, Lawrence, and Delbert Bardwell; and two daughters: Mrs. Hazel Zackery and Mrs. Edna Hamrell, all of Great Falls; five brothers: Ross Anderson of Forest Grove, Oregon; Guy of Clumbia Falls, Montana; Lloyd of St. Paul, Minnesota; Floyd of Vancouver, British Columbia; and Ben of Astavan, Saskatchewan; and twelve grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elder W. C. Redfield at the Croxford Chapel.

SPRAGUE.—Hugh A., was born in Pierpont, Ohio, on November 5, 1868, and died March 18, 1949, in Bellingham, Washington, following a lingering illness. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church in September, 1894, and was ordained to the office of elder in 1910. For many years he served as bishop's agent of the Seattle-British Columbia District.

He is survived by his wife, Mary; a son, Averil H. of Bellingham; three daughters: Jessie Rose and Nettie Schabaika of Seattle, Washington, and Veronia Lockett of San Bruno, California; eleven grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren. Elder L. R. White conducted the funeral service.

WHITE.—Laura Belle Landingham was born November 15, 1876, at Woodbine, Iowa, and died March 13, 1949, at Cherokee, Iowa. At the age of eighteen, she was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church and on February 9, 1896, she was married to William Edgar White, who preceded her in death on September 8, 1947.

Surviving are six sons, six daughters, thirty-eight grandchildren, and six great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Cherokee, Apostle D. T. Williams officiating. Interment was in the Oak Hill Cemetery.

Correction

In the feature, "Introducing," page 2, April 9 issue, under the heading, "John W. Rushton," the last paragraph should read: "Beatrice M. Rudd became his wife on August 1, 1898." In the article, "The Power of His Resurrection," page 7 of the same issue, column 2, paragraph 3, line 5, should read: ". . . the cross of Calvary and the open grave are the symbols of the power of the Spirit . . ."

 TWO MEN

I heard two men disputing about the nature of God.

And I thought, They know nothing at all about him. If they did, they would be on their knees before him, worshipping, asking for light and understanding, praising him for his glory and majesty, honoring him for his justice, his mercy, his truth, and giving thanks for the wonderful gift of life.

 SLEEPING IN CHURCH

Perhaps in the future our churches will have lounge-rooms where harrassed wives may leave their sleep-loving husbands during the service. If ours were the salaried kind of ministers, there might not be so many "sleeping soldiers" in our midst. We would stay awake to see that we were getting our money's worth.—Edith G. Beggs.

 BACK FENCE GOSSIP

If the title leads you to expect something sensational in this item, it is misleading, and you can pass by it.

There is a kind of back fence gossip that hurts no one, for there is no malice in it.

There are spiritual fences, too, and one of the pleasures of life is to lean over them to exchange thoughts and ideas with good men, both parties gaining "riches untold" in the bargain.

In his early years, Dr. L. J. Marshall, a good friend of mine, related to me recently, he was taking a trip on a steamboat from St. Louis to New Orleans. It was his honeymoon, and he and his bride enjoyed the peaceful rest and the beauty of a vacation on the great river. They got acquainted with the captain. And before they reached New Orleans, there were eight honeymoon couples on the boat.

"We're pretty close to heaven, Captain," Dr. Marshall said one day.

The captain squinted ahead to a broad curve in the river. "I've had many kinds of people on my ship, with both heaven and hell in them," he replied.

"I remember one trip when I had a load of gamblers bound for the races at New Orleans. They gambled and drank and caroused all night. And there was just one preacher aboard. One morning he came to me and said, 'Captain, this is hell!'"

"Another time, I had a boatload of preachers going to a convention. This time, there was just one gambler aboard. Well, those preachers prayed and sang and quoted scripture and told holy stories until that gambler could hardly stand it. And one morning he came to me and said, 'Captain, this is hell!'"

"I suppose it all depends on how you look at it."—L. L.

A very good safety slogan is appearing in Kansas City—"Watch your step. The life you save may be your own!"

And we could use such a slogan in our church ministry—"Watch your spiritual life. The soul you save may be your own!"

 SUNLIGHT

Do not take the clouds too seriously. Of the 93,000,000 miles between you and the sun, they occupy, at most, less than three miles, leaving 92,999,997 miles of pure sunlight. The sun is still shining up there, and it will shine again on you.

LAMONI, IOWA.—The Zion's Leaguers from the congregations of Lamoni Stake met April 2 and 3 for their Restoration Festival commemoration. The banquet was held in the Coliseum basement on Saturday night with Ed Browne as master of ceremonies and Carl Mesle, youth leader in Independence, Missouri, as speaker. On Sunday, at 11:00, Brother Mesle spoke in the Coliseum. His theme was "What Is Discipleship?"

April 10 to 17, Fred Davies, pastor of the Walnut Park congregation in Independence, Missouri, presented nightly sermons to the Lamoni congregation. His theme was announced as "The Triumphant Christ."

GULF STATES DISTRICT.—District President W. J. Breshears reports that this district has adopted a baptismal goal of one hundred and seventy-five for the calendar year 1949. Last year the goal was 150, which was exceeded by seven.

Five persons were baptized in a missionary series at Birmingham, Alabama, in January, and six at Montgomery, Alabama, in March. As the result of a round-robin missionary series, in which Brother Breshears spent one evening each week for six weeks during February and March at Coldwater and Berrydale in Florida, and Dixonville and Atmore in Alabama, six others presented their names for baptism.

EASTERN MICHIGAN DISTRICT.—This district is "going to school" again as a district. Members have registered for a credit training course, A Yearbook for Church Schools, with John Rogers as teacher. In this district class, there are eight members from the Owendale Branch, six members from the Caseville Branch, seven from the Bay Port Branch, five from the Sandusky Branch, and two members from the Cash Branch.

This district has made history by successfully doing this same type of group studying in the past.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.—The annual Building Fund dinner was held here on March 25. For the third successive year the branch went over the top of their goal of $25,000.00. The total cash and pledges raised at the dinner this year was $26,305.93. Since that date $835.00 more has been given, increasing the total to $27,140.93. It was easier to reach the goal at the dinner this year than last. About 400 people were in attendance, and there was an abundance of enthusiasm and a fine spirit present. Those doing the tabulating had a hard time keeping up with the announcement of each contribution.

DES MOINES, IOWA.—On April 3, eleven new members were baptized. Three more decisions for baptism were given as a result of the three-weeks series of meetings just completed. These will be baptized later. John R. Grice preached the series of missionary sermons, and the attendance was excellent. On Sundays, the church building was completely full. The Graceland College A Cappella Choir sang in a concert in the evening. Encore after encore was demanded.

NIAGARA, ONTARIO.—Brother William I. Fligg is making slow but continuous improvement toward full health after an accident which has incapacitated him since December 20.

AURORA, ILLINOIS.—The women of this branch recently had a novel social activity when they sponsored a shower for their church kitchen. The prettily decorated packages were opened by the president, Margaret Reedy, and everyone enjoyed admiring the many useful articles of culinary equipment.

SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI.—The Zion's Leagues of the Spring River District joined at the Ozark reunion grounds near Joplin, Missouri, for their Restoration Festival celebration. At 8:00 o'clock on April 9, Carl Mesle of Independence, Missouri, spoke. The Springfield Zion's League was in charge of the service. On April 10, there was a Communion service and a prayer service.

HOLDEN, MISSOURI.—Missionary John Puckett baptized seven people on March 27, as a result of extensive missionary work which he has been carrying on in this region. His work has been centered in Central Missouri Stake.

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.—Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Sr., was at the district conference held here for the Central Illinois District on March 21. He reports there was excellent interest shown, and several prospects for new openings and for an increase of members were seen. A number of ordinations was provided for at the conference.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—Mont Keir, six-months-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Mont O. Roper was blessed by his grandfather, James F. Keir, and Vernon A. Reese in the kindergarten department of the Stone Church on April 3. The children were arranged in a large circle and sang "Happy Birthday," and "Welcome to Sunday School," to the baby. Tessie Smith was in charge of the service.

MOBILE, ALABAMA.—The Restoration Festival banquet was held in the new annex building recently added to the Mobile church. There were about ninety present on this April 6 event commemorating the organization of the church. Apostle W. W. Smith was present for the event. F. M. McDowell was the speaker, and Maurine Crownover was the toastmistress. The theme was "The Pioneer." The annex building is in two stories. The first floor is devoted to classrooms. On the second floor is the assembly hall equipped for banquets and having a stage.

DENVER, COLORADO.—On the very day that the Saints in Denver were holding their first services in their new church, there appeared copies of the Denver Catholic Register carrying a front page picture of the church at Speer Boulevard and Logan Street occupied by our members for many years and which recently was purchased by the Roman Catholic Church. Quoting from the Register briefly: "The creation of a new parish in Denver, the acquisition of a church and residence for it, and the naming of a pastor were announced this week by Archbishop Urban J. Verh. The parish will carry the title of 'Mother of God.'"

Graceland A Cappella

SHOWN ON THE COVER of this week's Herald is an organization which is recognized nationally as one of America's finest junior college choirs—the Graceland College A Cappella. The choir is twenty-six years old this year.

As in most other years, members of the choir come from many states. To be exact, sixteen states and the District of Columbia are represented in the organization this year. These states include as widely separated points as Idaho, Florida, California, New York, and Tennessee.

Recently the choir completed a spring concert tour which included radio broadcasts and performances in Des Moines, Council Bluffs, and Omaha. The repertoire this year includes sacred works from such composers as Palestrina and Christiansen, Negro spirituals, folk songs, and selections from the pens of Jerome Kern, Rodgers, and Hammerstein.

Director of the choir is Henry A. Anderson, instructor in voice and director of choral music at Graceland.

All Graceland students, whether music majors or not, are eligible to try out for membership in the A Cappella. Membership in the choir is one of the most highly sought honors at Graceland. The choir is featured regularly in Graceland's church services.

Introducing . . .

L. WAYNE UPDIKE (page 6) has been contributing to Herald columns for the past ten years. His last article appeared in the issue of February 19, 1949. He is the author of the booklet, Ministry to the Erring and Church Court Procedure, published late last year.

Wayne was born at Black River Falls, Wisconsin, on September 17, 1916. In 1944 he married Mary Elizabeth Malcor. The names of their children are Lee, 3; and Vicki, 2. Brother Updike attended Graceland 1937-1939. He received his Ph.B. (Finance) from the University of Wisconsin in 1942. He has done graduate work at Kansas City University.

After receiving his degree, Wayne went under missionary appointment and served the Southeastern Illinois District. The next year he was ordained a bishop and sent to Kansas City Stake where he has served for six years.

GOMER R. WELLS (page 10) has been a minister of the church for sixty-one years and has served it in many capacities and many fields. He was the first general Sunday school superintendent to give full time to religious educational work. In 1891 he was elected the first general secretary of the Sunday School Association.

Brother Wells was born near Bozeman, Montana, July 10, 1867. He went to Australia on a mission in 1893 and was ordained a seventy in 1896. The next year he married Adelaide Mary Pascoe. They have four sons: Edward H., Gomer R., Melvin R., and Milbert A. Their two daughters are Mrs. Lena Jones and Mrs. Dorothy Kepley.

In 1888 Elder Wells attended State Teacher's College, Warrensburg, Missouri, and was preparing to teach when he was called into general church work. While in college, he began his literary career as manager and contributor of the Normal Student. He also played clarinet in the college orchestra. He served six years on the board of trustees of Graceland College.

Seven of the fifteen years Brother Wells served the Australian mission he was counselor to the first bishop on that continent. He also served several years as editor and manager of their mission paper, The Gospel Standard. In America he served in pastoral capacity in Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, and Nebraska. Since 1934 he has worked in Independence under the direction of the Presidency. He has served in group pastoral work and as Auditorium guide.

VIDA E. BUTTERWORTH (page 12) is the daughter of Patriarch Charles E. Butterworth, formerly of Dow City, Iowa. She was graduated from the Independence Sanitarium School of Nursing in 1929 and in 1935 came back as educational director and instructor and is still serving in that capacity.

Miss Butterworth attended Graceland College in 1934 and then went on to Teacher's College, Columbia University, New York, where she received a B.S. the next year. From the same university, she received her Master's degree in 1941. She was elected to Lambda Delta Sigma at Graceland and is now serving as treasurer of the Missouri State League of Nursing Education. She is also a member of the Business and Professional Women's Club and of the University Women's Club of Independence.

PRIESTHOOD INSTITUTES HELD

April 1 to 3 in Mobile, Alabama, a priesthood institute was held with F. M. McDowell, U. V. Smith, Orlin Crownover, W. J. Breshears, Franklin Steiner, and Raymond Booker on the staff. April 8 to 10, the same staff with A. D. McCall went to Brewton, Alabama, where another priesthood institute was held. With a total of 119 eligible priesthood members in the two branches, there were 103 registered in attendance. "Building Latter Day Saint Family Life," was the text. There was 100 per cent attendance of priesthood at the Brewton Institute by the men from Birmingham, a distance of 250 miles.

ARTHUR GIBBS PRESENTS SERIES

Seventy Arthur Gibbs reports three successful series of preaching services and lectures. In Camas, Washington, he gave ten lectures and two sermons with an average attendance of eighty-four, of which twenty-four were nonmembers. At the end of the work, there were three baptisms. In Woodburn, Oregon, he presented six lectures and one sermon. The average attendance was ninety-five, of which about thirty were nonmembers. There were fifteen baptisms. In Sherwood, Oregon, he presented six lectures and made many visits. At the end of the time there were six baptisms.

HARTSHORNS IN SPRINGFIELD

Elder and Mrs. Chris Hartshorn went to Springfield, Missouri, Sunday, April 17, where Brother Hartshorn preached the Easter sermon at eleven o'clock and the evening sermon. They drove back to Independence on Monday morning. Brother Hartshorn is the managing editor of the "Saints' Herald."

APPOINTEE INSTITUTES

All General Church appointees from the Northwestern, Western, and Southern United States are meeting in an institute May 4 to 13 inclusive at Berkeley, California. At the same time, beginning May 3, the appointees from the Great Lakes and East are meeting at Detroit, and those from the Middle West are meeting at Independence. All three of these institutes will have the same topics for consideration.

BAPTISMS IN GENERAL CHURCH FOR MARCH

President F. Henry Edwards reports that the baptisms for March, reported to the department of statistics, are 214, slightly better than the average.

QUORUM AND COUNCIL SESSIONS

The Quorum of Twelve met in session beginning Monday, April 19. The joint council, comprised of the Twelve, the Presidency, and the Bishopric, convened April 20 and will continue in session until shortly before the opening of the appointees' institute in Independence, on Tuesday, May 3.

REPORT FROM BERLIN

President F. Henry Edwards reports that Apostle D. Blair Jensen and Seventy Eugene Theys have met with the Saints in Berlin, who now have a church building of their own. Conditions in the city are improving. There is good interest, and there is a high percentage of baptisms. The men report an excellent spiritual quality among the people.

Question Department

FROM THE VERY BEGINNING of the Herald, its editors have received questions from many sources relating to matters historical and doctrinal. From Isaac Sheen, first editor, on down through the late President Joseph Smith and associates and during the administration of our lately deceased President Frederick M. Smith, literally thousands of questions have been answered in Herald columns.

For quite a number of years, a department in charge of Elder A. B. Phillips was successfully maintained; this has been discontinued during recent years. Undoubtedly hundreds of people have directed questions to the editors in chief, the president of the church, or his counselors, thinking that answers could be termed ex cathedra or official interpretations having the weight of law; however the fact is that such has not been the case. Answers given have been but the personal opinions of the writers, carrying only such weight as was naturally attached to the thinking of those more or less advised as to the law and familiar with the history of the Restoration.

In 1879 President Joseph Smith, editor, was called upon to answer a direct and explicit question on this point. In the Herald for January 15 of that year, we find the following:

"Question.—Are the answers to questions published in the Herald to be received and used by the Church as law to govern in matters to which they may refer?"

"Answer.—No; the answers to questions are the opinions of the Editor, or Editors, upon the subjects referred to; and so much is law as may be quoted from the books themselves, or the decisions of conferences which may be cited.

"We have been expecting that this question would be asked, and hence we are prepared both for the question and the answer. The only weight that these opinions may have is that which may attach to the supposed capability of the Editors, and their opportunity for knowing whereof they speak; or that fictitious, or factitious, meritoriousness supposed to be conferred by the choice of the body to represent them in the editorial chair. But as dignities are not highly prized in the age in which we are living, none are very awe-inspiring. Bigotry and dogmatism may have ruled well in times past, but we all fear to trust them now, and hence weigh well human opinions before being concluded by them.

"One effect that this answering of questions in the Herald has had, and does have, it tends to bring about a more complete understanding of the law itself and the practical workings of it, as well as giving us to know how we stand upon the matters discussed.

"We hold that man is not infallible, hence we make no claim to perfection of judgment or knowledge, and even feel to hesitate to declare dogmatically what we do know. And while willing to express an opinion if we have one, upon any point of the law, or any subject upon which we may be questioned, or an opinion may be desired, we are just as willing that every one else shall hold an opinion upon the same subject or point, either agreeing with, or adverse to the one we hold; and further, we are willing that ours shall be examined, criticised, received or discarded, as its demerits or merits may demand."

IT IS IN THIS SPIRIT and pursuant to the policy therein so well stated that Herald editors will resume another Question Time department.

We are faced, at the outset, with the difficulty if not the impossibility of giving personal attention to the questions coming to us for answer. Neither the editors in chief, nor Associate Editor Lea, nor Managing Editor Hartshorn can find time necessary to do this work. However, we have undertaken to enlist the services of a corps of experienced church men and to allocate to them, according to their respective experiences and abilities as nearly as we can, the various questions reaching our office from the desk of Managing Editor Chris B. Hartshorn. Up to the present, the following have consented to serve: Elders Charles Fry, John Blackmore, Samuel A. Burgess, George A. Njeim, and James F. Keir.

We offer whatever of service this department can give to members who have problems. We have no desire to make work for anybody, but feel there is a need, as indicated by the number and nature of questions reaching us.

Each answer will carry the name of the one who has prepared it.

We trust in this way we can supply a real need without assuming a burden we feel we cannot carry by ourselves alone.

Beginning in an early issue, we will give such space to this department as may be required by the number and character of the questions received.

If You Don't Know, Ask

We have learned much that we know by asking questions. The kind of questions asked is the important thing. It reveals the nature of our interests, our hunger for knowledge, and our ability to state our problem. The willingness and ability to ask searching questions is a sign of intelligence—not "exposing one's ignorance."—C.B.H.

Editorial

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

We have recently received two letters from Elder Emery E. Jennings, President of Far West Stake. The first addresses itself to objections to Children's Day activities and expresses our point of view very well. Here it is:

Every once in a while I hear someone indicating that Children's Day activities and perhaps a baptismal service bring children into the church prematurely and consequently serious problems are developed later with too many of our young people who are baptized on this day.

I have done some research work here in Far West Stake in that regard, and I find that that is not generally the case at all. As a matter of fact, most of our delinquents come from people who have been baptized through other sources, and I am one who thinks we should stress even more the importance of holding pre-baptismal classes for our young people and giving better emphasis to Children's Day Activities.

I am sending you for your information a copy of a letter recently sent out to our church school supervisors, urging them to arrange for children's pre-baptismal classes and to send us a list of children who are eligible to be baptized. We have done this sort of thing now in Far West Stake for the last four years and find it quite beneficial.

The second of these letters is addressed to church school supervisors in the Far West Stake and is as follows:

As has been the custom in our church for many years, we have given a great deal of emphasis to Children's Day. Quite often a baptismal service is planned with the other activities on this day. And as a part of the Children's Day program, a pre-baptismal class should be arranged to which boys and girls of the church school can be invited. This class should be organized right away as we have just thirteen Sundays left before Children's Day. The quarterly, "Getting Ready for Baptism," Q-223-D, is most excellent for this work. It is available and can be sent to you from our office if you don't have one and care to use it for this class.

We should like to have you contact your pastor and work with him in organizing this class if you think you need one, and have any children of baptismal age, or some who will be by June 12, attend. In fact, it would be well to invite seven-year-olds to this class, too.

We are inclosing a form and would like to have you fill it out and return it to our office for our information and "prospect file." Be sure you list all the youngsters in your congregation who are not members of our church even though they may not be attending.

If we can be of any further help, please let us know. This is a very important part of your responsibility, and we know you will do all you can to prepare your children for baptism.

On Christmas day, while at home thinking of the church, the Christ child, and many other things around that season of the year, I was impressed to visit a family, of which none of the members belong to the church. After spending about two hours with them "talking church" and feeling very good in my soul, I left with an invitation to come back any time. I informed Brother Zonker, the pastor of our branch here, and we have visited in this home every Tuesday (with a few exceptions) since. The whole family—father, mother, and five children—are to be baptized April 6. I am very happy today to know what God can do through us, his servants, when we are obedient to the impressions that come to our minds.

My passage on the plane from Kansas City to Lima was altogether pleasant. The average number of passengers on the plane was about thirty-five, and there were scarcely any perceptible air pockets. We arrived in Lima on schedule at 7:35 a. m., the day after leaving Kansas City.

After checking in at a hotel, I went out for a stroll on the plaza San Martin, the chief square and busiest part of the city. (San Martin was the Abraham Lincoln of Peru.) As I walked along, I heard a voice say, "Ward Hougas." I was somewhat startled and instantly wondered if I had heard a radio. Then I turned and looked directly into the face of Roy Weldon. It was a happy meeting. Accompanying him was Francis Anderson of Holden, Missouri. They were looking well despite their strenuous trip—mostly by land—from their homes.

I spent a couple of hours with them at their hotel that night, and we had dinner together the following evening. They left Lima yesterday by plane for Cuzco. It was a pleasure to exchange notes on travel and experiences. In a city of 850,000 population, the words, "Ward Hougas," being spoken at my side, the three of us having arrived in the city the same day, and our not knowing of each other's whereabouts would make our meeting seem providential. Brother Weldon had just called for his mail and had received a letter from Brother Hougas.

Lima, named by its founder, Francisco Pizarro, who with his 110 infantrymen and sixty-seven cavalrymen overthrew the mighty empire of the Incas, enjoys perpetual springtime. It is never sufficiently wet for raincoats or umbrellas. I am spending some time at each place of interest. By so doing, I hope to come in contact with information that I might miss on a more hurried trip. I am particularly interested in pre-Inca ruins. The entire coastal section around Lima shows traces of ancient civilizations—ruins of unquestioned antiquity. It has been my privilege already to have visited the ruins of Maranga and those at Cajamarquilla.

The population of Lima is composed almost entirely of mestizos, a mixture of Spanish, Indian, and some Negro blood.

Dr. F. M. McDowell, Director of Priesthood Education, reports that he has conducted priesthood institutes at Cameron and St. Joseph, Missouri; Logan, Iowa, Mobile and Brewton, Alabama, since February 25. He compliments the administrative officers in each of these places for their co-operation and says that members of the priesthood appeared "hungry for instruction and materials."

Dr. McDowell outlines his objectives for these institutes as follows: a. a call to renewed priesthood preparation and service; b. a fresh approach to the ministry of the local priesthood; c. making available essential materials for study; d. intensive classwork using new methods, especially stressing various types of discussion; e. providing for a high percentage of participation including oral reports; f. publicity and sale of materials available for priesthood education; and g. mapping out high points for continuing educational programs in each district.

Serve Where You Are

By LEONARD LEA

Service and Success

Service is a key to success. Organizations survive or perish according to the merit of the work they do. People are judged by the work and thought they give to the world. Church members are reminded that "we should bring forth fruit unto God." If the church is to grow in strength, it must improve the quality of its leadership and membership in lines of service.

The path to improvement lies in the direction of deepening and enriching our spiritual life, increasing our devotion, and extending our training and preparation for our specific tasks.

Be Sure You Serve

The church and kingdom of God move slowly along toward their destination because of the many who are willing to ride and do nothing, while those who are willing and able to work are so few. There is an urgency in the necessity for service. Joseph Smith brought this message to the people of his generation:

O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind, and strength, that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day: therefore, if ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work.—Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1.

In the membership and priesthood of the church, we have many people of talent and ability. If we could persuade more of them to give real time and effort to church work, more good could be done.

There are many excuses for not serving, but there is only one correct answer to the invitation of Jesus, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." That good answer is, "And they straightway left their nets, and followed him."

The original disciples answered with action, not with talk nor excuses.

Serve With What You Have

Some members decline to serve because they allege that they are not prepared. Yet every man has some gift with which he can serve God. "All are called according to the gifts of God unto them."—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8.

The condemnation of unwilling servants was indicated by Jesus in the parable of the talents (Matthew 25: 14-30), "Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." If this is the fate of the unprofitable servants of God, what shall become of those who do not serve him at all?

Let none hear you idly saying,
"There is nothing I can do,"
While the souls of men are dying,
And the Master calls for you.

Prepare by Serving

The way to learn how to work is to go out and do it. Dr. McDowell used to say to his classes, "You learn to do by doing!" If you want your talent to wither and die, let it lie idle and useless. If you want it to develop, go out and put it to work.

Nobody learns how to do anything by reading a book, except to gather ideas. When the book is read, he must put it down and go to work. Nobody could learn to preach simply by studying books on homiletics. Real learning begins only when one takes a text and some thoughts and goes into the pulpit to address the congregation. So it is in any line of church service.

Prepare While You Serve

Put it either way you wish: serve while you prepare, or prepare while you serve. They should go together. Many students carry a full load of scholastic work along with some kind of church service. Business and professional people serve and learn at the same time.

Every good life should divide its leisure time into three parts: 1. rest and recreation; 2. study and self-improvement; 3. church and social service. A life deficient in any of these aspects is not wholesome or well-balanced.

Paul castigated the idlers who made learning an excuse for idleness with a sharp phrase, "Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth."

Serve Where You Are

Serve in the work to which you have been called, as member or minister. Do not yearn for higher office. Ambition for advancement of this kind unfits you for any ministry in the church. If you will not serve where you are, you will not serve in a higher office.

Serve in the place—the city, the congregation, the mission—where you are, as long as you are there. When circumstances take you to another place, be ready and willing to serve there. But wherever you are, as long as you are there, continue in the ministry that God has given to you for the advancement of his kingdom.

Some members of the priesthood are "unemployed" because they have moved to congregations where there are already many holding office and serving. Such men could renew their work and find joy in service by going out to assist smaller congregations where the need of help is great.

IN TELLING THE GOSPEL STORY, we often are asked this question: "Why should I be baptized?" If this question is asked of the average group of Latter Day Saints, one can easily predict that the first answer will be, "Baptism is for the remission of sins." In addition, many other answers are frequently given by those of our faith. Some say, "We should be baptized because Jesus was baptized," and quote the Scripture: "Thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." Sometimes we refer to the experience of Philip in baptizing the eunuch when in answer to the question, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" Philip answered, "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." Those who are inclined to emphasize the need for authority in baptism usually refer to Paul on the occasion when he rebaptized some who formerly had been baptized by Apollos.

There is a definite value in knowing these common answers. It is of unquestionable value to be able to say "the Bible teaches baptism." Jesus often used the words, "It is written," in supporting his position with regard to the subject under discussion.

This ready ability to cite the common scriptural reasons as to why men should be baptized is a definite factor in the growth of the church. Dr. Marcus Bach, in a book entitled, They Have Found a Faith, tells of his personal study of what he calls "the world's little known religions." He has taken the time actually to live and worship with, and even to assist various small churches, in an endeavor to discover what makes them grow and become vigorously missionary in general tone. He went along with the Jehovah's Witnesses and turned the crank on the little phonograph that tells the story of the people of that faith. He attended meetings in the homes of members of other churches. He asked questions. After considerable effort in this regard, he stated two outstanding conclusions as his answer to the question, "What makes a church grow?" These are as follows: (1) Every member is a witness. (2) "Stock answers" are employed almost exclusively.

It can be readily seen that the first of the above reasons as to why a church grows fits in with our philosophy and constitutes a challenge to our church in attempting to win new members.

The second reason given for the growth of small churches also has some value for us, though members of our church are inclined to veer away from any dependence upon a certain set curriculum or list of answers for all questions. It should be recognized, however, that a reasonable "stock answer" is better than no answer at all. It is far better to quote a sound scriptural reference with assurance and faith in its truthfulness than to seek to find the answers in the realm of human thinking and to fail therein. Suffice it to say at this point that Dr. Bach feels that one of the elements which makes small churches grow is that their representatives refuse to be led into discussions of other subjects than those contained in their rather definite missionary story. These men are taught to tell the story as they see it, and to avoid philosophies they do not understand. They merely state: "This is what we believe." This same story is repeated over and over again at every opportunity to many people. The result has proved that this method wins members. One who is in search of truth will be continually reaching out for better answers and greater understanding of God's total plan, but the beginning point is in having a thorough knowledge of what we believe.

THERE ARE MANY COMMON VIEWS in the world as to the purposes of baptism. One of these views is that baptism is a ritual which makes you a member of the organization. A second view is caught up in the phrase "an outward sign of an inward grace." There are those also who hold that no organization is necessary, that baptism is merely baptism "into Jesus," and that becoming a member of a church is anti-Christian.

Latter Day Saints are not inclined to be restricted to any of these common views of the purpose of baptism. They make use of the scriptural quotations supporting the reason for baptism, but in addition to having these stock answers from the Scriptures, the effective Latter Day Saint who wishes to be a witness for Jesus also understands something of the reasons as to why these answers exist in the Scriptures. It is said that the question was once asked, "Why baptism?" The answer was given, "Because God commanded it." And back came the question, "But why did God command it?" And the answer again was, "Because man needed it." This exchange of question and answer might be carried one step further, and in the next question and answer we find the introduction for the following chapters in this series.

Man doesn't need baptism if he wants to stay where he is. Nor does he need it if God were willing to have him stay where he is. But he does need it, because God needs man. God's desire can never be satisfied while man is partly under the domination of another power and another authority and another way of life than the godly way. Since God needs man, man needs baptism.

GOD'S NEED FOR MAN

God loves mankind. He created us. It is difficult to imagine any but the very kindest of attitudes on the part of the Creator toward his creation. Just as anything I make is mine and has become a part of me because of my investment in it, so have we become a part of God because of his investment in us. Not only did he create us, but he gave his Son that we might not be lost.

There are some people in the world who go through life always saying, "Some day I am going to get that done." Their desire to get it done is, however, insufficient to move them from their lethargy, and day after day passes without the accomplishment of any particular project. Rather suddenly they discover that they are getting old, and that which they set out to do is still not begun.

God is not that way. So long ago that it is beyond the reach of time, he set forth to save his human children. With him it has never been a matter of "Some day I will get that done." With him it has been a matter of continuous striving with man that humankind might be returned to him. "Man is that he might have joy," and God is not joyful as he contemplates the lost condition of man. He cannot rest until all is done that can be done to save us and to overcome the forces of evil which contend against this salvation.

Love demands action. There is no place for lethargy. There should be, therefore, in our philosophy of God, no thought that the forces of righteousness are marking time. Throughout all the ages of human history, there has been above and before men the challenge of the upward pull. Whenever a man has responded to this upward pull, he has risen above the common run of men and has become recorded, not only on the pages of history for our information and challenging, but also on the scoreboard where God's successes have been recorded. While the battle for the allegiance of humanity grows increasingly fierce, those who trust in him have increasing confidence that when the final score is reckoned up, God will have won the battle for possession of the creation he loves. God needs man so intensely that no failure on the part of man to co-operate with him will cause him to abandon mankind. He is so persistent in his efforts to save man that no seeming defeat will cause him to give up in despair or disgust. His yearning for man is such that with him no rest is possible. No cessation from his labors can be even remotely considered until all is done that can be done to cause man to choose him and accept Jesus as the Savior.

MAN'S NEED FOR SALVATION

The ordinary man of today is lost. He doesn't know where he came from; neither does he know what will happen to him when he dies. He is the acme of creation, yet he is completely without control over the universe in which he lives. Lightning might strike him down at any moment. A flood may wash away all his possessions or drown him. He is completely at the mercy of powers beyond the control of humanity. And yet, to a great extent, he has come to utilize these forces for his own purposes. The rain which might cause the floods can also water his crops. The storm that brings the lightning also cools the earth and makes it habitable. The wind which might destroy and spread havoc over the face of the earth, when reduced in violence becomes the breeze that cools man, drives his windmills, and carries the clouds into position so rain can fall on his fields.

In man's relationship with the universe in which he lives, there exists a son-father relationship between him and his Creator, upon which hangs his dominion. Without the Father, man can no more make of this universe a place of security and enjoyment than a newborn babe can find its way in the world of humans. Man is dependent upon a kindly God.

This dependence upon God in the field of material things is but a symbol of the dependence upon God in a spiritual sense. Man left to his own devices is often reduced to the level in which he reacts to others more like an animal than a potential son of God. Left to shift for himself, he destroys his brother. This hopelessness of individuals becomes a hopelessness of nations, and peace disappears. Wars follow. This is the way of men who are lost.

When one is lost, his principal problem is that he has no reference points on which to base his movements. There is nothing to which he can refer to determine whether or not he is going in the right direction, and, like a man lost in a forest, he wanders about, knowing not which way to go. He needs to be found.

It was recognition of the fact that man, being lost, needed someone to find him and lead him back to his former relationship with God, that caused God to send his Son to the earth to become "the Way." Herein is demonstrated the action which God's love for humanity demands from him. Without such help, man would have been forever lost. The purpose of baptism has to do with this great need of man for salvation. It touches his life at the point of embarkation upon "the Way."

GOD AND FUNCTIONALISM

To many of our people the church has become a routine, a ritual, a procedure which is followed Sunday after Sunday and Wednesday after Wednesday. It is hoped by these people that following this routine—"playing church," as it is sometimes called—will result in the salvation of souls. Those saved will be those who "endure." A large part of the effort of many of our church workers is an effort to continue the usual routine and keep it running smoothly. The adept administrative officer senses that a smooth running organization must have unity and good will, and he therefore strives to preserve happiness in all those who are coming to church and participating.

God probably approaches the problem quite differently. While he, too, is very anxious that there should be unity, fellowship, and good will, he seeks that those who are striving to assist him in the achievement of his purposes for man shall find such fellowship and good will, not in activity which is circular and brings us back to the same point each week, but in activity which is pointed toward a distant but definite goal and finds us moving toward that goal a little way each Sunday. He recognizes that the distance to the goal is measured in terms of people. In their habits and thoughts, he measures his successes. To effect such progress, he has set in the church some few rituals which are designed when properly executed to move people in the direction of the kingdom. When these rituals are perfunctorily executed, it soon becomes apparent that even in these no progress is made. But when they are executed with understanding and purpose, progress becomes obvious.

It is a rule in certain scientific fields that "form follows function." This is particularly true with regard to some architecture. The thought behind this phrase is that the beginning point in the construction of a building or a piece of machinery or other scientific accomplishment is the determination of the desired objective. What are we trying to do? What functions need to be performed?

It was in just this manner that the reaper was invented. The beginning was the objective of cutting wheat and removing the straw from the grain. A process of development followed until these functions were accomplished by one machine. Who could have predicted the form a reaper would take? The function was understood long before the reaper was in existence, but the form has followed the function until now an efficient combine has been built which will cut the grain and thresh it in the field, then load it on trucks to be hauled to the market.

The same process is followed in the construction of buildings. The architect begins with the purpose for which the building is intended. If it is to be an office building, he builds it to house adequately the necessary activities which should take place in an office building. The same procedure might well be followed for the construction of homes and churches, etc., as against a lingering adherence to the practice of building houses as they were built before, and building churches as they were built in the yesterdays.

In our church activities, we have this continual conflict between doing the thing which was done yesterday—the "pull of tradition" as it is often referred to—and accepting functional activities which are gauged to move the church toward the kingdom.

In the setting up of the church and its ordinances, God has always taken the functional approach. His first objective has been to qualify man for life with him. Every aspect of the church has been designed in order to contribute to the accomplishment of that objective. God has not set in operation a series of actions to be followed; rather he has begun with a people to be returned to him and devised a plan which includes various rituals, ceremonies, virtues, codes of ethics, standards of procedure, and principles of life, all of which if properly applied will move people in the direction they ought to go.

One of the forms which evolved as a result of these efforts to save man is the ceremony of baptism. It cannot be overemphasized that this ceremony is something more than a means to church membership, something more than an outward sign of an inward grace, something more than a demonstration of authority. More than all of these, baptism is a ceremony designed to "get the job done" with regard to moving a man nearer to the kingdom. The form of the ceremony follows the function which requires accomplishment.

Everything God has set in the church by way of commandments and procedures has been so instituted because of God's desire to save man. They have been worked out against the background of his great love for men, and man's great need for salvation. As God observes man in his lost and fallen state, he observes that in his "lostness" there are certain characteristics about humans, all of which must be recognized. Some of these characteristics, of course, must be developed and made stronger, but others must be removed. Regardless of which characteristics are found in a man, the effort to move him toward a better life must recognize those which do exist and begin at that point.

What a task—to devise a set of principles, a code of law and ethics, and a series of outward ordinances which, properly used and co-ordinated, could effect salvation for all the individuals in the world and in all its ages of time. This is the task God has performed in setting up the church. Every man is a lit-

THE STORY OF TWO BOYS

THIS IS THE STORY of Eric and the circus. Eric is a small boy of my intimate acquaintance—about three and a half years of age. He is a pronounced extrovert—friendly, a “good mixer,” eager to be in the middle of things, ready to go places, and with a smile that is his passport with most people.

When Eric was not yet three, he was living with the family of Ed and Lois Larsen in Santa Ana, California. One day Ringling Brothers’ “greatest show on earth” pitched tents in a vacant field not far away. All on his own, Eric trudged across the field and joined the circus. First he found some men and women mending canvas. One of the men gave him a penny. Promptly the penny fell through a hole in Eric’s pocket. Then one of the men made him a canvas bag and put the penny in the bag. Other pennies followed. Eric ambled about the grounds, tle different from his fellows, but all men are similar in some respects. The greatness of God’s ability is expressed to a marked degree in a “marvelous work and a wonder” which is so all-inclusive that every man who lived on the face of the earth throughout all history can be included, and yet which can be so definite and effectual that the result in every case where this great plan is applied will be the development of a kingdom-quality person. Yes, God begins with a vision of the purposes to be wrought, and he has given to us the plan by which these purposes may be accomplished in the life of every man. One of the steps in the plan is known as baptism. In the following chapter of this series there are set forth some of the common characteristics of humanity which account for the fact that God selected the ordinance of baptism as an integral part of the plan of salvation.

When Eric went home, he had 149 pennies in the bag and complimentary tickets for the entire family. And mind you, these were not ordinary tickets—they were tickets to box seats. Eric was guest of honor and sat right next to the big brass band. In Eric were fulfilled about all the dreams of all small boys since circuses began to circus. The strange thing is that the circus people seemed to think Eric was entertaining them. Which may have been true. Perhaps in him their own youth returned to them for a day—unsullied and carefree.

THIS IS THE STORY of a somewhat older lad, under quite different circumstances—the carpenter’s Son from the hilltops of Nazareth who quietly walked into the sacred courts of Solomon’s Temple and made the acquaintance of those learned and dignified doctors of the law who were looked upon with respect and awe by adults. There was something about this twelve-year-old lad, his straightforward sincerity, his ingenuous way of thinking that charmed and held the rabbis and caused them to marvel at his questions and answers.

These men had lost their way in the intricacies of the temple service. They were engrossed with the details of buying and selling, of slaughtering and offering doves, lambs, and other creatures as sacrifices. They were engrossed in the game of taking tribute from those who came to worship. They were enmeshed in the web of technicalities, the thousand and one traditions of the elders. They were concerned to make the outside of the cup and platter “ceremonially” clean when they should have “cleansed the inside of the cup and the platter.” Here came one untouched by intrigue, unspoiled by sophistry, who asked and answered simply and directly.

I REMEMBER a small lad, the son of one of our prominent ministers, who had reached his eighth birthday. He said to his father, “Daddy, will you baptize me today?” The boy had been well taught. According to the laws of the church, he was eligible for baptism. Nevertheless the father was taken by surprise. Perhaps he had other plans for the day. This was in Lamoni. To go to the home pond and observe the ceremony of baptism was quite a chore. So the father said, “Why not wait a little while? There will be others to baptize.” The son replied, “Father, when Jesus says to do something, should we do it now or wait a while?” The father answered, “We will do it now.”

With like simplicity and directness, Jesus answered the doctors of the law in the temple—and they marveled. He must have been to them like a fresh breeze from the cedar-crowned hills of Lebanon. Perhaps he took them back to their own youth when they were unspoiled, devout, as eager as he to be “about their Father’s business.” In him they saw themselves again as they were before they lost their way. Could they have held the vision, he need not have come back eighteen years later to scourge them from the temple because they had made his Father’s house “a den of thieves” when it was meant to be “a house of prayer.”

ELBERT A. SMITH

“The sacrifice of body and mind and means to the work is what is demanded at this hour, an unreserved consecration and devotion to the cause of Zion which is the chief function of this church and is the one great thing that will permit us to carry on in the unfinished tasks of the church.”—From President Frederick M. Smith’s message to General Conference, April 6, 1936.

"He Is Risen"

Can We Be Assured of It?

By GOMER R. WELLS

The resurrection theme does not lose its interest when Easter is past each year. The author of this article brings out the historicity of Christ's resurrection, but he does more. He shows how the gifts and blessings we enjoy in the gospel have assurances for us that we shall find a new life eternal and triumphant.—Editor.

IF YOU WERE SERVING ON a jury, would you take seriously the witness who testified to something in the case which took place while he was asleep? That was the kind of testimony offered by the enemies of Jesus Christ to show that he was not resurrected. (Read it in Matthew, chapters 27 and 28.) By their request—and to make sure no fraud would be practiced—Pilate, the governor, ordered the tomb officially sealed and sent a guard of his soldiers to make sure the sepulcher would not be disturbed. It meant death to a soldier who failed on guard or who slept.

Imagine the predicament of the soldiers when a heavenly messenger suddenly appeared and rolled the great rock away from the door, releasing the living Christ. "His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow; and for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men." Even the earth quaked.

Some of the guards hurried into the city and reported to the chief priests what they had seen. The priests and elders at once went into a conference. They decided to bribe the soldiers with "large money," directing them, "Say ye, His disciples came by night and stole him away while we slept." They promised, "If this comes to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you." There you have it—the best evidence from those on the spot. What is it worth to you?

On the other hand, what divine assurance of his resurrection can we have today in addition to the testimony of the many witnesses of 1,949 years ago who saw him and conversed with him after his resurrection?

Paul declared, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." He builds faith in our souls when he compares them to a "purchased possession." Jesus purchased immortality for us, and promised that his Father would send the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, which would testify to our spirits that Christ really lives (John 14: 13-17, 26; 15: 26, 27). On the day of Pentecost, Peter declared that this promise was not only to them and their children, but "to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."

HOW CAN WE KNOW?

Jesus promised that if any man would do God's will, ". . . he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself" (John 7: 17). A part of that doctrine (teaching) is that Jesus came out of the tomb and is alive. Paul assures us that God is ready to give to us "the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts;" and that after we believe and obey the gospel, we can be "sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession."—II Corinthians 1: 22; Ephesians 1: 13, 14.

Note well that word earnest, for ages a legal part of transactions involving purchases of property. It means a pledge, a security. Jesus has purchased immortality for us.

As an assurance, he gives us a spiritual experience in which we may know that this doctrine is true; that the promise of our eternal life can be realized. Thus to the believer is given an earnest, a pledge, that "if the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." While led by the Spirit, we are children of God; and as such, we are "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ."

WE MAY EXPERIENCE THE RESURRECTION POWER

We may ask, "Why is the gift of healing operating in Christ's church today? Is it to save us from pain—from hospital bills?" Certainly not! "Is it that we may testify that Jesus heals?" There is much more to it than that.

When my body receives divine healing (which it has), that is the resurrection power at work, giving me now in part what I can receive in fullness "when Christ who is our life shall appear in glory." Thus, I receive the earnest—the pledge—of the completion of the promise (and I must not forget that I am pledged, too, by my covenant). It is much the same as a purchaser of land who makes a down payment, which becomes an earnest or pledge that he will, later on, complete the purchase.

Now, Jesus is the purchaser of our eternal life. When we see his resurrection power at work in ourselves or others, there has been received the earnest of the purchased possession. Thus we are assured that Jesus came out of the tomb—HE LIVES. We become witnesses for Christ—not only that he heals the body with his resurrection power but also that he has power to heal the soul, which is more important than physical healing (Luke 5: 23-25 I.V.).

The earnest or pledge is also implied in Matthew 16: 15-19, where we read that "signs" are to follow

Flint, Michigan

THE SAINTS here were already assembled when we arrived. Brother Simons, in charge, was assisted by Doctor Lawrence Brockway of the University of Michigan, and I addressed a capacity congregation, both upper and lower auditorium being filled. Again I was heard by many through a public address system.

My train home was scheduled for midnight, and so a group met at the home of Brother Simons to pass the hours, all of which was a pleasant experience.

During the evening a slight rain turned to snow, the wind blew, and I boarded the Grand Trunk in what looked like a real blizzard. Chicago was reached early on Monday; I made a close connection with the Santa Fe and by evening I was safely home after a memorable day with the Detroit Saints.

Iowa Lawmakers

For about twenty years now, I have been qualified by experience in a former General Assembly to be a member of the Pioneer Lawmakers' Association of Iowa. Every two years, when the Legislature of Iowa is in session, the Pioneers meet for a program of their own in the forenoon and are the guests of the General Assembly in joint session in the afternoon of the same day.

This year we met on March 15, and I was permitted to meet quite a number of those whom I have known for years. I was impressed, however, with the obvious fact that the years are taking their toll. Those who yet live of the 158 members of the 34th General Assembly (1911), of which I was a member, are few, probably but twenty-five or thirty.

Here I met three of our church members who are present members of the Iowa Legislature: Mrs. Katheryn Metz of Lamoni (Decatur County), Jay Leeka of Thurman (Fremont County), both Representatives; and Charles Van Eaton, senator from Woodbury County (Sioux City). I think it is quite significant that our organization has 2 per cent of the entire personnel of the present Iowa Legislature. Jay Leeka is a brother of Sister Paul M. Hanson.

Peoria, Illinois

Some weeks ago, by interaction between Pastor William H. Norris at Peoria, Apostle Williams, and myself, decision was reached that I should visit the Peoria Branch on Sunday, March 20. I was met at Chillicothe on Saturday evening by William Shotten and Brother Cady and taken the twenty miles to Peoria. Here I found lodgment at the home of Brother and Sister Shotten. I was made to feel at home with these fine Saints. Brother Shotten is well in his seventies, but in spite of almost fifty years as a coal miner, he is of spare, muscular build and has greater physical endurance than a man younger in years.

The day began with a fellowship meeting in joint charge of Pastor Norris (a son of Sister Flora B. Davis, one of those faithful members who have kept alive the coals of faith at Peoria) and Elder Lyle W. Woodstock, missionary and district president.

This was my first ministry in connection with Lyle, and I am much gratified with his prospects as a servant for Christ. I knew him when he was a quiet and unassuming lad in college with my own boys. Today he has his hand on the gospel plow, and if my leadings are correct, there will be no turning back with him. He has a devoted and efficient aide in Sister Doris Woodstock.

The Saints at Peoria, after three quarters of a century without their own church home, have now inaugurated a movement to build. Tentative plans have been prepared, and a fine model of what they expect to build was on display. The entire Rock Island District was invited, and an unusual crowd from the various centers was present. If the enthusiasm evidenced there is a guide, the Peoria church will be realized before long. The meetings were held in the spacious building of the Peoria Women's Club.

I spoke at eleven o'clock and again at 2:30 p.m. Lunch was served by the women at noon.

Elder Jasper O. Dutton was present and participated. Elders John and Leonard Stiegel also had a part. In fact, Brother Norris did a good job in having various pastors of the district take part in the meetings of the day, including Ambrose King of Galesburg, F. C. Bevan of Rock Island, E. J. Lenox of Moline, and David N. Williams of Kewanee.

Here I met again Elder Raymond Wrigley, formerly of the Liberty Street congregation in Independence.

Robert Frye presided at the organ, and appropriate music was rendered by the Peoria choir. Jess Cady gave a vocal number.

In the evening, after a repast at Shotten's, Brother Woodstock drove us about the city and then to Chillicothe, where I boarded a "streamliner" and arrived safely at home in the early morning of the following day.

New Church at Louisville

My latest excursion took me along with Bishop Henry L. Livingston of the Presiding Bishopric to Louisville (pronounced "Louieville"). We left Independence on Saturday afternoon on the Missouri Pacific, changing cars at "St. Louie" about midnight and arriving at our destination early on Sunday, March 27. Here we were met by Elder James B. Welch, the enterprising pastor of the Louisville Branch; and after breakfast, we were launched on a full day. Here we found Apostle W. Wallace Smith and Seventy Joseph Yager, and so the ministry and preaching burdens were considerably lessened.

I spoke at eleven; Bishop Livingston at three; and Brother Wallace at 7:30. Brother Yager was scheduled to begin a series of meetings the following night.

Elder James B. Welch and associates and the Louisville Saints are to be congratulated on what has been accomplished there. Eleven short months before this initial service, the Saints were worshipping in a basement—they had occupied this unfinished structure for many years. Then they learned that the electric power company was abandoning a transformer station at Third Street and Kenwood Way. Negotiations were begun, and after a visit by President Edwards and Bishop Livingston, this substantial building was purchased.

Then an architect, Mr. A. G. Tafel, was employed. Mr. Tafel with remarkable planning drew specifications for remodeling, and today the Saints have a very fine church home that will care for their needs for a long time. A picture of this structure will be used in the Herald before long. With some financial assistance from the church, the Saints at Louisville are now adequately and appropriately housed.

Architect Tafel was present at the morning session and, being presented by Pastor Welch, spoke briefly, indicating he had been led to feel a special and unusual interest in the project.

Here we met pastors and members from most of the branches in the Southern Indiana District, including Elders Chester B. Metcalf, district president; Dwight D. W. Davis of Indianapolis, John R. Byrn of Byrnville, Thos. W. Wareham of Evansville, Edmond L. Fouts of New Albany, Charles Nolan of Centerton group, Z. M. Harbstreit of Washington, and W. M. Charles of Bedford.

We also met some members formerly of Independence, among them Brother "Andy" Goode, father of Professor Goode at Grace-land College.

There we also met my niece, Rebecca Weld Nolan, wife of Charles, and her son, Dr. Joseph Nolan, and his wife and two children, all of Indianapolis.

We must pay tribute to Mrs. Lucile Oliver, organist, and her husband, Lee Oliver, for musical renditions. The Louisville choir added greatly to the day's services.

A former pastor, Elder W. H. Burwell, now counselor to Pastor Welch, shared the duty of presiding during the day.

Bishop Livingston and I left the Kentucky city for home, knowing we had had a pleasant experience and trusting we had successfully ministered to a group of fine Saints.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Lo, the State of Israel!

Tune: No. 407, Saints' Hymnal.

Lo, the State of Israel

Rises 'gainst the powers of hell;

Joy shall in her anthems swell;

Born a nation in a day,

Whom a Herod cannot slay.

Swift the messengers who tell:

"Now is the day of Israel."

War, disaster, famine, all

Voices of Jehovah, call

Judah back from death and thrall.

God shall save the burning brand,

Jacob dwell in Canaan's land.

Loud proclaim that "all is well,

Now is the day of Israel."

"God shall choose Jerusalem,

Decked with every precious gem,

For his royal diadem,"

Was foretold by ancient seer;

Last day Saints the message hear;

Hearken to the pealing bell,

"Now is the day of Israel."

Heaven shall not Christ retain;

Olivet shall cleave in twain;

Gog's unnumbered hosts be slain.

Israel's enemies shall fall;

Babel rise no more at all.

Hark, the trumpet, "All is well,

Now is the day of Israel."

Nursing as a Career — By VIDA E. BUTTERWORTH, R.N.

AMONG THE FUNDAMENTAL concerns of parents is their children's future vocational choices. Parents sense that an individual's emotional well-being is definitely related to his or her vocational life. It has been proved psychologically that individuals like to do, and are happy in doing, those things they do well and at which they are successful. We wish to show you one career that is open to healthy, intelligent young women that may help them to lead useful and successful lives.

Of all careers for women, probably the one most often undertaken is that of a wife and mother. We must sadly add that the career for which these same girls are least prepared is wifehood and motherhood. Those of us in the nursing profession maintain that a nursing education is one of the best preparations for that vocation. We will mention some of the studies of the student nurse which will also help the future wife and mother.

One of the first things a nurse learns is how to get along with other people—those with whom she lives, works, and serves. She studies many of the social sciences such as psychology, sociology, ethics, professional adjustments, and social problems related to illness. She makes application of this knowledge in her daily work.

She studies many of the physical and biological sciences such as anatomy, physiology, chemistry, microbiology, hygiene, pathology, physics, nutrition, and cookery. She learns how the human body is made, how it works, and how to prevent many of the needless ills to which it falls prey. She learns how important housekeeping details are in the care and well-being of the sick and healthy, not only from a scientific angle, but also from a psychological one.

She learns to care for the newborn babe. She learns how it should grow physically and mentally to become a healthy, happy adult. Few other types of education so nearly fit a modern-day girl for the career she is most likely to take up at some time during her life.

PEOPLE WHO HAVE BEEN ENGAGED in nursing for a number of years seem to think that no other line of work offers a young woman such an opportunity for marriage; however, we must cling to reality. In our own Sanitarium Alumnae with three hundred eighty-one graduates since its beginning in 1910, there are ninety-two unmarried ones. Of these, 30 graduated in 1947 and 1948. Many of them already have wedding dates set. Actually the percentage of unmarried women among our "San" graduates is the same percentage as exists among women in the United States.

Today marriage must often be postponed until a young man can be educated for his life's work. Until this is accomplished, he is unable to support a family. The young woman he will marry will be much happier if she feels she is engaged in learning something useful and interesting. It gives her a professional education to use any time she may need to assume the family's financial obligations. While learning to be a nurse, as well as a good wife and mother, she is making a needed contribution to society.

Even after marriage there are great opportunities for nurses to carry on in this essential profession. In case a woman decides to devote her entire life to a career, there is no profession so needing that devotion as nursing. To show you some of the careers in nursing, let me briefly sketch the interesting lives of a number of our "San" graduates.

THERE IS
Irene Andes, class of 1932. She was a dark-haired, merry-eyed lass from Montana. She had a jolly time as she learned the knowledges and skills of nursing. . . . My memory fails me here, but for some reason the class of 1932 was in disgrace. The authorities suggested that with as much vivacity as the girls had, they should write a play for the nurses' Christmas party and entertain that year. Irene did a wonderful piece of writing in that original play. Her classmates joined into the spirit of it, and the evening was a grand success such a success that some people who still attend nurses' Christmas parties say, "Now if they'd just think up something new and different like the class of '32."

Miss Andes worked at the San as a general duty nurse for a time after graduation. She left Independence to take a postgraduate course in surgery at a New Orleans hospital, returning to the San to work in the operating room. She spent several summers at one of the Western National Parks as a "camp nurse." Sometimes she had wild ambulance rides over mountainous roads, late at night, to get a camper suspected of having acute appendicitis to the hospital before it was too late. She became instructor at a Montana school of nursing, attending college part time.

She became a public health nurse and broadened her education by a study of public health nursing at Teachers College, Columbia University, in New York City. She practiced public health nursing as a member of the Montana State College Health Department. Later she married Harry Kelly, a physics professor. They settled in Boston where their first son was born. After the war, Irene's husband was sent to Japan to do some important scientific work, Irene and her son joined him in Tokyo. There a second son was born.

Irene has had an interesting and worthwhile life as a nurse. Now she is concentrating on bringing up her boys so that they, too, may lead happy, useful lives in the years ahead.

THERE IS
Louise Anthony, class of 1936. She had an interesting life in the Army Nurse Corps. She cared for wounded soldiers, who were removed to the United States by air transport. She maintained a hospital high above the clouds.

THERE IS
Dorothy Scholl, also class of 1936. She joined the Army Nurse Corps at Ledderman Hospital in California. She was accompanied to her post in Manila by her fiance, an army officer. When Corregidor and Bataan fell to the Japanese, she was interned in Santa Thomas prison until released by the Americans many months later. Her greatest thrill was to find that her fiance still lived in spite of mistreatment from his Japanese guards. She now resides with her husband and two children at an Army base here in the United States where he is on duty.

THERE IS
Alice Anson, class of 1926, who is a hospital superintendent in a small community in Illinois.

THERE IS
Myrtle Phillips Taylor, class of 1920, who has been an industrial nurse at the Standard Oil Company in Sugar Creek, Missouri, for many years. She has enjoyed doing this necessary work at the same time she reared a family.

THERE IS

Estella Hansen, class of 1932, who is a doctor's office nurse. She takes electrocardiograms and does various scientific treatments. This permits the physician to see more patients and to help more distressed individuals than he could do without her help.

THERE IS

Doris Eliason Caster, class of 1942, who was the office nurse of a busy eye, ear, nose, and throat specialist. She helped him examine eyes, kept important records, assisted with minor surgery done in the physician's office, and "scrubbed" for major eye operations performed at the hospital. Now she is a school nurse, busy checking upon the health and physical defects of children. She helps the parents have these defects corrected so that the children may develop into normal, healthy adults.

THERE IS

Loydea Thompson Hardy, class of 1937, who is office nurse for a hard-working surgeon. She helps him examine patients before and after operations, schedules operations, makes appointments and gives treatment to patients thus permitting them to leave the hospital earlier.

THERE IS

Margaret Chapman Esler, class of 1930. She became a school nurse in Kansas City. On a summer vacation, she went to Honolulu to visit a sister. She stayed in this romantic setting to marry a pilot. She was there when the Japs attacked Pearl Harbor, and she aided in treating the injured. Margaret came back to the states where her son was born shortly before her husband was lost while on a mission. She is now back at school nursing and helping other mothers care for their children. She is studying public health nursing for her degree while working. She wants to be more proficient in her work.

THERE IS

Myrtle Radmall, class of 1918. She has been a public health nurse in California and is this summer due for retirement with compensation.

THERE IS

Margaret Wiley, class of 1919, who spent many years as a visiting nurse in Kansas City. After deciding to specialize, she studied physiotherapy. Now she spends her time helping children to overcome their physical handicaps at Delano School, Kansas City's special school for crippled children.

THERE IS

Gladys Forbes, class of 1940, who became a member of the Navy Nurse Corps before Pearl Harbor. During the war, she had an interesting career as a nurse aboard the Navy hospital ship, the U. S. S. "Solace." After the war she went to the Philippines to serve out her enlistment. Now she is at Graceland College acquiring an expensive musical education. Her nursing education is helping her earn her way.

THERE IS

Elaine Rosevear, class of 1937, who is making the Navy Nurse Corps her career. The Navy has helped her obtain further education. She is now stationed at Richmond, Virginia.

THERE IS

Dorothy Smith, class of 1925, who has spent many years caring for tuberculous soldiers under the auspices of the Veteran's Administration. She has been stationed in hospitals in different parts of the country.

THERE IS

Ruth Wingett, class of 1945. She spent some time in Honolulu after graduation, working at Queen's Hospital. She worked in the operating room at the "San" for a while. Now she is in charge, under a pathologist, of the hospital pathological laboratory. She has become proficient in the many tests used to aid the physician in the diagnosis and treatment of disease.

THERE IS

Martha Criley, class of 1934. She spent a number of years in the operating rooms of the Ellis Fischel Cancer Hospital at Columbia, Missouri. After returning from the war, during which she served with the Army Nurse Corps, Miss Criley specialized in anesthesia. Now she is a nurse anesthetist at a hospital in Oklahoma City.

THERE IS

Helen Weeks, class of 1923. She is doing a wonderful piece of work at Rest Haven here in Independence. She directs the care of some of our aged church women in this very homelike atmosphere.

THERE IS

Donna Holmes, class of 1945, who has been the college nurse at Graceland for several years. She assists Dr. Gamet in maintaining an efficient health service for the students and faculty.

THERE IS

Mabel Faulkner, class of 1932, who has worked at our San since her graduation except for time out to study obstetrical nursing at the Chicago Lying-In Hospital. She has calmed the fears of many an anxious father, eased the pain of many a prospective mother, and aided physicians in bringing thousands of babies into the world. Besides this, she has shared her knowledge with and taught her skills to many student and graduate nurses.

THERE IS

Ina Hattey, class of 1924, who spent years in devoted service to individual patients as a private duty nurse. She was one of our first graduate nurse supervisors at the San. She has also helped to usher many new babies into the world. Since moving into the new hospital, she has devoted her time to the care of the newborn, watching over them as anxiously as a mother, but with far more knowledge and skill than the average mother has. Making a strong, healthy infant of a premature is one of Miss Hattey's personal triumphs.

THERE IS

Dana Watts Ellis, class of 1920. She married a missionary, former Apostle Clyde F. Ellis. She shared with him his mission to the Islands of the Sea and was responsible for bringing one of the islanders to the San for a nursing education. Now that her children are grown, she makes use of her nursing knowledge and skill in caring for the very ill medical patients at the Sanitarium and in supervising the work of the students who are learning.

THERE IS

Malita Weldon Hitchins, class of 1939, who was a director of a school of nursing in the west. She became a public health nurse in Washington state, transferring to Alaska. There she married and resides happily.

THERE IS

Veda Shupe Warren, class of 1933, who went to the Hawaiian Islands, where she married. She is engaged as a "Plantation Nurse," looking after the health of the plantation workers at Hilo, Hawaii.

We could go on and on telling you of the many interesting and even unusual fields open to nurses who have completed a basic nursing education. We could enumerate many more interesting careers of our own San nurses. However, we will now leave it to you to imagine that career in nursing in which you or your daughter could be most useful and most happy.

This Crowns My Task - By LYDIA A. WIGHT

DURING THE WEEK OF shared experiences at General Conference, we were stimulated by a new perspective of the kingdom-building task. It indicated that more areas of human experience were being touched by an improving ministry of love.

She who read thoughtfully the extensive program of Conference and studied the reports of the quorums and departments of the church sensed more keenly than ever before that human need for God is the challenge of the hour and that the chief business of the church is to meet that need. The women of the church know they have considerable responsibility in that business. They know the home must rear God-serving families if the kingdom is to be a reality. The emphasis the past few years on the need for home and church to work together has borne some fruit. It will bear more.

The Department of Women was specific in presenting in its Conference program guidance, helps and incentives for those who want to build Zion homes. Surely young mothers who are facing that task and grandmothers who back them up no longer will spell in heavy black letters, T A S K, but in golden symbols, OPPORTUNITY.

What is that opportunity? What is it that can happen? What is it we women may help bring about? This little story answers the question.

A young mother was asked to prepare a Christmas worship service for her club on the theme, "The Most Perfect Gift." She was perplexed. She called her leader for help and put it this way: "That topic you gave me . . . I know it is the traditional Christmas theme, but I can't even get started on it. Oh, yes, I know God gave his Son and he died for us, but what of it? Mothers and fathers in this past war have given their sons, too, who have died for us."

Though she was young, the leader was wise. She didn't gasp in dismay. She merely said, "Let me think about it. I'll call you again." Then she went to an older woman for counsel. Prayerfully they considered the situation. An illuminating moment gave them a new approach for their worship service. God's most perfect gift to mankind, they felt, is the gift of the power to become the sons of God. And he gave us his Son to show us the way to do it. The leader passed that idea on to the young mother who exclaimed, "Now, I can do something with that."

SURELY THE PERFECTING of mankind is no matter for one generation. Every generation should have a part in that development. Generation upon generation has already passed. Many more may pass. But certainly time might be conserved (and this is called the hastening time) if the generations which touch can come to a common understanding and appreciation of their relationship to one another and learn how to work together that the rod of progress be not broken.

God created the human family so that one generation begets another. He had something to say about the relationship of generations. In section 26 of the Doctrine and Covenants, when God spoke to Joseph, he said: "the hour cometh when I will drink of the fruit of the vine with you on the earth." Then he added: "and with Moroni—" and with others who held the keys of various parts of the Restoration task. We are concerned here with these words especially: "and also Elijah unto whom I have committed the keys of the power of turning the hearts of the fathers to the children and the hearts of the children to the fathers, that the whole earth may not be smitten with a curse." Can it be that failure in this will make the work of the ministry fruitless?

Sobering implications lie in that thought. Certainly when the hearts of each age group—fathers and children—are turned to each other, a heritage may be passed on and eagerly received. That this too often fails to be done is due perhaps to misunderstanding and wrong attitudes on the part of both generations.

An incident in my life may help at this point. When our first son was born, my nurse, a Latter Day Saint woman with years of experience, sat at my bedside and talked of the promise in our little son. Wisely and simply she gave me a working philosophy. "When you teach him or show him how to do things, even if it be no more than driving nails in a block, show him how you do it, and say 'This is the best way we have found up to now to do this. Perhaps you can find a better way. If you do, come and tell us.'"

Thus we recognize that our children may excel us in achievement, and we long to have them do so, for that insures progress. We ask only to know of their accomplishment that we may learn what we can from it and be comforted. The child so instructed and encouraged may achieve beyond his parent, but he recognizes that his achievement is rooted in the past and that his heritage gave him a head start. He knows, too, that those who come after him will be expected to improve upon his work.

THE STRUGGLE TODAY for complete independence in each generation has become a vaneer in human life that covers the fine-grained wood of reasonable interdependence. The war forced families to co-operate, and out of that experience in many cases has come a new appreciation of the value of each personality in varied age groups. Even yet, crowded housing conditions and the pressure of living costs that mount faster than incomes for many groups make wholesome and adequate family life a difficult achievement. In the urban areas, especially, family stability is at stake. The American Association of Family Living has concerned itself with the problem and a new topic appears in their classrooms. It is called "The Meeting of the Generations." They bring psychologically sound suggestions for working out differences in family practices and point out rather convincingly that not only mothers who work outside the home, but those who do not, need some relief time if their health is not to be broken by the demands made upon their time in the complex society of today. A very real contribution, they say, can be made by grandparents to meet this need. Adjustments in ways of working can be harmoniously brought about, and children will benefit through the efforts of someone who really cares about them.

It is a fact that much of the work of our branches is done by busy fathers and mothers. How splendid it is to hear a grandmother who has been a soloist say to her son, "We'll keep the babies every rehearsal night if you and Mary wish to help the choir." Or to hear one who has given years of service to the church school say, "We know you'd like to go to the regular worker's council meetings. Why not let us stay with the children."

The meeting of the generations! The turning of the hearts of the fathers and the children to one another! How alike they sound. One was thought of by social workers in 1946, the other was given to Joseph Smith in 1830. Now we read it with better understanding. No longer can it be a matter of "We'll live our lives and let the old folks live theirs." Rather it must be "We'll live all our lives for the good of all."

Can we not see that in this task of guiding growing personalities we join hands with God in his creative task? If the children of men are to become the sons of God, we must know how and guide our children to that end. Does not that partnership crown the task with a glory immeasurable? Can it not sustain you young mothers who are in the midst of diets and health checkups and school adjustments? Does it not enable you grandmothers to "catch on" to better ways of caring for babies and children as easily as you "caught on" to work in munitions plants and wartime factories, and to jobs as nurses aides and Red Cross workers?

THE SENSE OF PARTNERSHIP with God is a crown one may wear as she works through the years. It shows in the calm manner with which she meets her daily task, in her strength and endurance, in her happy ways as she moves within her family circle. That is the glory crown.

Then there is the joy crown. It is the priceless fellowship of the family. And there are families whose members share naturally and wholeheartedly one another's joys and sorrows, successes and failures. For them, fellowship is a warm vital something that flows from person to person, strengthening, encouraging, understanding, forgiving, and forgetting. Through the years I have stored in my mind snapshots of family fellowship. I want to share some of them with you.

The door opens across the street. Two children of school age wave good-by to mother, grandfather who lives with them, and to their little sister a year or so old. The mother returns to her household tasks, and grandpa leads the little one down the walk. She pulls her hand free of his, runs on ahead, finds a drop in the walk level and steps carefully down. Delighted with the new experience, she must do it over and over again until muscle-mind co-ordination is smooth. Then on to watch a squirrel with a nut. A hum overhead makes her look up. Grandpa lifts her, and from his shoulder she scans the sky. Soon a little finger points and grandpa says, "Airplane." It passes from view, but a daytime moon is discovered, and there's talk of that. So it goes. By the time the walk is finished, Sally has had a rich sensory experience, made some new co-ordinations, added a word or two to her vocabulary and feels secure with grandpa.

A family sits about the dinner table—

father, mother, grandmother, ten-year-old Henry, twelve-year-old Mary, and a friend or two. The occasion is a brief stopover between trains of the missionary on his way to the coast to embark on a foreign mission. The experiences of the missionary are stimulating. Grandmother tells of grandfather's days as a missionary, too. The children's questions are answered, and every face is aglow with shared fellowship. Too soon the dessert is over, and the drive to the station imperative. As the children give their guest his coat and hat and father picks up his bags, the missionary bids the grandmother and mother good-by, saying very quietly, "Christ abides in this home."

Here's a family reunion. It is grandmother's and grandfather's golden wedding day. Sons and daughters as well as grandchildren eagerly run over the place, remembering this and that in the old home. Later they gather in the living room where grandfather, whose foot has been injured, is lying down. One young woman, a bride of eighteen months, watches the others with shadowed face. She is alone. Grandfather motions for her to come close. Under the cover of the others' sprightly talk, he asks, "Where is Alf, dear?"

"Oh, Grandpa, we are at outs just now. We're thinking about washing the whole thing up." He pats her hand and whispers: "Think it over, Ellen. Had your grandmother and I washed it up in two years, where would you be? Come to see us, just you and Alf, some day soon." They did, and a home was saved.

One more picture. It shows fellowship of age and youth in the church. It is Sunday. An afternoon fellowship service of all ages closes a week end of activities in which the needs of youth have been emphasized. Talk after talk stresses the place of youth in the branch. A young fellow of sixteen years arises. His face shines with the spirit of love and understanding as he speaks: "I feel the challenge of the hour. I know I would have to grow into any of the jobs you mention today. I know I can't do what I need to do without the counsel, the prayers, and encouragement of the older people of this branch. I'd like to work with some of them." At the close of the service, two of the older members of the priesthood thanked him for his words, saying, "You have helped us. God grant we may learn how best to work with you."

WHOLESAME FAMILY FELLOWSHIP and wise association of youth and age in the church and community at times can make possible the happy meeting of the generations. And that gives all a sense of continuity, a sense of at-oneness with the eternal processes of God. Such fellowship is indeed the joy crown. How much more significant it is, how much deeper the joy, if the home and its hospitality have been shared with others; if friends of every member of the family, or newcomers to the community feel the spirit of its understanding; if we include among our guests not just the attractive, stimulating personalities that may add a richness to our experience, but also those individuals who need understanding, who need to share the rich experience our families have had.

This is what I mean. A young man just out of high school left home, gave up plans for college work, and lost his way in a large city. After some years of being buffeted about by the undesirable persons he met, he finally looked himself squarely in the face. He went to another city away from his old associates and enrolled in a trade school. His mother once had said, "Where you go, look up the church people." He did so now, and before long he was working for his board and room in a friendly church home. He did well in his studies, became a member of the Zion's League and of the young people's class at church school. He joined the church later and finally became a member of the priesthood. He served his country in a creditable manner in the recent war, married a splendid church girl, and since has completed his college course. True, he had serious discouragements at times, but he was sustained by the casual parental type of interest shown by the older folk and by his acceptance as a big brother by the young people whom he counseled wisely again and again. His emotions became stabilized, and his personality more and more integrated about his dominating purpose to learn something which could be of service to the church.

And now I want to speak to the composite motherhood of the church. The very fact of her church membership should make her a partaker of the experimental faith taught and lived by Jesus. The basic principle of that faith is the firm belief that God implanted a spark of the divine in every individual and that it can be fanned into flame through calm and wise handling.

When a young person begins to lose his way and his self-respect, he needs help. We read in horror about the murder of human lives, but we stand indifferent, too often, and let the ego be destroyed. In Matthew 18: 1-6 where Jesus speaks concerning the little child he placed before his disciples, he says:

Daily Bread Fills a Need

No one was more happy than I when I read in the Herald last fall that our church was to publish a little magazine of daily devotions. For over ten years I have subscribed to devotional magazines put out by other churches, for with me they are a must in my daily reading. I have used Upper Room from the Methodists, Today from the Presbyterians, Forward from the Episcopalians, and Daily Word from Unity in Kansas City at different times.

Although I had just subscribed for Daily Word, I lost no time in ordering Daily Bread for us and gave three subscriptions for Christmas gifts even though we had never seen a copy.

Everyone who reads it seems well pleased with the magazine, and we think it compares very favorably with similar devotions published by other churches for many years. We pass our copies on as soon as we are through with them.

A person upon arising early in the morning seems very near the Father's house if he can read a page of Daily Bread before the cares of the day begin pressing upon him, remembering also to pray, he stands a very good chance of keeping his thinking straight and of "practicing the presence of God" all the day long.

I just wanted to express our appreciation that our church has seen fit to publish Daily Bread and that it is so good.

Asks for Continued Prayers

I thank all who remembered me with cards and letters during my recent illness. I am better now and able to do my housework. I am seventy years old and isolated from the church, but I have a strong faith in this work. I still need the prayers of the Saints.

Receives Blessing Following Accident

On Decoration Day two years ago, my husband and I were working near the berry patch on our place. As he started to drive over some new berry plants, I pushed with all my might against the tractor. As I did so, the tillers which dig down nine inches into the earth grabbed my leg. The bone, arteries and veins were all severed. My foot and ankle held only by a small piece of skin.

I prayed for strength to be courageous as my husband tried to dislodge the blades. We were afraid the amputation might have to take place right there as it seemed for a while it would be impossible to free me. I prayed harder for God to help my husband, and he finally succeeded in moving the tillers.

Fortunately the best surgeon in the city was at his home and there was a room available for me at the local sanitarium where my husband is the physiotherapist and I am a registered nurse. The head nurse, who had just returned from England, was also on duty. Just before the operation, my son phoned for Elder Winship to come at once. Apostle Jenson, who was visiting in the Winship home at that time, came with him. I received a remarkable blessing from that administration. Even the surgeon said my recovery was amazing.

During the operation, the nurses at the hospital started a fund to buy an artificial limb for me. I want to thank the Saints of the Pittsburgh, Lock Four, Fayette City, and Union-town congregations for contributing also. I appreciate even more their prayers, cards, and letters. Since I have not been able to drive with my "new" leg. I don't get to church very often. My husband is a very good man, but he is not a member of the church. Our three oldest children were baptized last year. Our youngest is only six years old.

In addition to caring for my home and children, I am keeping my mother and father-in-law. Both of them have heart ailments. At times I get very tired and feel that I can hardly keep going. Please pray for me.

Miracles Still Happen

Recently I heard a remark that miracles of healing do not happen today as frequently as in olden times. I am wondering if that is true or if we just do not hear about them so often.

It is difficult for me to express in words my feeling. I was ill and went to a physician. After an examination, he called the hospital and made arrangements for a major operation and suggested that I have radium treatments afterward.

I had had a long illness a few years before and, contemplating what I must now cope with, I felt rather resentful. Knowing this was the wrong attitude, I prayed continually that this feeling would be removed and that I could face whatever was to be with the will to say, "Lord, thy will, not mine, be done." Finally I became reconciled. I asked to be administered to. I was to go to the doctor's office for an examination just before entering the hospital. When the doctor asked me how I was, I answered, "I'm just like the person who goes to the dentist and his tooth stops aching. My trouble is over." He examined me, and both he and the nurse were very surprised. He said, "The trouble is all gone, and you do not have to have a major operation."

Naturally I was very happy. I am thankful that I worship a God who does hear and answer prayer.

I was born in Missouri, reared in Arkansas, and have lived in and near Flint, Michigan, since 1926. I have no relatives here but think of my brothers and sisters in the church as relatives.

I have two sons, ages eighteen and sixteen. The older one plans to go to Graceland this coming fall. I also have an adopted daughter four years old.

My heart is in this work, and I do pray that my children will grow up to love the gospel and be good, honest, Christian people.

Grateful for Blessings

I want to thank all who sent cards and letters of encouragement to me during my illness. I also appreciate being remembered in prayer. I had part of one lung removed last August. For several days I was very ill, but as soon as I regained consciousness, I asked for administration. I began to improve at once, following the administration, and was able to return home in two weeks. I prayed that, if God so willed, I would be healed so I could continue to make a home for my three sons. My husband died six years ago.

I am thankful for the many blessings I have received, and my prayers are for others who are ill.

Serve Where You Are

As I picked up the Herald this week and read Sister E. M. Neff's letter in the P. S. column telling of churches without congregations, I decided to write my opinion on this situation.

Many times we find a branch or a group will grow and prosper under the able leadership of some man called of God to do his work. Then, before anyone realizes what has happened, the group is left without leadership. Sometimes this situation cannot be helped, but more often it is because of the priesthood member's own choosing — some even isolate themselves. Many times they move to the Center Place without being called only to find themselves idle a good share of the time.

How much better it would be if they would stay out in the field where there is work to do and, if necessary, hunt out cases such as Sister Neff wrote of, and move in and help build the kingdom.

I am sure God would open up the way for any man who would do this—revive the work that some member of the priesthood started and then neglected.

Let's stay out in the field, and build the kingdom of God.

The Work of the Campus Shop

About three years ago, as I sat down to my noon meal and asked a blessing on the food and the church, I had a most remarkable experience. I was praying for the success of the Campus Shop when a vision came to me. I was shown Christ and the 5,000 to whom he furnished food from the five loaves and two fishes. After they had eaten, I saw the twelve baskets of left-overs which were gathered up. Then the vision ended. I asked, "What does this mean? I was praying for the Campus Shop when the Spirit came upon me." The answer came: "This which you have seen is no more miraculous than what is being done by the Campus Shop." Then I saw the comparison. After the needs of the "multitude" have been cared for, there is still an abundance of clothing, quilts, rugs, and other useful things left at the Campus to supply future needs. Hundreds of people here and overseas have been helped; still there are rooms filled with necessities which may yet arise.

My prayer is that God will continue to bless the leaders of this organization until we become as Enoch's people—all equal, of one heart and one mind.

Ask and Ye Shall Receive

After two days of intense pain, I prayed, "Lord, if this pain is the warning of a more serious illness to follow, help me to bear it until I can obtain medical aid. If it is a temporary illness, and I am worthy of a blessing, I know you can remove it." The pain lessened and I slept well all night. By morning it was gone.

Through the experiences of those in the past as well as those now living, I have come to believe that we must be very careful in praying. We must avoid asking for things which we think we need but which we would be better off without. If we would only look far enough ahead, we could make a more certain preparation for the kingdom. We must help the "bride" prepare for the coming of the "bridegroom," but we also have an important responsibility to others. They too are dear to the heart of the Master and will have their place in the kingdom when it is established.

Tribute to Fredrick Gregory

Fredrick Gregory served the church as a missionary for nearly thirty-seven years. Born in London, Ontario, he accepted the gospel when a young man. Soon after his baptism, he was ordained an elder, then a seventy. He was the first pastor of Toronto Branch and did much of his missionary work in Ontario. Later assignments took him westward into Manitoba, where he baptized several families who have since made outstanding contributions to the church. In 1911, he homesteaded in Ribstone, Alberta, continuing his missionary work while his wife and children cared for the home. His last General Church appointment was the pastorate of Winnipeg Branch. He was released from active duty in 1927, and died March 8, 1949, in Wainwright Hospital, at the age of seventy-seven.

He is survived by his wife, Alice; three sons: Lloyd of Whiterock, British Columbia; Earl of Vancouver, British Columbia; and Alfred of Edmonton, Alberta; a daughter, Mrs. Edna Larson of Ribstone; and eleven grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Ribstone, Elder George Miller officiating. Burial was in the Ribstone cemetery.

An Answer to Prayer

I shall never forget the first prayer I had answered. It was not until I was twenty-seven. Two years before, I came to the realization that while I had been a "good girl" all my life—I had said my prayers, gone to church, obeyed my parents, and kept my jobs—I still didn't know if I'd ever had a prayer answered. Then one night I heard a sermon on prayer. It was just what I needed to hear. The minister said that learning to pray was like learning to skate. At first we fumble around, fall down, and get some pretty bad spills, but by keeping at it and practicing, we eventually master the art. By practicing and keeping at it, we can also learn to pray so that we know our prayers are being heard. He warned that we could easily forget our skill and urged us to keep constantly in touch with God. From then on, I thought as I prayed.

Later a tragedy occurred in our group of faculty associates as we were returning home from a watermelon feed. Four of our party who were driving together came to a "Y" in the road. Someone in the rear said, "Turn right," and another interrupted, "No, turn left." The driver was not speeding, but the car was going too fast for late orders and quick turning. He split the "Y" and was killed instantly. The other occupants were badly shaken.

The death of this young man was a real loss to us. He was brilliant, clean, honest, kind, and had much to look forward to. He was to have been graduated soon from a school of osteopathy and to have married the teacher with whom he was driving. I couldn't see why one with so much promise had to be taken. Somehow it preyed on my mind until I decided to ask God to care for his soul. As I lay in bed, I offered several prayers, then something seemed to flash inside me, and the light filled the entire room. I was scared, but I was also thrilled beyond expression. I knew beyond a doubt that a prayer of mine had reached its destination.

I did a lot of thinking after that. This prayer had been for someone else, it was not a "gimme" prayer. So often we know what we do want but not what we should want. This experience has helped me many times and has been the steppingstone to other experiences of wider scope. I know now that I must pray often and in faith letting God decide what blessings I should have that will be for my good and the good of those with whom I associate.

An Isolated Saint Asks for Correspondence

I am very thankful I was reared in a Latter Day Saint home. I know it has been a great help to me. Now that I live where we cannot go to our own church services, I find that the Herald helps keep me in contact with others of the faith. I would like to hear from any who live near me.

MRS. HENRY GRUBB.

Chatfield, Minnesota

Note of Thanks

I know that following my request for prayers in the Herald, many of the Saints did pray for me. The operation was successful, and I am now convalescing at my home. I thank all who remembered me in their prayers and those who sent cards and letters.

BRIEFS

TUCSON, ARIZONA.—Apostle Charles R. Hield was in Tucson March 5 and 6, giving the Communion message. Robert Heald was ordained to the office of priest, with Elder A. H. Hartman officiating.

Elder Herbert C. Lynn is scheduled for a missionary series in the Tucson Branch from May 15 to May 27.

CHICO, CALIFORNIA.—Seventy George Njeim held a series of missionary meetings in this branch from March 12 to March 27. The church was almost full every night. Seldom was there a night when there were not seven or eight nonmembers. Some of these people had no related connection with the church outside of friendship. When the series was over, there were five baptisms. Pastor H. Dean Hintz is mainly responsible for the growth of this branch.

CHATHAM, ONTARIO.—A service of unusual interest took place in the Chatham church, Sunday, March 27. Five grandchildren of Mr. and Mrs. John Ambrose were blessed by Elders R. R. Wood, V. E. Pritchard, and J. F. Kelly. Children blessed were: Margaret and John, children of Mr. and Mrs. John Ambrose, Jr.; Peggyjoice and Pattyann, twin daughters of Mr. and Mrs. O. Cadotte; and Robert, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Stimpson.

DETROIT-WINDSOR DISTRICT.—A formal banquet marked the beginning of the sixth annual Zion's League convention of the Detroit-Windsor District. Under the direction of Dick Lancaster as master of ceremonies, the banqueters enjoyed a gala program of group singing led by Arthur Karpeles. The rest of the program consisted of an accordionist and comedian team, a group of soprano solos by Sister Pauline Frisby, a noted concert artist, and a short talk by the guest speaker, Apostle Arthur A. Oakman.

The theme of the convention, "With Christ—My Covenant," was presented in four class sessions, two on Saturday afternoon and two on Sunday afternoon, by guest speakers, Apostle Arthur Oakman, District President W. Blair McClain, and Patriarch George H. Booth. After a buffet supper Saturday evening, the Leaguers relaxed in an evening of fun, including an old-fashioned debate.

The Spirit of God was felt in abundance at the fellowship service which began the activities of the Sabbath day. This same spirit was manifest in the inspiring sermon by Apostle Oakman which followed. The Leaguers felt they had been truly blessed by the morning's activities. The ministry of Apostle Oakman was very much appreciated.

The Sunday afternoon activities included two class sessions and a short, informal program of drama, song, and comedy in charge of Gladys Alexander and Jack Owen.

The closing service of the convention was unusual and unprecedented. After a beautiful solo by Sister Frisby, the image of President Israel A. Smith was projected upon a screen while a wire recording brought his voice to the assembled Leaguers with a message especially to the Detroit-Windsor youth. Thus, on this inspiring note, ended the convention.

This convention, the sixth for the district, was thought to be especially noteworthy because it was the first one which had been fully executed under the district commission system and by the direction of the district supervisor, R. K. Wood.

Vision

By Norma Anne Kirkendall

THE PARABLE of the beam and the mote was really quite a true one. It is always one's own weakness which shows up the more violent in the life of another. An old philosopher friend of mine used to say, "By washing the windows in our own house, our neighbor's washing won't look so dirty."

Let's pretend that my vision is distorted in such a manner that all straight lines appear crooked and all curved lines seem perfectly straight. What a different world this would be. No contour would appear the same to me as it does to another. If I were to describe a vase, that description would be far from the actual appearance of the pottery itself. No person could identify or even recognize the world as I saw it. My description would be true to me since I saw it that way, but far from the truth as others saw it.

Many people live daily lives amid such distortion, caused by sin, lack of understanding, or willful ignorance. Their lives do not fit into the standard living pattern, because what they see as perfectly satisfactory conduct pattern is far off the beaten path of normal society.

Have you ever realized that every person tends to such attitudes in varying degrees? It behooves each of us to keep our windows so clean that our view of the world remains wholesome and clear. When the time comes that things begin to look cloudy and wicked and the whole world seems steeped in sin, it is then we must wash our mental windows and gain the clear vision again. The cloudy mind and befogged brain soon darken the light of God and leave the soul and the outlook sullied and eventually unclean. There are many ways to cleanse the spirit, but prayer is the most predominately successful. This, too, reflects the blessing of God's healing love, for he wants us to see his gospel in clear understanding and perfect vision.

the believer. These include the gift of tongues, which points to the day when a pure language shall be restored, and the casting out of devils—an earnest of the time when satanic hosts shall be banished and finally destroyed. Further, there are the gifts mentioned by Paul: the gift of knowledge, prophecy, etc., "by the Spirit," assuring us that knowledge shall at last cover the earth and that we "shall know as we are known." All such are given now "in part" as an earnest of the time when all those qualities of the Zion family shall be the rule and not the exception. "Now we walk by faith and not by sight." "Now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face."—I Corinthians 13: 12.

May we all be privileged to join in that great chorus, "The New Song," when ten thousand times ten thousand will chant that greatest of all oratorios:

Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor and glory and blessing . . . unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.—Revelation 5: 12, 13.

Witnessing in Gospel Bonds

By Audentia Anderson

The writer of this article shares with Herald readers her experience in a recent prayer meeting. Readers will discern that the spirit of testimony and intelligence responded well to the opportunity presented. It is one of those 100 per cent prayer meetings we all long for but seldom experience. There were twenty-two present and twenty-one testified. The twenty-second person asked for baptism.—EDITOR.

IT WAS WEDNESDAY EVENING, and a small group of devoted Saints had met in a quiet, peaceful home for prayer service—their midweek custom. Twenty-two were present, six of whom had come from distant points fifteen to thirty miles away. Six prayers were offered and twenty-one testimonies given. There were also a half-dozen hymns sung.

The Scripture reading was about the ten lepers who were healed, only one of whom returned to give thanks. The keynote of the service was pitched to giving expression of thanks to God and fellow men for blessings and favors received.

In harmony with the direction given the meeting, these loyal Saints in their testimonies did not express a single negative thought; there was no word of complaint, doubt, or criticism—just joy and gratitude. Below are some of the thoughts of appreciation they voiced.

No. 1. For the sunrise that morning, the joyous twitter of bird song and the spirit of gladness that had lasted all day.

No. 2. For God's loving-kindness, and a suggestion that we be quick to thank him at all times.

No. 3. For the gospel plan, its hope and its assurance of Christ's constant presence.

No. 4. For a deep-seated desire to share our gospel message with others and for every opportunity to do so.

No. 5. For the sublime beauty and bounty of God's creation all about us.

No. 6. For a new understanding of God's way of hearing and answering prayer which has given courage and confidence in making decisions.

No. 7. For an opportunity to give a tract (Other Sheep Have I) and the Book of Mormon to a well-educated man who is deeply interested in the Book of Mormon as history. Prayers were requested for him that he might be led to recognize its divinity.

No. 8. For the ministry of the men and women who are directing local activities and studies; for the thought, time, and effort they expend in arranging and providing the services and programs.

No. 9. For the seeds of gospel truth that had been planted in the hearts of a visiting sister and her husband. Prayers were requested that those seeds might grow and bear rich fruitage.

No. 10. For the opportunity to read and study, and for recently expressed thanks from relatives to whom this brother has been sending church books and literature. He also asked prayers that those relatives might see the joy and beauty of this work.

No. 11. For the many blessings of everyday life—health, the ability to work, and the feeling that God was near and interested.

No. 12. For the fact that after forty-six years of mostly isolated membership, a brother now has these group meetings to attend twice a week. He hoped there would be a niche wherein he could labor for the cause.

No. 13. For God's care through many years of life, being blessed beyond deserving.

No. 14. For coming to know and love this group of fine Saints, whose faithfulness and loyalty are both incentive and challenge.

No. 15. For the song, "Wonderful Words of Life."

Scout Troop Sponsored by Modesto, California, Branch

Pictured above are members of Boy Scout Troop 17 sponsored by the Modesto, California, Branch. This troop took part in the activities of Scout Week (February 6 to 12) by demonstrating on one of the main streets of Modesto how biscuits can be baked in a reflector oven. The biscuits were buttered and distributed to spectators at the close of the demonstration.

No. 16. For the good results of a first missionary effort when, as a young woman, one sister visited a Protestant minister to ask him to differentiate between her church and the Utah Church when he was to talk on "Mormonism."

No. 17. For having been taught the gospel in childhood and for the chance to attend regular services.

No. 18. For the presence of a spirit and fellowship such as was experienced in earlier years, but one which had not been found or felt in many years' association with other denominations.

No. 19. For the richness of the blessings which followed obedience to the gospel ordinances of faith, repentance, and baptism, and for the good Spirit to guide.

No. 20. For renewal of opportunities to work out one's soul's salvation each new day, and attempt to discover and do God's will.

No. 21. For the reception of the Holy Spirit soon after baptism, being bathed in it for three days, and finding it ever at hand to help solve every problem.

At the close of this service of thanks and appreciation, the elder in charge announced the coming baptism on the next Sabbath of the twenty-second person at the meeting that night—a young man of nine years, who had requested the ordinance after faithfully attending the services twice a week for months.

Announcement was also made that on Sunday forenoon, ten days hence, all the members who could, would go to the country home of an isolated sister, who was partially paralyzed. A service of song and prayer, sermonette, and testimony was outlined for her comfort and encouragement.

May God, who rejoices in the thankful heart, richly bless the dear Saints of this Orlando group and hasten the day when they may have a suitable building in which to hold their various services.

The Bridges We Build

By Lloyd E. Cleveland

An old man going a lone highway
Came in the evening cold and gray
To a chasm vast and deep and wide.
The old man crossed in the twilight dim,
The sullen stream had no fears for him,
But he stopped when safe on the other side
And built a bridge to span the tide

—From "The Bridge Builder" by Will Allen Dromgoole.

AS TRUE LATTER DAY SAINTS, we are, in a manner of speaking, engineers. We may never obtain an engineering degree from a recognized engineering school, but we are nevertheless engineers in a very real sense. Both in outlook and in action, the spiritual quality of Latter Day Saintism is evidenced in the determination to build.

All of us are not, of course, equal in engineering ability. Many who, like the old and weary traveler in the poem, should be concerned with the fate of those following them in the way, choose instead the role of the curious questioner in Dromgoole's poem, who considered the building task a foolish one. How much easier the pathway is if those who do the exploring and pioneering build a few bridges here and there against the possibility of floods.

During the war, we heard a great deal about the importance of bridges and of taking and holding bridgeheads. A quickly-captured or a quickly-erected bridge often meant the difference between winning and losing a battle. Too many lost battles meant a lost war.

WE TOO are waging a war against the forces of evil. What, you may inquire, has a bridge to do with winning this war? What kind of bridges may we expect to find useful in our work? What are the best materials available for use in the construction of the type of bridge we are talking about?

In this modern age we take bridges for granted, just as we do our high-speed highways, electricity, the daily paper, and free delivery of our mail. But to our pioneer forefathers, the small streams we cross at highway speed presented grave, often almost insurmountable obstacles. Thus the pioneers of early Restoration days painfully waded through the swollen streams of tribulation and, being builders at heart, laid in place the sturdy timbers which today make easier our pathway. Thus we of this generation, proud of our heritage as we make steady progress toward our destination, need to cast an appraising eye at contemporary building needs lest we in our rush to set up the kingdom forget those who will come after us.

WHAT KIND OF BRIDGES? One of the first and most important we need to be concerned about is one that spans the gap between childhood, in which we accept the church and its message eagerly, and adulthood, in which all too often we become embittered, cynical, or indifferent. What happens to the adolescents and the older youths to make them lose the faith and ardor of their childhood? At what swollen stream are they swept away by the sullen waves of doubt, fear, and false pride? Social and religious "engineers" can locate the trouble spot, but they must have help in building the bridge. If our zeal is rightly placed, we can accomplish the needed building in our homes, church schools, community institutions, and organizations. If we correctly emphasize the needs of growing youth and surround our young people with such influences as will contribute to the best mental, moral, and spiritual growth, we are building that bridge.

We know that the parent who would neglect his child's physical needs would be hailed into court and fined or jailed. We believe that millions of well-meaning parents who throw up their hands in horror as they see pictures of undernourished children in Europe should take a closer look at the spiritual and moral diet their own offspring are receiving.

In this age of high-pressure selling and equally high-pressure living, it behooves every thinking parent to open his eyes and the eyes of his children to the kind of world in which we live. All the films Hollywood can produce, all the soap operas, all the multitudinous gadgets which pour from the assembly lines of America will not save our people from destruction. Only the right instruction of good parents, good teachers, and good leaders can point the way to our youth. And today, from all evidence, such really good teaching is the exception rather than the rule.

WOULD YOU LIKE to challenge the above statement? Very well, visit, if you will, several non-Latter Day Saint homes and study as closely as possible the procedures used in rearing the children in those homes. Then visit an equal number of Latter Day Saint homes, making a similar survey. What are the significant differences—if any? What do Latter Day Saint parents give their children which should make them different in every way from the hundreds of thousands of young nonchurch members who grow into adulthood each year?

Most parents, including church parents, do not know or fail to remember the extent to which their own actions and conversation mold the lives of their children. Casual dinner table conversation which features derogatory comments about people (perhaps church officials), institutions, or the government often is the basis for the formation of lifelong biases in children. The parent who is so careless often builds the wrong kind of bridges and makes agnostics, moral anarchists, and political cynics of his own flesh and blood. Perhaps all parents should interpret the slogan, "Win a member," to mean "Win My Own Children."

It is an easy matter for well-meaning parents to take a careless and indifferent attitude toward the environment which molds the lives of their children. Do you who are parents care what kind of movies your youngsters see, what kind of books they read? what kind of teachers they have (in church school, too!)? Do you know where they are at this moment?

We do not advocate a stiff and rigid censorship nor the creation of a parent Gestapo, but all mothers and fathers are duty bound to exert every influence at their command to create a desire for the better things of life. Certainly your children will not love you any the less for knowing you care about these things.

YES, PARENTS CAN HELP build this bridge—from childhood to adulthood. There are others which are important, too. There is a bridge of racial "golden-rulism," for example. Most of us could make improvement here. There is a bridge of neighborly affection which must be built before we can reach our neighbor with the gospel. There is a great bridge between us and God over which the Holy Spirit may travel to minister to our needs. There must be a vital bridge between our workaday lives and material possessions and our religious lives and things of the spirit. No doubt you can think of other bridges we need to build.

If your bridge-building is at an all-time low, how about taking that refresher course in human engineering offered through the church and its various departments? Why not join in helping to make some good solid construction? Now is the only time you have!

The Beyond

By LILLIAN B. CROSS

(From British Columbia District Challenger)

I NEVER SAW my great uncle Theodore. I think he died before I was born; but I have always felt I knew a great deal about him, because my mother often spoke of him. I know she was very fond of him.

It seems one time when he was visiting his sister he said, "You know, Elizabeth, when I die and go to heaven I don't think I'm going to be very happy there."

"Why, Theodore, what a dreadful thing to say!" replied his sister.

"Well," said Uncle Theodore, "I don't like the idea of floating around, playing a harp, and listening to my own singing. In the first place I can't play a harp and you know yourself what my singing sounds like."

When great uncle Theodore was on earth he was a very ingenious person and had a real gift for mending things. It was comforting to his family and friends to hear him say in his cheerful voice, "Don't worry, I'll fix it for you." He fixed so many things that his friends almost believed he could mend a broken heart.

That he mended things was not nearly as important as the fact that he did this because of his love for his friends, and he liked to make them happy. He developed a very loving personality and a real spirit of service to his fellow men. I am sure that this same love and spirit of service would be used in the proper channels in the beyond.

New Horizons

"But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." To me that is no offense so great as the destruction of the ego. Without some sense of self-worth, one cannot even start to become a son of God.

IN JESUS' MINISTRY to wayward men and women no time was wasted in saying whose fault it was that they had lost the way. He saw their specific need and supplied it. That need was an awareness of their heavenly Father and of his care for them.

How fine it would be if we would express our faith in children and youth in as forthright a manner as did this mother. The teacher at the school sent for the mother of a small boy. "Take him home," she said. "I can't teach him; he's stupid."

Then the mother struck back, "He's not stupid. I'll teach him myself." She did—and the result was Thomas Edison!

The church is blessed with many homes in which women of such faith and courage give incentive and guidance to their own children and to others. These homes become real schools of Christlike character.

In conclusion, let me speak of those who are on the sunset slope of life. For those, who to the end of life shall maintain a strong faith in God and in his gift to men of the power to become the sons of God, there is the best-of-all crown, the peace crown.

These are able to feel that they have helped further the development of the next generation and other generations that follow if their children and their companions are actively affiliated with the church. If they see its task a little more clearly and have learned to love its work more dearly and to discipline themselves more wisely for its sake, if they are a little more sensitive to the needs of others, more single-minded, more ready to forgive, more eager for truth, and more effective in service, these home builders have lived to some purpose and can say to the Master, "Behold our children, Lord. They are ready for greater service in thy kingdom than we have been able to give. Use them as you see fit, Father, for we are assured of your love and justice and your forgiveness for our shortcomings. Bless all the generations that follow, that truly men may become the sons of God." And a peace, deep and abiding crowns our task.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Velma Clark, The Plains, Ohio, asks continued prayers for the physical and spiritual welfare of her husband, and for her aunt, Electa Collie, that she may regain her health.

DEATHS

WALTERS.—Elizabeth Webster, was born June 22, 1859, at Lisbon, Illinois, and died March 12, 1949, at Sioux City, Iowa. On November 27, 1879, she was married to Tunis M. Walters; six children were born to them. Mr. Walters and a daughter, Vera, preceded her in death. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church early in life; she gave freely of her time and talents to serve others.

Surviving are four sons: Claud B. of Danbury, Iowa; Harvey E. of Presho, South Dakota; J. Maclin of Ft. Pierre, South Dakota; and James E. of Tyler, Texas; one daughter, Myrta Shoemaker of Des Moines, Iowa; eighteen grandchildren; and twelve great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held in Des Moines, Elder C. B. Hartshorn officiating, assisted by Pastor Herbert Scott. Interment was in the Davis City cemetery.

BOTKIN.—George Walter, son of Morgan and Arabella Botkins, was born on January 11, 1867, in Logan County, Ohio, and died March 15, 1949, in Springfield, Ohio. His wife, Georgeanna, preceded him in death four years ago. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since December 18, 1937.

He is survived by one daughter, Mrs. Clara Reedy; two stepdaughters: Mrs. Ruth Knight and Mrs. Francis Cornwell of Springfield; and two sisters: Mrs. Rozella Hamilton of Springfield and Mrs. Della Hamilton of Tremont City, Ohio. Services were held at the Austin Richards Funeral Home, Elder Orval M. Hooten officiating. Interment was in the New Carlisle, Ohio, cemetery.

CLARK.—Gary Alden, son of Alden and Alyce Lorenzen Clark, was born November 15, 1948, at Sacramento, California, and died twelve hours later. He is survived by his parents and a twin sister, Gayle Alyson. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Myron Reed Schall at Sacramento.

BISHOP.—Lot, son of Elizabeth and James E. Bishop, was born September 16, 1864, in Staffordshire, England, and died at his home in Johnson City, New York, on February 8, 1949. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church at the age of ten. Following his ordination as a priest, he was ordained to the office of elder in 1897. In 1904, he was married to Louise Watkins Davies who came with him to the United States and settled in Scranton, Pennsylvania. He moved to Youngstown, Ohio, in 1918 and helped to organize the mission there. All through his life, he was active in church work.

He is survived by his wife; four sons: William Bishop of England; W. John Davies of Portsmouth, Virginia; Ernest and Albert Davies of Scranton; four daughters: Mrs. Thomas Thomas of Willoughby, Ohio; Mrs. Ira Humes of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Mrs. Walter Dykeman of Cincinnati, New York; and Mrs. Arthur Bellinger of Johnson City; twenty-nine grandchildren; and nineteen great-grandchildren. Services were held at the Gould Funeral Home, Elders Adolphus Edwards, Sr., and Stanley I. Hayes officiating. Burial was in the Kattelville, New York, cemetery.

CULP.—Hulda Cordelia, daughter of Edward and Joan Crabtree, was born November 16, 1883, at McCulloch, Ohio, and died February 11, 1949, at her home in McCulloch. She was married to Harry Culp on November 3, 1914; six children were born to them. On March 13, 1916, she was baptized into the Reorganized Church at Pleasant Valley Branch, where she was a faithful member the remainder of her life. She was a woman of great patience; even during her illness, she was considerate of others.

She is survived by her husband; three daughters: Mrs. Mabel Cunningham of Portsmouth; Eleanor and Orpha of the home; three sisters: Mrs. Drusilla Chaffins and Mrs. Stella Criswell of West Portsmouth, and Ida of McCulloch; three brothers: Alva, Birchard, and Millard of McCulloch; and two grandchildren. Three of her children died in infancy. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Pleasant Valley, Elders T. R. Beatty and Floyd T. Rockwell officiating. Interment was in the McCulloch cemetery.

TODD.—Mary Elizabeth Brintnall, was born December 24, 1863, at Rothsay, Ontario, and died February 10, 1949, at Kenville, Manitoba. She was married to George Todd in Michigan on February 28, 1880. She was a devoted wife, mother, and member of the Reorganized Church, in which she was a faithful worker throughout life. Mr. Todd preceded her in death nine years ago.

She is survived by a son, Orrin H., and a sister, Mrs. R. Farmer of Kenville; and a daughter, Emma L. Saul of New Westminster, British Columbia. Interment was in the Durban, Manitoba, cemetery, beside her husband.

THOMPSON.—Margaret, daughter of William and Rebecca Scott Smith, was born April 15, 1867, in Canada, and died March 15, 1949, at Hermosa Beach, California. In December, 1885, she was married to Arthur D. Thompson in Michigan. In 1906, they moved to California, where they remained the rest of their lives. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since October 15, 1890. She taught church school, and for many years she grew flowers to adorn the pulpit in the church. She is survived by her adopted son, Carl, of the home and a host of friends. The funeral was conducted at the Central Los Angeles Reorganized Church, Patriarch Elbert A. Smith officiating.

PICKLES.—Floyd B., son of Nathan Alexander and Julia Alivira Pickles, was born November 20, 1880, at Bloomington, Illinois, and died at his home in Intercity (between Independence and Kansas City, Missouri) on March 30, 1949. He moved with his family to Independence when he was six and attended school there. On January 10, 1908, he was baptized into the Reorganized Church by Elder Joseph Luff. In 1902, he was married to Grace Ross; two children were born to them. His wife, Grace, died in 1919 and in 1927 he married Nellie M. Hayes; one child was born to this union. He was an employee of the Kansas City Bolt and Nut Company for thirty years, beginning in 1896 as an apprentice and working up to a master mechanic's rating. After he left this company, his business took him into the southern and southwestern states. In later years, he moved back to Missouri where he remained until his death.

He is survived by his wife, Nellie, of the home; one son, Edgar F. Pickles of Richland, Washington; two daughters: Mrs. Beulah Saunders of Kansas City and Miss Julia Pickles of the home; a stepson, John C. Hayes of the home; four grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Claude A. Smith at the George C. Carson Chapel. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

ANDERSON.—Sarah Elizabeth, daughter of Cassanda Arnold and John L. Cooper, was born near Elliston, Iowa, on November 7, 1870, and died April 6, 1949, at the Decatur County Hospital following a brief illness. On March 9, 1890, she was married to John A. Anderson. Soon after their marriage, both she and her husband were baptized into the Reorganized Church. The family home was near Elliston until 1918 when they moved to Lamoni, Iowa. She is survived by her husband; three sons: Earl of Lamoni; Orra of Los Angeles, California; and Alma of Mt. Ayr, Iowa; two sisters: Mrs. Nancy Boyer of Shannon City, Iowa, and Mrs. Alice Miller of Sterling, Colorado; two brothers: Jack Cooper of Granby, Missouri, and Frank Cooper of Denver, Colorado; four grandchildren; and two great-grandchildren. A daughter, Katie, died at the age of nine. Services were held at the Marsh Chapel in Lamoni, Elders Robert Farnham and Arthur Lane officiating. Interment was in Rose Hill Cemetery.

* J. CHARLES MAY

Brother J. Charles May was a visitor to the editorial offices on April 15, and recalled that this day was the fortieth anniversary of his first General Conference appointment at Lamoni, Iowa (1909). His first mission was to the Society Islands, and he has spent fifteen years of his ministry in such island mission service. He was there in 1912, when Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths and C. Ed. Miller visited the islands, and was ordained a member of the Seventy at that time. He has been engaged continuously in church service since his first appointment.

* QUOTES

Two little items that appeared in a recent "Reader's Digest" offer so much help to Christian people that we think they ought to be sent as far as possible.

The next time you find yourself in a gab session, remember this: "Gossip always seems to travel faster over the sour grape vine."

Or when you find a member disturbed by someone with a loose tongue and a hard heart, remember that "He was suffering from skeptic poisoning"

* GOSPEL

In all the universe, the only place of safety is with God.

* BIBLE VIGNETTES—

Eutychus

Three tears and a firkin of sympathy to the young man, Eutychus—with a name like that he could have had curly hair and a pretty complexion—who, "being fallen into a deep sleep" as Paul's sermon droned interminably on "until midnight," fell out of the third story window of the upper chamber where he was sitting, as part of a yawning congregation. He was picked up from the street below, apparently dead.

It was fortunate that Paul, who had put the lad to sleep, was able to awaken him again (Acts 20: 9, 10), so that everybody, excluding Eutychus who wanted to sleep, was comforted.

But did Paul learn anything from that experience? He did not. He simply called for lunch, and before they could finish eating and escape home, he was talking again. The poor things were trapped, since Eutychus had proved that a leap from the window was too hazardous. Paul kept them there till dawn, endlessly talking, so that he could take ship in the morning without the trouble of going to bed. That was very inconsiderate, because he could take a long nap on the ship, while they had to report for work on Monday morning, and it must have been a long day for them. Well, it was on his third and last missionary journey, which was for the best, or he would have had a smaller crowd at the next meeting.

But whatever became of Eutychus? Perhaps he belonged to the younger set, more interested in the tall tales of faraway places told by the sailors down at the wharf, or in a pretty brunette who lived with her parents over the sandal maker's shop, than in religion. Out late the night before, cornered by his worried mother, who wanted to get something serious into his fair but empty head, he took the only refuge of trapped boredom by going to sleep. His mistake was in picking an unsafe spot for it.

Eutychus must have been disgusted with religion. The headache he suffered for several days could not have helped matters much. The Scriptures record nothing more of him. The blood of martyrs did not flow in his veins, nor did the sacramental wine, touching his lips, inspire him with missionary fervor.

"They Dream of Home"

—From an old song

Who has not felt how sadly sweet
The dream of home, the dream of home,
Steals o'er the heart, too soon to fleet,
When far o'er sea or land we roam?

—Thomas Moore (1780-1852)

This is nostalgia—a dream of home, heart-hunger for a place our very own—a bit of earth beneath the sun; a gnarled old tree abloom, sending its fragrance out on the breath of spring like a gift to God; a house all dressed in white, a shaded porch, a door that opens to the touch; and there within, the sweet fragrance of cleanliness and peace.

There, too, the voice of Mother, singing—singing a sweet old-fashioned song whose tones go reaching down into the farthest treasure chambers of the heart, touching a wellspring of happiness so close to tears, of joy so full that it resembles pain.

The Queen is reigning on her throne. Within those walls, her realm is governed by the Law of Love. A province, this—a province of an empire far away, where God is King; a place as much like heaven as anything we can understand.

In spirit and in memory, we tiptoe in, hoping to surprise her. But she looks up and smiles as if she knew. And then the heartfelt laughter, and the long embrace. At last, we are at home!

This is nostalgia—a dream of home.

Introducing . . .

PAULINE JAMES ARNSON (page 5), who provides our Mother's Day feature article, is a vocalist, schoolteacher, and women's leader. She was born in Independence, Missouri, and was graduated from Central High School, Kansas City, then studied a year at Lenox Hall, a girls' school in St. Louis, Missouri, and another year in Belcourt Seminary, Washington, D. C., two years and a summer at Kansas State Teacher's College, and a year and a half in vocal music and French in Paris, France.

President F. M. Smith appointed her chairman of the General Council of Women in 1934, where she has served since. In this capacity she has traveled to many parts of the church for institutes and women's meetings, where she always wins friends for the church.

Sister Arnsion has belonged to the Stone Church Choir for many years, singing the soprano solos for the Messiah at least seven times. She belongs to the Tuesday Club, the Mother's Club, and the Independence Music Club. She taught school for one and a half years, and served as supply teacher in the Independence schools for ten years.

She married Shankland S. Arnsion in 1927. He is an elder and member of the Herald Board of Publication.

"Although I have not written it," she says, "the main purpose of my activities is and has been the interest of the church. I was taught that talents came from God and should be developed for use in his church."

NOTE—"A TRIBUTE TO MOTHER," by Sister Arnsion does not end on page 5, but is continued on page 13.

HARLEY A. MORRIS (page 7), who last wrote for us in the Herald of April 16, was introduced in that issue. This article, "A Mother's Influence," was prepared a year ago, but was received too late for publication then.

EVELYN MILLIS DUVALL (page 9) is a consultant and the executive secretary for the "National Council on Family Relations." In collaboration with Rufus Hall, she wrote the popular book, When You Marry.

Mrs. Duvall spent two days lecturing and counseling on the Graceland Campus last December. This article, as also the one which appeared in the Herald of March 19, 1949, was taken from recordings at Graceland and are printed by permission. Of this experience Dr. R. A. Cheville writes, "She caught the spirit of the college and was received at once into 'the Graceland Family.' Her graciousness, her understanding of youth, her competency in the field, and her wide travel elicited both respect and response. Her visit constitutes one of the high lights of the year."

SUCCESSFUL SERIES IN PHILADELPHIA

Apostle Maurice Draper and Elder John Darling, from the Department of Religious Education, were in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, from March 20 to April 7 to present a month-long series of missionary services. Much of the success of the series was due, Apostle Draper asserts, to local support, and the organizational work projected by Elder John Conway in preparation. Brothers Draper, Darling, and Norman Preusch baptized sixteen people on the closing day of the series. Several novel approaches were made in this series. Affirmations of our faith—basic statements of belief—were made after each sermon. Publicity was all built around the Book of Mormon. The length of the series, too, was a novelty. Apostle Draper states that the missionary spirit is growing in the eastern mission. Almer Sheehy is now in the midst of a two week series at Jonesport, Maine.

GROWTH IN WESTERN BRANCHES

Seventy Arthur Gibbs reports that the Camas, Washington, Saints are purchasing the Methodist church building. It will be available next March 15. The group in Woodburn, Oregon, was organized as a mission four years ago. Since then they have organized as a branch, have purchased and paid for their church building, and have baptized thirty-five new members. Elder George Oman is the pastor.

BAPTISMS IN LOUISVILLE

J. H. Yager completed a series of missionary sermons and home contacts in Louisville, Kentucky, recently. Ten were baptized and he states that more are very near the point of making their decision to join the church.

BAPTISMS IN MINNEAPOLIS

Seventy James Daugherty, after a recent Minneapolis series of missionary services, reports three baptisms, uniting three families in the church. Eight more expressed desires to join, but their baptisms are being planned for later. Elder Daugherty expressed appreciation for the spiritual growth and enthusiasm displayed by the local priesthood, commenting that they show sincere desire to take their responsibilities in the work of the church.

ELBERT SMITH RETURNS

Presiding Patriarch Elbert A. Smith, who has spent the winter in Los Angeles with his son and family, Mr. and Mrs. Lynn Smith, returned to Independence about April 28. Personal mail may be addressed to him at his home, 1513 West Walnut Street. Official mail may be sent to the Auditorium.

MCDOWELL IN WESTERN UNITED STATES

Dr. F. M. McDowell left Independence Saturday, April 30, to participate in the appointee institute at Berkeley, California, May 3 to 12. His attendance there is to be shared with Apostle Charles Hield. Dr. McDowell and Apostle Hield will share also in district priesthood institutes in the following places: Berkeley, May 13 to 15; Los Angeles, May 20 to 22; Phoenix, May 27 to 29.

"Behold Thy Mother!"

At the Foot of the Cross

Jesus, nailed to the Cross, was dying. At his feet stood a little group of women, including his mother, Mary. And near them was his friend, John, whom he loved. To the very last, a sense of his responsibility for his mother remained with him. In those tragic circumstances, and in spite of his agony, Jesus saw the possibility of saving his mother by establishing a new relationship for her. He could count on John to carry out his wishes. His mother need not be alone. At that moment, love burned high in a clear and beautiful light. To his mother he said, "Woman, behold thy son!" And to his disciple, "Behold thy mother!"

This Sunday is an occasion for all of us, if we have forgotten, to take a look at our mothers.

Our Complacency

Here in America we have been a little too proud of what we have done for the mothers. We have succeeded in lowering the death rates of mothers and infants. We have fought the illness and diseases of motherhood as hard as we could. Our doctors, nurses, and hospitals have carried on this battle for us. We have taken a relatively easy part in paying the bills. It is a good thing to take care of the physical needs.

Now it is time to prick the bubble of our self-satisfaction.

The Needs of Mothers

Mothers have other needs that too many of us are neglecting. In the homes they need special care and consideration. They need husbands who will help with the dishes and the housework, who will pick up things from the floor and put them away, and help take care of the children.

More than this, mothers need kindness, love, and peace in their homes. Human beings are emotional, and when life puts heavy burdens upon us, as it does upon mothers, the emotions come closer to the surface. It can be said categorically that there is a little too much callousness and coldness of speech and manner in many homes, and that husbands who are very generous in providing for their families are often too blunt in dealing with them and not considerate enough of their feelings.

Our Sins Against Mothers

Worst of all, here in the United States, in vastly increasing numbers in recent years, uncounted numbers of men have been abandoning their responsibility for mothers and children by the divorce route, leaving them to shift for themselves. The care and burden of children is thus left upon the weakest member of the partnership, and the man escapes to another part of the country, to court and marry again, and to enjoy a carefree life. This is a cruelty and an injustice that is a national scandal; and if we want to do something for our mothers, we can make an effort to see that something is done to bring the penalties of the law to bear upon irresponsible husbands and fathers. Would it not be possible to put a husband under a bond, if necessary, to make him aware of the necessity of faithfulness to duty? Bonds have been used for less worthy purposes.

In our treatment of mothers, we have little reason to be proud and much reason to be ashamed, as a nation.

A Look at Mother

On this Mother's Day, it is good to remind ourselves to take a look at mother. Perhaps we have taken her too much for granted, as the saying is, and whatever it may mean.

Mother is growing old. She is working too hard. She probably has not been taken out to dinner and to a show for a long time. She has stayed home and prepared the meals while the young people went out for a good time and while father has gone his pleasant way about business and church work.

Jesus may be speaking to you, this day—to you—and saying, "Behold thy mother!" Take a look at her. See if she is tired. See if she needs help, or if she has been working too hard. Try to recall how much you have received from her, and if you have done anything to insure her happiness, or give her some rest or recreation.

St. Paul in writing to the Romans (12: 10) gave a good suggestion for home life: "Be kindly affectioned one to another . . . in honor preferring one another." If that spirit could prevail in all of our homes, mothers and fathers and children would find home a heaven that they would rather reluctantly leave for any other place on earth. Beginning by improving our care and consideration for all mothers—ours and other people's—and the mothers of our children, too, we could bring a little of that too rare atmosphere of heaven into a troubled world.

Mothers today the world over, present a varied record of success and failure. Some are making wonderful contributions to the future through their children, some are creating serious problems.

No mother can do her best by her children without the father's active, sympathetic and understanding help and support. Women will be better mothers when men are better fathers.

We shall build a better world in the future only as mothers and fathers together train and prepare for their tasks, and devote themselves to building the kingdom of God at home.

Editorial

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Apostle Paul Hanson,
Cuzco, Peru, April 12:

Last Sunday I came here by plane from Lima—a two-hour trip. We rose 21,000 feet above sea level, and rubber tubes were provided for inhaling oxygen to relieve difficulty in breathing.

I can hardly realize I am in the historical and monumental city of Cuzco, the ancient capital of the Inca Empire, which holds the remains of pre-Inca, Inca, and Spanish civilizations. My desire is to become gradually acquainted with these remains. A hurried visit would mean consciously being thrown into a chaotic welter of facts and semi-facts. Here one archaeological wonder follows another. Already what I have seen archaeologically in hugeness of conception and masterly execution is hardly believable.

My plan is to make Cuzco my headquarters for two weeks or more. Perhaps I have already informed you, that among the leading places I have in mind in this region to visit are Sacsahuaman, Ollantaytambo, Machu, Picchu, Pisac, Urco, and Abancay.

Hotel Cuzco, in which I am located, is one of a number of government maintained hotels in various parts of Peru, providing comfortable accommodation for tourists at a moderate price. There is electricity and running water, with warm water being provided at a certain time in the morning and evening. The direct rays of the sun are quite warm, especially at noon, but in the evening a warm suit and woolen jacket are necessary. The altitude is about 11,000 feet. No heat is provided.

The city is situated in a bowl of the mountains, some of which are capped with snow.

From the desk where I am writing, with two windows opened from the center to the sides, I can look directly over one block of low red tile-roofed buildings to the cathedral that stands on the opposite side of the great plaza. In the morning there is the tolling of bells from the cathedral. This church stands in part on the site of the Temple of Wiracocha—a major, if not the chief deity of the ancient Peruvians, white and bearded. He was believed to have personally visited in Peru and to have promised he would return; the Peruvians believed Pizarro probably was Wiracocha returning as he had promised.

I am amazed not only at the colossal ancient stone works that exist in profusion, but also at the conquest by Pizarro of the empire of the Incas. This conquest, although inseparable from treachery and massacre, impresses me as an almost impossible achievement. From what I have seen of the mountains, coastal desert, and other great formidable obstacles, it appears to me a conquest that could not have been accomplished by any person of present day caliber. He and his followers must have been a tougher lot than the present age affords—entering such a mountainous country, moving in high altitudes where rarefied air makes breathing difficult, traveling in a new country, etc. I must pause and rest while climbing the stairs to the third floor of the hotel here because of the altitude.

Llamas are seen in considerable numbers in and around Cuzco.

Yesterday the plaza in front of the cathedral was crowded to overflowing with Indians, many from outside the city. The festival of Santo Lunes was being celebrated. There were soldiers in uniform, a band, and priests in clerical robes preceding a large statue of Christ, portrayed in agony on the cross, mounted on a silver base, and carried on the shoulders of about forty men. As the statue emerged from the entrance of the cathedral, there was a tolling of bells, flowers were strewn from each side of the doorway upon the statue, and then the procession moved along one side of the square amid the great throng to the Church of Santa Teresa and the Church of La Merced. At 6:30 p. m., in front of the cathedral, the image of Christ, dark in color, was bowed three times in benediction, to one side, to the front, and to the other side, to the people, while they cried, screamed, and implored him, among other blessings, not to send any more earthquakes. It is said that in the earthquake which destroyed Cuzco in 1650, there were 300 quakes in one day.

I am well, and, with a few words of Spanish added to my vocabulary, I manage to order meals and move from place to place with little difficulty.

From Apostle R. E. Davey, Rozella, N. S. W., Australia, April 14:

By the time this letter arrives, the Joint Council will likely be in session. I regret very much that it will be impossible for me to be present at this meeting of the Council, but I pray the blessings of God will attend your deliberations so that out of your endeavors may come that which is in harmony with his will.

I realize somewhat of the shadow that the loss of Brother Garver will throw over the Council. Truly a consecrated, devoted, and capable man has been taken from our midst.

At the present, we are putting on the final touches in our preparation for the Mission Conference, which opens this evening with a priesthood Communion service. A report of the conference and post-conference activities, together with the report of my recent trip through the southern and western Australia, will be sent to you the latter part of next week.

I pray that the guiding influence of our heavenly Father will attend all of your deliberations, and that he will continue to strengthen each in the task that is his.

Sister Sarah G. Selbe of Phillipsburg, Kansas, writes:

I see by the Herald that you are asking help for the Sanitarium. I am sending a check, as I have been an isolated Saint most of my life. . . . I am the only one here that I know of . . . I am alone—but not alone, for He is with me.

I will be eighty-one years young the last of this month. I will never forsake the church; it is the only thing worth living for.

Elder Cecil R. Ettinger, general church appointee to the Nauvoo District, writes on April 12:

We continue to be blessed in our ministry, both with the branches and in our home. Last fall our little son had pneumonia; therefore he catches cold rather easily. He had a bad cold last week that began to settle in his lungs. We tried to give him penicillin, but he was so ill that the sweetness of the tablets nauseated him. That evening just before he went to bed, we called upon God through the power of the priesthood invested in us for those blessings consistent with his will. That was the first evening Ray slept through the entire night since he had returned from Maine. The doctor, upon seeing him, commented that it didn't seem as if he had the same pair of lungs. Yes, God blesses his people today when they look to him for guidance.

There are men that will make you books, and turn them loose into the world, with as much dispatch as they would do a dish of fritters.—Cervantes.

A Tribute to Mothers

By PAULINE JAMES ARNSON

THERE ARE TWO SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT on the subject of observing a special day to honor mothers. Some feel that too much sentiment is expressed, and if the following incident could be taken as a typical example of this view, many people might be inclined to rally to this side. On this particular occasion, the pastor asked all those present whose mothers had passed on, to rise. It happened that I had lost my mother just a short time before, and I said to myself, "If this is the way Mother's Day is to be celebrated, I shall absent myself in the future from such services." I was almost ready to join those who exclaim, "Let's do away with Mother's Day as a special celebration; let's honor good mothers every day of the year."

There is little doubt, however, that Anna M. Jarvis, who in 1907 originated this special day of honor, hoped that this observance would inspire all women to be good, worthy mothers. To set all women upon a sentimental pedestal, in spite of their shortcomings, was far from her purpose. In my opinion it is good to observe any kind of a day in honor of any subject if it helps only one person to think a little more deeply about the subject and to make a few resolutions for improvement. Even our Lord, Jesus Christ, whose teachings should be in our hearts and thoughts always, had to remind his church to "do this in remembrance of me." So, likewise, we should express our love and gratitude to mothers in a more tangible way on this special day.

Will Rogers, the cowboy philosopher, said, "I never met a man I didn't like." He must have arrived at this conclusion because he looked for the good within the man so that he could find some quality worth liking. Other qualified specialists have said, "There are no bad children," and there must be some basis for this statement even though the daily papers are full of accounts of crime committed by children.

I have never known a really bad mother, although there may be some who willfully choose to do ill toward their children. I have seen careless, ignorant, unwise, and sometimes selfish women who were mothers; but it is probable that the economic pressure and unfairness of the society in which they lived caused them to be so. More to be expected, however, is that they are that way because some other mother failed.

I doubt not that at some time in a mother's experience, even in the heart of the most unfit one, has come moments when she has dreamed of the good job she was determined to do with the little one then resting in her arms. It is this person, at her best moment, along with the more fortunate, enlightened women, that we honor today.

WHEN I THINK OF "MOTHER," the picture of my own mother comes distinctly to view. She was a cheerful, intelligent, companionable, lovable person, and I enjoyed her companionship more than that of any other I ever knew. I was punished many times for childish misdemeanors, but felt no resentment, for Mama was a fair person, who did not take out her ill feeling upon her children. I think of the urge to do "big things" that her faith in me gave to me and how much her confidence in my ability meant. She taught me that talents are given by God, and they should be used in his service. How small our success or progress would be if our mothers did not believe in us!

The most vivid memory I have of my mother's mother, Grandmother

Robinson, was of her on her knees praying before her davenport after her family had left for the day's work. Grandmother always prayed aloud, and I shall never forget the eloquent praise and worship she gave to her Master as she poured out her heart to him. I remember also what fun she was and how she loved to have her grandchildren visit her and gather around the big base burner which held the bowl of buckwheat cake sponge, to be baked in the morning.

My father's mother was a gracious, reserved lady who welcomed me every Saturday morning and was willing to take time out from her many duties to let me "help" her do the Saturday baking. How I loved to take home at the end of day the tiny loaf of bread and the little cakes she taught me to make! I remember also that it was the usual custom at grandmother's to attend the Sunday afternoon prayer meeting at 2:30, and no matter how large the crowd was for dinner, it was understood that she and the guests would leave for prayer service when the time arrived for meeting. I am sure that my affection for older people had some of its beginning in the kindly treatment Grandmother James gave to me.

A lasting memory of another mother I knew, who was rich in

Pictures of Mother

WHEN I THINK of some mothers—the ones that are glorified by the newspapers and magazines as Mother's Day approaches—somehow the pictures I have in my memory of my mother never seem to fit in. She was, and still is to this day, not the knitting or crocheting kind of mother. She does not come in the category of mothers who sit in the old rocking chair and wait for someone to bring them a cooky.

The first picture I have is of my mother at the wheel of that first "Reo" we owned. It was a "chug chug" affair and painted bright red. I can still see her as she took a corner on two wheels, and I can hear her laughing as she rounded a curve. True, we nearly lost all the blackberries we had picked and I, the youngest of four piled in the car—if you care to flatter it by the name—nearly fell out. But it was all fun, and Mother, as usual was laughing!

The second picture I have of my mother is on a rainy day back in 1914—and in those days it really rained in Southern California. The river would even flood. We four children were at school when the storm began. I, in the primary grades, began to worry, "How in the world would we get home for lunch?" and then, "How in the world would we ever get home at all?" My childish brain fretted. At last the noon-bell rang, and out the door I went. There stood Mother, drenched, but clutching four packages, and when I opened mine, how wonderful! Fried egg sandwiches—and they were still warm.

I have another favorite picture of Mother. This is of the day she killed my brother's pet hen to make soup for a Mexican neighbor who lay ill on a pile of rags in an attic across the street from where we lived. I went with Mother as she took the soup to the house and left it in the kitchen. A little later we went back—Mother wanted to check up. Sure enough, the husband had eaten the soup. What Mother didn't tell him! The next day when we went back, the woman was on a bed downstairs and the sun was coming in through open windows.

Then the "flu" epidemic came, leaving with me more pictures of Mother as she nursed the poor Mexicans and others who could not afford to hire help.

So many pictures of Mother come crowding my mind! I remember her scolding my brother when he came home with his shirt nearly torn off. After she had finished, my brother simply winked at her and said, "Gosh, Ma, you should see the other guy! That's the last time he'll ever call me a Mormon!" That was the only time I ever saw Mother really stopped.

I remember how proud I was when Mother was elected president of the "Ladies Aid." That was really an honor. It didn't dawn on me that it was just another pie for Mother's finger to be deep into.

It would simply be painting the lily for me to add anything about her nobility of character, her steadfastness, her undying faith, her spirit of youthfulness and optimism, and her understanding heart. These are just a few—a very few—of the pictures that come to my mind when I think of my mother.

"If Thou Art Consecrated—"

I REMEMBER dear old Aunt Mary. She lived in a little house—a hut, some would call it—out on the edge of town. The garden path was neatly bordered with "Johnny-jump-ups." Her one-legged husband—a curiosity to us children—kept a cow on the back of the lot. Her house was always neat and clean. Her kitchen smelled of homemade butter and freshly-baked bread.

Now I understand why the missionaries always found the way to Aunt Mary's door. It wasn't because of her fine linens and beautiful silver—Aunt Mary had none. It wasn't because there was a table loaded with rich food, because at Aunt Mary's sometimes there was only bread and milk for supper. Aunt Mary herself was the reason they came. She had no guile in her heart, and she had a humble spirit. You say she had nothing to be proud of? Let's see. Aunt Mary may have been lacking in this world's goods, but money couldn't buy her magnetic personality. Money couldn't buy her genuine love for her fellow man. Money could not purchase her humility. God had given her much that could not be bought with silver or gold. For you see, Aunt Mary was consecrated to a Cause—a Cause that made each day shine more brightly for her and changed her whole life into something beautiful and fine.

"If thou art consecrated to a Cause" such as Aunt Mary's, there will be no room in your heart for doubt or fear. And surely down deep in your soul there will be no room for pride, jealousy, or selfishness. These "secret" sins (I call them that because they do not work out in the open like some others) affect people like termites affect a house. First they begin to nibble, then they chew a little—just at the corners—but before long, those persons whose faith is not strong enough to withstand them find these secret sins have eaten deep down into their very souls.

"If thou art consecrated to a Cause" such as Aunt Mary's, these secret sins will not find a place to nibble, for your faith will be steadfast. There will be no room in your heart for PRIDE—only humility, the humility of Jesus. Neither will there be any place for JEALOUSY or SELFISHNESS, for you will carry the love of Jesus in your soul.

Forgive the sins I have confessed to Thee,
Forgive the secret sins I do not see.
Oh, guide me, help me, and my Keeper be.
Dear Lord, Amen.

A Mother's Influence

By HARLEY A. MORRIS

THE GALILEAN HILLS were green with the promise of spring; and in the heart of Mary, it was spring indeed. From the hill that overlooked Nazareth, she watched Joseph, her betrothed, at his work in the yard outside his carpenter shop. He was a strong man—strong and steady and honorable—and she knew he loved her with a quiet devotion. The spring sun warmed her as she took in the pleasant scene, and she was filled with a great peace. Her thoughts turned from the present and knocked at the gates of the future. Within her ken was the cottage of gray stone adjoining the carpenter shop where she and Joseph would make their home, a clean and sturdy home, and large enough to shelter them and the happy children she hoped would come to bless it.

But with that thought a trace of fear clouded the sunlight of her hope. She thought of her cousin, Elizabeth, now advanced in age, and childless. Often she had seen the look of reproach cast at her cousin when, in the company of other women, the conversation had turned to children and home. Often on her frequent visits to the hill country, she had heard the quiet weeping in the night and Elizabeth's whispered plea that God would take away her reproach. And Mary bowed her head and breathed a prayer: "Most High God," she prayed, "may I indeed fulfill the measure of my creation and bring forth sons and daughters to gladden our household."

A SHINING PRESENCE stood before her, his garments of purest white, shaming the sun; and out of the midst of the glory a voice spoke: "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favor with God. And behold thou shalt conceive, and bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus." And Mary's heart burned with joy, for that which she sought was to be: she was to become a mother.

Like every girl in Galilee, Mary knew that her body was organized as it was only that she might be a mother. She recognized her responsibility to bring forth children that the race might survive. But now she saw more, too, in that son who was to be. She saw that there would be in him something of the Divine. Yielding herself to the promptings of heaven's messenger, she pledged herself to see that that spark of divinity would be set ablaze so its fire might purify the mortal. This motherhood was not to be simply a biological process, but a spiritual mission. It meant joining hands with Divinity in bringing into existence a Child of God, and nourishing that bit of godliness to its maturity. It meant lending to God the most potent character-forming force in the world that together they might create a greater generation than ever had been known.

THE GALILEAN HILLS again were green with springtime warmth and showers. Sinking behind the horizon, a laggard sun pointed long fingers of shadow across the valley. Securely nestled in his mother's arms, a little boy begged the eternal boon of childhood, "Mommy, tell me about when I was a little baby."

Mary's mind flashed back to a day on the hillside when she talked with an angel. She heard again the intense words of the promise: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

Again she listened in wonderment to the story of the shepherds—how an angel of the Lord appeared to them and said, "Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior, who is Christ the Lord."

Again she saw the Wise Men and heard the strange story of their travels and of the star as each one laid before her a gift worthy of a king. Again old Simeon blessed them and spoke his stirring prophecy, while ancient Anna voiced her thanks that she had lived to see that day.

But the child grew impatient with her musings. "Mommy," he pleaded, "tell me about when I was a little baby."

Should she, indeed, tell him the wondrous things that she and Joseph had treasured in their hearts? Could he understand what she but half-understood?

And then, in bold resolve, she told him.

He little knew the import of the tale at that first telling, but night after night, with wearying repetition, he begged the story again and again until the conviction grew that he was not as other boys; that somehow between him and God there stretched an invisible band of kinship; that his was not a chance existence, but that behind his coming into the world there was plan and purpose and consummating love.

What a splendid heritage this was—to grow up with a consciousness of divine relationship; to feel that life, his life, was important and purposeful; to feel that he was wanted and loved and depended upon. All this he received from his mother, as any child might.

AS YEARS WENT BY, he turned again and again to Mary, questioning, filling in the gaps that memory left about those mystic happenings; and Mary, thrilling to his growing sense of mission, taught him the ways of the "Princes of the Blood" and helped him to mature responsibility. She sent him to the village rabbi to learn of the law and the prophets. She sang with him the sacred Psalms. When errant curiosity led them into the fields and hills, she bade him listen to the fluent voice of nature bespeaking God's bounty and benevolence and the immutability of his law.

When other babies came to share the household, she taught him to yield and to adjust and to take his place as one among the social group. He learned obedience and respect for elders. When preoccupation made him laggard in his duties, he learned the sharp discomfort of punishment. But more than all this, Mary, and Joseph with her, taught Jesus by precept and example the sacred truths their fathers had preserved for generations. He learned the sin of selfishness and the dignity of labor; he learned to cherish truth and follow charity. Love never rises from an empty cistern, but flows through unclogged channels from a living spring. The store from which Jesus, the Master, withdrew in abundant supply for all men's needs was stocked from the love that graced his boyhood home.

For Jesus, Mary performed all the duties of a mother. She gave him birth and nourished the spark of God within him. She gave him a sense of dignity and mission and of fellowship with the Infinite. She strengthened his resolve to walk the ways of righteousness and saw that he possessed the tools of his profession. She taught him self-control and social fitness. She cherished him in love and made him secure in her affections. And finally, when she saw her hopes—and the world's—lifted high upon the hill, she stood beside the tree and comforted him in those moments of public scorn with mute testimony of her confidence and faith.

It was of such a mother that Elizabeth said—and we with her:
"Blessed art thou among women."

A Bible Vignette—

Vashti, the Queen Who Defied a King

A SCENE OF ORIENTAL splendor surpassing, if possible, the magnificence of the court of Solomon, is the setting for the story of two remarkable women, Vashti and Esther, at the time of the captivity of the Jews.

In Shushan (Susa), the capital of the empire of Persia, stood the palace of King Ahasuerus (Xerxes I, 485-465 B.C.).

Ahasuerus made a feast in his beautiful palace against a background of rich drapes in the royal colors, blue and white, hung by silver rings from columns of marble, over floors of colored mosaic. There were lounges of precious metal, and the princes of the realm and their servants drank wine in vessels of gold from the cellars of the king.

Esther, "fair and beautiful" to behold, was the heroine, and risked death as queen to save her people. But Vashti also "was fair to look upon," and brave too. And where Esther faced danger and won, Vashti lost.

While the king was feting the nobles with revelry and wine, Vashti maintained her end of the hospitality by quietly entertaining the ladies. The king, an unashamed exhibitionist, indulged his vanity by making a display of the wealth and glory of his realm, and finally decided to bring Queen Vashti out as a part of the entertainment.

Vashti must have been disgusted with the thought of making a display of herself before all those intoxicated princes. Besides, the king was drunk, and like as not in a dangerous mood. So Vashti flatly refused to obey the command that was brought to her by the eunuchs. It was an unpardonable offense for an Oriental queen.

And so, it appeared, Vashti was doomed. If she had succeeded in this rebellion, the king would have been dishonored in the eyes of every prince in the palace, and before every humblest subject in the great empire of Persia. Moreover, the news would spread, and every prince would go home to find that his wife had heard of it, and every citizen would be faced with contempt and insubordination in his home. Ahasuerus took the problem up with his court, and the decision was handed down: Vashti must be deposed, must never see the face of the king again, and another queen should be chosen in her place. Thus the masculine dominance was preserved, feminine rebellion crushed.

What happened to Vashti after that is not told us. Evidently, in the Oriental mind, she immediately became a woman of no importance. Yet for modern readers, she is the most interesting figure in that grim drama, and we would pay tribute to the courage and spirit of that gallant and remarkable woman. Surely Vashti knew what would happen if she defied the king. Why, Esther risked her life just to walk into the presence of the king without an invitation.

Perhaps Vashti was done ingloriously to a painful death, as deposed queens sometimes were.

In such a light, Vashti stands as a martyr in the long struggle that women have had to make for dignity and honor, for the rights and respect of human beings. She failed, alas, but hers was a brave and noble effort. Hail her who considered it a greater honor to be a woman than to be a queen, and who, with a queenly dignity that no king of earth could take from her, passed in a tragic climax from the stage of history. Ahasuerus won a hollow victory over an unarmed but not helpless woman. It is a victory that never stood, that cannot stand. The noblest figure in that story is a woman—Vashti the Queen.

Families for Today

By EVELYN DUVALL

SINCE grandpa's day, many changes have taken place in family life. Life then was more uniform. Today there are many kinds of families, and we can select the type of family life we desire.

Then, most of the persons and the family were agricultural. Now only 17 per cent of the families in this vast country of ours are farm families compared with 64 per cent at the turn of the century. Another shift was the change in size of the family. There are now 3.6 members of the average family in America today. It is considerably smaller than the family of grandfather's day.

Now, too, members of the family are out on their own. The making of bread and butter has become big business. Jobs such as these have moved from the family. Children are no longer an economic asset. The cost of rearing a child today is between ten and twenty thousand dollars with a bottom of between seven and eight thousand dollars.

Another change is that families pick up and move very readily from county to county and from state to state. They are not staying together as they used to. Grandma had no alternative. She couldn't pick up and leave when she got angry. She took her peevishness out in churning. Even though she put on her bonnet, she had no place to go—no job other than right at home.

Who's Boss of the Family Today?

The family controls are changing too. The authoritative father as the head of the family is disappearing. Now the members are mutually assuming responsibilities. The new democratic family is coming into being. As a result of all this, the roles of the family's members are becoming confusing. Father shares in homemaking, and mother knows something about father's business. Flexibility is the rule. We are not sure what is manly and what is womanly. We need to establish patterns for family roles in this new order of things.

This Fast Moving Age

The automobile has certainly changed courtship and family relationships from what they were in the horse and buggy days. Now you can jump in the car and in just a few minutes be in a strange neighborhood where no one knows you and no one cares to know you. Community standards do not hold us in the new situations. Questions about drinking and petting, how far to go, where and when, and the like confront young people. Their social, religious, and moral values are given the supreme test. Now each must develop standards by which he shall make his choices.

Young people today are faced with problems on dates and in marriage that the generation before never had to make. Grandma could sleep over decisions they have to make immediately. What can they do? Doing what comes naturally is fatal in a dynamic society. They no longer can depend entirely upon choices dad made. They need to know much more about living than did those of several generations before.

We Are More Aware of Others Today

We are no longer provincial. We are much more at home in the world than ever before. When we listen to the radio at the breakfast table, we learn about people, their problems, and their joys—people we will never meet. We learn more about people on the other side of the continent than grandpa knew about his cousin who lived two countries away. Youth meets youth of other places. In former times, young people met those of their own neighborhood. All this complicates the question of choosing.

We need a specific kind of education for marriage such as those courses on marriage and family which are being instituted in colleges all over the country. We need counseling and guiding service in this transitional period—not only for those who have problems, but for those just going into marriage, those who are learning the adjustments of married life.

The Need for Being Scientific

All this implies the need for much more intelligence and calls for a willingness to be scientific. There are social implications that involve all of us. Marriage is not a solo experience. We need to build a society in which family life can thrive. Every one of us needs to know what our legislatures are doing. We should be concerned with laws concerning prices and housing and other vital issues which affect the family. We still hold that the family is the root of our society.

The Family and the Larger Society

We shall do well to distinguish between a disintegrating and a changing society. We need to inquire how the family can survive in this speeded-up age. If enough people care, the family will survive. We shall not re-establish the society of grandpa's day. We must see to it that the family functions adequately in our kind of changing society. There is need of alertness. Our families today are more and more the cradles of tomorrow's leaders. The success of today's families is the real hope for permanent peace and for the kingdom of God on earth.

NEEDS MET BY BAPTISM

IN THIS DIVISION are listed some of the characteristics of humanity which God evidently recognizes and which account for his selection of baptism as one of the steps in salvation. Beginning with man in a lost condition powerless to save himself, God recognizes that man must submit himself to someone who is able to save him. His first need if he is to achieve salvation is that he must trust someone outside himself. He must submit to some kind of leadership. He must acknowledge that he is lost.

In order to make it more easily possible for man to so submit to Christ, the Way, God gave to Jesus "all power, in heaven and in earth." As men grow to understand this, it becomes less difficult for them to submit to the leadership of their Savior. They cease to look for another way. As long as a man feels that of himself he has sufficient power to save himself and refuses to submit to the invitation to follow the light which is in Jesus Christ, he will continue to be lost. Only Christ can dictate the terms of salvation.

This philosophy, by which the right to dictate the terms of salvation is reserved for Christ only, is well stated in the preface to The Autobiography of R. C. Evans. This introduction was written by Joseph Smith, the prophet of the Reorganization. Someone has said, "Empty your bucket before you dip from the well. God requires that you bring only your need to him." A Latter Day Saint philosophy, of course, will not agree that nothing more is needed, but we must eventually come to recognize that humanity must submit to the ways of God as one of the first requisites of salvation. Until this submission becomes an actual fact in the life of man, his movement toward God—if there be any at all—is a faltering and indecisive movement. On the other hand, immediately when a man completely surrenders himself to the will of a loving Father and can sincerely and honestly say, "Have thine own way, Lord," he has taken a definite forward step in the direction of the kingdom. Baptism symbolizes this submissiveness. A candidate for baptism symbolizes his willingness to submit to the plan of God in that he allows himself to be submerged in such a common substance as water, and to place himself completely in the hands of someone else.

God, knowing that one who is lost must necessarily submit to the leadership of one who knows the way, has found fit to institute such a ceremony as baptism to symbolize to man this need for humility and submission and trust in others.

A SECOND REQUIREMENT, if man is to be saved, is that he shall be saved within the range of his own agency. God could have arranged to save man, at least to a degree, without giving him his agency. If he did, however, man would have been denied the opportunity to reach the heights that he can reach in purposely choosing the right way. Just as a mediocre swimmer might save someone who is drowning by first "knocking him out," so might God save mankind by destroying or denying men the right to make their own choices. But as a powerful swimmer can save someone without "knocking him out," so God saves the individual, while leaving him the ability to work for his own betterment and to make his own choices. Therefore, one of the needs of man, as he moves toward salvation, is this need to respect the authority of God and his authorized representatives, yet to retain his own agency. In selecting an ordinance which would demonstrate this part of the total plan, God needed to work out a ceremony which would be efficacious in its functioning to answer this need. He, therefore, chose the ordinance of baptism through which man, exercising his own agency, may submit or not, just as he chooses, but if he submits to it, the ordinance requires that he respect the authority of the church and its duly authorized priesthood. In this way God has pointedly symbolized the truth that the plan of salvation calls for man to use his own agency, but within the range of this agency he must respect the authority of God to work in and through the church for the salvation of humanity.

ANOTHER NEED OF MAN is a need for commitment. He does better in following any course if at some certain place along the way he definitely commits himself to follow such a course.

There is an old familiar story told of a man who was walking in his garden when the devil came to tempt him, but this time the devil was somewhat surprised, for the man refused to be tempted. When the devil asked, "Why not?" and the man hesitated in his answer, the devil laughed at him and said, "Oh, I know; but since when did you start serving the Lord?" His answer was, "Well, come to think of it, I don't know just when I did start." Then, taking a stick, he drove it deep in the ground, with the assertion, "Henceforth this stick shall represent to me that on this day and in this place I began serving the Lord."

One of the needs of man is that he shall have a point of commitment. At that point of commitment there needs to be placed some experience which shall be to him as a reference point. At all times in the future when there is any need to observe progress or to adjust to new situations, he can refer to this point as a point of beginning.

Membership

In surveying for a new building, one of the first things a surveyor does is to find the markers which indicate the corners of the lot on which the building is to be constructed. He then finds a "bench mark." Beginning with the location of a corner and the location of a bench mark as points of reference, he can locate exactly the position that the building will occupy according to the blueprints which have been drawn by the architect.

In Kansas City there is an aged man who is still active in visiting the sick. For many years he has sought to be helpful in the homes of the people whenever opportunity has presented itself. If he is in an automobile, riding down the street with someone, he talks constantly about the things that have happened as he has visited in the various houses along the way. So many have been his experiences in which he has felt the companionship of the heavenly Father and the power and influence of the Holy Spirit as he has administered to the sick, that as he rides down the street he can hardly talk fast enough to tell all the things that have happened. Everywhere he goes in Kansas City, he sees reference points, reminders of experiences which have shown him that God loves His children, and that his power is available to them.

Some people, of course, refer throughout their entire lives to one particular experience which they have had. At times when they feel rather "low" in their loyalties to the church, they testify that they would just give it all up except that this one experience cannot be explained away. Many other people, of course, refer to no particularly miraculous experience; but according to scriptural promise, they have continued to grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. In that growth their convictions have become stronger and stronger that they are walking the way God wants them to walk.

God in his wisdom has seen the value to humanity of having some particular point of reference to which every man can return to strengthen him in times of temptation and weakness. In answer to this need which he found in lost mankind, God has set in the church the ordinance of baptism that every man might have this common experience. Many people who have grown temporarily cold to the church would have left it entirely had it not been for the fact that in baptism they had this point to which they almost automatically referred, perhaps sometimes even unconsciously, as they have considered discontinuing their membership in the church and their striving toward the kingdom. Sensing this need and providing the ordinance of baptism is but another mark of the way in which God has provided in the church ordinances and ceremonies which have functional value.

ANOTHER NEED of man, if he is to be saved, is that he shall be clean. "Cleanliness is next to godliness." If you represent God by a circle, erroneous as it is to feel that he can be encircled, then the next circle surrounding him should be labeled the land of cleanliness. There is no way to approach him except through the land of cleanliness. God, in his infinite understanding of man and his needs, recognized that if man were to be saved, he must come to God clean; he must be free of evil. He must have his sins remitted. How then could he best symbolize this? How could he best show that the way to God was the way of clean living? The answer to these questions is readily found in the ordinance of baptism. Here is symbolized the "washing away" of our sins. It is perfectly natural that the average Latter Day Saint should say, in answer to the question, "Why baptism?" that baptism is for the remission of sin. This is not just because Peter said, "Repent and be baptized every one of you for the remission of sin," but because man moves toward God in the process of salvation, and the approach to God cannot be made in sin. To live with God, one must be clean in body and mind. How magnificent of God to provide a ceremony by which this could be symbolized and by which every member of the church can be reminded in this symbol each time a new candidate is brought into the fellowship.

MAN NEEDS to see progress. All men are subject to discouragement and have a tendency to give up and accept failure. This tendency is diminished if, at the times when a man pauses to take stock of his situation, he is able to see by looking back that certain milestones have been passed. The way of salvation is the way of continual repentance; that is, a way of continually improving upon that which was accepted as the standards of yesterday. Seeing that man needs not only a reference point but a certain milestone occasionally, God has provided baptism as an ordinance by which he might well measure his progress. Every man who has sincerely accepted baptism, discouraged though he may become later on, can always look back and find encouragement from the fact that his situation in relationship to God and salvation is so much better now than it was before he submitted to the will of the heavenly Father in baptism.

WE LIKE TO BE CLEAR in our relationships with others. There is a certain healthiness about a situation in which one brother can say of another, "I like that man. He never leaves me in doubt as to where he stands." Of course, the matter of stating one's own position can be carried too far and violate the principles of diplomacy and kindness; but there is a basic need in man that urges him to have a definite understanding of all relationships which can be made definite. For example, it helps a member of the church if he knows whether or not the man to whom he is talking is a member of the church. He needs to have delineation made between those who are with him and those who are yet to be won. He feels more secure in knowing just what the situation is. Not knowing leaves him insecure, unsure, and ineffective.

Similarly, the unknown makes for inefficiency in the organization of the church, which has been called to the task of assisting our heavenly Father in bringing salvation to mankind. God sensed that it would be helpful in the process of salvation if there were some means by which man could distinguish between those who are with him and those who are against him. He recognized that if man knows the size of the army with which he is marching, he will march with more confidence. If he knows the number of witnesses who are bearing the same testimony that he is bearing, he will carry his testimony with more assurance. If he realizes in how many places the flag of Jesus has been flown, he will unfurl his flag and show his true colors with greater pride and alacrity. Therefore, in the process of salvation, God arranged for delineation to be made between the army of the Lord and the multitudes of those yet unenlisted. For efficiency in his organization, and for increasing the assurance and security of the various individuals within the organization, God provided baptism, which would definitely distinguish between those who have enlisted and those who are either knowingly or unknowingly lost.

Baptism is so distinctive that there can be no question as to a man's position. He is either a baptized person, or he is not. There is no such thing as "being on the fence" with regard to one's position in the army of the Lord, regardless of the fact that many people who once enlisted have since deserted. Deserters are still members of the army. Records should be brought up to date to designate that the desertion has taken place and to insure against overestimation of our active forces. Deserters should be, as far as possible, returned to active duty. It is difficult to imagine any ordinance or ceremony which might better perform the function of identifying those who are members of the church and working toward salvation, as against those who are not yet enlisted in the cause of the kingdom.

Man also is ministered to by being able to associate with power. It is said that when the soldiers and marines were provided with good weapons their morale lifted appreciably. The "lift" that a man gets when he drives a big truck or pilots a great airplane, or drives a powerful locomotive is commonly recognized but rarely explained. It seems that there is something about man which makes him feel good when he has at his disposal a great amount of power.

In God's efforts to save man, he has provided that when man becomes baptized, he becomes eligible for the power of God to rest in him in a way that was not possible before. What an effective method for God to appeal to man! What an astute measurement of human responses! How wisely God has provided in the church those things which will cause men to move toward him; yet he has avoided destroying man's agency, for without it, man could never reach the heights!

THE CHURCH has recognized that man also needs drama in order to learn rapidly and to retain well. This has been demonstrated in our considerably increased use of visual aids. But God recognized the need for drama first and made provision to meet this need. For all our talk about blackboards and cameras and projectors and flannelgraphs and other good audio-visual aids, the one best visual aid of all is a well-planned baptismal service. How can you surpass it? Here is a dramatic symbol which causes one to understand the value of the completeness of commitment. One is entirely immersed when he is baptized. There are also the symbols of planting and growth and yield; the symbol of death and burial, rising from the grave to a new life; the symbol of washing, demonstrating the recognition of man's need to be clean if he is to be saved; and the symbol of rebirth, by which it becomes more clear to man that one step in salvation is the coming forth from darkness into light as we are born into the kingdom of God and thus place ourselves in a position by which we might "see the kingdom."

Man also needs a supporting social situation if he is to be saved. This is probably not always an essential from an individual standpoint, but God recognizes that where commitments are made in the presence of others, one's desire to appear well will cause him to follow through on such commitment. Again, how wisely our heavenly Father has arranged the ceremony of baptism that it might be performed in the presence of the membership that here in a social situation one makes his commitment, so that should he ever be tempted to turn away, he will feel the helpfulness of all those who witnessed his immersion and will thus be in a position to accept the fellowship and supporting assistance of his brethren.

ANOTHER COMMON REQUIREMENT on the part of humanity is that men shall have objectives within the range of their comprehension. It is a mark of the apostasy that men turned from the hope of building the kingdom of God on earth and directed their attention toward qualifying for a life with God hereafter. Perhaps both are worthy objectives, but man is a creature who will work harder for goals which he feels are within his range. As he progresses further, more distant goals become visible to him; but if only these goals were shown to him at first, he would feel that they were so far away that their challenge would be lost to him.

Man responds first to those things which are nearest him. Proximity of goals is a factor in success. As we recognize this, it becomes obvious that God was wise in selecting baptism as the means by which men should register their enlistment in the army which is to build Zion. Every time a member who has a vision of Zion observes a new member taking his place by his side, he feels that his comprehensible and attainable goal is that much closer. The baptism of new members and the building of Zion go hand in hand. God is wise enough to have planned the gospel way, which includes objectives within the range of our vision, as well as the seemingly more distant objectives of salvation, knowing that a spur to greater progress would be found each time a new member is enlisted in the task of achieving these goals.

THE GOLDEN THREAD

A study of the subject of baptism and church membership seems logically to fall under three heads, especially if the study begins with the scriptural approach. These three heads are as follows: (1) symbolism, (2) covenant (contract), (3) rewards. Every Latter Day Saint should be able, by beginning with these three words, to discuss with increasing understanding the basic philosophy of his own church. When the concepts caught up in the meaning and ramifications of these words are placed against the background of man's relationship with his Creator, all aspects of individual and church life seem to fit into place.

Throughout the whole story of human history is the golden thread of truth that God loves his creation. Long we have thought we understood this. Often we have repeated it. But we have yet to appreciate it. To think we understand, or to repeat a platitude is far short of making an application to life.

Every Latter Day Saint should spend a great deal more time in following the thread of God's love as it is woven through human events. He must follow it through the history of nations, but more important still, trace it through the days of his personal past. Some day there will dawn upon the consciousness of each person who seek diligently, the overwhelming conviction that God loves him. Then he will no longer answer in generalities and stock phrases when asked the question, "What did Jesus do for you?" Testimony will be eager and fellowship rich.

The hope of the kingdom lies in a people who will find this golden thread in their own lives, and who, upon finding it, will respond. Church membership, to such persons, will be a high privilege, and baptism will be a door at which hundreds of ushers are busy.

this world's goods and generous, was not of the gifts she bestowed upon the children but of the welcoming arms which drew the young ones to her ample bosom for comfort and protection.

OTHER MEMORIES expressed by my friends of their mothers have taken the form of statements like these: "The thing I remember about mother was her outstanding buoyancy, hope, and courage in face of hardships and poor health." "The twilight visits on our front porch are the most satisfying experiences of my life. Her good judgment, her sane balance and calmness—developed through many hard and trying years—have always been an inspiration to me." "My memory of my mother is that she expected us children to undertake any necessary task, to do it the best we could, and then if it proved beyond our ability, to ask for help. She gave us faith to carry on." "I remember mother's devotion to her church in all circumstances, under stress or hardship or otherwise." "My memory of my mother is of the sincerity of her hospitality and her love and devotion to the church." "I shall always remember mother for her quiet, humorous courage based on her deep and abiding faith."

These memories testify to the effective and lasting values which real mothers give to their children. There is no question that these are of more importance than rubies. Looking at these women through the eyes and memories of their daughters, one sees the imprint of their lives. What an opportunity is offered to latter day mothers—to the mothers in Israel! The mothers of the past have done a good work, but the present mothers should be stimulated to do an unsurpassingly fine job with their children. Because of their educational advantage and their increasing conviction of the necessity for a society where love will abound, they should rear their children well.

We honor many women who have nobly fulfilled their role as mothers. We think of the church school teacher who brings Jesus and his church closer to her class; of the good women whose homes are opened to young people and whose lives are an example and inspiration; of those who are willing to lead youth groups, who counsel and advise and plan for them; and of the many good women who have worked for the betterment of society in their "Hull Houses."

To these courageous and devoted women, we bring garlands of homage and honor them for their good works. We pray that this day may be fruitful, making a better world because more women have caught the vision of their great task and privilege and will continue to strive to be worthy of the praise given them on Mother's Day.

Invading the Home — By VIDA M. FLETCHER

IT WAS SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO that Dr. Dio Lewis gave a lecture before a group of Hillsboro, Ohio, citizens. At that time, the drink bill of the nation was six hundred million dollars annually. Ruin and suffering were brought to millions of people because of the liquor traffic. The liquor dealers were so protected by law, sheltered in politics, and sustained by the government that they dictated to statesmen, controlled legislatures, and defied public sentiment. Temperance was not popular.

In those days, only the men drank alcoholic beverages, and untold thousands of mothers and wives saw sons and husbands become drunkards and homes become hovels. The women were helpless. If they voiced their suffering or ventured a protest in saloon or court, the liquor interests howled them down with "unwomanly," or "fanatical dry," or "go home, old woman, and darn your stockings." The world joined in the laugh of scorn. Many of those women did stay home till their homes were gone, and mended garments till there were no garments to mend.

Then Dr. Lewis came with his message of light and challenged those citizens of Ohio. He told the wives and mothers of drinking men to "take up the work of temperance reform," and "in a spirit of Christian love" persuade the saloonkeepers, "for the sake of humanity and their own eternal welfare," to quit the soul-destroying business of selling alcoholic drinks.

SCORES OF WOMEN volunteered to help, and good men pledged themselves to encourage and sustain the women in their work. The next morning, another solemn assembly gathered at the church. A strange work was to be done and by unaccustomed hands. A leader was elected, a prayer was offered by a woman who had never before voiced a prayer audibly. This band of Christian women set themselves to the mighty task of ridding their town of saloons through prayer and pleading.

A plan of work was adopted—the crusade movement was organized. Prayer and action were blended into one mounting song of Christian service as delicately nurtured women in pairs or small groups marched boldly into saloons and on into the back rooms and preached to the "spirits in prison" there. Facing the saloonkeepers in the midst of their deadly work, they entreated them in God's name to give up their business and seek pardon and salvation in Christ.

Jeers, mockery, laughter, and injunctions sought to discourage and forbid the women to sing and pray in public places. But God walked with those consecrated crusaders, and under their barrage of prayer, saloon after saloon closed its doors. Like a prairie fire, the crusade gained momentum, and women all over the land joined the movement. Temperance leagues sprang up wherever Christian women caught the vision of a liquor-free people. Within fifty days, nearly two thousand five hundred saloons were closed.

THUS BEGAN the women's work for temperance in our land. The crusade movement later merged into an educational and spiritual organization under the consecrated leadership of Frances E. Willard. The work has had its ups and downs in the years intervening. A brief period of fourteen years was experienced when the liquor traffic was legally banned. No liquor advertising existed during that period, and more of the nation's income was devoted to its homes and children than ever before or since. Less crime and poverty existed during those years.

Then the forces of evil prevailed, and again the traffic was legalized. Today we have the blighting effect of the liquor traffic controlling state and national legislatures, dominating national issues, and defying public sentiment. Seventy-five years ago, the national drink bill was a mere pittance compared to the $9,640,000 of 1948.

The lone weapon of our crusade mothers was prayer. They did not have the ballot. They did not have the strength of organized Christian temperance forces. Today we have all of these at our command. It behooves the Christian forces of America to avail themselves of every method of attack against this traffic. Shall we be less prayerful, less courageous, less militant in our warfare against the saloon than our crusade mothers?

One of the major efforts of the liquor interests this year will be a more intensified advertising campaign than ever before. Last year, a publisher of three popular magazines carried 810 pages of liquor ads and received an estimated $8,000,000 revenue for it. Let us not be deceived by these enticing pages or their radio and motion picture equivalents. They are paid for with the single purpose of making us accept alcoholic beverages as a necessity. The profit is considerable. One company last year declared nearly $30,000,000 in profits.

THE EARLY CRUSADE MOVEMENT had for its aim the protection of the home. The liquor traffic was making inroads into family life. Sons and fathers were becoming victims of drink, bringing sorrow to wives and mothers. Today the saloon is extending its tentacles into the home in even a more deadly way. Mothers and daughters are being ensnared by the modern saloon. Many daily newspapers feature full-page, illustrated stories pertaining to girls and young mothers frequenting taverns. Notice this from the Chicago Herald American:

Day after day, night after night, in every large city of the land, women are brought into police stations, staggering, incoherent, drunk, and the records tell the same sordid story: arrested in a bar—too drunk to walk—investigators report home and children neglected. The female bar fly is rapidly becoming one of the nations major crime problems. Four out of ten alcoholics are women, and the number is increasing fast.

As Christians, we must continue to crusade for sobriety in behalf of youth and of the American home, through prayer, organization, education, and legislation. Every woman who is a member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is defending her home and family against the liquor traffic. Young people active in the Youth's Temperance Council and children in the Loyal Temperance Legion are pledged to total abstinence from alcoholic drinks and to the better life. They are strengthening our national bulwark at a time when America needs youth at its best. We would hasten the day when our flag will be cleansed from the stain of the legal liquor traffic and shelter only those enterprises which help to make men fine and noble.

Liquor Shops and Barber Shops

The liquor people say: "Wipe out the abuse, not the use. There are bad barber shops, filthy, dangerous barber shops, but you don't favor destroying the barber business."

Did you ever see a man go into a barber shop and have three shaves and two haircuts, and then treat the house to a shampoo? Did you ever hear of any poor woman knocking at the door of her pastor to say: "Dr. Smith, for goodness' sake help me to get John out of the barber shop. He's already had five face massages and his hair singed, and when he comes home, he'll break up all the furniture and may-be kill the children."—The Methodist Clip Sheet.

Apostles at UNESCO Conference

APOSTLES CHARLES HIELD and Percy Farrow attended the Second National Conference in the United States of the United Nations Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization, better known as UNESCO, on March 31, April 1, and April 2 in Cleveland, Ohio. They were representing our church among the 3,000 delegates of all kinds of worthy organizations present. The purpose of the organization is to lay the mental foundation for peace. The organization asserts that war starts in the mind of man, and peace must also have its foundations there. It stands for freedom of speech, movement, and employment, with emphasis upon the sacredness of personality.

UNESCO is a world organization, one of eight special organizations which are a part of the over forty United Nations. In the United States, Congress, under the Department of State, set up a national commission to further the aims of UNESCO. The commission is constituted of 100 individuals representing all varieties of civic, religious, labor, and philanthropic organizations. In the United States, Milton Eisenhower, President of Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science, is the chairman of the United States National Commission for UNESCO.

Brothers Hield and Farrow heard two major addresses, one by Jaime Torres Bodet, Director General of the world organization and one by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt who helped draw up the "Universal Declaration of Human Rights," which is the Bill of Rights of the organization. On one evening the "Symphony of Freedom," arranged by Howard Hanson and presented by the Cleveland Orchestra, Dr. Hanson, conducting, was presented for the conference—"A magnificent work," states Apostle Hield.

Among the active works the organization sponsors are: the rehabilitating of libraries in war-torn countries; arranging for university student exchanges among the nations; international work camps for youth to help rebuild ruined cities; giving aid to cities and universities through the means of supplying books, playground and scientific equipment, and other cultural needs.

Apostle Hield expressed the hope that the members of our church throughout the world will co-operate and take part in local UNESCO councils. The organization of UNESCO councils is entirely voluntary. It is to be the spontaneous organization in other established organizations. There should be state, county, and city organizations. One suggestion of the organization is for communities to adopt communities abroad and try to supply educational, cultural, and social needs insofar as possible.

Those interested in the organization may write to the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C., and ask for the price list of UNESCO publications, including films. By all means ask for a copy of "UNESCO and You," price 15c.

Worship Suggestions for June

Theme for the Month: ZION, THE BEAUTIFUL

JUNE 5, 1949

Theme: ZIONIC HOMES ARE BEAUTIFUL

Instrumental Prelude: "Onward to Zion," Saints' Hymnal, No. 436.

Call to Worship:

Give unto the Lord, O ye mighty, give unto the Lord glory and strength.

Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name; worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness.—Psalm 29: 1, 2.

Hymn of Praise: "We're Marching to Zion," Saints' Hymnal, No. 5, stanzas 1, 2, 3.

(Remain standing for prayer.)

Scripture Reading:

Zion must increase in beauty, and in holiness; her borders must be enlarged; her stakes must be strengthened; yea, verily I say unto you, Zion must arise and put on her beautiful garments.—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 4.

Prayer:

Of thanks for the Zionics ideals we have; asking God to help us have a greater desire to beautify our home life.

Prayer Response:

Zion, Zion, lovely Zion,
Beautiful Zion, city of our God.
—Chorus of Saints Hymnal, No. 353.

Talk:

The Psalmist speaks of Zion as the perfection of beauty. Surely, then, Zionics homes must seek this perfect beauty. First of all, they must be beautifully clean. Cleanliness is not next to godliness; it is a part of godliness. Next, Zionics homes must be beautiful in spirit. Just as the Spirit of God illumines and beautifies the face of one who lives God's word, so the Spirit of God illumines and beautifies the Zionics home. The Lord has said that Zion must put on her beautiful garments, and he has also named the mantle which each Zionics home-builder must wear in striving for perfection.

Scriptural Challenge:

See that ye love one another . . . and above all clothe yourselves with the bonds of charity, as with a mantle, which is the bond of perfectness and peace.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 38.

And charity suffereth long, and is kind, and envieth not, and is not puffed up, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, and rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth, beareth all things; wherefore, my beloved brethren, if ye have not charity, ye are nothing, for charity never faileth. Wherefore, cleave unto charity, . . . charity is the pure love of Christ, and it endureth forever . . . pray unto the Father with all the energy of heart, that ye may be filled with this love which he hath bestowed upon all who are true followers of his Son Jesus Christ, that ye may become the sons of God, that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is, that we may have this hope, that we may be purified even as he is pure.—Moroni 7: 51-53.

Hymn: "Lord of All," Saints' Hymnal, No. 18, stanzas 1 and 4.

A Home Prayer:

I do not wish a spacious home
With glitt'ring knobs and shining dome,
But just a simple, little place,
O Lord, and may it ever face
Thy twilight beauty in the west!
I know I must be careful, lest
I ask too much, but if you will
But send your love its rooms to fill,
No furnishings can dare seem poor
With warmth of true love to allure;
This little home will do us well
If 'tis a place where Christ may dwell.

Meditation Music: "O Master, Let Me Walk With Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 213.

Prayer:

Of thanks for the Scripture we have concerning Zion and asking God's blessing as we seek for his mantle of love in beautifying our homes for him.

Instrumental Response: (Softly) "Zion, Zion," Saints Hymnal, No. 353.

A Thought:

Beautiful homes are those that weave Christ in the pattern of work and play, Striving toward Zion's goal, day by day.

JUNE 12, 1949

(Children's Day)

Theme: ZIONIC HOMES ARE HAPPY

Instrumental Prelude: "Holy, Holy, Holy Is the Lord," Saints' Hymnal, No. 7.

Call to Worship:

Praise ye the Lord. Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints. Let Israel rejoice in him that made him; let the children of Zion be joyful in their King.—Psalm 149: 1, 2.

Hymn: "With happy voices singing," Saints' Hymnal, No. 37.

Silent Meditation: (seated) While the chorus of No. 353 is softly played, pray that as we worship we may sense a greater desire to build happy homes.

Poem:

THE ROAD TO HAPPINESS

'Tis only just a little road,
The road that leads To happiness. It's made of faith
And kindly deeds,

By CAMILLA COLLINS

Of pleasantness, of words that bless,
Of thoughts that heal;
Of very silent giving up
For others' weal.

—Mary Carolyn Davies.

Talk:

Jesus found this road to happiness. His entire ministry was spent in giving that others might be happy. Let us look at Jesus on one of his journeys with his Twelve. On their way to his last Passover, Jesus healed the ten lepers. He paused by the Jordan River to teach the people who crowded around him. He blessed all of their little children; he gave counsel to the rich young ruler and heeded the cry of blind Bartimeus; he called Zaccheus, who was a sinner, to come down from the tree and dine with him, thus changing the whole course of his life. Throughout the journey, he spoke in parables to his disciples and these parables were recorded for us. Then at the end of the journey he cleansed the temple, impressing upon all generations that God's house must be a house of prayer.

Throughout our Three Standard Books there are many passages pointing the way to Zionics living; but Jesus has summarized for us the way to build happy homes. No doubt he learned these things in his own home, and the children of today may practice what Jesus did.

Challenge for Zionics Living:

Doctrine and Covenants 85: 38. (Listen for the promise Jesus gives if we do these things.)

Special Music: "Oh, to Be More Like Jesus," Zion's Praises, No. 128.

Prayer:

Of thanks for the desire to build happy homes; for the pattern given us by Jesus; asking God's help in reaching our goal; praying that the children may do their part in following the pattern of Jesus; that we may all be kind, loving and helpful to others.

Solo (Congregation join in chorus): "Loving Each Other," Zion's Praises, No. 83.

CHORUS:

Loving each other,
How pleasant to cherish a brother;
Serving each other,
The Savior looks on us with joy.

JUNE 19, 1949

Theme: ZIONIC HOMES ARE RIGHTEOUS (Father's Day—Attention may be directed to the place of the fathers as heads of Zionic homes.)

Instrumental Prelude: "Trust and Obey," Zion's Praises, No. 4.

Call to Worship: Psalm 24 or 15.

(The answer to the question may be read from the rear of the room or from the choir loft.)

Hymn: "Oh, May It Ever Guide Our Feet in Ways of Righteousness," Saints' Hymnal, No. 102.

Scripture in Unison: (Or may be read by a father) "The Lord is my shepherd."—Psalm 23.

Prayer:

Of thanks for Jesus who has shown us how to find the path of righteousness, praying that each home builder might sense a greater desire to build a righteous home, recognizing especially the father's place and responsibility in the home.

Instrumental response: (softly) "We Will Follow None But Jesus," chorus only, Saints Hymnal, No. 361.

Talk:

Jesus said, "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled," and again, "Let Zion rejoice, for this is Zion, the pure in heart."—Doctrine and Covenants 94: 5.

Righteousness means purity of morals. How, then, can we build a morally pure or righteous home?

We must prayerfully seek God's help.

We must daily search the Scriptures to know the right way.

We must have the co-operation of each member of the family.

Jesus said, "Learn of me, and listen to my words; walk in the meekness of my spirit and you shall have peace in me."—Doctrine and Covenants 18: 2 b. Peace is the reward of righteousness.

Scripture Reading:

The law of the Lord is perfect.—Psalm 19: 7-10.

Hymn of Challenge: (special) "The Scriptures," Zion's Praises, No. 178.

Prayer:

Of thanks for the word of God, for the Three Books which we have containing the fullness of the gospel law; asking God to bless us with his Spirit as we seek to study and to teach his law to our children in building righteous homes.

Promise to the Righteous:

Doctrine and Covenants 76: 1, 2, followed by 45: 14: "And it shall come to pass that the righteous shall be gathered out from among all nations, and shall come to Zion singing with songs of everlasting joy."

Closing Hymn: "Oh, Happy Is the Man Who Hears Instruction's Warning Voice," Saints' Hymnal, No. 93, stanzas 1 and 2.

JUNE 26, 1949

Theme: ZIONIC HOMES ARE STABLE
Instrumental Prelude: "Onward to Zion," Saints' Hymnal, No. 436.

Call to Worship:

The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble; he sitteth between the cherubim; let the earth be moved. The Lord is great in Zion and he is high above all the people.—Psalm 99: 1, 2.

When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory.—Psalm 102: 16.

Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at his footstool; for he is holy.—Psalm 99: 5.

Instrumental Solo: "Oh, Worship the King," Saints' Hymnal, No. 9.

Prayer:

Of thanks for the desire we have to worship together, praying that as we worship we might become more Zion-minded.

Hymn: "We're Marching to Zion," Saints' Hymnal, No. 5, stanzas 1 and 4

Scripture Reading:

Doctrine and Covenants 36: 3, followed by Genesis 9: 18-23 (Inspired Version).

Talk:

Jesus said Zion would be his abode forever. Zion, then, has permanence or stability, and Zionic homes must have this quality, too. To be stable, the Zionic home must have both an immediate and a far-reaching purpose.

The immediate: to live Christlike lives.

The ultimate: to prepare for Christ's coming to dwell with us. To attain to these goals, a stable home must be beautiful, happy, and righteous. Underlying all these things, the Zionic home must continually have the spirit of repentance. Jesus warned, "Preach naught but repentance" (Doctrine and Covenants 18: 2). Surely, then, we must teach repentance and cultivate its spirit, if we build homes that please our Master.

Special Music: (Tune, Saints' Hymnal, No. 10, "Praise Him, Praise Him.")

1. Zion, Zion! We must build homes now for Zion!

Happy, stable, beautiful, righteous, too! Zion, Zion! We must all walk with our Master;

Learning, praying, as he would have us do. Like a shepherd, Jesus will guard his children,

In his arms he carries them all day long.

CHORUS

Zion, Zion; Oh, how we long for our Zion! Zion, Zion! Meeting the heavenly throng.

2. Jesus! Jesus! We'll build thy Zion so gladly. Loving, giving for ev'ry needy soul.

Jesus, Jesus! We will forgive one another; Striving, daily for our dear Zion's goal.

Thou art coming, over the world victorious, Power and glory unto thee, Lord, belong.

Challenge: Doctrine and Covenants 108: 5: "Hearken and hear, O ye inhabitants of the earth," etc.

Closing Hymn: "Onward to Zion," Saints Hymnal, No. 436, stanza 2.

Mother Checks Up on Herself - By Stella Omohundro

WITH SO MUCH ATTENTION—good, bad, and commercial—centered on mother this month, she may sometimes ask herself, “Am I really that good?” If she is honest, she may go even further; she may sit down quietly and evaluate her attitude and efforts as a mother.

Women are often accused of being extremists. I fear there is some truth in this accusation. And nowhere does it show up in worse light than in the role of motherhood.

Take the physical aspects of rearing children—that is the first responsibility that occurs. There is the expectant mother who takes to her bed so she won’t overdo. She refuses normal companionship, treats herself as an invalid, and talks constantly about her pills. Her muscles are not in shape for the ordeal ahead; neither is her mind.

At the other extreme is the woman who says that childbirth is a perfectly normal phenomenon, disregards her doctor’s advice about a specialized diet, forgets her extra quota of vitamins and minerals, and blithely eats everything that comes her way because she is clinging to the notion of “eating for two.”

NEITHER OF THESE has a happy time at the birth process, nor do they afterward. The one pokes a thermometer at her babe every time it cries. The other lets her child cry endlessly, saying, “It is normal for a baby to cry. That’s the way he develops his lungs.” She also maintains that it’s a good idea to let a youngster have all the childhood diseases as they come so he’ll be over with them. The other says, “We must prevent illness at any cost.” And in her child’s preschool years, she shoos all the neighborhood children away from him, and refuses to take him to kindergarten at the church for fear he might be contaminated.

The children of these two

MAY

When gay little baskets are hung, doorbells ring, small feet scamper, and finally excited childish laughter fills the air as tiny tots are caught and kissed—the merry month of May is here. Let no child be deprived of the joy of hanging May baskets.

Following closely is Mother’s Day—as if one day could be more a mother’s day than any other. Anna Jarvis in 1907 started the movement to set aside a day “in honor of the best mother that ever lived—your mother.” In spite of commercialization, the thought remains in its original purity. However, to most mothers its meaning is twofold. How many in accepting the honor and tribute accorded them on this, their day, are not at the same time bowed in humility over the privilege of being a mother?

It is fitting that in a month filled with happiness we should pause and honor those who have gone before, particularly those who have given their all that we might have this peace and happiness. May we this memorial season rededicate ourselves to finishing their task.

May is a lovely month. Mother nature dons her freshest and prettiest attire. Poets wax eloquent. But what do they mean when they sing, “Oh, that we two were Maying”? If in March they sang, “Oh, that we two were Marching,” that would be understandable. A glance over the month reveals that for the housewife there is much to be done—the garden, the yard, the house, last minute sewing, and graduation. Should one do them all at the same time or one by one? Could this be what the poets mean by “maying”? If so, “We two will be maying.”

mother-types are handicapped from the start. The most tragic part is that unless someone gives the mothers a jolt, the handicap grows and grows.

The overanxious mother reads everything written regarding child development, frequently ignoring the original intent of the author, and tries to fit her child into a set pattern. The lax mother says, “Most of these things were written by men. What do they know about being a mother?”

The wise mother does not try to stumble along alone, where many have walked before, but seeks advice from her physician, specialists in child development, and leaders in her church. She soon develops some judgment herself and, with the aid of her common sense, acquires sane attitudes knowing that the problems arising with her child are not altogether unique but may be met sensibly.

The first type is jealous of her child, excluding other relatives to whom he may become attached, sometimes even the father. While the other extremist shoves the father into the role of strict disciplinarian. “Let father share his responsibility,” she says, and when problems arise, “Wait till I tell your father when he comes home.”

A GROUP OF MOTHERS were discussing their children the other day as women frequently do. The mother of a nine-year old girl broke in with her solution to a behavior problem, “So long as Sally is under my jurisdiction, she does what I say with no questions asked.” What that mother doesn’t know is that her daughter is already lying to her as to her own solution to situations. Children learn very early from their parent’s attitudes what they may expect.

It is the children of the extremists who are well on the way to becoming "juvenile delinquents." The child of parents who believe in letting him have his own way about everything is little better off than the one reared by the "do as I say, I'm older than you" school of thought.

In each case the parents will have lost their best chance of gaining an understanding with their children when they reach adolescence. They would be horrified if you classed them as delinquent parents. Didn't they provide their children with good homes, good food, and "all the advantages"?

Yes, the child was reared to expect that he could have anything he wanted just for the asking. And what a shock when he learned that he had to earn the respect and good will of his contemporaries.

The mother of an adolescent girl recently confessed: "In this confused and troubled world, I'm inclined to teach Sylvia there is no hope for a better life. . . . That will make her face reality better than feeding her on fairy tales."

This particular mother has not even made an attempt to teach the rudiments of a religious faith.

Fortunately there are few extremists on the other side today who force little children to sit through long church services beyond their understanding and create an early resistance to all matters connected with the church.

IT IS A WISE MOTHER who early shares the joys and responsibilities of parenthood with the father and realizes the partnership with God in the directing of a human life. She is wise, too, who tries to understand her child's particular talents and temperaments and, with the counsel of specialists, seeks gently to draw out her child, teaching him to choose and select so far as he is able. She teaches him to walk by himself, certain of loving care when he needs it.

It is something for which we can all try, for we shall need a more able generation than we are—not one that is uncertain of its own abilities.

THE EASTER MOMENT," by Margaret Lee Runbeck in the April Good Housekeeping is a moving, inspirational article that will not be seasonal only, despite the title. As the author says, "The Easter Moment" will come for us in every travail.

If you are one of the many women who would like to acquire the knack of making perfect meringue, try the method described in "Susan Makes Meringue" also in the April Good Housekeeping.

Gustav Hazen, a successful architect, gives some sound advice to parents in "Your Boy Should Learn a Trade," in the April Parents' Magazine.

If you are an expectant mother, be sure to read "Eight Reasons Why You Should Nurse Your Baby," by Alice Von Briesen, in the April Parents' Magazine. In view of the tendency of most people, even many doctors, to encourage artificial feeding, this is a reminder that nature provides a better way.

"Pioneers Next Door," by William Drake in the April American Magazine may give you a mental "jolt"—perhaps you've been like the neighbors of the Caparellis sometime. You'll enjoy reading this account of actual events that illustrate the meaning of true democracy.

"Good News For the RH Negative," by J. D. Ratcliff in the April Woman's Home Companion is of general interest and describes a newly-developed treatment for this condition.

"Condemned to Neglect," by Patricia Lockridge, also in the April Woman's Home Companion, will open your eyes to conditions in our schools concerning health examinations.

"Quick Clean-Up," still another feature in the April Woman's Home Companion, may help you with your house cleaning.

"Elizabeth and the Beautiful

Life," by Duncan Norton-Taylor in the April McCall's Magazine is a thought-provoking discussion of labor legislation which affects all of us.

For downright enjoyment, relax with "Cheaper by the Dozen," a book condensation in the April Reader's Digest, by Frank Gilbreath and Ernestine Carey. You'll find chuckles, tears, and ideas.

Spring Prayer

I thank thee, Father, for the spring
When things begin to grow,
Which seemed so lifeless buried there
Beneath the winter's snow.

Thy cleansing power shows in spring.
What else could make things new?
Pray help me cast dead works aside,
And cleanse me, Father, too.

According to the Rules - By STEPHEN BLACK

AS A BOY, I got into many arguments because of the rules of the game. In baseball and football it was always disturbing to me when some of the fellows didn't know the rules. They were not interested in learning them and would not play if they applied against their interests. I have seen boys break up a good ball game simply because they couldn't have their way. And I have found that the same boys who wouldn't play the game fairly in youth have had difficulty playing the game of life according to the rules. They still want to pick up all the marbles and go home.

It is unfortunate when we fail to learn to play the game according to the rules in youth. Our civilization is very complex, and it takes a lot of co-operation to make it work. Therefore it is important that we learn the principle of teamwork—that we sacrifice our own personal glory for the glory of the team. As Paul says: "I have suffered the loss of all things and do count them as dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, [meaning man-made law] but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith." We lose ourselves in the baseball or football game for the good of the team. And what boy has not been proud to be the member of a team that plays and wins according to the rules? We also are happy who keep the laws of the community in which we live and keep the commandments of the Master whom we serve.

THE OTHER DAY I read in the paper about the last of the Barker boys and how he had met his death.

The story of this family was unusual, for not one of the boys learned to play the game according to the rules. Ma Barker thought her sons could do no wrong. When they picked up the marbles and went home or beat another boy over the head with a club because he didn't play the way they wanted him to, she said they death at the hands of the society whose game they would not play. Even their mother met death with a machine gun in her hands. This is an extreme case to be sure, but those who refuse to play according to the rules meet a similar fate, if not in this world, then in the day of eternal judgment.

Here Is the Writer

Stephen Black, a native of California, grew up and went to grammar and high school in Van Nuys, California. At school he was active in sports and dramatics, and served as student body president. He majored in drama at Los Angeles City College, leaving near the end of his second year for a career in the professional theater. He followed this career as a director and actor until 1939 when he became a member of the Reorganized Church.

His first church work was that of supervisor of the Brooklyn, New York, church school. He helped to organize the Newark, New Jersey, group—the only branch in that state—and make the first motion picture on church history. This was filmed at Deer Park, Pennsylvania, in the summer of 1940 as a project of the New York-Philadelphia District Zion's League. He has been a young people's leader and has directed many plays for church groups. He was called to the office of priest in the spring of 1946 and was ordained an elder in November of the same year. During the church year of 1947-48, he served as pastor of the Englewood congregation in Independence.

Now under general church appointment, he is associated with Evan Fry in the radio department. He is married to the former Lea Vail. They have three children: Michele, Lauren, and John Christopher.

were right and took their part. When these boys grew up, they hadn't learned to play according to the rules. Honest toil was for the other fellow, not for them; whatever they wanted, they took—they played the game of life just as they played games in their youth, and their mother still thought they were right. The result was that all died a violent

Those of us who have worked for large corporations know about company policy. Such companies over the years, through the experience of trial and error, have formulated a way of doing business which they call company policy. Many an ambitious young man has found that such policy cramps his style and has tried to break it. But almost without exception that person soon finds himself out of a job, and the company policy remains unchanged. However, the fellow who has learned to play the game according to the rules will find that it is not too difficult to go along with company policy, and, after he thoroughly understands it and knows why it is as it is, he may be able to make suggestions that will be adopted after proper procedure and in this way change the policy of the company. But in all walks of life, the man who has learned to play the game according to the rules will have less trouble getting along than a fellow who knows no rules except his own.

I saw a movie the other evening about three men who set out to find gold. They had agreed to certain principles or rules to govern their expedition. But after they found the gold, one of the men no longer wanted to abide by the rules—he wanted all the gold, and he wasn't above killing his best friend to get it. Consequently, the fellow who played the prospecting game according to his own rules lost everything, even his life. The other two who kept the rules lost the gold because of the selfishness of their friend, but found the contentment and happiness that each had hoped the gold would bring. It takes patience to play the game of life according to the rules. We find that it is easy to break them, and we usually think we can get away with it. But the criminal is always found out and brought to justice. It may take time, but time favors the right.

PART OF LEARNING to play according to the rules is learning the rules themselves. No boy playing baseball will concede that he is out when tagged if he does not know what constitutes an out. So it is with the game of life. We must know and understand the laws governing the game before we can be expected to keep them. But too many of us are willing to take someone else's word for the rules rather than to read the rule book. Many of us regard our religion the same way—we take some other person's word rather than investigate for ourselves. We should ask, "What were the principles or rules laid down by the Master?" and not be content until we know all of them. We must know the rules of the game of life before we can successfully live according to the rules.

If we can't learn to play according to the rules of the games in youth, we are apt to find life very difficult. The suicide says, "I won't play the game according to the rules of society," and kills himself. The worldly man says, "I won't play God's game; the rules are not fair." And he, too, commits a kind of suicide. But the man who has learned to play the game according to the rules finds that God's rules for the game of life are just and equitable, and he finds happiness and contentment in living according to those rules. If all Christians lived in harmony with the thoughts expressed by the Apostle Paul in his letter to the Philippians, God's kingdom would soon be a reality. "Whereunto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing."

I Learn of Christ Through Fellowship

World-wide Zion's League Project for May, June, July, and August—By the Zion's League Council

THE COMING SUMMER MONTHS for Zion's Leaguers should be a period of fine fellowship through activity in the special summer programs offered by the church. This year every League member is being urged to attend one or more of the summer church programs such as a reunion, youth camp, or retreat, as the Zion's Leagues swing into their next church-wide project.

Sometimes fellowship has been thought of as purely prayer and testimony. At other times we have thought of it as recreation and sociability. Neither viewpoint is altogether correct, for fellowship is a broad term—one that reflects total living. A League views its total program as fellowship—one which includes a balance of worship, recreation, study, and service. If learning of Christ is achieved through real fellowship, then to know, appreciate, and practice fellowship is a stewardship. Where better can this be experienced than in our reunions or similar gatherings of the church young people?

Here is what the League can do to help promote the participation of its Leaguers in one of the activities listed:

1. Make sure every Leaguer knows of the summer church activities available to him. It could be one or all of the following:
 - a. Reunion
 - b. Youth camp
 - c. Stake or district conference
 - d. Stake or district youth convention
 - e. Zion's League retreat
 - f. Church history excursion
 - g. Other stake or district activities.
2. See that each Leaguer is informed of the values to him in each of these activities, and that it is important for him to make every possible effort to take part in one of these.
3. Canvass your League to find out which of the available activities your Leaguers would most like and find possible to attend.
4. Set a League objective of the number and percentage of Leaguers who will try to attend one of the summer church activities.
5. Work with the pastor and parents to help assure the League's reaching its objective.
6. Plan one or two League meetings having on the program Leaguers who have been at reunion, youth camp, retreat, etc., and have them tell about it.

7. Raise funds to help deserving representatives attended selected summer activities.

1. Make every effort to attend at least one of the special summer activities.
2. Select the most suitable activity and make your summer plans early to include attendance there.
3. Save your money, register early, and get there.
4. Take an active part in every phase of the program from swimming to worship.
5. Be alert to ideas which will help you and your League when you return home.
6. Volunteer for any work from "KP duty" to offering prayer that will help make the activity a success. It will mean more work that way, but you will make friends and—believe it or not—have a much better time.

Here is what the camp or reunion leader can do:

1. See that every League is informed in advance of the special activities included for Leaguers in the summer program.
2. In camp or reunion, invite the Leaguers to participate by asking them to:
 - a. Plan and conduct worship services.
 - b. Be responsible for worship setting and worship materials.
 - c. Prepare special musical numbers for services.
 - d. Help keep the rooms and grounds clean and in order.
 - e. Help the book steward.
 - f. Select and complete work projects.
 - g. Keep the bulletin board.
 - h. Plan recreation activities.
 - i. Work on camp newspaper or other publication.
 - j. Assist in children's work.

These are just a few ways you and your League can enter into fellowship with the entire church this summer. There will be activities going on within your district; discover what they are and how you can participate. You will be blessed by it, and others will be blessed because of your fellowship with them.

Remember, at the end of the summer each League is to report on its success to its district or stake officers. Good camping and good fellowship!

BRIEFS

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—Easter Sunday attendance at the R. L. D. S. churches for the morning preaching services came to a total of 5,416. All the churches were full to capacity, with seats placed in the aisles in many. Broken down, the figures read: Stone Church, 2,173; Walnut Park, 679; Englewood, 460; Spring Branch, 283; Enoch Hill, 258; Liberty Street, 247; Second, 237; South Chrysler, 206; Mount Washington, 190; East Independence, 172; Eden Heights, 159; Slover Park, 157; Gudgell Park, 130; Sugar Creek, 65.

The pre-Easter week services held nightly in twelve congregations were well attended. A large degree of the Spirit of God attended each service.

The third six-weeks series of Aaronic priesthood classes began April 18, Tuesday. The topic for study during this period is "Ministry in the Home." Instructors include: Fred Epperson, L. W. Kohlman, Sanford Downs, A. K. Dillee, O. L. Athey, Howard Timm, and L. F. P. Curry. Other members of the staff include C. V. Graham, supervisor in Zion; Harold Cackler, representing the presiding bishopric, and F. M. McDowell, director of priesthood education in the church.

BLOOMSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.—The pastor of this group of some 125 members received honor in the house-publication, The Magic Carpet, of the rug manufacturing concern for which he works in Bloomsburg. The title of the little article was "Walter H. Lewis Is Highly Efficient Both as Preacher of Gospel and Worker." The picture of the smiling pastor was included with the article and many complimentary things were said concerning him. Quoting briefly from the article:

"It is interesting to note that Lewis, who is an Axminster inspector in the finishing department where he has worked for the better part of twenty-six years, became interested in church work when he was seventeen years old, and he has been active and zealous in church work from that day to the present. As presiding elder, he receives no pay—nor desires any—for his religious work, to which he devoted many thousands of days or tens of thousands of hours here and in Philadelphia, Kansas City, Missouri, and Camden, New Jersey. He likes the work of the mill coupled with that of preaching and finds much of the happiness that everyone seeks in life. He is highly respected by his fellow workers, not only because of his church position, but because he has proved to be a fine sort of fellow who takes the bumps of life along with the good. He's 'regular' through and through."

Brother Lewis is a member of the Quarter Century Club in the plant where he works. "Dedicating his entire life to the spread of the gospel and ministering to the spiritual wants of his fellow men, Walter H. Lewis continues to hammer daily the ideals of Christianity in a strong and vigorous manner though his age is three score, plus five years. A presiding elder of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ, he has been an ordained man of God for the past twenty years."

OMAHA, NEBRASKA.—A nursery is being built and equipped in the basement of the parsonage, next to the Omaha church. Harry Jacobsen is directing the work, assisted by members of the parsonage committee and managerial board, as well as other interested volunteers. Bathroom facilities have been installed and an outside entrance is arranged in a convenient location. The project was completed for use at Easter.

DEATHS

ANDREW.—Isaac, son of George and Ann Andrew, was born September 19, 1872, in Moore Township, Lambton County, Ontario, and died at his home in Bridgen, Ontario, on January 30, 1949. He was married to Margaret Johnston on May 6, 1896; nine children were born. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1901 and was ordained an elder on March 18, 1907. He served as pastor of both Kimball and Windsor Branches as well as doing work in Chatham District.

Surviving are five daughters: Mrs. Nellie Hubbard of Blenheim, Ontario; Mrs. Janet Tye of Bridgen, Ontario; Mrs. Ethel Green of Toronto, Ontario; Mrs. Lillie Ecclestone of Kansas City, Missouri; and Mrs. Mabel McKeit of Independence, Missouri; three sons: William of Independence; Arthur of Windsor; and Leslie of Bridgen; two brothers: John Andrew of Colchester, Ontario, and George A. C. Andrew of Sarnia, Ontario; and one sister, Mrs. Fanny Watson of Wyoming, Ontario. A daughter, Marguerite Andrew, preceded him in death in 1927.

Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Kimball, Ontario. Elders Stanley Phillips and J. A. Pray officiating. Interment was in the Union Cemetery at Mooretown, Ontario.

SCHAAR.—Jane Seymour, was born December 31, 1893, in Ionia County, Michigan, and died April 1, 1949, at her home in Coleman, Michigan. She was married on November 17, 1910, to Roy Schaar; seven children were born to them. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since September 3, 1922.

She is survived by her husband, Roy, of Coleman; five daughters: Mrs. Carl Cotton, Mrs. Mildred Barber, and Mrs. Clayton Barber of Clare, Michigan; Mrs. Asa Wilson of Chester; and Mrs. Donald Worden of Pontiac, Michigan; two sons: Clarence of Coleman and Chester of the home; a sister, Mrs. Hanna Thrush of Alma, Michigan; three brothers: William Seymour of Edmore, Michigan; George of Oregon; and Emmit of Alma; and twelve grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Thurston Chapel, A. E. Burton officiating. Interment was in the Loomis Cemetery.

MORRISON.—Lula Elizabeth, daughter of William and Hattie Anderson, was born at Gallando, Iowa, on May 25, 1862, and died March 27, 1949. At the age of fifteen, she moved to California and on April 1, 1886, was married to Wallace Morrison at Oakland; two children were born to them. Both children preceded her in death. She was baptized on August 29, 1875, and for seventy-four years was a devoted worker in the church. For twenty-five years she served as director of religious education in her branch.

She is survived by her husband, Wallace; and a sister, Minnie. The funeral service was conducted by John W. Rushton.

PICKENS.—Alice H., died March 3, 1949, at her home in Independence, Missouri, at the age of seventy-eight. She had been bedfast for twenty months. Born in Johnson County, Tennessee, she first learned of the gospel from missionaries and was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church as a young girl. She was healed by administration of tuberculosis in her youth, and her faith was a shining example to those who knew her.

She is survived by her husband, S. E. Pickens, and a daughter, Mrs. Ernestine Wallace of the home; and a brother, Jesse Roberts, also of Independence. Two children, Osmer R. Pickens and Edna Earl Pickens, preceded her in death.

She was married to Robert Billingsley on May 6, 1903; one son was born to them. Until 1914, she ran a hat shop in Garden City, Missouri, then she moved to Independence and operated a shop there. She also taught hat-making at the Campus Shop. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since June 12, 1894.

Her only immediate survivor is her son, Glenn. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Glaude A. Smith and Donald V. Lents at the Henry Stahl Chapel in Independence. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

REEK.—Kate J., daughter of John W. and Hannah Bennett, was born February 11, 1876, in Holland, Michigan, and died at the Pauline Sterns Hospital in Ludington, Michigan, on February 26, 1949. She was married to Fred W. Reek on January 4, 1911. A member of the Reorganized Church since May 18, 1902, she served as a church school teacher and was district leader of the women's department for several years.

She is survived by her husband and one brother, John Bennett. Funeral services were held at the Fresnoil Reorganized Church, Elder Harry Doty officiating. Burial was in the Fountain cemetery.

Professor Phineas Dribones, the peripatetic pedant, recently undertook a small research project on the origin of the old expression, "from Dan to Beersheba," which is used to mean "all inclusive." It was a pet literary expression of the historians who compiled the books of the Judges, Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles in the Bible. Early writers said, "from Dan even unto Beersheba." Later writers, to assert their independence and originality, said, "from Beersheba even unto Dan." Or maybe it was just another phase of the North versus South argument.

How far was it from Dan to Beersheba? In a straight line, about 140 miles. But in that rough country you would need an airplane to make it in a straight line. Not far in a modern motor car on a smooth highway; but the ancient people covered the distance on foot, with nothing but sandals for protection from the rough and rocky, dusty trails.

Dan was far to the north, within sight of the cold snows of Mount Hermon, an outpost exposed to the raids of the militant Syrians, many times sacked and destroyed. It was on the highway from Tyre on the seacoast to the ancient trading city of Damascus on the banks of the abundant waters of the Abana River.

Beersheba was far to the south, in a desert land, on a junction of roads from Gaza to the salt fields of the Dead Sea, and of an alternate route, farther inland from the Mediterranean, down to Egypt.

So, when you hear someone say, "everybody from Dan to Beersheba," you will know that he does mean everybody.

* HOT DRINKS

A plump girl was looking at the black coffee that a doctor had put on her diet.

"No sugar," she said, with a sigh. "No cream," she added, with a frown. And, after a pause, "No good!"

One thing Paul should have learned: You can preach people out of the church, as well as into it.

WASHINGTON STATE

In the earthquake which hit Washington State, April 13, about noon, four cities where our church has congregations were hit, Seattle, Tacoma, Puyallup, and Olympia. However, according to information sent to Apostle George Mesley on April 14, none of our church buildings or people were harmed.

* BIBLE VIGNETTES:

(2) A Perfect Friendship

The Bible records many tragedies of evil falling upon good men. Cain, the good farmer, slew his brother, Abel, the herdsman. Noah debauched himself with wine, after he had saved humanity in the Ark. Saul, jealous of David's success and favor with God and man, sought often to kill him. Many others could be added to the list.

So, a story of beautiful and perfect friendship is a rare thing in the Bible, as it is in life. Take the friendship of Jonathan and David, for example, from the first Book of Samuel:

And it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit to the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul.

How fortunate for David that Jonathan was there to love and befriend him, when David so desperately needed a friend. And when Saul organized an expedition to destroy David, Jonathan, the son of Saul, "went to David into the wood, and strengthened his hand in God."

Jonathan met an undeserved and violent end one tragic day when he and his brothers, led by Saul, were overcome by the Philistines, and Jonathan was slain. Thus ended one of the world's finest friendships.

This was a friendship in which Jonathan must receive the greater credit, because he gave the most to it. He gave it first, and he gave it to the end of his life. Though the son of a king, he was not marked for greatness as David was. But he recognized the qualities of greatness in David, and he let his own interests take second place to help David climb up the long, slippery, and dangerous path that led to the throne.

There are men, who inspire our love and trust. We want to give something to them simply because we love them, and not for anything they may return to us. We like to be in their company, to hear their words, to remember their thoughts. They make us better than we are. They give light and glory to our lives, far beyond our poor power ever to repay them. We are attracted to them, but cannot say fully why. They have only to ask, and we would do almost anything for them.

David had the power to inspire great friendship. Jonathan had the power to be a great friend.

How's YOUR Missionary Effort?

A good way to tell prospective members about our church in a pleasant manner is to hand them copies of the tract "Hear Our Story" from the missionary kit. In this tract, your friends will read the story of our church and find brief facts about our church in simple, easy-to-read language. "Your Missionary Kit" includes 5 copies of the pocket-sized "Hear Our Story" tract plus the large "This Is Our Church" tract for church members.

Aaronic Priesthood Anniversary

"Upon you my fellow-servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer this priesthood and this authority, which shall remain upon earth . . ." Thus it was that the Aaronic priesthood was bestowed upon Joseph and Oliver, May 15, 1829, by the hands of an angel. Commemoration of this memorable event in our church should stimulate us to again evaluate the place and importance of the Aaronic priesthood in the life and growth of the church.

This priesthood has responsibilities for public ministry such as teaching, preaching, witnessing, watching over the church, and caring for the comfort of the Saints while assembled for worship. A vital aspect of its work, however, is placed upon a more intimate and personal basis, that of ministry in the home. Here God has provided for a direct contact to be made by his ministers with father, mother, and children with a view of teaching his law and helping each individual to understand how he may actually participate in the work of the church. The efficient performance of this ministry will result in progress of inestimable value to the home and the church. So far as the Bishopric is concerned, we have felt for a long time the need for the actual performance of Aaronic priesthood ministry in the home as the base line of our church endeavors.

The ministry of teaching families to pray and to attend to all family duties including the management of family and personal finance is of vital importance. It is related to the larger areas of church service, for greater progress is assured when priesthood leadership and ministry are extended effectively to our homes.

The Aaronic priesthood has tremendously significant responsibilities in this regard and the church should uphold these men that it may receive and enjoy the instructions and blessings of God provided for by the restoration of this priesthood.

Introducing . . .

EUGENE A. THEYS (page 5) was born in Burgess, Missouri, on December 12, 1914. He was graduated from high school at Independence, Missouri, in 1934 and then took short courses from University of Illinois, Kansas City School of Commerce, and Kansas City University.

He entered the grocery business shortly after his graduation and rose to the position of manager. Gene was active in young people's work before entering the field. He served as City-wide Recreational Director and then as League President for Zion. He accepted appointment as missionary in Far West Stake in 1940. In 1942 he became pastor at Cameron, Missouri; in 1944 he was appointed missionary to Central Illinois, Southeastern and Southern Missouri Districts; in 1946 his field was changed to Far West, Central Missouri, and Kansas City stakes. In the fall of 1947, he started on his present mission to Germany.

He married Alma Black on April 25, 1943. They have two children, Michael Eugene, 3; Sheryl Ann, 6 months. They now live in Rotterdam, Holland. Gene was ordained to the office of seventy April 9, 1944, and became secretary to the first quorum.

THOMAS S. WILLIAMS (page 8) left school at the age of twelve and worked in the mines for twenty years. He spent a year with the religious education class at Graceland 1921-1922, and then went into the mission field. He served six months in Lamoni Stake, then went to Wichita, Kansas, where he served three and a half years. In April, 1926, he went to Detroit, Michigan, as city missionary. Three years later he was transferred to St. Louis, and the next year to Lamoni Stake again where he served till 1931.

He married Stella Barker in 1912 and they had one son, Blaine. After her death, he married Lyda Elefson in 1931. Elder Williams owned and operated the Williams Cafe for fifteen years in Lamoni, and part of that time served the community as mayor. He is a Rotarian, a high priest, and member of the stake high council.

ROBERT J. MILLER (page 11) has been contributing to the Herald for the past five years. He is an elder, a member of the Columbus, Ohio, Branch, and a veteran of the first World War. He was born at Shauck, Ohio, December 31, 1895. His denominational inheritance was United Brethren, he was reared a Methodist, and "married into the Lutheran Church." After thirteen years in the Lutheran faith, he was invited to read the Book of Mormon and received a strong conviction of its divinity.

He married Verona Brown in 1922. They have one son, William Thomas, 14. For several years Brother Miller worked in the baking and grocery businesses, then went into the roller-bearing industry for three years. He has since been employed as a postal clerk.

Elder Miller was graduated from Caledonia High School in 1914 and subsequently took extension work with University of Wisconsin. Two weeks after the United States entered World War I, he enlisted in the regular army, was wounded May 30, 1918, in France, and was gassed four months later, but continued in service another year.

HONOR TO BILOINE WHITING

One of our younger church members, Biloine Whiting, daughter of Evangelist Ray Whiting, has been honored in winning first place in the state of Iowa for a weekly newspaper edited by a woman, at the annual Iowa Press Association conference recently held at Ames. She is the youngest editor in the state of Iowa, and will have a reprint of one of her columns in the June issue of the "Cosmopolitan Magazine."

Miss Whiting is editor of the "Lamoni Chronicle." She took her degree in journalism at Kansas University. She is co-author with Josephine Skelton of a novel, "North of Heaven," published by Herald House, and she has written a number of articles for the "Herald."

GRACELAND BOARD

The Board of Trustees of Graceland College, whose chairman from 1932 until the time of his death in March of this year was John Garver, met at Graceland College on April 28 and elected Dr. Floyd M. McDowell of Independence as chairman. Dr. Charles F. Grabske of Independence was named vice-chairman, and Verne Deskin of Lamoni was re-elected secretary. Bishop Walter N. Johnson was elected to membership on the board for the interim until the next General Conference.

Other members of the board are Mrs. George Mesley of Kansas City, A. Neal Deaver of Independence, and Dr. Lawrence Brockway of Ann Arbor, Michigan.

APPOINTEE INSTITUTES

Three appointee institutes opened simultaneously on May 3, to continue until May 13. Fifty-six men from the midwest and south, exclusive of the staff, participated in the eleven-day institute in Independence. The First Presidency directed the Independence Institute. Associated with them as staff members were Apostles D. T. Williams, E. J. Gleazer, Sr., W. Wallace Smith, and Reed Holmes, together with Bishops G. L. DeLapp, Henry Livingston, and Walter Johnson. The institute meeting at Detroit, Michigan, included the twenty-five men from Michigan, Ontario, and the East and was under the supervision of Apostle Arthur Oakman with Apostles Maurice Draper and Percy Farrow. The Berkeley, California, Institute was for twenty men of the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast areas. It was conducted by Apostles George Mesley and Charles Hield. Associated with them was Dr. F. M. McDowell, Director of Priesthood Training.

Daily sessions at Independence convened in the choir room of The Auditorium at 9:00 o'clock each morning and continued until 9:00 o'clock or later each evening. The men were served lunches each noon in The Auditorium dining room by the Laurel Club. The latter part of the afternoons were devoted to recreational activities in The Auditorium gymnasium or on the campus under the supervision of Carl Mesle.

Three apostles who could not take part in the institutes were Paul Hanson who is in Peru, Roscoe Davey in Australia, and D. Blair Jensen in Europe.

SEVEN MEMBERS IN LINCOLN

Seventy J. Charles May completed a fifteen-day series of meetings on May 1 in Lincoln, Nebraska. Seven were baptized on April 28 by Pastor F. T. Shrunken. Five of the new members are adults and two are children. Three family circles were completed. The priesthood of the branch and the members worked in fine co-operation, Brother May reports.

The Aaronic Priesthood

The Beginning

It was on May 15, 1829, that Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, while at work on the translation of the Book of Mormon, prayed for information concerning certain passages in the text; and in connection with the answer received, they were given the Aaronic priesthood at the time of their baptism. This first step constituting the beginning of a working organization was a foundation upon which, within a year, they were to be divinely instructed to organize the church and to establish the Melchisedec priesthood.

The fact that the Aaronic priesthood was given first may indicate, in some way and to a certain degree, its importance. Certainly it is fundamental, and the slow progress made by the church in its development may have been because of our failure to give to this branch of our ministry the attention and the work it deserves.

On this anniversary of the date of its foundation in the latter days, we may well give some attention to the work of the Aaronic priesthood.

The Area of Service

Among the many duties of the members of the Aaronic priesthood is their service to individual members of the church and in the homes. They have important work to do as educators of the membership of the church. Great fields of service lie ahead of them, which they have not yet had a real opportunity to touch, for various reasons and conditions. Is it necessary to say that the building of Zion will depend to a great extent for its success upon the labors of this branch of our ministry?

Sources of Information

In recent years, fine progress has been made in developing a program of training and preparation for the

Aaronic priesthood under the direction of the Presiding Bishopric, since "the bishopric is the presidency of this priesthood, and holds the keys or authority of the same."

In the Doctrine and Covenants, we find information concerning the Aaronic priesthood especially in sections 17 and 104. New publications have been made available through the work of the Presiding Bishopric. Dr. F. M. McDowell has been appointed to full time labor in the general field of priesthood education and has been giving attention to this part of it.

Nauvoo Temple

Because of inquiries reaching me the latter part of last week, I took occasion to visit Springfield, Illinois, where the Illinois Legislature is in session. Representative John B. Monroe, in whose district Nauvoo is located, has introduced a resolution in the House which is intended as a sort of apology for "the regrettable incident which led to the exodus of the Mormons from Illinois." Prompt action without opposition is predicted for the bill, and provision is included that "suitable copies" of the resolution be sent to President George Albert Smith of the Mormon Church and to me as president of the Reorganized Church. Some of the preambles set forth are not quite clear, but the whole thing seems to be born out of good will. "Reconstruction" of the Nauvoo Temple is implied, but no provision for necessary funds is included specifically, though the resolution contains a "request" addressed to the Governor of the State and the Director of Public Works and Buildings that they "co-operate in every practicable manner in this laudable undertaking."

In our next issue I shall present the matter at some length.

ISRAEL A. SMITH, President.

A thoughtful and informative article was published in our issue of January 22, "The Aaronic Priesthood in Church Structure" by Harley A. Morris.

Preparation for Service

The important nature of the Aaronic priesthood indicates the necessity of high standards of character and spirituality for the men who are to serve in this branch of church work. Whoever goes into a home needs all of the resources of personality and training that may be possible to acquire.

In addition to a knowledge of the Three Standard Books of the church and of the church law, a member of the priesthood will need also a good background of general cultural education, because many of the people he must visit will be so equipped, and he will find it difficult to help them if they are superior to him in every way.

Social studies, especially in the fields of psychology and sociology, would be valuable aids to an effective ministry. At the present time, the church is not able to offer a wide variety of studies in this field, and young people must turn for most of this kind of training to the colleges and universities. But it is apparent that these studies can give their best help only when the time comes that their resources are turned to church problems under the direction of our own people, as at Graceland College, through our general headquarters, and in the local churches under able leaders.

This suggests a program of adult education directed from church headquarters and administered in our local church congregations far beyond the work we are able to offer now.

Adult Education

It should not be hard for us to realize that the local church build-

DENVER

One of the places the administrative councils have given special attention in recent years is Denver. There our members had outgrown their church, and some three years ago, steps were taken to secure a location for a new house of worship.

In October of 1947, the writer took part in "breaking ground" on location at East Fifth Avenue and Marion Street, and soon thereafter plans prepared by Mr. Earl Morris, architect, were approved, and the work was awarded Messrs. Williams and Bellamy, builders.

Sunday, April 3, witnessed a most happy occasion when, the building complete—even to flowers in boxes appropriately built into the structure—the Saints gathered within its walls for the first time.

The writer left home on Friday, April 1, and thus was permitted to spend a day in learning the status of affairs as well as witnessing great activity at the church where last-minute details were looked after. Devoted members, both men and women, were busily engaged. A serious-minded, electrical contractor was personally installing some essential wiring. A new organ was being tested. Floors were polished. Temporary seating was installed; their pews, very ornate and serviceable, were under construction but not yet ready.

Elder Merle E. Howard, in work clothes, was everywhere; and by late evening, everything was in readiness.

Williams and Bellamy, contractors, had provided for the women a splendid electric refrigerator, making the kitchen equipment complete.

Sister Virginia Bell, at much expense to herself, engaged florists to install very beautiful flowers in the boxes.

If there was anything lacking, it was not noticeable to the writer.

District President C. Houston Hobart made his appearance on Saturday, and on Sunday morning, Apostle Reed M. Holmes arrived.

Appropriately, the first meeting of the day, at 9:30 a.m., was a Communion service in charge of Pastor Howard. Elder Howard S. Sheehy, counselor to Pastor Howard; Apostle Holmes, missionary in charge; District President Hobart, and the writer had a part in this well-planned and deeply significant service which prepared a fine spiritual tone for the meeting that followed.

At 11 o'clock, with more than 400 in the congregation, the writer addressed the Saints on the subject of altars and shrines. Prior to his address, Pastor Howard spoke of the concern all had felt in the work of construction and preparation. He then introduced Mr. Morris, architect, also Mr. Williams and Mr. Bellamy, contractors, who were present. All the members of the building committee were on the rostrum and were presented to the congregation.

At this service, another of Brother Howard's counselors, Elder Richard S. Salyards, gave the invocation, a former and long-time pastor, Elder E. J. Williams, father of one of the contractors, gave the benediction.

Through the offices of Brother Ed Fishburn, a splendid surprise greeted the Saints. It was a Baldwin baby grand piano, the gift of one of Denver's philanthropists, Miss Helen Bonfils. This gift was acknowledged, as also the gifts of flowers and the refrigerator, by Pastor Howard.

Brother Fishburn, occupying a place on the platform, was presented as an "honorary" member of the building committee in recognition of his services on behalf of the project from its inception.

In the evening, after an auto trip about the city with my nephew Brother Salyards and his wife, and a pleasant visit in the home of Sister Fenn, an old-time member from western Iowa, I left on the City of St. Louis (Union Pacific) for home.

Brother Reed Holmes remained in Denver to preach a two-week series of sermons. This was my first experience in ministry with Brother Holmes, and I appreciated it very much.

ZION'S LEAGUE—FAR WEST STAKE

My latest journey away from home was on Sunday, April 10, when I drove to Stewartsville to be present at a Restoration Conference of the Far West Stake Zion's League. The theme of the day's services was, "It Began With Youth." Plans for the day were made by Stake President E. E. Jennings and League leaders. Brother Jennings was at Lamoni for the day, and the meetings were conducted by the League.

The program included a "Palmyra Party" on Saturday evening (the ninth), with costumes of the 1800 era.

I was unable to attend all of the 9:30 a.m. panel discussion service on Sunday, in charge of Brother John W. Newhart, moderator, but from what I witnessed after my arrival, a profitable time was had. The church was crowded to overflowing. Those participating were: Virginia Dunlap who spoke on the "Spirit of 1830"; William Higdon, on "If God Were to Speak Today"; Eunice Vincent, on "What Ancient America Speaks to Us"; and Robert Salisbury, on "The High Lights of Our Message."

At 11 o'clock, I spoke on the work of a young man in bringing forth the Book of Mormon; Brother Newhart presided. Special music was rendered by a girls' chorus from St. Joseph, under the very capable direction of Sister Haden, and a solo was sung by Sister Mauzey.

The day was rainy and the temperature a little low, but the Saints were out in force to help the Leaguers who conducted a very creditable program.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Planning a Priesthood Visit

By SEVENTY EUGENE A. THEYS
Missionary to Germany

This material was given at a priesthood institute in Hannover, Germany. It is presented in the hope that it will give to some men of the priesthood the courage to visit more in the homes and to realize the great opportunity this ministry can bring to the membership of the church.

ONE OF the first things a doctor does when he calls at your home is to take your temperature and check your heartbeat and blood pressure. These three steps will help him determine the extent of your illness. To be sure, he will ask questions as he goes through the routine checkup. Some of his questions may be: "Where is the pain? What have you eaten lately?" Answers will help him find the cause of your trouble.

As spiritual doctors, we need to make "sick calls" quite regularly among our members. We need to take their spiritual temperature, check their heartbeat, and find out how high or low their blood pressure is. One of the best ways to keep down a backsliding epidemic is to make periodic visits in the home of every member. You will find that where branches are most alive, the people are getting ministry not only from the services but also in the homes. Do not wait to be called to a home—go there.

Some men of the priesthood are frightened at the very idea of making a priesthood call, but that is one of the important parts of ministry, and you are expected to perform this duty. No man should be ordained and then told to go out and visit. He should be trained for this job just as in his everyday occupation. Newly ordained men should be taught under the supervision of the pastor or a more experienced member of the priesthood. Priesthood visiting isn't easy—ask the man who has done it alone. There is sound advice in the command that we should go two by two. Men need the ministry and support of each other as they function in their office and calling.

Can you remember the first visit you ever made? Did you stand outside the door and shake from pure fright at the thought of going in alone and conducting a visit? Perhaps you misunderstood just what this call should constitute, but nevertheless, you were scared, weren't you? Perhaps your mind went back to the first time you ever received a priesthood visit in your home and how you were just as frightened then. Remembering this, you probably forgot your fear, summoned up your courage, and rang the doorbell. I know what you went through—I had the same experience.

PLANNING THE CALL

One of the sure ways to make a successful call is to make arrangements with the family ahead of time—don't go barging in the first evening you have free. Plan your visit with the family you are going to see. Try to fit your schedule to theirs. If you are not successful the first time in arranging a visit, try again later. You may be able to arrange this visit at the Sunday service or even a midweek prayer service if they attend church regularly. If you are unable to make an appointment at church, call them on the telephone or stop by their home for a few moments and arrange a date. If a visit is important enough to make, then it is important enough that you arrange ahead of time to make it.

Some people are frightened at the idea of having a priesthood visit. There should be no reason for this. If priesthood members function in this capacity as they should, people will look forward to their calls. Members should be taught early in this church association that priesthood visiting is a part of the total church ministry. Soon after a person has been baptized, he should be visited. In fact, it is a good idea for visiting to begin even before baptism.

Every member of the priesthood should make at least fifty visits a year. This amounts to slightly less than four calls a month. I have yet to meet a man who cannot find time to make at least four calls a month. The more you get in the habit of visiting—and that's really what it is—the more you will enjoy calling on members. You will get more inspiration for your sermons from visiting than from any other source. Men who get their sermon materials or ideas from visiting are the ones who give people the kind of ministry they stand in need of. Visiting will help you get your finger on the pulse of the branch needs. You will be surprised to find how many of your members are thinking along the same lines when you go to visit them.

NO VISIT can be effective if the minister dashes right in and out again. I know of one man who boasted he averaged ten visits in an evening. This man wasn't visiting; he was playing a game. Neither should one stay so long that he undoes all the good he might have accomplished. A successful call can be completed in thirty to forty-five minutes; of course, the time factor will be determined by the need. Usually a half hour will give any man sufficient time to perform a good ministry.

To give the most in a visit, the minister should plan for it before the call is made. When two go together (and that is the most successful way) they should discuss their plan for the visit first, determining the needs, so far as possible, of those to be visited. Prayer is essential. God will grant sufficient light when the time comes to give those being ministered to the spiritual food of which they stand in need. Prayer channels must be opened to God for divine direction. The more one prays over such matters, the greater his spiritual life increases. A real minister carries the needs of people on his heart constantly. No problem is so difficult that God cannot help solve it.

Analyze your visits by asking a few pertinent questions such as: "What do these people stand in need of? In what way can they better serve the church? (The pastor can give you some suggestions on this point.) What are we striving to achieve as a church? How can these people adapt themselves to this program?"

No visit should ever be made without first consulting the pastor. It is possible that he has received light as to who best could make such a call. Rely on his judgment; he is your leader. Do not try to make more than two calls in one evening. Allow yourself sufficient time for each call.

If you have arranged to be at a home at a certain time, be there at the time promised. It is far better to start a half hour earlier than necessary than to be ten minutes late. However, it is just as bad to be too early as it is to be late. Beware of your personal appearance. Keep your clothes neat, give your shoes a shine and your trousers and coat the iron before calling. No man has ever been rejected for being neat and clean. Your wife can be of great help in such matters. She should know ahead of time that you have an appointment so she can see that your clothes are in good shape. Also, she can plan the activities in the home, knowing you are going to be away. If it is impossible for a member of the priesthood to go with you, it is often wise to plan to take her along; but remember, you are representing the priesthood.

VISITING THE SICK

Much has been written on this subject, and I do not intend to dwell long on it. A few suggestions may be quite timely, however.

When calling on the sick, make your visit brief. Talk quietly and do not linger too long in the sick room, especially if the patient is very ill. Avoid loud talking. Bring a note of cheer and comfort, and—above all—a faith in God.

If you have come to administer, this should be done just before leaving the home, or at least the sick room. When you have administered, leave as quickly as possible; this will impress on those about you the real purpose of your call. Prayers for the sick should be brief and to the point, instilling faith in those who hear that God's will be done.

CALLING ON THE INACTIVE

This visit, like all others, should be prearranged if possible. Remember, when you call on inactive members, do not reprimand but try to determine the cause of the inactivity. Avoid points of disagreement, and be tactful in pointing out where the differences lie. Do not try to win your point, for in so doing, you may lose the friendship of those you visit. If you come in the proper spirit, they will know who is right, and they will concede the point.

A well-chosen Scripture is always good to use in any visit. Some members of the priesthood have used the Lord's Prayer and the Twenty-third Psalm to advantage. Take with you a spirit of enthusiasm—this is always contagious. If your congregation publishes a branch calendar, take one with you and leave it. This helps keep members posted on what is happening.

In your conversation, talk about the constructive program of your branch and the general church. There will be plenty to discuss without sympathizing over some grievance. Get the ones you are calling on to think in positive terms and keep the conversation pointed always in that direction. If you do otherwise, you lose your case. Inactives should be visited regularly. Take an interest in them as well as all the others on whom you go to call. Learn all you can about them. Regardless of their standing, you will always be able to learn something about them that will be of help to you later. A sure way to win people back to the church (or even to the church, for that matter) is to adopt them—make them your project to win for the Master. Instead of merely inviting them to church, stop by and pick them up before the service. If you find it is difficult to get them started to the worship services, then take them to some of your social activities. This will often break down more barriers than some of the more solemn meetings. If they hesitate to attend even social functions, go with them to some of their activities, but never become so interested in these affairs that you forget your main purpose. When you show a genuine appreciation for others, they are bound to respond to your ministry. No person is so cold or indifferent that he cannot be re-won to the church. Never admit defeat. If you feel you are not getting anywhere, suggest to the pastor that someone else try his hand.

NO CONGREGATION was ever built up without a visiting program. If your branch is lagging, check up on this phase of its ministry. If you haven't a visiting program, start one at once. If you have only a few ordained men, solicit the help of lay members. I firmly believe a congregation can be built in any city where a member lives. It takes three things to make a branch—conviction, prayer, and enthusiasm. When you hear someone say it is impossible, you can be sure he is lacking one, two, or all three of these important elements.

Wisdom should be exercised in the priesthood prayer. Sometimes it is better not to pray vocally. You may even do more harm to suggest it than to pass it up. Few people will object to having prayer, and seldom will you find a home that is not ready for it, but keep yourself open to good judgment in such matters. Some people have grown so cold spiritually that the very suggestion of prayer will scare them away from you.

The wife of a priesthood member can often be helpful in reaching someone in the home. Children respond well to women, and I believe that the feminine influence in some visits is quite helpful. I remember very well one of our pastors who always took his wife with him; she accomplished as much good as he did.

If there are children in the home, take along something for them. Candy or a small toy will help immeasurably in reaching the hearts of the little ones—and their parents. The old saying, "The surest way to a mother's heart is through her children," still holds true. I once knew a store manager who insisted that all his clerks give every child that entered his store a cookie; the results were astounding. Even a business man realizes he must not only hold his steady customers, but be constantly trying to win others.

WHEN YOU OFFER prayer in the home, always kneel facing the family. Never turn your back or pray so low that no one knows when you are through. Pray distinctly and slowly enough that every member catches the significance of what you are saying. The prayer should catch up the tone of the visit and determine what its theme is. Every visit does have a theme. You will find there is some central thought that the family or the minister is constantly referring to. You can ask God for things in your prayer that you may hesitate to ask those listening to do. They will sense this, and quite likely they will respond to your wish. It is wise to bring your visit to a climax and then finish with a brief word of prayer. As we have said before, all prayers should be brief and to the point.

HELPING THE ACTIVE MEMBERS

Often we stress the need of visiting the inactives so much that we forget the loyal members who attend most every meeting. Even the actives should be visited. We have already said, everyone likes to be appreciated, and this goes for those who attend every service.

Visits to active members should encourage continuous participation. Do not forget the old and sick. Be willing to listen to constructive criticism. Big industries find that it pays to listen to their workers. A sure way to avoid defeat is to be willing to listen and to accept sound advice, be it from a priesthood member or a layman. No ordained man should feel he has all the answers. People like to be heard, and it is a real art to develop the gift of listening.

VISITS TO THE ERRING

Many of our greatest spiritual disasters may be avoided by a timely visit from some member of the priesthood. Such visits should be in the spirit of love and understanding. We should never go in the spirit of reprimand to those who have erred, except as we do so in love. It is easy for one to point out another's errors, but it takes a "big" man to show such a person the way back to God and his brethren. A good pamphlet on this subject has been written by Bishop L. Wayne Updike, Ministry to the Erring and Church Court Procedure.

WHEN DEATH COMES

I know a few pastors who have hesitated to call at a home immediately after learning of a death in the family. Their biggest reason for not going was that someone might think they wanted to preach the funeral. A far greater ministry can be given to such a family than preaching the funeral sermon. Some of the most successful pastors I know are the ones who go into the home and help arrange for automobiles, pallbearers, and occasionally even the burial ground. All these things are done without any thought of wanting to preach the funeral. The pastor should be the kind of shepherd people can depend on in such an hour. Few persons know how to go about making arrangements for a funeral, and a wise pastor will see that these things are made easier for the membership in their hour of grief. It is much simpler to minister to people in little ways than in trying to do the spectacular. I have seen no family forget such kindness. When a man can forget himself and think of the welfare of others, he has begun to minister.

CALLING ON NEWLYWEDS

It is the dream of every young man and woman to plan for marriage. All normal human beings look forward to the day when they can choose a companion. This should be encouraged by priesthood members, with a willingness to give sympathetic help or advice when it is sought.

The pastor should make himself available to the young people of his congregation and always be willing to help them in planning their home. This should be true of every member of the priesthood. A home today is not safe unless consideration has been given to its spiritual needs.

Shortly after the marriage, when the young people have had time to get settled in their new home, the pastor or some of the priesthood members should call on them and give them the church's blessing. Perhaps they will feel they need help in establishing a family altar. This every Latter Day Saint home should have.

Many of our younger members are asking to have their homes dedicated to God with a special service. When this is asked for, and especially when agreeable to the couple, a midweek service can be planned in the home. The members may even want to take advantage of giving them a house-warming if no other opportunity has been provided. Such a house warming usually includes the giving of gifts necessary to "run" a house. Members of the congregation will enjoy a home dedication when it has been planned by both the married couple and the pastor.

SPECIAL ANNIVERSARIES

Every home will have an anniversary of some kind sooner or later. A careful check on your branch statistical records will reveal anniversaries of one, five, ten, and even fifty years of married life, as well as birthdays and other important days in the lives of its members. Make it a point to call on these people and extend your best wishes.

An active member of the priesthood will find many opportunities to go into the homes of the Saints and render ministry. Homes today are suffering from the lack of this ministry. Men of the priesthood have failed to experience visiting.

In "Double Harness"?

AT LAST we see the Catholics and Protestants unite in a common cause. Advices from postwar Poland are to the effect that these traditional religious enemies have consolidated their forces in Poland in order to resist the throttling processes of Communist Russia.

In Catholic dominated Spain, however, the Protestants do not get much consideration. With only 30,000 among a population of 27,000,000, the Protestants have recently appealed to fellow Protestants throughout the world. They desire the right to print Bibles and tracts, open religious schools, and marry legally, all of which the Catholic hierarchy refuses to grant.

As the public press carries items of this appeal, the following counts of Protestant complaints are given:

1. Exemption for their children from Catholic teaching in the public schools or freedom to start Protestant schools.
2. The right to print Protestant literature, including hymnbooks, "since the law requires the Roman Catholic 'imprimatur' as a prerequisite to approval by the government censorship, a thing naturally impossible to obtain."
3. The right as converts to be married by civil ceremony. Spanish law requires that anyone baptized a Catholic, even in infancy, must be married by a priest.
4. Equal rights to government jobs, respect for their faith in the conscript army, hospitals, or asylums, or the right to hold Protestant ceremonies at burials in civil cemeteries, or assurance of a "decent place of burial" in towns which lack civil cemeteries.
5. Freedom to do missionary work.

The appeal concludes with the assurance that Spanish Protestants love their country, but need outside help to eliminate the "greatest obstacle to its development."

Practically nonexistent in Spain since the sixteenth century, Protestant activity revived under the republic of 1873 and the liberal monarchy that followed.

The appeal says Protestantism carried on "most of the times under precarious tolerance, full of difficulties and even scurrilous criticism, but never so restricted—if it may even be called alive—as since the triumph of General Franco, which has been considered the triumph of the Roman Catholic church."

A Vatican prelate makes Franco responsible for the situation, indicating the Holy See would not oppose—though proposing—relief by the Franco regime, adding:

"Naturally," this prelate said, "the church holds to its dogmatic position that the Catholic Church is the only true church, based on divine revelation, and hence that all other cults are necessarily in error.

"However, in recent times, the church has found it practically possible to get along very well in countries which do not stipulate—as does Spain—that Catholicism is the state religion, and the only religion.

CITES U. S.

"A notable example is the United States, where, with establishment of a state religion specifically barred and freedom of worship guaranteed by the Constitution, Catholicism has made marked advances."

The press item continues:

On most of the five points made in the Protestants' appeal, the prelate pleaded lack of specific knowledge of actual conditions in Spain. As to the Protestants' appeal for the right to do missionary work, the prelate said in effect that the Roman church would vigorously oppose this.

Ritual in Worship - Part 1

In response to requests, we are re-printing with slight editorial revision, this article... It was first published in the "Herald," of May 25, 1927, and the two subsequent issues. It is worthy of thoughtful reading and rereading.—Editors.

RITUAL is usually justified from its legal, theological, and historical aspects; but little or no attention is given its social utility or its usefulness in meeting the operations and conditions of the human mind. However the use of ritual can best be vindicated if it be found to meet a human need—if it satisfies a real want in the lives of men.

The religious uplift of both individual and group must be the supreme purpose of ritual. The effort to make it conform to a legal strait jacket must not stand in the way of its contribution to man's mental and social needs and wants. I would not depreciate the value of a legal and historical defense of ritual; it must have these to make it effective. But if the rite is merely the perpetuation of an antiquated custom, thus becoming an end in itself, it may with profit be dropped as a rite in the church.

RITUAL AS A SYMBOL

The real meaning of religious truth (any truth, in fact) lies deep beneath the surface. "It is the glory of God to conceal a thing." The ritual is symbolic, a sign of something else. To be worthwhile, it must be a truth clothing itself in a picture, appealing to the mind and the feelings through the imagination. The ritual may be (and to be worthwhile must be) the preserver and at the same time the transmitter of religious values, ideals, and standards. "The elusive contacts and subtle realities of the world of the spirit must wear something, if we are to grasp them at all. They must wear something easily recognized by the human eye and heart."

Men have bodies. They worship with their physical beings as well as in spirit. "The spirit and the body is the soul of man." In fact, the inner man cannot be reached other than through the sense organs of the outer man. Religion, as all other of man's impulses, is rooted deep in his fleshly tabernacle. The mental life of the average individual is so wedded to the concrete that he cannot grasp an abstract religion. The ritual gives man something of an objective nature to which he can tie.

Ritual must be the tool of religious teachers, for it is an aid to the soul to discover and recognize the truths of God.

In the symbol proper . . . there is ever, more or less distinctly and directly, some embodiment and revelation of the Infinite; the Infinite is to blend itself with the finite, to stand visible and, as it were, attainable there. By symbols accordingly man is guided and commanded, made happy, made wretched.—Thomas Carlyle.

THE DANGER IN RITUAL

That there is danger in formal worship cannot be denied. History is replete with evidences of it. We shall outline briefly some of the pits into which the ceremonial worshiper may fall.

Form may be substituted for spirit; worship may take on the character of a dress parade. The spiritual symbolism may be lost in the glamour and pomp of the ritual. Many rites conceived in purity have become gross because the truths which their symbolism originally conveyed have lost their primary meaning. Thus the ritual becomes the masquerade of religious truth rather than the means of its revelation.

The ritual may bewilder the mind of the worshiper by its intricacy and obscure symbolism. An imposing, mysterious, complex ceremony makes those in the congregation feel that their part is reduced to nothing; it also tends to remove the religious worship from the everyday tasks and problems of life. Since the ceremony fails to symbolize truths in terms the worshiper can understand, he is satisfied in watching the priest move and mumble.

The human tendency is toward the habitual. The exact reproduction of the ritual in inherited words and acts causes the worshiper to lose its real significance, and his religious response is halfhearted and habitual. The ceremony, too, may be regarded as having a magical power within itself to bring about certain mystical results; in this manner the real spiritual meaning of the rite is lost.

The ritual may also arouse deep emotions without providing an outlet in action. If the religious program fails to furnish a means for a constructive expression for the emotional power it has generated, it will explode destructively. Those whose worship is emotionally intense usually live on a lower moral and ethical plane than those whose devotion is more calm and restrained.

By THOMAS S. WILLIAMS

Ceremonial worship tends toward group exclusiveness. The worshiper may feel that those not participating are outside the favor of the Almighty. This is the outstanding weakness of this type of religious expression.

In brief, the great danger in ceremonial worship is that it may be substituted for religion rather than functioning as its aid. But the danger is not in the ritual itself; neither is it with the people. The responsibility for its rightful use and the danger of misuse rests with the priest and minister. The shepherd of the flock must be one who knows the meaning and value of ritual if it is to find its rightful place. In the words of Carlyle, he must be one who "sees through the heart of things." Formal worship in the hands of a man who fails to understand its meaning and place in human nature is indeed a dangerous thing. In the hands of a leader who recognizes its symbolism and the limitations and needs of his fellow worshipers, it is a power for good.

THE GOOD IN RITUAL

Because there is danger in ritualistic worship is no reason its use should be avoided. There is danger also in the use of fire and water. Human living demands fire and water, but they must be used with judgment and skill. So it is with ritual.

Ceremony has always been associated with religious worship. Religion, as all other of man's impulses, must find expression in some form of action or ceremony. But ceremony must be regarded as the garment—the clothing of religion—and not the essence of it. It makes visible and palpable the unseen, the spiritual life.

The purpose of public worship is to learn the mind and will of God by communion with him, and to instruct, inspire, and revive those whom the daily tasks and problems of life have left wornout and discouraged. It clearly follows that ritual, to be of benefit to worship, must be effective in two ways: (1) as a factor in the teaching process, and (2) as an agent for the promotion of unity. "Some rituals are directive, as the map of our country, while others are emotional in their value, like the flag." If ritual has no place in these two aspects of individual and group life, there is no excuse for its perpetuation.

Ritual, to be of value to group worship (if group worship contributes to individual and social elevation), must be illustrative of something bigger. It should focus the attention upon some central Christian truth. Since man is an objective worshiper, ritual will recognize this tendency by presenting an abstract truth concretely, through a process recognized as one of the fundamental laws of teaching, i. e., proceeding from the known to the unknown.

There is a human tendency to mistake means for ends. One should take care that he does not lose sight of the lesson within the rite. The principle existed before the symbol. The principle involved in the baptismal and sacramental ceremonies existed before the institution of the rites. Therefore the symbol should present in the language of the worshiper the meaning of the principle. As long as the lesson and symbol are seen in their rightful relation, all will be well; but if the lesson is lost, the symbol becomes an empty shell.

If the ritual is elevated to its divinely appointed place, it will do more than produce subjective satisfaction. It will be a guide and a help, giving a deeper meaning to life by illuminating the truths of the gospel. It should fix firmly in mind the new truth discovered and recall vividly to consciousness truth previously revealed.

Rightly used it will give each individual the opportunity to think, increase one's capacity to recognize truth, and clarify religious thought. It will note man's limitations and furnish him with the concrete materials with which to think. Emphasized rightly, it will produce the stimulus for constructive religious thought. No man will engage in creative thinking unless given an incentive to so do.

Those who teach truth in its mere abstractness can never take much hold of the general mind, and success awaits a teaching which is intellectually sound (that is, consistent with the clearer thought of the day) and at the same time, able, by a wealth of fit symbols, to make itself at home in all sorts of plain minds. And it is just this that is apt to be painfully wanting in a time of intellectual and social change.
—Cooley's Social Organization.

RITUAL AS A SOCIAL AGENCY

Participation in ritualistic worship produces a tie hard to sever. As a social agent for the unifying of groups, ceremony has been a powerful factor. The objective nature of this type of worship produces the mental state and the emotional tone necessary to social unity. The ceremony presents something visible upon which the minds of the group may be centered, thus producing a "common object of mental activity." It is the responsibility of the leader by the use of suitable songs, prayers, and exhortations to produce a "common mode of feeling" toward the rite. It is those who feel and act alike in the same situation that are driven together. This unison of response in the ceremonial service will create a reciprocal feeling among the members of the group.

The retrospective and prospective elements of the ritual should be helpful in the establishment of unity. The historical (retrospective) aspects of the ceremony now find a place. The worshiper recognizes an ancient background to his ceremonial devotions. This gives him some assurance that it will continue as the center of worship for the future, thus bringing about a consciousness of the continuity of the group, which is one of the requisites to group unity. The ritual will link up the present with the past and future.

Ritual, if rightly used, will create and stimulate a desire to work with and share with others the product of our labors, and to recognize the common responsibility for social welfare. The traditional ritualistic response (of the older Christian sects) is more effective for moral and spiritual uplift and a greater social agent for the promotion of unity than the spontaneous individualistic responses of the modern "ecstatic" sects. This ceremonial worship will have an important place in the redemption of Zion.

Nothing in this article should be construed to mean that the writer leaves God out of the religious experience found in ceremonial worship. Our point is that ritualistic response prepares the human heart for the entrance of God. It will arouse man's emotional nature, awaken an attitude of receptivity, generate a repentant spirit within his soul. It prepares the ground for the divine presence, and stimulates growth.

We are all agreed that God is limited in his effort to reveal himself to man because of the human attitude toward him and concept of him. If stewardships is to be accepted and Zion is to be redeemed, the church must have a higher concept and a deeper consciousness of the divine Being than it has had hitherto. Ritual, if rightly used, can occupy an important place in developing this state of mind and feeling. Wrongfully used, it will hinder. Ritual is valuable only if it calls up the required feelings and ideas requisite to a higher concept of life and the birth of a new spiritual light.

ALL THINGS IN ORDER

Since ritual has been established to meet a human need, the laws of human nature must be recognized in its application. The ceremonial service, to be effective, must be free from distracting sights and sounds. The meeting should be in order and all arrangements made before time for the service. The details should be previously planned. Each man should know his part, so that no confusion in the service will detract the attention of the people from the rite. Where dignity and order reign, the worship is much more elevating and pleasing than where disorder and confusion prevail.

THE ENVIRONMENT OF THE SERVICE

The material things which surround the service should receive much consideration. The Communion table, the arrangement of the men presiding, the condition and order of the church building go a long way in stimulating and sustaining an atmosphere of solemnity and reverence in the service. The writer once presided over a Communion service in which the table covering, a worn-out affair covering but part of the table, was the only thing resembling linen belonging to the service. The women of the church were persuaded to prepare a more elaborate tablecloth, which decidedly removed the atmosphere of cheapness from the service. A ceremony which celebrates the most sacred and costly event in religious history should not have anything connected with its commemoration that smacks of cheapness, if it lies within the ability of the people to make it otherwise. If ritual is the clothing of religion, its garments must be clean and of the best.

On one of the principal streets of a western city stands a large signboard; its size is decidedly out of harmony with its environment. In large, bold, black letters, with a white background, are the words: "Jesus is calling you; hear his message at the church of _____ today." It strike me as an insult to the name of our Lord. By a road just outside the city some religious zealot has smeared on a rusty piece of tin, "God is love." Even those who profess to be his followers profane the name of Deity. North and east out of Arkansas City, Kansas, on the slope of a rock-crested eminence, with hills of equal height to the right and left, inlaid in stone are the words: "Christ died for the ungodly." As I viewed this from a distance of perhaps two miles, I seemed to vision a deeper meaning in the crucifixion, and its lesson was indelibly impressed upon my consciousness. Nothing should be done that will remove dignity and solemnity from the service, and everything should be done to promote it.

SHOULD NOT BE STEREOTYPED

We have said that the exact reproduction of the ritual in words and acts causes the worshipers to lose the significance of the rite. While there should be a degree of preciseness in the ceremony, it must not be too formal and stereotyped. Every group has its formalist who keeps his eye on the water level to see that every hair of the baptismal candidate is submerged, while apparently he gives little thought to the meaning of the rite.

There should be no place for a final interpretation of the rite. Lessons of additional truth should be brought out of the service. It should be an aid to higher concepts of divine and social relationship. The ritual, too, should be interpreted in present-day terms, ideals, and values. Its lessons should be a help in meeting present needs and future problems.

THE ANTIQUITY OF THE RITE

Man's inherent tendency to revere the past has an important place in ceremonial worship. Ritual must have the halo of the ancients to be effective in religious service. It must not be torn ruthlessly from its old garments. The Israelites in the wilderness found it hard to adjust themselves to a new form of worship. The attention of the people should not be directed toward the antiquity of the rite unless there is found a lesson for today. If men look backward, they should "look backward into the future." The ritual should stand for moral and spiritual progress. It must be more than a copy of a bygone age. It must be a prototype for the present and future, a guide for the truth seeker today. It should reveal a fundamental truth of the gospel that will be helpful in meeting the conditions and solving problems of the time.

MYSTERY IN THE SERVICE

While it is true that a mysterious, complex ceremony removes worship from the actualities and duties of life, yet there must be a degree of strangeness or mystery in the rite in order to arouse curiosity and awaken a feeling of reverence within the breast of the worshiper. Strangeness will excite curiosity, and curiosity will stimulate interest, and interest will lead to thought and meditation. With no hidden meaning, the ceremony becomes commonplace, ordinary, and consequently purposeless. The ritual should be the revelation of a truth through the symbolism of an outward act. The physical, which man to a degree understands and is at least able to see, must be made to serve as a means to reveal the spiritual.

"Priesthood"

SOMEONE HAS SAID, "The three great essentials of happiness are something to do, something to love, and something to hope for." The answer to all three have been given us by Jesus Christ, who said, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life."

He gave us something to hope for when he taught there was a way to life eternal. By life eternal, he meant a never-ending life rich in the fullness of eternal values, abounding in health, happiness and peace, and freedom from worry, pain, and fear.

He told us our hope of life eternal depended upon obedience to two great laws: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." There are really three commandments here, for the second commandment also implies a high regard and love for oneself.

And he gave us something to do. In fact, all of Christ's ministry was for this one purpose—to show and teach us the things we must do to obtain the realization of our hope, eternal life. We cannot love without expression; it compels us to do something to make it real. Some of the things we must do are: repent, believe, obey, exercise faith, be baptized, study diligently the Scriptures that we may know the will of God, perform acts of mercy from a sincere heart, be considerate of others, and realize that our hope of happiness is bound up in the happiness and well-being of our neighbors. These are some of the essentials to salvation and true greatness.

Christ gave us a Golden Rule to help us in the determination of our behavior: "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."

We, the disciples of Christ, have something to do, something to love, and something to hope for. Are we doing what is necessary to make our hope a possibility? Let us make our hope live.

MY FAITH

By Agnes Fay Morgan

Bio-chemist and nutritionist, University of California

I am a believer, holding a conception of the Deity which is wholly compatible with my belief in science. I think of God as the personification of the magnificent law and order of nature.

Can a scientist believe in God, or a man of religion believe in science? The scientist who answers "no" must qualify that answer, defining his idea of the Deity. When we conceive of God from the point of view of truth, of law, and order of nature, every scientist is a devout believer, whether or not he realizes it. The religionist who refuses to accept the methods and findings of science, on the other hand, denies his faith in the power and permanence of God. Science must seek truth and only truth, or it is not science. In the pursuit of truth, science and religion must converge.

I believe that the discovery of truth by science in itself is the practice of religion in one of its purest, most exalted and universal forms. Scientists must be objective. By comparison, those who turn the findings and inventions into goods and services are under no such discipline. The great problem today is the use by society of scientific findings and inventions. I believe in the application of scientific methods toward its solution.

The method of science is needed in the realm of human affairs. By its extension into human affairs, there will be brought greater spirituality in our lives, of which the obvious manifestations would be greater alleviation of suffering, emancipation of the mind and emotional reassurance for everybody. This will deepen and widen faith.

Baptism by Water -

By ROBERT J. MILLER

BAPTISM BY WATER as a requisite to discipleship with Christ and salvation was commanded by the Master himself. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water, and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—John 3: 5. This statement, so positive and concise, carries a note of authority one can hardly dare question. In fact, the simple reading of it conveys to the soul a conviction of its truth.

We may not understand perfectly the purpose of baptism by water, but the Scriptures give us some very definite reasons why it is essential.

In the twenty-second chapter of Revelation, verses one and seventeen, we read: "And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb . . . And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." Herein we note that water is a symbol of purity and life eternal, and that it is so recognized by the godhead. Water may also be used here to refer to the Word of God, which is "clear as crystal" to those who believe, and pure in its content—for it is Spirit. Christ has said, ". . . the words that I speak unto you, they are Spirit, and they are life."—John 6: 63. What medium, other than water, could be better used to designate the Word of God? Both water and the Word are necessary to life, and both serve the purposes of the same God.

Water is also a term used by the Master in referring to the Holy Spirit. "He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. (But this he spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on him shall receive; for the Holy Ghost was promised unto them that believe, after that Jesus was glorified.)"—John 7: 38, 39. Since the Master himself speaks of water as an emblem of the Holy Ghost, we can safely point to this statement as an added reason why water should be used in the ordinance of baptism.

Paul refers to baptism as the "washing of regeneration" (Titus 3: 5), and in the Inspired Version of the Holy Scriptures we find a most logical reason why water should be used in the ordinance of rebirth into the kingdom of God.

Therefore I give unto you a commandment, to teach these things freely unto your children, saying, that by reason of transgression cometh the fall, which fall bringeth death; and inasmuch as ye were born into the world by water and blood, and the spirit, which I have made, and so become of dust a living soul; even so ye must be born again, into the kingdom of heaven, of water, and of the Spirit, and be cleansed by blood, even the blood of mine Only Begotten; that ye may be sanctified from all sin; and enjoy the words of eternal life in this world, and eternal life in the world to come; even immortal glory.—Genesis 6: 61, 62.

Then in verse sixty-three of the same chapter, and the same version, we find another reason: "For by water ye keep the commandment." Here water typifies obedience; and I daresay there is nothing of material value which so beautifully portrays the rewards of obedience to the Word of God.

We have given some excellent reasons why water should be used in baptism: it is a symbol of purity, of the Word of God, of the Holy Ghost, and of obedience to the Word of God. Furthermore, "the washing of regeneration" for rebirth into the kingdom of God is a perfect similitude of our birth into this natural kingdom.

BAPTISM BY IMMERSION

Regarding the mode of baptism by water, much might be said, but it is sufficient for us to refer to a few of the statements made in the Scriptures to show that baptism by immersion is the true way as practiced by those in the time of Christ.

Concerning the baptism of our Saviour, we read: "And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water" (King James Version, Matthew 3: 16; Mark 1: 10; Inspired Version, Matthew 3: 45; Mark 1: 8). This surely indicates Christ was baptized by immersion, and therefore it is the acceptable way to him.

The reason John was baptizing in Enon near to Salim was "because there was much water there" (King James Version, John 3: 23; Inspired Version, John 3: 24). Again the inference is plain that immersion was the mode of baptism in the days of Christ. Had sprinkling been acceptable to God then, John could easily have carried with him a small container carrying sufficient water to baptize hundreds anywhere the need arose. But it was necessary to be where there was a fair-sized body of water.

At the baptism of the eunuch by Philip, "they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him" (Acts 8: 38).

To conclude this matter of baptism by immersion, let us read from the writings of Paul, the diligent disciple of Christ.

Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection.—Romans 6: 4, 5.

How can we be planted together in the likeness of his death by sprinkling?

Baptism by immersion may be regarded by many people as a humiliating experience, or a crude, if not vulgar display of Christian practice. But as we understand the purpose of baptism and the things water symbolizes, the ordinance becomes one of great majesty and beauty, for in this rite we witness one of God's greatest miracles—the reclamation of the human soul.

ABOUT WATER

It is interesting to note that water also has its place in Taoism, a Chinese religion which emphasizes the importance of simplicity, and the desirability of being free from the tyranny of passion and interests outside oneself. In Taoism, water is a symbol of simplicity and freedom from all evil. Hence Lao-tze and his followers might also accept the Christian meanings as well as the symbolism. In this regard, water is a perfect symbol and may well be one of the reasons Christ referred to water as typical of the Word of God, Holy Spirit, obedience, and purity. Let us consider some of the reasons why this is so.

Water is not an element in itself, but is composed of two elements which are indestructible and eternal. The elements of which it is composed, hydrogen and oxygen, are two of the simplest in atomic weight and structure.

Hydrogen's atomic number is one, and it is the lightest and simplest in construction of all the elements. It is fourteen and one-half times lighter than air, colorless, odorless, and tasteless. It is found in almost every organic substance and is the essential element in all acids.

A stream of pure hydrogen burns quietly in air with a flame so intense it will easily melt platinum, an element which cannot be melted in ordinary furnace heats. When used in combination with the electric arc, it produces a temperature of over 8,000 degrees Fahrenheit.

Oxygen's atomic number is eight, and it also ranks eighth in atomic weight as compared to the other known elements. It, too, is a colorless and tasteless gas and is necessary to all life except certain forms of bacteria. Oxygen forms almost one half of the earth's crust. It is approximately eight ninths the weight of water and forms about 60 per cent the weight of the human body.

From this description of the two gases which form water, we begin to see clearly, by reason of their characteristics, why water is a perfect symbol for the Christian religion.

Water occupies a position of importance because of its perfect obedience to the laws of God. The very existence of each element is dependent on some indefinable intelligence which directs and orders the neutrons, protons, and electrons, causing them always to behave in a manner which assures their constant and eternal value. Perfect obedience to that intelligence makes this so.

Neither element performs its greatest service by itself, they must be in perfect union and co-ordination with the other. We find a beautiful illustration of this union in Doctrine and Covenants 90: 5: "The elements are eternal, and Spirit and element, inseparably connected receiveth a fullness of joy, and when separated man cannot receive a fullness of joy."

Hydrogen, the lightest known element could easily represent Spirit. In its gaseous state, it is invisible, being almost an all pervading substance without any characteristics which can be called evil. Within it is the purifying potential of fire.

Oxygen could easily represent the elements, for it is an element. It is everywhere in the world and possesses no characteristic of evil. It is the breath to all animal life and an essential to complete combustion. It is the perfect complement to hydrogen.

WATER—THE PERFECT AGENT

Yes, water is great because of its obedience to the laws of God, governing its existence. One always knows what can be expected of it because of its constancy. Its values never change—there is no hypocrisy. God is always manifest in its behavior.

There is nothing in water to incite passion, encourage greed, or in any way corrupt the mind. It does not tempt man to indulge in any evil through the medium of his senses. Surely it typifies purity and represents the Word of God, for it is a portion of the Word of God manifest. It is law at work.

Water, as a union of two eternals, is also a perfect illustration of the Father and Son in union (see John 14: 23); the Father, because of the law created by him which creates water, and the Son, because of the manifestation of that law in discernible substance.

As the Holy Spirit is everywhere and all pervasive—the missionary of the godhead—so water, more surely than any other substance, is a perfect missionary to the natural needs of our world. For as the Holy Spirit proceeds from God to minister to the spiritual needs of God's creation, so water leaves the confines of its main body to be carried through the air to minister to the natural needs of creation. Water is the perfect agent for the "washing of regeneration," and blessed is he who feels no sense of humiliation as he is buried in it for the cleansing from sin—then raised to a new life in Christ Jesus.

Now It's God's Turn

Of all the compensations of a Christian life, certainly not the least is the comforting knowledge that we can carry our problems and perplexities to God, that he will share with us those burdens which are too great for us to bear.

This doesn't mean that we can sit back and placidly wait for him to work out every detail of our lives. He intends that we shall use our muscles and our minds, that we shall do our level best in every situation. Having done so, we can confidently leave the rest to him.

Let us be conscious of the fact that God is working through us—every day in every way. Henry Ford, who firmly believed he was guided by a power stronger than himself, said on the eve of his eightieth birthday, "Too many of us, when we accomplish something, exclaim, 'see what I have done,' instead of 'see where I have been led.'" Orison Marsden said, "God and man are partners. They co-operate in producing, creating, improving, and uplifting."

The terms of a partnership imply that both parties have obligations and responsibilities. Both must be willing to make a "go" of the business.

When our Senior Partner is the reality of wisdom, love, and justice, we need not fear even death. His resources are our resources, for we are in partnership with the infinite.

When we, as a church and as individuals, have done our full share as the junior partners of this firm, we shall have no fear of the future and can reverently say, "Now it's God's turn."—Pastor Charles Neff in Omaha Ray-O-Lite.

A Bible Vignette

A Pacifist

If you look for them with a discerning eye, wherever you read in the Bible you will find the telltale evidences of a rich and entertaining human quality that will give you pleasure while it teaches you something about life. Romance, irony, humor, tenderness, sarcasm—all the literary moods are to be found there.

Consider, for example, the plaint of David on that calm, warm, sunny spring day when he wanted nothing in the world but a little peace (Psalm 120: 7) and a chance to sleep.

David was tired. He had seen enough of trouble. He was fed up with putting down enemies and conquering new territory for the kingdom. That one day he yearned for the preservation of the status quo. His ears wearied of the clamoring of his many wives (the proper fate of a bigamist) and of the bawling of their numerous progeny. He was tired. His neck ached from holding up his head with the heavy crown on it, and callouses were developing on the bald spot where the edge of it rested.

And there were the enemies. No matter how often he put them down, they bobbed up again. No matter how many he had killed, new ones took their places, like dandelions in the palace lawn.

Worse than the enemies were his friends—the counselors, the chancellors, the chamberlains, the secretaries, the generals and captains—always under his feet and in his way, always urging him to do something when he wanted to rest. Or when he wanted action, they wanted him to do nothing. No matter what he wanted, they wanted something else. The king business was a heavy cross and a crown of thorns. He was sick of it. So he complained, "I am for peace: but when I speak, they are for war."

That is ever the fate of the pacifist. When his heart is full of good will toward all the world, somebody wants to pick a fight. Then when he is finally convinced he must go to war to save himself, other people are talking peace. He is always out of step.

David never wanted war or trouble. Of course he liked to add a bit of real estate to his possessions, and there were inconvenient persons dwelling on these "additions" who considered him an aggressor and an invader. Such people usually fought back when he tried to put them out. There was bloodshed and violence, all very messy and regrettable. It was very inconsiderate of them. David would have preferred easy, nonviolent victories. He was really a man of peace.

I Visited A Mormon Church

By MYRON N. THOMAS

THERE ARE TWO major religious bodies today springing from the Restoration Movement inaugurated by Joseph Smith in 1830. They are the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints with headquarters at Salt Lake City, Utah, and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints with headquarters at Independence, Missouri. For the sake of brevity, I shall refer to the former as the Mormon Church—a semi-official name accepted and used by that church—and to the latter as the Reorganized Church.

Having been a member of the Reorganized Church all my life, I have often wondered how doctrinal and political differences between these two churches resolved themselves into patterns of worship in the Mormon Church. Accordingly, I took advantage of an opportunity to make an extended visit to a congregation of the Mormon Church. The following does not attempt to comprehensively describe either the differences between the two churches or to extensively portray the Mormon Church service. It merely relates impressions I gained from that visit.

REGARDING THE CHURCH NAME, the words Mormon Church appear as a sub-heading on the congregation's signboard under the full name, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The word Mormon is used commonly in conversation and print, referring to the church and its institutions.

For Scripture they use our familiar Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants; but the King James Version of the Bible is used instead of Joseph Smith's Inspired Version. A fourth book—a total stranger to the Reorganized Church—The Pearl of Great Price,* is added. This latter is made up of a collection of revelations, translations, and narrations by Joseph Smith, the founder. These include revelations not incorporated in the Doctrine and Covenants, translations of manuscripts from the tombs of Egypt, and the account of Joseph's personal experiences relative to the initiation of the Restoration.

The emblems are served to children less administered to the congregation at nearly every Sunday service, both morning and evening. The one who is offering the prayer of blessing on the emblems is the only one who kneels during the Communion prayer. Those in the corps of servers may be as young as twelve, for at this age ordinations of deacons in the Aaronic priesthood may take place. The emblems are served to children less than eight years old, and no mention is made of not serving to nonmembers. The servers of the emblems partake themselves after the congregation is served. One notes the change from the word wine to the word water in such instances as the Communion prayer and Communion hymns.

THE MORMON SUNDAY SCHOOL consists of a worship period and Communion service followed by classes. There ordinarily is no preaching on Sunday morning. On Sunday evening the service is comprised of a Communion service, two or three short talks, and a concluding sermon.

In a typical service one may hear hymns common to both churches such as: "We Thank Thee, O God, for a Prophet" and "Redeemer of Israel," or those entirely of Mormon origin such as "Come, Come Ye Saints," inspired by the trek to the West, and "O My Father," inspired by contemplation of man's pre-earth existence. The hymn, "Praise the Man," written for the prophet, Joseph Smith, contains the phrase, "Hail the Prophet." This impressed me as an approach to worship of the individual, and consequently a deviation from the worship of Divinity. However, the Mormons do not regard it as such.

The status of women is such that they frequently serve the church as full-time missionaries, give short talks, and offer benediction for the general Sunday evening worship service.

In church polity, the term ward is new to a member of the Reorganized Church. A ward is a congregation whose principal difference from the branch lies in the fact that the ward is an organizational division of a stake, whereas the branch is an organizational division of a mission.

The word Zion was not used nearly so often as one hears it in services of the Reorganized Church. This may be because the Utah settlement is regarded as an adequate Zion; or, as a member of the Mormon Church might jestingly remark, "We're doing something about it and have not time to spare for talk." At any rate, the Mormons still regard Independence, Missouri, as the Center Place for Zion. They look forward to a time when they will build a temple there, and when their church headquarters will be located there instead of at Salt Lake City.

TURNING NOW to a more doctrinal vein, we might say that the concept of Divinity by the Mormon Church constitutes the essential difference between it and the Reorganized Church. The Mormon Church's concept of Divinity entails the orthodox trinity, but the doctrine is developed into greater detail, and one hears such phrases as "God, our Eternal Father," "God, our Eternal Mother," and "Council of the Gods" associated with the subject. God is a god of progression by constantly creating and peopling new worlds. He is the same or unchangeable only in his relations with man. Upon his discovery of unchangeable and eternal principles of truth, God became God. Adam was one who came from the Council of the Gods to earth.

Closely allied with the doctrine of divinity is that of celestial glory. Even as celestial glory is the highest of the glories, likewise the "Council of the Gods" is the highest division within celestial glory. This Council-of-the-Gods status can be attained only by obedience to all the gospel, plus the sealing of celestial marriage in the temple. During this ceremony of celestial marriage in the temple, the participants don the "garments," (a special type of underclothing) which must be worn continually from thenceforth. Mortals reaching the Council-of-the-Gods status will create worlds, people them through natural procreation and become God to their creations. Those individuals not having the good fortune to marry on earth will receive this opportunity in the next world.

The genealogical work incident to the doctrine of baptism for the dead is regarded as fulfilling the Scripture which declares that the hearts of the children shall turn to their fathers.

Brotherhood can be furthered by understanding. After having visited the Mormon Church, I can more sympathetically appreciate the philosophy of that faith while at the same time my own is quietly reaffirmed.

*EDITOR'S NOTE.—The Pearl of Great Price, first printed in 1851, was not a "standard" book of the church. The Book of Abraham was never approved or adopted by the church. The Prophet Joseph Smith never advocated it as containing doctrine.—I. A. SMITH.

That Word Otherwise - By J. W. A. BAILEY

The author spent several years in the mission fields of Utah. When the Mormons were reproached for the "grosser crimes" in their history of having "many wives," they frequently would take advantage of a grammatical technicality. There is evidence that this practice still persists. Elder Bailey deals with the whole issue of polygamy as based on the phrase, "I will command my people: otherwise . . ."

He makes references to our authorized edition (A) and to the Utah edition of 1920 (U) throughout the article.—Editor.

THE WORD, otherwise, as used by the Prophet Jacob in the Book of Mormon (A) 172: 39, (U) 111: 30, does not mean as claimed by the Utah Mormon Church, that God will or may change his mind concerning the law of marriage.

God is unchangeable. See Malachi 3: 6; Book of Mormon (A) 770: 19; (U) 517: 18; Doctrine and Covenants (A) 17: 4; (U) 20: 17.

When the Nephites had fallen into sin through the crime of polygamy, the Lord commanded Jacob to declare against it in no uncertain terms; however, before Jacob delivered the revelation he had received from God against the sin of polygamy, he said:

And now it came to pass that the people of Nephi, under the reign of the second king, began to grow hard in their hearts, and indulge themselves somewhat in wicked practices such as like unto David of old, desiring many wives and concubines, and also Solomon his son: . . . wherefore, I, Jacob, gave unto them these words as I taught them in the temple, having firstly obtained mine errand from the Lord.—(A) 168: 15, 17; (U) 108: 15, 17.

In these statements of Jacob, we can see that he called polygamy a wicked practice, and he charged David and Solomon with this great sin.

Notice, Jacob did not say that God had justified David and Solomon in having many wives and concubines; to the contrary, he condemned it.

Again Jacob said:

Now my beloved brethren, I, Jacob, according to the responsibility which I am under to God, to magnify mine office with soberness, that I might rid my garments of your sins, I come up into the temple this day, that I might declare unto you the word of God;

And ye yourselves know, that I have hitherto been diligent in the office of my calling; but I this day am weighed down with much more desire and anxiety for the welfare of your souls, than I have hitherto been.

For behold, as yet, ye have been obedient unto the word of the Lord, which I have given unto you.

But behold, harken ye unto me, and know that by the help of the all-powerful Creator of heaven and earth, I can tell you concerning your thoughts, how that ye are beginning to labor in sin, which sin appeareth very abominable unto me, yea, and abominable unto God.

Yea, it grieveth my soul and causeth me to shrink with shame before the presence of my Maker, that I must testify unto you concerning the wickedness of your hearts;

And also, it grieveth me that I must use so much boldness of speech, concerning you, before your wives and children, many of whose feelings are exceeding tender, and chaste, and delicate before God; which thing is pleasing unto God.

And it supposeth me that they have come up hither to hear the pleasing word of God, yea, the word which healeth the wounded soul.

Wherefore, it burdeneth my soul, that I should be constrained because of the strict commandment which I have received from God, to admonish you, according to your crimes, to enlarge the wounds of those which are already wounded, instead of consoling and healing their wounds;

And those which have not been wounded, instead of feasting upon the pleasing word of God, have daggers placed to pierce their souls, and wound their delicate minds.

But, notwithstanding the greatness of the task, I must do according to the strict commandments of God, and tell you concerning your wickedness and abominations, in the presence of the pure in heart, and the broken heart, and under the glance of the piercing eye of the Almighty God.

Wherefore, I must tell you the truth, according to the plainness of the word of God.

For behold, as I inquired of the Lord, thus came the word unto me, saying, Jacob get thou up into the temple on the morrow, and declare the words which I shall give thee, unto this people.—(A) 169: 2-13; (U) 109: 2-11.

From the foregoing admonition, we see that polygamy was denounced as a sin, a wicked practice, a crime, an abomination before God and man, a practice that breaks the hearts of the wives and children.

After Jacob had given his admonition to the Nephites against pride and polygamy, he said:

And now I make an end of speaking unto you concerning this pride. And were it not that I must speak unto you concerning a grosser crime [polygamy], my heart would rejoice exceedingly, because of you. But the word of God burthens me because of your grosser crimes.—(A) 171: 29-31; (U) 111: 22, 23.

THE REVELATION OF GOD AGAINST POLYGAMY

Jacob said:

For behold, thus saith the Lord, this people begin to wax in iniquity; they understand not the Scriptures: For they seek to excuse themselves in committing whoredoms, because of the things which were written concerning David and Solomon, his son.

Behold, David and Solmon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord.

Wherefore, thus saith the Lord, I have led this people forth out of the land of Jerusalem by the power of mine arm [Spirit], that I might raise up unto me a righteous branch

[(A) 16: 7; (U) 11: 1] from the fruit of the loins of Joseph.

Wherefore, I, the Lord God, will not suffer that this people shall do like unto them of old.

Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the word of the Lord: for there shall not any man among you have save it be one wife; and concubines he shall have none: For I, the Lord, delighteth in the chastity of women.

And whoredoms are an abomination before me: thus saith the Lord of Hosts.

Wherefore, this people shall keep my commandments, saith the Lord, or cursed be the land for their sakes.

For if I will, saith the Lord of Hosts, raise up seed unto me, I will command my people: otherwise they shall hearken unto these things.—(A) 171: 32-39; (U) 111: 23-30.

The word otherwise as used here, means contrariwise, to the contrary, oppositely, etc. (See Webster's Dictionary. Also see the following references: Matthew 6: 1; Romans 11: 6, 22; Philipians 3: 15; I Timothy 5: 24; and Hebrews 9: 17.

The word shall used in the thirty-ninth verse does not necessarily mean "commanded to do." Webster says, "The words shall and will are often confounded by inaccurate speakers and writers."

If they will not keep God's command concerning marriage, then "they shall [or will] hearken [or do] these things"—the things which David and Solomon did, also some of the Nephites, that of practicing the crime of polygamy.

Jacob, continuing his rebuke of the Nephite polygamists, said:

My brethren, ye know that these commandments were given to our father Lehi [(A) 16: 7; 48: 7, 8; (U) 11: 1; 31: 7, 8]; wherefore, ye have known them before; and ye have come under great condemnation: for ye have done these things, which ye ought not to have done.—(A) 172: 44; (U) 111: 34.

Yes, they did otherwise—contrary to the commandments God gave on marriage.

Now let us turn back and take a look at the law of marriage as given of God to Lehi. Nephi recorded the matter as follows:

And now I would that ye might know, that after my father Lehi had made an end of prophesying concerning his seed, it came to pass that the Lord spake unto him again saying, that it was not meet for him, Lehi, that he should take his family into the wilderness alone; but that his sons should take daughters to wife, that they might raise up seed unto the Lord in the land of promise.—(A) 16: 7; (U) 11: 1. See also (A) 172: 39; (U) 111: 30.

* * *

The sons of Lehi did what the Lord commanded. Nephi said:

And it came to pass that I, Nephi, took one of the daughters of Ishmael to wife; and also, my brethren took of the daughters of Ishmael to wife; and Zoram took the eldest daughter of Ishmael to wife. And thus my father had fulfilled all the commandments of the Lord which had been given unto him.—(A) 48: 7, 8; (U) 31: 7, 8.

FROM this we see that the sons of Lehi observed the one-wife system of marriage as they had been commanded of God to do in order to "raise up seed unto the Lord."

The same law of marriage is referred to by the Prophet Malachi, who said:

Yet ye say, wherefore? Because the Lord hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously; yet is she thy companion, and the wife of thy covenant. And did he not make one? Yet had he the residue of the Spirit. And wherefore one? That he might seek a godly seed. Therefore take heed to your spirit, and let none deal treacherously against the wife of his youth—Malachi 2: 14, 15.

In connection with the above statement of Malachi, read (A) Doctrine and Covenants 42: 7; (U) 42: 18-26; (A) 49: 3; (U) 49: 15-17; (A) 111: 2 (deleted from the Utah Doctrine and Covenants beginning with edition of 1876); Book of Mormon (A) 16: 7; 171: 32-34; (U) 11: 1; 111: 23, 24.

Again we wish to quote from Jacob's admonition to the Nephites; he said:

Behold, the Lamanites, your brethren, whom ye hate, because of their filthiness and the cursings which hath come upon their skins, are more righteous than you;

For they have not forgotten the commandment of the Lord, which was given unto our fathers, that they should have, save it were one wife; and concubines they should have none; and there should not be whoredoms committed among them.

And now this commandment they observe to keep; wherefore because of this observance in keeping this commandment, the Lord will not destroy them, but will be merciful unto them; and one day they shall become a blessed people.—(A) 173: 54-56; (U) 112: 5, 6. See also (A) 210: 33; 654: 1; (U) 136: 5; 436: 1; Doctrine and Covenants (A) 49: 3; (U) 49: 15-17.

I now wish to quote from a book entitled, Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R. N. Baskin, formerly Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah. He had much to do with a number of polygamist criminals such as Bill Hickman and others; thus he was well informed concerning the Utah Mormons' doctrine of polygamy and their claim that Joseph Smith taught it.

In chapter XII under the caption, "The Alleged 'Revelation' of Polygamy," after giving a number of quotations from the Book of Mormon against polygamy, the judge made this statement:

In view of the quotations I have made from the Book of Mormon, this would have been the natural answer to Joseph's (supposed) request so far as it relates to David and Solomon.

Judge Baskin said that if Joseph Smith had asked God how he justified David and Solomon in their polygamy, Joseph would have received the following answer:

My dearly beloved servant, have you so soon forgotten that in the Book of Mormon, which I have inspired you to translate, I stated in most positive and unambiguous terms that that act of David and Solomon, his son, in having many wives and concubines was abominable before me and rendered them less righteous than the filthy Lamanites, for they have not forgotten the commandments of the Lord which was given unto their fathers, that they should have, save it were one wife, and concubines they should have none.—Page 157. (This book was published 1914.)

HEBER J. GRANT, late president of the Utah Church, denounced polygamy as being an unclean practice. The Associated Press news dispatch reported him as saying: "The old belief that Mormonism involves polygamy was dying out, and a proper admiration for the clean living of the Mormon people was taking its place."—Deseret News, September 9, 1937, page 13.

The Salt Lake Tribune in a reprint from the Canadian Express Dispatch quotes Mr. Grant as follows: "A proper admiration for the clean living of the Latter Day Saint people is replacing the old ideas of Mormons as polygamists." September 10, 1937.

According to this statement of Mr. Grant, section 132 of the Utah Doctrine and Covenants is false, for God has said, "No unclean person can inherit the kingdom of heaven."—Ephesians 5: 5.

In the Utah Church Quorum Bulletin for the Melchisedec priesthood, it is stated that "two major sins had crept into the ranks of the Nephites during the ministry of Jacob." This quarterly lists the first sin as pride and the other as polygamy which brought forth the denouncement of the Lord through Jacob. (This is an endorsed quarterly, first quarter for 1938, page 22.)

As "God is unchangeable from all eternity to all eternity" (Book of Mormon (A) 770: 19; (U) 517: 18), why would he turn a sin into a virtue? (However, a sinful man may become righteous, through the "divine law" of regeneration. See Isaiah 1: 16-18 and Ezekiel 18: 21, 22.)

EVIDENTLY, after the Prophet Jacob had delivered the revelation of God against polygamy to the Nephites, they repented of it.

Here is what Mosiah had to say about the family life of the Nephites in his day:

And it came to pass that when they came up to the temple, they pitched their tents round about, every man according to his family, consisting of his wife, and his sons and his daughters, . . . from the eldest down to the youngest, every family being separate one from another.—(A) 210: 33; (U) 136: 5.

Even down to the time of the coming of Jesus, the righteous Nephites were under the one-wife marriage system. Nephi said:

And now it came to pass that when Jesus had ascended into heaven, the multitude did disperse, and every man did take his wife and his children, and did return to his own home.—(A) 654: 1; (U) 436: 1.

In order to "raise up righteous seed," the Lord ordained the one-wife system of marriage. See the following references: Genesis 2: 23, 24; Malachi 2: 14, 15; Book of Mormon (A) 16: 7; 48: 7, 8; 172: 36-39; 173: 54-56; (U) 11: 7; 31: 7, 8; 111: 27-30; 112: 5, 6; Doctrine and Covenants 42: 7; 49: 3; 111: 2-4; (U) 42: 22-26; 49: 15-17.

If he had commanded his people to practice polygamy, he would have provided a way for them to have carried out that command. Nephi said:

I know that the Lord giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them.—(A) 7: 65; (U) 5: 7.

Here is what the Lord said to latter-day Israel through Joseph the Seer: "Let no man break the laws of the land for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land."—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 5; (U) 58: 21.

ing is a center of education. The church school is for the children. The preaching and worship services, the many departmental meetings, the prayer meetings, and other features are all different kinds of adult education—efforts to change and transform the lives and characters of the members.

Yet we have not organized church-wide adult education in as effective a program as we could and should. Such a program awaits a new concept of the importance and administration of adult education and the services of teachers who are able to give the necessary leadership and instruction.

One of the difficulties that has hindered church work so many years has been the tendency of men to receive ordination to the priesthood and then wait for something to happen. Generally not much happens unless they take the initiative. If men prepare for service, opportunities to lead and to serve will surely come to them. L. J. L.

Food Chats

By B. MILDRED NELSON

TO PRESSURE-COOK or not to pressure-cook—is that your problem? What pressure cooking does to foods depends upon the way in which you use your pressure cooker. If you are careful to put only those foods that are well adapted to pressure cooking into the cooker, and if you do not overcook any of them, pressure cooked foods come out both tasty and nutritious with lots of time and fuel saved.

Ascorbic acid (vitamin C) and thiamine (vitamin B) are the two well-known vitamins most easily destroyed by cooking. In their destruction in vegetables, meats, and fruits, usually three factors play a part. Water dissolves them, air oxidizes them, and heat speeds both the dissolution and the oxidation.

In the pressure saucepan, the amount of water is reduced greatly from that usually used in cooking. The food itself comes in contact only with steam which has replaced much of the air during the first few moments in the pan, thus reducing oxidation to a minimum. And although the temperature is high, it is maintained for such a short time that the destruction of vitamins is usually as little as or less than that experienced in other methods of cookery.

Less tender cuts of meat, cereals, dried legumes, dried fruits, and starchy vegetables all are especially well adapted to pressure cooking. With them, the savings in fuel and time are the greatest because they ordinarily require long, slow cooking. Some other vegetables such as carrots, green beans, and whole beets cook beautifully under pressure. You can even "bake" custards in two minutes after the cooking temperature is reached or prepare luscious steamed puddings in a comparatively short time.

Rarely cook a tender cut of meat in the pressure saucepan. Tender meats are much more tasty cooked by dry heat methods. Many succulent vegetables take such a short time to cook properly that pressure cooking isn't necessary. The five minutes required for steaming spinach, six to twelve minutes for tender young corn, ten minutes for a whole cauliflower head, seven minutes for cauliflower flowerets or for tender green cabbage, are so few that little if any time is saved by using pressure. It's almost impossible to keep from overcooking all but a few of the frozen vegetables if they're put under pressure, so check the cooking time to see which you'll thaw and cook in that manner and which you'll turn directly into a small amount of boiling water and cook in a pan.

Getting the Most Possible Good From Vegetables

To get the most good from the foods you cook by any method, you must treat the food right. Potatoes need to wear their jackets right to the dinner table. No vegetable likes being cut into pieces. The more times you cut the vegetable, the less real good it can do you when you eat it. And every vegetable, with the possible exception of potatoes, should come from the pan while it's just at that crisp tender stage at which it can be cut with a fork as if it were cooked, yet can be picked up by spearing with the fork without falling apart.

Vegetables, like people, should be beautiful when they grace a table. Clear bright colors are never found in overcooked foods.

These same rich colors can be kept only if food is treated according to its likes, too. Red vegetables like acid. It's easiest to keep them red if they are cooked in soft water or if a bit of food acid such as vinegar or lemon juice is added after they are cooked. Add it after they're cooked, for it's hard to cook them done if you add it at first.

Green vegetables detest acid. It's easiest to keep them a brilliant green if they are cooked with the lid off, at least during the first few moments of steaming when the volatile acids are creeping out of the vegetable and into the steam. If these acids get into the water and make it acid, the poor vegetable can't keep from turning that pale olive green that takes so many appetites away. Hard water helps to keep them bright green, and cooking to the just-done stage is a "must." Soda is sometimes used to help keep green color, but in the amounts we often use, it speeds the destruction of vitamin C and B¹. We suggest that it not be used—at least not until we know more about the amounts that can be used safely.

Whether they're being cooked in a pressure saucepan or by any other method, to get the most from any food, every bit of liquid must be used. The drippings from the meat, the liquid from the vegetables, the syrup from the fruits—all contain water soluble vitamins and minerals that mean added health to you and your family.

Because food always gives up some of its vitamins and minerals to the cooking liquid, you'll do well to use only a small amount of liquid—certainly no more than you can serve. You can do it and save money on fuel at the same time if you will. And you'll find the food ever so much more tasty than when drowned in liquid.

We use one-fourth cup water or less for a whole panful of fresh vegetables unless the lid has to stay off a long while. Have the utensil hot and the water boiling before food is placed in it. Cover closely, unless it's a green vegetable. Keep the heat high until the vegetable is hot and the water is boiling again.

The Home Column

Then turn the heat low as you can turn it and still keep the water bubbling lazily.

There's no real reason to keep cooking water bubbling and dancing as a torrential mountain stream. The food cooks no faster than when its just lazying along, for without pressure the temperature of water can go no higher than 210° at sea level no matter how hard it boils. When it bubbles violently, the fuel cost soars, more vitamins are coaxed out of the food and destroyed.

As for members of the family, if they want their money's worth, they should come quickly when they hear the "dinner" call. After the food is cooked and is being kept hot, the vitamins are simply slaughtered. The only way you can save them is to eat them soon.

Since every time foods are reheated, more vitamins are lost, try to plan left-overs to be served in ways that will save those vitamins. Use them often in salads in which they're not reheated at all. Or serve them in creamed or casserole dishes in which the escaping vitamins are trapped in a sauce that will be eaten, because it's good to the last drop.

Aluminum Cooking Utensils

By B. MILDRED NELSON

HAS A SALESMAN tried to scare you into tossing out your aluminum ware and purchasing another kind of equipment? If he has, you are one of thousands who has been subjected to false propaganda designed to make you a little poorer and a few utensil companies richer. Don't you believe him!

In the first place, if aluminum in food were poisonous, all of us would long since have been dead. Aluminum occurs naturally in almost every food grown. It is the most abundant of the metallic elements in the earth's crust. To avoid it would mean to quit eating natural food. And, of course, all foods made with double-acting baking powder would have to be taboo, for aluminum is one of the ingredients in it.

Second, our bodies are so constituted that very little aluminum ever is absorbed into the tissues. Whether that which is absorbed is necessary to life, we do not yet know; but certainly it is not toxic to the usual individual.

Third, the quantities of aluminum, transferred from cooking utensils to foods are extremely minute. Some reported tests have indicated ill effects from the use of compounds of aluminum, but those tests have been made using hundreds and even thousands of times as much aluminum as is found to normally occur, even in acid foods cooked in aluminum. To administer proportional quantities of salts of iron, or other minerals known to be necessary for life, would also bring about serious if not fatal effects.

A film of aluminum hydroxide does form on aluminum when water stands in it, whether that water is just water or vapor, or whether it contains foods that are not acid. Some foods produce other types of film. Acid foods will dissolve these films, but they may also be removed by scouring. Of course, we prefer to use clean bright utensils, but there is no evidence to indicate that using a darkened one is dangerous.

Actual tests, some using human beings as test animals, have been made at such reputable institutions as Johns Hopkins University and Iowa State College. These have given no evidence of danger from use of aluminum cooking utensils. As late as 1947, Russell M. Wilder, M.D., of Mayo Clinic, stated specifically that that clinic has no evidence of such danger. In fact, he called attention to the fact that many physicians have been successfully using an aluminum compound, in amounts many hundred times as large as are found in foods cooked in an aluminum, in ulcer treatment.

Frightening customers into purchasing other types of cooking utensils through fear of cancer, ulcers, and other bodily disorders has become so vicious that the Federal Trade Commission has been called upon to issue cease and desist orders to curb the practice. The postmaster general's office has stopped much of the dissemination of anti-aluminum propaganda by issuing fraud orders against those who used the mails thus maliciously, and has carried through with convictions and penitentiary sentences for some.

Don't permit yourself to fall victim to any such false tales.

Tenancy

How much thought and care we give our body as compared with that which we give its God-given inhabitant, the Soul!

If we disciplined and nurtured our souls as conscientiously and fearfully as we do our bodies, allowing them to make the growth God intended they should, we would not be so alarmed about his notice to vacate. Righteous living is the best death assurance we can have; it is our guarantee of a future abode in God's kingdom.

LETTERS

On Marrying "in the Church"

According to my memory, the statement has been made that about eighty per cent of the young men of the church marry nonmembers and that an even higher percentage of church girls marry "outside the church." The problem might amount to "supply and demand" or maybe "distribution." Be that as it may, one is justified in thinking there is such a problem.

The percentage indicated probably covers church membership as a whole. In organized areas, it may not be so unfavorable; and while it is not easy to believe that persons, if given an opportunity, would choose to marry nonmembers, still the figure is stubborn, and one is moved to ask "why"?

Our church membership comes at a higher price than the membership of most other churches. If people are willing to pay the higher price to belong to this church, then one might say there is something which does not "add up" if members do not use the principles which the higher priced membership provides—unless somewhere along the line, there is lack of help or guidance, which might favorably reduce the percentage of hazard. And hazard it is, for observation shows that marrying "outside" generally discourages active participation in church work.

It has been said that district, stake, and general church activities serve as a means (although perhaps in a secondary way) of meeting this need, but the limiting effect of circumstance, vocation, and responsibility cuts rather sharply into the final equation. Most of us know the limiting influence of a thin purse. Then there is one's work. The pleasant time of year for reunions is harvest time for rural people. Conference, in the spring, is planting time; in autumn, harvest.

This matter cannot be dealt with in a crude or wholesale manner. Those who are in need of help, will probably be sensitive and not take kindly to anything which has the appearance of paternalism. That there are real difficulties in the path of any measure intended to improve this situation is clearly apparent, but difficulties are simply something to be overcome.

This question may gradually become one which receives more attention as did the matter of filing annual financial statements. Doctrine and Covenants 111 is not exactly a commandment, still the principle is similar to that which is expressed in Genesis 8:3, Inspired Version, "The daughters of thy sons have sold themselves." II Corinthians 6: 14, 15, 16: "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers." The early Christian Church knew this problem, and Noah, also. It is for this age to contribute to human progress by finding an answer.

Appearance of Three Nephites

I greatly enjoyed reading the letter by Bessie Jensen which appeared in the February 5 Herald. I have thought much about the work entrusted to the Three Nephites, and would like to relate an experience my mother had while attending the General Conference in 1930. Mother always went early to the meetings so that she could get a seat where she could hear and see well. As she watched the people assembling for Communion service, she noticed three men walk in together and take seats near the front of the auditorium. They were large, well-built men, and she felt the power of the Spirit as they entered. She was told that they were the Three Nephites, and that they would partake of the Communion. As the service drew to a close, she looked to see if they were still present, but the seats they had occupied were empty.

I also enjoyed reading Glen Wiley's letter in which he told of his true experiences. Certainly God is willing to do his part when we do ours. Has he not promised that he will pour out such great blessings we shall hardly be able to contain them? Worldly pleasures are enticing, and it is not always easy to live a Saintly life, but if we are willing to place our hand in Christ's, he will help us to be victorious.

Tribute to Mrs. V. D. Ruch

As I read the article by Mrs. V. D. Ruch in a recent Herald, I thought of the wonderful work she and her husband are doing. I remembered, too, the address she gave at a reunion held at Pawnee, Oklahoma, in 1937. It was the source of much inspiration for me. I have always hoped to measure up to her high standards of womanhood. She is indeed a challenge to the women of the church.

I ask to be remembered in prayer that I may strive more diligently to serve the Master.

BRIEFS

PEORIA, ILLINOIS.—March 20 was the date selected by the Peoria Branch to commemorate the reopening of branch activities on March 17, 1940. For the occasion, all-day services were held in the Peoria Women's Club auditorium. President Israel A. Smith was the honored guest and speaker. The other branches of the district joined in the day, swelling the group present to about 300. Prayer service was held at 9:30 a.m., President Smith talked at 11 o'clock, giving an outline of the life and work of the first prophet, Joseph. A basket dinner was held at noon and at 2:30 p.m., President Smith gave positive proofs of the divine help in the translation of the Book of Mormon. Part of the afternoon program was spent in consideration of plans for the building of a church home in the branch.

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.—The Pittsburgh District conference was held April 9 and 10. On Saturday afternoon, there were classes for the priesthood and women's department. The annual business meeting took place Saturday evening. Elder Henry Winship was sustained as district president. Elders T. A. Dershimmer and J. Hough were elected counselors. Sunday's activities included a fellowship service at 9:15, a sermon by Seventy Merle Guthrie at 11:00, a musical program at 2:30, and a sermon by Elder John Carlyle at 3:15. The theme, "Preparation," was carried throughout the conference.

FORT MADISON, IOWA.—In commemoration of the beginning of the Restoration Movement, the Zion's Leagues of the Nauvoo District met in Fort Madison, Iowa, on Saturday and Sunday, April 9 and 10. Registration was held at 10:30 Saturday morning, followed with a pot-luck dinner. In the afternoon, fellowship and recreation were enjoyed in the form of a scavenger hunt. At 6:30, Missionary Cecil Ettinger presided over a Restoration Festival banquet as master of ceremonies. The tables were decorated in the official church colors, and each one signified some place in church history.

Sunday morning at eight o'clock, a young people's fellowship service was held with Pastor Melvin E. Francis in charge assisted by Brother Max Hornmek. The theme was "The Challenge."

H. E. McKiernan taught a special young people's class on the subject, "Teaching Youth About God." As a climax to the two days' activities, the young people presented the 10:40 service which was a summarization of the missionary work they had been doing prior to the festival in each of their individual branches.

HOLDEN, MISSOURI.—Stake President Ward Hougas preached on Wednesday night in a Holy Week series at the Baptist church in Holden.

Missionary John Puckett has been doing extensive missionary work in Holden. On Easter Sunday, there were twenty-one baptisms. Combined with eight recent baptisms in the same city, Brother Puckett's work shows a fine aid to the growth of the branch.

BEND, OREGON.—This mission was established June 20, 1948. George Dyer, a priest, at that time was ordained to the office of elder, and Robert Henderson was ordained to the office of priest. The group has recently started holding prayer meetings on Wednesday evenings at different homes. The Sunday services are held in the Norway Hall at the corner of Galveston and Columbia. Saints not yet contacted are invited to come to services or address Brother Dyer or Brother Henderson at Bend, Oregon.

PUYALLUP, WASHINGTON.—Bishop Monte E. Lasater of the Northwest, covering Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and British Columbia, conducted a pre-Easter series of sermons in this branch. On Easter Sunday, as a result of this series of sermons, eleven persons were baptized.

PORT HURON, MICHIGAN.—This branch commemorated the one hundred and nineteenth birthday of the Restoration on April 6 by having a baptismal service at 7:30 p.m. There were twenty-one baptized. One hundred and forty-three were present to enjoy the occasion. These baptisms were mainly the results of two classes that J. J. Ledsworth was conducting. One was for a ten-week period on Friday evenings and the other was for a five-week period on Tuesday evenings. The confirmations were on April 10 at the morning and evening services, and some of the children were confirmed during the junior church. Seven family units were completed. Fourteen of the number baptized were young married adults. Brother Ledsworth and E. E. Smith are conducting a follow-up ten-week period of classes giving the new members instruction from the Church-member's Manual.

SOMERVILLE, MASSACHUSETTS.—Skipper Eugene Carter is proud to announce that during May the Sea Scouts of the Somerville (Boston) Branch will have obtained a thirty-eight foot former Navy Tender. It will be the SS "Marlin," made available through the Boston Council of the Boy Scouts of America. Skipper Carter and the Sea Scouts meet at the church every Friday evening at 7:30.

HAMILTON, ONTARIO.—On Sunday, March 27, in the Hamilton R. L. D. S. Church, Paul Mark, infant son of Brother and Sister Max Kettlewell was blessed by Evangelist B. H. Hewitt of Toronto and Elder Urban E. Essery of Hamilton, Ontario.—Reported by F. ELDON OLIVER.

PROVO, UTAH.—Patriarch William Patterson preached a week's series of services at this branch during the latter part of April. Many of the Saints received their patriarchal blessings at this time. An excellent spirit was felt among the Saints during the week.—Reported by MRS. ELOISE M. LUCAS.

PORT HURON, MICHIGAN.—On March 29 and 30, the Flint-Port Huron District Women's Institute was held at Port Huron, Michigan. Large attendance was evidenced both days. Mrs. Myron McConley spoke about the experiences of herself and Brother McConley while in England and Europe. She also gave five lectures during the two days on the theme, "For Zion We Build Our Home."—Reported by MRS. W. R. KAPNICK.

REPORTS and OBJECTIVES OF THE CHURCH -- 1948 - 1950

Contained in this pamphlet are the reports of the First Presidency, the Quorum of Twelve, The Presiding Bishopric, the Department of Religious Education, and the Department of Women to the General Conference and the General Church. The statement of policy of each of these groups is also included. For use by administrative officers and others concerned.

Prayer Makes a Difference

By LEWIS E. SCOTT

THE MOST VITAL PART of our religious life is centered about prayer. The understanding and intelligence we manifest toward this most powerful medium can determine whether or not our personal religious responses are full and satisfying or vague and empty.

What is prayer? What does it mean to you? Does it make any difference in your life? Does it affect your personality and behavior as an individual?

Prayer is so personal, yet at the same time so inter-related with the affairs of others, that it is difficult to outline its borders or its sphere of influence. We know for a surety that man has never outgrown prayer. Ever since the dawn of human intelligence, he has sought companionship with the Divine. Savage peoples used magic chants and worshiped the gods of nature. We today, in our weakness, want to feel a kinship with a greater power and to commune with the source of life itself.

There are several definitions of prayer which I like. Here is one of my favorites: "Prayer is the heart's sincere desire—the opening of the heart to God." All true saints have been men and women of prayer; the more saintly they were, the more they prayed and the more real their sense of need was. Jesus sensed fully the necessity of prayer for all people. His words are like beacon lights: "Men ought always to pray and not to faint." "Whatever things ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye shall receive, and ye shall have whatsoever ye ask." But prayer isn't merely uttering words or assuming a physical position. As Victor Hugo wrote, "Certain thoughts are prayers. There are moments when—whatever the attitude of the body—the soul is on its knees."

WHEN YOU PRAY, do you pray with wisdom and intelligence? Prayer is an art, not a form of magic whereby we gain our desires merely for the asking. It is designed for the uplift of the soul—not to pull God down to us, but to lift us up to God. Prayer can mean an increase in spiritual power, an enlargement of life, a transformation of character, or it can be selfish and

He holds the office of priest and has served as young people's leader in the Southern California District. He and vain. It is a misuse of prayer to pray for trifles which have no significance for our inner life. After all, one of the most important ends and aims of prayer is the development within us of a better self. Anything which does not bear upon this development has no place in genuine prayer. Our prayers must be God-centered, not self-centered.

Do your prayers, as a vital part of your religious life, affect your personality and behavior? When you are distressed or tired, when you need guidance, when you are bewildered or irritated, do they determine your reactions to those about you? If your prayers actually create in you a new and better self, and in turn your new self creates a better environment about you, then your prayers do make a difference. There is a wise saying: "He who rises from his prayer a better man, his prayer has been answered!"

Surely prayer must be effective and fundamental in our lives, for we use it in our most solemn ordinances — marriage, baptism, healing of the sick, confirmation, and ordination. If, as a people, we can approach the throne of grace in humility with the proper conception and appreciation of God there will be a fusing together of spiritual life and power which will surmount tremendous obstacles and bring about the evangelization of the world. There will be truly a fulfillment of God's words revealed in Doctrine and Covenants, section 18, verse 6: "Pray always and I will pour out my spirit upon you, and great shall be your blessing; yea, even more than if you should obtain treasures of earth and corruptibleness to the extent thereof Canst thou be humble and meek and conduct thyself wisely before me? Yea, come unto me, thy Savior."

Prayer does make a difference. God has told us so. It is the difference between an abundant, enriched life and a mere existence. We must become a prayerful people. When we do, we shall also be an inspired people.

Prayer is listening to God, as well as talking to him. It is more than asking him for help: it is asking him for wisdom, understanding, and self-control. In trouble we come to God and ask him what we should do.

First Zion's League Project Report

By the Department of Religious Education

The following is a report of the project, "I Recognize my Stewardship by Complying With the Three Parts of the Financial Law." It is felt that other Zion's Leagues beside those reported here have complied with this project, though their reports have not been sent to the Department of Religious Education.

This project is world-wide, and all Leagues were asked to take part. Special emphasis was given it by branch leaders who sent their reports to the district leader, who in turn sent their reports to the Department of Religious Education. Here are the results:

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Viola Frankier, Rural Route 3, Box 13, Kaw, Oklahoma, requests prayers for her grandson, Billy Varner of Renton, Washington, who has a skin rash; for a nonmember friend, who is suffering from rheumatism; for her daughter, Mrs. Hazel Parker, and her husband and family, that they may receive the physical and spiritual blessings of which they are in need.

WEDDINGS

Miller-Moran

Rose Lauree Moran, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Arno Moran of Broseley, Missouri, and John Miller, son of Mr. and Mrs. Conrad Miller of Walla Walla, Washington, were married April 17 in Walla Walla. Elder Roy Stearns performed the double-ring ceremony. They are making their home in Walla Walla.

BIRTHS

Mr. and Mrs. H. Wayne Lynch of Minneapolis, Minnesota, announce the birth of a daughter, Cynthia Harlean, born March 25. Mrs. Lynch, the former Clarice Shippy, is a graduate of Graceland College, class of '47.

A daughter, Karen Sue, was born April 2 to Mr. and Mrs. Leo Holman of Wayne City, Illinois. Mrs. Holman is the former Norma Fae Henson of Mt. Vernon, Illinois.

A daughter, Bethel Amy, was born on March 4 to Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Gelhorn of Chicago, Illinois. She was blessed on Easter Sunday at First Chicago Branch. Mrs. Gelhorn is the former Doris Stutman.

DEATHS

BROWN.—Alta May Edwards, was born February 5, 1874, at Lowrey City, Missouri, and died March 12, 1949, at Kansas City, Kansas, where she had lived for the past thirty-three years. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on December 9, 1891. She is survived by her husband, Elder W. S. Brown; four daughters: Mrs. Helen Ricks, Mrs. Doris White of the home; Mrs. Anamae Jameson of Kirkwood, Missouri; and Mrs. Jewell Leavy of Kansas City, Kansas; two grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. An only son died in infancy. Interment was in the Maple Hill Cemetery in Kansas City, Kansas.

HINDERKS.—Temme H., son of Henry and Mary Hinderks, was born at Burlington, Iowa, on November 16, 1872, and died at his home in Lamoni, Iowa, on February 20, 1949. At an early age he moved with his parents to Stewartville, Missouri, where he grew to manhood. Here he joined the Reorganized Church, of which he remained a faithful member throughout life. In March, 1895, he was married to Martha Marks; one son was born to them. They moved to Lamoni when their son entered Graceland College and continued to live there. Mrs. Hinderks died on October 17, 1936. On June 5, 1938, Mr. Hinderks married Allie P. Erwine, who was his devoted and attentive companion during the intervening years.

He is survived by his wife, Allie, of the home; his son, Marvin; one grandchild; two great-grandchildren, all of Des Moines, Iowa; a sister, Anna Johnson of Cameron, Missouri; a brother, Henry of Stewartville; and two stepdaughters: Mrs. Larene Coggeshall of Independence, Missouri, and Mrs. Ann Willis of Clinton, Illinois.

ARNOLD.—George Francis, son of Benjamin K. and Isabel Arnold, was born in the Homestead at Nauvoo, Illinois, on August 25, 1872, and died April 5, 1949, at his home in Independence, Missouri. He was married to Ida Johnson on February 8, 1899; two daughters were born to them. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on January 27, 1907, at San Francisco, California, where he assisted in missionary work. Following the death of his wife, Ida, on January 17, 1912, he was married to Anna M. Nederveldt on October 14, 1913; one son was born to this union. For many years he owned and operated a shoe repair shop in Independence; when he gave up working in his own shop, he devoted every Tuesday to repairing shoes at the Campus Shop.

He is survived by his wife, Anna, of the home; two daughters: Mrs. Leona Rinehart and Mrs. Elvira Davis, both of Independence; a son, George, of Warrensburg, Missouri; two stepsons: Bert Nederveldt of Detroit, Michigan, and Edwin Nederveldt of Warsaw, Missouri; a sister, Mrs. Viola Garrison of Keokuk, Iowa; nine grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Glaude A. Smith at the Roland Speaks Chapel. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

BROWN.—Mollie Lois, daughter of Harrison and Eliza Shewe Brown, was born November 3, 1868, at New Canton, Illinois, and died March 17, 1949, at Quincy, Illinois. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on March 29, 1916, and was an active worker until ill health prevented her attending services. She had lived alone since the death of her father in 1906. She has no immediate survivors. Elder E. E. Thomas conducted the funeral at the Reorganized Church in New Canton. Burial was in the Brown Cemetery.

McCAULEY.—M. George, was born on December 3, 1883, in Melancthon Township, Dufferin County, Ontario, and died October 8, 1948. He was married to Ethel French on March 22, 1921, and was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in that same year. He spent four years and eight months overseas with the Fourth Battalion Machine Gun Unit in World War I and was awarded the D.C.M., the Mons Star, Full Service Medal, and Victory Medal. He received his honorable discharge in April, 1919.

He is survived by his wife and a son, John. A daughter, Sadie, preceded him in death in 1930. Funeral services were conducted by Elder H. A. Dayton at the McMillen Chapel in Dundalk, Ontario. Members of the Legion attended as a body and last post was sounded.

FETTING.—August, was born at Adair, Michigan, on February 17, 1866, and died suddenly at the home of his grandson in Auburn, Michigan, on April 1, 1949. He moved to Cash, Michigan, as a young man and on October 3, 1887, was married to Eleanor Cash. Mrs. Fetting preceded him in death on November 26, 1925. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since February 9, 1892.

Surviving are three sons: Arthur of Port Huron, Edward of Cash, and Harry of Baltimore, Maryland; eight grandchildren; and fifteen great-grandchildren. Eldon C. Winters was in charge of the funeral service. Burial was in the Watertown cemetery.

BRONSON.—Claude L., son of Abigail and William Bronson, was born in Plano, Illinois, in 1871, and died April 1, 1949, at the home of his son, Burr, in Pittsville, Missouri, where he had been visiting for several days. He was married in 1889 to Ermina Wildermuth of Plano; seven children were born to them. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since childhood.

He is survived by his wife, Ermina, of Independence, Missouri; four sons: Elder Lester W. of Grandview, Missouri; Elder Marion of Independence; Elder Burr B. of Pittsville; and Hiel J. of Helena, Montana; and two daughters: Mrs. Ada Wilcox of Independence and Mrs. Milla Ferguson of Pittsville. Another daughter, Mrs. Ruby Gouldsmith, died in 1923. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Warrensburg, Stake President Ward Hougas officiating. Interment was in the Sunset Hill Cemetery in Warrensburg.

RINEHART.—Ira Newton, son of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Rinehart was born September 20, 1876 and died at his home in Mt. Ayr, Iowa, on April 14, 1949. He spent nearly his entire life in the vicinity of Allendale, Missouri. On March 27, 1898, he was married to Pearle Montgomery; twelve children were born to them. He became a member of the Reorganized Church in 1912. He was highly respected by his neighbors and friends.

He is survived by his wife; nine sons: Vern, Clyde, and Claud of Mt. Ayr; Velma, James, and Lloyd of Hatfield, Missouri; Homer of Redding, Iowa; Leland of Grant City, Missouri; and Calvin of Creston Iowa; three daughters: Myrtle Tschuden of St. Louis, Missouri; Jeannetta Miller of Allendale, Missouri; and Dorine Rinehart of St. Joseph, Missouri; four brothers; four grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Allendale, L. G. Holloway officiating. Burial was in the Allendale cemetery.

LAMBKIN.—Byrne Story, son of Edwin and Martha Lambkin, was born December 23, 1877, at Canboro, Michigan, and died April 5, 1949, at Holden, Missouri. He grew up in Kingsley, Michigan, and was baptized into the Reorganized Church on May 26, 1892. He was ordained a priest in 1901, an elder in 1906, and a high priest in 1913. His first General Conference appointment was in 1902 and his ministry took him to Minnesota, Iowa, and Indiana, as well as his home state, Michigan. On May 5, 1907, he was married to Ella Brackenbury, who survives him. Before his sudden and unexpected death, he had been doing missionary work in Central Missouri Stake. He had taught a class of young men at Holden in the morning, and preached at Kingsville in the evening on the Sunday before he died.

Besides his wife, who resides at Holden,

Missouri, he leaves four sons: Joseph B. of Ukiah, California; Walton H. of St. Louis, Missouri; Roland C. of Warrensburg, Missouri; and Fred of Independence, Missouri; one daughter, Bernice of Independence; a sister, Mary Reynolds of Lamoni, Iowa; a half-sister, Ella Doty of Traverse City, Michigan; and twelve grandchildren. Pastor S. E. Miffin and Stake President Ward A. Hougas were in charge of the funeral service; Bishop G. L. DeLapp gave the memorial address. Interment was in the Fairview Cemetery.

OMOHUNDRO.—Alice P., daughter of Joseph and Margaret Schaffer Parsons, was born September 6, 1872, in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and died April 15, 1949, at her home in Altadena, California. She was married to Edward E. Omohundro on March 29, 1894, who survives her. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church for about fifty-five years, helping to build up the Pittsburgh Branch and giving a great deal of time and energy to the church wherever she lived. She was also a member of the Dames of Malta, Emsworth, Pennsylvania, chapter, and Mothers of the Defenders of the Flag, Pasadena chapter.

Besides her husband, she leaves seven sons: Elmer A. of Altadena; Myron B. of Ben Avon, Pennsylvania; Sidney E. and Arthur S. of Leadville, Colorado; Herschel C. of Columbus, Ohio; De Vere P. of Pittsburgh; and Lawrence S. of Torrance, California; a daughter, Mrs. Margaret Raisbeck of Pittsburgh; two sisters: Mrs. Martha Parsons and Mrs. Emma Fairley of Willoughby, Ohio; sixteen grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. Funeral services were held in Pasadena, California, Evangelist Louis J. Ostertag and Elder Warren K. McElwain officiating. Burial was in the Mt. View Cemetery in Pasadena.

TEEL.—Ida May, daughter of Wesley and Sarah Newberry, was born at Argyle, Iowa, on January 11, 1878, and died at the Glendale Sanitarium in California on April 13, 1949, following two years of illness. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church as a child and spent her lifetime as a servant of it. She was married to Dr. Ambrose Wilson Teel, who for many years was Church Physician. Since 1912, they had made their home in Los Angeles, California, where Sister Teel assisted him in his church work and also served as nurse and secretary in his medical office. Often she would act as his chauffeur, leaving home early to care for patients who had to see the doctor before going to work. She was hospitable, kindly, artistic—a woman of outstanding character who discharged her duties with quiet dignity whatever the circumstances. For nearly fifty years she found her happiness in being a helpmeet to her husband. Her name is immortalized in the hearts of many throughout the church who have been ministered to by her and her capable husband.

Funeral services were held at Forest Lawn in the Church of the Recessional; Pastor G. E. Tickemyer and John W. Rushton officiated. Interment was in the family lot.

SCHAEFER.—Elise Fredericke, daughter of Karl and Wilhelmine Fezer, was born October 4, 1904, at Haubersbronn, and died April 12, 1949, at the Osteopathic Hospital in Kansas City, Missouri. She was reared in the Evangelical Lutheran Church. After graduation, she moved to the city of Stuttgart where she was married to Fred Schaefer in a civil ceremony on September 24, 1935. Following their arrival in America, they were remarried in a church ceremony in Brooklyn, New York, on March 14, 1936, by Pastor Ephraim Squire; a daughter, Elsie Emma, was born to them in 1940. Elise was baptized into the Reorganized Church on June 5, 1938. Since 1942, she and her husband had made their home in Independence, Missouri. She enjoyed living in the United States and never desired to return to Germany.

Besides her husband and daughter, both of Independence, she is survived by a brother, Karl Fezer; and three sisters: Mrs. Emma Glassle, Mrs. Elsa Lutz, and Mrs. Helene Otle, all of Haubersbronn. Services were conducted at the Speaks Funeral Home in Independence, Elders Evan A. Fry and C. L. Olson officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

BENNETT.—John Eugene, son of John W. and Hannah Schreuer Bennett, was born April 5, 1874, at Holland, Michigan, and died March 25, 1949, at Manistee, Michigan. At the age of ten, he moved with his parents to Free Soil, Michigan, where he was married to Bessie Jane Tucker on September 30, 1899. Nine children were born to them. On August 8, 1909, he was baptized into the Reorganized Church. He served the church in many ways, as a teacher, superintendent of church school, bishop's agent, and branch president. He was ordained an elder in 1910, and had been pastor of the Free Soil Branch since 1930. His energy, courage, interest, devotion, and faith were an inspiration to all who knew him.

He leaves his wife, five sons, two daughters, and thirteen grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Free Soil, Elder Allen Schreuer officiating. Burial was in the Maple Grove Cemetery.

LeRAY.—Ava B., daughter of Joseph and Barbara Bruce, was born November 12, 1866, in Indiana, and died March 16, 1949, at the Omak Hospital following a brief illness. She was married on February 14, 1899, to Stephen C. LeRay at Hebron, Nebraska. Both were baptized in the Columbia River in 1920, and their home was always open to missionaries. They gave generously of their material gain and were diligent tithepayers. Their kindness found expression not only in the church but in the community where they lived; no one in need who came to them for help was ever turned away. They lived in Nebraska, Illinois, Colorado, Oregon, Idaho, and Washington spending the past twenty-one years in Chelan Falls, Washington, where they celebrated their golden wedding anniversary on February 14 of this year.

Mrs. LeRay is survived by her husband, Stephen; two sons: John Swartz (by a previous marriage) of Chicago, Illinois; and Kenneth LeRay of Tacoma, Washington; two daughters: Mrs. W. B. Wilson of Okanogan, Washington, and Mrs. J. M. Chandler of Manson, Washington. One son and one daughter preceded her in death. Funeral services were held at the Manson Community Church, Bishop Monte Lasater officiating. Interment was in the Riverview Cemetery.

SPERRY.—Anna Christina, daughter of William and Harriette DeBender Mengel, was born May 19, 1875, near Reading, Pennsylvania, and died at her home near Greenwood, Missouri, on March 22, 1949. With her family, she moved to Iowa, then homesteaded in northwestern Nebraska, where she was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church. She had lived in Missouri since 1908.

She is survived by her husband, Nelson Sperry, of the home; three sons: Robert of the home; Charles of Independence, Missouri; and Roy of Greenwood, Missouri; a daughter, Mrs. Harriette Greene of Shawnee, Kansas; a sister, Pearl Mengel of Kansas City, Missouri; a brother, I. F. Mengel of Lee's Summit, Missouri; and eleven grandchildren.

DALY.—Allie, son of William and Sarah Daly, was born November 15, 1862, at Louisiana, Missouri, and died April 21, 1949, at Maryland Heights, Missouri, where he had lived since 1910. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1911. Later he was ordained to the office of priest, then elder, becoming pastor of the Maryland Heights church in 1915. He worked untiringly to obtain a church home for the congregation there when others said it was impossible to get one. During his thirty-four years of ministry, he saw the branch grow and flourish. He also was a member of the board of education for two years and contributed much to civic projects.

He is survived by his wife, Minnie, and a son, Frank L. Daly. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Frank McDonald at the Maryland Heights church. Interment was in the Fee Fee Cemetery.

 SAFETY ISLAND

The light changed—green, amber, then red—and the surging stream of car traffic slowed grudgingly to a halt at my left, the radiator grilles grinning at me like the teeth of voracious sharks, and motors throbbing impatiently to resume their mad pace. I hurried across as some drivers edged forward, unwilling to give me even the brief interval promised by the red light. "Sharks!" I thought with a shudder, giving a glance at the hard, fanatic faces of the drivers.

I reached the safety island as the light changed again, and the cars roared forward on both sides of my narrow refuge, with injury and death only a few inches away. I looked gratefully at the strong concrete guard that sloped up to a high shield to protect the little group of pedestrians huddled on that small concrete island. It was the only place of safety in all that wild, rushing river of dangerous traffic.

As I waited for the streetcar, I thought of the parallel of my situation there, and in relation to God and the universe. We live in a world and a universe that is filled with danger, evil, and peril; danger to the body, danger to the soul. We turn to God because the only place of safety is with him.

 A CHILD'S VERSION

On a recent visit to the Center Place, I was talking to friends. One of the youngest, a bright-eyed five-year-old, reciting the Twenty-third Psalm, said, "The Lord is my shepherd; that's all I want." His eyes shone, he smiled, and his little face was alight with faith.

An impressive sentence sermon was given in his slightly scrambled version of the Psalm. If we adults could so trustingly accept the fact that the Lord is our shepherd, and sublimate our wants, how quickly the kingdom would come into being.

—Mrs. Ernest O. Sherman.

* There is nothing funny about getting caught in a snare composed of your own good intentions.

It is a paradox of life that people who are always moving never get anywhere.

When you leave the old ladder to success for a new one, you always start again on the bottom rung.

It may be true that this road does not lead to success. But unless you stay on some road, you will never reach a destination.

 LEGACY

William T. Gard, for years a valued worker with young people at the Walnut Park Church, Independence, passed away recently, and many people have cherished some kindly memories of him. This is one I remember:

I was passing the neat home where he was then living, and saw him at work on a small job where a less careful eye than his would have seen nothing to do. To make talk, I asked, "What are you doing, Brother Gard?"

"I'm beautifying Zion," he answered, and smiled.

It was the kind of statement one remembers a long time. It is good to think of whenever you are doing some small, apparently unimportant task, and will lift it and you above the mean and ordinary level. That thought is a good legacy from a fine man.

BOOK OF MORMON FLANNELGRAPHS

Story-Builders

In Black and White

Herald House has three sets of Book of Mormon Suede-O-Graphs in black and white. The script for each one is contained in the book, BETWEEN THE COVERS OF THE BOOK OF MORMON by Verda Bryant.

Easy to Prepare

Each plate is printed on a suede finish paper which does not need to be backed with flannel, but will readily adhere to the usual flannel backgrounds. Colors to be used are indicated for each scene and character.

To Save You Money

No duplications of characters have been made, unless more than one is needed for the same scene. For this reason, Unit 2 cannot be used without having Unit 1.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

William W. Phelps

A Favorite Phelps Hymn

O Jesus! the giver of all we enjoy,
Our lives to thy honor we wish to employ;
With praises unceasing, we'll sing of thy name,
Thy goodness ne'er ceasing, thy love we'll proclaim.

With joy we remember the dawn of that day,
When, led by the Spirit the truth to obey,
The light dawned upon us and filled us with love,
The Spirit's sure witness sent down from above.

THE Saints Herald

SOME OF THE FINEST HYMNS of the church are monuments to the memory of William Wine Phelps, who was identified with the work of the Restoration from 1831 at Kirtland, Ohio, to 1845 in the "dark and cloudy day" at Nauvoo.

Brother Phelps adapted some words by Joseph Swain (1761-96), producing the majestic lines of "Redeemer of Israel" in Saints' Hymnal, No. 190, which has been used to open many a General Conference of the Reorganization, and has recently been named by President Israel A. Smith, "The Battle Hymn of the Church." W. W. Phelps gave lyrical beauty and reverence to "Earth With Her Ten Thousand Flowers" (No. 122), each verse ending, "God is love." He wrote one of our fine Communion hymns, "O God th' Eternal Father" (No. 384). There is a pentecostal note in "The Spirit of God Like a Fire Is Burning" (No. 414). "O Jesus! the Giver of All We Enjoy" (No. 31) is often used in prayer meetings.

Phelps was the first publisher to operate a printing plant for the church. In the fall of 1831, he was authorized to purchase a printing press and type at Cincinnati, Ohio, and take them to Independence for use. He published The Evening and the Morning Star, the first monthly issue of which appeared in June, 1832. He was appointed to help review, select, and prepare revelations to the church for publication in the Book of Commandments. This work was ruined when a mob destroyed the publishing house and the Phelps' home on July 20, 1833.

After this disaster, he went to Kirtland where he was entrusted with two more responsibilities, the preparation of the Doctrine and Covenants for publication and editorial work on the hymns that were compiled by Emma Smith for church use.

Phelps was a man of courage and offered to give his life as a ransom, with other leaders, to protect church people from persecution during the troubles in Missouri.

NEWS AND NOTES

BAPTISMS FOR APRIL

The General Church Department of Statistics reports that 267 baptisms were listed with them for the month of April. This is the best April since 1930.

BOOK OF MORMON IN BRAILLE

Apostle Reed Holmes tells of the work of one Latter Day Saint woman in Denver who, with several of her friends, not members of our church, is performing for the church a fine service. Mrs. Myrtle Fortney of Denver is a member of a Red Cross chapter, the ladies of which have learned to write Braille, the written language of the blind. Through her suggestion, the women of the chapter are making copies of the Book of Mormon in Braille. This is being done at no cost to our church. All we have to do is to bind them. The pages are all done by hand and shellacked to give a permanent finish. These books will be kept by the church in a lending library for our members who are blind.

FLINT, MICHIGAN

President Israel A. Smith stopped in Flint on his return trip from Detroit in March, and preached to a large congregation. Mrs. Emma McConley visited the branch during April and told of her experiences in Europe with her husband, Myron McConley.

As a result of cottage meetings held in Flint during March by the pastor and local priesthood, sixteen candidates were ready for baptism on Easter Sunday. The services started with a sunrise service at six o'clock, followed by breakfast served by the women's department at 7:30 and the baptisms at 9. The following became members of the church: Mr. and Mrs. Donald M. Easlick, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Upsel Sumner, Mr. and Mrs. Alva Green, Gary Finch, Florida Finch, Donald Finch, Gwen Finch, Carol Thulen, Alden Vanderkarr, Rosalie Whitcomb, Kathleen Whitcomb, Forest Nickerson, and Claude Sansan.

CINCINNATI, OHIO

A series of sermon lectures was held in the Mayfair room of Hotel Sinton in Cincinnati during the last week in March by Loyd R. Adams, Southern Ohio District missionary. The first ordination service ever held in Cincinnati took place April 24, with District President F. T. Rockwell in charge, assisted by S. E. Dixon of Dayton and Claude Barker of Middletown, Ohio. The ordinations of Everett L. Smith to the Melchisedec priesthood and W. T. Cline to the Aaronic priesthood are felt to be a step forward in the work of the church in this group.

OWEN SOUND DISTRICT CONFERENCE

Sunday, April 24, at Owen Sound, Ontario, the district held a special conference to approve the call of fourteen men to the priesthood. Bishop Joseph Baldwin and Missionary Louis Zonker were in attendance. The day's activities began at 9:30 with prayer service in charge of District President Gordon Farrow. Bishop Baldwin preached at 11. Business session was held at 2. At 3 o'clock, three classes were held. Mrs. George Mortimore, district women's leader, took charge of a women's class, Bishop Baldwin spoke to the priesthood, and Brother Zonker spoke to the pastors. An invitation from the Grand Valley Branch to hold the next annual conference in Grand Valley, Ontario, was accepted.

Introducing . . .

G. LESLIE DeLAPP (page 5) received his early training as a banker and specialized in properties connected with farming operations. After being graduated from North High School, Minneapolis, Minnesota, in 1913, he took extension courses from the University of Minnesota, the Y.M.C.A. School, the American Institute of Bankers, and special courses at Graceland while serving as stake bishop.

Brother DeLapp was first ordained in 1925 as priest. That same year he was called to the office of elder, and the next year was ordained high priest and bishop. From 1926 to 1928 he served as bishop of the Minnesota District; from 1928 to 1931, as stake bishop of Lamoni Stake; from 1931 to 1940, as counselor to the Presiding Bishop. In 1940 he became Presiding Bishop and Trustee for the church.

Bishop DeLapp was married to Ardyce Lucile Case in 1926. They have three children—Cicely Ann, Patricia, and George Leslie, Jr.

His social training and love of people has led him to serve his community in several capacities and always with distinction and honor. He was president of the Independence Kiwanis Club in 1947. He is on the board of trustees of the Blue Cross Hospital Service of Kansas city, is a member of the Independence Chamber of Commerce, served as a member of the Jackson County Charter Commission in 1948, and was president of the rural Jackson County Community Chest in 1947-1948. From 1917 to 1918, he served with the United States Army. In his church-connected service, in addition to his work as Bishop, he is vice-president of the Central Development Association and executive secretary of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. He is rated in America's Who's Who.

MAURICE LEE DRAPER (page 8) was born in Arma, Kansas, on August 24, 1918. He was graduated from San Bernardino, California, High School in 1935. He received an A.A. degree from the San Bernardino Junior College in 1937, and since then has taken courses from Denver University; Spring Hill College, Mobile, Alabama; the University of Alabama; University of Missouri; and Kansas City University. He won school honors in the speech department and was high school champion in extemporaneous speech.

Brother Draper was ordained at the age of sixteen to the office of deacon. Two years later he became a priest; later in the same year he was ordained an elder. In 1940 he was ordained to the office of Seventy, and in 1946 became a president of the Seventy, which office he occupied until he was called to the apostleship in April, 1947. Brother Draper's first appointment to the mission field came in 1937, when he was eighteen years old.

In 1940 he was married to Olive Ruth Willis. They have three children—David Lee, 8; Edward Alan, 6; Janette Louise, 3.

Tardy Amends

AFTER A NUMBER of inquiries from the press by telephone a few days ago, which I was not able to answer satisfactorily, one of them from a reporter for the Quincy Herald, I took occasion to visit Springfield, Illinois, where I contacted Mr. John B. Monroe of Macomb, a member of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly of Illinois, on May 3 and was informed as to the facts.

Mr. Monroe, a member of the House from a district which includes Hancock County where Nauvoo is situated, had introduced a resolution which attempts an "honorable amende," so far as the Legislature is concerned, for the expulsion of the Saints from Illinois about a hundred years ago. The resolution, jointly signed by Representatives Monroe, Robbins, Gibbs, and Schaumleffel, is as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION NO. 53

WHEREAS, The City of Nauvoo, Illinois, which was the home of the community of Latter-day Saints or Mormons from 1839 to 1946, is one of the great scenic and historic sites of America; and

WHEREAS, Mob psychology was largely responsible for the regrettable incident which led to the exodus of the Mormons from Illinois, an event Governor Ford, Stephen A. Douglas and many other distinguished citizens endeavored to prevent by an amicable settlement; and

WHEREAS, Prior to leaving Nauvoo, the Mormons had erected a monumental temple which was at that time the most magnificent structure in the West; and

WHEREAS, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are co-operating in the reconstruction of this historic edifice, which was destroyed by fire and storm a century ago; and

WHEREAS, The site of the temple, located on a lofty eminence overlooking a sweeping bend in the majestic Mississippi, is one of the most impressive and picturesque in America; and

WHEREAS, The restoration of the Nauvoo Temple not only would serve as a fitting memorial to the courageous band of pilgrims who here acquired the heroic determination to found a new state in the West, but also would add immeasurably to the attractiveness of historic Nauvoo and would create on the part of many Illinois citizens a new interest in the great movements which have played so prominent a role in the history of our State; therefore, be it

RESOLVED, BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS, That we wholeheartedly commend the decision of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the

Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to rebuild the historic Nauvoo Temple and bid them Godspeed in their efforts, and that we respectfully request the Governor, the Director of Public Works and Buildings and other appropriate officers of the executive department to co-operate in every practicable manner in this laudable undertaking; and be it further

RESOLVED, That suitable copies of this resolution be sent to his Excellency, Adlai E. Stevenson, Governor of Illinois, to the Honorable George Albert Smith, President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and to the Honorable Israel A. Smith, President of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

IT WILL BE NOTED that the fourth preamble suggests that there has been some sort of collaboration between the Mormon Church and the Reorganized Church looking toward a "reconstruction" of the Nauvoo Temple. The basis for the assumption is not at all clear to me, though Representative Monroe informed me that a few days before my visit to the Illinois Capital, a delegation of citizens of Nauvoo had been in Springfield in the interests of the proposal. Mayor Horton's name was mentioned. Governor Stevenson also had visited our Nauvoo properties recently.

A representative of the Associated Press informed me that the "Salt Lake Church" had been told about the resolution and that there was some excitement there about the matter, though Representative Monroe said I was the first to interview him from either church.

I was introduced to Representative Robbins, one of the cosigners of the bill, and had the pleasure of meeting Governor Stevenson, the Speaker of the House, and other notables.

I found a lack of information about the churches named, most of the men I met being entirely ignorant of the controversy as to where the true Latter Day Saints church is, some even thinking the Reorganization and Utah Church are identical. I dispelled as much of the misunderstanding as possible in the time at my disposal.

It will be noted also that this resolution is at most only an expression of regrets and good will. There is nothing in it which even implies specific appropriation or proposal to extend state funds to build the "reconstructed" temple. I was informed however that the legislature is appropriating a large sum of money for "park" purposes, and that some portion of these funds might be available for use in reconstructing the temple.

Ten years ago, soon after I accepted a place as counselor to President Frederick M. Smith, he and I met at the Quincy Historical Building with Mr. Paul Angle, then Secretary of the Illinois Historical Society; Father Tholan, Catholic priest at Nauvoo; Apostle A. E. Bowen, and Mission President Hinckley of the Mormon Church; and, as I recall, representatives of the press, Burlington Railroad, and the Park Commission of the state. I believe a Mr. Newberry, an artist of some local notoriety, was also present.

The proposal at that time was for the development of the "flats" at Nauvoo and the restoration of many of the buildings, residence and otherwise, and a "replica" of the temple to be located on the original temple site.

This project made little progress, mostly, I understand, because it was not supported sufficiently by the legislature; but partly—and it may also have been a pivotal factor—because the proposal as developed at this conference was to place the Utah Mormons in control of the publicity bureau (to be maintained in the "replica" of the temple) from which their church propaganda was to be distributed. This was a wholly unthinkable thing as we looked at it then and as we still view it.

Mr. Angle registered an immediate protest. Father Tholan also demurred. And President Smith declared our opposition to it.

We came away, and the whole

Joint Council Actions

AT A RECENT SESSION of the Joint Council of First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve and Presiding Bishopric some important actions were taken, looking toward the strengthening of our missionary endeavor and the conservation of our material resources to this end. Further study is required on many of the matters considered, and the Council will reassemble in September to pursue these studies. At that time, and as occasion requires, the church will be kept informed of what is being done.

The following appointments, assignments, and reassignments were made and will take effect as soon as local circumstances permit:

APPOINTMENTS AND ASSIGNMENTS

- Thomas R. Beil to Los Angeles Metropolitan District; Los Angeles Central Church objective.
- Harry L. Doty, Southern, Central, and Northern Michigan.
- N. Gerald Gabriel, Far West Stake; Stewartsville, Maple Grove, and Osborne objectives.
- Avon Yap, Hawaii.
- Ray V. Webb, Spokane District; Spokane objective.

project ceased to be considered.

It may be that this proposal of 1939 is the basis of the assumption implied in the resolution that the churches had participated in an effort to "rebuild" or "restore" the temple.

We will be pleased to watch developments. We believe we can properly conserve and protect our interests (both material and spiritual) at Nauvoo. The "park" aspect is closely identified with an ambitious "scenic highway" proposal which Illinois is endeavoring and fostering through the state from north to south, which is routed through Nauvoo.

ISRAEL A. SMITH

REASSIGNMENTS

- Ward A. Hougas, Eastern Colorado District; Denver objective.
- Harry J. Simons, Central Missouri Stake, Stake President.
- T. A. Beck, The state of Michigan, Bishop.
- Willard C. Becker, Central Missouri Stake, Stake Bishop.
- R. Melvin Russell, Flint-Port Huron District; Flint objective.
- Merle E. Howard, Far West Stake; St. Joseph objective.
- A. O. Crownover, Independence, Missouri; Assistant to the First Presidency.
- Jack A. Pray, Gulf States District; Mobile objective.
- Elwood E. Smith, Chatham District; Chatham objective.
- Warren A. Chelline, Flint-Port Huron District; Port Huron objective.
- Elder Garland E. Tickemyer, who has had responsibility at Los Angeles Church, will now labor in the surrounding metropolitan district.

THE WORK IN LOS ANGELES

IT WAS MY PRIVILEGE to spend the past winter in Los Angeles with my son, Lynn, his wife, Lorene, and the two boys. Passing by the weather, which was unusually "unusual," I wish to give a brief and sketchy report on my impressions regarding church conditions in that big city area.

As you no doubt have noted in news reports, general church officers in connection with local church officials made a careful survey of that area, as was also done in other large centers of population. As a result Los Angeles, including Long Beach, Venice, Inglewood, and other towns in the immediate territory, were organized into a district, with former Stone Church pastor, Garland Tickemyer, as president of the "Los Angeles Metropolitan District."

The whole area was carefully studied and charted. It is planned—and the plan is taking actual form—to plant missions and organized branches systematically, so that no one in all that vast area need go more than five miles to worship in one of our churches and hear our message preached—and in Los Angeles five miles is just around the corner from where you are. Of course, many will not need to go that far. The response already had in the newly-planted missions is reported as highly gratifying in the way of attendance of both members and nonmembers. Church buildings and quarters are being erected, rented, or purchased to accommodate the missions.

Rather obviously such a set-up will reach more people than could be reached in one or two large central church buildings, and it will give many more members of the priesthood and other church workers an opportunity to make a contribution and grow through experience and service.

I found the project most appealing and stimulating. If it receives general support, is wisely administered and persistently carried forward, it should make over the map of Los Angeles, so far as our church work is concerned. Of course we must not forget the many good men and women, including ordained men, who over the long years of the past have labored to keep the work alive in that city and to bring it to the point where the time seemed ripe for such a program of expansion.

PAUL SAID, "I have planted and Apollos has watered, but it is God that giveth the increase." Paul, the missionary, plants; Apollos, the pastor, cultivates; God gives the increase. We may read the text like this, with a promise, "If the missionary will plant and the pastor will cultivate, God will give the increase"—remembering always that we are told that "all are called" according to the gifts and callings of God unto them to accomplish "the work entrusted to all" (Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8).

It is to be hoped that some one better acquainted with the details of the project of which I have written will report it in more detail for the readers of the Herald. I may close by saying that, being human, I had an especial pleasure to meet with the Saints of the East Los Angeles Branch where my son is pastor and to work and worship with him and his family. It is an old branch, now housed in a new and attractive church building. Brother Lumm, who for so many years shepherded that flock, is still active in the branch work; also Sister Jasper, and other fine, dependable church workers. Others, perhaps unknown to us and forgotten, have passed on to their reward, and though "unknown soldiers" in the army of the Lord, their Master has not forgotten them. Their reward is sure.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

OUR INCREASING RESPONSIBILITIES

By G. L. DeLAPP

An address given at the Aaronic Priesthood class on October 9, 1948

YOU ARE HERE because you have a sense of responsibility as ministers of Jesus Christ. Since I wish to emphasize responsibility this morning, I will begin by placing upon each one of you a share of the responsibility which is mine of ministering to the membership of our church.

We proceed upon this fundamental premise: "It is required of the Lord, at the hand of every steward to render an account of his stewardship both in time and in eternity. For he who is faithful and wise in time is accounted worthy to inherit the mansions prepared for them of my father."—Doctrine and Covenants 72: 1.

If there was ever a time in the experience of the church when it was essential to face the tasks of ministry, it is today. And this does not apply to the members of the Aaronic priesthood only, but to every member of the priesthood throughout the church. But there is an equal responsibility which rests with the Aaronic priesthood, and I wish to emphasize particularly this morning the extent to which we as members of this Aaronic order can assume responsibilities in behalf of the church, for on it is coming an ever-increasing load of ministry to the multitudes of the earth.

One other premise upon which I wish to build is that we are working to bring about the consummation of God's eternal purpose in man. There is the statement, "It is my work and my glory to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man." I don't wish to be lost in a discussion of generalities; to some these may appear to be statements that are general in character, but they are not. They place upon us the specific responsibility, first of all, of accounting to God. Accountability goes beyond the act of filing a financial statement; that act is but one of the methods or techniques of giving recognition to the fact that we acknowledge our stewardship to God. It goes beyond the perfunctory act of serving as a deacon in looking after the comfort of the Saints in the house of worship. It goes beyond the act of ministry of the teacher who seeks to bring light and understanding to families and to assist in the solution of family problems. It goes beyond the act of serving the Communion by the priesthood.

Accountability must, in its fullest sense, become a yielding in obedience to the will of God and the complete consecration of all that man has of life, talents, and resources. Unless we think of accountability in this complete sense, we become lost in the maze of the individual acts we perform daily. We certainly don't want that to happen, yet we don't want to lose sight of these services to which I have referred in the broader aspects of our goals.

Take a look with me at the church, and in that looking, relate yourselves to this great work to which you are called. We have talked in the broad terms of evangelization, but what do we actually mean by it? Does it mean the sending of money to carry on the work abroad? Yes, that is part of it. But is there not some way that it comes closer to us?

Let us begin in the home. Here is the beginning of all the work of the Aaronic priesthood—the teaching within the home itself of the member of the Aaronic priesthood, the teaching of the fundamental principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ, of faith, of repentance, of baptism; these are basic responsibilities. Then we reach out from the home to those to whom we are to minister. And there is no place at which a member of the Aaronic priesthood can stop and say that his ministry has been completed.

What does this ministry incorporate? It includes contacts with youth, the teaching of the financial law, the teaching of all of the fundamentals of life. Undoubtedly, there has been pointed out to you the breadth of the educational program that is being inaugurated to train and qualify men of the Aaronic order to become servants of the people. Our church is undertaking a great program of evangelization. We look at conditions in the world today and talk about chaos, war, and social problems. As we see these conditions, we look about for a solution. But the solution to these problems can come only as our church moves forward in the discharge of its responsibilities. It no longer suffices that we shall have one or two foreign missions, as we think of the needs of a world which is in distress. We see imposed upon the church the load of missionary projects, of the establishment of centers or bases in foreign fields, some of which we have not as yet touched. One might well ask the question, "What does that have to do with the membership of the Aaronic order whose duties primarily seem to be in the field of local responsibility?" I shall attempt to show how this responsibility finally is imposed upon the members of the Aaronic order, and that our success in foreign fields is, in the final analysis, dependent upon our ability to train and qualify members of the Aaronic priesthood.

It may have seemed to some in years past that the members of the Aaronic priesthood are almost a lost order; but as we view these new conditions—as we see the increasing responsibilities which come to us as a church—we find it necessary to go back to the very root of our church organization, which fundamentally is the Aaronic order, and there begin the preparation which will enable us to carry the loads being imposed upon the church, first by the very nature of the purpose of the church, and second because of conditions throughout the world.

AS WE LOOK to our Zioniac organization, we see that our progress will be dependent upon our ability to develop a trained and qualified Aaronic priesthood. And I shall refer to this again and make specific reference as to why I believe it to be true. In addition to the increasing responsibilities which come to us in our missionary endeavors in missions abroad, there are also those which are closer home. We talk about our Zioniac organization. This can be perfected in the proportion that we establish strong nuclei of branches or congregations in these central areas, and that in the perfection of this organization there is a quality of ministry given to the Saints which will keep them constantly pointed in the direction of the greater and broader goals of the church. Thus we see that there is being imposed upon the church today an increasing load of pastoral ministry.

Today we are trying to solve many of our problems by placing pastors in these strategic centers. Then we find that in too many instances a pastor in charge of a congregation of some 300, or 400, or 500 Saints is unable to give personal ministry. There is the tendency of the church today to professionalize this ministry and to have those pastors under full-time appointment who attempt to serve the congregation in all areas of its need. Wherever we have one individual pastor who is attempting to serve a congregation of the church in which he must act day and night without utilizing the Aaronic priesthood in service to the members, we find a branch in a precarious condition. These loads of ministry are constantly being enlarged, and the only solution to the problem of pastoral ministry can come through our Aaronic priesthood. If for one moment we think the time can ever come when our church can add to its ministerial appointee list sufficient men to carry the load of all this pastoral ministry, we are thinking in the most fallacious terms. We must recognize that there will be a continuous expansive growth, an outreach on the part of the church, and that outreach can best come through the functioning of the Aaronic priesthood.

Now, does this preclude other organized groups, including the youth, within the church? Not at all. It means that through the work of the Aaronic priesthood we can reach out and contact youth as never before in our experience. We are hoping that there may be imposed upon the Aaronic priesthood the additional responsibility of ministry to the youth of our church. This day by day contact is essential to the welfare of the youth. It is practically impossible for a pastor or even a parent to have this continuous contact with the young people which will point them in the direction of service to the church and an understanding of the basic principles of the gospel. To whom, then, may we look, to carry on this work with the youth of our church through daily association and contact? The membership of the Aaronic priesthood.

Some of the best contributions made to my own children have been through members of this order, not altogether as ministers, but as neighbors. In that neighborly association there has been given that which stimulated and encouraged the youth in my home to look toward the church. When a man functions as a Christian minister of the Aaronic order in association with youth—whether he has a badge on his lapel or not—he performs a most wonderful ministry.

There is the responsibility of ministry in the home, of teaching these fundamental principles of life. Our church is assuming a load of additional appointees, and we shall undoubtedly increase the appointee list in the future, but the solution to the problems facing us as a church, in evangelization, in Zioniac organization, is best found through the training and qualifying of men of this order. Does this mean that it is a substitute for the work of the other priesthood of the church? Not at all. It simply is a statement of fact that we begin at the beginning.

WHAT ARE THESE other increasing responsibilities we face as a church? We have been discussing at different times this whole procedure of Zioniac organization. How is it to become effective? It can become effective just in the proportion that we have a body of priesthood who believe in their accountability to God, and who discharge that accountability through compliance with the temporal law.

In Independence we have over 400 members of the Aaronic priesthood. In our work up to the present, we have been unable to get full participation either in compliance with the financial law or in compliance with the work of quorum organization. I have just read some letters written by Bishop Cackler, calling the attention of quorum officers to the fact that they had not completed the enrollment list for the educational work that is being carried on for the Aaronic priesthood. This is incidental, but nevertheless important, for we feel that we are headed in the direction of a program which will qualify the men of this order. However, there is need of co-operation, and unless there is this sense of accountability and responsibility, the program may die of its own weight or because of indifference of the members of the priesthood. Yet we continue to emphasize that it is essential for us to move forward constructively and creatively and qualify ourselves for the discharge of these responsibilities.

We, as a church, are assuming a financial load today greater than any we have ever undertaken in the years which are past. Does this have any significance to those who are members of the Aaronic order? Is there any relationship to that load, that financial obligation which we are assuming, and the work which is being done through the Aaronic order? Our ability to carry the load is going to be dependent upon the extent to which the men of this order function in their respective offices and are given the opportunity to so function.

We recognize some of the handicaps under which men labor. We know that at times there are difficulties they encounter in even getting the opportunity to serve. As our men become qualified, however, there is no doubt that greater avenues of service will open to them, and the need will become such that it is imperative they be used in service to the membership of the church.

AS WE APPROACH the future, we are reminded of the fact that we are taking on new social obligations. There was a time in our experience when we said, "If a person has need, let him make application to the proper officer of the church." Now we are finding that the time has come in our experience when we do not stand as a church awaiting someone to come to us to call to our attention the needs of our members. The time has come when the Aaronic priesthood must reach out in ministry to the members of the church to find those who are in need. The purpose of creating an oblation fund is that it might be an extension of ministry, and this does not mean that we give unwisely, or that because we have money, we become careless in the way we apply it. It means that we give to the members of the Aaronic order new responsibilities because of this increasing load the church is obliged to carry. The men of the Aaronic priesthood must qualify themselves to make contacts with the membership of the church, to seek out those who are in distress and who, because of no fault of their own, are lacking the basic necessities of life. Thus through the Aaronic priesthood there can be extended a charitable ministry, charitable not in the sense that we are doing something for individuals because of social duty, but out of a love for our fellow men. We have requested that members of the Aaronic priesthood be assigned these responsibilities throughout the entire church.

We are asking them to approach these problems wisely, keeping in mind that conservation of resources is essential and therefore our resources are not to be dissipated. We must keep in mind that we as ministers of Jesus Christ have within us the power to heal and to rehabilitate through bringing relief to those who are worthy and in need.

AS WE LOOK to the future of the church in Zioniac organization, we think of the responsibilities we have of purchasing land, and of locating people upon this land. Here again is another responsibility that must be assigned to the members of the Aaronic priesthood. They need an understanding of the procedures to be followed by those who are gathered to these central areas, of the costs that are involved in the acquisition of land, and of the qualities desired in those who participate in this gathering. Therefore, our first step as we think in terms of Zioniac organization is that of educating the priesthood relative to the processes which are involved in the whole work of the Gathering.

cal change of location on the part of the individual. It is essential that we inform the members of the Aaronic priesthood of the procedure to be followed, of the forms to be filled out, of the questions to be asked and of the consideration to be given to those thinking in terms of a change of location. So we have attempted to include in our whole educational program those courses that point toward this perfection of ministry.

In past years we have had discussions of surplus, and every once in a while someone raises the question, "Well, when are we going to consecrate surplus?" Are we in a position to answer that question? And if we were to attempt to answer specifically by setting some date, we would be doing that which in our opinion would be both unwise and unjustifiable. But we can make an approach to the problem by saying there must be a broadening of our program until it reaches a larger percentage of our membership, so that there may be accountability on the part of the membership of the church which will finally lead to the consecration of surplus. With some 136,000 members on our records, and with only slightly over 29,000 having given a contribution of even ten cents, we should become aware of our stupendous task of broadening the base and strengthening the foundation of our financial structure enabling us to expand our activities both in the fields of evangelization and Zioniac organization.

We have some 5,000 acres of land. But what is 5,000 acres of land when we think in terms of the development of communities and the gathering of thousands of people to this central area? It is relatively insignificant. Our responsibility is to carry to the members of the church these facts, to impress upon them a sense of responsibility, to increase the number of contributors, to teach men and women the basic fundamentals of the temporal law.

The Fruit of the Spirit By Maurice L. Draper

The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.—Galatians 5: 22.

THE CREATIVE NATURE OF GOD is expressed in all his works. This is true in human personality as in the galaxies of the universe. Always marvelous, the miracle of creation is more so when it involves living creatures. In part, the inspiration of springtime lies in the mysterious unfolding of newborn life. And one of the abiding satisfactions of late autumn is the sense of secure abundance which accompanies the harvesting of ripened crops, the "fruit" of the earth.

Fruits—what an achievement of creation! They are not built up artificially, as a house is built. Even this is marvelous, but more amazing is the fact that fruits do not grow by external additions like a snowball. They grow from within. The powers of life in the innermost parts of the fruit work in an incomprehensible way to transform the nourishment drawn from the soil and atmosphere into living substance, and the fruit grows.

CERTAIN PERSONALITY traits of Deity, intended by him to be shared with men, by the Apostle Paul are called "the fruit of the spirit." These are not external additions to be put on or taken off at will; they grow within the Christian even as fruit grows on a tree. The powers of life within accomplish the miracle of this growth as part of the natural development of one who is created to be a "son of God." A normal, healthy, well-cultivated, properly fertilized tree cannot help producing an abundance of good fruit. So also does the normal, healthy Christian, cultivated by the Spirit of God, produce in abundance the "fruit of the Spirit" without external compulsion but as the result of the life within. It is the nature of one obeying divine laws to bear such fruit, and its production results from the inner impulsions of the Spirit of God.

The order of the listing of the fruit of the Spirit by Paul is significant. Love comes first in the list, with the others following. Upon examination of these divine traits, we discover that the others are all functions of love, which is the essence of the personality of God. They add nothing fundamentally to what has already been said in the term love. They simply define the functions of this first great movement in the heart of growing Christians. The fruit of the Spirit in them is love, and because of this, the others follow.

THE MINISTRY of the Spirit of God in human hearts creates love. The lover finds joy in his beloved. Friends are joyful in their companionship, and broken-hearted when for some cause it is destroyed. There is peace between the lover and his beloved. A person will not desert those he loves when they err. He understands them and even when they go astray, he is concerned about them. He longs for the restoration of their fellowship because he loves them.

One will suffer many things at the hands of his beloved. Even carelessness, thoughtlessness, and rebellion will not cause one to reject those he loves. He is long-suffering and patient in an eternal hope that the gentle insistence of his love will bring to pass the miracle of conversion in the hearts of the rebels. And he is gentle; he knows that rough handling may damage the delicate texture of affection and break the ties that bind hearts together.

ONE WHO BEARS the fruit of love is good. He will not knowingly create any condition of distress for his love. He must be obedient to the laws of life for the sake of the blessing he brings upon the objects of his affection. He has an enduring faith in the basic integrity of his companions, and when they may fail at some specific point he says, "Father forgive them, they know not what they do." He then proceeds to trust them again and challenges them to do better by demonstrating his confidence in their fundamental honesty.

Meekness is a quality of the personality of one with divine love in his heart. He is not lifted up in vanity, exalting himself above his beloved. Rather he is the servant of those he loves, and in lowliness of heart seeks to minister to their needs. Modern definitions are not applicable here. This is not the meekness of cowardice. Rather it is the humility of loving service, and implies the courage to face any extremity for the sake of serving those who are loved. It was this kind of meekness which caused Jesus to submit to the cross, and which at the same time gave him the courage to face the pain and ignominy of this cruel experience.

Love is temperate. It is not given to excesses, but strikes the fine balance of serving without fawning, of sharing without demanding, of receiving without possessing.

The fruit of the Spirit is love. And in love is found all the rest of Christian virtues. In love one finds joy and peace. Love is patient and kind. Love is gentle. Love is good. The lover has faith in his beloved. He is not self-exalted. He is constant and enduring in his love without possessiveness, without domination, and yet without self-effacement.

BY FELLOWSHIP in the Church of Jesus Christ, through communion with God in prayer, by spiritual experiences through participation in the administration of the ordinances of the gospel, one may

Bear Ye One Another's Burdens

By PRESIDENT F. HENRY EDWARDS

THERE IS AN OLD STORY about a man who was traveling in the mountains and came to a place where a huge rock had rolled into the path and blocked his way. Since there was no other way around, the traveler did his utmost to move the rock, but to no avail. Soon he was utterly exhausted and sat down by the side of the road in the deepest dejection, wondering what would happen when night came and he was without food or shelter or defense. While he sat brooding, another traveler came up the path, and he, too, tried and gave up and sat down exhausted and fearful. Then another came, and another, and yet another. But the last comer, instead of sitting down to brood, said, "Brothers, let us pray to our Father in heaven; it may be that he will have pity on our distress."

After they had prayed with great earnestness, this last comer added, "Brothers, what no one of us could do alone, who knows but what we might achieve together."

So they got up and all pushed against the rock and the rock gave away, and the travelers went on their journey in peace. (Adapted from "Words of a Believer" by F. R. deLamennais.)

One wonders, of course, why travelers in such a situation needed to take time out to pray. One would think that the way out of their dilemma was apparent from the first. But it may be that they could not bring themselves to do so obviously wise and necessary a thing as to work together until they had prayed together. People are like that. Suppose, for example, that cultivate the garden of his life so that the life-giving power of the Spirit of God may work its miracle of creation and cause the fruit of the Spirit to grow within him, thus blessing all men and bringing to pass his own salvation.

one of the travelers had been a business executive, and another a labor union official, and another a Negro, and another a Jew, and yet another a good-intentioned but somewhat complacent and tradition-bound average man. If anything like this were so, then praying together was an important preliminary to working together. The spirit in which we face our common problems is a vital factor in the solution of these problems. This is probably why Paul wrote to the members of the church in Galatia, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ."—Galatians 6: 2.

THE VERY GREAT IMPORTANCE of this principle of burden-bearing, and of the spirit in which it is done, becomes a little clearer when we think about some who won immortal glory in the recent war. Think, for example, of the four young chaplains who gave their life-belts and their places in the lifeboats to their soldier comrades and chose certain death together, without fear and without regret. No one required them to do this. Any requirement there was came from deep down in their own souls. But it is not too much to believe that in those last uplifted moments, when they linked arms on the slanted deck and sang the great hymns of the Christian faith, they knew with certainty that in thus dying they did a "far, far better thing than ever they had done before."

That which is so glorious when done amid the dramatic tensions of war is really no less glorious when done quietly in response to the common, everyday needs of men. Bearing one another's burdens—taking other men's needs as challenges to our own nobility—is always a glorious thing.

On a cold day in January, 1817, in a gloomy vestibule outside the women's yard of Newgate prison in London, England, two of the guards might have been seen arguing with a lady. That lady was Elizabeth Gurney Fry; wellborn, cultured, gentle. She was determined to go into the prison yard alone, and the guards were telling her that such a thing was unthinkable. Nevertheless Elizabeth was obdurate, and finally she had her way. The gate was opened, and she walked quietly forward to meet the mob of dirty, noisy, diseased, ignorant, and astonished women; unarmed except for her natural dignity, her courage, her good sense, and her devotion. Lifting her hand for attention, she said, "Friends, many of you are mothers. I too am a mother. I am distressed for your children. Is there not something we can do for these little ones? Do you want them to grow up to become real prisoners themselves? Are they to learn to be thieves or worse?"

Of course those women listened to her and, in forgetting self for their children's sake, they rose above themselves. So was the work of prison reform begun, and from this Quaker lady's self-imposed burden-bearing sprang a new understanding and a new sense of responsibility among the people of England, France, Germany, and the United States, the value of which can never be measured this side of eternity.

A similar basic sense of stewardship, of a divinely imposed obligation to bear the burdens of the men, motivated Abraham Lincoln in the advice he gave to a client. Mr. Lincoln said: "We can doubtless gain your case for you; we can set a whole neighborhood at loggerheads; we can distress a widowed mother and her six fatherless children, and thereby get for you $600 to which you seem to have a legal claim, but which rightfully belongs, it appears to me, as much to the woman and her children as it does to you. You must remember, however, that some things legally right are not morally right. We shall not take your case, but we will give you a little advice for which we will charge you nothing. You seem to be a sprightly, energetic man. We would advise you to try your hand at making $600 in some other way.” —From Lincoln the Lawyer, by F. T. Hill. Copyright by Appleton-Century-Crafts, Inc. Used by permission.

IT IS A MATTER for deep satisfaction that all of us can recall many similar illustrations of stewardship in action. But neither those mentioned nor any others which we might recall, can match the self-forgetful burden-bearing for the good of all mankind which was such an impressive aspect of the life and ministry of our Lord Jesus Christ. We think immediately of the love which caused him to “steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem” (Luke 9: 51) that there in his own body he might demonstrate for every succeeding generation the stark awfulness of sin and the conquering glory of the love of God.

But his sense of stewardship was not born at Calvary. It was dominant in the life of the Master long before he set out on his last fateful journey to the Holy City. This is clear from a study of his parables. These were not just imaginary pictures; they have such a ring of truth that we can be sure they were lifted out of his own experience. If we use these parables as windows through which to look back into his early life, we can see how gentle he was with the disappointed children playing in the market place; how sympathetic he was with the fearful widow who had lost her money; and how kind he was—despite his weariness—when the multitude followed him without making reasonable provision for their own needs.

A Voice From the Past

Bishop Mark H. Siegfried has helped us by selecting some of the letters of W. W. Phelps published in 1834 in the church paper, The Messenger and Advocate. These letters were addressed to Oliver Cowdery and dealt largely with a description of the conditions he found in the Center Place. We believe our readers will find this description quite interesting because all the church is concerned historically and literally with Jackson County, Missouri.—EDITOR.

Lest I become irksome on too many things at once, let me turn to some of the advantages and disadvantages which are natural to the land as it is. It is a great advantage to have land already cleared to your hands, as the prairies are; and there is no small disadvantage to lack timber for fencing, fuel, and buildings. Notwithstanding there are many good springs of water, yet there is a want upon the prairies in some places; and, generally, water privileges for grist and saw mills, and carding machines and clothiers' works are scarce. That patriotism which results in good roads and bridges, labor-saving machines, and excellent mills, is yet dormant. I do not know of a clothier's works in the upper or lower country. It costs one fourth or one fifth of our grain to grind it. Run-round horse mills, or those on the inclined plane order for horses and oxen, are all the dependence at present. There is a small steam saw and grist mill of about ten horse power engine in Clay County; a steam saw mill at Lexington, and a flouring mill nearly finished on the Little Blue, in Jackson.¹ It may be supposed, in those states where Negroes do the work, that they can saw boards with a whip saw, and drive the team to grind in an animal power mill.

Let it be remembered that most of the land is free from stones, even too much so, for, excepting limestone in some places, there are very few, if any, for use. But suffice it to be that with all the lacks and inconveniences now extant, grain is raised so easy that a man may live as well on three days' work in a week here as on six in some other distant places. It is not uncommon for wheat, when ripe, to be let to cut and thresh at the half. Corn at twenty cents per bushel, and wheat at forty, are, however, the lowest selling prices latterly; and I conclude that from the great quantity of corn and wheat, or flour, necessary to supply the garrison, it will never be lower.² So much on things as they naturally are.

Now with all the country has, and all it has not, without witty inventions, let us reflect that God has made and prepared it for the use of his people, like all the rest of the world, with good and bad to try them. Here are wanting many things to expedite ease and opulence. Here sickness comes, and where does it not? The ague and fever, the chill fever, a kind of cold plague, and other diseases prey upon emigrants till they are thoroughly seasoned to the climate. Here death puts an end to life, and so it does all over the globe. Here

Jesus was already practicing the principle of burden-bearing when, as a carpenter, he gave the extra time and care needed to fit yokes more smoothly to the necks of the oxen, or when he fashioned with such patience the simple farm and household tools for which his neighbors looked to him. And in an even fuller sense he had the needs of all mankind on his heart when he set forth his deathless message in words of such simple clarity, and when he spent the whole night on the mountain in prayer, and—most of all—when he promised, “I will pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide in you forever, even the Spirit of truth.”—John 14: 16, 17.

Surely the Lord Jesus has earned the right to remind all of us of the kindly obligations laid on us by his love, and to say to us through the Apostle Paul: “Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ.”

And surely he has the right to expect us to accept this commission willingly and to discharge it gladly as we take our stand with him as pioneers of the new order, demonstrating the grace of mutual helpfulness in the quality of our work, in the breadth of our compassion, and in the outreach of our faith.

¹I have in my back yard one of the Mill stones from the old mill then being erected on the Little Blue River northeast of Independence. The stone was brought here from Liverpool, England, where it was hewn in 1832.

Ritual in Worship - Part 2

GROUP EXCLUSIVENESS

We have pointed out that ceremonial worship tends toward group exclusiveness. Unless the lesson hidden in the ritual is emphasized, the worshipers will be inclined to feel that they are God's favorites. There is no place in Christianity for an exaggerated group self-regard. The rituals of Christianity suggest the making or renewal of a worldwide social obligation.

The problem before the church is always to get the benefits of ritual without their abuse. The responsibility in this regard in a large measure lies with the shepherd of the flock. He must know human nature and apply the ritual in a way that meets its conditions and needs.

LATTER DAY SAINT RITUAL

Formulas fashion themselves as paths do, as beaten highways leading towards some sacred or high object, whither men are bent. Formulas begin by being full of substance . . . I hope none of us are ignorant withal of the true significance of true formulas: that they were, and will ever be, the indispensablest furniture of our habitation in this world.—Thomas Carlyle.

In various branches of Catholicism, ceremonialism is decidedly overdone. Man's approach to God is through formal words and ritualistic performance. Thus one may be careless in his moral and ethical conduct, since divine forgiveness may be had through this type of worship. In this manner, religion and life are placed in separate compartments. Protestantism is lacking in ritual, and, as a result, fails to get its solidifying influence and truth-revealing power. Ritual has had much to do with the solidarity of the people of the Catholic faith, but it has failed to make the most of its opportunity to teach the underlying truths of the gospel. Ritual has been used as a means to promote loyalty to the institution.

The Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church, I believe, has the right amount of ritual. Our weakness lies in our failure, in many instances, to recognize its worth as an aid in religious education and as a means for social solidarity. Another outstanding weakness is that emphasis is given the wrong place in the rite. God's part in the service is overdone, and man's part in the rite is given but a minor place. My criticism on these points will be offered as we take up each ritual topically.

BAPTISM

Baptism, like all rituals, is a power for social unity. Common participation by individual members of a group in a ceremony like baptism creates a social bond that unites the group into one strong brotherhood. This social bond is best established if the ceremony is performed in the presence of the group. The candidate should be made conscious of the fact that he is making a vow in the presence of people who have made like covenants at an earlier date. A brief statement concerning the meaning of the rite made in the presence of the church will be effective in creating within the consciousness of both the candidate and the group the realization that all have made a common covenant with God. If our position on this point be true, then a baptismal service conducted in the absence of the group deserves criticism. When possible, a baptismal font should be placed in the main auditorium of the church, where every eye of the congregation can view it.

The rite of baptism represents the basic principle of the gospel of Christ. Around it the plan of salvation is centered. It is the rock foundation upon which the religious life of the true Christian must be builded. The death of the old man and the birth of the new is fundamental and basic in real religious growth and development. Old ideals, attitudes, and purposes must die in order that a new and higher vision of things might be had. It is the giving of life (and all of life) to bigger and better things. It is the consecration of life to God and man. Thus it is the basic principle of the gospel and the fundamental step to spiritual growth.

The preacher of stewardship must emphasize baptismal consecration; and while baptismal forgiveness of sin will be preached, it should receive secondary consideration. The real steward must be interested in what he can give, and what he can get will remain in the background. Doctrine and Covenants 55:1 advises us that forgiveness is conditional, and the condition prescribed is a consecrated heart. Time should be taken at each baptismal service to emphasize dedication and stewardship of life.

I once asked a group of average Latter Day Saints to set down in writing what baptism meant to them. Out of twenty-seven answers, I received one that defined the rite as a consecration of life. One other defined the rite as a dedication of life, but evidently considered the "washing away of sin" of first importance, because the latter preceded the former in the written definition. A large number had to rely upon a scriptural quotation for their interpretation, indicating their inability to present in their own words its meaning. A small number of the answers indicated that the germ of the idea was present, though careful study showed that the concept of consecration was obscure and uncertain.

The successful teaching of the doctrine of stewardship must have consecrated, baptized candidates as its students. The soul-satisfied one, who sees the "washing away of sin" as the biggest thing in baptism, will be poor soil in which to plant the seed of stewardship. The religion of Jesus Christ calls for courageous, heroic, cross-bearing men. If there is one place above another in the religious experience of men that they should begin their life of cross-bearing, it is in the waters of baptism.

THE SACRAMENT OF THE LORD'S SUPPER

The Communion service offers a place for the followers of Christ to renew their vow of consecration. Here they rededicate their lives to cross-bearing. Concentration upon the suffering and agony of the Savior has caused men to overlook their own sacrificial offering. While attention must be directed to the offering of our Lord, yet his sacrificial devotion to his duty must be carried over to our lives.

The oblation presents a fine opportunity to bring this lesson home to the worshiper. We once made an effort to bring this lesson home to one of our congregations, and we were glad to note some degree of success. Just before asking for the oblation, we called the attention of the people to the sacrifice the Lord had made for us and that in the oblation there was given an opportunity to make a sacrificial return for the offering he made for us. When the oblation was taken, the deacons placed it in the hands of the presiding officer, who then offered a prayer of consecration, dedicating the offering to the work of the Lord. He then turned to the bishop's agent and presented the offering to him. Judging from the testimonies given later, the desired result—a better comprehension of humanity's part in religion—was accomplished.

I have said that group exclusiveness is a fundamental weakness of ritualistic worship. This is more clearly demonstrated in the Communion service than any other. The thought that I am participating in an act from which the people of the world are barred, will, unless wisely directed, cause me to feel that I am a special favorite of the Almighty. This tendency may well be overcome by calling attention to the fact that the sacrifice of Christ was a "whole world" offering and that the responsibility of the church is the salvation of every creature. Ours is a "whole world" obligation. This will tend to eliminate group exclusiveness. I am not criticizing close Communion, because I believe it is necessary to church unity. The consecration and renewed dedication of life for the salvation of the whole world should be the lesson brought home to the follower of Christ in the baptismal and Communion services if the doctrine of stewardship is fully practiced.

THE LAYING ON OF HANDS

Each Latter Day Saint participates in, and a greater number witness the ceremonial laying on of hands than any other church ritual. Consequently it is most potent as an agent for the promotion of group solidarity and is at the same time an important means for teaching religious truths.

We have already suggested that all ritualistic worship is a powerful factor in producing "a consciousness of kind" in the mind of each participant. The laying on of hands will do this and more; it will, when administered by one of recognized authority, bring into the religious experience of each individual a consciousness of God-nearness. The consciousness of the divine presence is vital in the religious experience of men.

This ceremony as a rite in confirming people into the church following baptism is an act of sealing, establishing, and ratifying the covenant made in baptism. It renders completeness to the religious vow by the candidate's giving renewed assurance of his determination to keep his covenant faithfully. As he receives the divine sanction or approval coming in the form of the Holy Ghost, there is the confirmation of the Lord's seal of approval upon the covenant.

Those who are called to officiate in the ordinance should keep in mind and suggest in the prayer of confirmation the full meaning of the baptismal and confirmational ceremonies. The opportunity to unite in spirit and purpose the life of the candidate to that of the group and to present and vividly impress the hidden truths of the gospel should not be passed by unused. If this is done, it will help to prepare the lives of the Saints as habitations for the Holy Ghost.

Many times, in the blessing of children, the emphasis is given in the wrong place.

In this ceremony, the dedication of the child's life to God should be the central thought. The petition for divine favor should be that God will assist him to make his life worthy of consecration. The blessing and favor of heaven will follow the consecrated life. If parents consecrate the lives of their children, they will do all in their power to direct them to develop their God-given talents to the limit of their possibilities and then use them in service to mankind. It will mean more than a mere promise.

In this rite, too, the officiating minister should take advantage of the opportunity to direct attention to the responsibility of parenthood and, as well, the responsibility of the whole church toward the life of the child. All should be done that can be done to enhance the sacredness and solemnity of the occasion. In too many instances this ceremony is performed hurriedly and without previous preparation on the part of both minister and people.

The ritual of administration to the sick is one of vast importance to the church, not only as a means to petition God for restoration of health, but as an instrument through which the spiritual level of the church might be elevated. The church would be greatly benefited, both physically and spiritually, if this rite were entered with greater forethought, prayer, and meditation.

A sister once asked for administration in a prayer meeting. Three other people who had evidently given the matter no previous thought then asked for the rite. Little good physically or spiritually can come from such an approach.

I recently assisted in administering to a woman who had, some weeks previously, advised me of her desire for the rite and who also informed me that she intended to make preparation for it and requested that I do the same. If God would see fit to deny the physical blessing sought, great spiritual good without doubt will result to this sister.

On another occasion, the officiating elders had to wait until a number of well-meaning people in the sickroom were through telling funny stories. Our church people have plenty of room to elevate the ritual of administration.

Of ordinations and patriarchal blessings, I have little criticism to offer. The prayers of ordination I have heard have been more to the point than any other ceremonial prayers of the church. It is surely too bad that the patriarch can come but once into the individual life with a ceremonial blessing. Some years ago I received my patriarchal blessing. While today it gives me some comfort, yet another given today would be of great spiritual help. One patriarchal blessing does not seem to be enough.

CONCLUSION

We have already said that our outstanding weakness as a church is in our failure to discern the worth of ritual in religious worship. If Zion is redeemed and the doctrine of stewardship is successfully taught and practiced, the ritual of the church will do much to accomplish the end desired. We will have to recognize the fundamentals of stewardship in the ceremony of the church. The basic principles upon which Zion shall be builded must be seen in our religious rites, and our ceremonial worship must be one of the most if not the most, important means to present and teach those principles.

Don't Poison Yourself

By Dr. Henry Seidel Canby

IT IS CURIOUS that most worthy people who have been attacking racial prejudice in this country have not used one argument which history has again and again proved to be true. They think only of the victim of racial prejudice, his sufferings, his wrongs, and the damage done to his dignity as a man. They forget what happens psychologically to the prejudiced man or woman.

The abolitionists before the Civil War were equally narrow sighted. They talked only of the harm done to the Negro by slavery. They said little or nothing of the moral damage to the white man who owned him.

What may have been the deepest curse of slavery was seldom mentioned in the North, although enlightened southern leaders had been aware of it for a century. It was the subtle corruption of the owners of slaves by irresponsible hands over human beings.

Racial prejudice has killed the bodies of millions in the last few years. We cannot forget that. But it is still warping the spirits and cramping the minds of tens of millions of the prejudiced. They are unaware that the man who hates and despises a race or a group without discrimination, will sooner or later, though perhaps only in the secret recesses of his mind, come to hate or despise himself.

QUESTION:

A Latter Day Saint boy married a Catholic girl, and now they have a little son a year old. The boy is an isolated Saint, not having had a chance to worship in his own church for years, but still a boy of faith and good habits. The girl attended her church regularly. He was made welcome in her home for fourteen months before marriage, and then she asked that the ceremony be a Catholic one. The boy claims that up to then she had acted as if the difference in religion didn't matter. He refused to be married by a priest, so was married by his cousin's husband, a Justice of the Peace. He is a steady worker, has a nicely furnished home for his wife and baby. She is a good wife and mother. They are pointed out as an ideal couple.

But now he is discouraged and upset by his wife's outbursts of tears every couple of months and needs advice badly. She claims that to have a priest marry them would give her church rights back—to take Communion and to make confession. She knows there is no hope of his ever being a Catholic. At first he was told he would have to sign an affidavit saying children born to them would be reared Catholics. Another one of her fears is of her baby not being baptized, but she claims his father can also have him blessed in his church and teach his religion to him as he grows old enough to understand.

Here is the big question. Can he do this and still keep his membership in the Latter Day Saint Church? He could have a clearer mind to study if his wife's confusion in her faith were ended. "What God has joined together, let no man put asunder," is the commandment. There is no thought of divorce by either, I am sure.

ANSWER:

It is unfortunate that the marriage which is the subject of this question was consummated in the first place. Marriage can never be a happy one without a soul-gripping ideal. This apparently was ignored by the young lady previous to her marriage. She knew that her future companion, though isolated from his church, was still a man of faith. Also it is apparent that she was a church-going girl and well acquainted with the requirements of her faith respecting marriage. She willingly ignored these principles and joined herself in matrimony to a man who was strong in his faith.

According to the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church, the marriage of this young lady to this young man was not legal because it was not performed by a Catholic priest. This is in contradiction to the teachings of Peter, who is considered by the church to have been its first Pope (See I Peter 2: 13-17). Also, the children born to this union are considered illegitimate, and if they should die without baptism, they would not go to heaven but to limbo. The young lady is now beginning to realize these things, and, naturally, fear is gripping her soul. That is why these outbursts of tears. The only solution to her problem would be a remarriage by the priest, and an agreement by the husband that the children from this marriage be brought up in the Catholic faith.

The young lady, however, should consider her husband and her future relationship with him. If he is the man of faith that is pictured in the question, he will feel just as bad when he sees his children being taught the things he considers erroneous as she now feels. He may agree to a remarriage by the priest and to all the requirements of her church respecting the education of the children and still be a member of the Latter Day Saint Church. But this is not the vital question. Would he be as happy when he knows that he was forced by his wife's tears to agree to the thing which he would not have considered otherwise? And would his love to his wife and respect to himself remain the same? With men of faith the principles of right and wrong are much greater than the bonds of marriage if the marriage were to interfere with these principles. The young lady should consider her happiness as well as the happiness of her husband.

The equitable thing for this couple to do would be to attempt a sincere and honest re-examination of their faiths. By doing that, without any coercion, they may be able to arrive at a soul-satisfying answer to the problem and retain their love and respect for each other. The young man should not simply deny his wife her faith—though he was plain regarding his attitude toward her church before marriage—without giving her something to take the place of that which she willingly surrendered by her union to him. From all appearances the man is already acquainted with Catholicism, is living in a community where the Catholic Church is established, and refuses to consider the teachings of the church to be correct. He should now try to acquaint his wife with his church and its teachings. That could be done by requesting the service of some competent missionary or elder of the church. If they are not too far from such help, arrangements could easily be made. Or, if their livelihood is not greatly jeopardized, they could move to a community where the Latter Day Saint Church is established and become acquainted with its principles. By a sympathetic understanding of the young woman's problem, and by an intelligent explanation of Latter Day Saintism, this husband may help his wife find that which her soul is hungering after. The quest of faith is costly, but it is also satisfying. If that can't be done, they may be able to study together some of the books explaining the church. The Call at Evening is a good one to read. We also have tracts explaining the church and its basic beliefs.

QUESTION:

What scriptural reason is there for believing in present-day revelation?

ANSWER:

One reason for believing it is that the Bible shows us that God did reveal himself to men during the various ages of its history, covering at least about four thousand years, and that the Book declares him to be impartial and no respecter of persons. Another reason is that Christ promises revelation from God to those who do his will, and does not limit that promise to his own time. (See Matthew 11: 28; John 7: 17; 15: 26; 16: 13; 17: 3; Revelation 19: 10.)

Still another reason is that prophets were set in the church as officers divinely appointed (Acts 13: 1; 21: 10; I Corinthians 12: 28; Ephesians 4: 11), and the saints were advised to seek the gift of prophecy (Romans 12: 6; I Corinthians 14: 29, 39; I Thessalonians 5: 20). It is difficult to see what use the gift would be if God did not inspire them to use it. These promises and commands are not limited to the ancient church.

We Three Together - By WINIFRED MILNER

A Serial in Two Parts — Part I

TOBY," David's voice came softly.

An undersized tomcat got off the sofa and came running; he pushed his small head against David's knees and arched his back, purring loudly. The two looked as if they belonged together. David was a small boy for nine, and thin. He picked the cat up and stroked its gray fur. He put his face against Toby's warm neck. "I'm going to stop practicing my violin for a while," he said. "It's time to go to the window and watch for Kathy." The thought of calling his mother Kathy made David blush a little. He never did it to her face, but lately, ever since his birthday, he had been doing it when he was alone or with Toby. And he had been calling his father Stephen. Kathy and Stephen—saying them over together helped to reassure him that they were going to stay together, but deep inside him was the frightening hurt, the uncertain lonesome feeling he was afraid to put into words.

"If she doesn't come right away, I'll practice some more," David told Toby. "Stephen will be wanting to hear my new piece when he comes home." It would please Stephen if he played it well, and more than anything David wanted to please Stephen. There were lots of times lately when he had wanted to say, "Mom's being awfully foolish. Maybe if we are better to her—" But he couldn't say anything like that to Stephen, he wasn't supposed to know what was going on. He was supposed to be too young, and maybe Stephen didn't know all of it himself. He played with a little orchestra every Tuesday and Thursday and always got home after Kathy did. And on regular days—days when Stephen gave violin lessons in the apartment—Earl Buffington the Third was never with Kathy. It was only on Tuesdays and Thursdays that he brought her home in the new black car with the polished chrome. Kathy and Mr. Buffington seemed awfully friendly, but David hated him. The first time he had brought Kathy home from the store, she had laughed at David's concern about it. "He's just a nice, important man who owns part of the store, honey. He has a fine car, and he lives up this way. Why shouldn't I ride with him?"

"You are awfully pretty," David had said.

"Thank you, darling."

"Does Daddy know about him?"

Kathy had pulled her brows into a frown. "Suppose you let me handle my own affairs. You are only a child. You can't know about adult ways."

Kathy hadn't asked David not to tell Stephen about Mr. Buffington, but he never had. David guessed he didn't know much about adult ways, but he knew Kathy often left for work without kissing Stephen good-by. He knew Kathy's doctor brother, Uncle Jack, had scolded her about Mr. Buffington and that they had quarreled, and Uncle Jack had said that Mr. Buffington was a stuffed shirt with a swelled head, and that if she really wanted to know what sort he was, all she had to do was to ask the clerks who worked under him, and they could tell her plenty. He knew Stephen spent too much time staring out of windows without seeing anything, and sometimes when Stephen wasn't teaching, he would take his violin and make it moan and cry. Then David would leave the room because he couldn't bear to listen or to see Stephen's face.

DAVID OPENED THE WINDOW and looked down Riverside Drive as far as he could. The black car was slow in coming tonight. The Hudson River looked muddy and gray. In the park across the street, some children were feeding pigeons. Across the river on the Jersey side, the Palisades were outlined in clouds, and cars crossing the Washington bridge looked as small as toy cars on a dime store counter. David's eyes came back to the children and the pigeons. Two of the birds seemed to belong together, they flew side by side to get the bread, then they left the other pigeons and went off together to eat it. David named them Kathy and Stephen. "They love each other," he told Toby. "They will live together forever."

The big black car came to a stop in front of the apartment house curb. David clutched the curtain and peered down. Kathy and Mr. Buffington were laughing about something. Then Mr. Buffington got out and came around to open the door for her.

"He is as ugly as an old toad," David whispered to Toby. But he knew it wasn't true. "He's wearing a silly-looking suit." But that wasn't true, either.

Mr. Buffington's clothes looked the way Stephen's did when he was going to play a concert. "Well, anyway, he's old." This time David didn't have to take it back. Mr. Buffington must be as old as forty, and Kathy was only thirty.

David saw Mr. Buffington put his hand over Kathy's. She would jerk it away, of course—but she didn't. David left the window, he didn't want to see any more. With Toby in his arms, he walked out of the apartment, closing the door behind him. He got on the elevator and rode down to the basement that was dark and smelled of furnace oil. He would stay here until he was sure Mr. Buffington was gone, then he would go out and sit on the front steps and wait for Stephen to come home. He didn't want to see Kathy or talk to her. Maybe if God had made her fat and ugly like Don Whaley's mother— He dashed tears from his eyes with the back of his hand; he was no sissy. He didn't really want Kathy to be fat and ugly, he only wanted her to love Stephen. They belonged together, like the pigeons.

THE CAR WAS GONE, as he knew it would be when he came out of the basement and around to the steps. He sat down and crossed one thin leg over the other. Toby curled down in David's lap and began to purr, and David closed his eyes, pretending that Kathy and Stephen were walking along the street holding hands. They were laughing, and then they stopped, and Stephen caught her in his arms and kissed her hard on the mouth the way he used to do a long time ago.

"Oh, there you are." It was Kathy's voice, and David stopped dreaming and looked up at her.

"I was afraid you had gone off somewhere." Her voice had kindness in it, and her eyes were friendly and warm.

"I'm waiting here for Dad."

"He should be along just any time now."

David nodded. "Will you wait here with me until he comes?"

The smile left her lips, and her face didn't look friendly any more.

She doesn't like Stephen, David thought, and the tight scared feeling moved through him the way the Hudson River was moving, on and on without stopping.

She touched his hair with her cool fingers. "Who would cook the dinner if I stayed out here with you? I am cooking steak, and you had better eat it. Steaks cost lots of money."

"Yes," he said. He wasn't hungry for steak or anything. He hadn't been hungry for days and days.

HE WAITED until he saw Stephen get off the yellow bus that said No. 5, but he didn't run to the corner to meet him. Instead, he sat on the steps and watched Stephen walk toward the house. David could tell Stephen's moods by watching what Stephen did when he didn't know he was being watched. Tonight his hat was pulled low over his face, and his eyes were on his shoes. He was worrying. David could tell by the set of his shoulders and the way he walked.

"Hello," David said when Stephen came close enough. He stood up with Toby and waved.

Stephen's reaction was like that of a man coming out of a trance. The worry left his face. He grinned.

David hurried from the steps and went down the walk to meet him. "You're late getting home," he said. He took the violin case from Stephen's hand, carrying it with great respect because he knew the value of the violin inside it. "Mom's home."

"That's nice," Stephen said.

"She's cooking steak for supper."

"Oh. How was school?"

"All right, I guess," David said.

"Did Mrs. Beemus look in on you while I was away?"

"Yes, but I didn't need her. I get tired of having a neighbor snoop at everything I do. She left when I told her I was going in the house to work. I wish you or Mom could always be home when I'm home."

Stephen put his arm across David's shoulder in the man-to-man fashion that always made David feel important and an equal. "I think I have it fixed so your mother can be with you every day, son. Let's go and tell her the good news."

KATHY WAS BROILING THE STEAK when they came into the kitchen. David was still carrying the violin and Toby. He had forgotten to put the violin down when they came through the living room.

"Hello, Kathy," Stephen said.

"Hello," she answered without looking up.

There was only the sound of the broiling steak. The silence in the room became a pounding in David's ears. It was a silence that made him shiver. Then Stephen's voice spoke through the silence. "I found a new job today." He was being too polite, and David clutched the handle of the violin case with tight fingers. Maybe they would quarrel again; maybe they would send him into the other room to get something neither of them wanted or out on some useless errand the way they did so often lately. "I am to play three nights a week at La Plaza del Juego." Stephen spoke almost as if he were afraid to tell Kathy about his new work.

Kathy turned around and looked at Stephen. "That's a night club, isn't it? I thought you wouldn't play that sort of music." She began setting the table, and Stephen followed her from the cupboard to the table.

"It's good pay," he said. "I thought more money was what you wanted, enough money so you could quit working and stay home with David."

"It is what you have tried to make me want, Stephen. But I like my job. I like drawing women's fashions and having my own desk, and being called Miss London as if I were somebody special."

"So you are going right on letting David run the streets after school."

"Don't raise your voice, Stephen. He's nine. He's home just one hour a day without me, and Mrs. Beemus always has an eye out for him. Besides, you are here most of the time yourself." She stood in front of him and faced him. "I'm not going to quit my job. David is going to have his chance. He has just as much talent as you have. He plays extraordinarily well for a boy of nine, and I am going to see that he has the best teachers and the best schools."

"If you are talking about sending me to college, Mom, you don't have to do that," David said. "I'll work and send myself."

Stephen's voice had a quiet kind of anger. "I wonder if you are keeping your job because you think I am a second-rate violinist who can't earn enough with my pupils and my playing jobs to give you and David what you need, or whether there is another reason. You wouldn't be interested in another man, would you, Kathy?"

The plate Kathy was carrying fell from her hands and broke into pieces at her feet. Stephen knelt and began picking the pieces up. He put them in the waste basket and left the kitchen, closing the door behind him. Kathy put her face against the kitchen wall and began to cry. It was a frightening kind of crying. David began to cry, too, without knowing why. He wanted to tell her that the steak was going to burn; instead he put Toby and the violin down, went to the sink and washed his hands, then he got a fork and began turning the steak himself. Turning a steak wasn't easy work; the grease splattered and burned his fingers. When he was sure the steak was all right, he picked up the violin and went into the living room to put it in its place by the piano. Toby followed him as far as the sofa.

Stephen was in the living room, sitting in the comfortable father chair. When David passed him he noticed that Stephen was reading the paper upside down. And when David left the living room, Stephen didn't look up or ask him where he was going.

DAVID WENT DOWN THE ELEVATOR and across the street to the park. He was glad the park was nearly deserted. A man and his girl were walking along the gravel path ahead of him with their arms around each other. A long time ago Stephen and Kathy always walked that way, huggingly close together. He walked behind them, pretending they were Stephen and Kathy until he came to a forsythia bush in full, yellow bloom, then he dropped down on the grass. He put his cheek against the cool greenness, then he turned over and lay on his back, looking up at the blue clouds and the sky that was beginning to darken into night. The park was almost quiet except for the sound of rustling trees around him. He watched a white cloud moving slowly in the sky. God was up there somewhere behind the cloud—God who could fix everything. David looked around to see if there were people near enough to hear him talk out loud, and when he saw no one, he said, "God, I guess you saw me snitch an apple from the box in front of Carey and Sullivan's grocery store this afternoon. I'll buy a bigger one and put it back if you'll help Stephen and Kathy. Something is awful wrong, and I don't know what to do. If you'll make them love each other again, I'll learn the times tables backwards from the fives through the twelves, and you know how much I hate 'em. I'll let that silly Martha copy my spelling paper every day. It's the only way she'll get a hundred, I guess. And I'll try to be smart in everything so Kathy and Stephen will be proud of me. If you don't know who I mean, God, it's the Kathy and Stephen Worthington who live on Riverside Drive in an apartment that is better than we can afford. Thank you, God. Amen."

David felt good after he had finished the prayer. Everything would be fine now. He had no idea how God would fix things, but he was sure God would. And suddenly he was hungrier than he had been for days. He got up and began running toward the street. When he had crossed over to his apartment steps, he looked up at the sky and saluted solemnly.

"I was just going out to look for you," Kathy said when he came in. And she kissed him on the cheek. "Go and tell your father we are ready to eat."

Kathy and Stephen no longer bothered him. He ate so much that first Kathy and then Stephen looked surprised and pleased and commented about the food he was storing away. David smiled happily. He wanted to tell them they were going to be in love again pretty soon, but it wouldn't be fair to tell a secret that was his and God's special own.

As soon as the meal was over, he asked if he might skate outside for half an hour.

"Let him go, Kathy," Stephen said. "Anyone who can put away that much meat and potatoes needs to exercise for half an hour."

When David went to get his skates, he took a dime from his allowance to buy the finest apple he could find. He wanted to settle his part of the bargain promptly so God would get busy with His. Ten cents would take a big slice out of his monthly pay. A nickel would buy an apple, but he had promised a special apple, and dime apples were redder and bigger and juicier.

THAT NIGHT, when David was ready for bed, he asked permission to take his arithmetic book to bed with him, instead of the usual storybook he was permitted to read for a while before his light went out.

Stephen eyed him over his paper. "Do you feel all right, David?"

"Yes, sir."

Kathy stopped ironing her blouse. "You aren't behind in your schoolwork, are you?"

"No, I'm learning the times tables backwards."

"All of them?" Kathy asked.

"From the fives through the twelves. I already know the others."

Stephen whistled.

David spent the next few days working hard on his promises. The worst part of his bargain was being nice to Martha. He considered her both dumb and lazy, but he let her copy spelling and arithmetic, too, and he walked part way home with her each evening, carrying her books and pretending not to care when his playmates teased and called after him, "David loves Martha."

Each night he went carefully over the day's happenings to see if he had failed in any way. He couldn't understand why God wasn't doing better by Stephen and Kathy. Yesterday Mr. Buffington had come upstairs with Kathy into the living room, and she had given him coffee and the last piece of Stephen's favorite chocolate cake. David stayed in his room and wouldn't come out until he left, and he blamed God more than he did Kathy for Mr. Buffington's being there. It was God's business to see that he didn't come. If David had God's power he would strike him dead.

Friday afternoon on the way home from school, David chanted his times tables triumphantly. He knew them now—all of them—every one. God had no reason for holding out any longer. A bargain was a bargain.

In front of his apartment, David saw a black car parked with the others. It looked like Mr. Buffington's car, only it couldn't be because this wasn't Stephen's day to be away from home, and anyway Mr. Buffington and Kathy were working at the store at this time of day.

He rang for the elevator and got on. "Twelve times twelve are one hundred forty-four. Twelve times eleven—"

David heard Kathy's voice and then Stephen's. Why was Kathy home so early? They shouldn't be quarreling in such loud tones. The neighbors would hear them.

David opened the door and came inside. He made his way to the living room and stood in the doorway. Mr. Buffington and Kathy were standing together by the fireplace. Mr. Buffington was leaning against the mantel with his hat in his hand. Stephen was standing by the window. David had never seen Stephen look so upset or so angry. He was saying something about lawyers, and then he saw David and bit his words off.

Kathy and Mr. Buffington were looking at David now, too, and Stephen said, "Since it is your idea to get a divorce, Kathy, maybe you had better let David say which one of us he prefers to live with. We don't seem to be making much headway by ourselves."

David leaned against the door. Everything in the room seemed to be dancing and turning upside down. He saw their faces and their eyes looking at him. He felt Stephen's hands on his shoulders and heard his voice explaining in quiet tones that Kathy wanted to marry Mr. Earl Buffington the Third, and that maybe it was a good idea since Mr. Buffington had money enough to give David and Kathy everything fine.

And then Kathy was kneeling in front of him and saying, "We'll work it out, David. We'll work out everything that is best for you."

David's head was spinning dizzily. This wasn't happening; he was dreaming, of course. He and God had made a bargain. God—God—

He pulled away from them, and as he turned he felt Toby's cool nose against his hand. He stooped and picked him up, burying his face in gray fur. With Toby in his arms, he began to run. He didn't know where he was going or what he was going to do. Nothing seemed real, nothing but Toby.

Receives Encouragement From Herald

Although I am in bed with a heart ailment, I am able to sit up and write. I believe God is working with the Saints through President Israel Smith. I have been shown that the Book of Mormon is divine, and I believe that before many years it will be used in schools throughout the world.

We are isolated from the church, but we read God's word and pray often. The Herald brings us a message of hope and encouragement. When we read the requests for prayers, my little son, Basil, and I pray for all who have asked to be remembered. We believe our prayers are answered and have a part in the recovery of those who are ill.

When my mother's life was nearing the end, I prayed that her suffering would not be too great nor prolonged, and that I could bear the loss of her, believing that death means only a temporary parting and the promise of a glad reunion hereafter. God heard and answered my prayers. I attended her funeral with a heart eased of grief and pain. I also prayed that my father would be comforted. A few days after the funeral, he told me of a dream he had before mother's death in which he saw her dressed in white and standing in a spacious, radiantly lighted room. I believe this was given to strengthen him.

How good it is to be able to go to our heavenly Father and ask for help in time of trouble. He never fails to bless us when we ask aright and not for selfish or foolish things.

Receives Encouragement at General Conference

It was my privilege to attend General Conference for the first time last October. The spiritual food I received there has been the source of great encouragement to me. My heart rejoiced when I saw so many young men willing to devote their lives to the work of the church. I have been a member of the priesthood for many years and have served as a branch president part of that time. I believe that the time has come for men of the ministry to "thrust in the sickle and reap." Many are groping in the dark with hands outstretched for help. We must tell the gospel story to them. Some seed will fall on good ground and eventually mature. This work is the greatest thing one can do. The church needs our prayers, tithes, offerings, and service. Zion the beautiful beckons us on.

Note of Thanks

I am grateful for the many flowers, letters, and cards I received during my six weeks at the Sanitarium where I underwent a major operation. I also appreciate the prayers of the Saints and feel that I have been wonderfully blessed. I enjoyed the visits of Chaplain Donald Lents and Elder Hubert Case, who came often to administer to me. The service given by the nurses was most commendable.

Pastor to Scattered Saints

WHEN HARRY SHEFFER, his wife, Shirl (Winn), and Heber Colvin thumped back home (Tucson, Arizona) on January 1, 1949, they were glad the old car had done so well. The Sheffer's twelve-year-old automobile had gone on many such trips before, and groaning with age and infirmity, it just about didn't carry the traveling missionary-ministers home from visiting their scattered flock.

Harry sat down and wrote a letter to the apostle in charge, Charles Hield, and gave him the report of Saints visited on this latest trip, taken between Christmas and New Year's Day when he and Shirl had vacation from school. Harry is an ex-GI, going to business school in Tucson, and Shirl teaches in the public schools of the city. They moved to Phoenix, Arizona, in 1942 from Missouri, and then to Tucson in 1946. Harry was ordained a teacher in 1944 and an elder in 1945.

In 1946, during a vacation, the Sheffers took their first such trip. They knew that in Arizona, New Mexico, and western Texas, there were Reorganized Latter Day Saints living isolated from other members. They went out to discover these people and minister to them. There were several trips after that, the longest being made by Harry alone between October, 1947, and January, 1948. Harry gives slide-illustrated lessons, holds prayer and Communion services, administers to the sick, blesses babies, visits, and baptizes as he goes along.

In twenty-one towns, during the trip of 1947 and 1948, he visited fifty-three families, comprising 174 people, of whom ninety-three are members, fifty-six were nonmembers, and twenty-five were children under eight years of age. He established a mission in Albuquerque and traveled a total of about 6,000 miles.

A page from his letter reads something like this: "I stayed three days at Tucumcari. The response was fine . . . two families were members, but I had more nonmembers listening than Saints. . . . Portales has some fine young men . . . they could make a nucleus to build a group. . . . Went on to Artesia. . . . Visited and taught three days there . . . next was Lovington. Baptized a father and his daughter and blessed the baby. . . . At Hobbs I spent two days visiting and hunting up lost members. . . . I visited in Eunice, twenty-five miles from Hobbs and found two more families. . . . At Pyote I stayed several days. I rested and taught. . . . I left there and drove home for Christmas. I was glad to see my wife again. She had gathered several small branches of a grease-weed bush and made a tree to hang our Christmas decorations on. It was the loveliest tree I had ever seen. . . . In the middle of January, I officiated at a funeral at San Simon. Instead of coming home, I finished my New Mexico visiting . . . went to El Paso one day, served the Communion . . . to Alamogordo for three days, teaching and using the slides, served the Communion. . . . Las Cruces for three days. . . . Up to Arrey for three days where I blessed another baby."

Harry's appointment to be the corresponding pastor of the field came from Apostle John Rushton and was continued by Apostle Hield. The work is voluntary and the money for travel expenses has been largely forthcoming from the Saints he visits.

The Sheffers send mimeographed letters to their scattered flock during the year, giving them news of each other and enclosing form blanks asking for information that will help the Sheffers in their visiting.

Harry says, "The primary objective in going is to teach, to encourage, and to administer the ordinances. Most of the people have been isolated for some time—one family for about forty years, and others are just fresh from branches. H. I. Velt was the last man through before we took our first and second trips."

Elder Sheffer is a humble man. Of himself, he says, "I'm not too well-versed in talking, and I quickly start to repeat myself. A study-for-a-week and run-dry-in-ten-minutes fellow, that's me."

With his wife or with Brother Colvin or alone, Harry has traveled almost 10,000 miles in his work. Wherever he goes, he ministers, humbly and sincerely, strengthening those who need help and making friends for Christ.

Elder and Mrs. Sheffer are eager to contact other Saints in New Mexico and Arizona about whom they have not heard. Address them at 924 Graybill Drive, Tucson, Arizona.—By SADI ANKA MOON.

BRIEFS

LAMONI, IOWA.—Clare C. Engle, secretary to Bishop Lewis Landsberg and Lamoni Stake secretary, has accepted the position as assistant to the business manager of Graceland College effective May 1. Robert E. Ballantyne will replace Miss Engle in the Bishop's office on June 1. Brother Ballantyne will graduate from Chillicothe Business College in May, is a deacon, and well known to many residents of the Stake.

The selection of Mrs. Lawrence Vogel of Evergreen as an assistant in the women's work of Lamoni Stake was announced recently by Mrs. Bert Brooks, stake leader of women. Sister Vogel's appointment is for the balance of the conference year ending February, 1950.

Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Yarrington observed their sixtieth wedding anniversary on April 7. Friends called during the afternoon. Brother Yarrington served as a member of the Lamoni Stake Bishopric from 1916 to 1930.

EUNICE, NEW MEXICO.—This group meets each Sunday for church school in the home of Brother and Sister Charles Brown. Besides the members of the branch, there is a family of nonmembers attending and four children from another family. Each Wednesday evening the group meets in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Glenn Stach for prayer meeting. Mr. Stach will be baptized in May at Seminole, Oklahoma, by Brother O. J. Stevens. Saints in the area are invited to meet with these people. Both homes are located in Gulf Dinkard Camp, southeast of Eunice.—Reported by MRS. GLENN STACH.

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.—An impressive service was held on March 6, 1949, at the East Bay Church, Berkeley, California, after the serving of the Communion to the congregation. A wrist watch was presented by Pastor Alma Andrews in behalf of the East Bay Church, to High Priest John D. Carmichael, who had concluded active ministry in the office of solicitor and other ministerial work of over fifty years in the various branches in the district.

Brother Carmichael is now 89 years old. He was born February 21, 1860, at West Sacramento City, California. On the 11th of February, 1874, at the age of 14, he was baptized, near the time Sister Emma, Joseph, and Frank Burton were baptized, by John R. Cook. He was confirmed February 21, 1874, at which time his perception was quickened by the Spirit, and he received the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and this spirit has permeated his ministry. King Benjamin's words in the Book of Mormon can be so effectively applied here, "When you are in the service of your fellow men, you are in the service of your God."—Reported by ALMA ANDREWS.

MINOT, NORTH DAKOTA.—Vernon W. Ditton from Fairview, Montana, conducted the Easter services in this branch. On Good Friday evening, he showed slides on "Building Christ's Church." The group is holding church school at the Logan schoolhouse again after the winter weather is over. All Saints in the vicinity are invited to attend.—Reported by VIRGIL D. SMITH.

GRACELAND COLLEGE.—Appointment of two persons to the faculty and staff of Graceland College has been announced by President E. J. Gleazer, Jr., following approval by the board of trustees. Harlan Metcalf, a graduate with the Graceland class of 1946, will replace Mrs.

William Gould in the secretarial science department while she is on a year's leave of absence. Mrs. Gould will continue her schooling at Columbia University in New York City. Miss Mildred Judkins, R.N., will replace Miss Donna Holmes as college nurse this fall. Miss Holmes also is planning to continue her schooling.

While a student at Graceland, Mr. Metcalf was active in the Missionary Club. He came to the college after having served three years as a clerk-typist in the Army. A resident of Wisconsin, he attended Whitewater State Teachers College there after graduating from Graceland. He is now doing directed teaching in typing in the college high school. Metcalf is twenty-seven and married to the former Ina Hershey of the Graceland class of 1942.

Miss Judkins, whose home is in Blue Hills, Maine, is now supervisor of the medical floor at the Independence Sanitarium. She received her training at the Portland Hospital in Portland, Maine. During the war she spent three years with the Army Nurse Corps and one year with the Maritime Academy in Maine.

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA.—The Northern California District conference convened in Sacramento on February 12 and 13. Apostle Charles R. Hield and Bishop J. Stanley Kelley were present and gave valuable assistance in classwork and preaching. All branches were well represented, and the church was filled to capacity for Sunday services.

The Zion's League held its annual valentine banquet on February 11. The program of music and skits was repeated for the conference visitors at a dinner at the church on Saturday evening, February 12. The Restoration Festival banquet sponsored by the League was held on April 8. The story of the Restoration and events in the life of Joseph Smith, founder of the church, were presented in music, narrative, and drama.

Following the Communion service on March 6, Cecil A. Jacks was ordained an elder. Seventy George A. Njeim paid a brief visit to Sacramento on March 27 and spoke at the evening service.

A baptismal service was held at 9:45 a.m. on Palm Sunday. Elder Lawrence Hendrickson baptized Mrs. Margaret Woodworth, Charles Woodworth, Dorothy Jellison, and Opalee Glauer. They were confirmed at the 11 o'clock service by Elder Hendrickson and Evangelist W. H. Dawson.

On Easter Sunday, the choir under the direction of Mrs. Edna Burdick presented the cantata, "He That Liveth." The subject of the sermonette by the pastor was, "There Is a Man on the Cross." In the evening a drama, "The Seamless Coat," was presented under the direction of Mrs. Maybelle Nephew.

Gayle Allison, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alden Clark, and Kathleen Elizabeth Chapo were recently blessed.—Reported by M. R. SCHALL, Pastor.

ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN.—The student's institute on "Our Vocational Stewardship," postponed because of President John Garver's death, took place March 12, 13, 1949, in Ann Arbor. Approximately fifty members of college campus groups from Michigan State College, East Lansing, Michigan; Wayne University, Detroit, Michigan; University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois, and the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan, were present.

Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp spoke Saturday afternoon on "What Makes a Steward," and "Relating Our Professions or Vocations to Our Church Program." Each of the talks was followed by a general discussion led by Gerald Fitch and Wallace Brotherton, respectively.

The campus group presidents were in charge of the evening program on the topic, "These Are Our Problems." Two students from each campus group gave their individual views on "problems" and a lively discussion period followed.

Visiting college students participated in the regular Sunday morning services of the Ann Arbor Branch, which included special attention to the subject, "Worthy of the Vocation Where-with Ye Are Called." Robert Matthew, Ruby Motta, and Don Ross were the speakers. The sermon, "Stewardship Is Restored," was delivered by Bishop DeLapp.

The institute closed at two o'clock Sunday afternoon after group consideration of the concluding theme, "This We Will Do."—ARLINE LAAGE, Reporter.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO.—A Melchisedec priesthood institute was held the week end of May 15 for the Eastern Colorado District at Colorado Springs. Among members of the staff there were: Ward Hougas, Merle Howard, Houston Hobart, Apostle Reed Holmes, and Elbert A. Schmidt, president of Kansas District.

WELLSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA.—Pre-Easter week was observed at Wellsburg Branch by nightly services. On Sunday morning, April 10, John Treiber spoke on "The Triumphant Entry." Sunday evening, R. E. Rodgers used as his theme, "Father, Forgive Them." Monday evening, S. M. Zonker spoke on "Woman, Behold Thy Son." Otto Melcher preached Tuesday on "Behold Thy Mother." Wednesday evening, John Treiber spoke on the saying, "I Thirst." Thursday, W. A. Schoenian of Moundsville, West Virginia, preached on "I Commend My Spirit." Friday, R. E. Rodgers used as his theme, "It Is Finished." The choir sang one of the "Seven Last Words of Christ" each evening in keeping with the speaker's subject.

On Easter Sunday morning, S. M. Zonker preached on "The Triumphant Christ." The choir sang, "The Holy City." Sunday evening, the music department, under the direction of Lenora Nixon, sang the cantata, "Our Living Lord."

On April 17, nine candidates were inducted into the church through baptism by Seventy Merle Guthrie. Four babies were blessed, and the confirmation of the candidates took place at the Easter Sunday morning service.

The women's department has instituted a "storehouse" and a "band of prayer." Visiting is the project of the year.

MOORHEAD, IOWA.—Mr. and Mrs. Ed Struble of Castana, Iowa (Moorhead Branch), celebrated their fifty-fifth wedding anniversary on April 11. They were baptized by Missionary W. A. Smith, and all of their eleven children belong to the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church, as do many of their grandchildren. They have retired from their farm work.

BUFFALO, NEW YORK.—The Buffalo women's department meets twice a month, the first Tuesday of the month for an all-day meeting, and the third Tuesday of the month in the homes of the members. There is an average of four nonmembers at the meetings. The department has packed over thirty boxes with food and clothing to send to Germany and England. They adopted a family in Germany to whom they sent parcels. They have made gifts which they took to shut-ins. The women study at their meetings and also leave time for a social hour. Mrs. Grace Schaefer is in charge of friendly visiting, and Mrs. Ann Lloyd is the teacher of one of the study classes.—EDITH BRAMAN, Reporter.

the poor have to labor to procure a living, and so they do anywhere else. Here the Saints suffer trials and tribulations, while the wicked enjoy the world and rejoice, and so it has been since Cain built a city for the ungodly to revel in.

But it is all right, and I thank God that it is so. The wicked enjoy this world and the Saints the next. They exercise their agency, and the Saints theirs; they are left to choose for themselves; and blessed be God that it is so, for it saves heaven from torment and righteousness from blemishes.

The lacks that seem most prominent will soon sink with the fading glories of perishable things; and then the banks of long continuance will be thrown down, and the rough places made smooth; yea, the glory of Lebanon will come upon the land of the Lord—the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together to beautify the place of his sanctuary and make the place of his feet glorious. Then there will be a river of pure water to gladden the soul of the Saint. Then every man will speak in the name of God. Then the righteous will feed themselves on the finest of wheat. Then the enmity of man and the enmity of beasts will cease. Then the vail spread over all nations will be taken off and the pure in heart see God in his glory.

With all these glories ahead, who would fail to seek them? Who would idle or revel away a few years of fleshly gratification and lose a thousand years' happiness and an eternity of glory? Who would serve the Devil to be a demon in darkness, when by pleasing the Savior and keeping his commandments he may be a son of God in the celestial world, where praise, and glory, and power, and dominion have an eternal now for space and duration, and the best from worlds to expand and beautify their sublimity? O that the whole empire of God might shout, "None!" But it will not be so, for Satan spreads himself and copes with thousands that must welter in woe unutterable.

Men of God, from this let us learn to take oil in our lamps from the great Spirit-fountain above and light them in the blaze of that noble fire, where a Hancock, a Jefferson, and a Washington lit their tapers, that while there is a hope in heaven or a gleam on earth, we may not covet this world, nor fear death, but, as Peter, as Paul, as James, die for the sake of righteousness, having fought the good fight and overcome through grace. Amen.

To Oliver Cowdery, Esq."

Going Visiting

By NORA MOSER

WHEN HAVE YOU ATTENDED church services outside of your regular congregation? I am speaking particularly to persons who have a firmly established habit of churchgoing, who feel they could scarcely miss a service. Thank goodness, a lot of Latter Day Saints are like that.

If there is another L. D. S. congregation in town, you will certainly have a number of friends in it. Both you and they would gain pleasure from being together in a Sunday service, prayer meeting, or women's group. It feels good to be treated as a guest once in a while, instead of being taken for granted.

In most cases there is only one L. D. S. church in a town, but often another is located within easy driving distance. Visitors from out of town are a big thrill to any branch. Latter Day Saints always receive each other warmly, especially after conversation has disclosed mutual friendships. I have yet to go to a branch where I could not discover some acquaintances in common. A trip to a near-by branch may require nothing more than starting an hour or so earlier. It can be combined with sight-seeing, a picnic, or a business journey. Once started, the exchange of visits between branches will benefit both.

About here, someone is going to say, "I would love to get away for just one Sunday, but I can't. I have to be here to teach my class." Or play the piano, or lead the choir, or preach, or take charge, or serve as deacon. I don't think even the church has the right to keep anyone completely tied down. A substitute teacher can be found. Someone else can play the piano—maybe not so well, but experience is the only way to learn. The choir doesn't have to sing every single Sunday, and the congregation can get along without a leader; in fact, it sometimes seems to prefer to do so. There is usually more than one preacher available, and if there isn't, why not arrange to trade assignments with a man from the branch you want to visit? A deacon, I admit, is hard to get along without. If the deacon isn't on the job, nothing goes smoothly, and everyone is out of humor. That is all the more reason for not working a good deacon to death; he needs a change as much as anyone else.

Everyone, lay or priest, officer, teacher, or not, goes stale sometimes, gets tired of the normal order of things, and has a natural desire to break out of routine. There are other good reasons for visiting a different congregation now and then. I have mentioned renewing old friendships and making new ones. A person who is concerned with some responsibility for the conduct of the service often is unable to free his mind sufficiently to have a worship experience himself. He needs to sit back and take it all in for his own spiritual well-being and growth, in order that he may give an expanding ministry in his regular calling. Here in unaccustomed surroundings, one's perceptions are sharpened and one gets more out of the service. The branch one visits is sure to be doing some things differently, and maybe better, than the home branch; this is a good way to pick up new ideas and techniques. It may be possible to give helpful suggestions also, but only if one knows the people well enough, and then it must be done with great tact.

SO FAR I have not considered the possibility of attending services of other denominations. Most of what I have said applies equally well to visiting the Baptists around the corner. There are sects which call it a sin not to attend church, and some which forbid attendance and participation in any other service than that of the particular denomination. This may be a way to keep members from going astray, but it casts doubt on their intelligence and the strength of their conversion. Latter Day Saints are considered adult enough not to require such a prohibition, even if it were compatible with the doctrine of agency.

If our church really has a higher spiritual quality than others, a visit to another church will give us renewed appreciation for what we have. I don't mean that one should enter another church with a critical attitude. That isn't necessary at all; the difference will stand out plainly enough. Then, too, home is always a little nicer after an absence.

A church of a different creed is an even more fruitful source of new ideas than another branch of our own kind. It is true that we do not desire to imitate any other sect, but we have many points in common with Protestants in general. They have Sunday schools, young people's organizations, ladies' aids, and building funds, just as we do. They have the same problems of recruiting and training teachers, choir members, and volunteers of all kinds. Their goal is the kingdom of God, even if they do not conceive it as we do.

The people in a branch who have a definite job to do, from the pastor on down, can benefit especially from seeing how others do the same job. It is one of the best ways for an inexperienced person to learn. The choir leader can study techniques of conducting and hear new pieces. The pastor may find a smoother order of service or a new way to capture the children's attention in junior church. The Zion's League officers may see methods for increasing interest and participation. The women's leaders could discover new areas of service.

OTHER CHURCHES are able to offer us some things we cannot obtain in our own. Many of our congregations worship in rented lodge halls, converted dwellings, or quite plain church buildings. There is no reason why we should deny ourselves an occasional glimpse of someone else's stained-glass windows. In particular, our children, who will build the churches of tomorrow, should not grow up ignorant of the beauty that exists in church architecture. In music, I know and like many hymns which are not in our hymnbook, and I go to another church sometimes just to hear them. Few of our choirs are able at present to perform large works such as oratorios, but we can hear and learn to appreciate them in other churches. We do not claim to have a monopoly on the truth. It is quite possible that we may find some new truth in another church, or a stimulating presentation of old truths. There are notable preachers in other faiths whom we should hear if we have the chance.

When, and how often, can one afford to go elsewhere to church? Our primary interest, our nearest friends, and our first duty are in our own congregation. We will be there most of the time. It would be sad if half the people decided to go visiting at once. If another church is offering a one-time-only program or speaker which I especially desire

Of Prophets and Scientists

DID IT EVER OCCUR to you that 2,000 years before Columbus set out on his now famous voyage to prove the world was round, the Prophet Isaiah casually mentioned this truth? (See Isaiah 40: 22.)

Why should we hold with the "wisdom of the wise" who scoff at all but their own wonderful generation? Is it true that today we know the how and why of things for the first time in the world's history? Are we stewards of a knowledge never before given to man? Or are we presumptuous in believing that men of old, who knew God so intimately, knew nothing of his ways with the world? Couldn't it be that some of the unspeakable things of the Spirit were practical facts the Lord preferred unspoken then?

Paul said, "Through faith we understand that the world was framed by the word of God" (Hebrew 11: 3). His brief estimate of how the world was framed seems now to be more correct than that written by the best minds of science 1,900 years later! "Things which are seen," he wrote, "were not made of things which do appear." This was not a flash of inspiration, I am sure, but an indication of the broad understanding of the mechanics of the world at which Paul arrived by faith.

The prophets, Amos tells us, know things before they happen. Those of old had understanding of the earth, and its mechanics, of atoms and their construction, of intelligence and light, and how it operates in the human body, of all the powers and sciences of today and beyond today.

I am willing to trust God, for he had a reason for waiting (if he did) to make this understanding of our universe common knowledge. Whatever the reason, we can trust him still to be ahead of common knowledge in our day. This he has done through prophecy given 100 years ago.

THROUGH Joseph Smith (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 2, 3) God gave us a picture of the world as he understands its organization, and as, scientifically, we are just now beginning to understand it. By means of today's scientific discoveries, we have arrived at the threshold of a new era of reaching, a fresh and powerful reasoning toward God, and new proof of the validity of the prophets and of our right to include Joseph Smith among them.

Peter saw our very day when he said, "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that of old the heavens, and the earth standing in the water and out of the water, were created by the word of God."—II Peter 3: 5. Today we face the world with mountains of scientific truth to back us. Today the ones who will not believe are forced to be willfully ignorant. The weight of scientific truth supports our contention that prophets were prophets and that the Lord God called yet another prophet in our day—a prophet that 100 years ago spoke the scientific truth about the construction, power, and inter-relation of our universe more clearly than science does yet today.

New Horizons

If one is to do that effectively, he will teach the temporal law not from the standpoint of getting money—of collecting dollars and cents—but from the standpoint of spiritual ministry to the individual. He will point out the relationship between compliance with the financial law, the filing of the statement (which is the recognition of accountability), the payment of the tithe, and the giving of offerings to that of attaining the spiritual and economic goals of the church.

The establishment of the storehouse fundamentally has as its purpose and objective the building of a spiritual power within the body of Christ. And if its purpose were only that of adding to the economic resources of the church, it would not be in harmony with that which has been divinely given to us. There must be a blend of both the spiritual and the economic goals.

We want the Aaronic priesthood to know that in the segregation of the funds of the church, in the very act of setting up reserves which has been approved by the action of the General Conference, we have operated in harmony with the principle of the storehouse. This we have emphasized and pointed out in the report of the Presiding Bishopric to the Conference. This is but the point of beginning, and yet it is a most essential point of beginning as we look toward the accomplishment of the storehouse objectives of the church.

WE REPEAT that in these days of increasing responsibility of the church, in these days when loads of pastoral ministry are weighing heavily on many men throughout the church, when our activities are being expanded in the educational field, and we are attempting to minister to youth as never before in our experience, we need the help of the Aaronic order. In these days when we are summoning youth to participate in the broad program of the church and challenging the pastors and the workers throughout the church to give them the opportunity of serving, when our financial obligations are increasing by leaps and bounds and our horizons are being expanded, we see that these increasing responsibilities must be assumed by each and every one of us. We are made to sense responsibility of accounting and service which rests upon the shoulders of every member of the Aaronic priesthood.

Now, you might feel that I have imposed upon you a load so serious and so heavy that life will not be enjoyable. However, I want you to look at it in a little different light. I want you to envision with me the beauty of Zion, the coming of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, and the establishment of this New Jerusalem. I want you to see something of the happiness that comes through the service to one's fellow man. Look ahead and envision a glorious and wonderful church, the church triumphant. As we can lift our faces upward and look toward God and remember that we are fellow-ministers of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the burdens of responsibility are taken from our shoulders and we are given strength and courage. As we seek to serve and do what we know God wants us to do, may we remember that our commission—whether it be as deacon, teacher, priest, elder, or high priest—is a great opportunity which God has given us to render service to our fellow men and to build his kingdom here upon the earth.

DEATHS

KISER.—Willard F., was born at Wabash, Indiana, on January 16, 1874, and died at his farm home near Coffeyville, Kansas, on April 21, 1949. He was married on May 17, 1906, to Daisy Lucas at Upland, Indiana. In 1915, they moved to Oklahoma, and in 1932 to Coffeyville. Both were baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1916. Brother Kiser was an employee of the National Refinery at Coffeyville until poor health caused him to retire. He is survived by his wife, Daisy, of the home and one brother, of Indiana. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Lee Quick at the Ford Mortuary in Coffeyville.

REYNOLDS.—George, was born in London, England, on February 22, 1864, and died in Essex, Ontario, on April 22, 1949. He was married to Nellie Woolard in 1896, and came to Canada in 1915. He lived in St. Thomas for a short while, then in Windsor, Monetteville, and Essex, where he spent the remainder of his life. He joined the Reorganized Church in 1915 and attended services regularly until shortly before his death. He was respected in every community in which he had lived.

He is survived by a daughter, Mrs. Clarence Smith of Highgate; a son, Francis of Essex; and a brother of St. Thomas. His wife preceded him in death four years ago. Funeral services were conducted by Elders James Pycoc and Gordon Brown in Essex. Interment was in the Greenlawn Cemetery.

STONE.—Ladner E., was born August 16, 1872, at Cherokee, Kansas, and died suddenly on April 27, 1949, at his home near Council Bluffs, Iowa. He had lived in Pottawatomie County for fifty-four years and was a retired farmer. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since July 26, 1891.

He is survived by a brother, Frank Stone, and a sister, Mrs. Minnie Wadley, both of Council Bluffs. His wife preceded him in death on July 3, 1915. Funeral services were held at the Woodring Chapel in Council Bluffs, Elder V. D. Ruch officiating. Burial was in Cedar Lawn Cemetery, Council Bluffs.

CRABB.—John Thomas, was born February 22, 1871, at Jefferson City, Missouri. (Date and place of death not given.) He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since August 15, 1915.

He is survived by Elder C. D. Crabb of Sagle, Idaho, and Elder Ralph T. Crabb of Kidder, Missouri; Mrs. Edna Gilly of Kelso, Washington; Mrs. Ruth Danruther of Dixon, Montana; and Agnes Pearson of Sandpoint, Idaho. His wife and three sons preceded him in death. Elder C. D. Crabb conducted the funeral service. Burial was in the Seneca-quoten Cemetery.

FLINN.—Randall Ralph, son of Isham and Hulda Flinn, was born in San Bernardino, California, on May 6, 1868, and died at his home in Stewartville, Missouri, on April 30, 1949. In 1872, he moved with his parents to Kansas in a covered wagon train, living there until 1886 when he came to Missouri where he spent the remainder of his life. He was married to Luella Worden on December 23, 1894; seven children were born to them. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since his youth.

He is survived by his wife; six daughters: Mrs. Lena Peters and Mrs. Lucile Adams of Stewartville; Mrs. Edith Vernon and Mrs. Velma Sloniker of Kansas City, Missouri; Mrs. Delpha Limb of Buffalo, Oklahoma; and Mrs. Freda Watson of Winter Harbor, Maine; one son, Ralph Flinn of Stewartville; and seventeen grandchildren.

WINSHIP.—George, was born December 17, 1882, at St. Marys, Pennsylvania, and died January 8, 1949, at Wheeling, West Virginia. He was married to Maud Earnest, and seven children were born to them. Two of the children preceded him in death. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since December 20, 1896.

Surviving are three daughters: Margaret Freese, Mildred Muldrew of Wheeling, and Maude Steen of Baltimore, Maryland; two sons: George and Carl Winship of St. Louis, Missouri; three brothers: Jess Winship of Baltimore and R. H. Winship of Lock Four, Pennsylvania; a sister, Mary Givens of Baltimore; twelve grandchildren; and two great-grandchildren. George Criswell and S. A. Martin conducted the funeral service. Burial was in the McMechen, West Virginia, cemetery.

STANDEFER.—Louella, daughter of Liza Jane and Samuel Harrison Howton, was born August 5, 1873, near Louisville, Kentucky, and died April 19, 1949, in Martin County, Texas. She grew to womanhood in Kentucky and Arkansas, where she met and married Leroy Standefer; ten children were born to them. In 1910 she was baptized into the Reorganized Church, of which she remained a faithful and active member until death. The family moved to Colorado City, Texas, in 1919, then to Martin County, where Mr. Standefer died on November 15, 1928. For the past twenty-five years, Sister Standefer was affectionately known as "Grannie"—a name honorably borne by her.

Surviving are four sons: Samuel of San Diego, California; Edgar, Grady, and Hyrum of Stanton, Texas; four daughters: Mabel Hines of Midland, Texas; Lois Church, Reva Koonce, and Hazel Hamm, all of Stanton; thirty-four grandchildren; and seven great-grandchildren. A daughter, Jettie, and a son, Heman, preceded Sister Standefer in death. Elders Ralph Wilt and R. E. Stone conducted the funeral service.

THOMPSON.—Martha Emmaline, daughter of Sidney and Mary Lampkins, was born June 3, 1883, at Mt. Pleasant, Indiana, and died April 26, 1949, at St. Croix, Indiana. She was married in January, 1904, to Thomas Thompson; seven children were born to them. Mr. Thompson and two sons, Rosco and Ralph, preceded her in death. She was a member of the Reorganized Church and attended the Marengo, Indiana, Branch.

Surviving are three daughters: Golda of Branchville, Indiana; Eva and Iva of Liapold, Indiana; two sons: Arlie and Leonard of Branchville; five brothers: Joseph of Oriol, Indiana; Asas of Oakland City, Indiana; Ed and Archie of Patoka, Indiana; and Jefferson of Valeen, Indiana; three sisters: Amanda Thompson of New Albany, Indiana; Mary Jane Thompson of Marengo; and Ada Woods of Princeton, Indiana; and nine grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Chester Metcalf at the Old Town Church in Marengo. Burial was in the church cemetery.

HUTTON.—Ida May Smith, was born August 5, 1875, in Missouri, and died April 22, 1949, at St. Joseph's Hospital in Keokuk, Iowa. Her first husband, James Reed, and a daughter born to them, preceded her in death. Later she married Isaac Jemison, and after his death, James Isenberger, who also died. On December 4, 1944, she married Charles Hutton, and they made their home in Nauvoo. Funeral services were held at the Sharman Chapel, Elder Arnold Ourth officiating.

Bible Vignettes

AN OLD ROMANCE

There isn't very much about love, in the modern romantic sense, in the Bible. Perhaps the love of a man for a good woman wasn't news in those stern, old days. Yet it is heartening to know that they were not utterly devoid of the tender sentiment that provides the basis of most of the world's happiness.

In all the voluminous records of the troubles and transgressions of Israel, there is one brief and beautiful story of an ideal love. It is in the twenty-ninth chapter of Genesis:

"And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed to him but a few days, for the love that he had to her."

Regardless of the evil things you may remember against Jacob—his cheating Esau of his birthright, his matching tricks and bad business ethics with Laban, his cowardice in facing Esau on his return home—this one splendid example of true love will live forever to Jacob's credit.

What a man Jacob must have been to serve seven years for Rachel, only to have poor, weak-eyed Leah foisted off on him by a dishonest father-in-law, and then to serve seven more years to obtain his heart's desire. So much for Jacob; but not all for him. What a woman Rachel must have been—for the Book says she "was beautiful and well-favored"—to attract and hold so great a love through the years. "Well-favored" must have meant that she possessed more than physical beauty, for only spiritual qualities could inspire a love that lasted so long.

How vainly we sigh for the beautiful things of old romance. Yet we need not grieve that such lovers are gone. In that one paragraph, the spirit of all true love lives everlastingly, as long as there are men and women to search the Scripture for things that inspire wonder and praise.

Later on, poor Rachel was to have her problems, but they are another story. By force of circumstance, other women were to encumber Jacob's life, but here he is monogamous. In the charm of this one little paragraph, so artistically done, Rachel is forever fair and Jacob forever true.

 HUNTING

Watch a cat sometime. It does a lot of hunting to get just one bird. When he makes a catch, it is often because the bird has forgotten danger in its search for food, and has got into a position where escape is difficult.

Have you ever seen sin searching for a victim? I saw a card-sharp once riffling his filthy cards in his hands, and watching me as I turned from looking in a shop window. I saw the spirit of evil in his loathsome face. A feeling of revulsion came over me, and I departed hurriedly, feeling like a bird who suddenly finds that he is being stalked by a cat.

People are not always as wise as birds. They do not see the spirit of evil in the face of the destroyer. Sin is a booby-trap, and they are always coming around to investigate it.

 SPEAK TODAY

If you have kind words for your friend, speak them today. Tomorrow he may not be there, and both you and he will be deprived forever of the happiness your words might bring. It is never too early to say something good. It is sometimes too late.

Lest We Forget

THE CITIZENS of the United States will soon be paying tribute to their heroic dead—and other loved ones gone on. The chief executives of state and nation call upon all citizens to take time on May 30 to pay a debt of patriotic gratitude. It is a mark of good citizenship as well as Christian character to take seriously this obligation to memorialize the defenders of our land. "Lord God of hosts, be with us yet, lest we forget."

Something noble in man and fine in our nation is preserved and enriched by cultivating the sentiments of "Decoration Day." We should give place to patriotism and take time out to place flowers in loving memory on the graves of our dead. "It won't do them any good," it's true; but it will do us good. Like a soft breeze after the summer rain, it cleanses the nostrils of our souls. As Lincoln said, "That from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain . . ." One can neglect his heritage, blot out the page of memory which records the valor and devotions of others that we might live in freedom and happiness, but he will never entirely forget. Neither the state nor the church asks us to spend an entire day in the cemetery. It is for each person and community to judge what Memorial Day services are appropriate and adequate. But in all good conscience, let us pay some tribute to these honored dead as their just due and our solemn obligation—let we forget.

Introducing . . .

WALTER J. HAWORTH (page 5) is one of the most familiar names in the Australian Mission. He was manager of the Standard Publishing House and editor of the Gospel Standard, as well as other church books and tracts, for a period of about thirty years. Brother Haworth was born in 1873, studied law, and went to the top in his profession of accountancy.

He was baptized by his father, Elder E. J. Haworth, in 1885. Three years later he was ordained to the office of deacon; and ten years later to the office of elder. In 1901 he was ordained under the hands of Alexander H. Smith to the office of seventy, the first Australian ordained to this office. Apostles McConley and Ellis ordained him a high priest in 1924. He was under continuous appointment from 1901 until his superannuation in 1942. Several times he was missionary in charge of Australasia.

Brother Haworth is the author of The Fall of Babylon, Man Here and Hereafter, and several tracts. For a time he was a contributing editor to Zion's Ensign.

Mrs. W. J. Burrows, Mrs. Harold I. Velt, Mrs. W. Hoile, Walter D. Haworth, and Eric J. Haworth.

DONALD W. SAVAGE (page 8) was born at Wilber, Nebraska, December 15, 1923. He was graduated from Wilber High School in 1941, and continued his education as a student of mechanical engineering in the University of Nebraska from 1946 to 1949, when he was graduated with a degree of Bachelor of Science in Mechanical Engineering. In 1948 Brother Savage won a scholarship to the University of Nebraska. He is a member of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers and of the University of Nebraska Varsity Band.

Donald was born on a farm in Southeastern Nebraska, where he worked until he was eighteen years old. During the war he was employed in aircraft production in California and Nebraska. At the present time he is working for the State of Nebraska Roads Department as a roadbed engineer.

On June 26, 1948, he was married to Joyce Odell Ahrens. He occupies the office of priest. His hobby is music; he plays the piano and clarinet. He is also interested in sports, journalism, and archaeology.

WINIFRED MAE (WEINHEIMER) MILNER (page 12) first wrote for us in 1936, and has been a regular contributor during the past two years. She has written poetry and fiction, as well as religious articles. She was the winner of the Graceland College Short Story Contest, and won second place in the Herald Short Story Contest. She was a first prize winner in declamatory work at Graceland, which she attended from 1922-1924 after being graduated from Long Beach Polytechnic High School, Long Beach, California.

After the death of her husband, High Priest Jonathan L. Milner, in June, 1937, she worked in California, and for a time managed her own carpet cleaning works. As opportunity has permitted, she has taken college work in California and New York, receiving credits from New York City College, and during the past four years has taken some courses at Columbia University, largely in the field of journalism.

Sister Milner has a son, Jonathan Leon Milner, and a daughter, Mrs. Laraine Nelson. She is now employed by the American Physical Society at Columbia University.

NEWS AND NOTES

WEDDLE LIKED CALIFORNIA "MESSIAH"

Franklyn S. Weddle, director of the general church department of music, wishes to acknowledge his appreciation of the work of the church choirs in California which joined in the presentation of the "Messiah" under his baton in April. His own statement is that the California choir was "really superior." It is remembered that Brother Weddle also conducted a radio performance of the "Messiah" during the Christmas season with Independence, Missouri, musicians in the choir.

NORWEGIAN TRACT

President F. Henry Edwards has on his desk a copy of "The Latter Day Glory," by Elbert A. Smith, printed in Norwegian. This work is one of the results of the trip of Brother Edwards and Bishop G. L. DeLapp to Europe last year. The translating and printing was done in Norway. When Patriarch M. A. McConley was in that country, he planned the venture.

WILLIAMS IN SIOUX CITY

Apostle D. T. Williams was a guest in Sioux City, Iowa, during the week end of May 15, doing ministerial work.

EDWARDS IN ST. LOUIS

President and Mrs. F. Henry Edwards spent the week end of May 15 in St. Louis, Missouri, where Brother Edwards preached on the theme of "Let Him In." Members of the Stone Church Zion's League from Independence, Missouri, were guests of the St. Louis Branch and shared in the week end activities.

PRESIDENT SMITH IN OHIO

President Israel A. Smith was the guest of the Columbus, Ohio, churches during the week end of May 15. On Friday evening he was the speaker at a joint banquet of the two congregations, a father-son, mother-daughter banquet held in a large auditorium in the city. This was under the supervisory planning of Pastor John Booth and Mrs. Nell Swanson, women's leader. President Smith spoke on Sunday morning at 11:00 o'clock at the North Columbus congregation. The other congregation met with them. Apostle Percy Farrow spoke on Sunday night to the Saints in Columbus.

During the week end of May 22, President Smith will be visiting in the Plano and Aurora, Illinois, Branches, under arrangement with District President Lloyd Hadley.

YOUNG CHURCH MEMBER RECEIVES HONOR

David Leonard, sixteen-year-old William Chrisman High School junior and representative of the Independence, Missouri, Optimist Club in the Junior Oratorical contest at the Tenth District Optimist Convention at the Hotel Muehlebach in Kansas City, Missouri, on May 17, won the district contest and will go to San Francisco to compete at the national convention. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. William Leonard and is an outstanding debater. He is a member of the Stone Church Teen Age Zion's League.

DeLAPP AT INSTITUTE

Bishop G. L. DeLapp was at Detroit, Michigan, to meet with the institute of local ministers from Detroit and from Northern Ohio District, Saturday, May 14, and Sunday, May 15.

For Christian Homes

"Home-keeping hearts are happiest." —Henry W. Longfellow.

The House

A house is simply a little part of the world which a man encloses in order to control the climate. There, if he has a good roof, he can escape rain; with the aid of a furnace, he can avoid the winter's cold; and, if his home is very modern, he can turn on another machine to take some of the sting out of summer's heat. With insulation, storm windows, and a humidifier, he can make his own climate.

Of all the kinds of buildings, a house is best for a home because it gives quiet and privacy and good control of conditions. A home can be made in an apartment, but it is harder. A hotel is worse, because neighbors change more frequently, and one can never know what kind of person is moving in next door.

Houses should be durable enough to last, practical enough to give comfort and convenience, and beautiful enough for the occupants to enjoy living in them.

The Home

Home is more than a dwelling. It is a spirit and a relationship, an atmosphere of mind and soul. Oliver Wendell Holmes touched the heart of the matter when he wrote, "Where we love is home." Without love, there is no home. Wordsworth sensed our longing for permanence when he wrote for another purpose some lines that are appropriate to ours,

They dreamt not of a perishable home
Who thus could build.

Edgar Guest, in one of his most popular and most quoted poems, said that it takes a great deal of living in a house to make it home. It takes a lot of the right kind of living, of course, to make a good home. Too much of the other kind of living makes multitudinous little hells in which people are unhappy and hate each other.

The Homemaker

It is rather common to speak of the wife as a "homemaker" as if she were the only one and could manage it alone. That is the trouble with our homes, particularly in the United States. The burden is too much for the wife, and the husband neglects his responsibility. Those who are united in marriage must share the work, the burden, and the problems, as well as the shelter of the home if it is to bring them happiness and peace.

In the finest home, husband and wife are both the makers. The success, permanence, and happiness of the home depend upon their character, temperament, and training for their tasks.

The successful homemaker must love his companion and be willing to work and make sacrifices for her peace, happiness, and welfare. He must be informed about married life in order to avoid the painful and grievous mistakes that cause trouble and break up homes. He must find his happiness in promoting the peace and happiness of his companion and their children. He must share in the work and responsibility of the home—the chores, the care of the children, and the maintenance of the house. He needs a religious faith, a place for the Spirit of God to operate in his life, to give the best of himself for the good of those he loves.

Preventing Broken Homes

Divorces cause many tragedies today to both parents and children. People do not reflect that the divorced child is a more tragic and suffering figure than the divorced parents, because he is more helpless.

Ignorance and selfishness are often the causes of trouble that leads to divorce. And divorce is a failure, like a half-successful operation, that leaves the victim alive but unhappy and worse equipped to face life alone than before marriage. For every marriage makes changes in people that cannot be canceled.

The church has a great role to play in the strengthening of home ties, in preparing the young people to be better homemakers, and maintaining happier homes for them. For a good marriage is a partnership with God, as well as with a man or a woman. And we cannot have good homes if we shut God out.

Better Individuals

It takes better people to make better homes.

The pastoral theme for the month of June is "Build Zion's Homes." One approach to that theme, and an important one, is to improve the individuals who are going to build the homes.

Too many young people get married with nothing to contribute to the home but their biological equipment. Their minds are untaught, and their spirits unprepared for the devotion and personal sacrifice that must go into the making of a happy and successful home. They are doomed to failure from the beginning.

Parents too often are not qualified to help their children to be good homemakers. Schools can help and are doing something practical. A great work remains to be done by the church. If our church is to build Zion, we must have a strong foundation of Zion's home life, and righteous individual life.

Christian community life can be built only upon Christian home life. Such home life depends upon Christian individuals. The cultural and spiritual foundations laid in our lives by the church must be strong and deep.

Change in Eastern Colorado Presidency

By action of the recent Joint Council of the First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and the Presiding Bishopric, Elder Ward A. Hougas has been transferred to Eastern Colorado District, Denver objective. This also makes possible the transfer of District President C. Houston Hobart to distinctive missionary work in the Eastern Colorado District. To complete the unexpired term of Elder Hobart, Brother Hougas is appointed to serve as District President as of June 1, 1949, subject to the approval of the next district conference.

REED M. HOLMES,
Minister in Charge.

Approved: Israel A. Smith

Notice of Appointment of Bishop's Agent, Western Colorado District

Notice is hereby given of the appointment of Brother Charles J. Hoschouer, 738 North Fifth Street, Montrose, Colorado, as Bishop's Agent of Western Colorado District, succeeding Brother Elwin Vest, whose resignation has been received. Solicitors are hereby notified to send their reports for the month of May and each succeeding month thereafter to Brother Hoschouer at the above address.

We take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation to Brother Vest for the years of service he has rendered in this office.

We have also appreciated the support given by the Saints to Brother Vest during the period of his service and take this opportunity of commending Brother Hoschouer to the Saints for their favorable consideration and support.

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From E. J. Gleazer, Jr., president of Graceland College:

Undoubtedly members of the First Presidency and other officials of the church are well-acquainted with the church interests and activities of members of the Graceland faculty. However, in view of the rapidly changing scene in higher education, I believe it of interest to note how Graceland faculty members are attempting to add to their professional qualities.

As an example of this, let me describe briefly plans of some of our teachers for the summer. Roy Benson will be at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, New York, where he is a candidate for the Ph.D. degree in music theory. Roy Cheville, newly-appointed Dean of Faculty and Instruction, will be leaving for England June 2 and will be studying at Oxford for several weeks.

Paul Deaver continues his studies in piano at the Chicago Conservatory of Music. Roscoe Faunce plans to attend the University of Michigan, where he is doing work toward the doctorate degree in speech. Deam Ferris is a doctorate candidate at the University of Wisconsin in the field of biology and will spend the eight weeks summer session there. My plans for the summer include two months at Harvard University, where I am a candidate for the Doctor of Education degree.

William Graves is to be at Northwestern University; Charles Irwin at the University of Kansas; Ned Jacobson at the University of Wyoming; Iola Kaestner at the University of Wisconsin; and Velma Ruch at the University of Minnesota. Jerry C. Runkle is on leave of absence now, attending the University of California; he is a candidate for the doctor's degree in economics.

Marilyn Sorden, college librarian, is to continue work toward a master's degree in library science at the University of Illinois. Ruth York, teacher of French and Spanish, who last summer studied at the University of Geneva, will attend a session at the University of Mexico City. Raymond Zinser will be at the University of Chicago, where he is a doctorate candidate in sociology. Malcolm Ritchie, newly-appointed Dean of Student Personnel, is continuing to do graduate work at the University of California.

W. S. Gould and Mrs. Gould have been granted a year's leave of absence by the Board of Trustees so they can enroll at Columbia University. Mr. Gould will receive his doctor's degree in communications.

I believe it is interesting and significant that eighteen members of our staff are engaged in active graduate work, and that they are enrolled in fifteen different universities from Mexico to England, and California to the east coast. I believe we can safely say that members of the Graceland staff are recognizing their educational stewardship and attempting to measure up to the great demand of the day in which they live.

The following letter is from Apostle Paul Hanson, Machu Picchu, Peru, April 24:

Here I am in Machu Picchu, which I had hoped to visit in 1932, but was prevented by certain conditions. This is my third day at the famous ruin discovered and uncovered by Dr. Hiram Bingham. The climate of Peru is principally a matter of altitude rather than of latitude. In the rarefied high altitude of Cuzco (11,200 feet), I was frequently cold. It is warmer here (70 miles from Cuzco). I am not the only American visitor who went to bed in Cuzco occasionally to get warm. Fuel there is very scarce. The direct rays of the sun are quite warm and penetrating, and many people sit with uncovered heads on the beaches in the plaza in front of the cathedral during the day. In moving from the piercing rays of the sun, I found it was too cool to sit in the shade.

The poor Indians, many little less than beasts of burden, are to be seen in nearly every part of the city carrying heavy loads on their backs. A number of them, not alone the beggars, wear clothing that literally falls from their bodies. How the half-clad Indians and babies survive is a mystery. My intention is to return to Cuzco tomorrow and spend a few more days there.

Machu Picchu—what a site for a citadel, or sanctuary, or whatever was first intended. It constitutes the most awe-inspiring movement imaginable. Archaeological treasures are associated with scenic grandeur that probably cannot be equaled anywhere in the world. The ruins are on a high ridge surrounded by towering mountains in one of the most inaccessible parts of the Andes.

Here are ruins of temples, courts, and palaces, stairways cut in the rock connecting terrace to terrace and building to building. Prominent and high among the ruins is an Intihuatana, or sundial. Whether some of the ruins are pre-Inca origin is not known with certainty, but

The Inner Sanctuary

By W. J. HAWORTH

The kingdom of God cometh not with observation; Neither shall they say, Lo, here! or, Lo, there! For, behold, the kingdom of God has already come unto you.
—Luke 17: 20, 21, Inspired Version.

THE LATTER PORTION of this text is varied in the Authorized Version to read, "the kingdom of God is within you." Robert Young's Translation gives it, "the reign of God is within you."

James Moffatt's Translation, while rendering it "the reign of God" instead of the kingdom of God, comes nearer to the Inspired Version than any other. "On being asked by the Pharisees when the reign of God was coming, he answered them, The reign of God is not coming as you hope to catch sight of it; no one will say, Here it is! or There it is! for the reign of God is now in your midst."

The Jews had long looked for a Messiah who would re-establish the kingdom of Israel with all the power of the Hebrew conception of the state as the kingdom of God. They overlooked the fact that prophecies concerning his first kingly entrance into Jerusalem nearly two thousand years ago would be that of one meek and lowly, seated upon an ass, and destined to be put to death on a cross.

A perusal of the remaining verses of Luke 17 will show that Jesus proceeded to show how it would be with the Pharisees and others who would say, Lo here! and Lo, there! in the day when he should come in the triumphant kingdom of God.

It has been assumed by some that this text refers, not to the reign of God within the individual members of the church, but exclusively to the composite body of saints called the church or kingdom of God militant. I assume that the reign or kingdom of God can be within the individual member as well as in the collective association of the body of Christ. "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." —Romans 14: 17. In my experience, I have found righteousness, and peace, and personal joy in the Holy Ghost, as well as experiencing them in association with others of the household of faith. The seeker after spiritual things finds them either alone or in association with others.

TO LOOK AT THE MATTER from another angle, Zion is the kingdom of God acting out the reign of God on earth. Yet, "Zion is the pure in heart." Purity of heart must first be personal before it can be collective. This is why the Lord has said that the gathering of the pure in heart "is no nearer, and no further away" than it is from the hearts of the Saints.

The Zion of Enoch's time started with the people. "And the Lord called his people Zion, because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness, and there were no poor among them." —Genesis 7: 23, Inspired Version.

Enoch continued his preaching in righteousness as the Lord had commanded him, gathering in the people of God. After this it is recorded: "And it came to pass in his days, that he built a city that was called the city of Holiness, even Zion." —Ibid., v. 25. So it is in these days. The complete establishment of Zion, the very center of the kingdom of God, depends upon righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost being inculcated in individual members.

Jesus said that the kingdom of heaven, like the fishermen's net, gathers of the good and the bad. The reign of Jesus Christ is being established in the hearts of the good, purging out the dross, and producing "the pure in heart." The "bad" may be "in the kingdom," but the trouble is the kingdom is not in them. "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." —Romans 8: 7. The "reign of the kingdom" in the heart is what makes the difference.

Peter, writing of the personnel of the kingdom of God, says, "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house." —I Peter 2: 5. He does not mean this simile to indicate that Zion or the kingdom of God is a ready-made structure into which God invites us to enter and worship him. Rather, he places the responsibility upon us of being "lively stones" used to make the composite "spiritual house."

WE CANNOT ESCAPE the responsibility implicit in being a "lively stone." Paul, writing to the saints at Ephesus, told them they were "fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; . . . built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth into a holy temple in the Lord." —Ephesians 2: 19-21.

What a world of meaning is thus presented to us! The building of God is fitly framed together with Christ as the chief cornerstone. All the stones are hewn out of the same quarry of sin, each with individual character irregularities. Each must submit to the chisel and polishing tools authorized by the Master Builder.

Buildings are "squared" horizontally and perpendicularly by the foundation stone or cornerstone. In the building which "grows" into a holy temple in the Lord, each "lively stone" must have what it takes to be "fitly framed together" with Jesus Christ, the peerless stone that stands at the head of the corner.

Again, each Saint is a personal temple of the Lord, being fashioned to become a portion of the temple of all temples in the triumphant kingdom of God: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."—I Corinthians 3: 16, 17.

TIMBERS FOR THE TEMPLE" is a fine story in which Brother Elbert tells of an expedition up the Mississippi as far as Wisconsin in search of suitable timbers in the vast pineries for the finishing of Nauvoo Temple. Linking in with it is the great historical story of our missionary endeavor.

"Lively Stones for the Temple of God" would be a fitting title for a historical record of the quest that has taken the missionaries of the church over the oceans, the railroads and the airlines of the world, to tell of the restored gospel. They have brought peoples of many lands into the fold; more still in Joseph's Land. They have done a splendid job, but it is still incomplete.

THE MISSIONARY TASK is not all. The standing ministry work overtime in the endeavor to prepare us "lively stones" to fit into God's building. Recalcitrant materials, slow production, unpropitious conditions all militate against the finishing of the job. Doubtless that is why the Lord is so concerned about how far Zion and the Gathering has progressed in the hearts of the Saints.

It has been my privilege to leave the perimeter of the kingdom and visit the Center Place upon two occasions. On my return home, many Saints seem to have been discouraged that I could not bring them tales of great enlargement of Zion commerce, industry, and city development. I have told them not to look for mushroom growth in the things of God. We must remember the parable of the grain of mustard seed, and consider how long it takes God to make a great, sturdy tree.

I am grateful that I am able to see God in slow development and in small things. I like the thought of Evelyn Underwood:

I come in the little things,
Saith the Lord:
Not borne on morning wings
Of majesty, but I have set my feet
Amidst the delicate and bladed wheat
That springs triumphant in the furrowed sod.
There do I dwell, in weakness and in power;
Not broken or divided, saith our God!
In your straight garden plot I come to flower;
About your porch my vine,
Meek, fruitful, doth entwine;
Waits at the threshold, love's appointed hour.

Can you imagine Zion, beautiful for situation, the site for the glorious temple to which Jesus will come again, without shady trees, fields of wheat, pastures with herds of cattle, flocks of frolicking sheep and lambs, and the loveliness of gardens? That would rob the city of God of much of "the perfection of beauty" out of which "God hath shined."

And imagine Zion, the center of the organized kingdom of God, without these:

I come in the little things,
Saith the Lord;
Yea, on the glancing wings
Of eager birds, the softly pattering feet
Of furred and gentle beasts,
I come to meet

Your hard and wayward heart. In brown, bright eyes
That peep from out the brake, I stand confessed.
On every nest
Where feathery patience is content to brood,
And leaves her pleasure for the high emprise
Of motherhood—
There doth my Godhead dwell.

But it is in men and women that God most wants to shine forth his glory in Zion:

I come in the little things,
Saith the Lord:
My starry wings I do forsake,
Love's highway of humility to take.
Meekly I fit my stature to your need.
In beggar's part
About your gate I shall not cease to plead—
As man to speak with man—
Till by such art
I shall achieve my immemorial plan,
Pass the low lintel of the human heart.

This poem might aptly be called a paraphrase of Scripture:

"Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me."—Revelation 3: 20.

Can you picture the Savior at your door—fitting his stature to your need? Acting the part of a beggar—pleading entrance to your life that he may establish the kingdom of God within you? There is a purpose—a divine purpose—in his eagerness to enter. You may be in the kingdom, but he also wants the kingdom in you. He wants to share in your conflicts of mind, to help in your trials, to comfort you and all his loved ones.

WITH JESUS in the inner sanctuary of the heart, his disciple learns the secret of serenity. A few may want to be alone; but the majority of human beings with healthy consciences find solitariness unbearable. It is intolerable for some to be long alone with themselves. Conscience tells them what they are. It condemns their darling sins, but since they cannot give them up, they seek refuge in drinking, smoking, gambling, and generally going the pace. They burn their candle at both ends until their plight is indeed desperate. Then, it is the psychiatrist or Christ. I cannot tell what the former will counsel. I know that Jesus Christ is the great healer.

Under similar stress, Charles Wesley is said to have composed that wonderful hymn, "Jesus lover of my soul, let me to thy bosom fly." Get out your hymnbook and read it, and apply the balm for Wesley's soul torture to your ailment, should you have such.

I do not wish to make it appear that Jesus will simply comfort the sinner and apply some healing balm. He will not look on sin "with the least degree of allowance," and it is understood that repentance is a prelude to his making his abode with anyone. If behind a smiling face, you have hidden grudges, anger, and hatred, he will tell you to cast out the devil of duplicity. If you have tortured yourself with jealousies and evil surmisings about others, he will demand that you make a clean break with these. He will make you see that it is more saintly to bear the responsibility for your own mistakes than to shelve them onto others.

He will tell you that love is the greatest medicine known to God or men—not love of self, but a genuine love of God and of your fellow men. He will uphold a healthy, self-regarding sentiment—one with a generous share of self-criticism in it. He will teach you that your welfare and liberties are bound up in the common liberties of the community. He will teach you not to strain for pleasure at the expense of another. He will tell you that in the kingdom of God the "race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong," but to those who cultivate that wonderful grace which outlasts even faith and hope—the love which Christ himself personifies.

WITH CHRIST WITHIN, we shall be truly trained in sainthood, for God will be with us also. "If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him."—John 14: 23. The law of God will indeed be written upon the fleshly tablets of the heart of such a man.

It is no new doctrine that Christ is "in" the members of his church. Paul wrote:

And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you.

Think of it! The Spirit of God that worked the miracle of the resurrection of Jesus Christ is ready to work in us, to quicken our mortal bodies, and to put into our hearts more concern for the kingdom of God than for the social and economic things of the world. Being in Christ and Christ in us, we become doubly new creatures. The old ways of life pass away; all things become new, and one unit of Zion at a time, we bring the Gathering nearer.

The mind that was once carnal becomes spiritual through the transforming grace of Christ. "They that are after the Spirit, do mind the things of the Spirit." They bear the fruits of the spirit—"love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Galatians 5: 22, 23).

I like the way Peter states the program of development for the new creature in Christ: "Giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." Then follows the promise: "For if these things be in you and abound, they make you that you shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." Thus are the developmental steps of the "new creature" made plain.

But to those who grow weary in well-doing, Peter says: "But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins."—II Peter 1: 5-9.

HOW EASY it is to forget the forgiveness of our old sins in these times! In the past thirty-five years, the world has passed through at least ten years of war and its aftermath. The generation that has grown up during this time has never known the normal ways of the beginning of the twentieth century. To them the abnormal has become the normal. Controlled economically, people have treated social convention with disdain and ceased to practice personal inhibitions that belong to normality.

Therein is a grave danger to our people, without respect to age or youth. Nothing is right and saintly just because everybody is doing it. The "new creature" must be careful not to return to his old ways. Each person knows his old mistakes and should earnestly try to refrain from repeating them. Here is the challenge we must not ignore:

"Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things [i. e., add all the Christlike virtues Peter mentions], ye shall never fall: For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

This is the ultimate gathering. The power that makes it possible for us to be pure in heart, "of one heart and one mind," must be in us, individually and collectively, or there is little hope of our sharing in the "kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven [that] shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High God" in the day when the triumphant Christ shall set up his rule over all the earth.

Repentance Continues - By DONALD SAVAGE

IN THE BEGINNING the word which is being preached today was declared by the Son of God. Through the ministering of angels and the Holy Spirit, this simple and all-important truth was taught: Repent and be baptized every one of you for the remission of your sins, and you shall receive the Holy Ghost. This Spirit will teach you all things that you shall do, and if you obey its voice, you shall be saved in the everlasting kingdom of God.

Thus the gospel was introduced into the world on the theme of repentance. The Holy Scriptures bear testimony that, whenever and wherever the gospel was again brought forth, it was woven about this same theme. As in the beginning, the Holy Ghost has continued to call upon men to repent and believe the gospel. Whenever men have heard that call and have obeyed its voice, they have begun the long and strenuous climb that ends at the feet of Christ. Through their agency they strive upward, one step at a time, out of the darkness and intrigue of the world. Always before them is the guiding Spirit, always encouraging them onward.

Repentance has been and will be declared to all men who can and will accept it. But know this: the Holy Ghost is not working with all persons, for it will not always strive with men. He who persistently rejects that gentle pleading will eventually find himself alone—alone, that is, as far as the light is concerned. The angel of darkness will see to it that he is not entirely alone.

THERE IS, perhaps, some questioning how this pertains to us at this late date? Was not our repentance accomplished long ago before we submitted our names for baptism?

Nothing could be further from the truth. No man's repentance is ever completely accomplished. In fact, in this life it is hardly begun. The most that we can hope to attain is the self-knowledge that we have always attempted to keep the commandments of God to the best of our ability in ever better and more complete fashion.

We, as a church, notwithstanding our serious shortcomings as individuals, have received a relatively large amount of spiritual light. Through the grace and design of our Savior, we possess this most precious thing in our earthly existence. But, by virtue of its possession, we are placed in a position potentially more hazardous than any other people on earth. The higher one rises, the more splendid and joyous the view, but the further he may fall.

I say this not to fill any heart with fear, but in an endeavor to help us realize that the path on which we have started is not a light or frivolous thing. Salvation is forever and ever. No one can be too careful or too cautious about how he prepares for that forever and ever.

Sin, crime, wrongdoing, or whatever else we may wish to name it, is one and the same thing in that it is in direct opposition to that which delights our Lord. We are placed on life's journey that we might have the opportunity to see the consequence of sin and the value of righteousness. In the day of judgment, men must be judged and receive a reward according to the degree they have overcome evil and loved good.

It is probably safe to say that everyone has at some time or another realized that all sin is not the same in magnitude. It is most certainly all the same in that it is all evil and an abomination, but it also most certainly varies in the degree of its "commitability." Let us attempt to illustrate what this means.

IMAGINE, if you will, a long blackboard upon which is drawn a number of vertical lines dividing it into several columns. These columns will be brackets into which we will attempt to place sins of different degree. Over the column on extreme left, let us place a phrase which is descriptive of the worst sin we can imagine. An appropriate title might be "This, the world abhors." Now working toward the right, let us title the columns in lessening degrees of sin until we have progressed through those which the world accepts to our extreme right where we end the headings with, "These, the world admires."

Next, let us fill into a number of the spaces the names of evil-doings which come to our minds. Perhaps the first we think of is murder. This one will surely be placed in the bracket on the extreme left as a sin which even the world abhors. But how about such a misdemeanor as drunkenness? This is not generally considered "so bad." Where shall it be placed? And where shall we fit such "little" sins as allowing our chickens to scratch in the neighbor's yard, or playing our radio too loud late at night?

As we continue, one by one, the different columns receive their allotment until it becomes obvious that there is great variance in the seriousness (an inadequate word) of sin. All sin is evil, but some sins seem to be much more abhorrible than others. I trust this will deceive no one into believing our church standards can be similar to the standards of the world. The columns which might be set up by Jesus would certainly stretch to infinity on the right side. On the extreme end of the list would be the standards actually practiced by the Savior. It is our duty as men and women who hope for eternal life to be always striving toward that perfect standard set by our master. We will not attain it in this life, but we must always strive in that direction.

REMEMBER THAT we have already said it is the Holy Ghost which allows men to realize their lowly and fallen state. As they allow it to filter into their souls, they are warned that men must repent or they cannot receive the fullness of joy which might be theirs through obedience and the mercy of their Savior. When a man has truly repented of the sins which he can see at that time, he is again shown sins to correct which are in a "higher bracket." Thus, Jesus constantly "tempts us upward." We can see that the amount of diligence which men exert in attempting to live more and more righteously is directly responsible for the spiritual heights to which they rise. This is in strict accordance with our previous implication that to the degree which men overcome upon the earth will they be rewarded in eternity.

THE FINAL TWO POINTS for which we have laid a hasty foundation are: First, "How high can a man rise without first repenting of the sins which are revealed to him in the bracket in which he is at that time?" Second, "What will happen to the person who grows complacent in his present status and does not seek to progress?"

The first answer is short and simple. The source of all righteousness is not the man but the Spirit teaching him. Should a man refuse to obey that Holy Spirit, he will be cutting himself off from more advanced instruction and can rise no higher. His righteousness simply cannot rise higher than its source.

The second answer is also simple and much like the first. Regardless of how high a man has risen, there is always a bracket above him to which the Holy Spirit tempts him to climb. Should he refuse to obey, he deliberately breaks the direct commandments of Christ. The Scriptures fairly teem with warnings to all men about this danger in which Satan tempts them downward. For although they may believe that their present level is assured, such is not actually the case. Spiritual growth cannot remain static. It must either rise or fall. The man of whom we speak is in danger of being cast off at the last day.

Therefore may I exhort every person to continually strive forward to attain the first glory that is the reward of the faithful.

He who seeks will surely find, and unto him that knocks will the doors of righteousness be opened. "Wherefore, ye must press forward with a steadfastness in Christ, having a perfect brightness of hope, and a love of God and of all men. Wherefore, if ye shall press forward, feasting upon the word of Christ, and endure to the end, behold, thus saith the Father: Ye shall have eternal life."—II Nephi 13: 29, 30.

A Code for Pastors

By James C. Daugherty

AS A PASTOR charged with the duty and possessed of the opportunity to lead a group of Saints and with them build a successful branch or district, and conscious of my obligations to them, my church, and the public to do the best job possible, I will sincerely endeavor to guide my thoughts and actions by the following code:

1. I will honestly appraise my capabilities and do everything possible to put them to work fully for the good of all.
2. I will frankly recognize my own limitations and do my utmost to improve my qualifications wherever inadequate.
3. I will try never to underestimate the importance of the other person's point of view.
4. I will remember constantly that the people who are associated with me are worthy of every consideration; therefore, I shall deal with them as brethren.

5. I will be ever mindful that the development of the best in any man is my most important job.
6. I will try to listen more than I talk.
7. I will maintain an open mind.
8. I will remember that I can make more friends by being genuinely interested in other people than by getting other people interested in me.
9. I will not hamper myself by carrying old grudges or prejudices.
10. I will share my knowledge and experiences with my associates, because helping them to success will lift me to greater responsibilities and opportunity for service.
11. I will not fear to assume the responsibility of supervision since I have the job to do, and management and leadership are necessary.
12. I will not miss the opportunity to give sincere praise and credit where they are deserved.
13. I will refuse to let myself feel too important, realizing that blustering, putting on airs, and unnecessary displays of authority are manifestations of weakness.
14. I will maintain friendliness without over-familiarity.
15. I will deal fairly with a person who has a grievance, whether it be real or imaginary.
16. I will treat all my associates without partiality or favoritism.
17. I will take a deep concern in the happiness, the health, the progress, and the general well-being of each member of my branch.

We Grow Latter Day Saints In Camps

By the Department of Religious Education

THE AMERICAN SUMMER CAMP for youth is perhaps one of the major educative influences of the twentieth century," so states Wallace Greene Arnold in Youth Leaders' Digest for April, 1949. He goes on to add that this is "a sweeping statement to be sure, but one the proof for which is steadily mounting." Again in his article, he says, "Camping has been called by a great educator 'America's contribution to education.'"

If camping in general contributes this much, if it truly is "one of the major educative influences," how much more may we expect from church camping? Can we expect it to be one of the major religious educative influences in the church? Probably not, because the boys and girls are in the camp environment for only one week out of the year, whereas many camps are conducted for six weeks or longer. Yet during this one week, the campers can practice Christian living perhaps more intensely and more interestingly than during any of the other fifty-one weeks of the year.

In camps, personal attention is given to individuals. Camper-staff ratio is from four to six (never more than eight) campers per adult leader. What opportunity this affords for individual counseling! One of the foremost character education psychologists in the country, Dr. Ernest M. Ligon, of Union College, Schenectady, New York, has built his entire program of character education on the ministry to the child as an individual. He goes so far as to say that in testing thousands of persons in their laboratory, they have yet to find an "average" child. It follows, then, that all our training, to be effective, must be planned for the individual. The camp environment is an excellent place for this. Perhaps this explains why the camping experience seems to be so effective in the lives of the campers.

OUR CHURCH LEADS

Our church has sponsored camping for over twenty years—since the first youth camp held at Nauvoo in 1928. It pioneered in youth camping. Only in recent years has it been that other churches and other organizations have sponsored youth camps. The greatest work in co-ed camping, as it is called in the camping field, is yet in the future. Truly our church has led in youth camping.

Our church has its opportunity, too, leading in church camping. Recognition of this phase, and its part in the total program of camping is just now coming to the attention of the American Camping Association, and this is one area of their work that will receive major emphasis in the future. As a church, we can help them with this study. In fact, we have done so in the past and are continuing to do so. At the camp institute held in April of this year by the Missouri Valley Section of the American Camping Association, Carl Mesle, supervisor of church youth activities for Independence, talked on "Spiritual Values in Camping." This section of the association is looking to our church for leadership in church camping.

OBJECTIVES IN CAMPING

It isn't difficult, in the informal atmosphere of camp, for young boys and girls and the older senior high groups to participate and lead in worship, prayer, singing, and the other activities of the camp. At an adult leaders' camp held last summer, a five-year-old boy asked the blessing and did a fine job. He came to us before the meal to see if we approved of his appearance—if his hair were combed and his face and hands clean! Several priesthood members, even one pastor, were in attendance; but because one of the major objectives in church camping is the training of leaders, we chose the boy for this responsibility. The pastor and priesthood members didn't need the experience, but the boy did.

Another important objective in church camping is to develop the art of harmonious living together. Camping provides opportunity for this under guidance. At camp, the overprivileged and the underprivileged, the aggressive and the timid, the talented and the untalented all live together. The leaders' job is to blend these into a harmonious unit.

The camp setting, site, and program encourage an appreciation for nature as one of the great blessings of God emphasizing how much man depends upon the natural resources for his life.

CAMPING IN '49

At the present time, these camps are planned for this summer:

Ponca City, Oklahoma, May 29-June 4
Colorado Springs, Colorado, June 12-19
Gardner Lake (Excelsior Springs, Missouri: Youth Camps, June 11-18 and June 18-25; Girls' Camps, June 25-July 2; July 2-9, and July 11-14
Elliston, Montana, June 19-26
Eric Beach, Ohio, June 26-July 3
Park of the Pines, Michigan, June 26-July 3
Deception Pass, Washington, July 4-10
Nauvoo, Illinois, July 10-17
Brooksville, Maine, July 30-August 6
Brewton, Alabama, Junior High, August 10-13; Youth, August 14-21
Des Moines, Iowa, August 14-20

If you are one of the young people of the church, plan to take advantage of the opportunity of attending one of the camps of the church. Get in touch with your local or district leader, or write the Department of Religious Education, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, mentioning the camp or camps in which you are interested. Your inquiry will be forwarded immediately to the proper officials.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours.

QUESTION:

"Am I wrong in teaching that there is always an opposite—that the church opposite Christ's church is the devil's (the Catholic)? It seems to have all the outward forms of godliness, but it does not teach equality and love in the way Christ did. We know it blinds and does not teach choice.

"I have also taught that all other churches were man's. I thought that the Catholic Church would call for and take all other churches, and that those who were not Catholics would belong to the Restoration. Now I am wondering if all Christians will finally accept the gospel and the other element which opposes will be the antichrist or communistic."

ANSWER:

To say that there is an "opposite" in all things may lead one into difficulties. It is an assumption not technically correct. For instance, we know no direct opposite to electricity. This may be stated of many things. In the Book of Mormon, II Nephi 1: 81, 98, is stated the thought that you have in mind more explicitly: "For it must needs be that there is an opposition in all things . . . even the forbidden fruit in opposition to the tree of life." It may be stated accurately that truth and righteousness will always have opposition. Satan stands in opposition to God and to all good. Keeping this thought in mind, we now refer to the statement found in the Book of I Nephi 3: 220-222: ". . . there are save two churches only . . . the church of the Lamb of God and the . . . church of the devil, and whoso belongeth to the church of the Lamb . . . belongeth to that great church, which is the mother of abominations." In terms of organization there can be only one church of Jesus Christ which has within it the twelve apostles, the two priesthoods, and the fullness of the gospel message. Church organizations which have not these, must in organization be foreign to God. However, this would include all churches, and not merely the Catholic Church. It is necessary to discriminate between the organization of a church and the members of those churches, some of whom may be among the "honorable men of the earth"—good folk, not in spirit followers of Satan, who will receive rewards according to their good works.

WHAT IS THE "CHURCH OF THE DEVIL"?

In referring to the Roman Catholic Church as the "Church of the Devil," one must be careful not to be too loose in his reasoning. There are other religions which are foreign to Christianity and to the Restored Church. We may mention the great world religion of Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, etc., which are definitely antichrist. Evidently we have not arrived at the time when the world has only two churches in definite organizations, the Church of the Lamb and the Church of the Devil, for the world is divided into many great religions and churches. Whether or not the time will come when there will exist only two organizations remains for the future to reveal. The First Book of Nephi, chapter three, verse 222, suggests such a classification. Yet, in making the interpretation, we must keep in mind the fundamental truth that no man (not even God) could draw a line between all humanity—past and present—and say rightly that all on one side are of God and all on the other side are of the devil. Such a division would negate all the teachings of the gospel about justice, love, and degrees of rewards and glories according to works. Let us keep in mind that all teaching founded in error stands in opposition to God and the truth. This identification is vastly more important than trying to identify the "Church of the Devil."

IS COMMUNISM ANTICHRIST?

It is definitely evident from the literature of leading Communists (read the Communist Manifesto by Karl Marx and Engels) that the philosophy of Communism is antichristian and therefore antichrist, which means opposed to Christ. But, though Communism definitely stands in opposition to Christianity and religion, all who may be classified as "antichrist" are not Communists. I have already referred to several great world religions which are antichrist in spirit and practice. I John 2: 18, I. V., says that there are many antichrists. John further says, ". . . all who are opposed to Christ are antichrist." Alma 16: 7-13 refers to a certain man as antichrist.

Shall the Communistic peoples crush the Roman Catholic Church and finally absorb all peoples other than the Restored Church? This is an assumption not based upon a broad scriptural or historical point of view. There are too many factors in the total world picture to justify such a definite conclusion. Let us be careful that we do not make ill-founded assertions for which the facts of history and the writings of Scripture do not provide adequate information.

SHALL THE CATHOLIC CHURCH ABSORB ALL OTHER CHURCHES?

Again such an assertion would not be well-founded. There is no final evidence as to the correctness of the viewpoint. As I have already pointed out, it is not the various branches of the Protestant Churches only which must be considered. There are the great world religions outside of the Christian group which among the family of peoples are as influential as the Catholic Church. We must keep in mind not merely the so-called Christian churches, for God is not a God of the Christians to the exclusion of other world religions. God is the God of the whole world and of the universe.

JOHN BLACKMORE.

QUESTION:

"We learn that the five most vital results in church life were obtained through group fasting and prayer as noted in Mosiah 11: 156 ff; Alma 4: 6; IV Nephi 13; Moroni 2: 3; and 6: 6. Why would not individual fasting and prayer at home do just as well?"

ANSWER:

The marvelous manifestations of God are not always dependent upon the consecrated efforts of a great many. A striking example of this is recorded in Genesis 18: 32. Here the Lord promised that Sodom would not be destroyed if ten righteous people could be found in that city. This plea was made by one man, Abraham.

In unity, however, there is strength, and when a number of people join in a season of fasting and prayer, there is quite likely to accompany that effort a manner of life which becomes the seedbed of faith, faith of such quality and in such measure as to unlock the treasure house of God. It would seem presumptuous, however, for us to state that individual effort to invoke divine favor would not also bring to one outstanding spiritual and material blessings.

We cannot limit God nor prescribe under what circumstances or conditions he will bestow blessings. Through fasting and prayer we deny the physical nature that the spiritual may be in the ascendancy. Fasting and prayer clears away the obstructions in the channel between God and man and permits the free and full expression of his Holy Spirit.

For these and other reasons, they can be indulged in with profit both by individuals and groups.

We Three Together - By WINIFRED MILNER

A Serial in Two Parts -- Part II

DAVID'S FEET didn't stop running until his breath was gone. God had let him down. Kathy and Stephen were not going to be in love again for always. Kathy was going away with Mr. Buffington just as soon as the law would give her the right papers. She had said so, and she wasn't joking. She and David were not going to be three people together in a house.

David hurt all over from his head to his toes, and his throat kept making sobbing sounds that wouldn't stop. He felt the way Toby must have felt the day he had put him in a shoe box and wrapped it in brown paper, cutting holes in the box so that Toby could breathe. He had planned to take Toby to Brooklyn on the subway train, where cats and dogs were not allowed, to visit Uncle Jack for Sunday dinner. But Toby had been too tight and hot in the box, and he had meowed in such fright that David had had to take him out of the box and leave him at home. He had planned to show Toby the instruments Uncle Jack had for cutting out tonsils and things.

The hurt in David was so big that he wondered why cars and people didn't stop moving. There shouldn't be any sun or any breeze moving the trees. All the clocks in the world should stop. There shouldn't be any talking or any laughing or any movement anywhere; the world should be dead.

He had prayed, he had worked, he had believed, and God had let him down. He had humiliated himself with Martha in front of his playmates for Kathy and Stephen's sake. He had kept his promises to God, all of them—every day.

The sky was bright blue with hardly a cloud anywhere. David looked through it and beyond it. "I hate you, God. I hate you—hate you."

HOW COULD YOU choose one parent and give up another? He thought of Kathy's sweetness, the way she smiled, the way she held out her arms to draw him in, never too busy to answer his questions, always making him a small cake or pie for his own whenever she baked. She knew wonderful stories and games; she could skate and race and catch a ball, and pitch and swim, and she was prettier than anybody's mother—prettier than any woman in the whole world.

And Stephen was the wisest man he knew. Stephen knew everything that boys liked, and he knew how to make playing the violin more fun than pitching a ball. He tried to picture what it would be like without the violin duets and the games they had practicing bowing and fingering. Stephen knew stories about people who wrote music. He liked the same records David liked, and when Stephen finished explaining a record, David and Kathy heard all kinds of wonderful things in the music they couldn't have heard by themselves.

Stephen could whittle wonderful things—wooden soldiers and toy cars and boats. Camping in the summer, he could make fires just right for frying fish and steak, and he knew when the coals were right for baking potatoes and corn and bread. He knew what was good for boys and what wasn't. He knew the kind of clothes and shoes boys liked to wear. Life wouldn't be fun without Stephen. He couldn't give Kathy up, and he couldn't give Stephen up; they belonged together—they belonged together always and forever.

"Hey! Get off the highway, you fool!" There was the sound of a car's screeching brakes, the sound of skidding wheels, and a man's cross voice. "What are you trying to do, boy, get yourself killed?"

David looked at the man dully. "What did you say, sir?"

The man opened the car door. "Get in here, son, and I'll take you wherever it is you're going. A kid alone on the Westside highway—" He bit his words off. "You're sick, aren't you, kid?"

"I guess so." He saw the speeding cars and the danger, but it was like looking at it all through a screen. He had felt this way once before, once when Uncle Jack had given him ether and taken out his tonsils.

"Where are you going, lad?"

The George Washington bridge was in the line of David's vision, spanning the Hudson from the New York to the Jersey shore. "Take me as far as the bridge," David said. He climbed in beside the man and settled Toby on his lap.

The car moved down the highway, and the man said, "Do you live in New Jersey?"

"I'll go with you as far as the bridge," David said.

"Do you live near the bridge?"

David didn't answer.

"What's your name?"

Again David didn't answer. What did Kathy see in Mr. Earl Buffington the Third? Hearing Mr. Buffington talk was like listening to a book with words that were too big to understand. His pants were too pressed, his hair too slick, his eyes were cold, and he was always talking about himself. He hated children, all children. David couldn't tell how he knew, but he knew. And he would be ugly to Kathy. He wouldn't let her skate or foot-race or ride a bicycle, he was sure of that. She would have to stay dressed up and be old and quiet for always now. He wouldn't like her low, red wedgies or her slacks. He wouldn't take her picnicking with her brown hair tied back with a scarf, or if he did, he wouldn't like it if she got smudges of dirt on her hands and face.

"Have you got any folks, kid?"

"Yes," David said with emphasis.

"I've got a father and a mother."

"If you tell me where you live, I'll drive you home."

Home! If he went home he would have to choose one parent from the other. "Let me off at the bridge," David said.

When they came to the bridge, the man stopped the car and said, "I don't feel easy in my mind, letting you go by yourself."

"I'll be fine," David said. "Thank you, sir."

WHEN THE MAN HAD GONE, David walked up on the bridge. He had been across on the Jersey side with Stephen and Kathy, but he had never walked across. Pedestrians did walk, though—there was a special sidewalk where people were safe from the traffic. A long way ahead of him, David could see two people walking, and he followed them.

It was very far across the bridge. Toby was not a heavy cat, but he was a wiggly one, and David had been carrying him a long time. He squirmed and was restless in David's arms. David stopped to rest. He leaned against the rail and turned his eyes to the New York City sky line. The buildings looked dwarfed. He could pick out Grant's Tomb and the Riverside Church. They looked like toys.

The Home Column

He couldn't see home, but it was there, not far from the church.

Below him the muddy water of the Hudson billowed and swelled. He could see the current ripple. It would be swift, and the water would be cold. He began to imagine what it would be like to climb over the rail and let his body drop into the water. If he did, Stephen and Kathy would be sorry, and it would be a way to get even with God. God had given him a special talent to play music. Stephen often said so. Stephen said talents were serious business, that the world needed lots of music and beauty in it to make it better. "If I drown," David told Toby, "God will have to create another boy to play the violin in my place. He'll get cheated out of David Worthington's share of music altogether." David walked closer to the rail and leaned over. He could feel the wind of the river on his face. Maybe there wasn't a God at all, maybe Stephen and Kathy were mistaken about him the way they had been mistaken about Santa Claus. But if there wasn't a God, who had made the stars and the wind and the river and the trees and grass and flowers? David leaned far out over the rail. Maybe if he killed himself, God wouldn't let him come into heaven. God had tricked him once; maybe if he killed himself, he would have to moan over the land like the wind with nowhere to go.

"I know a better way to get even with God," David told Toby. "I'll be mean and wicked. I'll be the wickedest boy in New York City." He had heard of problem children lots of times. Well, he would be one. He would steal and lie and cheat. Maybe a policeman would put him in jail where he couldn't ever be of any use to anybody. "I'll be as mean as I can to Martha, and I'll never study." He had seen a boy once without a brain in his head. A mind that wasn't used would grow crazy and silly like an idiot. He tried to think of something he could do that would be so wicked it would make God sick. He looked at Toby. He could throw Toby in the river. Drowning Toby would be worse than lying or stealing or cheating in school, it would be killing something alive that God had made.

He took Toby roughly in his hands. "I am going to drown you, Toby. I am going to make God as mad at me as I can."

Toby leaned against David, digging his claws into David's shirt as if he knew what was happening. He was trembling and meowing mournfully. Then he loosened himself from David's grasp enough to climb up and lick David's cheek. And suddenly David gathered the cat close and put his face hard against the cat's body. "I can't do it, Toby. You love me. You trust me. And I love you, too. I can't drown you, I can't hurt you." Tears ran down David's face and fell on the cat's fur. "I'll take you home," he said.

With Toby hugged tightly against him, David ran toward the road. There was one other thing he could do that would be as bad as drowning Toby. He could break his violin, knock it to pieces, and be sure that he would never play again. The talent God had given him would die then, and without the violin, David wouldn't be much good to anyone.

WHEN DAVID REACHED THE ROAD, his eyes were bright with misery. This time he didn't wait for someone to ask him to ride, he stood at the downtown bend in the road and held out his thumb. He had never thumbed a ride before, and he was scared, but he had to get home fast.

As he came to his apartment, Mrs. Beemus stood with her fat body in front of the door and wouldn't let him go in. "Aren't you ashamed of yourself, running off and worrying your folks? They are out looking for you. I was given orders to look after you the minute I laid eyes on you. Believe me, if you were mine, I would know what to do with you. Running off and making trouble—is that any way to act, I'm asking you?"

David didn't answer, he only looked at her, and she moved out of his way to let him open the door.

"What's ailing you, Davey, lad?" she asked. "You look like you're passing through hell."

"I'm all right, Mrs. Beemus. You don't have to come in with me."

He closed the door and put Toby down. His face felt hot as if he had fever. He went to the piano and lifted his violin. It was so beautiful. He put his hand against the wood, in his mind he could see himself and Stephen playing together. He plucked the strings and put the violin in position, loving the feel of it against his neck and chin. He was trembling so that he could hardly walk when he took the violin into the bedroom and closed the door. He opened his toy closet and took out his hammer. Then he laid the violin on the floor and dropped to his knees beside it. He raised the hammer to strike the blow, but he couldn't make his hand come down, the love for his instrument was too great, it was like striking the life out of himself. Then David began to cry, and he couldn't stop. The room began to weave and whirl. Faces began dancing on the ceiling and on the wall, some of them were Martha and some were Mr. Earl Buffington the Third, and every face was God.

DAVID FELT THE SHEETS around him and the pillow under his head. His eyes were heavy, and he opened them slowly. Stephen and Kathy and Uncle Jack were standing beside the bed. Kathy was holding his hand. The white curtain at the window was blowing, and he could hear the bells from Riverside church.

"You are going to be fine, old man," Uncle Jack said. He had on his doctor's white coat, and he had dressed it up by wearing a pink carnation in his lapel buttonhole.

"The bells?" David said in a weak little voice.

Kathy squeezed his hand. "It is Sunday, dear. The church bells are ringing."

David's mind was all confused. How could it be Sunday? Had he been in bed three days?

Stephen seemed to read his mind, for he said, "It is eleven o'clock Sunday morning, son," and then to Uncle Jack, "I didn't know shock and hysteria and fever could take so much out of a child."

David lay still. Thinking was such an effort. He felt weak, as if he had cried for hours and hours. And then he remembered—that was exactly what he had done. He tried to sit up in bed. The violin—was it all right? He must go and get it. And then he discovered he was too weak to raise his head.

Uncle Jack was bending over him. "What do you want, David?"

David's lips moved, "Violin."

Stephen left the bed. In a moment he came back with the violin and put it on the pillow beside David. David felt it against his face. The violin was all right; it was safe. He hadn't hurt it. He smiled at them and closed his eyes. He could sleep now.

IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN AN HOUR after that, it could have been half a day. David heard footsteps coming into the room. He thought it would be Stephen or Kathy or Uncle Jack, but it was Mr. Earl Buffington the Third.

David began to tremble so that the bed shook. He had come to take Kathy. From somewhere inside, David got the strength to scream, one scream and then another, over and over.

Kathy came running, and Stephen called, "I'll phone Jack and have him come as soon as he can."

Kathy's angry voice was shrill and sharp. "Get out of David's room, Earl. You should know that he is much too sick to see visitors. Go home, please. Go now."

Uncle Jack came. He gave David a hypo, and he must have thought David had gone to sleep, for he said to Stephen and Kathy, "I don't want to know about your troubles and difficulties. I think too much of both of you to meddle in your affairs, but if you want your boy, you are going to have to pretend, in front of him at least, that everything is fine between you. He can't adjust to the idea of losing one of you."

David hated the pretending. Whenever Stephen and Kathy were kind to each other, whenever they stood together like friends, David told himself, "It is not really so, it just seems so because Uncle Jack told them to do that."

Earl Buffington the Third was being especially nice to Kathy. He wasn't coming to the house any more, but he was sending lots of flowers and books and candy. David knew it was only part of Kathy's pretending, but she acted as if she didn't want any of the things he sent. She gave them to Uncle Jack to take to some of his patients who were too poor to buy books and candy and flowers for themselves. Uncle Jack told Stephen, when Kathy was in the kitchen, that giving Buffington's stuff to the poor was a good joke on the old boy, because it was something the fellow would never do himself.

DAVID DIDN'T KNOW what day it was, or how long he had been in bed, he only knew that he was getting better, and he had made two decisions after long and hard thinking. The first one was, he was going to ask Uncle Jack if he could go to Brooklyn and live with him and Aunt Grace. It would be easier to do that than to try to live with Stephen without Kathy or Kathy without Stephen. And he had decided against being the wickedest boy in New York City. If he were real naughty at Uncle Jack's, Uncle Jack would only analyze his head and fix an opinion about him. Doctors were like that. And uncles didn't love enough to forgive badness in boys the way fathers and mothers did.

Stephen was sitting beside David's bed. He had been sitting there quite a while, just sitting doing nothing. He wasn't even whittling. He thought David was asleep. David wondered if he should tell Stephen that he was going to live with Uncle Jack. He might even be going as soon as tomorrow, because Uncle Jack had said only this morning that David could get up this afternoon and walk around the room some. It wasn't going to be easy to leave Stephen and Kathy, even if he could see them every day. It would be as hard for him to leave them as it would be for him to stop hating God. But Uncle Jack had remedies for things like hate and fear, too, and he used bad tasting medicine to cure them.

David was about to tell Stephen the things he had been thinking, and then the telephone rang, and he went right on pretending to be asleep so that he could listen to Kathy talk. He knew right away that she was speaking to Earl Buffington the Third.

"No, Earl, you can't come to see me this afternoon. . . . Yes, the welfare of my child does mean more to me than you do. Please let me alone. As soon as I know what I am going to do, I'll let you know. I am all confused. You are going to have to let me work out my problems my own way."

KATHY CAME INTO THE BEDROOM then, and Stephen stood up. "David is better. There isn't any point in our going on like this, Kathy, torturing ourselves. Why don't you let the man see you? God knows you aren't going to get any interference from me, and David is going to have to begin facing facts the way they really are, for his sake as well as for our own."

Kathy came up to the bed and put her hand lightly on David's forehead. "Are you asleep, dear?"

David didn't answer. He felt a tear drop on his face, then another, and another. Kathy was crying. "Be good to me, Stephen," she whispered, "and listen to what I have to say. I love you."

David's heart began pounding wildly. This wasn't pretending. Kathy thought he was asleep, there was no need for pretending.

"I have been such a fool." Kathy's voice was speaking out loud now, it was low and full of suffering. "The day Earl and I came to tell you I wanted a divorce, it was as if God had taken the bandages from my eyes. I saw values that day that had been hidden from my sight. When I heard you telling David that living with me and Earl could be a fine thing for him, that Earl's money could give him advantages you couldn't afford, I knew you had something of far more worth to give than anything money could buy. I know how much you think of David, how much he means to you. I saw you then as the man you really are—unselfish, good, kind. Abraham once had a son named Isaac. I saw that day, but I wouldn't admit it even to myself. It has taken David's illness—these hours of closeness to you to make me see that if I lose you I will lose everything. You may not want me, Stephen, but I shall never marry Earl Buffington."

Stephen was holding Kathy in his arms now. "Darling, darling Kathy. Thank God—thank God." He was kissing her in the old way, the way David loved, and then they were walking out the door together, hugged in each other's arms tight and close.

David got out of bed. He walked to the window and pressed his face against the glass. Overhead in the blue sky, white feather-clouds had gathered, and they were moving slowly before the sun, so that a shining light was behind them. David watched them. Behind their slow motion was God. He stretched himself upward, trying to get closer to the slow-moving cloud.

"Forgive me, God." He pressed his thin body against the glass, he had never felt such gratitude, such humiliation, such shame. Tears ran down his cheeks and dropped on the floor at his feet. "I thought you didn't care, and you were answering my prayer all the time. I thought you didn't hear me. I didn't trust you, and now I don't know how to make it up to you. You must have lots of jobs down here that I can do. Give me some hard ones, some that will hurt me, so I can pay you back for the way I've hurt you. Thank you, sir, thank you forever. My name is David Worthington. I'll talk to Stephen, he knows everything. I think he'll know a way for me to make you like me again."

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

The Second Mile - JASPER O. DUTTON

WE HEAR A LOT these days about the "second mile." It seems quite a popular expression with most people. Many years ago when the country was new, a young couple lived some distance from town, and in going home one night were a little late. They had to go through about 200 acres of heavy timber, which was infested with wolves and a few bears. At the beginning of this timber was a farm house; the farmer had two grown sons, two hunting dogs, and some good rifles. The young couple rapped at the door and asked if the boys would see them through the timber, but the boys were tired and did not want to go. After some reasoning and urging, they were persuaded ("compelled," shall we say) to go. When they reached the other side of the timber where the young couple were not afraid, would you say this young couple should insist on the second mile? This thought is based on Matthew 5: 41, King James version, which reads: "And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain." The Inspired Version reads: "And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him a mile; and whosoever shall compel thee to go with him twain, thou shalt go with him twain."—Matthew 5: 43. So we see that the second mile is not required unless requested.

We will appreciate the Inspired Version more as we use it more. Matthew 5: 40, in the King James Version, states: "If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also." Did you ever hear of anyone's doing this? The Inspired Version reads: "And if any man sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have it; and if he sue thee again, let him have thy cloak also."—Matthew 5:42. That sounds reasonable, and we have known of plenty who have thus been wronged, and never did we hear of anyone giving two articles when sued for only one.

In Doctrine and Covenants 3: 6, Joseph was told not to translate what had been taken from him, but to get the same teaching from the plates of Nephi. Then in Doctrine and Covenants 76: 3, we have another example of the use of the word translate: "For while we were doing the work of the translating which the Lord had appointed unto us, we came to the twenty-ninth verse of the fifth chapter of John which was given unto us as follows." As to just how this was done is not clearly stated, but we know that he did not have the Urim and Thummim after section fifteen was given. I presume that the same Spirit which inspired St. John also directed Joseph to make the corrections in the Inspired Version.

SOME USE the Inspired Version only in preaching and say very little about it. My experience leads me to preach from the King James; whenever there is a correction, I read it and take time to explain about the Inspired Version and how we came to have it. I have found it a good way to help the lovers of truth.

One reason why we need the Inspired Version is that there are statements in the King James which make people doubt that the Bible is inspired. For example, Deuteronomy 14: 21: "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shalt give it to the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien." While the Inspired reads: "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shall not give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; thou mayest not sell it to an alien, for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God." Such inspiration as shown in these and many others of a like nature speak for themselves and thereby remove the stumbling blocks that have bothered so many. Let us take a reasonable view of the "second mile" and use it as God intended.

In the preface to the Inspired Version we read: "Thou shalt ask, and my Scriptures shall be given as I have appointed, and they shall be preserved in safety; and it is expedient that thou shouldst hold thy peace concerning them, and not teach them until ye have received them in full. And I give unto you a commandment, that then ye shall teach them unto all men, for they shall be taught unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people."

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION AND LEADERSHIP TRAINING CURRICULUM

Educational Bulletin No. 103

Revised to January 1, 1949

This pamphlet is prepared by the Department of Religious Education giving listings of recommended courses of adult study. The department has sought to emphasize the distinctive message and mission of our church in these suggested courses and to supplement the church school curriculum.

BRIEFS

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—Four hundred and sixty awards were presented to Blue Birds and Orioles at semi-annual award services held Sunday in the fourteen congregations of the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church. Yvonne Rhyan of the Custodis Ignis Circle of Stone Church received her sixth and final "Light of Life" award. There were sixteen girls who received their enrollment certificates in the "Light of Life" program; and sixteen who received their first awards; eight received their second awards; and six received their third awards. Three girls and two leaders of the Orinzi Circle of Stone Church received the highest Oriole award, that of First Rank Builder: Dean McKay, Helen Harder, Joan Farley, Mrs. Vida Kraus, and Mrs. Alberta Davis. Sanitarium Service Pins, awarded for hours of paging at the Independence Sanitarium, were awarded to the following girls: 200-hour pins to Ruth Elser, Marilyn Andes, Edith McKinney, and Kay Oeser; 100-hour pins to Elizabeth Watkins, Sylvia Sallee, Mary Ann Hightower, Carolyn Essig, Barbara Burroughs, and Hazel Englebrecht.

The Men's Club of Independence has voted to sponsor the Campus Recreation program for the summer. The City-Wide League invested $400 last year to restore two volleyball courts and one tennis court under lights. This year they have allotted $200 to begin with and each League is raising additional funds. The Men's Club is naming one man for each sport who will act as adviser and helper to the League Committee. Once determined by the League Committee and himself what needs to be done, he should be able to give leadership in rounding up the necessary man power, equipment, and technical skill. The following committees are being set up: volleyball, softball, tennis, miniature golf, horseshoes, croquet, archery, campfire circle, and children's play area. Also needed is a small permanent building in which to store recreation equipment and to use as a refreshment stand and office for the campus supervisor. Lee Hart, former Graceland, who is studying Recreational Leadership in Chicago, is being hired by the church as Campus Supervisor to maintain the grounds during the summer and give supervision to activities there.

LAKE ORION, MICHIGAN.—The opening services of the new Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints at Lake Orion, Michigan, have been scheduled for Sunday, May 15. The first service planned was a Communion and fellowship service. Dr. L. O. Brockway preached at 11:00 a.m. At 3:00 p.m., a special consecration service was held in charge of Elder Harry J. Simons of Flint, president of Flint-Port Huron District. Apostle Arthur Oakman preached at this service. Elder Simons is continuing in Lake Orion in a week of special services. Elder Henry E. Webster is pastor.

PASADENA, CALIFORNIA.—The first meeting of the Pasadena Branch following the withdrawal of the Temple City group, which has formed its own congregation, was the Communion service on April 3. The attendance at this very fine service, presided over by Elder Warren K. McElwain, pastor of the branch, was 104. Elder Laurel McElwain gave the address, and Joyce McElwain sang "Just for Today."

Elder John W. Rushton was guest speaker on Palm Sunday, the attendance being 121, with eighty-eight remaining for the potluck luncheon immediately following the 11 o'clock service.

On Easter Sunday, 162 members and friends of the branch enjoyed the very fine sermon by Elder Harry Waylett and the newly organized choir.

Elder McElwain has chosen Elders Joseph F. Ruchaber and Harry Waylett as his associate pastors.

The young people of the branch are under the leadership of Mr. and Mrs. Reece Walker. Newly appointed book steward is Dale Uehlin.

Priest Glen Gardner is director of religious education with Mrs. Earlita Inslee leader of the children's division of the church school, and supervisor of the junior church. Bruce Bridenbecker is secretary of the church school.

Mrs. Minnie Burton has been elected leader of the women's department, with Mrs. Ottilla Bridenbecker, secretary-treasurer, succeeding Mrs. Ednah Strong, resigned. The "Luncheon Is Served" project on April 7 was very successful both socially and financially, $53.65 being netted. Mrs. Eulalia Robey was chairman of the project. Mrs. Robey is ways and means chairman for the department.

The "Talent Tea" was given on Sunday afternoon, March 27, at which time a number of children and young people of the group demonstrated their musical talents, both vocal and instrumental. At the conclusion, refreshments were served and a social hour enjoyed. Mrs. Vera Njeim was in charge.

The prayer services are improving both spiritually and numerically. On Wednesday evening, April 13, Elder Robert Chambers spoke under the influence of the spirit, encouraging and admonishing both the priesthood and the laity. On this evening, twenty-one were present and twenty-six on the following Wednesday evening.

The sudden passing on April 15 of Mrs. Alice Omohundro, one of the oldest members of the branch and a member of the church for more than fifty years, brought a note of sadness at this Easter time.

On March 20, at the 11 o'clock service of the Pasadena Branch, Lila Kathleen, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Carnahan, was blessed by Elders Blaine Bender and Paul Moore. Mrs. Carnahan, who before her marriage was Myra Sheppard, and her husband are now making their home in Cedaredge, Colorado.—EDNAH STRONG, Reporter.

ROTTERDAM, HOLLAND.—The Zion's League (The S. I. L.) met at the home of Albert and Twyla Scherer for a party on Saturday evening, April 2. The League is celebrating its fifth anniversary this year, and the high light of the evening's activities was the playing of a phonograph record which the European Mission Club of Graceland sent to the S. I. L. congratulating them on their anniversary. The record consisted of individual greetings from members of the club and the singing of the hymn, "What a Friend We Have in Jesus," in both English and Dutch.

The S. I. L. derives its name from the first letters of their motto, "Streven Is Leven," which means, "Striving Is Living."

Hendrik Compier, past president of the S. I. L., is now attending Graceland and is the president of the European Missions Club.

DINUBA, CALIFORNIA.—Elder George Njeim of the Quorum of Seventy held a series of preaching services at the Dinuba Mission church, April 7 to 15. Attendance among the Saints was good.—LULA PARK, Reporter.

BAY CITY, MICHIGAN.—Four men have been recently ordained in this branch, Donald Greenacre and Richard Zmyslony to the office of priest, Theo Banks, teacher, and Gerald Mash-er, deacon.

On Easter Sunday morning, the following were baptized: Barbara and Robert Paul, Melvin and Kenneth Johnson, Judy, Ronald, and Dale Graves, Elroy and Norine Rice, Erwin Magg, and Harry and Barbara Cendrowski. Confirmation service for the twelve new members was held Easter night with Pastor George Whitney and Assistant Pastor Bernard Weber in charge, aided by Elder Otto Boutett of Midland, Michigan. Patriarch Carter of Lansing conducted missionary services April 24 through April 29.—NANCY ZMYSLONY, Reporter.

SAGLE, IDAHO.—About 125 attended Easter Sunday morning services at Sagle, the largest attendance in many years. Elder and Mrs. J. L. Verhei of Portland, Oregon, were in the branch for the day. Mrs. Verhei talked during the church school hour, and Elder Verhei preached the Easter sermon. There was a basket lunch, and Elder Verhei spoke again. Elder Vernon Gunter is the pastor.

PITTSBURG, KANSAS.—The Zion's League held an Easter worship service at 6:30 a.m. on the bank of a brook west of town. Curtis Pearson was in charge of the meeting, and there was a good response from those present. The idea brought out in some of the talks was, "Christ died for me. What shall I do for him?" About twenty members were present. Eldon Anderson is president of the local Zion's League, and Arthur Goettel is young people's leader. After the worship service, the young people had breakfast together around the fire. Mrs. Curtis Pearson prepared the meal.

PHOENIX, ARIZONA.—The Phoenix Branch now has a Blue Bird Band and an Oriole Circle under the supervision of Mrs. Ruth Wood. Eleven girls have received their insignias. The women's department meets on the second and fourth Thursdays of each month to study "New Vistas Unlimited."

Apostle Charles Hield met with the branch on March 7 and 8. His sermon topics were "Repentance" and "Salvation." The average attendance was 125. On Palm Sunday, the Zion's League held an early morning sunrise service at Papago Park. Marion Blakely, League supervisor, was in charge of the service. On Easter morning, the branch held its annual early sunrise prayer service in Paradise Valley. At eleven o'clock the choir presented "The Redemption Song" directed by Mrs. James H. Barrett. Pastor Wilbert W. Wood preached the Easter sermon.

Cecil D. Briggs, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Cecil D. Briggs, was blessed on Easter Sunday. The Zion's League Guild Players presented "Man of the House" on April 21 and 22, directed by Miss Shirley Williams. The proceeds went to buy choir robes.

Saints passing through this area are invited to meet with the branch at Tenth and East Moreland Streets.—WALLACE GREENE, Reporter.

CHICO, CALIFORNIA.—Following the missionary series of sermons by Seventy George A. Njeim, in Chico, five people were baptized on Sunday, March 27. Attendance was excellent during the series, with twelve to fifteen nonmembers present each evening.

Pastor H. D. Hintz is conducting missionary type services on Sunday evenings to ground the new members in the beliefs of the church. He also conducts a radio service through alliance with the Chico Ministerial Union and has gained favorable recognition for the church. They were invited to participate in the World Day of Prayer, sponsored by the Chico Council of Church Women, on March 4. The pastor was invited to speak at the Good Friday services conducted by the local Union and held at Trinity Methodist Church.

The Zion's League promoted a successful auction April 1, netting them $109.

A cake sale at a large downtown market the day before Easter, was a project of the women's department. A special feature was the sale of eggs decorated to represent ducks and chicks, to be used as table favors; they were in great demand by the public.

Ira Sliger and Leon Ultican repaired the walls of the church's lower auditorium and were assisted by members of the Zion's League in a fresh paint job. New wrought-iron railings for the church steps were installed under the direction of Harold White.

Maundy Thursday services were conducted by the pastor in the evening, using candlelight, portraying the Last Supper. The atmosphere was one of quiet reverence as members partook of the Communion.

Hundreds attended Easter sunrise services at Sunrise Hill in Bidwell Park, sponsored by the interdenominational youth of Chico. Cora June Hintz was in charge of program arrangements, and Marjorie Hintz was director of the choir. Both girls are Leaguers. The Zion's League held a breakfast following the sunrise service at the church.

Special Easter services were conducted by the church school on Easter morning under the Director of Religious Education, Lillie B. White. At eleven o'clock, the Easter message was given by the pastor. A religious play was given in the evening.

A new organization, the Men's Fellowship Club, has been instituted with Harper M. Brown elected president. They gather regularly for dinner meetings.

PENSACOLA, FLORIDA.—Two religiously divided homes were united in the gospel recently as Coley D. Blue and Hillary R. Cook were baptized in a service conducted on May 1. District Missionary W. J. Breshears conducted a one-week series from April 24 to May 1.

BAY CITY, MICHIGAN.—Patriarch Edward R. Carter was with the Saints in the Bay City, Michigan, Branch from April 24 through 29. During his stay, he preached five sermons, for which the average attendance was seventy-five. There was a high spiritual standard and many nonmembers attended. Fourteen members of the branch received their patriarchal blessings from Elder Carter during the week.

SALEM, OREGON.—The Easter Sunday sermon was by Elder A. V. Nelson of Portland in the church at North Seventeenth and Chemeketa Streets in Salem. Two babies were blessed also.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.—The second annual conference of the Youngstown District was held in Youngstown, Ohio, on March 20, 1949. Due to the illness of District President William McCune, the conference was in charge of Apostle Percy E. Farrow and Seventy Merle Guthrie.

David Sheehy of the Sharon Branch and Calvin Wescott of the New Castle Branch were called to the office of elder. Robert LaSalle of the Baldwin Branch was called to the office of teacher and Roy Stevenson of the Baldwin Branch was called to the office of deacon; these calls were approved by the conference.

Brother William McCune was re-elected district president; his two counselors are G. B. Franklin of Youngstown, Ohio, and Homer McDowell of Hamburg, Pennsylvania.

The following were sustained in the respective offices of the district: Agnes M. Kean, secretary; Glenn E. Reichard, treasurer; Howard McDowell, church school director; Amy Axelson, director of music; Mrs. William McCune, women's leader. William Clinefelter was elected director of young people with G. B. CENTRAL MISSOURI STAKE HAS NEW OFFICIALS

HARRY J. SIMONS

Sunday, May 8, a new Central Missouri Stake President and a new Stake Bishop were installed by President F. Henry Edwards at Warrensburg, Missouri.

HARRY J. SIMONS, pastor at Flint, Michigan, was appointed to the presidency of the stake when Ward Hougas was called to an assignment in Eastern Colorado District. Willard C. Becker was called from Far West Stake to serve as bishop of Central Missouri Stake and to supply the vacancy created when Bishop T. A. Beck was called to serve as bishop of the state of Michigan. These appointments were made by the action of the Joint Council of The Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric on April 20.

Stake President Simons was born in Des Moines, Iowa, May 22, 1909. In 1930 he was married to Ruth R. Curtis. They have two children, Janyce Marie, 10, and David Charles, 8. Brother Simons was graduated from East High School in Des Moines in 1926, attended Des Moines University and the State University of Iowa during the next four years, and received his Bachelor's Degree in Commerce in 1930. He has also done graduate work at the University of Toronto. During the twelve years following his graduation in 1930 he worked in the life insurance business at Fort Wayne, Indiana, and Lincoln, Nebraska.

Brother Simons' first contact with the church was through his companion. He auditors. Homer McDowell was sustained as bishop's agent, while Richard Baldwin was sustained in his office as evangelist.

Along with the recent conference, the Youngstown Branch has been active along other lines. The women's department held a mother and daughter tea at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. Kean on Tuesday, May 10.

was baptized in 1935, and at once became active in the branch work at Fort Wayne. In 1942 he was appointed as pastor at Toronto, Ontario, where he served for nearly three years. In 1945 he became pastor at Flint, Michigan, where he remained until the present.

BISHOP BECKER served the church as pastor at Longview, Washington, from 1933 to 1936. Following this he was appointed missionary to the states of Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia, where he remained from 1936 to 1938. He served in the Army Air Corps during the war until his discharge in September of 1945. He did personnel work in England and received the Bronze Star Award for meritorious work in the field of organizational planning.

Brother Becker was graduated from Woodland, Washington, high school in 1930. In 1938 he entered Graceland College, in 1940 he enrolled at Iowa State College; and following his war service, he returned to Iowa State College, Ames, Iowa, and received a Bachelor of Science degree in Agricultural Economics, majoring in Rural Sociology, December, 1945.

He was married to Doras Gamet on August 19, 1945.

At the 1948 General Conference, Brother Becker was appointed to Far West Stake with Maple Grove and Osborn, Missouri, as objectives.

The young people of the branch have been sending packages to a family of Saints in Germany, and they have been working very hard on a missionary play entitled, "Send Out Thy Light," which they will present in a Sunday evening service, May 22.

Note of Thanks

I wish to thank our friends and neighbors and the doctors and nurses at the Sanitarium for their kindness to my husband during his illness. He is improving but still needs the prayers of the Saints.

The Promise of Youth and Its Fulfillment

How swiftly time is passing! As a French astronomer has said, "The present is an aperture through which the future is ever rushing into the past."

Easter Sunday this year, I was again the invited speaker at our beautiful church in San Bernardino. The sanctuary was filled to capacity with worshipers and friends, many of whom I had known since 1915, and with whom I had enjoyed many happy experiences. There were those on whom the passing years had laid a heavy hand; life's burdens had slowed their step, bowed their frame, dimmed their eyes, and left indelible marks of wear. There were others, whom I had known in their youth when the siren voices of imagination and hope had called to them in terms of romance; when with bright eyes and eager step they accepted the challenge of the future. These are now staid men and women shouldering their responsibilities and building upon the foundation laid by those who had preceded them in the flow of the river of life. Some I had known since their childhood and some I had sacramentally christened and dedicated; these, with others, are now serving the church in various ways. One of the impressive features was a group of little children who, under the guidance of their teachers, paraded up to the front of the church and sang an Easter hymn in the usual shy but lovable manner.

It was a rare privilege for me to sit in the chancel of the church in company with an old friend and fellow minister, George H. Wixom, whose ministry as local pastor and traveling missionary I had known and in some measure shared. There were also two of the new generation of ministers—George Dexter and Herald Wixom, son of George Wixom. He is now pastor of the San Bernardino Church in succession to Elder H. C. Ferguson, whose long and honorable service ended some months ago when he responded to the urge to move Zionward.

The following is a splendid tribute paid to the new pastor by The San Bernardino Sun. This speaks in terms of praise of Herald and his work, which brings rejoicing to all who know him.

Dr. Herald G. Wixom recently was elected pastor of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, succeeding Elder H. C. Ferguson. Dr. Wixom is a native of San Bernardino, descendant of a widely-known pioneer family, and is the son of George Wixom, who was mayor of the city from 1915 to 1917.

Dr. Wixom is following in the footsteps of his father, who also held the pastorate of the church for several years, and served as a missionary for 17 years. With such a background under his father's tutelage, Dr. Wixom was ordained as an elder in the church in June of 1941.

He graduated from San Bernardino High School and attended Valley college for three years, completing his formal education with four years of study at Kansas State college, where he received his degree as a doctor in veterinary medicine. He later was employed by the California department of agriculture, and from 1942 to 1946 served in the United States Army, retiring from duty with the rank of major.

Resuming civilian life, Dr. Wixom returned to the state department of agriculture and resided at Stockton, where he served as an associate pastor. Last summer the family returned to San Bernardino, where they reside at 1092 Olive Tree lane in Highland.

Mrs. Wixom is the former Dorothy Elkins, also a member of a pioneer family. They have two sons, Lyman and Billy, and a daughter, Susan.

We rejoiced this glad Easter day in the continuity of the work. It is good to see the fruit of love and devotion coming into fruition, as time with "moving hand" takes the baton of life's race from the tired hands of the past and places it into the strong grasp of those who wait to carry on.

God grant they may carry it higher and further than the fading generation was able to do.

Thanks for Letters

I have received so many wonderful letters in response to mine and would like to answer each one personally, but I could never begin to do so. I really don't know how I could have stood up during this past month without the strength and courage those letters gave me; knowing that so many people believed in me helped. Isn't it wonderful how close Latter Day Saints are to each other?

At our Easter program, the children sang of the victorious Christ arisen—children who had probably never known of anything but Easter bunnies before; there were more than a hundred of them, and as many adults. All the heartaches and wearying hours spent on that service were certainly compensated for by the response of parents and friends at this first open session.

My husband has given great help with the secretarial work, the amplifier to broadcast the recordings, and the Easter slides.

We have sixty-seven children on our gold star attendance record, who have been promised Bibles for sixteen Sundays in a row, and thirty-two more in our kindergarten.

Thanks again for your prayers and moral support.

An Appeal for Greater Progress

A realization came over me while reading the Herald recently that the majority of articles display a free mental will, a personal experimental searching by the writers. They are not shackled by ancient dogmas and prejudices. Slowly and surefootedly we wander into this field of thought, ever conscious of the pitfalls brought about by our religious predecessors. For centuries it was thought that an intelligent searching for God was not for the layman, but Joseph Smith ushered in the truth. The God of humanity is living and active among men today, just as he has been every day since the beginning of time. We are free, but we must realize that the will of God prevails. The walls of deceit will crumble, and our own prejudices and half-truths will vanish with the others. We must weigh carefully every statement and have affirmative proof of it.

So be it a challenge that each will find knowledge through daily communication with God as does the scientist in the laboratory. As the laws of physics apply to the material world, logic must surely say there are laws of the spiritual world which apply to this plane of life. The world has preached laws and claimed proof, yet we are still wanting. Greater progress must be made if we answer the world's spiritual plight. The Doctrine and Covenants lays great weight on the idea that our church is in a better position to lend the spiritual progress so needed by all nations. Let us not be content with a degree of progress; let us aim at a complete gain.

From the Yukon

Easter Sunday came and passed, a lovely day, dry, and with bright sunshine. We were able to go up the hill to attend the Sunday school, of which Jean Barnett is superintendent. It is operated by Army personnel. As I sat in a chair watching the children getting ready and Jean bustling around, I thought, "What a task, what a work to be done." The program was splendid; colored pictures were shown of the crucifixion and resurrection, and Jean told the story.

The Indians here have great need of help. It is pitiful when they come in with their furs, not able to read or write or stand up for themselves. They are shy and nervous, and the laws discriminate against them.

We are now in a large store with more comfortable living quarters, steam heat, and running water. I do not think it hurts any of us to have to rough it for a while; we learn to be thankful and to appreciate the things we have had to do without. I thank God for the trials, for suffering and discipline, which help me to grow and develop in this work. I am feeling much better in health and can do more than a year ago. There is work for all of us to do here.

Ministry Needed

I have been a member of the church for forty-seven years, but most of the time I have been isolated. I read the Herald regularly and send articles from it to my relatives hoping they, too, will accept the gospel. God has blessed me greatly, cheering me in times of sadness and answering my prayers in times of illness. There are four in this community who belong to the church. We often wish an elder could come and talk to us; we would be glad to prepare the way for preaching services. The Herald is our correspondence course, but we need a teacher also.

That God's great family may move forward in this work is my prayer.

A Vision

There are times in one's life when an expression of light and truth from on high is of great worth to him or his family or friends. It grounds him more solidly in the wonderful plan of God as revealed in this church, strengthening his faith and knowledge.

It was my privilege to see in vision the condition of Brother Carl Thompson immediately after he passed through the veil between this life and the next.

He died the Sunday after I had this experience.

As I lay in bed meditating about Carl, I wondered what I could tell him that would be of comfort in the event he should ask such questions as, "Am I going to die?" "Should I want to die?" or "Why must I not be healed?" I felt that I didn't know what to say to encourage him.

At first a song came to my mind, "I'll Go Where You Want Me to Go." Then I thought of that statement in Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12, where the elders are to be called to lay their hands on the sick, and "If they die, they shall die unto me, and if they live they shall live unto me."

As different thoughts ran through my mind, these two persistently returned, especially the song.

An hour or so later, while yet awake, I saw Carl. He was dressed in a dark suit, and standing about 200 feet from me, and about half facing me. It seemed there was a mist or a very light fog between us that cut down the clear view normal at that distance.

At his feet and against his legs was a small pile of brown straw, about the size of a half-bushel basket. These straws were not lying straight nor packed together; they were loosely arranged, some on end, some leaning.

As I was looking, I saw a fire consume all the straw. It seemed to originate in the straw and burn slowly, not blazing up as a fire we might start in a pile of dry straw. After consuming the straw, the fire went out. Carl paid no attention to the fire, it did not burn him or his trousers though it was on his feet and against his legs.

When the straw was burned, the vision ended.

I had a new understanding of that beautiful song we sing so often, "I'll Go Where You Want Me to Go." We sing it so blindly or so longingly for a missionary trip, when really it is much more encompassing.

Even in death we must be willing to say, "I'll Go Where You Want Me to Go, Dear Lord." If we can sing this song meaningfully even to the end, then as is stated in Doctrine and Covenants 42:12, "They that die in me shall not taste of death, for it shall be sweet unto them."

That we as Saints may live to enjoy such a glorious end, is my prayer.

From a Practical Nurse

I was very much interested in the articles about the Sanitarium. After my son was born and my husband was called into service, I learned to care for the sick. Since the education I received in Europe before coming to the States did not prepare me to enter a regular school of nursing, a kind doctor helped me to learn what to do. I have been a practical nurse since 1920; much of my work has been caring for babies, and I love it.

I hope the day will come when the church can have more hospitals so that people everywhere can go to them when they are sick. May God bless all who work at the Sanitarium and all who enter it as patients.

Importance of Family Worship

I have been thinking much of Zion and wondering when our dream of it will be realized. Perhaps the first thing we must do is build Zion homes where peace and contentment and love are ever present. If each day, parents and children will take time for worship, home life will be much happier. These devotionals need not be long—young children become weary when they must listen to lengthy scripture readings. Rather, the home worship service should be the most pleasant part of the day with all members of the family looking forward to it. Our children like to take turns in preparing the worship center.

Good example is an essential in teaching children. It is useless for parents to try teaching Christian ideals without putting them into practice in their lives. We have tried to live clean lives, and we have taught our children to take their problems to God when they need help.

Young people need guidance in selecting a life companion, too. Here again God can help them. He is interested in what we do, but he depends on parents to assist him in his work. A righteous home will bear good fruit.

May we have a greater love for God and his people so that Zion will be a reality.

I recently underwent a serious operation and am now convalescing in the hospital. I called the elders to administer to me before going to surgery and also prayed that God would guide the physician's hand during the operation. Now I am on the road to recovery, but will be hospitalized for some time yet. I will be happy to hear from any who care to write.

News From Hardy, Arkansas

Two years the group of Saints at Hardy had dwindled down to an average attendance of about ten. The only ministry we were receiving was from Elder A. E. Ziegenhorn of Amagon, who met with us every second Sunday of the month. Those who continued to attend faithfully realized the need for workers and began to write letters to those who could help. These letters were supplemented with constant prayer for the progress of the work. District President T. B. Sharp visited the group, calling on both the regular attendants and those who had quit coming. He also made new friends for the church and seven were baptized last summer. He was assisted by Seventy J. Charles May, Elders B. F. Pollard and Zeigenhorn, and Priest James Doty. Recently Dale Zuber was ordained a priest and Floyd Sweatnam a teacher. Also assisting in the work is Priest Fred Turnbull, formerly of Independence, Missouri, who is now making his home in this locality, and E. R. Davis, a teacher. Present attendance averages thirty, and the women's and children's departments have been organized.

We ask the prayers of the Saints that we may soon be officially organized as a branch.

Faith Without Works

As I think of Christ's parable of the sower, I feel sad for those who receive the word with joy, but because of no root fall away when temptation comes. I am sorry also for those who are choked with the cares, riches, and pleasures of this life, consequently, bringing forth no fruit to perfection.

As a boy, I never was as strong as most of my playmates. I used to envy my brother who could always beat me in a boxing match or wrestling, even though I was two years his elder. I wanted broad shoulders and lots of muscle. One day while looking through a magazine, I saw a picture of Charles Atlas. Along with his picture was the story, "Once I was a ninety-seven pound weakling, and now look at me, the world's most perfectly developed man." Then he said, "This miracle can also happen to you. Just write to me and I'll tell you how."

That was the chance for which I'd been looking, so I wrote to Charlie telling him what a weakling I was and that I hoped he could do something for me. The answer I received was very hopeful—for a small amount a week and a close adherence to the rules prescribed, I'd soon be a giant. Wanting those broad shoulders and bulging muscles, I went to work with much zeal.

After two weeks of staying in nights, no smoking, no drinking, and eating the kind of foods that build muscle, plus plenty of physical exercise, I began to notice my biceps taking on a little shape, and I could chin myself thirteen times—a feat I had never before accomplished. "Oh, boy!" I thought, "it won't be long until I look like Charlie."

Well, take one look at me today and you'll not see the image of Charles Atlas. Something went wrong with my plans. I believed that Charles could make a man out of me, but I didn't show my faith by my works.

When the fellows I had been chumming with didn't see me for two weeks, over they came. "Say, Owen, what's the matter? Where you been keeping yourself?"

My reply was that I was building muscle. "Who wants muscle? Look at the fun you're missing!" With such temptation, I fell away. If I had stayed in training, I believe I could have at least become a strong, healthy person.

So it is with all of us. If we would measure up to the stature of the fullness of Christ, we must exercise those flabby muscles of our faith until they become strong. Then we, like him, will be able to withstand any temptation.

Report on Canton Group

It was a pleasure to meet with the Canton Saints at the home of Rex Foster and to know that although their church was destroyed by a tornado, these people are still strong in the faith. They are planning to construct another building soon. Attendance on Mother's Day was thirty-five; among other hymns of faith, they sang "Never Be Discouraged." The women are doing all they can to raise funds; even nonmembers are sympathetic and have expressed the hope that a new church may soon be constructed.

I Found Christ in a Hospital

By MAY EDITH OAKMAN

THE WAR EXPERIENCES OF AN ENGLISH NURSE

EACH OF US is engaged in some sort of daily activity, and each has met Jesus Christ by the wayside. To everyone, he presents a different picture. Think a minute . . . have you ever met Jesus carrying his cross?

Let me tell you how I met Him.

When I first left my home and entered into a world of silver and white and quiet, calm efficiency, I imagined that there of all places in the world, it would be easy to live in absolute accord with Jesus. I wondered why Dad had cautioned, "Whatever you do, stand by the church." I have often remembered those words, for like many girls, I had visions of entering the wards completely equipped with a Christlike sympathy and a faith in his church which could never be shaken. But believe me, although Christ is in every corner and nook, beside every bed, and in every room of these great institutions for the sick, it is most difficult to find him.

I was overwhelmed when I learned of the functions and marvelous co-ordination of the human machine. You might think that such a revelation in itself would turn your attention to the Creator, but oddly enough you find yourself so intrigued by the invention that the inventor is overlooked. Daily and hourly as you traverse the wards, Jesus is there, but people brush against him and knock him over in their hurry as they seek blindly for more and more knowledge, never realizing that he is the fount of all wisdom.

I passed from the stage of the lecture room where I had been permitted to view some of the Master's work in the creation of living things, but Jesus was still just a name to me. I still believed firmly in the rosy visions of cooling fevered brows and breathing words of kindness and sympathy over sick people. It seems like yesterday that I was rushed into a ward of howling children with bread and milk on their bibs and faces, and tiny, sticky fingers reaching up to besmear my clean, white apron. Somehow Jesus seemed to step right back into the pages of the New Testament. It is said in the circles of the profession that nursing either makes you or breaks you; I do not say this is true, but I do know that before you can see Jesus at all in a hospital, you must first be possessed of a "broken heart and a contrite spirit." Two or three days in a ward full of tiny children with the ravaging marks of disease on their little faces is enough to shake anyone's faith. I well remember I doubted the very existence of a God.

TRAINING TO BE A NURSE is arduous, exacting work. I frequently found the courses so extensive that if I studied at all, there was no time left to read the church books. Even in my free time, I was often too tired physically and mentally to pray. So, my vision of merciful ministry was speedily smashed.

Here Is the Writer . . .

May Edith Oakman, S.R.N., was born in Enfield, England. She is a half-sister of Apostle Arthur Oakman. Before the war, she worked as a stenographer and bookkeeper, but in 1942 she joined a government emergency nursing organization. Then she decided to make nursing her career. While she would have preferred training at the Independence Sanitarium, war conditions prevented her coming to the States, so she took her three-year course at the West London Hospital. She passed the final examination entitling her to practice as a state nurse in 1947 and is now completing midwifery training. Although her choice of career has taken her from branch activities, May has been able to do much good in bringing a knowledge of the church to many she would not otherwise have contacted. Her hobbies are knitting, swimming, and letter-writing.

I smile now, but at the time it was not funny to be sent to wash the face of a patient and find that I could not carry out this simple task without embarrassment to both of us. As for the sympathy which I was to have offered in large portions—well, there was no tongue more tied than mine. I must have been most pathetic—a nurse, professedly a follower of Jesus Christ, all fingers and thumbs and unable to proffer one word of encouragement to the sick. It was a long time before I met Jesus carrying his cross, and when I did, I found he was carrying not only his but hundreds of others—including mine!

Time passed swiftly. I was sent out to our base hospital during the war to care for the wounded soldiers. I had learned to accept the fact that people must die, but that disease is curable, and that God does care more than he seemed to do when I first viewed the world through the eyes of the sick. I still wasn't able to see him, however, or to understand his purposes; I merely tolerated the seemingly unnecessary suffering because I loved my work.

I came from a beautiful hospital, where rows of clean white beds stood on polished floors, and vases of fresh flowers adorned the tables. One could expect to find Jesus in that environment, but I never met him there. Much later, in the mud and dirt and pain of the convoys that came in from the battle fronts of Europe, I learned the meaning of a contrite spirit.

IT WAS MARCH, if I remember correctly, and the ground was covered with snow. At seven o'clock one bitterly cold morning I entered the ward prepared, I thought, for my work as a war nurse. Here there were no white beds, no polished floors, no flowers—only row upon row of black iron bedsteads, and in each a still, silent form covered with a gray army blanket. I shall never forget that first morning. I was horrified to know that "our boys" had no white counterpanes, no cut-glass tumblers, no china cups and saucers, no flowers. The day passed like a quiet but hideous nightmare. The soldiers were too tired to say "good morning," and we were too tired to say "good night." I remember in the evening after supper we held a council of investigation in our rooms; we grumbled and complained; we "laid down the law" about disgusting conditions. We were too blind to see that the men didn't care whether they drank from tin mugs or glass tumblers—all they wanted was a few words of understanding and the opportunity to sleep.

Some of you may have traveled, at one time or another, that valley of the shadows so beautifully described by the Psalmist. Those who have will agree with me that the experience is not one to be feared or avoided, for it is there you meet the Master in many guises. I have seen him in youth and in manhood—in the face of the aged and in the beauty of a newborn child. He didn't appear in glorious vision, but there have been times when I know other hands than mine have ministered with me. I have bent over the pillows of shattered men and women—products of the ravages of war—and I have felt his presence.

I REMEMBER Private B., a guard from the Black Watch. He had been a professional dancer with absolutely no regard for religion or God. He came to us like many others, still and quiet, a man with a name attached to an identity disk and a leg that would never dance again. There were very few nurses who did not sit with him through the long watches of the night and wipe away tears while he fought his battle of the Garden. He wanted to save his leg, he wanted to dance again—it was his livelihood. We were all determined that the leg must never be removed until he had won his own battle, but it was a long time before he came through. One day around lunch time, he called me over to his bedside and said, "Nurse, I can't take any more. I'll have to lose it," and he turned his face away like a little child, ashamed that he couldn't be bigger than the pain in his leg. I think that is when I first met Jesus, for after the operation was over and the face on the pillow was no longer pain-racked, he told me many things. I listened to him tell of the bravery of the man who caused his wound. He bore no malice; like Jesus, he said, "Forgive him." He told me how in the weeks of pain he came very near to God and felt that only God knew the agony he endured and the lesson he had learned. He asked me why I became a nurse—many patients ask that, and many say, "I wouldn't have your job for all the money in the world." I told him why I had selected my profession, and then I told him about the church. He said, "You know, Nurse, that's right; if everyone followed God's plan, there would be no wars to fight." Yes, Private B. went through the war shoulder to shoulder with many others, but in his little corner of the ward he fought a private war of his own, and he came through with a new conception of Jesus—one he received in the valley of the shadows and one which, by the grace of God, I was permitted to share.

MANY SUCH EXPERIENCES were ours as we nursed the boys. They told us stories of God's protection which moved us to deep humility. It was through men like Private R. who lost both his hands and his sight that we saw Christ most clearly. This soldier didn't just sit back and accept the matter; he, too, passed through the Garden, and it was a long time before he reached the mount of transfiguration. I used to stand with him in the night and hold his cigarette while he smoked. I sometimes silently thanked God that he was blind, for the thing he hated most was our pity, and it was more than difficult to remain dry-eyed while he puffed silently and then suddenly started up with a cry, "Nurse, I can see a light. Tell me, is there a light over there? Someone has flicked a lighter, Nurse . . . Nurse, there is . . . a light . . . isn't there?" And the answer would always have to be, "There's no light . . . none at all; it's quite dark in here; it's night." I watched those sightless eyes search the gloom and the stub arms drop slowly to the sheet as he would say, "Funny . . . I was sure I saw a light." We feared for his sanity at times, but there were other hands than ours over those blinded eyes, there were other voices than ours bringing comfort to him in the darkness. When he was ready to go out into the world again, I offered to take him for a walk. I never dreaded any experience so much, and I never needed the grace of God more than I did then. As we set out across the lovely countryside, my tongue was tied—how could I find the right words to explain the scene before my eyes to this man who must spend the rest of his life in the dark? I was more ministered to on that walk than I can ever tell you; the Spirit of Christ was with us all the way, and I was able to tell Private R. of the things I saw. He told me what he saw, too. That sounds funny, I suppose, but he saw things in his mind that were wonderful to behold. The sole of his slipper was worn through when we got back to the hospital, but Jesus had one less cross to bear. That afternoon, Private R. became strong enough to shoulder his own.

THESE WERE THE EXPERIENCES we shared during the war. It was our task and privilege to care for men of all nations. Often in the night, as we made our rounds of the beds, someone would call, and from the lips of men who spent the day denying the existence of God, would come some of the finest testimonies of his goodness that ever reached my ears. Time upon time when I have been homesick for my own people and for church association, some tough, unshaven soldier would lift up my faith with his broken story of the goodness of God to him.

Occasionally I felt that the whole thing was too much for me to understand; the courage of these men was truly a miracle. Many of them were fully aware that their remaining years would be spent in bed, yet the "ward of fractured spines" was the happiest of all. There was no pity ever offered in that ward; all the patients asked was a smile. They didn't want sympathy, but they did need understanding. On rare occasions, I saw these men break down and cry, but they never complained. They were the ministers, and we were the "ministered to." I remember one thirty-year-old man who had been an excellent swimmer. He came to us unable to use his hands and unable to walk, yet from morning 'til night the boys rocked with laughter at his jokes and chatter; they never saw the tears hidden behind the Daily Mirror when he took his morning nap. Soldier G. hid his bitter struggle behind a newspaper, but he learned to carry his cross, and, like Jesus, he also helped to carry others'.

MANY TIMES my faith has been tried, but always over my life I have felt the guiding hand and loving wisdom of my Heavenly Father. I remember one particular evening very clearly. The convoys kept coming in every day, and we did nothing but work, eat, and sleep. It was ten in the evening as I slowly walked to my room across the hospital grounds. I was very tired, and as I looked up at the star-strewn heavens, I said, "Oh, dear Father, I'm weary of all this pain." And in those brief minutes out there in the open air, it seemed the very arms of God reached down and surrounded me, and the power of his love encouraged me.

As the years passed, I learned that true sympathy is born of understanding; it does not arrive with the uniform. There are still times when I go with fear to the side of a patient, dreading the inevitable questions, but at such times, Christ is always standing at the other side of the bed. He never fails to provide the right words for me to say to the sick or to the relatives of the one whom he would take Nursing is hard work. It requires much study, much patience, and a lot of time, but no one can ever express in words what it means to be a nurse. If any of you who read this have daughters who entertain hopes of entering this great work, don't think to spare them the pain and suffering; you would be cruel to deprive them of the experience of walking with Jesus in the wards and corridors of a hospital. If you yourself plan to cast your lot with those of us who minister beside the sick, don't be afraid that you'll fail, or that you won't like it, or that you'll be too soft. You will find Jesus standing beside you and working with you. Then when the letters R. N. are behind your name, you'll be glad, as I am, that you are a nurse, for you will have learned from him how to carry your cross and the crosses of others who are in your care.

it appears most, if not all, belong to the Inca period—that is within the time since the founding of the Inca Empire in the eleventh or twelfth century A. D.

Among the visitors who came from Cuzco to Machu Picchu when I did were Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Buechler, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Witzig, both families of La Paz, Bolivia, and a brother of Mr. Buechler, manager of a bank in Thun, Switzerland, who was visiting his brother. They extended to me an invitation to accompany them in their auto from Cuzco to La Paz, and this generous invitation I would gladly have accepted had plans not been formulated for other activities.

I repeatedly visited Sacsahuaman near Cuzco. It may without question be classed among the wonders of the world. There are three series of stone walls that encircle a hilltop overlooking Cuzco. How the huge granite blocks (some weighing over 200 tons—the largest 300 tons) were moved a great distance and fitted together without mortar or cement with a sort of jeweler's precision is unknown. No one has been able to give the answer. So perfect is the joining of the great stones that a skilled cabinetmaker could not exceed the delicate fineness of the joints between the perfectly cut stones. The lower or northern wall is regarded by the highest authorities as pre-Inca in origin.

No small groups of stones are to be seen around the ruins. The Cathedral in Cuzco was built largely of stones from Sacsahuaman. What was left was too much of an undertaking to move. In almost every street in Cuzco may be seen the remains of Inca or pre-Inca walls; many streets being lined on each side with walls of perfect stonework, serving as foundations for crude colonial and adobe structures.

Air mail arrives and leaves Cuzco twice a week, on Sundays and Wednesdays, when weather conditions do not interfere with visibility for the planes' landing.

The rainy season in the highlands has about come to a close, which is favorable for my visit, though the weather is growing colder.

Those who give not till they die show that they would not then, if they could help it any longer.—Bishop Hall.

DEATHS

FISHER.—Myron C., was born a twin on June 21, 1870, at Shenandoah, Iowa, and died at his home in Somerville, Massachusetts, on Friday, May 6, 1949. A graduate of Western Normal College of Iowa, he went to Boston in 1891 as a teacher. In 1903, he and a brother, Edmund H. Fisher, established a secretarial school in Somerville. First known as the Winter Hill Business College, the name was later changed to Fisher College. When the business was incorporated in 1944, his brother retired and Myron's three sons became officers in the new corporation. A devoted member of the Reorganized Church, Myron Fisher served as a teacher, a church school superintendent, a district officer, a pastor, and bishop. Until his retirement in 1946, he was bishop of Southern New England District. He was also a member of the board of trusteeship of the Somerville Y. M. C. A., the Somerville Rotary Club, and the Winter Hill Improvement Society.

He is survived by his wife, Florence Sanford Fisher; three sons, Sanford L., Myron C., Jr., and Albert L.; his brother, Edmund; and seven grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church.

HACKER.—David Luther, was born December 22, 1938, at Long Beach, California, and died April 30, 1949, at his home in Warrensburg, Missouri, following an accident which happened while he was playing in a tree. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on March 16, 1947, by his father, Elder Felix Hacker, pastor of the Knobnoster, Missouri, congregation. His tragic death was a blow to his family and the whole community.

He is survived by his parents, Opal F. and Felix Hacker; a sister, Evelyn June; a brother, Alvin Clyde; his maternal grandmother, Lillian Erickson of Bell, California; and his paternal grandfather, John R. Hacker. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Warrensburg, Apostle E. J. Gleazer officiating. Interment was in the Sunset Hill Cemetery in Warrensburg.

FREEMAN.—Joseph A., was born July 29, 1891, at Macomb, Missouri, and died November 5, 1948, at his home in Independence, Missouri. In 1939, he was married to Elsie M. Keller. He was a construction engineer and superintended the building of various large structures in different parts of the country. He was a member of the Reorganized Church, the Disabled American Veterans, and the Masonic Lodge of Norwood, Missouri.

He is survived by his wife, Elsie of the home; three brothers: Arthur and Oscar Freeman of Macomb and Edgar Freeman of Wichita, Kansas; and a sister, Mrs. Effie Nevels of Springfield, Missouri. Funeral services were held at the Speaks Chapel in Independence, Elders W. E. Wakeman and Stephen A. Black officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

DUNN.—John Jefferson, son of John Bridges and Mary Dunn, was born April 17, 1869, in Wilcox County, Alabama, and died April 24, 1949, at a hospital in Atmore, Alabama, after having been in failing health for the past two years. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints since April 25, 1937.

He is survived by his wife; three daughters: Mrs. W. R. Solomon, Bay Minette; Mrs. W. E. Cayler, Birmingham; and Mrs. Walter J. Jones, Atmore; six sons: F. J., Albert, and J. D. Dunn, Mobile; Bernie Dunn, Washington State; J. J., Jr., and D. J. Dunn, Birmingham; thirty-four grandchildren; and twenty-seven great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elder A. Orlin Crown-over at the Reorganized Church in Huxford, Alabama. Interment was in the church cemetery.

WATFORD.—Claude Washington, son of James Sullivan and Lala Annie Elizabeth Watford, was born October, 1892, in Wilcox County, Alabama, and died April 21, 1949, at a hospital in Atmore, Alabama, after an extended illness. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints for many years.

He is survived by his wife; four daughters: Mrs. E. Mills and Miss Catherine Watford, Atmore; Mrs. N. W. Franklin, Florida; and Mrs. Joel Day, Huxford; two sons: Carl and James Watford, Atmore. Funeral services were conducted at the Reorganized Church in Huxford, Alabama, the Rev. L. J. Watson of Atmore officiating. Interment was in the church cemetery.

ROYSTER.—Mattie, died May 2, 1949, at the age of fifty-four at Rogers, Arkansas. She was baptized in 1913 near Garfield, Arkansas, and soon after was married to Wallace Marlow; three children were born to them. One died in infancy. Later she was married to Vol. T. Royster, who survives her. She also leaves two daughters: Mrs. John Morrison of Garfield and Mrs. Vera Vierra of California; three brothers: Joe Bowman of Garfield; Charles and Marion Bowman of Tulsa, Oklahoma; and two sisters: Mrs. Maggie Douglas of Garfield and Mrs. Wright of Monett, Missouri. The funeral was held in Rogers, Reverend Rei Gray officiating. Burial was in the Ruddick Cemetery near Garfield.

LUCE.—Elva Leona, daughter of John A. and Margaret Schofield Brubaker, was born December 21, 1869, at Rockton, Pennsylvania, and died March 28, 1949, at the home of her daughter in Williamston, Michigan, following a brief illness. She was married on April 12, 1893, to Henry O. Luce in Maine, and moved to Lansing, Michigan, in 1920. Here she heard the gospel message and accepted it, giving to the church twenty-four years of faithful service. Mr. Luce and three of the seven children born to them preceded her in death.

Surviving are four children: Shirley O. of Okemos, Michigan; Earle H. of Tucson, Arizona; John A. of Lansing, Michigan; and Mrs. Margaret Case of Williamston; ten grandchildren; and five great-grandchildren. Elder Alva J. Dexter of Lansing gave the funeral sermon. Interment was in the Deepdale Cemetery at Lansing.

WELLS.—Noel Ben, was born near Elk Grove, California, on February 24, 1880, and died May 4, 1949, at Sacramento, California. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on January 4, 1914, remaining steadfast in the faith until death. The last few years of his life were spent in blindness, but he was valiant even without sight, often ministering to those who went to minister to him.

He is survived by his wife, Jessie; a son, Melvin N.; and a daughter, Gladys McFarland, all of Sacramento, California; a brother, Earnest Wells of Michigan Bar; two sisters: Mrs. Mae Baker of Redding, California; and Mrs. Ida Matt of Sacramento; and one granddaughter. Funeral services were held in the Palm Chapel of the James Garrick Mortuary in Sacramento, Pastor Myron Reed Schall officiating. Interment was in the Odd Fellows Lawn Cemetery.

RICHARDS.—W. B., was born in Wales on December 6, 1868, and died at the home of his son in Azusa, California, on December 26, 1948. He was married to Caroline Jones in 1892 at Bevier, Missouri. He was an elder in the Reorganized Church and served as a missionary to Canada from 1918 to 1920.

He is survived by his son, David J. Richards, and one grandchild. Funeral services were held at the Fulton Chapel in Kansas City, Kansas, Elder Evan Fry officiating.

LINDSEY.—Mathilde Louisa Tandberg, was born on April 21, 1863, in Christiania (now Oslo), Norway, and died at Independence, Missouri, on May 4, 1949. In 1885 she was married to Olaus Tandberg; eight children were born to them. Three of these children died in their early years. In 1894, Mrs. Tandberg and two sons joined Mr. Tandberg in Akron, Ohio, where he was employed as a cabinet-maker. They were baptized into the Reorganized Church on June 13, 1905, in Akron. They also lived in Toledo, Ohio; Defiance, Ohio; and St. Louis, Missouri, before moving to Independence. Sister Tandberg was one of the first "friendly visitors" of the church; she also taught in the church school intermediate grades. Brother Tandberg died on March 4, 1921, and on February 3, 1936, she married James Lindsey, who joined the church soon after their marriage. In 1945 her health began to fail and from December of that year until her death she made her home with her daughter, Mabel.

She is survived by her husband, James, and two daughters: Mrs. Esther Koehler and Mrs. Mabel Short, all of Independence; three sons: Hans Tandberg of St. Louis; Leonard Tandberg of Los Angeles, California; and Stewart Tandberg of Brooklyn, New York; ten grandchildren; and eleven great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Claude A. Smith and Ted Paxton Scott at the George C. Carson Chapel in Independence. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

ARNOLD.—David, died following an operation at St. Joseph's Hospital in Sudbury, Ontario, at the age of seventy-two (date of death not given). He is survived by two daughters: Mrs. Elmo Gordon and Jessie Arnold of Manitowaning, Ontario, and one sister, Mrs. John McDonald of Leamington, Ontario. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Manitowaning, Elder M. K. Brown and the Reverend Renshaw of the United Brethren Church officiating. Interment was in the Hilly Grove Cemetery.

JORDISON.—Arthur William, was born February 2, 1878, at Sandhutton, Yorkshire, England, and died April 7, 1949, at Cameron, Missouri. He came to America as a small child with his parents, who located at Fort Dodge, Iowa. He was married to Lillian Hazel Zeidler on April 9, 1923; two children were born to them. The daughter, Sunshine Agatha, died in infancy. After living in Cameron a few years, they returned to Fort Dodge, where Mr. Jordison was in the retail business. Later they moved to California to be near their son, Verle, while he was serving in the Navy. Just last year they returned to Cameron. A member of the Reorganized Church, Brother Jordison was nicknamed "Smiler" because of his happy disposition.

Besides his wife and son, he leaves three brothers: John of Los Angeles, California; Amos of Oakland, California; and Thomas of Fort Dodge; six sisters: Miss Ethel Jordison of Oakland; Mrs. Elizabeth Hay of Lehigh, Iowa; Mrs. Ada Hay of Milner, Colorado; Mrs. Sarah Anderson, Mrs. Rose White, and Mrs. Ruth Gaffey of Fort Dodge. Funeral services were held at the Crunk Mortuary in Cameron, Elders Orman Salisbury and Marvin K. Fry officiating. Interment was in the Delano Cemetery.

MYERS.—Carolyn Wilson, was born on March 31, 1895, and died of cancer on April 30, 1949, at the home of her sister. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on June 13, 1944, and was a faithful member of the Cedar Rapids, Iowa, congregation the remainder of her life. Her husband preceded her in death several years ago. Always mindful of the growth of the church, she bequeathed $500 to the branch building fund.

She is survived by her daughter, Mrs. Lester Topinka; her mother, Mrs. Christiana Wilson; a brother, Albert Wilson; and a sister, Mrs. Oscar Ainsworth. Elder D. M. Cassiday was in charge of the funeral service. Interment was in the Linwood Cemetery at Cedar Rapids.

* VACATION

We were passing around the Square during our lunch hour. Two humble citizens were discussing the employment situation briefly as they crossed at a busy intersection.

Said Vanilla to Chocolate: "I ain't heard anything about you workin' lately. What you doin' now?"

Replied Chocolate to Vanilla: "I ain't gonna work no mo'!"

A lot of people have thought that in recent years—a rather dangerous idea. It leads to strange ends. It can lead to parasitism and unemployment compensation. It can lead to politics. It can lead to crime. It can lead to prison. And it can lead one to hell.

* PRAYER

I had been in pain for some days, and I was sorry for myself. I prayed for relief and help.

Then I heard someone knocking at the door—a man selling brooms. He was blind, and he had found his way down our street by tapping his cane along the edge of the walk. He wasn't asking for sympathy. It seemed he wasn't even sorry for himself, although the bright beautiful world was a blank wall to him. Perhaps he had some inner light, for he smiled.

I bought a broom I thought we didn't need and carried it into the house. Now, whenever I look at it, I remember him. It is a symbol in our home—a reminder of his courage. I need that broom, after all.

When he turned away, tapping the walk, traveling his darkened way in the sunlight, a lump arose in my throat. I quit praying for myself and began to pray for him.

Are you praying for somebody else?

* THANK YOU

Miss Ora Dollins of Hartshorne, Oklahoma, writes concerning a quotation from Elbert Hubbard in this column for April 9 that she finds a more complete version of the sketch in the works of an earlier American writer, Stephen Crane (1871-1900), famous as the author of the classic, "The Red Badge of Courage." This version is as follows:

I saw a man pursuing the horizon;
Round and round they sped.
I was disturbed at this;
I accosted the man.
"It is futile," I said,
"You can never—"
"You lie," he cried,
And ran on.

* TEMPTATION

Too many people are like "Lightnin'" and his bottle. When he was chided for his intemperance, he said, "I can take it, or I can leave it. But generally I take it!"

"We should teach people how to live, as well as how to make a living."—Charles A. Norberg, "Monroe County News," Albia, Iowa.

It is easier to tell people how to be good, or go to heaven, or make money, or keep out of trouble, than it is to do it.

I know how to put a seed in the soil, to water it, to hoe the weeds, and keep off the bugs. But how does God make a flower of it?

HOW TO SPEAK THE Written WORD

A Guide to Effective Public Reading

By NEDRA NEWKIRK LAMAR

This book was not written: it was talked. The author has simply put down in clear, conversational style the basic principles of speaking and reading the written word.

The book aims at an unaffected naturalness in reading—shows you how to phrase, emphasize, and inflect phrases as you naturally do in conversation.

Ministers, radio announcers, teachers, dramatists and all others who read aloud will welcome it gladly.

Change of Publication Date

It has been deemed advisable to change the date of publication of the Herald from Saturday to Monday. The first issue for June will be dated the 6th and thereafter accordingly. This may result in some of our contributors receiving the weekly issue one day later than formerly. However, it should give them the advantage of receiving more up-to-date news and official announcements. Our deadline for copy now is on Thursday night, so that the final form can go to press on Friday. This change will permit a Monday morning deadline for important news releases.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,

By Israel A. Smith

Introducing...

LILLIE JENNINGS (page 8) has to her credit a long record of church school work and public school teaching. Since July 1, 1947, she has been editor of Zion's Hope and assistant editor of Church School Literature.

Sister Jennings graduated from Tulare High School and Central Missouri State Teachers College, where she received her Bachelor of Science degree in education in 1943. She also took work in the State Teachers Colleges of Fresno and San Jose, California, and did graduate work in the University of Hawaii, majoring in English.

She taught school twenty-two years in California, Missouri, and Hawaii.

Sister Jennings has always been active in church school and young people's work, serving as superintendent of both the Religio and Sunday school department, teaching children's and young people's classes.

She is joint author of the book, It Can Be Fun, published by the Herald House in 1948.

LOUISE SCOTT WRIGLEY (page 14) says her hobbies are "writing, painting, and people." For three years she worked for the Hall Brothers Greeting Card Company as a verse writer. She has been a frequent contributor to the Herald, Zion's Hope, and Stepping Stones.

Louise was born in St. Joseph, Missouri, in 1921. She was baptized at the age of eight at Central Church, Kansas City, Missouri. She was graduated from William Chrisman High School in Independence, Missouri, in 1938.

On July 19, 1942, she was married to John H. Wrigley who is now a lieutenant in the Army Medical Corps at Seattle, Washington. They have one son, John Warren, age 4.

WILFRED E. WAKEMAN (page 15) was born in Wathena, Kansas, June 4, 1895. He is a graduate of Central High School, St. Joseph, Missouri, and took two years at the State Teachers College at Maryville, Missouri.

In 1917 he married Kathryn M. White. They have one son, Robert I., who lives in Independence.

Brother Wakeman heard the gospel in middle life and was baptized in 1936 in St. Joseph, Missouri. In March, 1938, he was ordained a high priest and is at present assisting Elder C. V. Graham, Supervisor in Zion, in his missionary training program. His vocational experience has been four years as chief clerk, eleven years as office and credit manager, nineteen years as insurance and real estate salesman.

His hobbies are "flowers, gardening, and pedigree Beagles."

News & Notes

WILLIAMS IN MISSOURI VALLEY

Northwest Iowa District met in conference May 22. Apostle D. T. Williams reports a very fine spirit. Five ordinations from the district were provided for. Twenty-two church families were struck by the flood this spring. Clothing and furniture were divided among these families according to the needs and money contributed was divided equally. Some brought back their portion to the church.

TITHEPAYERS' SERVICE REPORT

The Presiding Bishop's office reports a promising increase of tithing statements received at headquarters for the first four months of 1949 over 1948. Forty-nine stakes and districts show an increase over the same period last year. Seventeen stakes and districts have filed more tithing statements in four months of 1949 than the entire year of 1948. The Zion's League in some areas is doing excellent work in teaching the financial law and securing statements.

NEW PROGRAM ON THE AIR

Apostle D. T. Williams reports that KFNF at Shenandoah, Iowa, will carry a weekly fifteen-minute program in behalf of the church. The branch will finance the project and will use Evan Fry's recordings of the fifteen-minute devotionals.

HUNKER COMPLETES 8,000 MILES

Seventy E. Y. Hunker reported long travels in two months' ministry ending May 18. He presented the Restoration Festival series of missionary services at Deer Lodge, Montana, concluding with a Zion's League festival held at the reunion grounds. He made short visits, preaching, ministering, and visiting at Helena and Great Falls, Montana; Lethbridge and Calgary, Alberta. On Easter Sunday he opened a week's series of services at Edmonton, Alberta. Short visits were made at Spokane and Seattle, Washington, and then he spent two weeks at Berkeley, California, at the appointee's institute. He returned for some further work at Spokane and then journeyed to Independence, Missouri, for a short stay with his family before starting his first reunion schedule at Detroit Lakes, Minnesota.

ORDINATION AND INSTALLATION

On Sunday, May 15, at Denver, Colorado, Merle Howard was ordained to the office of high priest. Ward Hougas, president of the Quorum of High Priests, gave the charge and the ordination was cared for by Apostle Reed Holmes and by High Priest Ward Hougas.

On the same occasion, Ward Hougas was installed as pastor of the Denver Branch and the announcement was made that he would be district president of the Eastern Colorado District beginning June 1.

Pentecost

And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. * And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. * And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. * And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.—Acts 2: 1-4.

Endowment

St. Luke was trying, in his story of Pentecost, to give a factual account of a spiritual experience, to use the materialistic concepts and speech of earth to convey the truth of heaven. Anyone who has ever tried it knows how difficult it is and how unsatisfactory the results are. Yet there is an obligation resting upon one who has had a great spiritual experience to bear his testimony in order that light and salvation may come to other souls.

To accomplish his purpose, Luke was obliged to employ figurative language. Spiritual experiences are "like" or similar to physical things and experiences, but not identical. There is a kind of resemblance, but always a great difference. Heaven and earth are opposite worlds.

Language and Reality

Note the eloquence and force, the literary beauty of the phrase, "as of a mighty rushing wind"—a description reminding us of the falls of Niagara; observe the vivid picturesqueness of "cloven tongues like as of fire." In these two powerful similes, Luke tried to convey some idea of what happened, succeeding admirably as far as the limits of our language are concerned, but falling far short in relation to the great spiritual reality involved.

The literalist and the statistically-minded person will never understand that account of Pentecost. (Anybody can count eggs; few persons know how an egg produces a chicken.) Pentecost is "all foolishness" in the laboratory of the scientist. It is an illusion to the psychologist. But these people are like a person blind from birth; they hear of the visible world by report, but they can never fully understand its form and color. Such a person recently underwent a successful opera-

Apostle Mesley to Alaska

In accordance with plans begun many months ago, and with the concurrence of the recent Joint Council, Apostle C. George Mesley within the next few days will proceed to Alaska to meet the Saints and make a survey and report back to the First Presidency.

His plans call for a visit to three principal cities: He will be in Juneau and Whitehorse areas from May 30 to June 8; in the Fairbanks area from June 9 to 22; and in the Anchorage area from June 23 to July 3.

In these areas Apostle Mesley will be in contact with the following members: O. E. Fields, 940 West Tenth Street, Box 762, Juneau; George Fowler, Shore A Lodge, Richardson Highway, Fairbanks; and Cecil Roling, Box 1904, Anchorage.

We should be pleased to have all our members there get into communication with the persons named at the earliest moment, in order that Brother Mesley may meet as many of them as possible.

In opening up new fields, organizing, and setting in order, Apostle Mesley will, in his discretion, exercise all necessary authority as an apostle.

We commend him to the Saints of Alaska in their scattered condition, and trust his visit will prove not only timely but profitable to them and to the church.

tion for the removal of a film from his eyes, and saw the world for the first time. Experience replaced report, and report had never been able to prepare him for what experience revealed.

Pentecost can be understood only by those who have had a real experience with the Holy Spirit.

Terms

Pentecost is a term meaning "fiftieth day"—and was originally a Jewish celebration of the fiftieth day after the second day of the Passover. For Christians, it is the seventh Sunday after Easter. The English call it Whitsunday, presumably because of the white robes of the candidates for baptism.

Too little attention has been paid to the meaning of Pentecost, probably because nothing like it is known to so many Christian churches. It is far beyond their experience. So, when people do not know what to do with a great experience, they pick out some small, less significant feature that their minds can grasp, and make that appear to be the principal thing. Using this device of mental escape, some have called Pentecost the occasion of "the birth of the Christian church." The only trouble with this idea is that it denies to Christ the credit for establishing his own church. And it is more than a case of giving credit—it is a case of ascertaining who, exactly, built the Christian church. Jesus declared, "I will build my church" (Matthew 16: 18). He didn't say that Peter would build it; he didn't say that the disciples would build it. The church was not built on the day of Pentecost. There was already a quorum of twelve and a body of believers functioning as a church on earth before the Crucifixion. So let us not be diverted from the truth by some lesser thing.

Official

After consultation with those most directly concerned, we request that no radio program broadcast or transcription shall be made in the name of the church unless and until a transcript of it shall be approved by the General Church Radio Department; and that no contracts for radio time shall be entered into until such approval has been given.

Some excellent work has been done by branches and districts where the necessary interests and talent and money have been available. But now that the Radio Department is organized to make the experience of the church in the radio field available wherever it is needed, and in view of the fact that the name of the church is so directly related to the quality of our broadcast material, this regulation seems to be called for.

It is the hope and expectation of the Radio Department that materials already available, or in course of preparation, can be used to augment contributions originating locally, so that no good local contribution shall be lost and the quality of our broadcasting shall be consistently upheld.

Appointment of District President for Western Colorado

Elder Elwin R. Vest having resigned as president of the Western Colorado District to assume full-time ministerial appointment in Oregon, Elder Clarence B. Wallis, 1645 North Seventh Street, Grand Junction, Colorado, has been appointed to fill out the unexpired term, subject to the ratification of the next district conference.

Thanks From Sanitarium Staff

To General Church officials, district, and branch leaders, and friends throughout the church:

We wish to express our sincere appreciation for the excellent efforts made in promoting the Sanitarium Day Fund Drive on April 24. Your support in behalf of our school of nursing was much appreciated, and we shall try to enlarge upon the contribution to the church and the community of Zion as these funds permit us to do so. We acknowledge your helpful assistance with gratitude.

Death of Myron C. Fisher

We regret to have to report the death of Bishop Myron C. Fisher which occurred at Somerville, Massachusetts, on Friday, May 6, 1949. The funeral was held Sunday, May 8, 1949, with Elder Almer Sheehy in charge.

Brother Fisher was baptized shortly after his eighth birthday and was ordained to the priesthood when twenty-three years of age. Fifteen years later, at the General Conference of 1908, he was set apart to the Bishopric. He served in this office with distinction, making a notable contribution to the work of the church in the Southern New England District.

Although Brother Fisher had been incapacitated by ill health for some time, he maintained his testimony of the gospel. It was a great pleasure to visit with him and to receive encouragement. He will be greatly missed.

The sympathy of the church goes to Sister Florence Fisher and to their three sons, Sanford, Myron, and Albert, all of whom are active in the Melchisedec priesthood.

Missionary Emphasis

There will be a strong missionary emphasis at the 1949 reunions. This is in harmony with our fundamental needs as recognized and approved in Joint Council action and concurred in by many of the local reunion officials with whom we have been in contact.

To further this missionary emphasis, a committee representing the Quorum of Twelve has prepared some important material for use in reunion classes, notably a pamphlet by Elder D. T. Williams entitled, Each One Win One. This pamphlet will be on sale at the Herald House in the near future.

Reunion classes for all groups will discuss our missionary message and responsibility. In particular, we are quite hopeful that many members of the priesthood will find it possible to be present at reunions this year, since priesthood leadership in this important phase of our work is essential to success.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Across the Desk

From Apostle Paul Hanson, La Paz, Bolivia, May 9:

Since writing from Cuzco, my time has been filled with varying experiences, visiting archaeological places of special interest and making my way here to La Paz. A Mr. Jean Paul Flury, a Swiss operator of Inca Land Tours in Cuzco, who caters to the needs of visitors, generously offered to supply his auto if I would provide the gas, and take me to an Inca, or pre-Inca ruin near Abancay, about 100 miles from Cuzco. This ruin is visited by very few persons. We started about 8 a.m. and did not return until nearly dark. We found the ruin, an extraordinarily large monolith carved with animals and strange figures, these have been terribly mutilated. It lies in a valley on a small hill, and to visit it entails some climbing to get back to the highway. Mr. Flury, who speaks five languages, including English, was very helpful to me.

On a Sunday, before taking my departure from Cuzco, I attended a church service in the city, conducted by the Evangelical Union of South America. It was in Spanish, and the sermon was by a young doctor, David Milnes from England. The congregation—about sixty-five in number—was composed almost entirely of Quichua Indians of various ages. Before the close of the service, I spoke for about fifteen minutes; Reverend Cook, a resident minister, interpreted for me. I set forth Christ as the living Savior of man, the genuineness of Christianity, God and his character and his readiness to bless his children today as in all other ages, and told of my having learned to pray at mother's knee. A church school of more than 100 with six classes preceded the preaching service; all were held in a building upstairs. This Evangelical Union has a number of native congregations in Peru, native ministers often being used to preside over the congregations. It is supported by various Protestant Churches.

On Sunday afternoon I enjoyed visiting with Mr. and Mrs. Cook in their home and with Dr. Milnes and his wife. They told of their missionary work, experiences, etc.; Mrs. Cook, an able missionary companion of her husband provided tea.

On Monday morning, May 2, I left Cuzco by train for Puno which is situated near Lake Titicaca, on a plateau, nearly 13,000 feet above sea level. Instead of the plateau's being a desolate region as many writers have stated, it had large flocks of sheep, llamas, alpacas, cattle, donkeys, barley fields, and adobe huts.

One thing at Puno I remember with appreciation is that a hot water bottle was placed in my bed every night at the hotel. This is a part of the regular service. It is very cold at Puno, and there is no heat in the hotel rooms. The penetrating rays of the sun in the highlands are unendurable to me for any length of time, while being out of the sunlight, is also uncomfortable. The Indians spend a good part of their lives lying in the sun—and who can blame them?

Mr. Hugnet, proprietor of the Tourists Hotel in Puno where I stayed, took me in his car to Escuela Rural, about three miles out from town, a school maintained by the Catholic Church exclusively for boys. It started in a small way and has been in operation twenty years. There are 200 boys selected from among the best in the province of Puno. The whole institute reminded me of Boys Town, near Omaha, Nebraska. It includes a large acreage, and the buildings face a bay of Lake Titicaca about one-half mile away. The boys are Quichua and Ayamara Indians. They are taught to be clean, are not allowed to return to their homes for seven years. They are trained in carpenter work, tailoring, weaving, the making of shoes and cheese, mechanics, and agriculture.

From Puno I went to Copacabana on Lake Titicaca in Bolivia. Here I visited near-by Inca ruins. Via sailboat I visited the Island of the Sun (Isla del Sol), which—according to popular tradition—was the home of Manco Capac, founder of the Inca race. This, the largest of the sacred islands of Lake Titicaca, is still regarded with reverence by the Indians because of its ruined temples. From one of the temples a most beautiful view is afforded across the deep, blue waters of the lake to other islands and snowcapped mountains in the distance.

From Copacabana I came here to La Paz in a sort of cross between a bus and a station wagon with seven Ayamara Indian passengers. They were very friendly and evidently possessed a sense of humor. The bus stopped at a place favorable for me to take pictures of balsas on the lake. The trip from Puno to Copacabana and then to La Paz—almost entirely along the shore and in the mountains bordering Lake Titicaca—will long be held in pleasant memory.

Elder Howard F. Miller writes from Honolulu on May 12:

We had a very impressive Mother's Day service at Makiki Branch, May 8, which also happened to be the fiftieth anniversary of Sister Alice Kanui as a member of the church. Sister Kanui was baptized on May 7, 1899, by U. W. Greene when there were but a few Hawaiian members in this mission. She has acted as interpreted for Brother McConley, for the late Brother Waller, and other missionaries sent to the Hawaiian Islands. She has been an active member in the church and is still a regular attendant at church services despite being 72 years of age. We were most happy to honor her as mother of the day.

Our program started on Saturday evening with a poi supper cooked by the men, who also provided the choral numbers on the program. Sister Kanui was presented with a most beautiful orchid lei, sent to her by the Wessel family in Hilo. As she reviewed her life in the church, she challenged all present. Sister Pagat of the Makiki Women's Department presented her with an anniversary gift.

On Sunday, she was again featured as the mother of the day before the church school group, where we had an attendance of almost 200. The program was well arranged by Sister Grace Lee. The climax of the program was when a group of young people was seated on the stage in a circle to hear Sister Kanui read the Scripture to them.

Elder V. B. Etzenhouser preached a fine Mother's Day sermon. Sister Kanui was again honored on the platform, and after being presented with the traditional lei, she was given a Book of Mormon, as a history of her forefathers, for she is a pure Hawaiian, and according to her patriarchal blessing, she is of the tribe of Manasseh. The program closed in the evening with a music festival dedicated to mothers. The music festival was climaxed by the congregation's singing "A Perfect Day" while Sister Kanui was on the platform.

From J. Charles Mottashed, Belding, Michigan, April 15:

Belding has a passion week union service each year, which culminates in a service on Good Friday.

This year Arthur Oakman was the guest speaker for Good Friday.

The meeting was the largest we have ever had in my ten years of participation.

Brother Oakman touched the hearts of the people of all creeds in a splendid manner. The clergymen were profuse in their commendations, and the prestige of the church was enhanced in no small degree. This is the second apostle who has preached in the Baptist church here to the credit of the church. Myron McConley was the other.

One woman said Oakman was wonderful timber (English Oak, I suppose), and I agreed with her.

Pentecost and the Church of Today

By F. Henry Edwards

ON THE FIRST SUNDAY in June, churches throughout the world will commemorate the outpouring of the Spirit of God which occurred on the first Pentecost after the Resurrection. In the historic churches the festival is known as Whitsuntide. It dates back to the first century when it was spoken of as the "Day of the Holy Ghost."

This festival tends to be neglected among Latter Day Saints. This is quite unfortunate, since the very nature of our belief and organization requires us to live for the endowment of the Holy Spirit, and to respond thereto with joyous gratitude. The Restored Church is destined to be "the habitation of God through the Spirit" (Ephesians 2: 22). It is "the true and living church" (Doctrine and Covenants 1: 5) in direct proportion as it is Spirit-filled and Spirit-guided.

The description of the church on the day of Pentecost which is contained in the Book of Acts gives us a good picture of the Spirit-filled church in action. Here the truth was proclaimed with convincing power. Here wicked men were persuaded to repent unto life. Here converted men were joined together through baptism in a fellowship of testimony and service. Here devout and earnest men were given special gifts of the Spirit. Here commonplace men were lifted up toward greatness as they carried out the work of the Lord Jesus in the power of his Spirit. Here all fear was forgotten in the glad assurance that Jesus is truly both Lord and Christ.

Pentecost Is Characteristic

These experiences of the church at Pentecost are characteristic of the church whenever she is in touch with her Lord through the Spirit. Today, as always, we need to proclaim the truth with more than human authority and power, to be divinely blessed as we persuade men to repent unto life, to have the testimony of the Spirit as men are born again and become members of the church of Jesus Christ, to enjoy the gifts of the Spirit appropriate to our needs, to know that we do not work alone.

The Restoration Movement brought back among men all that was essential and characteristic in the life of the early Christian church. By the grace of God there was thus recommitted to men the authority of the priesthood, the light of revelation, clear instruction concerning basic doctrines, the word of truth concerning church organization, the gifts of the Spirit granted to the faithful, the wider testimony of the Scriptures through the translation of the Book of Mormon, and many accompanying blessings. But, making all these restored gifts vital and significant has been the renewed activity of the Spirit of God whereby we know that Divinity is actually at work among us, directing us in the way of light and truth which leads to the kingdom.

Pray For the Spirit

How shall we maintain the glory of the Spirit among us? Here, surely,

Pentecost has much to teach us. Consider, for example, the fact that after the ascension of the Lord Jesus, the disciples returned to Jerusalem and "all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication" (Acts 1: 14). As the days passed and the fervor of the apostles increased, these prayers and supplications came to embody a single, central, fundamental, and urgent plea; at whatever cost the disciples felt that they must receive the promised Comforter.

Every Pentecostal blessing of which we have any record has been preceded by such united and fervent prayer. This is not hard to understand, for we are partners in the work to be done, and we are prepared to do our share only through the soul-searching and self-commitment which such prayer involves. One of the lessons which the church of today can learn from the church at Pentecost is, therefore, that we shall do well to pray earnestly, unitedly, and persistently for the guidance and enrichment of the Holy Spirit. Moreover, we should not be content to pray for the gifts of the Spirit. What we need is the rich, full-orbed ministry of the Spirit of the living God which will bring us appropriate gifts, but which will also set before us challenging duties and guide and strengthen us in all the ways of life.

The Spirit and Moral Earnestness

As we look back to Pentecost, we also remember that such an abiding endowment of the Holy Spirit as we have in mind is only granted to men and women who are in moral earnest. There is no such endowment for hypocrites—play-actors whose spiritual purpose is never serious or urgent enough to penetrate to the depths of their lives. The apostles came to Pentecost from ten days of eager waiting, during which all bargaining for place and privilege had been put aside. They realized as they never had realized before that repentance and dedication are indispensable to endowment and have no substitutes. As one of the disciples who shared Pentecost wrote many years afterward, "Let no man deceive you; he that doeth righteousness is righteous" (I John 3:7); and as we ourselves have been reminded in modern revelation:

He that keepeth his commandments, receiveth truth and light, until he is glorified in truth, and knoweth all things.—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4.

The Spirit of God cannot dwell in unholy temples.—Doctrine and Covenants 94: 4.

Zion cannot be built up unless it is by the principles of the law of the celestial kingdom.—Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2.

The Spirit and Unity

We have already noted that those who shared in Pentecost were together and of one accord. Evidently Luke was impressed by this basic unity, for he mentions it twice in the same narrative (Acts 1: 14; 2: 1). Later he says further that the disciples continued "with one accord" in worship and fellowship (Acts 2: 46, 47); that they prayed "with one accord" for the courage to continue in testimony (Acts 2: 24); that they were blessed with many signs and wonders when "they were all with one accord in Solomon's porch" (Acts 5: 12); and that important decisions concerning the Gentiles were made when the elders were "assembled with one accord" (Acts 15: 25).

The significant thing about this unity and power which impressed Luke so much was not only that the disciples were especially blessed when they were united in their prayers but also that they achieved this unity when they were urgently and exclusively concerned about fundamentals. It is easy to imagine that they might have been divided over procedure in administering re-

The Time of Accounting

One of our subscribers has raised a pertinent question on the law of stewardship, requesting "specific and direct answers." In reply Bishop DeLapp has given in a few words the information sought. Many of our readers will be interested in his answers.—EDITOR.

Dear Bishop DeLapp:

We sincerely want to teach the doctrine of the church in our district. Therefore, we are asking the following questions:

What is the authority that requires a member of the church to file a financial statement?

Will a person be appointed his stewardship who has kept the financial law, but will not file a financial statement?

When did the church begin to require the filing of financial statements?

Sincerely yours,

Dear Brother:

In reply to your letter, I am very glad to answer the questions you have raised:

1. What is the authority that requires a member of the church to file a financial statement?

The scriptural authority for this is found in Section 42: 9:

Every man shall be made accountable unto me as steward over his own property.

Section 72: 4:

Now, verily, I say unto you that every elder in this part of the vineyard must give an account of his stewardship unto the bishop in this part of the vineyard

Section 101: 2:

. . . . for it is expedient that I, the Lord, should make every man accountable as stewards over earthly blessings.

The foregoing set forth the principle of the accounting. This is amplified in a letter written to Bishop Partridge by Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, and F. G. Williams, which indicates that this accounting is to be through the filing of inventories:

Brother Edward Partridge, Sir: I proceed to answer your questions concerning the consecration of property; first, it is not right to condescend to very great particulars in taking inventories. The fact is this, a man is bound by the law of the church to consecrate to the Bishop before he can be considered a legal heir to the kingdom of Zion (Church History, Volume I, page 300).

This was further clarified by General Conference action on October 13, 1923, Resolution Number 847:

. . . . that the Order of Bishops believe it to be the duty of every member of the church to acknowledge his stewardship by complying with the law as given in the Scriptures:

- a. Filing his inventory
- b. Paying his tithe
- c. Paying his surplus
- d. Making his offerings
- e. Thereafter giving an account of his stewardship annually as required by the law of God

Further action was taken by the General Conference on April 6, 1925, Resolution Number 851:

(2) that the Bishopric secure completed financial statements by the selection of a corps of men qualified by special training if possible, who have been assigned territory with the view of securing these financial statements by personal contact

(4) that the members of the church be requested to file their financial statements annually.

II. Will a person be appointed his stewardship who has kept the financial law, but will not file a financial statement?

In the interpretation of the foregoing, the filing of a financial statement is a requisite to full stewardship status.

III. When did the church begin to require the filing of financial statements?

This question is answered in the foregoing.

I trust that this will be helpful, and I assure you that I am very glad to co-operate at any time in regard to such matters.

For Children's Day - - -

MY VERY FIRST teaching assignment came to me quite unexpectedly when I was sixteen years of age. It was my senior year in high school, after which I was planning to enter a college and begin teacher-training. How great was my surprise to be handed this class with the remark that since I was planning to teach anyway and the kindergarten group in our local branch needed a teacher, my desire ought to make me the one for the job. Well, I was thus launched on my pedagogical career. Every Sunday we had our lesson story, and then I didn't know what to do with the time left over! The tiny room was filled with regular-sized chairs and a huge table. There was no space available for moving about—had I known enough to consider it, but I didn't. I don't recall using any handwork or music whatever, but I do know that every week I brought books from the library and read story after story to those long-suffering kindergarten children. There was no attempt at correlation between the lesson and the supplementary material. If I remember correctly, one of the library stories was a warning against eating green apples!

I have often thought of that lack of correlation between the lessons which I taught and the material which I brought in to round out the lessons. The example is certainly a "what-not-to-do" one. In just the same way I have considered the numerous booklets offered by publishers as material for Children's Day programs. On Children's Day we have a real teaching opportunity, and so few of the printed programs listed for sale take into account that opportunity.

THERE ARE MANY MEMORIES of past Children's Days, some of them good and some of them bad.

The hectic times when programs were practiced in a hurry so there might be a performance over which all the fond parents might "Oh" and "Ah"—those were not so good. Those were occasions when taut nerves were wont to snap, and leaders who began as friends became estranged and often refused to come to church because of a quarrel over the simple matter of where each one's class should stand on the platform. The programs themselves were hardly more than public school affairs with flowers and birds and sunny skies prominently featured; few, if any, words were mentioned about Jesus and his relation to Children's Day.

But there are pleasanter memories, too, of programs chosen because they really represented the gospel message with beautiful, inspiring music and words. Best of all were the programs which were not "programs." They were worship services which the children shared with the adults. There were no unwilling childish participants at these services as there frequently were in the old much-rehearsed type. In one particularly lovely service conducted wholly by the children, for this was their day, the life of Christ was featured in Scriptures, hymns, and pictures. It was the outgrowth of the children's own worship experiences when they had met alone during the year. It ministered not only to the congregation but to those who took part as well.

IN A SMALL BRANCH, services (not programs, remember) of this type could be given with the entire membership together. In a larger branch it might be just as well that the children remain by themselves on their day, having a special worship service centering around Children's Day. Instead of the much-used stories of Jesus and the children as told in the Bible, try the Book of Mormon version. You will find III Nephi 8: 12-27 to be a beautiful, faith-inspiring story. When Jesus comes to Zion, will we have a Children's Day experience like that?

The leader who likes to use pictures with her stories in worship will find a problem in using the Book of Mormon version of Children's Day. She can use a head-of-Christ picture on such an occasion, or if there is a local artist available in the branch, he might paint a picture for the Book of Mormon story.

A service could be planned around a hymn, such as "We Would See Jesus" or "Tell Me the Stories of Jesus." Incidents from the life of the Master can be portrayed by real people in colorful costume, using as characters those whom the Master knew. This is especially effective and lovely if no other pictures are used and a large frame is built to display the "living pictures." Curtains pulled at the right moment reveal the scenes.

Church school supply houses have large-sized pictures suitable for use in the creating of services based on a picture. Tom Curr's "Follow Me," sold by The Pilgrim Press, is rich in meaning if one studies it thoughtfully. Jesus is leading the children of the world upward toward a city in the distant background. This city could easily be represented as Zion. Make Zion live for your children. Tell them exactly where the Center Place is and what, through your study, you have conceived Zion will be like. If you do this you will have a Zion-centered Children's Day service, and there could be none better.

THE MOST IMPORTANT THING we have been trying to say in this article is that we need more creative work done in the field of material which is distinctively Latter Day Saint in content. We need writers and artists and musicians who will combine to offer our people in print the very best there is for the training of children. Children's Day should not be just an occasion for giving another program; it should be a valuable teaching experience built up through the type of worship material which has been carefully chosen.

If you lack the right printed material, try creating your own service to fit the needs of your particular group at a particular time. Through the courtesy of Sister Ruby Strand of Creston, Iowa, we are closing this article by giving the adaptation of a successful Children's Day service contributed by her. Note that it is built around the sacrament of baptism, which has come to be almost traditional for Children's Day.

"WALKING WITH JESUS"

(A service with the congregation for Children's Day)

Suggested Picture (to be displayed on easel at one side): "Baptism of Jesus." (If not available, use "Head of Christ.")

Piano Prelude: "The Child of Galilee," Zion's Praises, No. 36.

Call to Worship (to be read reverently):

Our Heavenly Father loves us all
So very much he sent his Son,
That we might learn to serve him well,
And build his Zion everyone.

For when, like him, we learn to love
All people, and be always kind
And walk with Jesus every day
His Zion here on earth we'll find.

Opening Song: "The Children's Friend," Zion's Praises, No. 179.

Prayer (by a child): Asking that we on this Children's Day might learn better how to walk with Jesus. Also remember those who are to be baptized that they might be very happy in doing the thing Jesus has asked them to do.

Prayer Response (by children and teachers):

Jesus, thou our teacher be,
As we come to learn of thee,
Lessons of thy love impart,
May they live in ev'ry heart.

Teach us from the Word divine,
May its holy pages shine;
May thy light each spirit fill,
Teach us, Lord, to do thy will.

Song (by children and teachers):
"Come, Learn of the Meek and Lowly," Saints' Hymnal, No. 258, first stanza and refrain.

Scripture Reading: II Nephi 13: 12-15.

Sermonette (by a priesthood member): This should include a charge to the children who are being baptized.

Suggestive thoughts on the theme of "Walking With Jesus":

1. Baptism is saying: "I want to walk with you, Jesus."

2. Baptism is saying: "I will try to keep your commandments."

3. Baptism is saying: "I will try always to love others and to make them happy."

4. Baptism is saying: "I want to help you build Zion, dear Jesus."

Duet (by two children): "Suffer Little Children," Zion's Praises, No. 55.

Baptismal Service: The preceding melody should be played between baptisms.

Song (by children and teachers):
"Jesus, Mighty King in Zion," Saints' Hymnal, No. 361, first stanza and refrain.

Poem (by a child):

Thinking of Jesus in all that we do,
Trying like him to be thoughtful and true;
Little, kind deeds that to others we show
Make the day brighter for someone, we know.
Loving and giving will make our lives sweet,
Strong to destroy the evil we meet;

Walking with Jesus while swift the days fly,
We shall be like him sometime—if we try.
Our lives pure and good will make Zion shine—
A light to show others the pathway divine.

Closing Hymn (everyone stand and sing): "Onward to Zion," Saints' Hymnal, No. 436.

Benediction (by a priesthood member): Asking God to bless the children here assembled and also to help us all that we might become as little children in walking with Jesus each day of our lives.

And the Lord spake unto Adam, saying, Inasmuch as thy children are conceived in sin, even so, when they begin to grow up, sin conceiveth in their hearts, and they taste the bitter, that they may know to prize the good. And it is given unto them to know good from evil; wherefore, they are agents unto themselves. And I have given unto you another law and commandment; wherefore teach it unto your children, that all men, everywhere, must repent, or they can in no wise inherit the kingdom of God.—Genesis 6: 57-59, Inspired Version.

Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.—Deuteronomy 6: 4-7.

We Shall Still Sing Together

It Happened This Way

This was no ordinary meeting. It was the last fellowship of the college year. At 7:20 the bell sounded to summon Gracelanders to Zimmermann Hall. The organ was playing the hymns they had been singing through the year. Ushers met them and directed them to their places. They filled the front seats first. Two faculty members and two students came to the platform to lead the meeting. The introductory reflections, preliminary to testimonial participation, were shared with a larger congregation, the church.

This Was the Message

This year we have loved to sing. This room has resounded with the buoyant singing of hymns and college songs. It has been hushed, too, with the quiet humming of familiar tunes as we have sat in the stillness of the evening. More than one of you have observed that this will soon come to an end with the chorus dissolving as we go our several ways. I say to you that we can still keep on singing together.

For several years I sang with the college A Cappella Chorus. We sensed a oneness and a certainty as we sang together. When the director gave the signal to begin, we could count on what the others were going to do. There came the time when it was advisable for me to sing in the chorus no longer. At Christmas time, however, I joined with the oratorio choir in its service of music. The more specialized A Cappella Chorus was usually placed at the center. This year I sat on the back row, far from the skilled musicians, in what seemed to me an ocean of musical uncertainty. When a choral number began, it seemed to me that I was blurting out as a soloist without a neighbor to support. Everyone seemed to be waiting on me. I soon saw that I would have to take my cues of sight and sound from the director and the piano out there in front. I had to have a firsthand contact.

In a fortnight many of you may be feeling about as I did that night in the chorus. You have been exposed to a somewhat sheltered life these months we have been together. If disposed, you could draw support from ever so many who sang by your side. Now you will have to take your signals and sounds from the Great Conductor. So shall we be able to sing together. If we are attune with God, we shall be at one with each other. Thus from New England to California and beyond the ocean waters, we can constitute a world-wide chorus. In so large a choral fellowship, there will be place for voices of varying timbre, souls of diverse temperament, and persons of different degrees of background.

From time to time we shall be coming together. Our world is getting pretty small, and our contacts will increase. We shall expect to meet each other at conferences, conventions, reunions, and homecomings. When you look to see who is standing at your side, when you listen for the pitch, should I be standing there beside you, I want to be in tune. Then we shall realize we are still brothers and sisters. Both will be taking the lead of the Great Director.

And this is no impossible wish. For several years now this very thing has been happening. Once in a while when pathways meet after ten or fifteen years, one of us is out of tune. We hit discordant notes. Some do not even make a sound. Some do not even come. But we shall not draw our inspiration from these. Many a time I have discovered a youth who, while here appeared to be indifferent or cynical, was getting the feel of the melody and the harmony of our gospel chorus. Now that fellow is offering prayer for me as I get ready to preach. Or she, who seemed so rattlebrained on the campus, is teaching her children the song of life.

Now I am concerned about keeping in tune—singing with the spirit and the understanding. I want to sense unity with you as next month your voice is raised in Hawaii, in Ontario, in Dixie, or in the Rockies. I want to join you whether in small branches, large congregations, or far from other singers. I hear you lifting your voice in this world-wide chorus. The baton is in God's hand.

You'll be going your way,
I'll be trav'ling mine;
Yet we need not drift apart:
Motifs can entwine
Harmonies and dissonance
In one choral whole,
As we take these leads from God—
Time and tone and soul.

And Then We Sang

That night we sensed what was meant in the council to Emma Smith:

My soul delighteth in the song of the heart;
Yea, the song of the righteous is a prayer unto me.—Doctrine and Covenants 24: 3.

There was a hymn of assurance, "God will take care of you," a hymn of prayer, "O Lord, around thine altar now," and a hymn of thanksgiving:

For mutual love and trust that keep Unchanged through all the changing time,
For friends who walk the goodly way,
We thank thee, Lord, with joy sublime.

Testimonies that come from deep in the heart rise to poesy and sound as choric reading with friends supplying a spiritual accompaniment.

All around the world we are still singing together.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only those questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

A special promise was made to John in John 21:21-23, that he might stay on earth until the second coming of Christ. It does not state that Peter and James were also left here, but it says so in the Doctrine and Covenants. We may run into trouble when we try to explain this to a nonmember.

ANSWER:

We know of no statement in the Doctrine and Covenants or elsewhere which says that Peter and James were to live without death until Christ came. Perhaps the questioner has in mind Doctrine and Covenants 26:3, where the Lord, speaking to Joseph Smith touching his calling, says, "And also with Peter, James, and John, whom I have sent unto you, by whom I have ordained you and confirmed you to be apostles and especial witnesses of my name, and bear the keys of your ministry." This passage by no means justifies an interpretation that all three were living in the flesh as was John.

It is generally understood from John 21:21-23 that John, in answer to his desire, was given power over death, and with a partial change was permitted to live on to the coming of the Lord. The Doctrine and Covenants confirms this.

As for Peter, the Lord, as indicated in John 21:18, 19, pointed out the manner of Peter's death by crucifixion saying, "When thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not. This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God." Doctrine and Covenants 7:2 also indicates that Peter should die, for "thou desiredst that thou might come unto me in my kingdom."

Angels may be any one of five classes of beings. 1. Precarnate spirits who have not yet lived in the flesh. 2. Discarnate spirits who have lived in the flesh, died, and now live in the spirit. 3. Translated men who were taken to heaven without death as was Elijah. 4. Resurrected persons such as came from their graves at the resurrection of Jesus (Matthew 27:52, 53). 5. Persons like John who were given power over death by a partial change to extend their lives upon earth for further ministry.

John is evidently of the fifth class. Peter and James still await their resurrection when Christ comes, hence are of the second class as above described. There is nothing to hinder the Lord in using all three in any special ministrations he may have for them to do.

CHARLES FRY.

QUESTION:

Is Saturday the proper Christian Sabbath?

ANSWER:

Christ gave a new covenant which Paul stated was not according to the old or Mosaic covenant, the old covenant being no longer in force to his followers. The new covenant was also a deliverance from bondage, not physical but spiritual—the bondage of sin. To commemorate the Christian covenant, the Sabbath is kept but is not necessarily the day called Saturday, as the Lord has never specified that Saturday should be kept as a Sabbath. Even under the Jewish law the Sabbath was the seventh day after six days of labor. The command, in fact, began by saying: "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work."—Deuteronomy 5:13, 14.

In order that harmony and convenience may mark the day of rest, it is fitting that some degree of uniformity should prevail. In modern revelation, therefore, the Lord has directed that "the Saints are to observe the first day of the week commonly called the Lord's day, as a day of rest: as a day of worship, as given in the covenants and commandments" (Doctrine and Covenants 119:7). History shows that the New Testament saints also assembled upon this day.

QUESTION:

Did Adam have the Ten Commandments?

ANSWER:

The Scriptures expressly tell us that the Ten Commandments were not given before the time of Moses, to whom they were entrusted as a covenant to be made between God and the people. Of this we read:

And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel. And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.—Exodus 34:27, 28.

That this covenant had not been made with those who lived prior to the time of Moses is declared in the following words of Moses himself: "The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day."—Deuteronomy 5:2, 3.

The Inspired Version clearly tells us that Adam had the gospel, which is based upon the love of God and the love of man. The Mosaic law, on the other hand, was based on fear of its penalties, and became necessary because men had rejected the gospel as the rule of life.

QUESTION:

Who are the dead to whom Peter says the gospel was preached?

ANSWER:

In a revelation given to the church in 1832, this matter is evidently referred to. It shows that those to whom the apostle refers were those who were of the terrestrial world and were the spirits of men kept in prison to whom Christ preached the gospel. The purpose of this was:

"That they might be judged according to men in the flesh, who received not the testimony of Jesus in the flesh, but afterwards received it."—Doctrine and Covenants 74:6.

From this it seems that they are those who may receive the gospel after death, who had not been willful rejecters of the word, and include some who had been blinded by the "craftiness of men," and some "honorable men of the earth."

Music and Church Architecture

By FRANKLYN S. WEDDLE

Director of Music for the Church

THE INNER CHARACTERISTICS of music and architecture are so similar that when used jointly in relation to the church, they can exert a powerful influence upon the worshiper. In music we speak of design, structure, plan, detail, and ornamentation, and major types of architecture are sometimes the basis for names of musical compositions. In architecture, such terms as rhythm and harmony are used. The ties which bind these two arts together are undeniable. We must, then, make these two arts—music and architecture—dwell in happy union where the church is concerned.

If church architects and building committees would carefully consider the following musical needs when new church edifices are being planned, many difficulties could be avoided. The matter of equipping a church for music is very important and certainly should not be left to chance or caprice. Music is so much a part of worship that it must be given consideration when planning a church structure. Here are some extremely important considerations:

1. Provide space necessary for housing an organ adequate to the needs of the auditorium space, most effective design and location of organ chambers, the proper height and size organ space for a given size auditorium seating capacity, and organ of given size.

2. The location of the organ console. The organist should be able to see the minister and follow the service, see the choir and minister of music, and be in a position to hear the organ, choir, and congregation simultaneously.

3. Provide a convenient space for and most desirable type of library case for organ and choir music.

4. Provide conveniently located and adequately sized robing-room facilities for the choir, as well as a rehearsal room if the regular choir space is not available for rehearsals. (If the choir is visible to the congregation, it certainly should be robed.)

5. Provide good acoustics favorable for choir singing as well as for the spoken word.

6. Provide a choir loft or space of the proper size in a well-located position for the average-size choir.

TOO MANY TIMES the construction of a church is well advanced before someone with adequate knowledge of these musical needs is consulted, with the result that the solution is makeshift, unintegrated, and hodgepodge.

The old-fashioned method of attaching the organ console to the organ body, with the choir standing behind the organist is obviously ridiculous, and yet many churches are still struggling with mirror arrangements so the organist can see, and other churches are being built in this manner.

Another persistent and very general architectural practice tending to hamper the musical service is to so arrange the chancel that half the choir sits on one side and half on the other. I have never found a choir director who believed that such an arrangement was ideal for musical ministry. Whatever its architectural reason, the obvious objection to the scheme is that no body of singers is ideally situated when split into two opposing sections. Also, there is the difficulty—if not impossibility—of all choir members seeing the director unless he stands out in the center for all the congregation to watch—a spectacle which inevitably suggests a secular concert. Equally unthinkable is the makeshift device of having the choir members stand, then move to a position where they are all in one unit with the director out in front for the anthem, then move back to the divided position to be seated. This bit of stage mechanics would certainly tend to destroy any worship atmosphere which had been created up to that point in the service when these mechanics are necessary.

The divided chancel choir is difficult and unnatural from a church music point of view, and this tradition descends from the period when the clergy, not the modern choir, occupied the chancel, and when the singing was done by a professional clergy. There is no good reason for persisting in the arrangement now merely because some architects have decreed that it conforms to the canons of beauty. All these makeshifts arise primarily from the perfectly natural emphasis which the architect places on the eye; but it is certain that the ear must receive some consideration also, in church architecture, and for some very practical reasons. Music is for the ear, and for the ear alone; false values and a loss of music's true function are a result of involving the eye.

THERE IS MUCH to be said for locating the choir and organ in the rear of the church. The chief objection would be that it tends to segregate the musical ministry from the clerical ministry. On the other hand, the chief objection to putting the choir in the front is that it separates one worshiping body, the choir, from the rest of the worshipers, the congregation. Such a separation certainly has its drawbacks, too.

In either event, however, the ideal is to have the choir and its director in such a location as not to disturb the worship center or to detract from the speaker—which is certainly the case when the choir is directly behind the speaker and on more or less the same altitude level. Just the natural movements of choir members, not to mention the unnatural movements—the new dresses, hairdos, costume jewelry, whispering and even gum-chewing—are all distracting influences that make it harder for the congregation to keep its attention on the worship experience and preaching ministry. If the choir can be out of the direct visual line from congregation to chancel, it can give itself over wholeheartedly to its function without the consciousness of being on review, and the director is free to conduct his choir naturally without any detraction to the service.

Architectural practices, such as the divided choir arrangement and other unnatural musical layouts, directly affect the musical ministry by placing upon it the burden of working under needlessly difficult conditions.

THE LOCATION AND TYPE of music library space is more important than many building committees consider. Over a period of years, the average choir builds up a fairly valuable library which, if no convenient filing space is available, becomes scattered, lost, and unusable. One of the best and most convenient ways to care for choir music is to keep it in a cupboard into which fit the vertical filing boxes made and sold only by the Gamble Hinged Music Company, 218 South Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Illinois. These boxes come in three widths, one inch, two inch, and three inch. Most choirs will find the one- and two-inch sizes best. These require a cabinet with shelves eight inches high, eleven and one-half inches deep, and width of not over three feet between supporting dividers. Specifications for this method of filing music can be obtained from the previously named company.

Cabinets for music are best located near the place of choir rehearsals and robing. It is therefore best to have a choir assembly room (robing-room) near the entry to the choir space. The room can also be used for a rehearsal room to save the expense of heating the whole church for choir rehearsals in the winter. The seating arrangement should be the same in the rehearsal room as it is in the choir space. There should also be wardrobe cabinets for the choir robes in this room. These should be twenty-two inches wide, five feet high, and of ample capacity for the number of robes needed by the choir. Needless to say, the room should also contain a piano which is kept in tune. It is of paramount importance that the choir room be readily accessible to the choir seats with entrances available for the choir to make a dignified entry into the church.

The size of the choir seating capacity should also come in for due consideration. The average effective choir in the small church will range from fifteen to thirty-five, in the larger church it may run up to sixty. If the choir is so situated that there must be more than two rows, a four to six inch rise for each row is desirable. Singers should not be unduly crowded if their singing is to be effective. It is best to figure a minimum of twenty-two inches wide for each seat, and a depth from the back of the chair in one row to the back of the chair in front of thirty-four inches minimum. Another important point to remember is to avoid having the choir spread out in a long straight line. It is better to have a deep but not too wide seating arrangement so each one in the choir can easily see the director.

All of these considerations seem quite obvious, but their provision is all too often left to chance.

NOW A FEW OBSERVATIONS regarding the choice of an instrument with which to accompany the ministry of music in the church. Traditionally, and for good reasons, the pipe organ is first choice for this function. Wherever possible, the pipe organ is the instrument to provide. Pipe organs do require a certain amount of properly located space. If one is contemplated, by all means investigate these space and location requirements at the time you plan your church building, even if the organ will not be acquired for some time after the building is completed. A given size congregational seating capacity will require a given size pipe organ; this necessitates a certain amount of organ chamber space. Find out all about it while the new church is in the planning stage. The General Church Music Department, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, will be glad to advise and help you get specifications upon receipt of your request for this service.

If a regular pipe organ is out of the question for space or cost reasons, a small so-called "unit-organ" is a good substitute. This is a pipe organ of smaller proportions and may be secured with a console attached or detached. The organ has from three to ten ranks of pipes and may be built-in, or it may be secured with an oak or walnut case to be placed in the auditorium. This type of organ will cost in the neighborhood of two to four thousand dollars and will be very effective for churches up to four or five hundred seating capacity. These organs have two manuals and pedal manual. Where space-saving is of prime consideration, the Baldwin electronic organ is the best instrument in its field. The cost is in the neighborhood of $2,800 with a saving of $200 if the speaker can be built into a tone chamber instead of in a cabinet as regularly furnished.

The Baldwin organ works on a different electronic principle than does the Hammond and is a much better church instrument. The tone of the Hammond has been so long associated with the roller-skating rink, the night-club, and the radio station, that it is next to impossible for an organist, even an accomplished one, to make this instrument

Not For Children Alone - By LOUISE SCOTT WRIGLEY

WHAT KIND OF A DAY will Children's Day be in your church? Will it be just another morning service of sweet little songs sung by rows of earnest, clean-faced youngsters as the child's view of Christ is unfolded in music and verse? Will it be only a day of "Isn't she sweet?" or "Wasn't he a manly little fellow?" Or will it be, instead, a day of recognition within your own heart of all the things Children's Day can and ought to mean to your branch and to you personally?

Many long and devoted hours go, each year, into the preparations for Children's Day. We all recognize that and approve it. Busy workers in primary and junior departments everywhere plan carefully and wisely for weeks ahead, trying their very best to fit the children in where they belong so that the program might be more effective. Not all fit perfectly, of course, but each child is given an opportunity to do something in service for the Master. How long has it been since we have given ourselves that opportunity?

. . . . And the songs they sing—"Jesus made the big, round sun" "Jesus loves me" "Come, learn of the meek and lowly." There are so many of us who have long neglected to give God the credit for the miracle of sunlight, the blessing of soft rain, the inspiration of a cool, green hillside. Such common things they are, yet only common because we ourselves have made them so. How long has it been since we stopped to consider all the simple beauties of nature and the humility of a godly man who walked so calmly through a long-ago world to bring us a message of peace and love and appreciation? Truly, Jesus loves us, and now, as then, we heed him not while we go on selfishly enjoying the blessings which he continues to heap upon us in his gracious patience.

LET US LOOK AGAIN, more closely, at these happy, excited youngsters who have prepared themselves so diligently. Listen! They are telling of beautiful truths which we once learned but have so carelessly forgotten. We have put them aside in the busy everydayness of living. We have lost their magic, the impact of their gentle logic.

Perhaps when he said, "Except ye become as little children," he referred in part to the amazing clarity with which children seem to strike through to the heart of a thing. Their wonderful, unshakable knowledge is that God's world is a good world. They gratefully accept the fact that heaped on all sides are bounteous blessings to be enjoyed.

Children do not question that they will be taken care of, provided for. Neither should we, for as long as we remain obedient to the laws of God, that promise has been given us. Children's faith in an ever-living, ever-present God is unquestioning and beautiful to see. It must be a balm to God's aching heart after the jolts we adults give him.

WHY CANNOT our faith be as strong and sure as that of our children? It should surely be augmented by the fact that we have lived to see evidences of his mercy and his power on all sides. We should know, by having lived, that through sickness, death, or personal tragedy his arm is ever steady—a sure staff to lean upon—and his face is never turned away. He waits for us if we will but come one step forward to meet him.

All of this is what children are saying on their day. This is what they are telling us with their sweet songs and simple stories, with their readings, and their little plays. They are reminding us that our world—God's world—is not lost—that Zion can be here if we will but let it be. They are re-affirming our shaken and toppling faith, saying, "While we have God, we have everything."

Yet, it is we who will not understand, who turn away in blindness. We will not hear them with our hearts. We will not acknowledge that they might teach us something. We ignore all those things we learned while we were yet a few years removed from heaven.

Yes, our little people the world over have a message for us on this Children's Day. It is a vital message. Let us not dismiss it lightly but rather look eagerly for the valuable lesson which should be there for each of us. Above all, let us be grateful for all of God's blessings, not the least of which are these children who are here to bring us closer to him once again.

A Child's Freedom to Play - By Nettie Chappelow Lake

WHAT of our children? What of their environment and chances of happiness in the world today? Summers are hard on mothers who live in cities—and harder on children. It's playtime, and yet for a great many youngsters there is no place to play. A small yard does not give enough room for a seven-year-old to "spread himself around."

I think parents ought to realize what play is. Is it something adults plan and supervise? Can Dad and Mother direct it? Do expensive toys make it easier? The answer, of course, is no. Play is the attribute of childhood which calls into being activity of hand and mind and gives plenty of room to imagination.

You fortunate ones who walked barefoot through country lanes or raced unchecked through alleys of small towns, let your memories run back to childhood. You had endless hours of joy because you were left alone. You were Indians, pirates, hunters, explorers, doctors, bankers, or merchants, as your fancy dictated. You built sand castles, erected forts, laid out cities with tin cans and broken dishes and dressed up corncobs to people them.

But your most pleasant memory of those dear days is of the freedom from parental intervention. They attended to their own affairs and let you mind yours. They could never come into your world because it was a magic place, a private paradise.

The children of today have constant supervision. Higher and higher grow the walls that shut out their horizons. Older people oversee and plan their games and sports. Though they yearn to run wild, they are checked by the fear of quick death under wheels. Parents have pounded that into them.

Their earth is covered with asphalt. Lanes have become highways. Woods and trees and streams are fenced and closed to them, or replaced by brick walls and pavements. They are the victims of our modern civilization. Give that a thought, parents, when you repeat the platitudes of juvenile delinquency.

What are you doing to make the world a pleasanter place for children?

The Blessing of Little Children

By W. E. Wakeman

THE RESTORATION MOVEMENT early called attention to the sacred obligations of parenthood. One of these obligations was the blessing of little children by the elders of the church. The church asks parents to put their trust in God and his plans and purposes for family and social righteousness. This is the law: "Every member of the church of Christ having children, is to bring them unto the elders before the church, who are to lay their hands upon them in the name of Jesus Christ, and bless them in his name."—Doctrine and Covenants 17: 19. It is because of this commandment that all faithful Latter Day Saint parents arrange to dedicate their little ones to God before the church.

Little children are God's choicest gifts to parents. All parents sensing this relationship have the pleasant duty and privilege of dedicating to God, before the church, their infant sons and daughters. This ceremony when performed before the altar amidst beautiful and solemn surroundings will stand as an event affecting the future life of both parents and children. As a result of this dedication, there abides with the parents a memory of the solemn responsibility they have to God, the faithful Creator. Through their continued devotion and Christian living, they shall raise up before God a righteous generation, a priceless gift to the cause of Christianity. The Lord shall say to them at the last day, "Well done, good and faithful servants."

Members of the congregation as witnesses of this dedication sense deeply the beauty and solemnity of the ordinance. In the same manner as a will or a marriage contract requires witnesses, so the Saints in each congregation serve as witnesses to this dedication of the child to God by its devoted parents. This ordinance so performed can be rightfully considered a binding covenant of the church's social and spiritual discipline to all concerned.

At the conclusion of this ceremony, it is entirely fitting to present to the parents of the child the booklet titled, Of Such Is the Kingdom. On the second page of this brochure is the sentiment that it is presented to the parents on the occasion of the blessing of their little one and mentions the officiating elders. On the succeeding pages is instruction to the parents to guide them in the momentous years ahead. Thus there is sealed God's choicest blessings which will bear fruit according to the measure of the parents' faith in God.

PARENTHOOD carries with it peculiar responsibilities—more than feeding, clothing, and sheltering children. Submission to the ordinance of the laying on of hands is a recognition of a spiritual heredity which contains the potentialities of godliness. As a physical act the imposition of hands is but an idle gesture, unable to bless us; but as a spiritual symbol in relation to the total purpose of the gospel, it is the God-given means for eternal and unlimited spiritual blessing. The expressiveness of our hands is a symbol of which spiritual power may be our priceless gift. Knowledge of and obedience to righteousness always results in spiritual and creative power.

The rights of the priesthood are inseparably connected with the powers of heaven, but these powers can be controlled and handled only upon the principles of righteousness. Therefore the symbol of placing the hands on the head of the child being blessed is a fitting one, for as the prophet of Jehovah said, "In his hands is the hiding of his power." By this means one may signify the free and abundant outpouring of all he possesses by the overturned palm in the gesture of blessing. It is, therefore, with the latter significance that the laying on of hands is used in the everlasting gospel in its fullness.

Thus an infant is blessed in the presence of the Saints with the divine influence of the Spirit of God through the laying on of hands by the elders of the church. (See Matthew 19: 13-15, Inspired Version; III Nephi, page 649: 23-26, and Doctrine and Covenants 17: 19.)

IT HAD LONG BEEN A CUSTOM in Palestine to ask godly men to bless little children. The Israelites for many centuries used this symbolic act to make the bestowal of spiritual power arresting and dramatic; at the same time, it created an event about which the spiritual preparation of the individual could center. Quite likely Jesus had been asked to bless the little ones before the discussion occurred which is recorded in Matthew 19: 13-15 with the Pharisees concerning marriage. It is interesting to note, however, that immediately after the discussion, several parents sought to bring their little ones to the Savior for blessing. For some reason the disciples wanted to forbid this. They may have felt it was an unwarranted intrusion on Jesus, or that his time should be occupied with more important things. Yet they must have recalled how Jesus had clearly demonstrated his affection for little children on several occasions. Before these parents took their little children away, Jesus saw what was happening and, moved with indignation, said, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God." This saying indicates Jesus felt that the kingdom is the natural inheritance of those who come to him in simple childlike faith, seeking his blessings and obeying his kindly guidance.

The great value of this doctrine lies in its awakening of spiritual energies to meet those of the Master; then results the oneness so necessary for blending the human life into the

Learn to Laugh - Not Worry

By RUTH SELZER

BECAUSE WORRY is so prevalent among women, it is a subject that bears much discussion. Perhaps none of us have worried ourselves into the tragic state depicted in the following example.

Mrs. Worrier has not heard from her wandering boy for some time. She muses: "He must be ill. The last time I heard from him, he said he had a cold. Colds turn into pneumonia. Pneumonia kills people. My aunt died that way. If son didn't have pneumonia, I know he would write. Son might die as my aunt did. Son is dead."

The saddest part of worry is that people do not actually think, they fret. Worries just don't pounce upon us. We get into them, and we usually play a part in the origin of every one of them.

The most dangerous form of worry is despondency. If you have too much self-pity, if you feel helpless in handling a problem, call on a friend, take a walk, keep active—never lie down. Learn to laugh. If you haven't anything else to laugh about, laugh at yourself for being so glum. Laughter relieves tension, abates self-pity and helps you to think your problem out successfully. Learn to relax. No control of worry is possible without relaxation. To relax, put your worries into words. Bring them up out of the dark basement into the living room where you can see them, talk about them, examine them, and live with them more comfortably. Have the clarification deal with the very heart of the problem. Ask yourself, "Is it really this that has me worried or something back of it?"

FORTUNATELY we can refuse to remain the victim of any situation. Those of us who blame life for our difficulties will seldom correct them.

"He who shakes his fist at God merely dislocates his soul." If we marry from the wrong motive, assume tasks for which we are unsuited, live in an incompatible environment or beyond our income, we shall suffer until we change our ways or our setting. Would it not be wise to refuse to remain victims of these things? With God's help we can overcome them. "Ask and ye shall receive." If we ask, we can expect compatible love, pleasant surroundings, a peaceful home. To free ourselves we need an inner guidance for our outer problems. We can meditate before we go to bed, pray sincerely, and then tell ourselves, "This is out of my hands. At sunrise I shall pick it up and take another look."

We must attempt to clarify our problems step by step. "Success is an inchworm that humps its back with everlasting patience." We must refuse to be hurried or driven over a certain matter. A calm management of self is necessary. Control of the nerves is good, but control of the mind is better. Whenever we take time to analyze a problem, to see where it comes from and seek the center of the difficulty, we are on the way to solving that problem. We must wait for an honesty of feeling and believe in our course of action. To do what we have to do for all we are worth is essential if we are to break away from worry.

We can make a habit of clarifying problems by talking or writing someone whose opinion and respect we hold. Advice of this sort is usually good. Advice is at its worst in family life. We allow our intimates to meddle with our logical thinking by trading on the fact that they are blood kin. Our minds tell us what is best to do, and argument is no solution. We might recall Jesus' words, "A man's enemies shall be they of his own household." We should not be afraid of injuring love by following our honest convictions. If it can be so easily discouraged, it wasn't worth having.

We should ask ourselves, "How serious is this?" Do we believe what Jesus said in the sixth chapter of Matthew? Is he not trying to lift us out of the mood of anxious concern and telling us to go along with the forces of life, meeting our experiences without fear and tension? We must accept ourselves as we are, take the situation as it is, use the judgment we have, and welcome the outcome.

SO LONG AS WE ARE HUMAN, vexing situations will arise, and we can either reason them out or worry about them. Worry comes when we delay following our choice. Our best reasoning will not be perfect, since we are all limited in our ability to foresee; but it is the best we can do. Sometimes the distressing situation must be accepted as is—must because at the time there is nothing else to do. In the illness of a loved one, when prayer and medicine seem to no avail, we must accept the fact objectively without undue emotion.

It is wrong to lash out at trouble and bewail, "Why did this have to happen to me," and then do nothing but worry about it. Trouble is the agitator in our lives. It awakens our emotions; it stirs the mind. Would you give up whatever growth trouble has brought you? Would you be the person you are except through conquest? Would you, without ever having experienced it, know the inner longings and sufferings of others? You cannot be a true disciple of Christ without the understanding they bring?

Easter Sacrifice Luncheon

At the New Church Home in Oak Grove, Missouri

By Mrs. H. R. Scofield

PREPARATION for the Easter service began with our making pockets to hang on the wall in which to collect sacrifice offering. These cards were about four by seven inches, with the pocket one half the size of the card, fastened with red yarn in the manner of leather lacing. On the upper part of the card was centered a print of "A Gift for Jesus," and on the pocket was a one-cent calendar pad with date of our regular meetings circled on each month. These were hung in a prominent place in our homes where they could easily remind us. Our collections were realized in various ways—by actually going without something we wanted and by doing special things for others and contributing our earnings. We started with the New Year and continued on through the weeks until the date of our meeting.

The program committee arranged for every member who could possibly attend to have a part in the service. Outlines were printed and attractive covers made for them. These covers had a silhouette of Christ with uplifted arms done in splatter painting—purple ink on yellow construction paper.

Our service was held in the afternoon, and each one was asked to come fasting and praying. Two of the women volunteered to care for the children at a near-by home.

Because we had just moved into our recently purchased and remodeled church home, and the Venitian shades ordered had not arrived, purple and gold crepe paper streamers were used to decorate the windows. The worship center consisted of a large picture of Sallman's "Head of Christ" placed on the front of the pulpit and flanked on either side by candelabra. The linen-covered speaker's table was decorated with a large bouquet of jonquils and a tall, lighted candle on each side of the flowers. Back of the table and immediately beneath the picture of Christ was placed the white-robed vacant chair. Card tables covered with white cloths and holding a small bouquet of jonquils were arranged symmetrically about the room.

All the women assembled in another room and, at an appointed time, walked in to the accompaniment of piano music and took places at the tables. After the invocation

June

Lula Carmichael

'Tis June the month of roses, perfect days, brides, and strawberry jam. Is there ever a time when skies are bluer, clouds more like drifts of cotton candy, or sunshine is pleasanter? Why shouldn't roses bloom in profusion? Wouldn't it be nice to forget our work and cares and take one June day and make of it a lovely, leisurely day of our dreams?—Let's do it!

Little wonder that brides choose June for their wedding day. With Mother Nature providing the setting, the bride's day should be perfect. May nothing mar its perfection.

But since roses wither and die and June wedding days pass, the bride must bring to the altar a rich dowry—rich in jewels that are indestructible. May her life and growing faith in the Infinite be as precious as emeralds, her love of home and community as warmly glowing as rubies, her good humor like the sparkle of diamonds. May her judgment, ability to work, acceptance of "better or worse" be as enduring as the hearthstones around which her home is established—and with it all, may she have enough culinary experience to make good strawberry jam.

With a month dedicated to brides, it is good to remember father. He who at one time stood at the head of the line by the side of the bride, who solemnly agreed to and has faithfully carried out his part of the partnership. He still stands in line—asking little but giving much. He is worthy of our love and affection.

they were seated. A trio sang "At the Foot of the Cross," and the Scripture reading, "Man shall not live by bread alone," was given by the leader. This was followed by a very inspiring message on the theme, "I Gave My Life for Thee," by the guest speaker, Pauline Arnsen, of Independence. The hymn of the same name was sung in unison, followed by Scripture quotations, talks, and poems bringing out various qualities of Christ's life such as love, charity, friendship, and service. These were interspersed with musical numbers. The closing hymn was "Consecration," and the closing prayer one of thanks and consecration.

We felt it was a beautiful worship service and a fitting climax to the period of sacrifice shared by all. The offering which was collected during the service amounted to more than enough to make one of the payments on our new church home.

Fruits of the Spirit

By Ella Harris

All good gifts come from God.

They are given us as seed that we may cultivate to bear fruits of righteousness and prepare ourselves for Zion—the pure in heart—and for celestial glory.

Many of the words in this list are synonymous, yet each has a meaning of its own.

We may feel at times that we can not attain to all of these virtues, but they are so interwoven that gaining one helps us to gain others.

Christ said the greatest commandments are "Love God with all your heart, soul and mind and your neighbor as yourself. On this hang all the law and the prophets" (Matthew 22: 37-40).

Notice the virtues named in II Peter 1: 5-11. "If these things be in you and abound, they make you that you shall be neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Worship Suggestions for July - By BYRNA ZERR

Theme for the Month: WE LEARN TO SHARE

JULY 3, 1949

(Independence Day)

WE SHARE WITH OTHER NATIONS

Call to Worship:

As Latter Day Saints in every land—the greatest thing of all which we can share with the nations of the world is our belief of freedom for all mankind.

According to the laws and constitution of the people which I have suffered to be established, and should be maintained for the rights and protection of all flesh, according to just and holy principles, that every man may act in doctrine, and principle pertaining to futurity, according to the moral agency which I have given unto them, that every man may be accountable for his own sins in the day of judgment. Therefore, it is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose have I established the constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood.—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 10.

Opening Hymn:

No. 401, Saints' Hymnal, "From Greenland's Icy Mountains"; No. 423, Saints' Hymnal, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee"; No. 419, Saints' Hymnal, "Oh, Say, Can You See." (Choose one.)

Opening Prayer

Scripture Reading:

Yea, they did fight like dragons; and many of the Nephites were slain by their hands; yea, for they did smite in two many of their breastplates; and they did smite off many of their arms; and thus the Lamanites did smite in their fierce anger. Nevertheless, the Nephites were inspired by a better cause; for they were not fighting for monarchy nor power; but they were fighting for their homes, and their liberties, their wives, and their children, and their all; yea, for their rites of worship, and their church; and they were doing that which they felt was the duty which they owed to their God; for the Lord had said unto them, and also unto their fathers, That inasmuch as ye are not guilty of the first offense, neither the second, ye shall not suffer yourselves to be slain by the hands of your enemies. . . . And it came to pass that when the men of Moroni saw the fierceness and the anger of the Lamanites, they were about to shrink and flee from them. And Moroni, perceiving their intent, sent forth and inspired their hearts with these thoughts; yea, the thoughts of their lands, their liberty, yea, their freedom from bondage. And it came to pass that they turned upon the Lamanites, and they cried with one voice unto the Lord their God, for their liberty, and their freedom from bondage. And they began to stand against the Lamanites with power; and in the selfsame hour that they cried unto the Lord for their freedom, the Lamanites began to flee before them; and they fled even to the waters of Sidon.—Alma 20: 49 ff.

Talk:

Freedom of religion and belief go hand in hand with man's free agency. Free agency was granted to man from the Garden of Eden. Parents and families and neighbors must recognize the value of agency and freedom of decision to their children and themselves. Social pressure must not be so hard as to stifle choice. Widening out into national significance, nations may choose to grant personal and collective liberty to their people. As in the reading of the Doctrine and Covenants, when people are in bondage either to each other or their government, they cannot be accountable for their sins since they have no choice. We must always be on guard for the protection of the rights of liberty, knowing from the Book of Mormon reading that God will strengthen the side of freedom. This idea is the greatest thing we can share with other nations—with freedom men can grow and live according to God's plan.

Closing Song:

No. 187, Saints' Hymnal, "These Things Shall Be."

JULY 10, 1949

WE SHARE IN THE CHURCH

Prelude

Opening Hymn:

Saints' Hymnal, No. 410, "In the Light," verses 1 and 4.

Scripture Reading:

All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8.

Hymn:

Saints' Hymnal, No. 18, "For the Beauty of the Earth," verses 1, 2, and 5. This may be sung as a solo, duet, or a quartet.

Leader: What work can you share in the church? There are definite commandments to the priesthood and to the membership. Let us see what the Lord has given us. Ephesians 4: 11-13 (Leader reads this).

(Young people, priesthood members, and all others taking part in the following have been given their Scriptures earlier in the week in order to be prepared to give the following. These are suggested Scriptures; others may be used too.)

By an Elder—The Elder's Work, Doctrine and Covenants 17: 8, 9.

By a Priest—The Priest's Work, Doctrine and Covenants 17: 10.

By a Teacher—The Teacher's Work, Doctrine and Covenants 17: 11.

By a Deacon—The Deacon's Work, Doctrine and Covenants 17; also 83: 22.

By a Layman—Member's Work, Doctrine and Covenants 17: 18.

By a Woman—Women's Work, Proverbs 31.

By a Child—Children's Work, Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4 and 55: 2.

Also, a child might say it was his duty to learn and listen to his parents.

Remarks:

For the benefit of all, let us check over the "calls" God has given us. Let us examine our share of the work, prepare ourselves, and be more diligent. We are called to our separate tasks. Let the men of the priesthood, and the men and women and children of the fold perfect their individual callings that their sharing may be of worth to God's church.

Scripture Reading:

Seek to bring forth and establish my Zion. Keep my commandments in all things; and if you keep my commandments and endure to the end, you shall have eternal life; which gift is the greatest of all the gifts of God.

Hymn:

Saints' Hymnal, No. 298, "Oh, Jesus, I Have Promised," verses 1 and 4 only.

Benediction

JULY 17, 1949

WE SHARE IN OUR HOMES

Opening Hymn:

Choose one: "O Master, Let Me Walk With Thee," No. 213; "Lord, for Tomorrow and Its Needs," No. 276; "I Would Be True," No. 294.

Opening Prayer

Scripture Reading:

Set in order your houses; keep slothfulness and uncleanness far from you.—Doctrine and Covenants 87: 5.

Round Table:

Select leader, and two each of men, women, and children. Let leader open discussion by stating the morning's theme, and presenting the picture of the ideal Latter Day Saint home. Assign the following questions or others on this topic ahead of time, and ask participants to have answers ready to read or tell.

1. What do we share in our homes, both tangible and intangible?
2. How can we create the desire within ourselves and others of sharing?
3. Discuss the importance of the morning Scripture reading.
4. What can men do—or was this given to the women?
5. What can women do?
6. What can children in the home do?

sound well in church. The stops and tonal setup are so different from that of the pipe organ that regular organists have great difficulty in adjusting to it. The immediate ping of the tone response is also very "unorganlike." I have yet to hear a Hammond played so it sounds like a good church organ, and I've heard so-called experts try.

The Baldwin, on the other hand, makes an organist feel right at home. The stops are labeled like the pipe organ, and the setup is familiar. Instead of the immediate ping of the Hammond tone, the Baldwin tone sounds like a pipe organ tone, the electronic principle involved being entirely different from that of the Hammond.

Where it is difficult if not impossible to make the Hammond sound like a pipe organ, it is next to impossible to make the Baldwin sound like a roller-skating rink instrument.

The Wurlitzer organ is a reed organ electrically amplified and is not practical because of the heavy expense of keeping it tuned. In any organ, the pipes that require most frequent tuning are the reeds, and the Wurlitzer is all reeds. Don't let anyone mislead you on that score.

For very small churches, the Minshall-Esty organ may be the answer; it costs about $1,400. A good, regular reed organ could be the answer in small congregations of around a hundred or less. Try to get it motorized so the organist doesn't have to pump the bellows.

Because music is so important a part of our everyday worship experience, we feel very strongly that it should be given due consideration at the time a new church is being planned or when remodeling is contemplated.

The General Church Department of Music will gladly help in any way possible upon request.

Pentecost and the Church of Today

lief or about the expansion of the work to the Gentiles or about many other important but secondary matters. But they "were all of one accord" when they prayed with fervent zeal for the guidance of the Spirit of God. And when they received the endowment of the Spirit, then gradually but surely the secondary things which had previously divided them vanished away.

Here is an important lesson for the church today. All of us can and should pray earnestly and unitedly for the light and power of the Spirit of God to be granted the church and the members of the church. As we are so endowed—individually and collectively—we have assurance arising out of Pentecost and out of the history of the church that our secondary difficulties will be resolved in wisdom and with justice.

Pentecostal Tasks

Finally, as we look back to Pentecost, we shall do well to remember that the endowment of the Spirit at Pentecost was given for the accomplishment of Pentecostal tasks. There would have been no adequate reason for the endowment if the work to be done had been less distinctive or less important. But these simple and unlettered men had to initiate a campaign of testimony and invitation which should echo and re-echo down the ages and which would change the whole course of history. They could not do this alone. Nor can we carry on our campaign of testimony and invitation—equally important with theirs—unless we too are endowed with power from on high.

We look back to Pentecost in order that we can look forward to the kingdom. May God bless his church with the rich graces of his Spirit that his will shall be done and his kingdom established.

Prayer Is Natural

By CHARLES KORNMAN

WILL YOU SAY the benediction?" It was a last-minute shift in plans, and the worship chairman was flustered as she asked one of the Leaguers to help out. So it was that she flushed a bit at the rather firm "No" from the Leaguer. Anticipating her "Why?" he continued, "I'll not say the benediction, but I'll pray if you want me to."

By his rather cryptic refusal to say a prayer, the Leaguer showed a bit of insight into the nature and purpose of prayer. I wonder if at times we don't become addicted to praying for the sake of appearances rather than because of a real soul need or because of a genuine interest in the kingdom! I wonder if our prayers are not sometimes on the verge of becoming only liturgically necessary—as if somehow we expect the magic incantations in the name of our Savior to be the passport to salvation! This cannot be and permit us to go kingdomward. Thanks be to God for the good people who recognize the importance of invocations and benedictions. Thanks be to God for those who make an art of prayer. And more fervently — thanks be to God for the gift of prayer!

For a few moments let us look rather questioningly at the subject of prayer—not so much in analysis of the process itself by itself, but rather in relation to milking cows, and driving taxi cabs, and mining for zinc. After all, to understand a football, one has to see it in the hands of a person who knows what it is and how to handle it; to really understand even a little thing like a football, we have to see it functioning in the game for which it was intended and feel the spirit of the game as well. We could analogize, analyze, and diagramize from now until I'm pretty as a nurse, and we could never really catch the pulse of prayer.

Apostle Oakman illustrates it this way—a grain of wheat can be analyzed in the laboratory and its total constituency tabulated, but in the very process of analyzing that which gives the seed authority to grow is destroyed. Yet, because of just such analyses, our understanding of prayer has been enriched. So, as we talk about particular parts of prayer, let us remember that prayer is "fellowship with God" and the richness of the experience is provided by the presence of the Spirit of God.

ONE NIGHT we sat in a "Drive-In" and listened to the juke box. It was an off-hour and Ollie, Harvey, and I were the only customers (three straws and a root beer). The juke box was playing that soulful little ditty about a "Sunflower From the Sunflower State." It finally ended and another took its place—and suddenly somehow the words seemed significant. "Far away places are calling . . . calling me." As I listened, I thought about the hills of Jerusalem and pearl-diving and—as I thought—outside on the highway, a convoy of trucks roared eastward, overhead a plane bored its way northward, and off in the distance was the moan of a diesel as it passed a crossing. Far away places were really beckoning. And I wondered, Is this call of the unknown—this lure of the not-yet-seen—is it a good thing or is it one of my "inherited evils"? Is it something I can use or must I always contend with it?

A few days later, while reading in the Bible for a leisurely five minutes, I ran across a statement that literally seemed to jump at me because of the rather rebellious thoughts just mentioned. There it was in black and white. "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee." Abraham didn't have to stick at home and study French or the problems of financing a rural community. The appeal of the horizon wasn't a mocking thing to him, because he knew as he knelt at eve to "talk things over with God"—he knew that the following day would tell him what was out there.

As I sat there musing, thoughts began to drift in . . . "The Lord is far from the wicked . . . like a man traveling in a far country . . . I go to prepare a place for you." And suddenly I didn't feel like a rebel any longer. There is a country—a faraway place—and there is a call to me to bring as many as I can and walk toward that place where I belong. The only reason it seems so far is because I've wandered so far from it. And all the "riches that grow in hell" can never satisfy the longing for or the appeal of that faraway place.

NO WONDER that the couple who went to Venice for their honeymoon came back to say, "It was nice and we're glad we went. But we saw a dead cat in one of the canals. It's certainly good to be home."

No wonder the people who've wandered come to prayer meetings and say, "This is what I've always been looking for!" Everyone feels the tug and pull of faraway places—they'll always call us because there is a faraway place in that kingdom just beyond the horizon where we belong. It's a part of us just like hunger for strawberries or a love of beauty. As I recognized this, I began to see that prayer is a natural thing—that it is intelligent, and that the "light that groweth brighter and brighter" comes from the throne of God, and that I am happy only as I live in such a way that I want to talk with my Master and am eager for conversation with my God.

Our amateurish explorations may not result in better prayers, but perhaps they will help us side-step the dangerous and ever-present sin of "honoring God with our lips, drawing far from him with our hearts."

Casting about for areas within the context of prayer which we can present in an intelligent manner, we came to the idea that prayer is a simple, normal, human relationship with God, a natural reaction to an inherited tendency—that of wanting something different and better. It is a reaction growing out of a dissatisfaction with our present status. As young people, we must acknowledge the divinity of our ministry, but we must never be satisfied with the quality of it. What we're trying to say is that prayer—the good kind of prayer—is as natural as smiling and as necessary as any other bodily function.

Courage Did It!

By MARIE GOSLINE

THIS LITTLE STORY is written to show what one person who was of good courage and who had the love of a cause in her heart accomplished.

"Flossie" had one outstanding characteristic—she was courageous, and courage was what was needed most in the tiny, struggling branch. There was much to be done and few willing hands trained to carry the load. There were many "holes in the line," and no quarterbacks to carry the ball.

But Flossie picked out one hole, moved in with the ball under her arm, and carried it all the way for a touchdown. That hole, that spot, that job which needed to be filled was music director of the branch. Flossie was not particularly musical, but she didn't bury what little talent she had—and she had courage. She could play no musical instrument, but while her young son was taking violin lessons, she picked up the clarinet. She would learn to play it or die in the attempt. And learn it she did.

By the time she had learned to play, "Trust and Obey," and "Never Be Discouraged," she started her orchestra. A twelve-year-old girl was the pianist, and two boys in their early teens were the violinists. Then there was Flossie on the clarinet. This was only the nucleus. By the time six months had passed, Flossie had the platform filled with would-be musicians. Sometimes the violins were a little off key. Sometimes Flossie wheezed at the wrong time on her clarinet, but these were not important. The important thing was that all these young people were working. They were doing something more than warming the pews. They were doing something for the good of the cause—and all because one woman had courage. The touchdown? This branch had been one of the smallest in the district. It had only seventy-five members. But Flossie's orchestra went to reunion and furnished the music for the whole ten days. Courage did it!

QUITE BESIDE THE POINT, but nevertheless an interesting fact, was the way Flossie built her home. When World War I came, she and her young son were evicted. She took most of the savings she had and purchased a lot out on the edge of town. Then she donned a pair of overalls, put a smaller pair on her boy, and went to work. From the junk yards and from the city dump, she gathered secondhand lumber, from the neighbors she borrowed a few nails, and the house still stands today. True, it isn't much, nor was it ever much in the way of beauty, but it served its purpose. Courage did it!

Like Flossie, other courageous souls have helped promote causes which would benefit humanity. Perhaps they too have not always given perfect performances, but the causes they started have lived on to bless countless people. Like Flossie, others have built homes from fragments of broken lives—homes that warm spirits and lift hearts when nothing else could.

I like to think of these comforting words, for nothing can quite take their place. We, of all people, need to "Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the Lord thy God, he it is that doth go with thee; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee."

New Horizons

Pentecost

The Promise

An understanding of Pentecost was not reserved for the fortunate few of the world's peoples who were present at the time. Peter, who was preaching to the assembled throng on that momentous occasion, declared in relation to the gift of the Holy Spirit:

Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.—Acts 2: 38, 39.

Fulfillment

Pentecost was the fulfillment of several promises made by Jesus. He had instructed his disciples, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high" (Luke 24: 49). Pentecost was the object of that direction and the fulfillment of its promise.

John also recorded the anticipation of Pentecost by Jesus, "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever" (14: 16).

To prevent misunderstanding, Jesus gave a definition. "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you"—John 14: 26. In John 15: 26, the Comforter is further defined as "the Spirit of truth."

Purpose

The endowment of that day, with its wonderful manifestation of the gift of tongues, had a purpose which may be found by a brief consideration of the circumstances.

The Jews were a scattered people. The best-known cause of the Diaspora was the deportation by force as a part of military conquest. But there was another factor. The Jews were a far-traveling people like their relatives, the Phoenicians. They engaged in trade and commerce. They knew the routes of travel, the ports, and the markets of the world. They had become a truly international people. They took their families with them to foreign lands, and there the children grew up. But they maintained their religion, their culture, and their attachment to the soil of Palestine. Jerusalem was their spiritual home—even if they were born abroad, citizens of other lands.

At this time of year many of them were in Jerusalem. And there, on the anniversary of the ancient festival of Pentecost, each one witnessed a new and unprecedented outpouring of God's power, and each one heard in his own language the testimony of the gospel of Christ. After the testimonies and the speaking in tongues, Peter arose to preach, declaring anew the things that Jesus had been nailed to the Cross for saying and bringing conviction to the hearts of many who had not yielded to the message. Three thousand persons were baptized on that day, one of the great evangelistic experiences of the church. As a result, a new fellowship of faith was established, a community based on the social ideals of Christ.

The day of Pentecost is celebrated on Sunday, June 5, this year, and church officers believe it would be good for our people to give it some attention on this day. It has an important meaning for us, for we believe in and have experience with the gifts that were manifested on that day long ago, as well as the other gifts of the gospel named in the New Testament. Pentecost is important as a historical event. It is more important as a living reality of spiritual experience. L. J. L.

The Blessing of Little Children

strength of the body or church. When the faithful servants of the Master, in his stead, touch little children in blessings, there is passed inspiration or power which in many cases remains with them, calling forth their best selves in a response evident through the years. It can and does eventuate as a "well of water springing up unto everlasting life," or a life identified with God in time and eternity.

Marriage relationships under God demand that parents prepare to guard the virtue of their children as they would their lives. The principals to happy and successful marriages conform their lives to the eternal laws of heaven. There is really no other way. This faithfulness brings the fullest joy here and glorious rewards hereafter. The ties of love and affection are re-enforced, and the peace of heaven enters the home. Parents who surround their children with this refining influence make a powerful contribution to the church.

IT IS THE PURPOSE of God that men shall grow together. Therefore the public blessing of children serves to bring the spiritual forces to the entire fellowship of Saints. Social righteousness or Zion living demands family righteousness. Parents must recognize that their family is a part of this larger social order. The family cannot exist in spiritual strength in insolation or apart from the body of the church. As we are disciplined, yet made stronger by relationships in the larger society of the church, so we come also to learn that an additional element is needed. The saintly home cultivates this plus element. Children from families so blessed usually find their places in adulthood in the forward march of the church. Such divinely-ordained homes are the very foundation of the kingdom of God.

WE SHARE WITH OUR NEIGHBORS

"Every man seeking the interest of his neighbor."—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 4.

Opening Hymn:

Choose one: "Is Thy Cruse of Comfort Failing?" No. 345; "This Life Is a Garden," No. 220.

Opening Prayer

Story of Dorcas:

Acts 9: 36-40, Inspired Version.

Talk:

Enlarge on the Scripture reading. As Latter Day Saints, our homes should be an inspiration to our neighbors—places of help and love. Those around us should feel completely free to come to us in time of trouble. Like Dorcas, we must be needed and of service. Love and study and wisdom in all the avenues of life are necessary to our preparation. We should consider our stewardship of sharing seriously and pray God to help us to completely love our neighbors as ourselves. Follow the Bible instruction—Exodus 20: 16; Psalm 15: 3; Jeremiah 22: 13; Habakkuk 2: 15; Ephesians 4: 25; Romans 15:

2; and Matthew 19: 19. (Let young people with Bibles read these passages.)

Special Solo:

"I'm Sure I Shall Not Pass Again This Way," or Hymn No. 225.

Closing Prayer

WE SHARE OUR EXPERIENCES

Opening Hymn:

Choose one: "Come, Tell the Story of His Love," No. 286; "Thou Must Be True Thyself," No. 300.

Opening Prayer

May we choose experiences that will bring us to God.

Scripture Reading:

And the angels answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye; for we know that ye seek Jesus who was crucified. He is not here for he has risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay; and go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead.—Matthew 28: 4, 5.

Jesus answered and said unto them, Go and tell John again of those things which ye do hear and see; How that the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, and the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them.—Matthew 11: 4, 5.

Talk:

Everyone likes to talk. Someone has said that talk is cheap. We share our experiences through talking and writing. What are our daily experiences we are sharing? What is the news of the day at your home? Experiences are like blocks that are stacked—the accumulation makes our life; they form our character. They may be bad, good, or indifferent. We desire that our experiences will be like the Scripture—of such importance that we may "go and tell." The women at the tomb went there seeking Jesus, and they had a wonderful experience to tell. When we seek Jesus, our experiences will be of a sharing caliber. We determine our experiences. We choose to do what we do. Let us plan our time, our study, our education so that the outcoming experiences will give us something that is helpful to our fellow men. When we do share our experiences with our friends and our brothers and sisters, let us tell these experiences that are good and true. We should prepare ourselves with knowledge of the books, the world, and the church; consequently, our shared experiences will be edifying and pleasant to those about us.

Closing Hymn:

"Let Us, Brothers, Let Us Gladly," No. 287.

It doesn't take much of a man to be a Christian but it takes all of him. —Thos. Huxley.

Notice to Records Purchasers

It has been discovered that there are some defective pressings among the new Stone Church Choir records. Some have been found with the label the same on both sides and some have the same recording on both sides. Anyone having received records with these defects may exchange them by returning the defective record only. Please do not return the entire album.

Home-coming at Pleasanton, Iowa

Members of the George Morey Historical Society invite all descendants of George Morey and those who are now attending or have previously attended the Pleasanton, Iowa, Branch, to be present at the home-coming celebration on June 5. All-day services will be held at the church, with a basket dinner being served at noon in the community hall honoring John R. Keown's ninety-third birthday. A short dedicatory ceremony will take place in the afternoon at which time the George M. Morey Memorial Library will be presented to the church. Anyone desiring to dedicate a church book to the memory of a pioneer family may do so at this service.

Visitors are requested to bring well-filled baskets.

Onset Reunion

The Onset Reunion will be held July 16 to 24 at Onset, Massachusetts. Special emphasis will be given to men's work. Apostle M. L. Draper, District President A. W. Sheehy, and Seventies William Guthrie and Don E. Harvey are to be present. The new commissary will be ready for use this year; tents will rent for $14 and $18. For accommodations, write to Mrs. Audrey Hardy, 27 Hancock Street, Lexington, Massachusetts.

A. W. SHEEHY,
District President.

Southern Missouri District Conference

The Southern Missouri District Conference will be held at Kennett, Missouri, June 18 and 19. Apostle E. J. Gleazer and Elder Donald Kyser are to be present. The first meeting will be held at 7:45 on Saturday evening. Sunday's activities include a 9:30 a.m. prayer service; a sermon at 11:00; lunch on the grounds at noon; and a business session at 1:00 p.m. Apostle Gleazer will go to Bernie, Missouri, following the conference to dedicate the new church building there. Nonmembers and members of neighboring branches are invited to attend the services.

J. A. PHILLIPS,
District President.

 MY FRIEND

I have a friend who comes to see me to talk about books and people and the events of the world. Being a preacher, he often talks about religion and God. I am always richer for his visits, because he always brings me some fine thoughts.

Lately, I have learned of something else he is doing for me. He has made some other friends for me, telling people about me, and I fear he has said some kind things I don't deserve. People smile and shake hands and say, "Yes, Dr. M..... has been telling me about you." They trust his opinions and ideas.

What better friend could one have than one who brings him other friends? What a mission in life—making friends for other people. What a beautiful mission!

Now I am suffering from a fear that my friend, and the other friends he has made for me, will discover that I am not nearly so interesting as they think I am. It is embarrassing to be found out.

Within my own mind, I know that I am like the potato—rather plain stuff without a little dressing. Mash a potato and put rich brown gravy on it, and you have a dish fit for kings. Hash brown it, with onions or cheese, and the honorable men of earth will praise it. Bake it and spread it with fresh country butter, and you have something for the gods. But take it alone, and it is very humble fare. Like the potato, if there is anything good in me, it has been added, mostly by other people. I didn't have it originally. I am afraid these friends of mine have been deceived by the gravy!

 NOTES

The other day I saw a beautiful sign on a liquor store. Are you surprised at me? Are you annoyed? Wait, Brother. That sign had just one word on it: "Closed."

Evan Fry told, in a radio talk, of a car ahead of him which carried a sign reading, "Jesus Saves." The driver went past a stop sign, entered a busy boulevard without pausing, caused danger to himself and to other drivers in a brief minute of law-breaking and irresponsible conduct. Such a driver may need Jesus before the day is over, and it is doubtful if Jesus would be interested in protecting him from a well-deserved accident. To all such drivers we should say, "Don't leave it all up to Jesus!"

 SCRIPTURE GAME

Some people make a game of conveying messages in quotations from the Scripture, rather than in their own words. If not overdone, this can be fun.

In our editorial offices, it is sometimes necessary to close an office door for quiet when general business becomes noisy. A sign on one door reads: "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you" (Matthew 7:7).

Well, at least that is better than some folk who just read: "Knock."

 SOMETHING IN A NAME

Uncle Joe has painted a new name on his duckboat, which is operated by a small outboard motor. It is now the "Lethargic." Aunt Molly says, "That applies to Joe, too."

Wouldn't it be wonderful if we could have the energy of small children, the hope of youth, the purpose of manhood, the wisdom of maturity, and the serenity of the sunset years? But we can't have everything at once. When we are young and strong, we don't know what to do with our strength; by the time we know enough, the strength is gone.

The Child Is Father to the Man—Wordsworth

News & Notes

IF SPECIAL DAYS WERE THE ANSWER to our social ills, we would soon have Zion. But Children's Day is more than an emphasis of a good idea, like "Flag Day." It is a church institution which had its start in 1868 and originally served as promotion day in Protestant church schools. Recently its purpose has shifted to that of "Decision Day," and many branches have beautiful baptismal and confirmation services on the second Sunday in June.

John Milton once wrote, "The childhood shows the man, as morning shows the day." All of the social heritage which will ever be saved for future generations is passed along by our children. They are the custodians of this great treasure. It may be too late for us to do much for some of them, but it is worth trying. The child next door, or in your home, as truly reflects the father of the man he is to be as the morning reflects the day which follows.

Introducing...

CHARLES FRY (page 5) was born in Devizes, England, February 13, 1872. He followed the vocations of farmer, schoolteacher, minister, and editor.

He came to the United States when thirteen years of age and lived with his uncle and aunt, Elder and Mrs. E. C. Brand. Elder Brand, who was a missionary in the church for many years, died when Charles Fry was nineteen. Brother Fry began farming. After two years of this work, he sold the farm and attended the normal training school at Shenandoah, Iowa. His teaching career began two years later and continued for six years. From 1913 to 1917 he was editor of Zion's Ensign.

Elder Fry's ministerial activity extends over a period of forty-six years as a General Conference appointee. He labored in the office of priest, elder, seventy, bishop, and high priest. He was also a member of the General High Council from 1914 to 1920. He was ordained a bishop in London, England, in 1921, and continued in this office until 1933. Since that time he has been laboring as high priest.

In 1902 he married Miss Emily Kinney. They have three sons: Evan A., A. Harold, and Charles W. Brother Fry pays high tribute to the "patient and unflinching support" of Sister Fry through all the years of his ministry.

MARGARET W. (MRS. A. L.) GIBSON (page 10) is a public schoolteacher, church school worker, and housewife. On July 15, 1920, she was married to Archie Leroy Gibson. He has served as pastor of the Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, Branch for a number of years. They have two children: Robert B. and Anne (Nancy), both Graceland graduates.

Sister Gibson was graduated from Mount Vernon High School, Mount Vernon, New York, in 1913, and received a bachelor of arts degree at Syracuse University, Syracuse, New York, in 1917 as an English major. She taught in high schools in New York, Massachusetts, Wyoming, and Idaho. She has taught in the church school for over sixteen years. She was council president of the P. T. Association for over two years, and is a member of the Idaho State Writers' League. She served the Spokane District as historian for several years, and is now District Director of Religious Education.

MARK H. SIEGFRIED (page 13) has lived in the Center Place for over thirty-eight years and has been busy in educational, musical, and economic activities.

Brother Siegfried was born near Nauvoo, Illinois, where he spent his boyhood and was educated in the common schools. He attended Iowa Wesleyan College in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and Elliott's Business College in Burlington, Iowa. He taught school four years, and acted as principal of the Nauvoo grade school for two years.

In 1906 he married Madge Craig. They have four children: Craig, Pauline, Cedric, and Charles Mark.

In 1906 he was assistant superintendent of the General Sunday School Association. For a number of years he was Nauvoo district historian, president of the district Religio, and superintendent of the district Sunday School Association. He was editor of Zions' Ensign in 1911 and 1912. He has served the church many years and in many capacities, among which are: as bishop, being a member of the Independence Stake Bishopric, and a member of the Presiding Bishopric. He has sung twenty-seven times in the "Messiah" chorus.

TULSA INSTITUTE

John Darling of the Department of Religious Education spent the week end of May 22 in Tulsa, Oklahoma, for an institute of church school workers. Classes were taught on "The Basis of Religious Education," "Church School Standards," "Worship in the Church School." There was a panel on "Church and Home." Pastor Victor Witte shared in the responsibility of the institute.

GOOD NEWS FROM GERMANY

Apostle Blair Jensen reports two items of interest from Berlin. On Sunday May 15, the Saints met and opened their new building in West Berlin, in the American Sector. On the same day Otto Smolney arrived after several years in Russia as a prisoner of war. It was a day of rejoicing for about 130 Saints and seventy of their friends.

McDOWELL HOME AFTER EXTENSIVE TRIP

F. M. McDowell, director of General Church priesthood education, returned May 31 from a five weeks trip, which included a series of priesthood institutes in Western United States. He attended the Appointee's Institute at Berkeley; the Northern California institute for local priesthood, also at Berkeley; a joint institute for the priesthood of the Los Angeles Metropolitan District and Southern California District; and an Arizona priesthood institute at Phoenix. Brother McDowell reports a large attendance and a splendid interest among all the men of the priesthood. They were eager to learn and to use new materials. His work was done in company with Apostle Charles Hield. Brother McDowell stated that he also enjoyed working again with District President Garland Tickemyer of Los Angeles District and Bishop Stanley Kelley and with Elder John W. Rushton whom he also visited in his home at Laguna Beach. He enjoyed his stay in the homes of the Saints and appreciated the opportunity to take a two-day trip with three of the brethren to Yosemite National Park.

ELDER QUICK CONVALESCING

Elder Lee Quick, whose address is Mapleton, Kansas, is recuperating from an operation at his home. He is a former missionary and has been pastor of the Mapleton Branch for the past several years.

INTEREST FROM OTHER MINISTERS

In preparation for the series presented by Apostle Maurice L. Draper and Elder John Darling during April in Philadelphia, Pastor John T. Conway sent out considerable publicity material, among which were letters of invitation to other ministers of the community. Several of these ministers answered, and some raised questions on matters of church history and the Book of Mormon. The Reverend Elwood F. Reeves, Jr. raised two questions. First, he wanted to know what became of the plates, and the second question was concerning the lack of any Hebrew records indicating the migration of the family of Lehi to America. Elder Darling replied at length to both questions, giving the traditional viewpoints of our ministry on the questions.

EVENTS IN ST. JOSEPH

President F. Henry Edwards and Apostle E. J. Gleazer were at First Church in St. Joseph, Missouri, on May 29 where in the morning service Elders Ormand Salisbury and Archie B. Constance were ordained to the office of evangelist. In the afternoon Merle Howard was installed as city pastor succeeding Melvin Russell.

Children's Day

And he took a child, and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms, he said unto them, Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me. —Mark 9: 36, 37.

Sunday, June 12

This is Children's Day. We join in public ceremony at church to honor them, to express our love for them, and to see and hear them participate in the program. Good parents, through all the year, have been loving and serving their children. Today everybody has a chance to participate together.

You have noticed that the happiest gatherings are those where they are present. Without them, things are rather quiet and sometimes a bit dull.

With all the happiness we find in them, isn't it surprising that anybody in the world would make a decree—"No Children"? Yet there are men and women in the world who have made that decree.

The Cult of Tiburon

Tiburon is an arid island in the Gulf of Lower California, inhabited by the Seris Indians. They wrest a scant living from their island home, its sparse grass and desert vegetation. They have tried to keep themselves isolated from the world, guarding the secrets of their religion and philosophy from strangers; but the world has crowded in upon them as it has upon all other peoples. They have resented it.

A few years ago it was reported that this tribe had abruptly ceased having children, as if to effect a final retreat from the world by self-extermination. It was said that Tiburon had decreed, "No children!"

If true, that was a dreadful thing. Some people would think it no great loss for a backward, hostile tribe to go out of existence. As the Lord High Executioner in The Mikado exclaimed, "They never will be missed!" But Christian philosophy holds a place and a hope for every race of people to live, develop, and improve on their way to salvation.

Our Tiburon

Will you be shocked to learn that there are members of the cult of Tiburon in all the cities of the United States? They are the owners of houses and apartments who refuse to rent them to families with children. The American Tiburon is the average apartment house.

Landlords, of course, have reasons. Many children are destructive and excessively noisy. They damage houses and make costly repairs and redecoration necessary. Rents that landlords are permitted to charge will not cover these costs in some cases. This is a condition parents must try to correct if they would be welcomed tenants.

One local man built an apartment house especially for families with children. He has had a fine experience with some good tenants and their youngsters. Then two elderly women applied for a vacant apartment, and he accepted them. Soon they were complaining of the children, wanting them put out. He tried to reason with them, but they remained querulous. Then he invited them to move.

Rachel's Cry

The yearning of all hungry hearts was expressed long ago when Rachel cried to Jacob, "Give me children, or else I die!" Those who do not have them lack a certain spiritual fulfillment.

It is a tragedy for the little children who come into homes where they are not loved nor wanted, where they are treated ignorantly and receive improper care.

Importance of Children

Children and adults are very necessary to each other. Children bring happiness, development, and enrichment of life to their parents, as good parents do to them. The best people in the world are those who love children. They are the most tolerant, the most wise, the most kindly and understanding. They are the easiest to live with. Whoever cannot live with a child cannot live at peace with himself or the world.

Children need to live, grow, and learn. They require physical and mental activity. Sometimes they make noise, break a window, or kick a hole in the plaster. They must be taught to live as civilized beings. It is good for them to be trained, and good for parents to train them, for in so doing parents grow up too.

Children and the Church

Parents and their children should be welcome at the church, for thus is the future of the church assured. Sometimes children make noise, displeasing adults. Older people should get used to it. A church is, or should be, a family situation. It is a spiritual home for all the family. Children are a natural part of it. Christ did not say, "I will build my church" to create a Tiburon. He rebuked the child-haters of his day and said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

It would be a dull, futile, tragic world without children. We should abolish Tiburon—from apartments, houses, and churches. Welcome the children in, as Christ welcomed them. There can be no kingdom of heaven without them. L. J. L.

Editorial

Across the Desk

A recent letter from Missionary Russell F. Ralston calls attention to the progress being made in the missionary campaigns launched by the Roman Catholic Church. He also calls attention to the fact that the Mormon Church has recently taken notice of their success. J. Reuben Clark of the Presidency at a recent conference warned the Mormons against the subtle appeals of the larger church. Brother Ralston says that since the Mormons frequently use the argument of size to prove that they are right and we are wrong, it makes their alarm the more interesting. We quote from Brother Ralston's letter without any intention of committing the church to or for his point of view.

It seems that the Catholic Church here is appealing to the young Mormons on the basis of more freedom morally. That is to say, the priest smokes with them, drinks with them a little, and in general tells them they can do these things in the open in the Catholic Church rather than behind closed doors. The Mormons still do a lot of talking about the Word of Wisdom, but in the little town of Malad, Idaho, where the population is admittedly 85 to 90 per cent Mormon, eight saloons are well supported and filled every Saturday night. It seems the Catholic Church is taking advantage of this and telling the people they can drink and still have the full approval of the church if they become Catholics. This is attracting a number of Mormon young people, and the priest has been able to get them to Catholic instruction classes—which about finishes them.

The thing that strikes me here is that the Mormon Church, which has been holding its youth mainly with its social program of dancing, is now facing the danger of losing its youth to a church with a still more liberal moral code and social program. To me, this bears out only one fact, the church which holds its young people to any other than the program of Christ holds them on a very weak and dangerous basis. Any church that has to compromise the principles of truth with worldliness in order to hold its youth is not accomplishing its mission.

This may give you some little insight as to what is happening here. Unfortunately we are losing some of our young people on the same basis—the Mormons lure them with the dancing program. However, I am convinced that we must hold fast to our program and, through the ministry of our personal lives and homes, call our youth not with compromise, but with truth and the Spirit of God.

From Allen Breckenridge, Papeete, Tahiti, April 22:

We are now getting into the routine of our work here in Papeete, and we are finding it very enjoyable. We have an official enrollment of 325, although this list is not accurate. Some members have moved to other islands; many who came here from Taronia have never been transferred on the records; and some whose names appear on the roll are now deceased. I believe there are nearly 400. Keeping accurate records is a difficult task as each member is listed alphabetically rather than by family; often they change their names, so that the one they are known by is not the name by which they were baptized. Few of the families have family names.

Recently we instituted a visiting campaign. We hope to keep the priesthood of the branch on a year-visiting program. Many of the men want to visit but need and desire instruction on how to do it.

We were very pleased by the response to the special services held on April 6 and Easter. Restoration festival day was observed with a picnic and swim at the beach; in the evening, a service was held at the church. Following several talks and special music, ten men were ordained. For this occasion we used a novel "attention director." Brother Butterworth had obtained a large picture of Christ extending his hand toward a young man (courtesy of a Kansas outdoor advertising agency). This eight-foot picture was cut out and mounted on the wall above and behind the pulpit, and the young man, Joseph Smith, stood six feet tall before Christ's outstretched hand. This scene made a splendid background for the service.

I never cease to be amazed at the quality and number of special musical numbers which are always available. Every Sunday evening there is a half-hour of music before the preaching service; this features solos, duets, trios, quartets, and instrumentalists. The choir sings at least once at each of the preaching services and often other musical numbers are given. On the nights of April 6 and Easter Sunday, about twelve special numbers were given.

Travelog

The writer had a very pleasant experience at Columbus, Ohio. Arriving at that capital city late on Friday, May 13, he soon found himself in the midst of a large assemblage of Saints in a mother-daughter, father-son banquet held in the Highland Avenue Methodist Church, West Columbus.

Here, under the joint supervision of Elder John E. Booth, pastor, and Sister Nelle Swanson, director of women, an appropriate program was given in connection with the dinner. Elder Booth presided. An address of welcome was given by Sister Swanson. Tributes to mothers and fathers were given by Donna Hopper and John Roberts, Jr.; responses were made by Thelma Dowker Mottashed and Enoch Swanson. Dorothy Miller sang a solo, and Marjorie (mother) and Walter (son) Cross sang a duet. Elders Charles Ferguson and Robert E. Madden offered prayers.

The writer was guest speaker.

District President and Sister Floyd Rockwell were present, and the Saints from Springfield, Dayton, and other branches were represented. Here also I met two of the daughters of Elder Gomer T. Griffiths.

On Sunday I spoke at 11 a.m. at the North Columbus church to a full house. Here I had an unexpected visit from my sister Audentia Anderson and husband, Benjamin, of Omaha, Nebraska, and their son, Duane, of Springfield, Ohio.

Apostle Percy Farrow came in on Saturday and was scheduled to speak Sunday night at the South Church.

While in Columbus, I stayed at the pleasant home of Brother and Sister E. C. Swanson, Enoch and Nelle, in Bexley, Ohio, a city entirely encompassed by Columbus. There I relaxed, feeling "at home" with these fine Saints. Sunday evening I was en route home. I arrived Monday noon.

My next trip will be to Plano, Illinois, where I was born, then Galesburg, Illinois, for a dedication.

The Doctrine of Predestination

By CHARLES FRY

(NOTE: In this article our investigation of the subject is based almost entirely upon the Scriptures as accepted by this church, including the Inspired Version of the Bible, from which all biblical references are quoted, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants.)

PREDESTINATION is an old doctrine, and it has always been more or less controversial, which is an indication that its foundations are uncertain. It has never been a doctrine of the Reorganized Church, though there are several incidental references to it in the Scriptures, justifying our study of it. The foreknowledge of God, foreordination, election, man's free agency or free will (which are mentioned in the Scriptures) and fate or fatalism (which is not mentioned there) are all related topics and need to be noticed as we proceed.

Without attempting to define the doctrine in its various phases, predestination affirms that God, from the foundation of the world, predetermined that certain men should be saved and others should be lost, and that without regard to any merits or demerits of their own. Our present effort is to show the teachings of our Scriptures regarding it.

MAN'S PRECARNATE STATE

Prior to coming into this world, all men existed as spirit beings, having been created of God "in the beginning." This probably means the beginning of the creation of our solar system with its inhabitants, for the Scriptures do teach that man was first created in the spirit. Turning to Genesis 1, we find an account of the story of the creation of man.

The word man is used in the generic sense, meaning all mankind.

"And I, God, created man in mine own image, in the image of mine Only Begotten created I him; male and female created I them."—Verse 27.

Man was the last work of the six days' creation which was followed by the "rest" day. It was not until after this rest day that Adam was made of earthly material, showing a separate creation from the first. The story goes on:

For I, the Lord God, created all things of which I have spoken, spiritually, before they were naturally upon the face of the earth And I, the Lord God, had created all the children of men, and yet not a man to till the ground, for in heaven created I them and there was not yet flesh upon the earth.

At a later time the Lord gave Enoch a vision of his work, and "he beheld the spirits that God had created" (Genesis 6: 38). In latter-day revelation, the Lord makes plain that there was a dual creation, "firstly spiritual, secondly temporal" (Doctrine and Covenants 28: 8). Birth is not the beginning of human life, any more than death is the ending of it. Man's earth life is but a segment of a much larger life, all parts of which are intimately related.

SOME CONDITIONS IN THE SPIRIT LIFE

The Lord has told us, "Every spirit of man was innocent in the beginning, and God having redeemed man from the fall, men became again in their infant state, innocent before God."—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6. Innocency here means not only without evil but also without goodness. Both were potential but not actual, for both would come only by man's voluntary action, and so far he had had no experience. He had never done any good and so was without commendation or reward, he had never done any evil or sin and was likewise without condemnation. He had no past; his whole life was future. God had created the form, planting within it the spark of divine life, and supplying every needful thing for proper growth into an (limited) independent being.

Apart from life itself there was one other quality or power given to man in his spirit creation without which he could not develop or even continue to exist. That was the power of free agency or free will. It was necessary to any self-expression and to his becoming a self-acting, accountable being.

Man was also in the beginning with God. Intelligence, or the light of truth, was not created or made, neither indeed can be. All truth [intelligence] is independent in that sphere in which God has placed it, to act for itself otherwise there is no existence. Behold here is the agency of man, and here is the condemnation of man, because that which was from the beginning is plainly manifest unto them, and they receive not the light.—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 5.

The divine spark of life was intelligence, which must have been of the essence of God, for it was never created, nor could it be created. It was placed in the spirit forms which were created, and they became living entities, partaking of the nature as well as the form of their Creator, in fulfillment of God's declared purpose to make man in his image and in his "likeness." They were actually sons of God by creation. Read of the time when the Lord rhetorically asked Job, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? . . . When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?"—Job 38.

These created spirits were not left to fend for themselves, struggling alone for the higher potentialities of life. Every needful thing was provided by their Creator for their development: Light and truth, two great elements in the growth of human souls, were freely given of God, but the reception and use of them were left to man himself. Life meant that he must learn to take the initiative.

GOOD AND EVIL IN THE SPIRIT WORLD

Free agency can operate only where man is free to accept or reject, to obey or disobey, to progress or retrogress. The free agent may do either good or evil, which are opposites. The man who chooses the good, grows in goodness and in the likeness of God; while the man who chooses evil, grows in evil and sin into a nature opposite to that of God. Evil is but the negation of that which is good, and the right to choose was possible to man in the spirit as in the carnate world. Choices made were not always right and good, insomuch that sin entered probably involving all to some degree. Some went so far into sin as to lose all desire for righteousness, becoming wholly evil and making it impossible for the purposes of the Creator to be fulfilled in them.

Behold, the Devil was before Adam, for he rebelled against me, saying, Give me thine honor, which is my power; and also a third part of the hosts of heaven turned he away from me because of their agency; and they were thrust down, and thus became the Devil and his angels.—Doctrine and Covenants 28: 10.

Wherefore, because that Satan rebelled against me, and sought to destroy the agency of man, which I, the Lord God, had given him . . . he became Satan.—Genesis 3: 4.

Satan and his following, constituting one third of all the spirits of men, in the exercise of their free agency chose to follow sin so completely that their degradation was complete, notwithstanding Satan, whose name had been Lucifer or "Angel of Light," stood high in authority in the presence of God. Alma says, "they were on the same standing with their brethren," that is when they were created, and "had as great privilege as their brethren." Many who did not fall with Satan did, nevertheless, "reject the Spirit of God [which was light and truth] on account of the hardness of their hearts and blindness of their minds." (See Alma 9: 67, 68).

A PERIOD OF CHARACTER FORMING

We have given the foregoing not only to show the fact of man's pre-carnate life, but also to show some of the conditions of that life, including free agency, and the opportunity under it of developing into the likeness of God. That life was a character-forming life either to the attaining of great good, or the falling by indifference or willful choice into evil of varying degrees. It was a life preparatory to life in the flesh. Some had grown strong in the knowledge and righteousness of God, while others had become blinded in mind by devoting themselves to other than that which made for righteousness. There must have been all shades of character, and among the more faithful, the degrees of development must also have been varied.

The great diversity of human traits and qualities manifested from birth in this world cannot all be attributed to parental inheritance. In the family of Adam, Cain and Abel possessed rather extremely opposite natures; and the inherent qualities of the twins, Esau and Jacob, whose parental inheritance was identical, were so different that God said, "I loved Jacob, . . . And I hated Esau" (Malachi 1: 2, 3). Paul affirms that this choice of the younger was made of God before the children were born (Romans 9: 11). Most parents with several children in the family know that from birth children show often great variations in inherent nature.

Speaking of the spirit world, the Lord said, "Here is the condemnation of man, because that which was from the beginning is plainly manifest unto them, and they receive not the light." Many walked in darkness as many do in this world, because of which they were under condemnation, hence the implication of sin in the statement:

Every spirit of man was innocent in the beginning, and God having redeemed man from the fall, men became again in their infant state, innocent before God.—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6.

THE FOREKNOWLEDGE OF GOD

Alma describes this period of human experience. In speaking of the calling of men to the high priesthood, he says they were "called and prepared from the foundation of the world, according to the foreknowledge of God on account of their exceeding faith and good works." God knew his men before they came into the world; he knew of what character they were and about what they would do here. Every man coming from the spirit world brings with him the background of his previous life; the character he formed there becomes the starting point for the further forming of character here. God knows the direction each life will take, and from the hosts of men, he previously chose such as are best suited by virtue of faith and righteousness for positions of trust and responsibility in his work.

In choosing individuals for redemptive work, God followed the rule common in the affairs of rulers and men of business in this world, of selecting men of proved qualification for positions of responsibility. Alma speaks further as to why certain ones were called to the holy office of high priesthood:

Therefore they having chosen good, and exercising exceedingly great faith, are called with a holy calling, yea, with that holy calling which was prepared with, and according to, a preparatory redemption for such; and thus they have been called to this holy calling on account of their faith, while others would reject the Spirit of God on account of the hardness of their hearts and blindness of their minds, while, if it had not been for this, they might [have] had as great privilege as their brethren.—Alma 9: 66, 67.

God's choosing of men for special responsibility and honor was no arbitrary choice on his part, but was based upon worthiness and qualification. Neither were the choices made to confer honor upon these worthies, but that they might be servants to bring blessing and salvation to their lagging fellows. They were "called by this holy calling, and ordained unto the high priesthood of the holy order of God, to teach his commandments unto the children of men, that they also might enter into his rest."

Incidentally we may note that evil characters were sometimes destined beforehand for such works as they might do, such as Pharaoh of the exodus of whom God said, "Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might show forth my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout the earth."—Romans 9: 17. Judas, and Pilate also, with many others God used in their wickedness. Their sinful acts were but the expression of their own evil will, just as the good deeds of men of the priesthood were the expression of their righteous will. There was no compulsion, no fatalism involved in these things.

SCRIPTURAL PREDESTINATION

In Paul's outstanding passage on predestination, we read:

And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are called according to his purpose. For him whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to his own image, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren.—Romans 8: 28-30.

It would require an extreme interpretation of this passage to make it mean that God, without regard to the free moral agency of his creatures, predestined some to eternal life and some to eternal death. What God did determine was that as many as would obey his law, coming up to the standard of righteousness in Christ, should be saved; and that those who would not obey, but continued in sin, should not be saved. This was the word given of God in the beginning of the world:

And the Lord God called upon men, by the Holy Ghost, everywhere, and commanded them that they should repent; and as many as believed in the Son, and repented of their sins, should be saved. And as many as believed not, and repented not, should be damned. And the words went forth out of the mouth of God, in a firm decree, wherefore they must be fulfilled.—Genesis 5: 1, 2.

After two millenniums the closing words of the Bible still carried the same message:

And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely.—Revelation 22: 17.

With Jesus teaching that "God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved"; and "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me"; and with Paul advocating of Christ, "who is willing to have all men to be saved, and to come to a knowledge of the truth," which Christ, he says, "gave himself a ransom for all,"—there seems to be no place in the divine plan of salvation for arbitrarily selected persons. The gospel offers equal opportunity to all men.

God did choose some to the work of his ministry, to be his servants, but even these came in through faith and obedience. Mormon, writing on the ministration of angels, says they declare the word of Christ unto the chosen vessels of the Lord, that they may bear testimony of him; and by so doing, the Lord God prepareth the way that the residue of men may have faith in Christ, that the Holy Ghost may have place in their hearts.—Moroni 7: 32, 33.

We need not multiply evidences, but such Scriptures establish the divine doctrine that salvation is provided for and will be offered to all, and upon their acceptance and obedience, rests their hope of eternal life, while those who reject the offer have no hope.

ELECTION

Elect means to select or choose; the elect are the chosen ones. God chooses men to salvation, not by caprice, but according to wise and just rules. Men become the elect of God through obedience to his law, in which case they are saved by divine grace. It is not the outward acts of obedience alone but the making of those acts effectual by daily transformation of soul that saves.

FATALISM

The fatalistic doctrine is of pagan origin and never has been taught under Christianity. It assumes that all events occurring in this world have been previously determined by some superior power and are unavoidable. According to this doctrine, whatever a man does he cannot avoid doing. If he becomes a drunkard, he was destined to be a drunkard and could not help it. The wife he marries was selected for him before he was born. His whole life has been marked out for him, and he must live it.

What a travesty on the divine principle of free agency! What else could more certainly destroy human initiative? What else could take away from man his sense of accountability and fear of judgment? What else could produce a deeper state of

Eternal Life Now

WHO WROTE IT?

Among the papers found in the late President Garver's desk was this article entitled, "Eternal Life Now." If the author sees it, we wish he would write us so the article can be identified.

TO A PEOPLE claiming a long history of divine appointment and favor as the elect of the earth and the chosen of God, the Maker of men proclaimed, "I am come that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly."

Jesus Christ was aware, both because of his own experience and through his understanding quickened by the Spirit of God, that the lives of men and women in his day were not geared to achieve the greatest possible enjoyment in life. He knew that life held greater possibilities than had been revealed in the Scriptures or were being taught by the priests of his day. He was certain that the responsibility of bringing to light and making available to mankind the rich resources of their own being was his personal problem, and after the rich experiences he enjoyed in his own life of obedience to the will of God, he had no hesitation in recommending his own experience of life as adequate to satisfy the needs of all men.

The life of Jesus Christ was a living testimony. When his disciples analyzed the impact of his life upon theirs, they wrote, "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." Too often the gospel of Christ is regarded as a system of doctrine or commanded ceremonies. Men forget that Jesus did not say "the doctrines I teach are the way of life." He said, "I am the way, the truth and the life." Men were not promised the more abundant life through the mental acceptance of a system of doctrine, nor by the observance of isolated sacraments or acts of religious worship.

It was the life of Jesus which was the light of men. In him they saw the word become flesh. They beheld the mind of God expressed in his son. As one disciple wrote, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life; (For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us;) that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ."

THERE CAN BE NO DOUBT that the early disciples regarded Jesus as eternal life made manifest. The Christ who said, "Love your enemies," prayed for his murderers, "Father forgive them for they know not what they do." It was out of his own soul's living and loving relation to his Father and men that he spoke. When he sent his apostles into all the world with the command to "teach all nations" and instructed them to "baptize them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost," his mind was fresh with the fuller life and closer relation to his Father which immediately followed the surrender of his will to God at the time he was baptized by John in the River Jordan. It was soon after this self-dedication of his life that a ruler of the Jews called Nicodemus approached him by night to discover the way of life. Christ unhesitatingly informed him, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God . . . and except a man is born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Jesus knew that until men adjusted their lives and wills to God's, and until the surrender of self was complete, fellowship between man and God would not be possible, and the eternal quality of life revealed in Jesus could not be reproduced in human lives.

On the night of his betrayal, Jesus finally revealed the secret of his own gloriously rich and full personality. He assured his disciples it would be available to them also. He had previously informed them, "I speak not of myself, but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." He was so certain the Father dwelt in him that he replied to Philip's request, "Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us," with the direct question and challenge, "Have I been so long time with you and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

Jesus was fully aware that the surging power of victorious life had filled his being from the time of his baptism, when heaven opened and the Holy Ghost descended in the shape of a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, which said, "Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased." The fullness of the divine nature was accepted by him and appropriated through faith and obedience. There were no barriers or hindrances to the manifestation of God in and through him.

THE GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST was the good news that the life revealed in Christ was for all men. He counseled, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." Then there was the promise "Whosoever believeth in him [the Son of Man] should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his son to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved."

Jesus based eternal life on a relation to himself and his Father. "This is life eternal," he said, "that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." Knowledge of a person is only possible through direct contact and association, and Jesus assumed this very thing when he announced, "If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." Alignment of the life and will with God's will brings a permanent relation of mutual love, fellowship, and interests in which the resources of God and man are shared.

The early disciples of Jesus were aware that life of an eternal quality could only be experienced in a permanent association with Christ. John said, "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life." Paul testified out of his living experience of eternal life when he wrote: "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." He was so overcome by the faith of Jesus Christ in himself and what had been done for him that he responded by living in such an intimate association with his Master that he was able to interpret his victorious life as the life of Christ within him. In this he verified the promise of Jesus: "I will pray the Father and he will give you another comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of Truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you and shall be in you. I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you."

The Apostle Paul was well aware of the means by which disciples achieved the abundant life here and now and came to be consciously aware of Christ's presence within them. To him faith was the secret. He prayed that the Ephesian saints, whose only partial conversion left them struggling to live the Christian life by human effort alone, "be strengthened with might by his spirit in the inner man." He also prayed that Christ might dwell in their hearts by faith; and that they might be filled with all the fullness of God.

FAITH WAS AND IS the answer in every age. While those claiming to be the chosen and elect of God may refuse to receive and appropriate the divine life which is offered to them in Christ Jesus, the certain promise is that "those who receive him" are given "power to become the sons of God, even them that believe on his name."

The more abundant life promised by Jesus is offered to every member of the human race today. God loves the world and longs for the happiness of all. In the very nature of things the only type of life he can approve, support, and perpetuate is that revealed in his beloved Son. It alone has the quality which is eternal. As men believe that Jesus is God's ideal and accept him by faith into the innermost depths of their being, giving him a permanent home, acting on the principle that he is there and that they have been joined unto him, a fellowship and partnership is established in which Christ comes into his own and again tabernacles in the flesh. God is today working to come to his own and impart unto them the more abundant and victorious life, and the world is eagerly awaiting the "manifestation of the sons of God."

"Come and Follow Me" - By Marie Gosline

DO YOU ALL REMEMBER the story of the rich young man who came to Jesus and asked, "What good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" When Jesus repeated some of the commandments, the man said, "All these things have I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?" Then Jesus answered, "If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and follow me."

What an invitation! Jesus offered his hand to the rich man. He offered him a new way of life—a new way of living that was full of hope and joy. He offered him a life of service.

How many of us today need to have a new way of living? How many of us become so involved in the work that lies before us each day we forget the more important tasks? When evening comes, does it find us wealthier spiritually? Does evening find us at peace with ourselves? Or do we need to sell and give and follow? Should Jesus come today, would he need to say to us, "Give to the poor," or have we progressed far enough down that long road to know that "everyone that hath forsaken houses, brethren, or sisters or father . . . or lands for my name's sake shall receive a hundredfold and shall inherit everlasting life"?

Some have pretentious homes furnished more beautifully than others; some have the knack of making money; some have the ability to save it. But what are these compared to eternal life? It isn't what one has that counts; the thing that matters is what one is. Therein lies the whole story. We have seen some who were "little lower than angels" living in huts, and we also have seen little less than devils living in mansions. How little it matters what one has!

THERE IS THE STORY of a rich man—another rich man—who was ill and in bed. He had some of his money changed into silver so he could feel it in his fingers. Then he spread it out before him on the bed. He played with it for a while, then picked up a dime—the thinnest dime in the lot. He held it lovingly for a while, then laid it aside. He put his head back on the pillow and wept—he could not take even the thinnest dime with him when he died! Had he only opened his heart so that Jesus might speak to him, how much the Master could have told him! Surely we can all hear the words, "Sell that thou hast, give to the poor; come and follow me."

How many of us today wander aimlessly along, forgetting our brothers who are less fortunate than we? How many of us let jealousy and pride stand in our way? Instead of helping our brothers, do we make the road a little rougher for them, the burdens a little heavier for them to carry? You speak of sin? What of these two—jealousy and pride? Surely our material possessions do not mean more to us than eternal life. Surely it will not be necessary for Jesus to tell a Latter Day Saint, "Sell that thou hast and give to the poor." Can each one of us accept that gracious invitation, "Come, and follow me"?

Baptism For the Eight-Year-Old?

By MARGARET GIBSON

MANY CONSCIENTIOUS parents have asked whether they should have their children baptized at the age of eight years. Their objections usually fall into two or three lines of reasoning.

There are those who believe that a child is too young at eight to know what he is doing. Others feel that a child cannot be taught enough in that time to be prepared for baptism. Still a third group of people feels that a child should have the opportunity to learn the differences between the various churches before he makes his choice—that anything other than this denies him his free agency.

Let us make it clear that no child should be baptized against his will, that he should certainly know as much as a normal eight-year-old can grasp of the message and purpose of the church before he takes this step, and that he should not be deliberately kept in ignorance of the beliefs of other churches. It is our purpose in this article to look upon the instruction God has given to us, more as a challenge than anything else.

In Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4, we have direct instruction from God on this matter.

And again, inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance, faith in Christ the son of the living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands when eight years old, the sin shall be on the head of the parents; for this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, and their children shall be baptized for the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of hands; and they shall also teach their children to pray, and to walk uprightly before the Lord.

Zion is a condition as well as a place. Parents brought up in the church have an advantage over those whose children are partly grown when they enter it. Family worship, grace at the table, and an atmosphere of godliness should be part of their lives. Frederick M. Smith made the statement several years ago that child training should begin with the grandparents. Zion homes do have this advantage.

It is true that if we wait until a child is seven and a half years of age and then buy a quarterly on baptism and another on faith and another on repentance, we can hardly expect to help him make adequate preparation in the remaining months before baptism. There are conscientious parents who have taught youngsters in this time and have given them a good conception of the truth, but parents in Zion, with children born in Zion, can only be considered neglectful if they wait until it is nearly time for baptism before they give necessary instruction.

When can a child learn to pray? He can learn to pray as the parents do. A youngster of two can pray in words and in attitude of mind and spirit. Children like to imitate. If they see their parents praying together, they will slip over and kneel quietly beside them and look up expectantly for prompting. They will bow their heads when the blessing is asked, and if asked in their turn, they will take their part with genuine reverence. A child who is reared in a righteous home will probably not remember when he learned to pray. It is a natural part of his growth.

God does not ask us that we teach our children the entire history of the church before they are baptized. That isn't necessary. He does ask that we teach them about repentance, about Jesus, about faith in God, about the meaning of baptism, and about the gift of the Holy Ghost. His intent is for us so to bring them up in the knowledge of the kingdom that when they come to the age of accountability, they will feel a responsibility to help God and Jesus build that kingdom.

How can we teach them about repentance? They will not grasp the doctrine of the atonement all at once, but they can learn it as a part of their own experience. Children make mistakes, they disobey us, and—let us say—break something as a result. They are instinctively sorry and will probably cry the first time. A child can be lifted, comforted, and told, "This happened because you disobeyed. But you won't do it again, will you?" The child will understand this. "All right, you are forgiven. Now go and play." There we have repentance—a turning away from sin—and forgiveness. And, if a parent continues to do this, the child soon learns. But if a parent forgives before true repentance is gained, the lesson is lost. One little child waited half an hour before saying, "Sorry." The parent went quietly about her work, and the little one was burdened in her soul. Finally, the child came over of her own accord and said, "Sorry, Mamma." "That's right," said her mother and kissed her. The child found real spiritual relief and returned to her play.

Parents must be consistent. To punish for an accident is unfair and muddles the real issue. When a child deliberately disobeys, he often sees the results of disobedience himself. If he does and is sorry, that is punishment enough. He repents.

A child can be led through his own experience to appreciate the sacrifice of Christ. He can learn how, by his own actions, he makes his parents suffer; and from this how God suffers from our misdeeds. As his mother and father must pay for his misdeeds, so God paid for ours with his most precious possession.

There was no other good enough to pay the price of sin,
He only could unlock the gate of heaven and let us in.

FAITH IN CHRIST—faith in God! How can we teach these to our children? First, we must believe them ourselves. We pray, and in our family circles, we pray out loud. We ask, believing we shall receive, and our children “feel” faith. But how very careful we need to be that we ask for the right things: help, courage, faith, kindness—not money, comfort, praise, and things of the world. How wise for us to say, “If it be thy will, Lord.”

Our children trust us, so we must be trustworthy. If we are and believe in a trustworthy God, they also will believe in him and in his Son. If we love him, they will love him. And from there to baptism: “I wish I had something to give Jesus,” thinks the little one. And the wise parent answers, “You have. There are many people who need help, and Jesus can’t do it all. He needs your help.”

“How can I help him? How will people know I’m one of his helpers?” “Well, by being baptized you become one of his family. You take his name, and then you belong to him. You show that you are sorry for wrong things in the past, and God washes these things out of your life, just as the water washes you clean.”

“But I’m so little.”

“Yes, but God has promised to give you a helper, and he calls this helper the Holy Spirit. After you are baptized, the elders will place their hands on your head and ask God to send you this Holy Spirit, and he will do it. In a little while, you find that something inside you tells you to do the right things, and as you obey this something (which is this Holy Spirit) you’ll find that you are able to help God more.”

Children want to do right. It is our charge to bring them up in the kingdom until they desire to serve in it. God never asks the impossible of us.

The all just and loving Father to whom free agency means more than it possibly can to us, asks only that we teach our children these things before they are eight years old. We know the gospel is true, so why should we teach our children any other faith? Answer their questions? Yes, by all means; as fairly and intelligently as we can. We must be sure we do not misrepresent other churches. But we do not give our children any physical food that we do not feel is the best for them, do we?

We feel that we must study and give them the best we know of in physical and spiritual training. Free agency exists all of one’s life. If, as a child grows older, he wants to know the differences, he should be told of them. He should be allowed to investigate; he should—even at the risk of a change in faith—be permitted his liberty of choice. But bring him up on the Bible, Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants. Teach him the principles of the gospel, as faithfully as you feed him his meals. Then when the time comes, he has standards by which to compare other ideas.

We cannot leave it all to the church school. “Inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, that teach them not—the sin be upon the heads of the parents.”

He who gives a child a treat
Makes joy-bells ring in heaven’s street;
And he who gives a child a home
Builds palaces in kingdom come;
And she who gives a baby birth Brings Savior Christ again to earth.

irresponsibility and despair? Its effect is to make man an automaton.

Many good people, some even among the Saints, thoughtlessly accept some of the incidental phases of this perverse doctrine, as heard in such expressions as “His time had come, and he had to go.” “Whatever happens has to be.” “Well! it had to be.”

There is nothing in this principle that harmonizes with the gospel of Christ, and it has no proper place in the lives of the children of God.

MAN’S DESTINY IN HIS OWN HANDS

The gospel is a harmonious and complete system of human redemption, but the doctrines of predestination, foreordination, election, and fatalism (or determinism), as they have been taught, are like discordant notes. They do not belong in the gospel, only as we have shown. We can afford to accept nothing that infringes the divine right of free agency and man’s accountability before God for his actions, or that casts doubts upon the justice and mercy of God. Men cannot afford to put a strained interpretation upon uncertain passages of Scripture, when such interpretation conflicts with a multitude of other passages which are clear and positive.

The broad teaching of Scripture is “Whosoever will” and “Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out.” To the first man, Adam, the Lord laid down the conditions of salvation which were for all men:

If thou wilt, turn unto me and hearken unto my voice, and believe, and repent of all thy transgressions, and be baptized, even in water, in the name of mine Only Begotten Son.

The decision was left to Adam, as it is to every man: “If thou wilt”—believing, obeying, relying on Christ, the Son of God. This is the way of salvation.

They Learn Young - By NAOMI RUSSELL

THE AVERAGE AGE of those who regularly attend Wednesday evening prayer service is probably somewhere between fifty and sixty. There may be a few League fellowships with an average age of eighteen or so, but I doubt that there is another midweek meeting anywhere patronized by worshipers so young as the one held at the home of Ruby and Raymond Johnson of Group 24 in Independence. For the past three years they and their neighbors, the Grover Knudsens, have invited the children of the neighborhood to "junior prayer meeting" on Wednesday evenings while their parents attend the regular service. In fact, it was the decrease in adult attendance that inspired the idea. When asked why they hadn't been coming to meeting, most of the mothers and fathers explained they just couldn't "because of the children." The cost of individual baby sitters for each family would have exhausted the group treasury in no time, but if all the youngsters were brought to one house, the problem could be solved easily.

And so it was. With no excuse for staying away, the Young Marrieds and the Older Marrieds too began going to prayer service again, and while they did, their four-to-twelve-year-olds had a wonderful time listening to stories told in their language by someone who enjoyed doing it. Occasionally a party was thrown in for good measure, and (whether they realized the ulterior motive or not) the children learned to play as well as worship together.

IT'S WORKING," agreed the Johnsons, the Knudsens, and Junior Pastor Melvin Knussman at the end of the first year, "but we still haven't fulfilled the real need. These children should be getting some actual prayer meeting experience so that when they outgrow this group, they can go to an adult service prepared to participate in it."

The "conditioning" wasn't easy. The children were timid about praying aloud, and most of them seemed to have no idea whatsoever about how to testify. With untiring patience, Pastor Melvin explained over and over to them what a testimony is. Eventually the idea "took." Perhaps it was the definition offered by a ten-year-old that cleared things up: "A testimony is just like a story that's really happened to you."

With all of the mysticism removed, the children responded enthusiastically. The problem now is how to get them stopped rather than how to get them started. Likewise, there is little timidity about praying, and frequently during the prayer period several children stand at once to offer their brief supplications. The essence of most prayers is this: "Thank you, God, for this meeting. Bless those who are sick and those who couldn't come tonight. Help us to be better boys and girls. In Jesus' name, Amen."

There are variations, of course. One small girl adds, "Thank you for this beautiful house to worship in," and another, "Help us not to get lost in the dark when we go home." Some very pointed requests are voiced too: "Help the speaker to teach us what we should know." "Help those who aren't here to want to come next week." "Help us to do the right thing even when it's hard to do."

Naturally, there are problems. It's difficult to plan a service that holds equal appeal for the preschoolers and those almost ready for junior high. What the older children like most, the young ones are apt to "squirm" through, and what produces wide-eyed appreciation in the tiny tots may bore the adolescents. Ideally there should be a separate service for each age group, but there are not enough leaders with the required amount of patience to "train them up in the way they should go" nor enough Johnsons and Knudsens who are willing to open their homes each week to a lively congregation of youngsters.

IT'S A FIELD for pioneering—one that is practically untouched as yet in most branches. It serves a very different purpose than church school, which is, as the name implies, a school designed to teach children about the church. Prayer service is a school too, but not the "read your lesson so you can answer all the questions" type. It is for the education of the soul. A child deserves to know how to pray and voice his testimony publicly as well as how to recite the date the church was organized and the number of books in the Bible. If there were more of this kind of training, family worship would (parents' willing) become a natural, and there would be less of the prayer meeting phobia that many adults seem to suffer from. People enjoy doing the things they know how to do. It is only when they don't know how that they hesitate to take part in a service.

If a child has an opportunity to learn along with others of his age, there is less fear of criticism. If he stumbles over his words or forgets in the middle of a sentence, there may be some chuckles, but they'll come from others who are apt to do the same thing. There are none of the long, tiring prayers or repetitious testimonies so often heard in an adult service. With juniors, everything is brief and colorful.

If you have the same problem in your branch that Group 24 had three years ago, why not provide a separate meeting for the youngsters? It's a good investment in the future.

The Irvingites - Who Were They?

IN PREPARING my church school lesson recently, I came across a letter written in Barnsley, England, April 21, 1835. In the History of the Church, Volume I, page 556, the letter is introduced by this brief statement:

The following is the copy of a letter from certain members of the Irvingite church (so-called) in England, presented to certain elders of the Church of Latter Day Saints, in the evening of the 10th of June, 1835, by a gentleman named in the same, at the time calling himself a communicant and preacher of that church.

Excerpts from the letter follow:

To the Saints of the Most High.

Dear Brethren in the Lord: At a council of the pastors of our church, held March 28, 1835, upon the propriety of the Rev. John Hewitt visiting you, it was resolved and approved that as he had an anxious desire to go to America to see the things that are spoken of in one of your papers brought here by a merchant from New York, he should have, as he desired, the sanction of the council, and if it pleased the Lord, his approval. The Lord hath seen our joy and gladness to hear that he was raising up a people for himself in that part of the New World, as well as here. O, may our faith increase that he may have evangelists, apostles, and prophets, filled with the power of the Spirit, and performing his will in destroying the works of darkness.

The Rev. Mr. Hewitt was Professor of Mathematics in Rotherham Independent Church. He commenced preaching the doctrines we taught about two years since, and was excommunicated. Many of his flock followed him, so that he was eventually installed in the same church, and the Lord's work prospered. As he is a living epistle, you will have, if all be well, a full explanation. Many will follow, should he approve of the country, etc., who will help the cause, because the Lord hath favored them with this world's goods. We had an utterance during our meeting, which caused us to sing for joy. The Lord was pleased with our brother's holy determination to see you; and we understand that persecution had been great among you, or would be, but we were commanded not to fear, for he would be with us.

Grace, mercy, and peace be unto you from God our Father, and from the Spirit, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

I am, dear sir, your brother in the gospel,

THOMAS SHAW.

Barnsley, April 21, 1835.

AFTER READING THE LETTER I wanted to know more about the Irvingites, so I consulted an encyclopedia and found the group took the name from a Scottish clergyman by the name of Edward Irving born in 1792.

In his early life as an ordained minister, he proved a brilliant orator. He went early to London, becoming very popular, the like of which had not up to that time been known. But his orthodox, staid superiors could not stand such popularity and leadership among the people who by large numbers followed him. So, in 1832, he was charged with heresy, a common practice of those afraid of their positions. He appealed in vain against dismissal, failing in which he joined the Catholic Apostolic Church and became an outstanding pulpiteer for this organization, being ordained in 1833.

He was an advanced thinker, his views and beliefs being far in advance of his coreligionists in Europe. He believed in miracles, the gift of tongues, and prophecy. His Apostolic Church believed in twelve apostles, prophets, pastors, evangelists, bishops, the second coming of Christ, and the millennium. He died of tuberculosis in 1834.

In 1926 this Apostolic Church had thirty-six congregations in the United States with a membership of 6,346.

The Reverend Mr. Hewitt, referred to in the letter, was introduced to Joseph Smith, Jr., in June, 1835. Of this event our history states:

About this time I received an introduction to Mr. Hewitt, a preacher who had come out from Europe, with his lady,

By MARK H. SIEGFRIED

to examine this work, and, as he stated, was delegated by his church for this purpose. His interview was short, and he left with the understanding he would call again and renew his investigations. As he did not return according to agreement, and hearing he was at Fairport, the Council of the Presidency sent him the following letter:

To the Rev. Mr. Hewitt.

Sir: In consequence of your not returning as we understood you at your introduction to us, it was resolved and approved in council, on the evening of the 14th instant, that the bearer, Oliver Cowdery, one of the Presiding Elders of our church, should proceed to Fairport, and ascertain if possible the cause of your delay; and this is done as one reason that we feel an anxious desire for the salvation of the souls of men, and to satisfy your inquiries concerning the religion we profess. . . . It is the sincere desire of the council that Mr. Hewitt return, that we may satisfy him concerning our religion, and he satisfy us concerning his; for we feel as great a desire for the welfare of his people as he can for ours.

With respects, etc.,
W. W. PHELPS, Clerk.

Elder Cowdery repaired immediately to Fairport, and on the day following reported to the council that Mr. Hewitt was not in the place; that he left their letter with Mrs. Hewitt, who informed him that her "husband had frequently spoken of his wish to become further acquainted with the people whom he had come out from Europe to see." But the next we heard of the Reverend John Hewitt was that he had opened a school in Painesville, Ohio. Mr. Hewitt was elder of the Irvingite Church, in Barnsley, England, and received a delegation from that church, as expressed in a letter from Mr. Shaw, of April 21, to visit the saints in America and ascertain their faith and principles; and if Mr. Hewitt found them as they expected, the saints in America might expect help from them (the church in Barnsley), as they were rich in temporal things, and had received the gift of tongues in the church. —Page 567.

The experience indicates the thinking in England was similar to that advocated by the Saints in America and that the clergy in England was about as receptive to the new thinking as the clergymen of America were to the new thinking advocated by Joseph Smith, Jr.

The Effectiveness of Prayer

About three years ago my husband was seriously injured when a train crashed into his car, completely demolishing it and carrying him half a mile up the track before stopping. He suffered a fractured skull, brain injury, and broken ribs. As a result of his injuries, he also contracted pneumonia and hovered between life and death for weeks. Three months later, my son was in an automobile collision and suffered concussion of the brain. Upon regaining consciousness five days later, he completely lost his memory. His amnesia was so complete that he even had to learn to talk again. As a result of prayer, both my husband and son have fully recovered from their injuries.

I have been a partial invalid for the last two years. I have had several strokes, each one increasingly severe, and various parts of my body are becoming paralyzed. About a month ago, when I was particularly ill, the doctor told my children that I may not recover. However, my daughters called the elders to come and administer to me and since then I have had no more seizures. I am regaining my strength and am able to get around a bit now. I thank God for his wonderful blessings.

Consider the Children

Much has been said and written concerning marriage and the home. During the war, many mothers felt the necessity of working to help balance the family budget. Spiritual growth in most of these homes was at a standstill throughout this period. The children continued to grow physically, but little religious training was given them. Thus a great responsibility and privilege was neglected because there "wasn't time" for family worship and instruction.

A few words may help to determine the course of a young person's life. I have found that having faith in God and the desire to do right regardless of my personal desires has brought rich spiritual experiences. I shall never forget the thrill attending my first reunion last summer brought. I returned home tired but grateful for the experience. The classes, sermons, and fellowship have truly enriched my life. I realized more than ever before my responsibility to my husband, who is a member of the priesthood, and my children. Although we needed financial help because of illness, I decided not to take a job outside of our home. Then soon after reunion I began taking in children as boarders.

God has been good to us. He has blessed us with patience and understanding and has given us strength to do our work. At night when prayers are said and the lights are out, we feel that God has guided our feet, our hands, and our words throughout the day.

Report From Atmore, Alabama

We are a small group of Saints who meet in the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. O. Harper each Sunday for church school and preaching service. Elder D. F. Hobbs, Sr., who lives at Century, Florida (about fifteen miles from Atmore), is our pastor. Although few in number, we have official approval to purchase lots on which to erect a church. We hope that our children will find comfort and courage in this house of worship and the inspiration to prepare for the movement to Zion. We ask the prayers of Saints everywhere that we may meet each day with calmness, meekness, and fortitude and direct our energy to the work of the Father.

From an Isolated Member

Since my wife died on February 5, 1948, I have been very lonely. I have been a member of the Reorganized Church for forty-two years. I ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints that I may continue faithful, and I will appreciate hearing from other members.

An Answer to Prayer

Several years ago I was teaching in a Kansas high school and rooming with a Baptist family. These people did not believe in the miracle of healing but thought that it would come sometime in the future. Then one Thursday evening their three-year-old grandson was brought to their home. He had had a tonsillectomy the previous day and, although he was a little pale, he seemed to feel fine. On Friday, he began hemorrhaging and had to be taken to the doctor three times for treatment. When I came home about nine in the evening, the parents were frantic. I suggested they call the surgeon who had performed the operation. He recommended an adrenalin solution, but the local druggist didn't have any. As plans were discussed for taking him to a hospital in a neighboring city, we noticed that the child's face and hands were very cold. The grandmother said, "He'll not live to go to the hospital." While members of the family were in the adjoining room, I remained alone with the child. No elders were near, but I remembered the statement in James 5: 16 that the prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Then I placed my hands on the child and prayed very simply that God would save his life. When the family returned to the room, the bleeding had stopped. Later I told the father what I had done, giving God the credit for saving his son's life. He said, "Well, it was time someone thought to pray." The following day the child was able to play with other youngsters.

God does answer prayer and bless his children when there is no one else to help them. I am grateful for this experience which confirms my belief in the power of prayer. Pray for me that I may be healed of my infirmities and always be worthy of God's blessings.

Request to Contact

I will appreciate having members of the church contact my son, Silas Dey (age 21), 703 South Ashland Avenue, Chicago 7, Illinois. He is attending school in Chicago. I would also like to have Saints call on Mr. and Mrs. Paul Dey, 1109 University Street, Wichita, Kansas.

Letter of Testimony

I was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1941 at Makiki Branch in Honolulu by Brother H. I. Velt. Soon after my baptism, I became quite ill. While walking to the elder's home for administration, I felt that I could never make it. Then the thought, "O ye of little faith," came to me, and I walked on. I received an immediate healing during the administration. Back on the mainland three years later, I was bothered with a pain in my right arm. The doctor diagnosed it as rheumatism, and I began taking treatments for it. After taking "shots" for nearly two years, I decided to see another physician, who said I had a tumor in an advanced stage and would need an operation. Before going to surgery I received administration; the operation was successful and I soon regained my health. Special prayers were offered for me in San Leandro, San Francisco, and Honolulu; I cannot put into words the wonderful feeling that came to me when I knew my friends were praying for me. My recovery was considered so remarkable that I was the subject of discussion at a class held for doctors and students.

I have much to learn about the church yet. There is no Reorganized Church in the town where we live, so I must read the Herald and church books to learn more of the work. I thank all who remembered me in my time of need, and I pray God will bless his people everywhere.

Children Healed by Administration

When our oldest boy was five or six years old, he became a victim of tuberculosis. Our doctor told us that there was no hope for him, and that he would live only a short while. When he continued to suffer more and more, we called an elder to administer to him. He regained his health rapidly and was able to go to school in the fall. Several years later our daughter was in an automobile accident and received severe abdominal injuries. Again the doctor predicted recovery was impossible, but through administration she was marvelously blessed. All who knew of the accident marveled at her recovery. We as a family are truly grateful for these blessings.

I enjoy reading the Herald and often lend ours to nonmembers. I put the church school papers in a loose leaf notebook and lend them to others to read. I would like to thank the contributors who make these fine publications available.

I feel that I cannot do enough to help God in his work to pay for the blessings we have received from him. I know of a certainty that my Redeemer lives, and that grace and power are in his hand. I pray we all may see our responsibility to our Heavenly Father and want to work for him.

Helped by Blue Pencil Notes

Presiding Evangelist Elbert A. Smith recently received a letter of appreciation from Albert and Twyla Scherer, missionaries at Rotterdam, Holland, telling how they were helped in a period of discouragement by what Brother Smith had written. The following is quoted from the letter:

"One evening I slouched down into an easy chair to relax, picked up the Saints' Herald of March 5, 1949, and on page 6 I saw your Blue Pencil Notes, 'Strong Swimmers in Distress.' I read it three times, and my heart overflowed with thankfulness. It was just what I needed. I knew that Sister Scherer would likewise profit from it, so I let her read it, and she, too, was lifted up.

"Brother Elbert, thanks for writing those words. You are truly fulfilling your function as 'Father' of the church. May God continue to bless you.

"We're back in the work now, stronger than ever, and once again convinced that God will not forsake us.

"Sister Scherer and I again express our appreciation for your comforting and encouraging words, and we pray that good health may continue to be your lot.

"ALBERT SCHERER."

Asks for Prayers

The past years have been sorrowful ones for me. I lost most of my earthly possessions during the depression, and my wife died in 1938. Then I became ill and was hospitalized at Excelsior Springs, Missouri. I am better now and able to do my work, but I don't have the privilege of meeting with the Saints. Please pray for me.

I wish to thank all who remembered me in prayer when I was so deeply in need. The Great Healer has been and is still very near to me. I cannot find words to tell of the wonderful blessing that has been mine. My desire is to continue in His service and be a true helpmeet to my husband in his work. My prayer is that others who are in need may receive God's blessings also.

The Dairy of William F. Donaldson

My father, William Ford Donaldson, began his diary in January, 1874, just before his eighteenth birthday. It was in a ruled book such as was probably used as a day-book for store entries, and on the title page was written the following:

"To all whom it may concern: This book is intended as a synopsis of the writer's life and labor. It also contains a correct account of the weather from the first day of January, 1874.

"To relatives and friends, this volume is respectfully dedicated, and may they find some pleasure in perusing the words herein written."

Reading this statement of purpose written when he was a lad not yet eighteen, and knowing that he steadfastly kept the diary for nearly seventy-five years, we can feel from that very first page the quiet determination and the sincerity that has been so large a part of his character.

His diary from day to day gives the story of his life, a fairly good picture of the farming methods of the 1870's, and also the social life among the young people of his community. He had been a regular attendant at church and Sunday school over a period of several years, and was by nature a serious-minded young man, reaching out for whatever tended to broaden his intellectual and spiritual life. A year of close association with David Kennedy and his wife Nellie, with Joseph Lambert and with Elder Charles Derry, all members of the Reorganized Church, probably influenced him to join the church at Magnolia, Iowa, on July 22, 1877.

When he retired in 1935, it was not to sit in idleness, but to start doing some of the things he had planned over the years—repairs to the home, the resetting of his roses, the making of new trellises, the bracing of a grape arbor. But principally, he looked forward to making the scrapbooks he had planned, sorting his newspaper clippings saved for years. And all the time more events of local or national scope were crowding into the daily papers, and he saw his scrapbook-making stretch out ahead of him so fast and so far that he could not hope to catch up. But it gave him an impelling urge to keep abreast of the times, to keep looking to the future, and he worked frantically to keep up with the war news from Europe and the South Pacific. He was very methodical in his work, and each book as it was filled was indexed and bound. The books increased until they numbered considerably over a hundred, and just a few years ago, he donated them to the Jackson County Library in Independence.

Report From Holden, Missouri

There is a large group of young adults here who enjoy many activities together. They study Overviews of Latter Day Saintism during the church school hour on Sunday morning and present the worship service one morning each month. They also are in charge of some Sunday evening meetings and sponsor branch night occasionally. One night during the month is reserved for a special activity—educational, missionary, worship, or recreation. This group also publishes a monthly news sheet called "The Enlightener." This is distributed free of charge to all members as the young adults finance it by serving suppers. It is hoped "The Enlightener" will prove an effective means of reinteresting members who do not attend regularly.

Missionary John Puckett was with us recently and did much good work in the young adult group. Before he left for his next assignment, he baptized nineteen new members.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

To Susan

By GEORGIA METCALF STEWART

THIS DAY IS YOURS, little girl—yours to live in, yours to laugh in, yours to play in. So live fully, laugh abundantly, and play hard. As I go about my morning tasks, I am happy to have you here in our own back yard. This is our home, little girl. This yard is Eden, the sweetest place I know, and you, my dear, help so much to make it so.

Run fast, little girl. How can little feet be so swift? Squeal and giggle all you please, for those are a little girl's rights. There are your swing and sand box. Daddy made them for you. He loves you, too, you know.

Giggle with glee when your rabbit twitches his nose or shakes his funny ears. Try to catch your little dog, but pat him softly and be kind. We want you to be gentle. Play, little girl, enjoy today. Tomorrow comes so fast. And yet—tomorrow can be happy, too. We'll help you make it so.

That butterfly is much too swift for you, little girl, but try to catch him if you will. And if, looking up, you stub your toe, run to me—I'll be waiting to help you—but still, look up. Go ahead and pick that precious flower I've tended with such care. After all, it is not mine, but his who made it—who gave us you. Perhaps he will teach you with that very flower some things I would but cannot say—beauty, power, magnificence.

Ride your tricycle around the old apple tree, but remember—no green apples. There are lessons we must learn. There are laws we have to hew to. Your toys are waiting. These material things we can give you—make them with our hands. But there are other things we are not so sure we can supply, We cannot wrap them in gay paper and hand them to you and then relax knowing they are yours. But we will try and hope and pray.

Yes, play, little girl. Watch the birds and bugs and flowers. Observe them carefully. They are your friends. Play until you know the time of day has come when Daddy will soon be home from work. I see you at the gate and need not look to know that he is here. You welcome him with chubby arms and one-breath summaries of your day. Your enthusiasm bears us up when our own begins to lag.

And when, at last, this day is done and two tired feet and sleepy eyes come in from play, we'll hold you for a moment, then tuck you in and say a prayer. God will help us keep you safe—we know he will, because we know he loves you too. He will help you blend your days into a future filled with purpose, and where our human efforts fail, he will take your hand and make you sure.

Growing Up

See those little fingermarks along the wall?

No, I see a little boy grown tall,
A life of vigor and of warmth
Unfolding.

He soon will care no more to press small hands

Against the pale, pink wall.
Soon he will be beyond the joy of smudgy fingerprints

Which so absorb him now.

And look! He's growing up!

These two right here are higher than the last—

But each a precious mark of love
Upon my heart.

May magazines contain some excellent articles on widely varying subjects. Trading with friends will help you to get the best material from a variety of magazines.

"Susan's Strawberry Shortcake," featured in Good Housekeeping is worth trying if you like a biscuit shortcake; it is a new and delicious version, very quickly made.

"What Breaks It Up?" is a commentary on a thousand letters received by Good Housekeeping Magazine in answer to this question referring to marriage. It is especially interesting as an analysis by ordinary people, not experts.

Three articles in Woman's Home Companion touch on vital issues: "Cemeteries, a Public Problem" presents facts which we seldom encounter until we are faced with grief. "Alive and Kicking" tells of a Colorado plan for saving premature babies, which could be set up anywhere. "Horror Is Not Enough" deals with traffic safety and what can be done about it.

"Book on Babies," American Home, lists the latest books on child-care.

"How Poor Are the Navajos?" in Family Circle not only discusses the present plight of the Navajos, but puts emphasis on the qualities of spirit and mind.

"Washington's Most Successful Lobbyist," in Reader's Digest is a chapter in the story of the progress of our democracy dealing with the Japanese-American portion of our population.

"First Photos Through Palomar's Giant Eye," in Collier's for May 7 is probably of greater importance than most people realize. It is a challenge to our intellects, "The growing certainty that there is order and plan out there . . . is a tremendous aid to human faith."

"The Day We Flew the Kite," Parents' Magazine, is good for the soul. It may bring back memories of some magic day and help you to realize that a child's best heritage is the memory of happy experiences.

"When Your Children Make You Angry," Parents' Magazine, is a discussion-provoking article for both parents.

"Mental Illness Begins at Home," Ladies' Home Journal, is another article that should be read by all adults. "Mental health throughout life is largely determined during childhood, when one is most dependent upon parental love."

"The Overtired Child," Ladies' Home Journal, is a discussion by Dr. Bundesen of a problem too often unrecognized in our busy modern life.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only those questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Was the Urim and Thummim ever used by anyone except nonpriesthood, like Joseph Smith at first, and the Aaronic?

ANSWER:

Assuming the intent of the question to be whether the Urim and Thummim was used by other than those holding the priesthood and those of the Aaronic order, we may say that it has at various times been in the possession of men of the Melchisedec priesthood and the Aaronic priesthood. In the case of Joseph Smith, it was given him for the purpose of translating the Book of Mormon before he had received ordination to either the Aaronic or Melchisedec priesthood. However, Joseph was called to be a prophet and priest and a servant of Jesus Christ and was, according to the revelation of God, a legal heir of the priesthood (Doctrine and Covenants 84:3). Bringing forth the word of the gospel was of prior need to teaching and ministering that gospel, hence the giving of the Urim and Thummim and the translating of the Book of Mormon before the giving of the priesthood and the organization of the church.

From the beginning of the world (and the Urim and Thummim is said to have been prepared in the beginning [Mosiah 12:19]), the Lord has retained the right of ownership over the instrument, placing it with whomsoever he chooses and withdrawing it whenever he wills. The earliest mention of it was when the Lord gave it to the brother of Jared in the mount as he appeared to him, by whom it was brought to the western continent some time after the flood, where it was kept many years. The next mention of it is when the Lord gave it to Moses, probably upon Mount Sinai, who was commanded to place it in the breastplate made for Aaron. Aaron, his sons and successors, were to have possession and use of it.

The Urim and Thummim remained in Israel in care of the Aaronic priesthood until near the time of the captivity, the last mention being found in

I Samuel 28:6, some 400 years after Moses. The Talmud states that with the pre-exilic prophets the use of the Urim and Thummim ceased (Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia). The second temple built after the return from Babylon did not have it.

The Book of Mormon picks up the thread of history relative to this instrument here, and more than 500 years after Lehi left Jerusalem (600 B. C.) mentions its possession among the Nephites in America—"They had been handed down from the time that Lehi left Jerusalem" (Mosiah 13:1, 2). The instrument had evidently come down through the line of kings with the records and other archives. Whether or not all these kings held the priesthood we do not know.

In 1827 the Urim and Thummim came into the possession of Joseph Smith where it remained until after the translation was completed. Then it was returned to the hands of the angel who came to receive it. This was probably early in 1830.

QUESTION:

Does your church believe that Adam lived in Missouri?

ANSWER:

A short answer could be given—"No."

In 1838 a settlement of church people was made on the Missouri River five or six miles from Gallatin. There were two hills, on one of which was a pile of stones, something like an altar, about sixteen feet long by nine or ten feet wide; the height at the ends was two and one-half feet above the surface of the ground, the center between four and five feet. Since the place was called Adam-ondi-Ahman, in later years there arose a story that this was the grave of Adam. No such assertion was made by Joseph Smith, Jr. He did call it a "Nephite tower or altar."

In the Saints' Herald, Volume 51, page 827, (1904) in answer to inquiry, the late President Joseph Smith discussed this story of its being the grave of Adam. In this he stated plainly that whether it is or is not "does not affect our work or faith . . . There is no legitimate proof" offered. No written statements by the prophet were published at the time. The story appeared in a number of publications, but it appears to be entirely without authentic support. Heman C. Smith stated, "Where these traditions originated we do not know, for there is no record of Latter Day Saints claiming that Adam was buried there."—Journal of History, IX, page 139. In 1854, nearly ten years after his death, a statement was printed alleging that Joseph Smith said, "by the mouth of the Lord it was named Adam-ondi-Ahman, because," said he, "it is the place where Adam shall come to visit his people, or the ancient of days shall sit as spoken by Daniel the Prophet."—Millennial Star, XVI, page 152. But this history was "revised" and altered after the death of Joseph Smith. Those who like long inferences and guesses might claim to find some basis in the hymn, "Adam-ondi-Ahman." It appears to have been used in 1838.

When the Saints' Harp, with something over a thousand hymns, was printed in 1870 (Joseph Smith serving as chairman of the selecting committee), this hymn was omitted.

Clearly the church does not and never has had any belief that Adam lived in Missouri. Individuals may affirm or deny as they choose.

QUESTION:

Is the practice of the bride and groom kneeling before the minister for a blessing a part of our church marriage ceremony?

ANSWER:

No. The required covenant for use in a marriage ceremony is given in the Doctrine and Covenants 111:2. What is given there should be a part of all our church ceremonies. However, it is too brief for a full ceremony, and other features are generally added along customary Christian lines, and three types of services have been suggested in the Priesthood Manual. Kneeling for a blessing at the end of the wedding ceremony is optional. Some couples wish to include this feature; others do not. There is no rule either for including or excluding it. Features of the ceremony are subject to arrangement between the couple and the officiating minister.

Briefs

Pastors or branch correspondents are encouraged to write to The Saints' Herald News Editor, Herald House, 103 South Osage, Independence, Missouri, for a list of helps for news reporters.

FLINT, MICHIGAN.—President Israel A. Smith stopped in Flint on his return trip from Detroit in March, and preached to a large congregation. Mrs. Emma McConley visited the branch during April and told of her experiences in Europe with her husband, Myron McConley.

As a result of cottage meetings held in Flint during March by the pastor and local priesthood, sixteen candidates were ready for baptism on Easter Sunday. The services started with a sunrise service at six o'clock, followed by breakfast served by the women's department at 7:30 and the baptisms at 9. The following became members of the church: Mr. and Mrs. Donald M. Easlick, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Upsel Sumner, Mr. and Mrs. Alva Green, Gary Finch, Floria Finch, Donald Finch, Gwen Finch, Carol Thulen, Alden Vanderkarr, Rosalie Whitcomb, Kathleen Whitcomb, Forest Nickerson, and Claude Sansan.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—A series of sermon lectures was held in the Mayfair room of Hotel Sinton in Cincinnati during the last week in March by Loyd R. Adams, Southern Ohio District missionary. The first ordination service ever held in Cincinnati took place April 24, with District President F. T. Rockwell in charge, assisted by S. E. Dixson of Dayton and Claude Barker of Middletown, Ohio. The ordinations of Everett L. Smith to the Melchisedec priesthood and W. T. Cline to the Aaronic priesthood are felt to be a step forward in the work of the church in this group.

OWEN SOUND DISTRICT.—Sunday, April 24, at Owen Sound, Ontario, the district held a special conference to approve the call of fourteen men to the priesthood. Bishop Joseph Baldwin and Missionary Louis Zonker were in attendance. The day's activities began at 9:30 with prayer service in charge of District President Gordon Farrow. Bishop Baldwin preached at 11. Business session was held at 2. At 3 o'clock, three classes were held. Mrs. George Mortimore, district women's leader, took charge of a women's class, Bishop Baldwin spoke to the priesthood, and Brother Zonker spoke to the pastors. An invitation from the Grand Valley Branch to hold the next annual conference in Grand Valley, Ontario, was accepted.

GULF STATES DISTRICT.—One hundred seventy-five women, representing some nineteen groups and branches of the Gulf States District, met at the reunion grounds, Brewton, Alabama, Sunday, April 24, and enjoyed an inspirational one-day retreat of study and worship.

The morning activities consisted of the opening session and introduction by District Leader Lula Jernigan, followed by a talk on the topic, "Stewardship of Ourselves and Our Possessions," given by Mrs. Evelyn Breshears, Pensacola, Florida.

The district leader of music, Mrs. Helen McCall, brought to the women a deeper appreciation of the finer arts through her program, "Appropriate Music." Mrs. Maurine Crownover, Mobile, Alabama, presented a challenge in her talk, "Women's Contribution in Evangelism."

A covered dish luncheon was served at noon. The afternoon program consisted of a short play, "Friendly Visiting," presented by the McKenzie Branch, and a lecture on helps for the women's work of the branch, given by Sister Martha Alford, Columbia, Alabama.

The day's activities ended with a worship service, "Forward Look," planned and led by Sister Crownover.

SANTA ROSA, CALIFORNIA.—High Priest Robert L. Bishop took office as mayor of this city on May 3 of this year. Brother and Sister Bishop made Santa Rosa their home in 1944, after being with Ford Motor Company in Detroit, Kansas City, and New York. They have four daughters, Beverly, Mavis, Marilyn, and Peggy, all of whom also live in California. Quoting from the Press Democrat, Mayor Bishop says, "To keep government in the hands of the people, we must broaden the base of community participation. We must all do our share, and while we're doing it, train young people for the job of city administration when we step out. I feel I have a right to expect, that when I step out at the end of a year—and I have no intention of running again for the city council—there will be someone with the same disinterested attitude as mine to step in and take my place." Santa Rosa has a city manager type of government. The council of five men, with the mayor at the head, is elected and is the policy-making board. Brother Bishop is the owner and manager of Bishop Motors in Santa Rosa. The clipping from the Santa Rosa paper stated, "Mrs. Bishop applies good management to her home in the same way her husband applies it to his business and city government."

DES MOINES, IOWA.—The Fort Des Moines group has secured the use of a government building at no cost to themselves for their meetings. It was a mess hall for Wacs during the war. The only stipulation in its use is that they must keep it clean. The first meeting was May 15 with an attendance of fifty-one. The next Sunday the attendance had risen to fifty-three.

SEATTLE DISTRICT.—At a district conference held in Tacoma on April 23 and 24, the following recommendations for priesthood ordination were made: From Puyallup, Dale Wheeler to the office of teacher and James Wheeler and Wilbert Dentland to the office of deacon; from Seattle First Branch, Charles Skoor to the office of deacon; from Seattle Second Branch, Pershing Tousley to the office of priest; from Tacoma Branch, Lloyd Thomas to the office of deacon and Kenneth LeRay to the office of teacher; from Neilton Mission, Ralph Fishel to the office of elder and Edward Fishel to the office of priest.

Because of ill health, High Priest Alma Johnson has resigned from the position of district president. Apostle George Mesley, as minister in charge, accepted this resignation and asked the conference, by telegram, to accept his nomination of Elder Granville Swenson. Brother Swenson accepted the nomination and subsequent election and the ordination was arranged for at a later time.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—Sixty-five St. Louis District Zion's Leaguers provided a warm welcome for thirty-five Stone Church Senior League members and their leader, Sister Doris Oakman from Independence, Missouri, when they arrived in St. Louis for the district conference May 14 and 15.

An afternoon of games Saturday and firelight singing that evening put the two groups in a deep feeling of fellowship for the full program on Sunday. Meanwhile, Saturday evening, President F. Henry Edwards and Sister Alice Edwards addressed men's and women's groups at the St. Louis church.

Sunday morning began with prayer meetings for the combined Leagues and for adults, and these were followed by men's and women's classwork under Brother and Sister Edwards. President Edwards then used the conference theme, "Let Him In," for his sermon at the 11 o'clock service, where attendance was just under 500. Special music was contributed by young people.

The afternoon meeting, in charge of district Young People's Supervisor Eldon Dickens, was devoted solely to Leaguers and consisted principally of music by members of both groups. Sister Oakman and St. Louis Branch Supervisor Charles Johnson talked briefly.

Following this meeting, the Stone Church group boarded their bus for the return trip.—Reported by DON HUNSTEIN.

VANCOUVER, WASHINGTON.—Three babies have been blessed recently in this branch. Peggy Mareta, daughter of Ted and Hazel Keyes, was blessed on Easter Sunday by F. E. Chapman and Paul E. Fishel. Janis Yvonne, daughter of Thomas I. and Doris A. French, was blessed February 6 by Elders Fishel and Chapman. Kenton J. Ellithorpe was blessed May 8 by F. E. Chapman and W. W. Barker.—Reported by ROYDIE A. CHAPMAN.

WARRINGTON, LANCASTER, ENGLAND.—Fifty members of the Warrington church school attended a social evening Monday, May 2. Their thanks are extended to the Saints of Cincinnati, Ohio, who provided refreshments for this evening. Sister N. Dawson, who reports the occasion, reminds Saints' Herald readers that this was an extra special event because of shortages in England. Mrs. Thelma Cline of Cincinnati planned and supervised the gift.

ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI.—Brother John L. Bear was eighty years old on May 9. Over 200 people attended the reception held at his home. He organized the Second Church in St. Joseph in 1906 and was its pastor for eighteen years. He is state chaplain of the American War Dads, was twice president of the St. Joseph Real Estate Board, and was president of the St. Joseph Underwriters' Association. He is an honorary member of the W. C. T. U.

BEARDSTOWN, ILLINOIS.—On March 6, a rededication service for the newly decorated upper auditorium of the church was held. Eider O. C. Thomas, superintendent of Bluffs, Illinois, schools, presented the address. Illustrated slides and a lecture on the history of the church were presented by Harold Skiles at the evening service.

Three babies were recently blessed: Robert Kays, Kenneth Alcorn, and Scott Hay.

On Sunday, May 1, Harold Skiles and Harold Walker were ordained to the office of elder. The officiating ministers were Elders E. E. Thomas, Arthur Henson, and E. A. Kratzer.

Special pre-baptismal classes are being held each Sunday morning under the supervision of Pastor E. E. Thomas with Elder Harold Skiles in charge. An average of twenty-one children attend.—Reported by LUTHEA SKILES.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO.—Twenty-five men attended the Melchisedec Priesthood Institute at Colorado Springs Reunion grounds, May 14 and 15. Apostle Reed Holmes reports that it was an excellent experience. The discussions followed the themes of "building evangelism into the branch activities" and "improvement of public worship." Leaders present, besides Apostle Holmes, included Elbert A.

Schmidt, president of Kansas District, High Priest Ward Hougas, Elders Houston Hobart and Merle Howard. Meals were served by the women of the Colorado Springs Branch.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—In an effective service, Seventy E. Y. Hunker baptized his son, William Franklin, at Gardner Lake, Friday, May 20. Elder Charles Graham was in charge of the service, reading the Scripture and making the address. Elder Evan Fry gave the invocation. The Stone Church Teen-age Zion's League, of whom Geneva Hunker, Brother Hunker's second oldest daughter is a member, provided the hymns and musical setting. William was confirmed at the group prayer meeting on Wednesday evening, May 25.

Of the three hundred thirty-three graduates from William Chrisman High School in Independence, one hundred two were members of the Reorganized Latter Day Saint church. Four of the five top scholarship students were church members; Marilyn Seroy, Margaret Holman, Mary Cooper, and Ellen Easter. Twenty-eight out of seventy-five awards made in scholastic achievement were given to church young people. Four out of the nine who received the gold award, earned by receiving over 100 honor points in their three-year record at the school, were church members. Thirty-five of those who received special honors were church members. These ninety-five honors included, besides scholarship, national honor societies in art, debating, dramatics, and writing. Of the group of graduating church members, over fifty have expressed determination to enter Grace-

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA.—On May 7, a young man and two children were baptized. The font in a Baptist church at Marion, Iowa, was used for the service as the Cedar Rapids Branch does not yet own a building. Confirmation services were held on May 8. Since that time there has been another request for baptism. The local priesthood is carrying on a definite missionary campaign in the city. A special service for the blessing of children was held on May 15. The branch building fund is growing.

MERLIN, ONTARIO.—On April 10, Elder R. T. Brown was ordained to the office of evangelist. Apostle Percy E. Farrow and Evangelist John McGregor of London, Ontario, were the officiating ministers. District President Jack Pray and Brother Brown assisted Apostle Farrow in a prayer service at 9:30. Basket lunch was served at noon. Apostle Farrow spoke in the afternoon. Brother Brown has been the pastor in Merlin for several years. Brother Fred Brown was chosen to succeed him in a business meeting held April 27. Charles Atkinson and Glen Atkinson were chosen as counselors.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—Wayne Fetter, nephew of Dr. and Mrs. C. A. Joyce, was baptized May 15 in the Stone Church congregation. Jacqueline Annette, infant daughter of Richard and Marjorie Cochran of Lawrence, Kansas, was blessed. Mrs. Cochran is the former Marjorie Sintz. Charles Graham and Glaude Smith were the officiating ministers. Gayle, son of William and Thelma Crick, was blessed by L. F. P. Curry and Glaude Smith. On May 22 Susan Ann Sinclair was blessed. She is the daughter of Clarence and Charlotta Sinclair. Mrs. Sinclair is the former Charlotta Ballantyne.

President Israel A. Smith was the speaker at the annual banquet given by the combined R. L. D. S. congregations in Independence at the South Chrysler Church. Seventy-five members of the class of '49 were guests as well as the pastors and their wives from most of the fifteen congregations in Independence. Charles Graham, pastoral supervisor, was master of ceremonies, and a program was presented by a trio from the Kansas City Choral Symphony, the Independence Barbershop Chorus, Don Pepper, soloist, and Stephen Black, reader. The invocation was offered by Elder Fred O. Davies and the benediction by Elder Glaude Smith. A special feature of the program was the singing of the schools' Alma Maters by about a dozen students from Northeast High School in Kansas City and some sixty students from William Chrisman in Independence. The group then joined together in singing a school song of Graceland, where a large majority of the graduates will be enrolled next fall.

KANSAS CITY STAKE.—A church has been purchased from the Baptist people in Nashua, at By-pass 71 and Highway 169, about twelve miles north of the river in Kansas City. The first services of our people in the church was on Palm Sunday with a congregation of 189. Evan Fry preached the opening sermon. The pastor is David France, and the average Sunday morning attendance is fifty.

Roy Weldon, recently returned from an archaeological exposition in Central and South America, spent the week from May 15 to May 22 giving a series of slide lectures to the Nashua congregation on the Book of Mormon, showing some of the new slides he had brought back with him from his trip.

A new church in Kansas City, Kansas, is being constructed at Forty-fifth and Shawnee Road, south of Argentine. It is mostly paid for and will be ready by fall.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—The Annual May Festival was held Tuesday, May 17, at 8:00 p.m., on the east lawn of the nurses' home by the nurses of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing. Costumes and customs of other lands were featured, and the high point of the program was the crowning of the May queen.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

Without Deity - By FRANCES M. MILLS

CHRIST CAME TO EARTH nearly two thousand years ago. His entire period of ministry, although brief in years, had an effect upon the peoples of this earth that time does not erase. The passing years, the long centuries, and eras of man's history serve only to intensify, not dim, the importance of his teachings and his example of righteous living.

His coming fulfilled that which was written by the prophets of old. He came that man might have life eternal and abundant—a fullness of joy. He washed away the sin of Adam and gave man baptism for the remission of sin, to put off the old way and begin anew. He died and arose again, and left mankind the promise of a new life, the assurance that death is not the end, but only a change from one life to another.

He left with his disciples the Word and the way by which man may have the more abundant life, both on earth and in eternity. Following Christ's ascension, the eleven apostles and a small but determined band of converts worked zealously to spread through all the earth the gospel—that is good news—the hope of eternal life, and the promise of his second coming to dwell again with man on earth.

The pagan world scoffed and found endless ways of torturing the adherents of the new faith, but in spite of cruelties and unbelief, the gospel spread—slowly, but with relentless conviction. Christianity was banned by law, and still the Word moved among men, through the humble and downtrodden, through the rich and influential, until it reached the very seats of the mighty, and kings and emperors professed Christ.

PARODIED, ADULTERATED, stretched too far, spread too thin, the mighty Word of God no longer thundered from the lips of righteous men. Man-made creeds were repeated parrotlike by unconsecrated priestcrafters in gaudy trappings before graven images, and religion became a ritual. It was no more than natural that these hastily converted peoples should bring into their new religion the familiar customs of their former idol worship. The influence so strong at that time is seen even today in the ornate robes of Catholic priests and the images of Mary before which they pray. Thus the one-time outlaw religion became the creed of the state. By force, and not through faith or desire, whole nations were baptized in the name of Christ.

Christ's way of life, magnificent in its simplicity, was too straight and narrow for a people who had taken away the plain and precious things from the gospel. Many and devious paths opened before them as confusion and darkness settled upon the nations.

Had God forsaken man—deserted his creation, his children? Was Christ's sacrifice in vain? Many centuries have passed since the Apostasy. The Dark Ages have long since melted away before a wave of enlightenment such as the world never before experienced. Knowledge has swept the earth like a flood. Truth and light have sprung from the ground in a restored gospel. How near, today, is man to God?

There is no major nation in which the gospel of Christ has not been preached in modern times by some sect of some creed. There is scarcely a part of this planet's surface that has not heard the name of Christ. And yet, today, in the highly important counsels of the United Nations, the name of the Father and the Son cannot be mentioned, because some of the member nations, once Christian, no longer teach Christianity or practice democracy. Still those nations claim to be seeking a means to bring peace on earth, good will among men. The importance of their search cannot be overestimated, for the need for peace is vital. But who will walk the straight and narrow way? Even the name is forbidden whereby man shall find salvation, which brings its own peace. The way is forsaken, the Word is spurned. Will darkness come again? Can man succeed without Deity?

AMERICA IS KNOWN through all the world as a Christian nation. What other powerful country would conquer a people, teach it democracy, protect it in time of war, and set it free, as the United States has done for Philippines? Out of our super-abundance of natural resources we feed and clothe and arm our allies. Do we love our neighbors as ourselves?

Self-sufficiency (pride) is a cardinal sin. Through it a system of false values is set up in which knowledge and importance are grossly overestimated. Man attempts to become secure through his own resources alone. His pride is in his learning, power, rank, and possessions, and in blind self-sufficiency, he races headlong into atheism.

In his farewell address George Washington said, "The foundation of the nation's prosperity is its religion and morals." In the early years of this country's existence, Congress knelt in a body to ask forgiveness for personal and national sins. The custom was abandoned after the time of Abraham Lincoln.

The totalitarian philosophy dominating many countries today came into existence during World War I. After World War II about one fourth of the inhabited earth was under the control of its atheistic leaders. Dr. Walter Maier suggests we consider China and add another 33 per cent. India is teetering on the brink, and Germany, France, and England are slowly succumbing, while who knows how many other lands, still bravely putting up a front of democracy and religion, are soon to fall? Totalitarianism has succeeded wherever Christianity has been rejected. America's present peril is the result of self-satisfaction. We are relying on ourselves without Deity.

If we ignore a thing long enough, we come eventually to the condition where we deny its very existence. In Russia it is not forbidden to believe in God, but it is forbidden to teach about God. That is "freedom of religion" in Russia. Officially, Christianity in Russia is something one may remember but must never talk about. As the older generations die, the Soviet regime intends that Christianity, and Christ, and God the Father, shall pass away from the minds and hearts of the people, and the newer generations shall know only the Red God in the Kremlin.

HERE IN AMERICA, the land of the free, we have many churches, and many creeds and sects, and freedom of worship. We may believe what we like and talk about it, too. We may freely send our children to church, to Sunday school, to parochial schools and church-owned colleges, where daily the name of the Father is heard in prayer and song and teachings, each sect hewing to its own line.

The public schools have by far the greater attendance, but in them what classes are begun or ended in prayer? What divine help is sought that knowledge and understanding may increase? Is the love of Christ told in song and story? Is contact with religion one day a week, for an hour or two, enough for children of school age? The commercial and political world dins its precepts into the minds of our children for six full days, and often most of the seventh. Can an hour or so of church counteract the worldly influences?

How many times has the Father made promises to man? It would be difficult to count them. The Bible, Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants record numerous promises to different individuals and nations over a wide range of subjects. God made promises to Adam, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Isaiah, David, Lehi, Nephi, Mormon, Moroni, Joseph Smith, and many others. He covenanted with the children of Israel and the people of Nephi. He made promises that affected vast nations over long centuries. Some have come to pass, many are still in force, waiting the time of fulfillment. None of these covenants have been broken by God.

EVERYTHING IN THE UNIVERSE is bound by laws. The stars, the solar systems, the atoms of matter, the forces of energy that activate them—all are obeying the laws of their creation. All living things, both animals and plants, have laws. To man also was given laws, and to him alone the agency to keep or break them as he chose. Man often has exercised his privilege recklessly, and at times it would seem that God is in danger of losing his most precious creation. Because of God's promise of free agency, man can never be forced into salvation (as Satan wished to do); he can only be persuaded, as Christ demonstrated.

The promises to man are conditional upon his obedience. The fruits of the divine promises were not meant to be enjoyed promiscuously, but only by the law abiding. Deity cannot tolerate mockery. Deity is not to be treated lightly or with scorn. Deity must be revered and obeyed. Hence the strict condition was placed upon fulfillment of promises made to man that God is not bound to those who do not keep his laws.

Man without law has no promise. The law is given to all men, and only man, through his free agency, can keep it or break it. God has given only one law to man. The same law that was given to Adam and to Israel is still the law today. It has never been withdrawn, modified, or replaced.

Can willful man learn to obey the law, and so become the pure and righteous creature God is desirous of having in his heavenly kingdom as his son, his companion?

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Prayers are requested for Mr. and Mrs. Earl Cox of Cape Girardeau, Missouri, who were victims of a tornado. Mrs. Cox has several broken ribs and a double fracture of the collar bone. Mr. Cox has a broken arm, broken shoulder, broken cheek bone, broken nose, broken jaw, fractured skull, and damaged eye. They are at the St. Francis Hospital. Their two sons are safe, but their house was demolished.

A sister asks the Saints to pray that, if it is God's will she may be relieved of her affliction and receive the physical and spiritual blessings of which she is in need.

ENGAGEMENT

Chapman-Baker

Mrs. Andrew Christensen of Vancouver, Washington, announces the engagement of her daughter, Carol Baker, to Thomas Chapman, son of Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Chapman of Vancouver. Miss Baker is also the daughter of James L. Baker of Palouse, Washington. The wedding will take place on July 2 at the Reorganized Church in Vancouver.

WEDDINGS

Neal-Skelding

Lois Lorraine Skelding, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred Skelding of St. Thomas, Ontario, and Bevan McNaie Neal, son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Neal, also of St. Thomas, were married by Elder Frank H. Gray on May 7 at the Reorganized Church in St. Thomas.

Engel-Moore

Juanita Moore, daughter of Mrs. Fannie Robinson Moore of Bayard, Nebraska, and Dr. Rodger Roy Engel, son of Mr. and Mrs. Aaron Engel of Santa Ana, California, were married April 20 in Tustin, California. Evangelist Louis J. Ostertag performed the double-ring ceremony. They are making their home in Long Beach, California.

BIRTHS

A daughter, Loretta Anna, was born on March 15 to Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Wagner of Long Beach, California. She was blessed on Mother's Day by Patriarch L. J. Ostertag and Elder Guy Smith.

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Wilcox of Lansing, Michigan, announce the birth of a daughter, Barbara Ann, born May 11. Mrs. Wilcox is the former Marjorie Muir. Both parents were members of the 1946 graduating class of Graceland.

Mr. and Mrs. Willbur O. Ihde of Park Falls, Wisconsin, announce the birth of a son, William John, born March 10. Mrs. Ihde is the former Zion Steede.

A daughter, Donna Louise, was born on March 8 to Mr. and Mrs. Donald A. Rich of Park Falls, Wisconsin. Mrs. Rich is the former Inez Steede.

DEATHS

NAPIER.—Pauline Olive Spurgeon, was born January 23, 1868, in Missouri, and died May 17, 1949, in Sacramento, California. She was baptized on May 12, 1878, and on May 6, 1888, was married to Newton T. Napier. Two daughters were born to them. The older one, Birdie Myrtle Clark, and Mr. Napier both preceded her in death. Throughout her life she was an active and faithful worker in the church.

She is survived by her daughter, Pauline Napier Winslow, and six grandchildren. Evangelist William H. Dawson conducted the funeral service. Burial was in the Odd Fellows Lawn Cemetery in Sacramento.

NEITZELT.—Emma B., daughter of William and Katherine Lucas, was born on March 25, 1877, near Warnock, Ohio, and died May 9, 1949, at Glencoe, Ohio. She was married to James A. Neitzelt on March 17, 1895; eight children were born to them. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since June 16, 1912.

She is survived by her husband; five sons: William, Alfred, Edward, Russell, and Floyd; a brother, Charles Lucas; and a sister, Etta Forsythe. Two sons, Ralph and James, Jr., and one daughter, Emma, preceded her in death. Funeral services were held at the Glencoe Methodist Church, W. Grant Ward officiating.

* GOOD INTENTIONS

In the first place, all I wanted was a paperweight—one of those little glass things that keep the papers from blowing off your desk when your friends breeze in for a visit. The stationery stores had nothing, the department stores had nothing, and the "gifte shoppe" had something cute from Italy for $12.50, which wasn't quite the right color for that price.

So, at long last, I arrived, as otherwise sensible people sometimes do, at an antique shop where I thought they had something that might do. There, in the bottom of a dusty case, were several, one of them from old Vienna, with a miniature garden of daisies and buttercups in it—period of Franz Josef and the Blue Danube Waltz and all that sort of thing—for only $65. Beside it, a glass with a pair of startled fawns racing through the Elysian fields, made in Czechoslovakia, for $87.50. Or, if I wanted something economical, there was a plain one from Bavaria for a mere $50. By this time my blush of embarrassment had arrived, so I lowered my eyebrows and departed in it, asking the gentleman's pardon for my invasion of his gallery (have you noticed the first four letters of that word?) and escaped to the common sunshine and fresh air of the street.

As I said before, all I wanted was a paperweight. I went back to the department store and bought a doorstop the size of a baked apple, which serves the purpose but doesn't quite satisfy my aesthetic sense. It was $1.95, which means a solid $63.05 saved, but yet . . . I really had something else in mind. All I wanted was a paperweight . . . something pretty, if possible. Just a little paperweight.

* WANDELL COLLEGE

"The Standard," our Australian monthly church publication, tells of the fourth annual session of Wandell College which was held at the pastoral headquarters, 22 Blackall Street, Hamilton, New South Wales. Twenty-five students and five faculty members attended, all but one in residence. Ten courses were offered, all related to church work.

Great things often have small beginnings. Who can tell what a splendid future Wandell College may have? What is necessary in a case like this is: build a little greater each year, never give up in the face of difficulty, meet each problem as it comes, seek new resources and support, and keep a high ideal for the future. Every institution has its bad times when it would be easy to accept defeat and failure—in fact, it is hard not to do so. May Wandell College, named for a courageous and faithful missionary, continue always to grow.

* JESUS SAVES

Some years ago, we told you about the hall at the west end of Sheffield viaduct, Kansas City, which sometimes carried the sign, "Strike Headquarters," and sometimes "Jesus Saves." The contrast in philosophy, mood, and purpose was very great. Sometimes the union was trying to save that community, sometimes it was Jesus.

The union has moved on to other quarters, and Jesus has held the place for several years now. Of the two signs, I like "Jesus Saves" much the better. Out of the surrounding industrial district and its homes, a fine group of people attend the chapel there, neatly dressed children go to church school, and a fine influence is extended to the community.

The Martyrs

IN A FEW DAYS (June 26), special services will be held at Nauvoo, Illinois, in memory of the Prophet Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum. We have been honoring these men in this way for a number of years at the anniversary of their tragic death (June 27, 1844).

Josiah Quincy, in his Figures of the Past, suggested the probability that the verdict of succeeding generations would be that, of the historical Americans of the nineteenth century, Joseph Smith "has exerted the most powerful influence upon the destinies of his countrymen."

The marvelous increase in the numbers of those who believe he was an inspired prophet of God might be held to be visible and demonstrable proof that Quincy's implied prophecy was itself an inspired statement. But there are spheres in which the martyred founder of Latter Day Saintism may have exerted a much greater influence, as found in the more enlightened thinking today especially among religionists, with respect to infant damnation, prison reform, stewardship, or social welfare, and health, not overlooking the realm of science in which he spoke prophetically a hundred years ahead of his day. See sections 22 and 85 of the Doctrine and Covenants, as to the extent and laws of creation and power in matter (atomic energy).

In all these things Joseph Smith—a true prophet like John—pointed the way to a new dispensation, a new and superior highway which already has been traversed by millions, and on which the King himself has ridden.

May we not with propriety suggest that on Sunday, June 26, the Saints give consideration to the great work accomplished by the martyred prophet and patriarch under the aegis and direction of the Master.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Introducing...

ELBERT A. SMITH (page 5) is an outstanding father. He is the father of Ronald G. and Lynn E. Smith, both elders; father of many literary productions; and Presiding Patriarch—father to all the church.

"Brother Elbert" was born in Nauvoo, Illinois, on March 8, 1871. He married Clara A. Cochran in 1895. He was reared on a farm, and for five years managed the farm, starting at the age of fifteen. For several years he was bindery foreman for the Herald. He was a partner in the Smith and Brackenbury Photographic Gallery of Lamoni, Iowa, for two years.

"Brother Elbert" has held the priesthood continuously since February 6, 1898, when he was ordained to the office of priest. He was ordained counselor to President Joseph Smith in 1909. He continued as counselor in the Presidency after his cousin, Frederick M. Smith, became president.

He was editor of Autumn Leaves from 1902 to 1917, and Herald editor from 1906 to 1938. Among his best-known books are: Timbers for the Temple, Square Blocks, and On Memory's Beam. His occasional Herald column, "Blue Pencil Notes," is still a most popular feature.

GARLAND E. TICKEMYER (page 7), pastor and tenor soloist, was born January 1, 1913. He married Hazel V. Roberson on March 6, 1936. They have two boys: Garland Lee, 9, and David Kent, 5.

After he was graduated from the Marshall (Missouri) High School in 1931, he attended Kansas City Junior College; Friends University, Wichita, Kansas; and William Jewell College, Liberty, Missouri. He received a B.A. degree from the University of Kansas City in 1943, and an M.A. degree in 1945.

Brother Tickemyer was ordained to the office of elder in 1933, and was in the first group of two-year appointees, going to Wichita, Kansas, in 1934 as pastor. For eight and one-half years he served as pastor of the Stone Church. In 1946 he became pastor of the Central Los Angeles Branch. At the present time he is president of the Los Angeles Metropolitan District. Brother Tickemyer has been tenor soloist in the Messiah several times.

CLEO HANTHORNE MOON (page 9), teacher, librarian, and poet, was graduated from the Watonga (Oklahoma) High School in 1922. From the Oklahoma College for Women she received a B.A. degree in 1936; and in 1937 an M.A. degree from Oklahoma University. She did graduate work in Columbia University, New York. She had nine years of high school teaching experience in Oklahoma and in Iowa, and was librarian at Graceland College from 1935 to 1945. She married Willard Moon, of the Lamoni Stake Presidency, in 1944.

News & Notes

DAUGHERTY IN INDEPENDENCE

Seventy James Daugherty was in Independence, Missouri, during the week of May 29 in relation to Visual Aids Committee work. He reports having baptized twenty-six new members since January, uniting a number of homes in the church. He has spent time giving lectures, visiting, presenting sermons, and ministering to the needs of the members in a number of places since April. These include: Minneapolis, Minnesota; Detroit, Michigan; Beloit, Madison, Sparta, Milwaukee, Lancaster, Soldier's Grove, and LaCross, Wisconsin. Brother Daugherty is the president of Wisconsin District. He explained with considerable pleasure that there were 1200 members in Wisconsin at the beginning of 1948 and that there was a 9.5% increase in the number of baptisms during last year. Every branch in Wisconsin has had an increase in numbers during 1948. In one branch, every family but one is a tithepayer.

RADIO STAFF PICNIC

Members of the church radio staff entertained the executive radio committee and their families at a picnic-breakfast June 1 at Paul Craig's home in south Independence, Missouri. The executive committee consists of the Presidency and Presiding Bishopric. Members may be interested in the extensive radio staff which the church maintains. They include Evan Fry and Steven Black, radio ministers, Paul Craig and Bethel Knoche musicians, Franklyn S. Weddle, radio director, Russel Resch, engineer, and Norma Smith and Edna Wood, secretaries.

GLEAZER IN FAR WEST STAKE

Apostle E. J. Gleazer, accompanying Stake President Emery Jennings, spent the week following May 29 visiting branches and groups in Far West Stake. They met with the Saints in Trenton, Chillicothe, Macon, Bevier, Hamilton, Cameron, and Kingston, all in Missouri.

The purpose of the visit was to familiarize Apostle Gleazer with conditions in the various communities and put him in a position to advise with the stake president on matters of missionary extension and to consider whether the church's purpose has been accomplished in these communities.

Apostle Gleazer preached in Hamilton and was pleased with the prospects in the place. He said that consideration is being given to the possibility of building a new church there in the near future.

The development of the Cameron Saints in raising funds for the building of a new church impressed Apostle Gleazer. The Cameron church burned during the past year and an excellent new location has been obtained.

The members of the stake are to be congratulated upon their new reunion grounds. The Far West Stake grounds are in good shape in one of the best groves in northern Missouri.

Wednesday, June 1, in the presence of a large congregation representing Maple Grove, Osborn, and Stewartville Saints, Gerald Gabriel was installed as supervising pastor of the three congregations. The service of installation was held in the Stewartville church and a fine spirit was in evidence. At the conclusion of the service, a reception was held in the lower auditorium for Brother and Sister Gabriel.

UNDERWOOD SPECIAL DAY

President Israel A. Smith spent June 12 in Underwood, Iowa, for Special Day meetings. Underwood is one of the towns settled by Saints who dropped out of the westward trek to Utah. President Smith preached at 11:00. David Carlile is pastor.

Love in a World of Hate

The Law of Love

We need to be reminded often that the basis of the gospel is love. In a world of confusion and strife, we are apt to forget it. In a church program of many activities, we sometimes let other things take precedence. But there it is, and there it remains at the heart of the Christian message. The words of "the first and great commandment" delivered from the lips of Jesus began, "Thou shalt love."

This is the "Law of Love." To depart from it is the first and easiest of all apostasies. To live by it may be hard at times, but it offers the richest rewards that can be harvested from life.

Will Rogers' Theory

You may remember the statement by the late Will Rogers: "I never met a man I didn't like." I remember seeing it in the morning paper when it first came out. It sounded good—a little too good. A man who had traveled as widely as Rogers had couldn't avoid meeting a few cheats, rogues, and fakes; a man as intelligent as he couldn't help detecting them. He had either developed a remarkable pair of blind spots or conveniently forgot what he saw. He knew very well that the world wasn't populated by angels and members of the Purity League.

But Will Rogers also knew how to bring the best out of people by expecting the best of them. They were better when he was near, whatever they were when he was gone. In his own way, he helped to make the world a little better.

The Limits of Love

Jesus went the limit in teaching the law of love. He told his disciples, "I say unto you, love your enemies" (Matthew 5:44). This demand seems fantastic, even today.

His theory was severely tested when he renounced the scribes and Pharisees in bitterest terms (Matthew 23); and if those censures do not represent positive hatred, they at least reveal antipathies that most of us can understand. But in the course of his sufferings, Jesus conquered his feeling, and in the agonies of the cross, he could say, "Father, for-

RETURN OF THE SCHERERS

Brother and Sister Albert Scherer and children, James Michael and Sandra Lynn, arrived in New York, Wednesday, June 8, on board the "Nieuw Amsterdam," thus completing their mission to Holland.

The return of Brother and Sister Scherer at this time had not been anticipated, but was thought wise by Brother Scherer's medical advisor at Rotterdam when Brother Scherer was found to be suffering from a blood ailment which can be better treated in this country.

Brother and Sister Scherer went to the Dutch Mission in October, 1947, and have served under difficult circumstances with marked distinction. They leave the Dutch branches very greatly strengthened by their ministry and have a warm place in the hearts of the Saints of Holland. We extend to Brother and Sister Scherer the grateful thanks of the church for the services they have rendered.

The First Presidency
By Israel A. Smith

give them; for they know not what they do."

Jesus himself was able to go to the last possible limit of the law of love. He anticipated the best principles of our modern science of mental health when he declared the necessity of love. It is a truth that we can be happy only by loving people. That law is written into human nature. Jesus knew it was there. If he really uttered those maledictions in Matthew 23, he was not then a happy person. And if the Lord could not be happy in such a state of mind, what chance would we have?

For very good reasons Jesus said,

If ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.—Matthew 6:14, 15.

In the law of love we have the ultimate effort under the gospel plan to present to the disciples a happy, wholesome, reasonable adjustment with God and man. It is essential to physical and spiritual health. The crowded asylums of the country, the long lists of patients seeking the aid of psychiatrists, the uncounted numbers of unhappy people who never reach the institutions or the physicians with their troubles are all evidences of the danger of breaking the law of love.

Forgiveness a Must

A person who hates or dislikes is in a miserable, unhappy state of mind. Ultimately, hatred leads to a wish to hurt and destroy. "Who-soever hateth his brother is a murderer" (I John 3:15). And since the homicidal urge of hate is repressed by criminal law, how can a hater be happy? Only by giving up his hate.

As long as you dislike another person, he has the power to hurt you, unknown to himself. You give him that power with your dislike. You are hurt by thoughts of him. Forgiveness is the only route of escape from those thoughts. Not until you forgive are you free. Forgiveness is the price of peace. The enemy can make your life a real hell without trying, as long as you hate him. The key release is in your hand: forgiveness. Jesus knew that.

Notice

We are forced to warn the Saints against a family giving different names that has apparently defrauded our members at various places: Lincoln, Omaha, Wichita, Seattle, Spokane, and possibly others. They travel by Ford panel truck, consist of a husband and wife and "six or eight" children. They have used the influence of the names of Elder Paul Wellington and Bishop Monte Lasater, who do not know them. They claim their truck has broken down, and through sympathy have secured various sums of money. These people are not church members and have no just claim on our members.

Before giving them money, please check with us by telegram or telephone.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

This is the last of the series of letters written by Paul M. Hanson, President of the Quorum of Twelve, during his recent visit to South America. Apostle Hanson returned to Independence, Tuesday evening, May 24. You, too, will enjoy his interesting and vivid description of his trip.

Hotel Majestic
Quito, Ecuador
May 22, 1949

President Smith:

When I last wrote to you, I was in La Paz, Bolivia. One evening I had dinner with Mr. E. E. Buechler, his wife and children in their lovely home there. He is a Swiss, has lived in La Paz twenty-five years, and is manager of the export and import division of Grace and Company of Bolivia. He and his wife speak English fluently. After dinner they listened with interest to the story of our church—the great restoration of God's work in these latter days. Then after showing some colored moving pictures of scenes in Bolivia, Mr. Buechler took me in his car to my hotel.

The next day I went by private car about sixty miles from La Paz to Tiahuanaco, where there are extensive and remarkable remains of pre-Inca civilization. When the Incas conquered this region about A.D. 1200, they found impressive remains of a civilization that seemed to center in Tiahuanaco. Little could be learned by the Incas of the ancient civilization from the people of debased cultural status living among the ruins. The superior stonework and innumerable vestiges of advanced culture found by the Incas influenced their techniques in various ways. The church and many other buildings in the village of Tiahuanaco are made of exceptionally well-cut stones carried from the ruins, and many such stones are to be found in colonial structures in La Paz. Although the ruins for centuries have been used as a quarry for ready-cut stones for building purposes, they are still most impressive.

No intensive archaeological work on a large scale has been done here or in Bolivia, yet science appears to have recovered enough material in the country and from sites in the coastal and highland parts of Peru to make possible a tentative reconstruction of the cultural history of Tiahuanaco. Apparently the builders were ancestors of the Indians to whom, after the Spanish conquest, the name "Aymara" was applied. Piecing together various fragments of evidence, one finds that Tiahuanaco about A. D. 600 received a powerful stimulus from advanced peoples living along the coast of Peru, which resulted in a phase of Tiahuanaco civilization higher in every way than what went before. This continued for 300 years, about A. D. 600-900, and this period is generally called Classical Tiahuanaco or Tiahuanaco II. The great remains to be seen belong mainly to the latter period. The cultural influence of this period was strongly felt in Peru, Ecuador, Chile, and Argentina. Practically nothing is known of the social and political institutions of the Classical Tiahuanaco civilization.

What marvelous stonework cut with perfect precision! Numerous colossal monoliths in a long line are still in exact alignment. Spread over a great area are huge blocks of stone, some intricately carved; about one mile or more from the main ruins are great monolithic cut stone platforms of such magnitude as to be almost unbelievably the work of human hands. I took numerous pictures which I hope will accurately represent these ruins.

What tremendous calamity brought the Tiahuanaco civilization to an abrupt end—epidemic, invasion by savages from the eastern jungles, earthquakes, or departure from the living God? According to certain early Spanish writers, the Tiahuanaco civilization was definitely associated with the worship of Wiracocha, a white and bearded deity who, in the form of a man but possessing godlike powers, appeared and ministered in ancient times to the people, mysteriously disappeared, and promised to return. The destruction of the Tiahuanaco civilization was attributed by these writers to a rejection of this deity and his worship.

Mr. Buechler called to see me off by train from La Paz—a flourishing city of about 370,000 deep down in a valley. From there I went by train to Guaqui, a little town on Lake Titicaca, and then by boat across the lake to Puno, Peru, where I took the train to Arequipa.

Lake Titicaca, the highest navigable body of water in the world, lies at an altitude of more than 12,000 feet on the Andean Plateau. It is ninety-five miles long and thirty-five miles wide, with an irregular outline; it contains some islands, among which are Titicaca that I visited from Copacabana and Coati, known respectively as the Island of the Sun and Island of the Moon.

The whole region of the Lake Titicaca basin abounds in traces of Inca and pre-Inca civilizations.

I am now in Quito, capital of Ecuador. My trip in South America is about at an end. One reason for my coming to Ecuador was to visit Otavalo, a town seventy-five miles northeast of Quito, where on Saturdays the Indians of the region hold one of the largest and most colorful markets in South America. The Indian population with the outlying districts numbers 40,000 to 50,000. This is a rich agricultural region, producing coffee, sugar cane, cotton, cereals, and potatoes. The Otavalo Indians are highly intelligent, industrious, and clean. The men are tall and of fine physique. Their striking costume consists of short white trousers and white homespun shirt, a poncho of red or blue with woven designs, and a huge reddish hat with a broad curving brim in which various small articles may be carried. The young men present a sturdy appearance. All the men wear their hair in a long single braid which falls down their backs. They are usually barefooted. The women, many of whom are beautiful, dress in embroidered blouses and long skirts. They wear the same style of broad-rimmed cinnamon colored felt hat as the men. They have several dark blue or orange carrying cloths, one of which may be used to hold a baby tight against the mother's back. The women adorn themselves with a dozen or so strings of bright beads around their necks.

Random Thoughts For Father's Day

By ELBERT A. SMITH

FIRST OF ALL this is by way of being a tribute to good fathers everywhere who take their responsibilities and opportunities seriously in the fear of God. And I would expand the tribute to include all fatherly men who minister to the needs of youth as ministers, departmental church workers, educators, youth counselors, Boy Scout leaders, and all others who singly or in groups are teachers, leaders, and exemplars to youth. Ofttimes these men must take over the task that fathers in broken or near-broken homes have abandoned and left for the church and social organizations to solve as best they may.

The Father and the Church

The church should minister in the family, and the family should go to church. J. Edgar Hoover once wrote, "If I had a son I would want him to go to church. What is more, I would go to church with him." Certainly J. Edgar Hoover is no "sissy." He is the chief law enforcement officer in America. It is his job to suppress crime. And at times, gun in hand, he goes out to apprehend the most desperate criminals, like Dillinger, for example, who once was "public enemy number one." Yet J. Edgar Hoover looks to the church as the first and best aid, outside the home, in the rearing of good citizens for church and state.

Family Government

The family is a small, closely-knit government in itself. The father is no longer a despotic ruler in a little kingdom before whose throne wife and children bow in humble submission. That, my brethren, is an understatement. The family exercises or should exercise all the functions of government: legislative, judicial, and administrative. The wise father will remember the terms of the Latter Day Saint marriage covenant between wife and husband: "You both mutually agree." He had better "mutually agree" with his wife regarding the laws to be laid down in the family for the children, the ways in which they shall be consistently enforced, and the judgments to be passed when they are disobeyed. One little junior can raise problems enough to keep both father and mother busy even when they are "mutually agreed."

The child comes into an utterly strange world. He has everything to learn. He has an insatiable curiosity. He forever asks "What?" and "Why?" Even when he gets wise answers, as he does at times, he is not satisfied. He must investigate and experiment for himself. The conventions, ideals, standards, and judgments of adults bewilder him, especially if they change from hour to hour as father or mother or both may be good-natured or peeved. So he is often in rebellion.

The Problem of Discipline

The problems which fathers and mothers confront, even happily in agreement, are many. There seem to be two major problems: discipline and guidance. Concerning discipline there appears to have been two widely divergent schools of thought.

Solomon laid down a scriptural admonition seized upon by one school: "Spare the rod and spoil the child." The old, stern, hickory-switch school held to that maxim, and it was the authority for many a preachment and "whipment." But Solomon did not do too well with his own children. They had too many stepmothers. With seven hundred wives, Solomon had little time for his children—excepting to use the rod periodically. Too many fathers today are so engrossed in other things that they do not give love and guidance to their children.

One of our missionaries of the old school once said, "In every home there should be hanging on the parlor wall a strap with a wooden handle inscribed with the words in gold letters: 'I need thee every hour!'" Perhaps the strap should be there for use only when other methods fail. Quoting again from Hoover, "If parents would teach their children obedience, crime could be abolished in one generation."

A modernistic school of child psychology swung to another extreme from that of Solomon and concluded that all physical punishment should be abolished. Let children do as they please—break the windows, dance on the piano keys—they must "find expression"—must not be "frustrated," or something terrible will happen inside them. Well something terrible has happened to children allowed to go their own, sweet way. It seems to begin to dawn upon psychological oracles that physical punishment may at times have a place in child training and may indeed be wholesome in its psychological reactions.

The Problem of Guidance

Yet after all that has been said, there "remains a more excellent way" which should be tried. It is the way of persuasion based on understanding and love and carried out with patience and all the other Christian graces and gifts, including wisdom.

At a reunion prayer meeting, I heard a young father tell of an experience with his small son. The father was going somewhere in his car in a hurry. The small boy began to ask questions. Finally the interrogation reached this stage; "Daddy, who made the earth?"

"Why, God made it."

"What did he make it for?"

"Oh, I suppose for folks to walk on."

"Well, why don't we get out of the car and walk on it?"

The father decided right then that no errand was more important than to keep in touch with his son. So he stopped the car, and they got out and walked on the good earth that God had made while the father answered the boy's further questions.

I honor those fathers and those fatherly men of whom I have spoken—ministers, educators, departmental workers, Boy Scout leaders, counselors—who take time and pains to learn to keep step with children and youth and speak their language, for thus they set the pace for those who are to be the future pacemakers for church and country.

When Father Comes Home in the Evening

A young mother of two children was talking to me about her husband. She said, "He is an ideal father. When he comes home from work in the evening, the day begins for the children—and for me." Modestly she overlooked her own part. The day began for the children in the morning, and all day the mother was the center of their world. But when the father came home in the evening, the family circle was whole again, and it was like a new day for all of them. Some fathers accumulate a grudge against a lot of things during the day, and when they come home in the evening, they take it out on wife and children. Happy is the home that has a new day beginning when father comes home to romp with the children, to listen to their chatter, and to help mother put them to bed at night.

When the Children Begin to Grow Up

When children begin to grow up and reach the stage in which they must reason things out and are entitled to begin to make decisions of their own, a new situation arises for father. Opinions begin to differ sharply at times. Some fathers meet the son or daughter head-on in conflict. A high school boy came to me, saying, "I want to talk things over with you. I can't talk with my father; he thinks I am crazy." Fortunate are the boys and girls who feel free to go to an affectionate, understanding, wise father who will listen with tolerance and understanding and patiently help them think through their problems, leaving them an increasing freedom to reach their own decisions.

We cannot shut our growing sons and daughters up within prison walls to keep them from temptation, error, and folly. But we can help them build strong bulwarks of defense within themselves—defenses they themselves believe in and which are based on deep personal convictions.

If you will look at some good fathers in the company of their children, you will find that they appear happier than other men.

bracelets, and frequently ten or more rings on each hand.

The Octavo Indians are famous for their tweeds, bright ponchos, carpets, and rugs. All their work is done by hand from washing the fleece of the Andean sheep in mountain streams to weaving their textiles on primitive looms.

The geographic location of Ecuador on the equator gave origin to the name of this republic. But we should not think that torrid heat predominates. In Quito, which has an altitude of 9,375 feet and is located in the Andean Sierras, woolen clothes are worn the year around.

The Guayaquil-Quito railway is one of the greatest engineering feats in the world. On the first part of the trip, the train passes from the coast along fields covered with tropical vegetation, plantations of sugar cane, bananas and pineapples. On the way, the train ascends 2,900 feet in five minutes along a daring zigzag road cut out of solid rock along the mountainside and supported by huge retaining walls. I left Guayaquil at 4:30 p. m. and arrived in Quito at 10 p. m. In Ecuador nothing is done on a small scale—jungles, snow-capped mountains, coast, and plains. The mountainsides are verdantly clad and cultivated up to 12,000 feet. On the trip here, Sangay (17,459 feet high) was erupting and though fifty miles away, visibility at one place was greatly affected. Our train and the countryside were gray with ashes.

I spent this afternoon (Sunday) in Quito with a Mr. Nicolas Delgado, whom I met on the plane on the way from Kansas City to Peru. His writing has appeared in the Spanish edition of Readers' Digest. He speaks English. With him I visited the Church of La Compania De Jesus (Company of Jesus) of the Jesuits, built in the seventeenth century (it is said to have the finest facade of any church in America); the Chapel of Cantuna with its marvelous gold altar; the Colonial Art Museum, the reconstruction of which was under the direction of Mr. Delgado. In the evening I was entertained in his home. Among the Kodachrome pictures he showed were some excellent views of interiors of churches in Quito and scenes in Ecuador.

Tomorrow I am to leave by plane for Guayaquil; and at 11 p. m. I shall board a plane of the Braniff Airways which is due the next evening (Tuesday) at 7:50 p. m. in Kansas City. I can say that my trip has met expectations in visiting ruins of the Inca and pre-Inca civilizations.

A Tribute to Joseph Smith

By GARLAND E. TICKEMYER

Next Sunday, June 26, "Martyrs' Day" will be observed in many branches. This tribute by Elder Tickemyer will bring to your memory many characteristics and incidences associated with the founder of the church. Joseph and Hyrum Smith fell in the course of duty by mob bullets 105 years ago on June 27.—Editor.

THE REAL JOSEPH SMITH will probably never be known. To enemies of the church he remains an enigma whose industry and achievements belie their charge of "lazy and shiftless," and against whose wall of moral integrity the charge of "charlatan" continues to break with diminishing fury.

To his six feet height, his great physical strength, his fair hair and blue eyes all can agree. We can agree also that from the time he reached his meridian, he dominated his surroundings so completely that no history of the West can be written without giving prominent place to Joseph Smith and to the "peculiar" people who became the exponents of the new philosophy of life and of religion revealed through him. Of the Book of Mormon which was presented to the world through him, Henry A. Wallace says:

Of all the American religious books of the nineteenth century, it seems probable that the Book of Mormon was the most powerful. It reached, perhaps, 1 per cent of the people of the United States, but it affected this 1 per cent so powerfully and lastingly that all the people of the United States have been affected, especially by its contribution to opening up one of our great frontiers.

Joseph Smith was possessed of a magnetic personality which, with the justice of his cause, won the support of such worthy men as Abraham Lincoln, who as an awkward, long-limbed, young member of the state legislature, voted for the charter for the city of Nauvoo, and was "so deeply moved by the stories of massacre and suffering related, that he rushed forward to the bar at the final passing of the bill to congratulate Bennett personally and wish the new city success." Also in this group were Stephen A. Douglas, to whom Joseph Smith gave the appellation, "The little giant;" and Alexander Doniphan, noted Missouri soldier and able lawyer, who won fame in the Mexican War.

One of the best descriptions of Joseph Smith is that contained in the autobiography of Parley P. Pratt who was an officer of the church and a close associate of the prophet for approximately fourteen years.

President Joseph Smith was in person tall and well-built, strong and active, of light complexion, light hair, blue eyes, very little beard, and of an expression peculiar to himself, on which the eye naturally rested with interest, and was never weary of beholding. His countenance was ever mild, affable, beaming with intelligence and benevolence; mingled with a look of interest and an unconscious smile, or cheerfulness, and entirely free from all restraint or affectation of gravity; and there was something connected with the serene and steady penetrating glance of his eye, as if he would penetrate the deepest abyss of the human heart, gaze into eternity, penetrate the heavens, and comprehend all worlds.

He possessed a noble boldness and independence of character; his manner was easy and familiar; his rebuke terrible as the lion; his benevolence unbounded as the ocean; his intelligence universal, and his language abounding in original eloquence peculiar to himself—not polished—not studied—not smoothed and softened by education and refined by art; but flowing forth in its own native simplicity and profusely abounding in variety of subject and manner. He interested and edified, while, at the same time, he amused and entertained his audience; and none listened to him that were ever weary with his discourse. I have even known him to retain a congregation of willing and anxious listeners for many hours together, in the midst of cold or sunshine, rain or wind, while they were laughing at one moment and weeping the next. Even his most bitter enemies were generally overcome, if he could once get their ears.

Had he been spared a martyr's fate till mature manhood and age, he was certainly endued with powers and ability to have revolutionized the world in many respects, and to have transmitted to posterity a name associated with more brilliant and glorious acts than has yet fallen to the lot of mortal. As it is, his work will live to endless ages, and unnumbered millions yet unborn will mention his name with honor, as a noble instrument in the hands of God.

THE PHENOMENAL GROWTH of the church resulted in a heterogeneous following that demanded a strong and resourceful leader, and there was probably no man who could have held the church in an effective organization as well as did Joseph. Paying tribute to this remarkable quality of leadership, Alexander Doniphan said that Lyman Wight was the bravest man he ever knew; Sidney Rigdon the greatest orator, but no one could have kept them all working together, except Joseph Smith. "Ah," remarked David Whitmer in his old age, "Joseph was a good man, but he had a hard task to manage with the people in the early days of the church. They were sectarian . . . and came in with all of their own views, and were hard to manage." Edward Page said, "I don't think the man ever lived who was more beloved by his people; they would have interposed their own lives to shield him. The world knew him not." On his deathbed, Lucius Merchant said of Joseph, "I saw and heard him, both in private and public. I never heard him say an immoral word or do an unkind act. We loved him deeply, and when he was martyred, you may be sure the mourning and distress can never be imagined; known only to those who were there."

Children loved him, and he often took a turn at the bat when the boys were playing ball. After two or three rounds, he would bat the ball over the fence and using the excuse, "Over the fence is out," would go on to his office "with the adoring eyes of his small companions following him admiringly." His black horse, "Charley," and his great mastiff, "Major," were his constant companions. When Joseph started for Carthage on what was to be his last journey, he ordered "Major" back to the house. For once the dog refused to obey. He was then put in an upstairs room of the Mansion House, but he jumped from the second story window and again attempted to follow his master. This time he was securely locked up. After Joseph's death this dog transferred his loyalty to young Joseph, never left him day or night, and allowed no stranger to approach him. His vigilance may have had a restraining influence on those who would have been tempted to take advantage of an opportunity to wipe out the seed of Joseph—especially the son who had been designated as successor to the prophet.

Evidence of his generosity is revealed in the fact that when a plague of fever struck Nauvoo, Joseph moved his family into a tent in the yard and made his house available as a hospital for the sick.

By the highest standards even of his own day, Joseph Smith was unlearned. Especially was this true during the early part of his ministry, but learned men sat willingly at his feet and were taught by him. He was without physical wealth, but men rich in this earth's goods laid their all at his feet for use in the advancement of the Restoration. Strong men bowed to his will and gladly carried out his orders.

Joseph Smith, the victim of intolerance, was a tolerant man. The history of the Catholic church in Nauvoo read at their centennial celebration about four years ago records that before a Catholic church was erected in Nauvoo, Mayor Joseph Smith provided their members with transportation across the river to Montrose every Sunday morning.

JOSEPH SMITH WAS A PATRIOT with political views that were far in advance of his day. He was opposed to slavery and proposed that the new land of the Louisiana Purchase be sold gradually and the money used to recompense the owners of the slaves. He said, "Break off the shackles of the poor black man and hire him to labor like a human being, for an hour of virtuous liberty on earth is worth a whole eternity of bondage." He stoutly opposed imprisonment for debts. He advocated the establishment of a Federal Reserve Banking System with branches in every state and territory, which, he said, "will mercifully cure that fatal disorder known in cities as brokerage, and leave the people's money in their own pockets. He laid down the dictum with regard to the rights of congress in relation to rights of the states upon which Abraham Lincoln rested his cause sixteen years later. He said,

And let me say that all men who say that Congress has no power to restore and defend the rights of her citizens have not the love of the truth abiding in them. Congress has power to protect the nation against foreign invasion and internal broil; and whenever that body passes an act to maintain right with any power, or to restore right to any portion of her citizens, it is the supreme law of the land; and should a state refuse submission, that state is guilty of insurrection or rebellion, and the President has as much power to repeal it as Washington had to march against the "whiskey boys" at Pittsburgh, or General Jackson had to send an armed force to suppress the rebellion of South Carolina.

Regarding the Constitution of the United States, Joseph said:

It is one of the first principles of my life and one that I have cultivated from my childhood, having been taught it by my father, to allow every one the liberty of conscience. I am the greatest advocate of the Constitution of the United States there is on earth. In my feelings, I am always ready to die in the protection of the weak and oppressed in their just rights. The only fault I find with the Constitution is that it is not broad enough to cover the whole ground.

Joseph Smith was a leader of remarkable resourcefulness. He may have made mistakes, but he can never be accused of running away from a problem or of flinching when the tide was against him. On the contrary, he was a fighting general who continually rallied his forces to the attack when defeat seemed inevitable. He acted on the principle of attack so well demonstrated by General Foch in World War I, which was summarized in these words, "When you are being pushed back, attack . . . Never stop fighting . . . You never lose until you quit." The application of this fighting principle was demonstrated in France and expressed in these words, "My right is gone, my left is crumbling, my center is retreating; I shall attack." Joseph Smith also was the exponent of another principle, later expressed by Foch in the words, "Morale is more important than material—the man in the house is more important than the house."

TIME AFTER TIME Joseph met crises with bold decisions. When persecution became intolerable in New York, he moved the entire body of the church to Kirtland, then to Independence, Missouri, again to Far West, and finally to Nauvoo. In each place he laid plans for cities to be erected and never once admitted defeat. From dungeon filth, where he was bound in chains, he sent messages of cheer and encouragement to his persecuted followers.

When depression brought panic throughout the United States in 1837, Joseph gave no thought to a program of retrenchment, rather he declared to the church, "God has revealed that something new must be done for the salvation of the church." Boldly and audaciously he laid out plans for expansion of the missionary work into foreign fields and sent six of the principal officers of the church to England to open what was to become the church's

Brother John's Shoulders

By CLEO HANTHORNE MOON

(This story is based upon a testimony I heard Willard Moon bear in a local prayer meeting in Lamoni. The John in the story is John Garver. I thought it was such a beautiful testimony that I asked permission to write the account into a story, hoping the narrative might find wider reading and appreciation. I heightened and elaborated the incident somewhat, but Willard said I had kept the true personality of Brother John as he had known him. All other characters in the story are fictitious.—C.H.M.)

PULL THAT CANVAS a little tighter there, Buell."

"Got it."

"Are you all set? Are we ready for the big lift? Under you go then, boys."

Clem and Bill ducked under the spread canvas of the big tent, and the billows of brown cloth traced their crawling like moles in a garden. The little boys standing around blinked, gaped, and then, one by one under they shot. That circle of canvas, ninety feet across, looked like a kettle of boiling dumplings.

While the men at the outside poles waited, they mopped the perspiration streaming down their faces.

"How are you standing it, Walt?"

"Okay, Brother. How's for you?"

"Have you got your grip, John?"

John's round face beamed, belying the weariness we all felt after three days of this preparation for the mid-summer camp meeting.

"Sure, I can heave my share of the load. I may be a little rotund around the middle, but this muscle is sheer steal!" He waved his left arm, his right gripping the side-wall pole.

It was another half hour before the eight of us spread the big tent, like a giant umbrella around its fifty-foot center pole. Still another hour went by before we had the stakes anchored and the walls hung. The lot of us looked limp and worn, for August had dealt us a sample of her way with the thermometer. That fine south breeze that had played around in the morning had taken the afternoon off. The big tent was the crowning job. Before that there had been the family and service tents to put up. And we had picked up brush and rubbish before that. We had sterilized the water supply cistern at the peak of the hill, and the old pump and the water pipes leading into the dining hall—all of them used only two weeks each summer. And we had made other manual preparations that campers are usually unaware of when they gather for the two weeks of religious celebration and planning and fellowship.

Jim was less talkative than he had been in the morning. Sandy was a little sharp-tongued, particularly distressed by the ubiquitous small boys who were having a delightful and memorable day albeit under our feet and blocking our progress at times. But John's disposition was unruffled. "Rotund" as he was, he had never flagged in his industry, and his wit and repartee were as genial and as clean-cut as ever. He was a tonic to us all, and no one was conscious of the fact while he worked, taking our orders on the raising of the tents, that it was he who carried the management of the whole affair, and that this day's labor was the beginning of the culmination of many details he had planned for months ahead.

I MISSED JOHN while we were putting the finishing touches to the tent. We could get along without him now, of course, and it was time for us all to go home. There would be time tomorrow to do some of the remaining chores even though meetings would be getting under way.

"Put that packing over there on that brush pile, Earl. I'll haul the whole thing to the back lot there tomorrow, and the young folks will have it for their bonfire some night," I said as I picked up my sun hat and started to go get my wagon. "I'll go get my horses and come back this way. You can hop on and go to town if you care to wait."

Earl didn't want to wait, so I struck off to get the team, over east of the knoll. When I got to the horses, I noticed someone behind the knoll, beside a clump of forsythia brush. It was John. He was down on his knees, praying, I knew. A lump rose in my throat. I had hoped that the meetings would be successful and had prayed, too. Here at this moment I sensed John's greater anxiety, the weight of his responsibility. He was pastor of the seven-county area comprising the local church district. No matter if he did have some willing workers among us, he necessarily carried a good share of the job alone. John was not one to shirk, and he never got so concerned with the trees, he couldn't see the woods. We had learned that about him in the three years he had been pastor.

I stalled around at getting the horses hitched up. I had to drive by that way, and I didn't want to interrupt or embarrass him. When I was throwing the lines into the wagon, I saw John starting to leave the place, so I swung up into the box and drove up around the knoll.

"Get in, John. You're pretty tired. I'll give you a lift to town."

It was a serious face he turned to me—pleasant, but the sparkle relaxed, as if with a close friend. I could see the man as he was with the dynamo of his wit and good humor at rest. His clothes were a mess. He loved to get into his worst clothes at a time like this, as if in rebellion against his oft-worn pulpit clothes. Perspiration streaked his dirty face. He rolled, rather than jumped, into the back of the wagon, and came to stand beside me.

"Yes, Willard, I'm tired. No one knows, Brother, what a load of concern I carry for these people. I've wanted this gathering to be a spiritual thrill, a memorable event in our progress. Do you see what I mean, Willard?"

He was so intent, he almost seemed to plead with me to understand. "Yes," I said, careful not to seem too sure, for I knew I didn't comprehend his full meaning. The general church was depending on this area for a test of the projects of the church program, spiritually and also in the economic, industrial, and social implications of the great communal plan.

I let John out at the intersection and drove on. "There goes a Christian gentleman," I said aloud, as if to my team.

THE MEETINGS of the people on the camp grounds in the days that followed were filled with the power of John's leadership. Surely God was helping him direct the sessions. I was impressed with the general tenor of the fellowship, but most unusual were the spoken expressions at the devotional services each morning when the people prayed and testified together.

Elsie Newell, who could always be depended upon in other years to cast her burdens upon the congregation, spoke on several mornings of her hopes and plans for the young people she was teaching. Martin Hastings, always long-winded and retrospective, spoke tersely and with point and purpose several times. Mary Bowen and Sanders Gunn and Irvin Baker—I could name a hundred of them—who had sat in other meetings without comment, spoke feelingly and convincingly of their high resolves.

Through all of the prayers and testimonies of the people ran specific purposes and an awareness of personal mission, and there was a surprising expression of the combined needs and directions. It was a daily thrill. I saw the work of the church myself with a clarity I had never dreamed I'd share.

Light on this peculiar spirit of our meetings came on the last morning we were together. Brother John arose from his seat on the improvised platform. I was aware at the same time of the creaking of the loosely laid boards under his physical weight, and the slope of his shoulders bearing the weight of his spirit.

He spoke of the richness of the Lord's blessing on the congregation. He outlined some of the steps that showed clearly ahead. Then—his spirit heightened by the unity there and the certainty of the love of the people for him—he broke into personal testimony.

BEFORE THESE MEETINGS started," he told them, dropping the thin centerpart of his hair in a humble, almost boyish expression, weighing his words carefully, knowing how the people hung on them, "I prayed that the Lord would free you from your sins, that you would be unencumbered by personal guilt and could see and feel the needs and purposes of the church. I asked him to lay all those sins on me. I know he has answered my prayer. I know it by the clean, childlike faith and hope I see in your faces. I know it by the selfless prayers you have offered, and the vision you have expressed in your testimonies."

Then I could see his shoulders droop even more. I remembered that tired John, of the drawn face, who had rolled into my wagon two weeks ago. A look of misery, almost agony, I thought, came over his face.

"I can tell it, too," he said with visible hesitancy at mentioning it, "by the weight of your sins on my shoulders. Sometimes during these two weeks, it has been almost more than I could bear, but I have thanked our Lord for the power he has given you. I count on this experience to lead us all to greater performance of the mission of Christ on earth today."

Then his voice changed slightly. His face paled. He spoke with a power that was unmistakably beyond his personal intelligence, with a conviction that no man of himself could have. "Your sins are forgiven you," he told those thousand people there.

I remember that as I went out of the tent at the close of the meeting, I had a feeling almost of fear, lest outside the tent I should walk beyond the bound of the personal concern of the Lord. I was afraid that in the full August sun I might lose the divine and precious favor—I might lose my strong sense of mission, or it might become an accustomed thing, instead of this new and buoyant urgency

YEARS LATER it was that John told me, in looking back to that day, that he thought perhaps he did the wrong thing then, to implore the Lord to lay upon him the sins of the people. He said he believed that the Lord's way was for each man to carry the burden of his own sins, and to adjust them with God.

"He answered my prayer, and it was a wonderful experience, but I know now that it was a man's wish. The Lord would never lay so heavy a hand upon any one servant.

"Let's sit down here a minute, Willard." We were walking home from church that Sunday morning, and there was a bench under a tree in the park. "I have never told anyone how great an agony I suffered those two weeks, because I thought it wouldn't help them much. I am going to tell you, because I think it might help you to understand our people, as it did me. Those sins I wore for those people pinched my lungs so I thought sometimes I could not go on breathing. They alternately palpitated my heart and seemed to arrest its beat. They gnawed my stomach. They jangled my nerves. They nibbled away at my self-confidence, kept me in fear of embarrassment before the people. They discolored every lovely and peaceful thought I had. They distracted me, interfered with my concentration. Each sensation in turn, mind you, seemed a great agony. I had never known until that summer what sin is—what a sickness of mankind. But for the grace of God, it is a blinding, confusing, disheartening, deadening burden. I suffered, I agonized, I wept. But I would not ask the Lord to take from me the weight I had plead with him to allow me to carry for those two weeks. The greater the weight upon me, the greater I knew the freedom of the people was. I learned, in a flood of divine intelligence, the measure of a man without sin.

John's elated countenance clouded with what I knew was a deep, sincere pity. "But I doubt," he said, looking at the grass carpet at our feet, "if any of the people knew the wealth of their blessing in those two weeks."

I HAD NO ANSWER. We got up and I walked on to the corner and parted with perfunctory words. I stood there and looked after him deliberately. I thought about that morning six years ago. I remembered the weight that bore him down then, though I had not understood its nature. I knew now John had never entirely lost that load. The people as a mass had not profited enough, of course, from that sacrificial gesture that he had made for them and for the church, but a few here and there had. I had learned the purpose he had had in asking that miracle of the Lord. It had been an experience that I would never shake off, and that I could never resist sharing openly and subtly.

Looking after him as he went toward his home that morning, I knew what John may not have known or had not admitted—that his experience had raised him above the common run of the rest of us. And I knew that he had never come down from that vantage point of vision and direction and faith and never would.

The Second Step -

By RUBY TINKHAM

THE TELEPHONE rang long and shrilly at the Martin house. Millie lowered her magazine and glanced questioningly at Sam, who was pleasantly engrossed behind the evening paper. He sighed, resignedly, tossed the paper aside, and, setting the glass in his hand on a near-by table, walked leisurely into the hallway.

When he returned, Millie looked up at him casually and then dropped her magazine in alarm. He was white as a sheet, and he looked absolutely horrified.

"Millie, do you remember that kid, Bill Summers, who came to work for us last fall? They just picked him up in a wreck over at the Y-bridge. Been drinking and didn't make that turn. Car smashed all to pieces, and he's dead."

Millie gasped incredulously, "Oh, no, Sam, not that nice young man. I liked him—he was so clean-looking and had such a pleasant smile. How could such a thing have happened?"

"I don't know. I guess he stopped at that tavern there on route 84 and had a few drinks with some of the boys on the way home from work. Good heavens, Millie, that boy helped me out on a job today. We were going to finish it up tomorrow."

He started pacing the floor, and Millie watched him anxiously. "How about his wife. Who will tell her?"

Sam ran his fingers through his gray hair and stopped thunderstruck. "I suppose Mr. Bevins will. He called me. Lord, I wouldn't want his job for anything in the world. They've been married only about a year."

He sank into the chair and picked up the glass at his side. Raising it to his lips, he stopped in sudden distaste and set it down with repugnance. Millie observed the lines in his kind, rugged face affectionately. This had really hit Sam hard. She tried to think of something sympathetic to say.

"Maybe we should go over to see Mrs. Summers. There might be something we could do."

"No," he whispered hoarsely. "She wouldn't want to see me, I know. You go over tomorrow and see if you can help any."

"Why, Sam, that doesn't sound like you. You are always so eager to help people."

He dropped his head into his hands, and she could see that he was shaking all over. "Millie, I killed that boy: Just as sure as you're sitting there, I swear, I killed that boy tonight!"

Millie was shocked. "That's impossible. You've been home here all evening. You couldn't have done anything."

HE GOT UP NERVOUSLY and started to pace the floor again. His face was still white, and there was a grim look around his mouth. "Millie, when that boy first came to work for us, he never touched liquor. We used to kid him and ask him when he was going to grow up. Some of the fellows called him, 'The Infant.' I never will forget that big company dinner we had at Christmas time. All the fellows were kidding him about being the only one who didn't drink. He just grinned good-naturedly, and then I took a glass and handed it to him and said, 'Here, Kid, grow up, this company doesn't like sober men on holidays.' He drank it, Millie, and a lot more, and I gave it to him. Me, Sam Martin, I made that kid take his first drink. Now he's lying out there under a smashed car, dead."

Millie got up and laid her hand on his arm. "But, Sam, it wasn't your fault he got killed tonight. You couldn't help it."

"It was my fault, Millie, and I could help it. I saw after he had a couple of drinks that night that he'd never be able to drive, so I took him home. You should have seen his wife's face when she opened the door and saw me there holding him up. She went all white, and her eyes got big as if I had struck her, then she kinda moaned, 'Oh, no, no—' I just stood there and grinned like a big fool and said, 'Put him to bed, Mrs. Summers, he'll be all right in the morning.' Only tonight nobody took him home."

MILLIE STROKED his arm soothingly. "Don't torture yourself so. Even if you did offer him a drink once, you didn't make him stop there tonight and get drunk. You can't blame yourself for all of this. Surely there were others—"

"Of course there were others," he exploded, "but I started it. Maybe if I hadn't offered him that first drink—look, what if it were one of our boys lying out there now? How would you feel?"

She paused, startled. "You know that neither of our boys ever touch liquor."

He turned on her defiantly, "How do you know? Can you be so sure they never will? How do you know that someone won't push a glass up under their noses someday and say, 'Here, Son, it's a holiday, just this one won't hurt you'? Can you be sure?"

She backed off uncertainly. "But what can we do? All our friends drink. About every third building is a bar or a tavern. You can buy the stuff everywhere; it's not illegal. What can two people do?"

His face hardened. "I don't know, but I'm going to do something." He picked up the glass and looked at it with cold determination. "Millie, I'll never touch a drop of liquor again as long as I live. What's more I'll never buy anymore or offer anybody a drink, so help me, no matter who he is!"

"But what will your friends say?"

"Oh, they'll laugh at me; they'll call me a sourpuss and say it won't last. But it will last—I swear it will."

"I know it will, and I'm glad." She laid her arm across his shoulders and said lovingly, "I'm proud of you, Sam, for feeling this way; most people would only feel sorry."

He sighed and relaxed against her arm. "Feeling sorry or ashamed isn't enough. That's only the first step. We have to do something. I don't know what, but we have to do something."

A MONTH LATER things were quiet at the Martin house. Millie watched Sam worriedly as he turned the radio on, dialed aimlessly, and then snapped it off. There was no doubt about it, Sam was restless.

"Sam, would you like to go over to Mabel and Jim's tonight?"

"No, it's no use; they'd offer me a drink, and then we'd start arguing again."

"A movie?"

"No, I'm sick and tired of movies. Just let me alone, I'm all right."

Millie put down her book and straightened up determinedly. "No, you're not all right. You're miserable and unhappy, and it isn't getting any better. Are you sorry you made that promise?"

He looked at her squarely, "No, I'm not sorry. I couldn't do anything else and still live with myself. It's just that I don't seem to be getting any place."

Millie smiled tenderly, "You can't make the world over in a month, Sam. You try too hard. Are they riding you at the office?"

"Oh, it's the usual bad jokes. The fellows would rather I'd not eat lunch with them. They say my water glass spoils their appetite. Then of course they never ask me to stop after work with them anymore."

"You miss all that, don't you?" she asked kindly.

"Oh, sure—but I'll get along."

"Sam, I know somebody who's glad about all this besides me. Doc Turner says you're in better shape than ever, and I'm so glad."

"I know. Even the elevator man stopped me last week and shook hands with me. Said he was proud of me for what I was doing."

"But, you just can't cut yourself off from people like this. You like people, and they like you. You'll have to get out some."

"But how?" he asked desperately. "Everywhere I turn, it's the same thing. All the people we know drink. If I go anywhere to eat, it's buy liquor. At lunch, after work—how can I fight it? I always wind up with an argument, and I'm sick of it. No, I'll stay at home."

"Listen," she said determinedly, "you can't take something out of your life without putting something else back in its place. You remember how the evil spirit returned and brought seven more with him—well, it's the same thing here. You ought to have a hobby."

"Good heavens, I'm fifty-five years old. I can't start playing games at my age—and I won't collect stamps."

"I know, Sam, but there are a lot of other things you could do. You could clean the basement and get out your old tools and do some of that cabinet work you've talked about practically all your life."

"I'm too tired for that . . . besides we can afford to buy any of that stuff we need now."

MILLIE GOT UP, irritated. "Listen to me, Sam Martin, you're not too old, and you're not too tired. You're just discouraged and feeling sorry for yourself. You can do anything if you really want to. Look at that young veteran and his wife living over Stanley's garage. He hasn't much to work with and very little money, but you ought to see what he made with just two hands. He drives a milk truck in the daytime and then works at night making wooden toys." She stopped and dropped her voice, pleading. "Remember that industrial arts teacher we met at the civic club last month? He's interested in woodworking. Then there's that youngest Larsen boy. Remember how he always was about picking up old things and working them over? You like boys, Sam, and they like you. Why don't you fix the basement up and invite these kids in to help you? Give them something to do; they need you. You said you felt responsible for one boy's life—well, here's your chance to give something back. We can afford it, and at least you'll be offering them something instead of liquor."

She paused and added softly, "Besides you promised me a new linen closet in the bathroom ten years ago, and I'm still waiting for it."

SAM GOT UP SLOWLY and grinned. "You know, those were pretty good bookcases I fixed up for the boys' room, weren't they?"

She smiled and answered hopefully. "The best, darling."

"I think I'll go down and look around the basement, see how many tools I've got left." He started for the stairs whistling good-naturedly, and Millie stood watching him with tears very close. He stopped suddenly at the bottom, and she waited apprehensively. Then he shouted "Who got all this stuff out?"

She sighed with relief. "I did, and there are a couple of old tool catalogs on the work bench. The prices will be higher now, but they'll give you an idea what you need to get started."

He began whistling again, and Millie sank into the big chair exhausted. A happy smile played around her lips, and she closed her eyes. It wouldn't do a bit of harm to thank God right now for answering her prayers.

A Bible Vignette

A Hero Without a Name

A number of nameless heroes and heroines march through the pages of the Bible, famous for their deeds, unknown by their names: the widow who fed Elijah; that poor creature, the Witch of Endor; the ideal woman of Proverbs 31, the Good Samaritan, and the man in vision who summoned Paul to Macedonia. Who were they? We would like to know.

The real "Forgotten Man" of the Bible, however, is named in a little story by The Preacher (Ecclesiastes 9: 14, 15):

There was a little city, and few men within it; and there came a great king against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it.

Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor wise man.

People have short memories for the help they have received, long ones for the sufferings they have endured. "Nobody knows the trouble I've seen" will be sung for a thousand years, and generations unborn will weep over it; but "Oh, what a beautiful morning" will be forgotten by the time you and I are carrying canes.

But for the efforts of "The Preacher," our anonymous hero would have lacked, not only a name, but a story; in which case there would have been one less illustration of the proverb, "Sic transit gloria mundi." People remember what they do for you; they forget what you do for them.

The Preacher was a good storyteller, but a poor reporter. He left out the name of the city; he forgot the date, the country, the name of the besieging king, and the strategy that saved the city. Working for a modern paper, he would have been fired on the spot.

One detail is given us: the wise man delivered the city "by his wisdom." Wisdom is neither spectacular nor dramatic, as stupidity often is. Wisdom makes a poor show. If the wise man had been a general and destroyed the city and half the population defending them, the survivors would have considered it a wonderful victory. They would have honored him in song and story, put him in the schoolbooks, and named their children for him.

But the poor man won by wisdom. Maybe he talked that king out of it—told him the little city wasn't worth taking and sent him home with his army and no fight. An anti-climax, certainly, and a disappointment to all those folk who had expected something grand, even if it killed them. A man who stops a fight never wins any friends.

One mystery remains—Was the story true? The critic says, "It could have been." It bears the mark of truth.

The man who is heroic in action, who risks his body in deadly combat, gets a statue in the public square—something for visitors to look at, for town loafers to lean against, for small boys to climb up and put old hats on, a place where pigeons light in fair weather. But the man who is heroic in thought, who tries to save humanity, may be fortunate if he is only forgotten. For sometimes the people treat such heroes as they did the Son of God—they nail them to a cross.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only those questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

What is our belief in regard to coaxing or insisting that people join the church?

ANSWER:

We are told that God "will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."—I Timothy 2: 4.

Certainly, we should be concerned about our relatives and friends, and about all the world, doing what we can to bring the blessings of the gospel into their lives which have meant so much to us. We should live such lives and so present the gospel to them that they will wish to join the church.

On the other hand, coaxing, teasing, and "insisting" that they should be baptized is a very crude approach to the problem, and very likely to disgust and repel them. Putting all the emphasis on baptism is a mistake. There must also be a conversion of the heart if membership in the church is to mean anything. Some people have been baptized into the church at the insistence of relatives and friends, without any change of heart or life. Neither they nor the church realize much benefit from such membership, unless a true spiritual experience comes later.

If we pray for our friends, and try to show them the spiritual truths in the gospel, they will wish to be baptized when the time comes. When we judge that such a time has come, it is well for us to invite them to join the church.

QUESTION:

When was the Jewish Sabbath given, and for what reason?

ANSWER:

This question is answered by Moses, who includes it with the covenant God made with Israel. He states that it was not made with their fathers, but with them. It was therefore a Jewish covenant, of which Moses says: "The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day."—Deuteronomy 5: 3.

In the preceding verse Moses states that it was made with them at Horeb. The explanation is also made that its purpose was to commemorate the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage. The statement follows: "Remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched-out arm; therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day."—Deuteronomy 5: 15.

Israel had been compelled to work every day in Egypt, but God gave them a day of rest, selecting the seventh day of the week, because in six days he had created all things and had rested on the seventh.

QUESTION:

When and by whom was baptism changed from immersion to sprinkling?

ANSWER:

The first instance of this change that we find recorded occurred about A.D. 250 in the case of Novatian, who, in anticipation of death and not being able at the time to receive immersion, had water sprinkled or poured upon him. Professor Newman says of this incident:

So great was the stress laid upon the ordinance by Novatian himself, that when he was lying ill and was not expected to recover, he submitted to what was afterward called clinic baptism; that is to say, he had water poured upon him while lying on his bed. This was one of the charges made against him by his Catholic opponents, who doubted the validity of such baptism and maintained that after his recovery he should have been properly baptized.—History of Antipedobaptism, page 18.

At that time the Roman Church did not recognize this as a proper baptism, and Novatian was denied membership, though ostensibly on grounds of moral lapses. But the controversy which developed on the subject in the course of time resulted in the recognition of sprinkling or pouring for baptism.

QUESTION:

What does I Thessalonians 4: 17, concerning meeting the Lord in the air, mean?

ANSWER:

This text refers to those Saints who are living at the time of Christ's coming to reign upon the earth, at which time they shall be caught up to meet him. Some have assumed that they will stay there with him in the air, because it says, "So shall we ever be with the Lord." But the text does not warrant such a construction, and Revelation 5: 10, which refers to the event, clearly states: "And we shall reign on the earth."

QUESTION:

Do the so-called soft drinks containing carbonated water come under the name of "hot drinks" (Doctrine and Covenants 86)? Are they more harmful than coffee?

ANSWER:

No, unless they are heated, they could not be called "hot drinks" by any stretch of the imagination.

The amount of harm resulting from drinking "soft drinks" depends upon the character of the beverage and the amount consumed. A church doctor has stated that a certain popular Cola beverage has about one half as much caffeine in it as an average cup of coffee. Caffeine is a strong drug, and in large doses, a poison. The Cola drinks might come under the "Word of Wisdom" as being related to "strong drinks," because of the caffeine content.

Anything can be harmful if too much is taken. A small child recently died from drinking too much water on a dare.

Any poison taken into the body is bad for it, except in individual cases when certain drugs are prescribed by a physician.

The carbonated water in soft drinks is said to be harmless. It may have a stimulating effect upon the stomach, causing a movement of other materials that need to be expedited. The gas itself passes off harmlessly. The quantities of sugar syrup used in soft drinks may be harmful to those who should not consume large amounts of it.

Bless That Man - By BLANCHE NEAL SHIPLEY

ROGER MAYUS GRABBED his old black felt hat from its honored hook in the front room and made a dash through the house for his overshoes on the back porch.

"It may be late when Dad and I get home this evening, Doris. Maybe you'd better get the calves in the barn," he instructed in exit. A car horn sounded out in the front, and he slammed the door in the back. "Don't worry about the pigs, though," he yelled as he rounded the corner of the house, and made for the front gate at full speed.

Doris began piling the dinner dishes. "Of all the hurry-flurry over nothing," she commented dryly to herself. "One would think they were called to a fire or the scene of an accident instead of merely going to a sale. In ten more years Roger will be as nervous and unsettled as a—flea. And as unthoughtful, too."

She glanced to the framed motto above the table—"God Bless This Home." The words stood out boldly against the silver background. Then, because she knew the rest by heart, she repeated slowly and barely audibly, "In kindness and mutual love let this home be builded. And may it be firmly established upon the rock of a pure faith in God."

Her voice trembled a little. A year had passed since first she and Roger had read those words together and had decided to hang the lovely little remembrance above the table where they could read it frequently. June one year ago they had taken the vows that had made them man and wife. With remarkable vividness she recalled the sincerity and the spirit of humble helpfulness with which the dear old minister had bestowed the gift upon them. "It is small in regard to monetary value," he had said to them that evening after the ceremony, "but its spiritual and aesthetic value cannot be measured in dollars and cents or in words. Only time will determine its value in your home. Let it remind you often of the vows you have taken and of the God who loves you."

Doris poured hot water over the dishes in the pan and began washing them. "Just one year," she repeated, "and Roger forgets all about our anniversary . . . no gift, no card of remembrance, not even a word to let me know he cares."

She rattled the dishes dangerously. "Nancy Telle would have to come breezing over here this morning with the orchid corsage Pren gave her! She knows we can't afford orchids, especially a whole pan full of them." (Pren and Nancy were married the same day Roger and Doris were, but because of parental backing, they had suffered no hardships nor reverses. Everything had been lovely for them.) "But a kiss doesn't cost money. He didn't even kiss me good-by when he started to the sale!"

A TEAR OF SELF-PITY fell into the soapy dishwater. She thought of all the inconveniences of the tiny house with its crooked walls and rough floors, of the dozens of socks she had mended, and the shirts she had patched. She thought of the hours of backbreaking toil she had spent on the yard, trying to make it look homey, of all Roger's faults, and they grew larger by the split second. Suddenly she stopped short in her washing task. Just what was Roger Mayus going to a sale for? It wasn't like him to waste a half day at this time of year when "cropping" procedures were in need of getting under way. True, it was muddy, but Roger was always busy doing something regardless of the weather. He hadn't mentioned any necessary tool or household article he intended to buy. "Anyway, we don't have the money for such things," she argued to herself. Surely he had gone simply for an outing with his dad. That must be it, for not once had he said, "Honey, you'd better go along, too," as he usually did when he was going somewhere. He probably was getting bored with his wife and had gone to the sale for sheer entertainment.

Arriving at such a conclusion was not at all healthy or comfortable. Doris resumed her dish-washing with vigor and vengeance. "If he brings home a mess of junk and ruffraff, he can take it to the barn. I won't have it in here!"

"What won't you have in here?"

DORIS WHIRLED AROUND to see Aunt Molly Cross smiling amiably at the screen. "Oh, was I talking out loud?" It was more of an exclamation than a question. "Goodness, how you did startle me. Come on in."

Aunt Molly was the "angel of mercy" in the neighborhood. It was she who ushered in the babies for miles around, and when the embarrassed parents fumbled for words to express their heartfelt gratitude and at the same time expose their drained finances, she would smile warmly upon them and say, "Never you mind about pay for me, children, but pay the doctor. Just grow this baby up into a fine healthy chap, and teach him a pure faith in God, and I'll have my pay a thousandfold." Usually such advice did something for people and acted as a challenge to their best efforts. Aunt Molly could sit in the evening hours and comfortably meditate upon most of her babies, many of them now grown tall, and seldom ever run into anything unpleasant to think upon. Occasionally a thoughtful youngster dropped in to chat with her and left some time later all warm inside and better able to meet the problems of life.

Yes, Aunt Molly was courageous and dauntless, but also tender and merciful. She loved and because she loved all from the strongest, most capable citizen to the poorest and most inconspicuous laborer, she was loved by a multitude of people.

Today, as Aunt Molly looked into the face of her youthful neighbor, she sensed something was wrong. At the same time she made this calculation, she also did a little mental scanning and came to the conclusion that about a year had passed since Roger had carried his pretty bride over the threshold of their humble house and had set into operation the processes of another home. "Homes are not set up over night," Aunt Molly would always say when talking to young people. "They grow and develop, sometimes from mere huts to places of beauty and security and peace. Each day you will add to these good things by living the love of Christ together, by sharing in joys and sorrows, by toiling in heat and cold, and by praying at all times."

AUNT MOLLY picked up a dish towel and began drying the dishes.

"My, what a lot of work I'll have to do when it dries up," she said in an effort to soothe the atmosphere. "Let's see—umm—why this is about the middle of May, isn't it?"

"The tenth, to be exact!" Doris spoke sharply. Then, immediately repenting of her harsh tone, she smiled and added, "This is our wedding anniversary."

"You don't say!" Aunt Molly looked up quickly to catch a tear in the pretty blue eyes of her hostess. "Uh-huh," she thought to herself. "'Tis a good thing I came over this afternoon. The poor child needs some lovin' and a mite of wisdom. No doubt Roger has forgotten the date altogether."

"How time does fly!" she said aloud. She dried the glasses and put them on their shelf in the cabinet. "I remember just as plain as day our first anniversary." She chuckled heartily.

"Did Uncle Henry remember it and give you a gift?" Doris asked quickly.

Aunt Molly chuckled again. "Lands, no, child, and that's where all the grief started. A man doesn't remember dates, much. They're too busy raising pigs and calves and planting crops to think of little details usually. But, bless 'em, they're grand creatures anyway. Just big, overgrown boys! That's what they are."

"Your anniversary, Aunt Molly, tell me about it."

The older woman picked up a gleaming white platter and began to dry it carefully. "It was this way," she began, slowly. "Henry and I had started out with nothing. Nothing but a world of love for each other and a determination to make our marriage a success. We worked hard and long, and skimped and saved. We ate the commonest of food and wore the plainest of clothing. We were poor, but we were happy. Then, along came the astounding news one day that I was pregnant. My, did that most bolster us over!" She laughed merrily in happy remembrance.

"Didn't you want babies?" asked Doris, gaining her usual cheerful mood by having Aunt Molly so close.

"Law, yes, we wanted babies," answered Aunt Molly with a twinkle in her eye, "but babies have a way of popping up at the most inconvenient times. Sure, we wanted the little angel, but as I said, we were poor, so you can imagine how we felt. Henry began to count every penny twice before he spent it, and figured early and late how to make ends meet. I shouldn't have expected him to remember all the special days, but, being young, I did."

SHE HUNG THE TOWEL in its place and settled herself in the one lone rocker to resume her story. The dishes finished, Doris took her embroidery work from the buffet drawer and sat down little-girl fashion on the rug by the door.

"I hope you weren't any poorer than we are," Doris said. "You know, we started out penniless, but, of course, I had my teaching job. That has been our saving grace the past year. It has helped us get on our feet."

"That it has," replied Aunt Molly, enthusiastically. "Many's the time I've said to Henry, 'Why, those children would have been mighty hard put for grocery money if it weren't for Doris' check.' And he always says, 'That's right, Mother, but Roger has a good head on his shoulders. He'll make it all right.' And you have. Your home is tiny, but it's as neat and clean and cozy as a little bit of heaven. It doesn't take a mansion to be a home. It's what goes on inside a house that makes the home, I always say." Aunt Molly looked admiringly at Doris. "And, child, your yard and garden would make any woman envious. You certainly do have a knack of making things beautiful."

"Why, thank you," said Doris. "But tell me more of your first anniversary."

"Goodness, it was a hectic day," chuckled her visitor. "That is, it was for me, for from the first hint of daylight, I began wondering if Henry would think of it. All through breakfast I hinted as openly as I thought was best, and not a word from him. He went to his work in the field—'twas the fifteenth of June—just as blissfully ignorant of the day as a pigeon. After he went out, I cried and got to feeling pretty sorry for myself."

"You cried!" Doris couldn't conceive of Aunt Molly's weeping in self-pity.

"Law, yes, child, I cried," admitted Aunt Molly. "And not only that. I thought of all the hard work I'd done, and of my birthday that he had missed until my little sister Ellen had reminded him of it, and, oh, there were so many hateful things that came into my mind. By noon, I wasn't fit to live with."

Doris couldn't help laughing at the dark picture being presented.

"It seems perfectly fantastic to think of your being that way," she said.

"I'm not at all proud of it," said Aunt Molly. "In fact, I have been so ashamed of it that I have kept it to myself all these years, but I thought maybe you'd enjoy hearing it this afternoon."

DORIS LOOKED into the kind, old face. "You knew all the time, didn't you? Well, go ahead . . . I'll confess."

Aunt Molly resumed. "Somehow we got through the noonday meal with no outburst of temper. Henry is that way, bless him. He won't argue. He went back to his work, and I busied myself with the dishes and such. When that was finished I went out to hoe, still rebellious and ready to cry. The day was warm, and the work was hard. I didn't feel any too pert, either. My mood wasn't at all desirable and I was beginning to tire of it, but I was too stubborn to change. Suddenly I heard a voice behind me and I turned to see Uncle Mose, the old Negro gardener for the rich neighbors down the road. He wanted some duck eggs for their little daughter. At once he noticed I had been crying.

"What's the matter, little girl?" he asked kindly.

"At first I thought I wouldn't tell, then I decided to get it off my chest. We sat down on the grass under a big elm tree, and I told him all about it—what a mean man I had, how neglectful he was and everything. When I had finished, Mose smiled and said, 'Now, if I talked that way about Henry you wouldn't like me any more, would you?' And I said, 'No, of course I don't want anyone else to say those things.' Then we both had to laugh—it all sounded so silly. Then he said, 'It is a pity he forgot about your anniversary, but, after all it is his anniversary, too. Have you given him a gift?' It struck me smack in the face. Here I had been feeling so sorry for myself all the time, and I hadn't thought of giving Henry a gift."

DORIS SIGHED. "You're certainly bringing me to my senses. What makes a girl have such silly spells?"

"It's natural for a woman to want attention on all the special days," explained Aunt Molly. "But so do the men. After Uncle Mose had talked to me a few minutes, I could see how thoughtful and good Henry had been. What if he had forgotten our anniversary! He hadn't forgotten the thousand and one little remembrances of his love every day of that year. When Uncle Mose got ready to leave, he said, 'Now, little girl, when you get blue and discouraged, and feel sorry for yourself, get out your Bible and read Philippians 4: 8, and then get busy and do something kind for someone, and see how soon the sun shines again.'"

"What is Philippians 4: 8?" asked Doris.

"It's a beautiful verse of admonition. It goes this way, 'Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.'"

"It is good." Doris arose from her seat on the rug. "You know what I'm going to do, Aunt Molly? I'm going to make an anniversary cake and decorate it with pink icing. And . . . well . . . I don't want my house cluttered up, but if Roger brings a whole mess of junk home from that sale, he can put it right here in the middle of the floor if he wants to!"

Aunt Molly laughed until the tears ran down her face. "That's the spirit!" she said gaily as she swabbed her eyes with a corner of her white apron. "Show the lad you love him. But now I must be off, or I won't get my evening chores done on time."

She put on her sunbonnet and stepped out on the porch. "Let me know what Roger bought at the sale," she called as she started briskly for home.

"I will," promised Doris from the doorway.

THEN SHE WENT to work. Roger liked devil's food cake, so devil's food it would be for their anniversary. Pink frosting might look funny on it, but Roger liked pink frosting. The egg beater buzzed, and the flour sifter clicked. With great care she counted as she beat the batter according to the recipe, for not one thing must go wrong.

It was almost 5:00 o'clock when she placed the pink cake in the center of the table and pronounced it a finished product.

"Roger will love that," she mused. "He's just a big, little boy as Aunt Molly said."

The calves began to bawl out in the barn lot. They were hungry. From now until the cows were turned in to them they would keep up a deafening medley of wails. Doris went out to shut them in the barn so the cows could come to the watering tank.

"You poor little black babies," she said as she patted their fat backs and shut them in their stalls. "You think you're starving, don't you? Well, you don't feel like it."

She glanced out to the hog lot where several fat shoats were fighting and squealing over a drink.

"For goodness sakes," she thought. "They must be out of water. I'll surprise Roger and fill their barrel and troughs."

So, taking a five-gallon bucket from a post, she went to the pump and began filling the barrel. When it was almost full, she dipped the bucket into it and started to fill the near-by trough. Just then a big sow came grunting around the corner of the shed and met Doris and the big bucket of water in a front-on collision. There was a wild shriek and a loud grunt. Then a commotion of mud and water and kicking feet, after which there was a calm and gentle quiet. The sow went on about her business as though nothing had happened, but Doris remained in a very disheveled condition in the mudhole. She straightened up and wiped the mud from her eyes. As she looked up, mud oozed aggravatingly about her.

"Of all the places to spend one's wedding anniversary!" she exclaimed crossly. "Is there anything dirtier than a hog?"

"Why, yes, right now I'd say there is. Just my wife, though."

ROGER MAYUS was over the fence in one bound.

"Honey, you look cute sitting there playing in the mud, but what's the trick? It really isn't like you, you know." His eyes twinkled and his chin wouldn't behave itself, but he knew it might not be safe to show too much mirth until he eased around a little. Doris was a peach, but she had a temper, and after all, this was an annoying situation.

Doris looked up appealingly. "Oh, Roger, why must everything happen to me? Go ahead and laugh, you goose. I know I look ridiculous. But help me up, please."

"Let me kiss you first, honey," he begged. "I never did kiss a lady in a hog wallow before. Isn't it romantic?" Whereupon he kissed her on the top of her head and explained, "The only clean spot on you, darling."

"Stop romancing and get me out of this. All afternoon I had planned how I would chore, then I'd fix up pretty for my husband."

"You'll need to wash up, anyway," agreed Roger as he pulled her out of the mud and gave her a scrutinizing once-over. "No bones broken, I guess?"

Doris laughed. "Nothing broken but my ego," she assured him. "Let's get to the house."

When they came to the back porch, Roger ran ahead and opened the screen door. Just inside sat a big fiber box holding a huge clump of the most exquisite orchid iris that Doris had ever seen. "Happy anniversary," he shouted.

"Oh, Roger, you didn't forget!"

"Like it, darling?"

"Like it? Why, Roger, I love it. It's so much nicer than Nancy's corsage. My clump will live for years. We'll have orchids for our grandchildren from it. But where did you get them?"

"At the sale, dear. It was a complete sale of all the earthly possessions of an old lady who died a few weeks ago. She was called the 'Flower Woman.' The people in charge told me that iris would live moved at any time of year."

Doris caressed the dainty petals of a flower. "You beautiful thing!" she said. "As for you, darling, when I tell Aunt Molly that you remembered our anniversary, she'll say, 'Well, bless that man!'"

Roger chuckled.

Opportunity Is Knocking

By Ruby Strand

A LITTLE TWO-YEAR-OLD went visiting. When she became restless, the lady of the house placed a box of brightly-colored blocks before her saying, "Build a nice, big church house for Jesus." The child played happily, looking up occasionally to repeat, "Church house. Jesus." In later visits to the same home, she invariably asked for the blocks and always built a church house for Jesus.

A woman had several toddlers in her charge during the church school hour on Sundays. One morning, not knowing she was to teach, she had made no lesson plan. Hunting about in a box of toys, she found a small basket and a doll that fitted into it. She began singing "Away in a Manger," rocking the basket gently back and forth. Each child wanted to rock wee Baby Jesus. Succeeding Sundays this same procedure was followed, all engineered by the children. They had had an experience with God and wanted to repeat it.

In the same group a lunch of graham crackers was sometimes enjoyed by the children with a "Thank you, Jesus." One mother later bore testimony that in the home her little one could be heard saying, "Thank you, Jesus," as she sat in her chair munching a cracker.

There is little more that needs to be said. These stories carry a message. Time is so precious. Many forces, not of God, are at work today. Our children need to take advantage of every opportunity to learn of him.

To be sure, we all intend to do many things which we never even start. This is good, so far as it goes, and it is guaranteed not to produce a backache. But dreaming has never built anything—not even a henhouse.

"A Robin Dies" - By ROBERT J. MILLER

I RECENTLY found my son in a very unhappy mood. Upon questioning him, I learned he and some other boys were playing with their slingshots. And, as boys will do, they were shooting at birds, hardly expecting to hit one. But my boy's pebble found its mark, and a robin fell to the earth.

In our conversation, he told me he was shooting at them hoping to come close enough to make them fly, but not intending or expecting to hit one.

Bill has always loved wild life of all kinds, and on various occasions has brought home such things as white mice, a praying mantis, garter snakes, a tortoise, a crippled pigeon, and a turtle dove. I know he told me the truth when he said he had not wanted to harm the robin.

I sought an answer in my mind which would not only console, but teach my son a lesson as well. I told him that perhaps this robin did not die in vain—that the incident might leave a lasting desire with him to mold a finer character through the years to come.

Sometimes the shock of a sudden realization of truth sobers and matures us. I hope that this robin's death created a keener appreciation of the value of life in my boy. I also hope he will recognize the fact that some acts, once committed, cannot be recalled and restitution must be made in some other way.

Parents often suffer many hurts from their children; but they forgive and continue to give of themselves under the impulsion of parental love until their day of life has ended. Frequently it is then that the life which was thus spent in unselfish love and devotion reaps its harvest. It is then that the child who was the object of affection gains an appreciation of love, remorseful for past mistakes and errors, repenting and witnessing the change by a new manner of life equal to or excelling that lived by his parents.

THE VIOLENT DEATH of Christ on Calvary alone did not sober men and women. That did not cause them to realize and appreciate the fact that he was truly the Son of God nor cause them to desire to live as he lived. But that act, plus the power he manifested over death, proved beyond all doubt that his words were true and came from God—that he was the Son of God. Then men awoke to the terrible truth that they had crucified their Lord, and that he, their best friend, had given his life for them, loving them still. Death did not end it all but was a means to a great end. The robin's life will not have ended in vain if it becomes the means of richer life in another.

YET ANOTHER LESSON I drew from my boy's experience. He shot at the robin to scare it—not to kill it. But the cold fact is that the robin is dead.

Often in a spirit of pique inspired by jealousy, envy, frustration, personal ambition or some other spiritual sin, we say mean things about people or commit hateful acts against them. Sometimes we bring out an unsavory fact that should be forever buried, or some hearsay without a shred of truth to support it which implies vicious affairs or misdeeds. We shoot at them with our barbed words or overt acts, not intending to destroy them, but hoping to hurt or scare them just enough to vent our spleen or accomplish our selfish ends.

When we do these things, we have no way of knowing how much damage we do. Some people are very adept at hiding their true feelings. The harm we do may be serious and of a lasting nature. "The spirit of man will sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear?"—Proverbs 18:14. Physical suffering is one thing; spiritual and mental anguish is quite another—it can wreck the soul.

This statement by the Master should be heeded, "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."—Matthew 12:31, 32.

These are the lessons inspired by the death of a robin.

Briefs

WINDSOR, ONTARIO.—About thirty Boy Scouts of the church-sponsored troop in Windsor are spending the first week in July at Camp Ernwigle, high on the bluffs of Lake Erie. Walter Thorp, Bob Newman and their assistants are going along with the boys in their camping. This is an annual event and the camp is sponsored by the local district of the Boy Scout organization.

WISCONSIN RAPIDS, WISCONSIN.—This is a new mission, just opened about the first of the year. The average attendance is thirty. Elder Ormand Kimball is the pastor. This good man requested a transfer in his occupation to this specific location that he might help in the work of the church.

SPARTA, WISCONSIN.—This branch has grown in membership from nineteen to fifty in the past three years. Twenty-five new members were inducted by baptism in 1948. The average attendance at prayer services is about twenty of which about half are children six to twelve years in age. An interesting fact is that almost all of these children take regular, active part in these services through prayer and testimony. Seventy James Daugherty, in reporting the news of the branch, explained that the growth has been largely due to the work of Ike Brockman, pastor and spiritual father to the group. At present this congregation is meeting in the basement of a home, but they are diligent in saving money for a church home.

ST MARY'S, OHIO.—During the month of March, Missionary Ray Ashenhurst held four weeks of cottage meetings. At the conclusion of these meetings, he baptized four and on Easter Sunday five more were baptized by the pastor Robert A. Galusha. These nine were confirmed on Easter Sunday, by Robert A. Galusha, Clarence Holmes of Toledo, Ohio, and G. W. Talley of St. Mary's. Several more candidates plan for their baptism for Children's Day. Recently the church building was given a new roof, and extensive redecorating is being done on the inside. The women's department is busy raising funds to help in the project. The Zion's Leagues of Lima and St. Mary's had a consecration vesper service during January when they paid tithing and filed inventories. Twelve members from the two leagues participated in the service. C. V. Holmes, district bishop's agent represented the bishopric in the service.

NORTHEASTERN ILLINOIS DISTRICT.—The annual district conference was held March 27 at Plano. Ordinations to the office of deacon were approved for Clinton Rogers of the Deslem Branch and Dale Anderson of the Mission Branch.

NORTHEASTERN ILLINOIS AND CHICAGO DISTRICTS.—A three day retreat was held at Camp Duncan near Chicago for the Zion's Leaguers of the two districts. The theme was "I Learn of Christ Through Fellowship." Staff instructors and leaders present included Apostle D. T. Williams, J. C. Stuart, Lloyd Hadley, Roy Healy, Jane Wight, T. R. Beil, and Gary Swanson of the Army Medical Corps.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—The Independence Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Franklyn S. Weddle, presented its last concert of the season on Sunday afternoon June 5, at 4:00 o'clock. Richard Smith, nineteen years old, the grandson of Ralph Smith who was organist at Stone Church for twenty-five years, was the soloist, playing the Hayden trumpet concerto. This young Latter Day Saint has been with the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra for several years. The remainder of the program was all request, numbers being played from concerts during the year.

Fourteen cars of Stone Church Zion's Leaguers drove from Independence on Memorial Day to Kernoodle's Lake near Grandview, Missouri, for an all-day picnic. Members of the staff included Eugenia and Tom Deal, Bill Anderson, Kay Jagers, Bill Thompson, Edgar Van Fleet, Marian Davis, and Doris Oakman. About eighty Leaguers spent the day swimming, hiking, and participating in sports.

The Stone Church Junior and Senior Zion's Leagues combined for a week-end retreat at Gardner Lake on June 4, 5, and 6.

LAKE ORION, MICHIGAN.—Elder Luther S. Troyer held a successful series of meetings, May 15 to May 22. He preached every evening, conducted priesthood classes, and made twenty-seven visits. He ended the series on Sunday evening, May 22. Six were baptized, three of which united families in the church. Brother Troyer has baptized twenty-three people, since the first of the year.

On May 15 at 3:00 p. m. the new church was dedicated. Apostle Arthur A. Oakman preached the sermon. Others taking part in the service were Elders Randall Hulse, L. O. Brockway, J. C. Muir, Harry J. Simons, and Melvin Russell, Pastor Henry Webster, Mayor Grover Shimmmons, John L. Hall and Miss Doreen Trudell.

SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI.—On May 8 an ordination service was held in the evening. Clifford Browne was ordained to the office of elder by Elders A. E. Starks and F. M. Bishop. O. Henry Plumb was ordained to the office of priest; Wilbur Troyer, Bill Bayless, and Emery Marvel were ordained to the office of deacon. At the Mother's Day Service, in the morning of May 8, the branch gave three potted plants, one to the oldest mother, Mrs. Wm. Sellers, age 77; one to the mother with the largest number of children present at church, Mrs. Maggie De Witt; and Mrs. Barbara Berridge Bayless, age 20, the youngest mother.—Reported by Barbara Bayless FOREST GROVE, OREGON.—On April 30 a building fund banquet was held. Two hundred twenty-five dollars was raised for the fund. A lot has recently been purchased. Each month, the women's department gives a food sale to increase the fund.—Reported by Velma Whiting.

LANSING, MICHIGAN.—The child study unit sponsored a Mother-Daughter banquet, May 3. A number of the women from the local branch attended the Fifth Annual Women's Institute of the Southern Michigan District, held at Belding, Michigan, May 15. Mrs. Jennie Page of Des Moines, Iowa, was the guest speaker.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—Several of the Latter Day Saints have gone in groups to see the movie, "Home of the Brave," recently released. It effectively presents a vital American issue, the racial problem, and has received the highest recommendation of these young people.

PASADENA, CALIFORNIA.—On Sunday afternoon, May 8, at Central Los Angeles Church, Alan Stiles was baptized by Elder Harry Waylett of the Pasadena Branch. Confirmation was on Sunday, May 15, at the 11:00 o'clock worship service. Eders Harry Waylett and Warren K. McElwain officiating.—Reported by Mrs. Ednah M. Strong.

PEKIN, ILLINOIS.—A mission has been opened in Pekin, sponsored by the Peoria, Illinois, Branch. The Saints will meet in a building used by the Navy Club on Five Points. Church school services will be held each Sunday morning at 10:00. The first Sunday of each month, Communion service will be held at 11:00 and church school at 9:00.

ROCK ISLAND DISTRICT.—The last week in each month has been designated as priesthood training week, and the priesthood of the district meet on the following schedule: Monday, Galesburg; Tuesday, Moline; Wednesday, Peoria; Thursday, Kewanee; Friday, Joy, Mather-ville, and Millersburg.

DALLAS, TEXAS.—Five people were baptized recently: Troyce Wheeler, Freddie Green, Janice Bratcher, Barbara Rodgers, and Merlin Metzler. Michael David and Mary Rebecca, children of Mr. and Mrs. J. Robert Billert; Wendy LaVelle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Wicks, and James Lawrence, son of Mr. and Mrs. Merlin Metzler, were blessed.

A new Hammond electric organ has been purchased by the branch. Elder H. E. Davenport is conducting a class for men on Wednesday evenings; several nonmembers are enrolled.

PHOENIX, ARIZONA.—Patriarch William Patterson preached a series of missionary sermons in Phoenix, June 1 through 15.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.—The annual business meeting of the branch was held on June 1, 1949, with Pastor George F. Robley in charge and Elder Almer Sheehy of Boston and Bishop Donald Chesworth of Fall River attending. New officers were Jerry Latham, church school director; Edwin Cockcroft, youth leader; and Jeanne Hallgreen, publicity agent. Other officers were sustained. The branch voted $200.00 from its surplus to be donated to the Onset Commissary Fund.

All Good Books

Brief Reviews by L. L.

The Crystal Fountain, A Volume of Poems by Grace Noll Crowell. Harper, 1948. 84 pages. $1.

No matter how many books of her poems one has read, he always finds something new and good in the latest volume. Perhaps it is because she addresses her songs to the heart—perhaps because she loves the earth and its humbler things, perhaps because she loves people and God. There is always something constructive in her verses—wisdom for life's mysteries, strength for its tasks, comfort for its sufferings.

Especially precious is, "An Older Mother Speaks,"

They come to me with questions in their eyes,
These mothers of small daughters and small sons

What shall she tell them?

And always there is God. I speak of him.
Without his help no mother's heart could bear
The anxious hours, the swift bright days abrim
With grave responsibility and care.

And she concludes,

O dear young mothers, give your children God.

You will find help in this good book when life is hard to understand.

The Angel Standing, or Faith Alone Gives Poise, by Archibald Rutledge. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, 1948. 48 pages. 75c.

Rutledge is a man of many talents. As a naturalist, there is no one in America who writes more beautifully and effectively. He has written with charm, sympathy, and understanding of the colored people, their lore and life, in his native South Carolina.

In recent years he has turned to religious subjects, and has won a new and even larger following of friends. This book begins with a line condensed from the tenth chapter of Revelation: "And I saw a mighty angel standing, with his right foot on the sea, and his left foot on the shore."

This story is typical:

Once I was talking with a famous biologist, who was boasting with intellectual pride that he would believe nothing he could not explain. I asked him if he was convinced that life on earth must have had an origin. Candor compelled him to admit that it must have had. I then asked him to explain it to me. I am still waiting for his answer.

It is things like that will make you stop and read whenever you see a book by Archibald Rutledge.

How to Think Creatively, by Eliot Dole Hutchinson. Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1949. 237 pages. $2.75.

This is the best book that has appeared in its field since the publication, in 1928, of the famous work, The Art of Thinking, by Abbé Ernest Dimnet. And in many ways the new book is the better one.

Dr. Hutchinson's book might have been given any number of revealing titles. "How to Put the Mind to Work," would be one. "The Exploitation of Insight," another. "The Employment of Genius," another, and so on.

One is impressed by the hundreds of interesting cases and examples drawn from literature, and from the lives of scientists, students, inventors, writers, composers, and people of superior intelligence. The book is based upon a prodigious range of reading, study, and reflection.

The key, according to the author, is insight that comes as a result of study, effort, exploration, and experiment that result in a synthesis and solution of the problem.

The writer is well qualified by study in American and foreign universities, under some of the best scholars of the century, and by subsequent experience, to do a book like this. His style is engaging, and the book easily read.

I Am Challenged By the Life of Christ

By MARILYN WOODS

CHRIST SAID, "Follow me," and no greater challenge has ever been hurled at mankind than those two words "Follow me." But how does this affect my life—what challenge do I find if I would follow him? To know this, I must have some idea of the characteristics or qualities revealed in the life of Jesus.

First of all, Christ spent many years in what I am sure was very careful and painstaking preparation for his work. His public ministry, as we think of it, did not begin until he was around thirty years old. However, we have no reason to suppose that Jesus refused all aid or ministry that might have been asked of him during those years of preparation. In fact, the one glimpse we have of Christ's childhood reveals that he was "about his Father's business" at a very early age. I believe that part of his preparation was willing service—as long as it did not require of him so much of time and effort that preparation for the greater service for which he had come to earth was forgotten or neglected. Thus, I am challenged to have the patience to prepare—to have the wisdom and will power to say "no" to taking too active or prominent a place (even in church work) now, that I may lay the foundation and make the development for greater and more far-reaching service later. Yet I must remind myself that Jesus did not procrastinate his service to God. His whole life was a tribute to his Heavenly Father—not procrastination but a perfect balance of preparatory and active service. Christ holds out this challenge to me.

WE FIND that the Master was thoroughly familiar with the Scriptures. He was able to quote them pertinently no matter what the situation. But more than this, by communion with God, he partook of the spirit of the Scriptures, and thus could properly interpret them by precept and example. He never allowed himself to become so involved in rites and forms that the basic meanings of any of God's com-

Here Is the Writer . . .

Marilyn Woods has been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1943. Soon after joining, she began to teach in the kindergarten department of the church school and continued to do so until she entered Graceland College. She was just graduated from Graceland and plans to teach in the Waverly, Iowa, elementary school this fall. Her home is in Des Moines. The accompanying article was first written for a service sponsored by the Zion's League.

mandments were lost. This is no small challenge.

Before every important act or decision, Christ spent long hours in prayer to his Heavenly Father. In all things he gave thanks. As I read the Gospels, I often find that, in the midst of his teaching or activity, Jesus would stop—lift his eyes and heart to heaven—and thank God for his mercy, or speak to the Father about some proposed action, as though he indeed had a friend always by his side.

It would seem that with so much study and preparation, with so much time spent in communion with God, that the Master would have little time for the petty everyday affairs of the people. This was not so, however; Christ had time even for little children. The Gospels are full of incidents wherein Jesus ministered to special wants of "unimportant" individuals. Never, in his busiest or most weary moments or even when he desired to draw apart in prayer, did Jesus turn any away who sought him.

This bond of love for people, a sincere desire to help them, constant communion with God, a thorough preparation and firm foundation through study and meditation were the outstanding contributing factors that made the Master of men a great teacher. Surely his skill in this field is a challenge to me. At his command, any method was suitable to the need of the moment. For instance, witness his thorough accomplishment in the application of parables. Jesus was never at a loss for some comparison to make between things heavenly and that which was familiar to the people with whom he talked—regardless of their condition or station in life.

I am challenged then, by the life of Christ to be constantly in touch with God—to be prayerful and to center my thoughts and affections upon that which is divine; to be ready and willing to draw the minds of my associates toward these things through means of their conversation or activity to help them see God at work and understand his plan for mankind.

CHRIST NEVER HESITATED to fight against evil, no matter where he found it. Custom and common acceptance because of long familiarity did not blind the eyes of the Master to the presence of evil; and, recognizing it, he fearlessly opposed it. I am thinking of the time when he cast the money changers from the temple. Some might have thought this an outrage to the temple, an irreligious act, perhaps even blasphemy—but Christ knew.

Here another challenge is revealed—the deep and abiding sense of a mission to be fulfilled. Such was the possession of the Christ. Holding fast to that assurance, he declared his message boldly. Yet at the same time he was humble and self-denying.

I have not given all the reasons why I am challenged by the life of Christ, nor have I exhausted the depth of those reasons I have given. Perhaps the greatest is the most difficult to explain. To illustrate, I call your attention to the response of Peter, Andrew, James, and John when Christ bade them leave their work and follow him. It was the Spirit of God permeating the Christ which challenged them. That same spirit is exerted today to draw us to Christ. To think about Jesus or feel the presence of his spirit inspires us to greater endeavor and better lives. I am challenged to live a life which will so reveal the Spirit of God that others are influenced for good.

THIS CHALLENGE we find in Christ's life is eternal, for as we gradually develop one or more of those divine attributes, there unfolds to us a new understanding and deeper appreciation of the life which Christ lived while on earth. Hence, the more we grow in his likeness, the greater becomes the challenge.

All this compels me to a more sincere effort toward study and prayer, toward understanding people, toward all things worth-while, than I have ever put forth before. I do not mean to imply that I possess these attributes I have mentioned. We are not challenged by that which we have already mastered—by that which is easily within our reach and requires little effort—but by things or persons higher and better than are we—by that which requires the best that is in us.

I am challenged by the life of Christ.

Graceland College
Lamoni, Iowa

Dear _____:

This year, 236 young people like yourselves, from thirty states and several countries, received their diplomas in Graceland's Zimmermann Hall, filed out in cap and gown to the lawn in front of the building, and said their last good-bys before taking their separate ways home. These were active, resourceful, and reasonably independent college graduates. But there was scarcely a dry eye in the crowd.

Not all of them had felt that way about Graceland two years before. Some had enrolled reluctantly and only because of parental insistence. But now it was different. There was no more misunderstanding about what Graceland was or what she represented. They had come to Graceland. They had known her virtues and her faults for two full years. They knew all about her -- for themselves. And now they were leaving -- forever.

Many were the testimonies that were exchanged that day -- friend to friend and student to faculty member. The Graceland of 1947-48 and 1948-49 would long be remembered by the class of 1949. Graceland for them would be a place to cherish throughout their lives -- for Graceland had given them something which few were willing to believe could ever be duplicated anywhere else.

The oldest and largest junior college in Iowa -- Graceland -- invites you to make this kind of an experience a part of your life.

Applications for admission to Graceland are now being received by the college. Send for your copy. The Student Selection Committee will be meeting all summer. They will be happy to consider your application.

There is still time to join with the class which will enter Graceland on September 8, 1949. There is still time to find your place with the class that will walk, diploma in hand, from Zimmermann Hall in 1951.

Sincerely,

R. Edwin Browne,

Director of Public Relations.

New Horizons

Notice to Pastors

Several weeks ago copies of a poster giving information about the admission requirements at Graceland College and inviting interested persons to contact the college for application for admission papers were distributed to the pastors of the church. However, owing to an error, some pastors did not receive the poster. If you are among the pastors who did not receive a copy, extra copies may be obtained by writing the Public Relations Office, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa.

Eastern Montana Reunion and Conference

The Eastern Montana District Reunion and conference will be held at Fairview, Montana, June 26 to July 3. Speakers for the reunion will be E. Y. Hunker, Philip Moore, and Arthur Gibbs. Meals will be served in the church basement for all who care to eat there. Further information may be secured from the district secretary, Lawrence Brown, Savage, Montana, or the district president, V. W. Ditton, Fairview, Montana.

Oregon District Institute

The Oregon District pastors' and women's institute will be held at the church in Vancouver, Washington, (Thirty-fifth and L Streets) on June 25 and 26. Women's classes will start at 9:00 a. m. on Saturday with Roycie Chapman, district women's leader, in charge. Other instructors will be Hazel Phillips and Effie Verhei. District President J. L. Verhei will speak on Saturday evening, and a church history play will be presented by members of Vancouver Branch. Classes for pastors and their wives will be held at 9:00 a. m. on Sunday morning. Bishop Monte Lasater and District President Verhei will instruct both days. The theme of the institute is "The Spirit of Dedication." Basket lunches will be served on both Saturday and Sunday.

Southeastern Illinois District Activities

The Saints at Flora, Illinois, will hold an official opening day for their new church building on June 26. All who wish to attend the services are invited to do so.

Those who plan to attend Brush Creek Reunion and wish to rent a tent (or need further information about housing accommodation) may contact Rufus Rockett, Box 460, Mt. Vernon, Illinois.

Nowata, Oklahoma, Home-coming

Home-coming services will be held at Nowata, Oklahoma, on Sunday, June 26. District President John Blackmore and Elder Lee Quick who was instrumental in organizing the branch will be present. All who have been members of the branch and friends and Saints in surrounding territories are invited to attend. A basket dinner will be served at the city park at noon.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Prayers are requested for A. B. Bunch, High Point Road, Peoria, Illinois, who has been seriously ill for the past six months.

Mrs. R. R. Petty, Reedy, West Virginia, a victim of cancer, asks to be remembered in the prayers of the Saints. She will also appreciate hearing from members who care to write.

Prayers are requested for Mary Hordy, formerly of Stockton, California, that she may regain her health. She is a faithful member but because of her physical condition is unable to attend church. At present she is staying with Mrs. Bridget Marglin, Box 737, Antioch, California. She would appreciate hearing from other members.

most fruitful field of missionary endeavor. Thousands were converted in a period of months, and the success of the mission so stimulated the church that despair gave way to a spirit of triumph, and the morale of the church was raised to new heights.

"Ah! Joseph was a good man," said David Whitmer. Yes, he was that—and more. He was a bold and inspired leader who would never have been satisfied with the small gains that so easily satisfy us in this day. He envisaged the winning of entire nations as reasonable objectives in decades, not centuries. Had he lived, it requires no stretch of the imagination to believe that most of the British Isles and perhaps other foreign nations would shortly have been won to the church.

THE WAY OF LIFE revealed through Joseph Smith is founded upon eternal principles and are, therefore, unchanging. The world today is just as hungry for revelation of the restored gospel as it was in the days of Joseph, and no obstacle should deter us from the prosecution of domestic and foreign missions. Financial security for the church is a desirable thing to achieve if people are not lulled to sleep by a sense of false security and providing the members do not become so engrossed in concern over the disposition of the physical assets of the church that they neglect to attack the real enemies of sin and ignorance. Nothing succeeds like success, and the measure of our success is dependent upon the morale of the people.

The secret of achieving unity within the church lies in our setting big goals and then hammering so incessantly at the accomplishment of those goals that we have no time for petty troubles within the organization. The church is never too weak to open new missions at home and in foreign lands or to make daring ventures toward other great objectives. Such bold steps may, in fact, so improve the morale of the church that wonders can be accomplished.

The cause of the Restoration waits for courageous leaders to move out with the boldness with which our martyred prophet led the church in his day. Then only will the church realize its true greatness; then only will the endowment of God's Spirit find fruitful soil in the high morale of the Saints; then and then only will the consummation of all things spoken of by the prophets be brought to pass in the building of the kingdom of God on earth.

To the accomplishment of this task, let us dedicate our lives anew in the spirit of a courageous leader and martyred prophet, Joseph Smith.

Under the Mosaic code, people were obliged to forgive seven times. But Jesus declared a law of infinite adjustment when he admonished Peter to forgive "Until seventy times seven." John the Baptist demanded "fruits meet for repentance" (Luke 3: 8) to be worthy of repentance. So sinners have some responsibilities, too.

It is not enough to love humanity at large—we must learn to like individuals. Begin by determining to like, or love, other people, and they have a chance to like you. Someone must take the initiative. The law of love can begin its work in you.

L. J. L.

Grateful for Blessing

I have received miraculous blessings through administration. For these I am humbly grateful to God and his servants who have sometimes traveled many miles to carry out this phase of their ministry. I have undergone two serious operations in the past three years. I am not entirely well yet, but God has given me strength to be up and help with the household duties. I ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints that I may be made strong enough to labor for him in every way I should. I want to set an example for my friends that will cause them to want to follow the Master.

MRS. LILLIAN MATNEY

DEATHS

TOMLINSON. — Jane, daughter of Robert and Christina Buchanan, was born February 1, 1862, at Bunkum, Iowa, and died May 10, 1949, at the Independence Sanitarium. She was married to Stuart S. McDole on October 6, 1880; one daughter and two sons were born to them. Both sons, Dana S. and Robert A., preceded her in death. Her husband, Stuart, died on December 1, 1889, and on February 1, 1891, she was married to David B. Tomlinson; four children were born to them. Two of these daughters, Mary C. and Lena F., have also preceded her in death. Mrs. Tomlinson was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on January 23, 1898, at Grand Junction, Colorado. In 1902 the family moved to Spokane, Washington, where Mr. Tomlinson died on June 17, 1904. Here Sister Tomlinson remained until the children were grown. Her home was open at all times to missionaries, and she enjoyed many rich spiritual blessings. In 1927 she moved to Independence to make her home with her daughter, Mrs. Olive Crabb.

She is survived by one son, Amos Tomlinson, and two daughters: Mrs. Edna Kennedy and Mrs. Olive Crabb, all of Independence; twelve grandchildren; and fifteen great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Claude A. Smith and Oscar Case at the Roland Speaks Chapel in Independence. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

* SPEAK THE WORD

"Take the zipper off your mouth The thing that gets me down, more than any hasty word or bad temper, is the strangely silent Latter Day Saints who fail to speak the word. The woman who brought me into the church was a humble, kindly telephone girl. She spoke the word. Any good I do here in New Westminster or anywhere else, that good sister has a share in."—Apostle C. G. Mesley, in "The District Challenger," British Columbia.

* DIARY

There was a cup of rain and a hatful of wind last night, so the power was off as usual. The day dawned with all the gadgets on strike—electric lights, clock, stove, refrigerator, shaver, toaster, and what not. As we become more civilized—if that's what it is—we are more dependent on the creations of our own hands. A kind of idolatry, isn't it? Two tall candles, that gave a soft and flattering glow to our dinner party last week, were left and lighted our way through the dimness of the morning hours. An antique oil lamp, flickering smellily, assisted. It was like turning the calendar back fifty years to grandfather's day, and it gave a nostalgic touch to the heart, imagining what it would have been like to be living then. Even in the rain and wind, the mind goes adventuring.

Galley Notes

* PARADE

We like parades in Home Town. Most of them are for the Big Folk, who also enjoy dressing up for the crowds. Then there is one especially for the Little Folk every year, sponsored by the Kiwanis, when every child in town who has a pet of any kind can march in some classification and show off his pet, in costume or not as he chooses. This year's Pet Parade (May 25) drew many children and a large attendance. The biggest dog was a St. Bernard, the size of a small bear; the smallest was in a wicker basket, and carried in state. There was a pet mole, earnestly trying to dig his way out of a corn popper; a skunk, incompletely neutralized, with his emotions upset; dozens of Shetland ponies with their small riders; tiny majorettes with their curls and pompons blowing in the wind; small vehicles with strange occupants in the drivers' seats. Loveliest of all the exhibits were the children themselves, smiling and happy on their big day of the year.

* BUS VS. CAR

In this country, there are two classes of people: those who ride public service buses, and those who drive their own cars. Rarely the twain do meet. One class worries whether there will be a seat on the next bus; the other worries whether there will be enough money for the next monthly installment on the car.

It is good to change classes for a while, learn how "the other half" rides, to hear the talk, discover the humor, to know something of the fatigues and interests of your fellow citizens. Have you ever thought that your car is a snug little cell that shuts you off from the world?

* SHORTS

Be as wise as your heart. It does its work one beat at a time, and never worries about a future beat.

Two Men I Honour, and No Third

First, the toilworn Craftsman that with earth-made Implement laboriously conquers the earth and makes her man's

A second man I honour still more highly; him who is seen toiling for the spiritually indispensable; not daily bread, but the bread of Life These two, in all their degrees, I honour; all else is chaff and dust, which let the wind blow whither it listeth.

Unspeakably touching is it, however, when I find both dignities united; and he that must toil outwardly for the lowest of man's wants, is also toiling inwardly for the highest. Sublimier in this world I know nothing than a Peasant Saint, could such now anywhere be met with. Such a one will take thee back to Nazareth itself; thou wilt see the splendor of heaven spring forth from the humblest depths of earth, like a light shining in great darkness.—T. CARLYLE.

Introducing...

LYNN ELBERT SMITH (page 5) was born in Lamon, Iowa, January 20, 1911. He was graduated from the Independence (Missouri) High School in 1929, and entered the University of Kansas that fall. In 1930 he began a two-year course at Graceland, where he received two gold seal awards and membership in Lambda Delta Sigma. He continued his education at Kansas State Teachers College, Pittsburg, Kansas, where he received his B.A. degree in 1934 and his M.S. degree in 1936, majoring in mathematics and education, and also held membership in Kappa Mu Epsilon.

Lynn had a teaching fellowship at Graceland and also at the Kansas State Teachers College. He taught five years at the Girard (Kansas) High School. From 1940 to 1942 he was pastor of the Boston, Massachusetts, Branch. From 1943 until the present time he has worked as an aeronautical engineer for the North American Aviation Corporation.

In 1937 he married Lorene Gaines. They have two sons: David H., 4; Eric, 3. His hobbies are photography, pipe organ, architecture, model railroad.

EMMA SMITH KENNEDY (page 7) was baptized by her father, Alexander H. Smith, at Stewartville, Missouri, in May, 1881. She married William F. Kennedy at Andover, Missouri, in 1887. She has one living daughter, Glenna M. Henderson. Her birthplace is Plano, Illinois.

Says Sister Kennedy of herself: "I saw the first spade of dirt turned for the building of the Stone Church, and was present at the laying of the cornerstone."

She began teaching in Sunday school in the brick church on East Lexington Street in 1882, and taught for nearly thirty years.

She is a member of the Patroness Society and the Laurel Club.

R. GERALD GABRIEL (page 12) was introduced when his last article appeared April 23, 1949. The recent Joint Council gave him an appointment to the Far West Stake, with Stewartville, Maple Grove, and Osborn as objectives.

LEONA HANDS (page 16) had her first article, "The Game of Hearts," in the Herald on January 8, 1949, though several of her poems were published last year. Her maiden name was Leona Nellie Burkholder. She married William Hands on September 7, 1924.

Because of poor health during the past eight years, she says: "I have taken time that I once thought I could not spare to study and learn. Afflictions make us more understanding and tolerant. I think I have grown a little."

News & Notes

CHEVILLE IN EUROPE

Dr. Roy A. Cheville of the Graceland College faculty arrived in Birmingham, England, on June 6, after spending a day or two in Paris. Arrangements are being made so that he can go to Germany with Eugene Theys. Starting in Hannover the two brethren with Brother Franz Beil of Hannover, who is taking his vacation at that time, will visit Saints in much of the American Zone and some of the British Zone. Dr. Cheville is spending several weeks in school at Oxford University, England.

Apostle D. Blair Jensen visited the Saints in the Scandinavian countries, leaving England June 15. He spent the week end of June 4 in Wales where at the afternoon meeting there were sixty-five Saints present.

SCHERERS HOME

Seventy and Mrs. Albert Scherer and their two children arrived in Independence by train June 11, returning from a year and a half mission to Europe with special work in Holland.

HIELD TO YOUTH INSTITUTES

Apostle Charles R. Hield reports that Northern California District held two Zion's League institutes rather than a youth camp. The first one was held May 21 and 22 in Santa Rosa. Le Roy Burdick, young people's leader of the district, was in charge, assisted by District President Lawrence McDonald. The second institute was at Modesto, June 4 and 5. Apostle Hield attended both institutes.

WIRE SERMON IN AUSTRALIA

On March 27, at Balmain, Australia, the wire recorder, recently received from America, was used to present the sermon. Apostle D. T. Williams' sermon, preached at General Conference, was heard. The balance of the service was as usual. This recorded sermon met with considerable publicity, and Sydney's two evening newspapers carried forward announcements of it as news items.

HOUGASES TO DENVER

Elder and Mrs. Ward A. Hougas left Warrensburg, Missouri, for Denver, Colorado, June 3 to make their home there. Beginning July 3, the Denver congregation broadcasts the Sunday morning services at 11:00 o'clock over radio station KFEL and KFEL-FM.

GOMER GRIFFITHS AT HOME

A letter from Missionary W. E. Williams states that Gomer T. Griffiths has left the hospital and is now at his home. His condition seems a little improved. He celebrated his ninety-third birthday on June 3.

WILLIAMS IN ILLINOIS

Apostle D. T. Williams spent the week following May 29 in the company of Lyle Woodstock, working in priesthood meetings in the Rock Island District. During Friday and Saturday, June 3 and 4, he met with about 100 young people of the Chicago District at Camp Duncan, near Chicago. On Sunday, June 4, he was at Fort Madison, Iowa, for a district conference of the Nauvoo District.

LONDON CONFERENCE

President F. Henry Edwards was in London, Ontario, Canada, for a priesthood and branch workers institute held June 3, 4, and 5. All workers in the London District were invited. Classes were held Friday evening and all day Saturday. A banquet was held on Saturday evening.

Support Your Church Institutions

"Sustain each other in peace, and ye shall be blessed with my Spirit, in comforting and strengthening you for my work."

—Doctrine and Covenants 117: 13, by President Joseph Smith III, 1873.

"The Saints should work together in the rich fraternity which can and will prevail among them when they keep the commandments."

—Section 138, by President Frederick M. Smith, 1940.

"The church is admonished again that joint responsibility is laid on all. Properly and equally borne, this responsibility will insure success, the consummation will be glorious, and all will share in that glory."

—Section 141: 8, by President Israel A. Smith, 1948.

The Unity of the Church

It is a normal human tendency to separate, to go diverse ways for different purposes. There is a kind of repulsion among people that makes them scatter over the face of the earth; they go as far away from each other as possible, working independently and sometimes in opposition to others.

Our need of unity was expressed in the beginning of the Christian church in the statement, "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular."—I Corinthians 12: 26, 27.

Our success depends upon working together at all times, supporting all projects and departments of the church work. In unity is strength; in separateness is defeat.

The Church in Action

Our church institutions are not really separate things at all. They are the church in action in special fields of service. The church does many things for its people. It converts them through its missionary program. It ministers to them through its pastoral program. It educates them in its church school. It informs them with its publications. It protects their homes with its visiting and counseling services. It seeks to guard their physical welfare with its health program. Besides these, there are many other special services rendered as need arises.

The church conducts its main lines of service directly. Some of its special services are rendered through institutions which require professional or technical training of those who serve in them. These institutions are the church at work.

The Local Church

Have you thought of your local church, the home of your congregation, as a church institution? Such it is—a local representative of the world-wide church—your part of it.

You support the general church by the payment of tithes. Have you thought of your responsibility to support your local church in its work? There are various ways in which you can support it, and in which it needs help.

First, you can attend services. This is something you should do for yourself. You cannot send your wife and children as substitutes. They can attend only for themselves. God does not save people by families; he saves them as individuals. You are saved or lost by your own record, not theirs. Wouldn't you be distressed to spend eternity in hell, wondering what they were doing in heaven?

Second, you can contribute to the financial support of the local church. It has expenses which must be met if it is to operate. It is not a profit-making concern. It has no set income except from its people. It needs your bit of help.

Third, you can do some useful work—teach a class, keep up the building and grounds, help with young people, or serve in some way.

All these things are good for you, as well as for other people.

Graceland College

Graceland College is the church in action in the field of higher education. When you support Graceland, you are supporting the church. Graceland specializes in preserving and imparting the ideals of the church during the important years when our young people are beginning their work on the collegiate level of instruction.

The Sanitarium

The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital is the church in action in the field of health. When you support it, you are supporting the church. When your daughters go there to train to be professional nurses, they are serving the church. Many a missionary, many a member, many a church official, is alive today because somebody's daughter helped to take care of him at the Sanitarium.

Herald Publishing House

The Herald Publishing House is the church at work in the use of publications — books, periodicals, quarterlies, tracts, etc.—for carrying on its work.

Some people get all their church information and religious instruction in their local congregations. This is bound to be incomplete, because no one person can attend all meetings. For a fully rounded spiritual life, a member needs to read the church publications and study in a planned way. If he does not, his progress will be retarded or stop altogether. Church papers keep members fully informed on all churchwide movements, events, and plans.

The pastoral theme for June is "Support Your Church Institutions." You personally can do something about it.

Appointment of District President

Notice is hereby given of the appointment of Elder R. Melvin Russell as president of the Flint-Port Huron District to fill out the unexpired term of Elder H. J. Simons, resigned. The appointment is made subject to approval of the next district conference.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By F. Henry Edwards

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Garland Tickemyer, Los Angeles, California, April 22:

I am pleased to report to you that the district choir performance of The Messiah under the direction of Franklyn Weddle was probably the most successful undertaking ever carried out in our district. The success may be attributed almost entirely to the inspirational effect upon our singers of working under such able direction.

The singers worked hard learning their parts, but from the moment Brother Weddle took the baton, the choir seemed inspired. He reached a large group of people in the district who are ordinarily little affected by the visits of general church officers. By the example of his perfectionist demands, he has unquestionably elevated the concept of what constitutes good performance.

I am also pleased to report to you that attendance at all churches in our district was approximately doubled on Sunday morning. Each of our missions ran a little over 100 per cent. Central had 412, Pasadena, 165, and Temple City, 110.

We seldom use this column for a letter from Herald correspondents, but this is an unusual letter. It is so genuine and appreciative that it merits special treatment. It will come as sweet music to the ears of our many contributors as well as to those of the editors. We are fond of bouquets.

Dear Editor:

I feel compelled to write a letter of gratitude to all connected with the publishing and editing of the Saints' Herald. I'm so grateful to belong to a church that furnishes us with such elevating reading material.

Many times in my weakest moments of despair I stop and pick up an issue of the Herald and just select an article at random. I have never failed to be helped and strengthened in my desire to be a better person. It has helped me at times when I've felt there was no answer to some of my problems.

My "hat goes off" to the many fine people who furnish these interesting experiences and stories. May this wonderful work ever continue, and may our Heavenly Father bless all those connected with it is my earnest prayer.

Yours in faith,
MRS. RUTH ASLIN.

3606 Agnes Street
Lynwood, California

Readers of the Herald will recall a statement in the issue of January 15 regarding a sales talk made by Bishop C. A. Skinner to a garage man in Illinois named George Dennewitz. This sequel to that sales talk is supplied by Elder Ray Whiting:

The President of the Northeastern Illinois District, Elder Lloyd Hadley, read the article and, in company with Brother and Sister James A. Martin, visited Mr. Dennewitz. A very interesting conversation followed and resulted in Mr. Dennewitz' attending our church which is located near Forest, Illinois.

A few weeks later I was asked to conduct a two-week series in Forest. Mr. Dennewitz was a regular attendant, and at the close of the series he and three other fine men were baptized. Mr. Dennewitz is a splendid person and a successful businessman. He is showing signs of becoming a good local missionary. He brought several of his friends with him to this series, loaned his books and tracts, and did what he could to inform all who would listen.

From a recent letter of his, I take the following excerpts: "I am sure that anyone who hungers the least bit for the true gospel cannot help appreciating talking with a person so truly interesting to talk with as Bishop Skinner. . . . Through Bishop Skinner I was led to the church, which I sincerely feel is what I have been seeking for many years. . . . I am fully confident that through God's grace and our joint effort, we can surely succeed in our service to his kingdom. . . . I sincerely hope and pray that I may live so more shall follow God's blessed way."

And so we see that once more it pays to advertise.

Captain Floyd H. Engstrom, Chaplain at Headquarters Station Hospital, Camp Chaffee, Arkansas, under date of June 1, gives us very important information which we print here for the benefit of all of our young men who are called into military service and who take their training at Camp Chaffee or, for that matter, at any other military training camp. What Captain Engstrom says is important:

I would like to suggest that a note be placed in The Herald, asking all our men in the armed services to be sure their records carry the church preference, "Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints." I find men coming through that are still putting "Latter Day Saints." The Utah Mormons get credit for all these men.

Some will ask, "What difference does it make?" I assure them that it does make a difference in several ways aside from the number of chaplains assigned the church. Figures and statistics are constantly being published about the support of armed forces by various churches against their percentage of population. I may be unduly proud, but I do not like it when the comparisons are adverse to us.

It is my personal opinion that the Utah Mormons got the credit for hundreds of our young men in the armed forces all during the war. I know that it is a long name and there usually isn't space, but one can write "Reorganized Latter Day Saints" if nothing better.

"Herald" Features Coming

"So You're Going to College?" in July 11 issue. President E. J. Gleazer, Jr., has something of interest to say to our young people (and their parents) who face an important decision. Even if you have not chosen Grace-land, it will do you good to read this article. The Australian Issue of the Herald will be dated July 18, 1949. The full story of the church in this important continent will be told. The history of the pioneer missionaries and their successes in our largest mission abroad is interestingly presented by some of our best writers.

What Did Joseph Smith Teach?

Radio sermon by Lynn E. Smith, given at Carthage, Illinois, over Station WCAZ

[Introductory note: During a memorial service conducted by general and local church authorities at Nauvoo by the graves of Joseph, Hyrum, and Emma Smith, Lynn E. Smith, son of Elbert A. Smith and great-grandson of Joseph Smith, founder of the church, was invited to come to Carthage and speak over the radio on the subject, "What Did Joseph Smith Teach?" The fact that a descendant of the Prophet should have been invited to talk over the radio to people of the community in which the Martyr met his untimely death speaks well for the change in public sentiment and feeling toward the church. It also speaks well for the confidence and respect won by the general church and no less so by the local church people in the Nauvoo District. A transcript of the sermon follows.]

THERE ARE OTHER COMMUNITIES which are as old as Nauvoo, but their past does not arouse the imagination and catch the interest as does the story of this town founded 100 years ago. The history seems to read as a book from the Scriptures as it unfolds a story of a modern Moses leading his followers across miles of wilderness to a bountiful promised land, laying down a new spiritual law of economic righteousness, and restoring in full the principles of the gospel of Christ.

Although the church was first organized in the state of New York, Joseph and his followers looked to the West for a land of promise where converts from all over the world could gather and build a city of equality and righteousness. Unable at that time to gain a permanent foothold in the state of Missouri because of religious persecution, the church finally settled in Illinois and founded the city, Nauvoo, on the banks of the Mississippi River.

BUILDING NAUVOO

Many fine homes of brick and frame construction were built, manufacturing and industry of various kinds were established, stores opened, a university faculty appointed, and—the crowning achievement of all—on the hill overlooking the city and the semicircular sweep of the river below, a temple was built in which the people could worship. In a short span of six years, Nauvoo grew from a swamp pioneer settlement of a few dozen individuals to a clean, healthful city of twenty to thirty thousand. This was a remarkable achievement indeed. Only a people with consecrated lives and a unity of purpose could have accomplished what was done. And it was the leadership of Joseph Smith that held them together and directed their activities so that all would be working for the good of the common weal.

WHAT MAGNET DREW THE PEOPLE?

THERE MUST HAVE BEEN something worth-while and fascinating in the doctrines that Joseph Smith taught, for his followers to grow to a multitude of over 100,000 in the fourteen years from the organization of the church to the untimely death of its leader. Although his life was cut short in its prime, his teachings and doctrines live on, and today he has over an estimated million followers including the different factions that sprang up after his death. Some of the factions have held true to the original doctrines while others have departed largely from his teachings and have introduced new ordinances and principles.

What were these doctrines of Joseph that induced so many to ally themselves with his followers? What were these teachings which led thousands to leave home and country to travel across oceans and through miles of wilderness so that they might unite in the endeavor to build a community which they called "Zion"?

Down deep in the heart of every citizen of this country or any country, there is a desire to live in a community of righteousness and liberty, where everyone has an opportunity to labor, where each industrious individual is assured of his needs and just wants of the material things of life, and where there is neither the extremely rich nor the extremely poor. The promise of such a community was held out to the people in the doctrine of the church. With this in mind, is it any wonder that the church quickly grew to such a large membership? Is that not also an answer to the phenomenal growth that Nauvoo underwent in the few years following its founding?

A SPIRITUAL LAW IN ECONOMICS

What was this spiritual law of economic righteousness on which such an ideal community could be soundly established? What were the principles taught by Joseph regarding the economic order of the "Zion" that the church wished to establish? Did these principles vary any from those of the economic order of that day and time? A careful study of them will reveal that they are unique, logical, and would be effective, if practiced wholeheartedly by a group of people. The fundamental concept of the new law is that the earth and everything therein is owned by God, who is the maker of all things. Each individual is a steward over that which he possesses and is responsible to God for the use or misuse of his trust. To bring all closer to a median standard of living, those who produce more than they need are to consecrate and donate their surplus—which in reality is God's, not theirs—to the use of the poor and needy.

Today it is said that the trouble with our economic system is "faulty distribution." Would not this law of economic righteousness bring about a more equitable distribution of our so-called "surplus products" and restore business to normality?

RELIGIOUS PRINCIPLES TAUGHT

ASIDE FROM THE PRINCIPLES of the economic structure, Joseph Smith taught certain religious principles that are in harmony with the teachings of Christ. The official statement of the belief of the church is:

We believe in God the Eternal Father, and in his Son Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost.

We believe that men will be punished for their own sins and not for Adam's transgression.

We believe that through the atonement of Christ, all men may be saved by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel.

We believe that these laws and ordinances are: (1st) Faith in God and in the Lord Jesus Christ; (2nd) Repentance; (3rd) Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; (4th) Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost.

We believe in the resurrection of the body; that the dead in Christ will arise first at his second coming when he appears to usher in the millennial reign, and the rest of the dead will not live again until the thousand years are ended.

We believe in the doctrine of eternal judgment, which provides that man shall be judged and rewarded or punished, according to the degree of good or evil he shall have done.

We believe that a man must be called of God and ordained by the laying on of hands of those who are in authority, to entitle him to preach the gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof.

We believe in the same kind of organization that existed in the primitive church, which is, apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers, and all other officers provided for in the Scriptures.

We believe that in the Bible is contained the word of God. We believe that the canon of Scripture is not full, but that God, by his Spirit, will continue to reveal his word to man until the end of time.

H. G. Wells, the English historian, in his book, The Salvaging of Civilization, speculated in one chapter on the questions, "Why did the Bible come to an end? Why did God cease to speak to people? And why does he not speak to people now?" We have an answer to this challenge that no other church has. Our Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which we use as a supplement to the Bible, contains revelations that have come to us during the history of our church. We believe that God still speaks to people, and this book is our open canon of Scripture.

Continuing with the statement of the belief of the church:

We believe in the powers and gifts of the everlasting gospel, which are: wisdom, knowledge, faith, healing, miracles, prophecy, discerning of spirits, tongues, interpretation of tongues.

We believe that marriage is ordained of God; and that the law of God provided for but one companion in wedlock for either man or woman. In cases where the contract of marriage is broken by death, the remaining one is free to marry again, and in case of breach of the marriage covenant, the innocent one may also remarry. . . .

We believe that men should worship God in "spirit and in truth," and we claim the privilege for ourselves and all men of worshiping Almighty God according to the dictates of conscience, providing that such worship does not require a violation of the constitutional law of the land.

We believe that all men are bound to sustain and uphold the respective governments in which they reside while protected in their inherent rights by the constitutional law of such governments, and that sedition and rebellion are unbecoming every citizen thus protected.

We believe in being honest, true, chaste, benevolent, virtuous, and in doing good to all men; indeed, we may say that we follow the admonition of Paul: We believe all things true, we hope for all things good, we endured many things and hope to be able to endure all things necessary to the glory of God. If there is anything virtuous or lovely or of good report or praiseworthy, we seek after these things.

RISE OF THE REORGANIZED CHURCH

SUCH WERE the teachings of Joseph in principle when he was still alive and leader of the church. When he was killed, his people soon scattered, and the church organization was disrupted. While many followed other leaders, there was a group of men who remained true to the teachings of the founder of the church, and when Joseph's oldest son and namesake, young Joseph Smith, became old enough, he was called and ordained to lead the Reorganized Church.

In the Congressional Record of December 13, 1906, Senator Julius C. Burrows made this statement concerning the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints:

The courts have repeatedly declared this organization to be the legitimate successor of the original Mormon church, and its adherents, . . . peaceable, patriotic, and law-abiding citizens . . . conforming to the laws of their country wherever they may be and adhering to the faith of the founder of their creed, repudiating and denouncing the doctrine of polygamy and its attendant crimes, without temple, endowment house, or secret order, worship in the open like other church organizations, unquestioned and unmolested.

Another senator, Fred T. Dubois, in the Congressional Record of December 17, 1906, makes a like statement: "The Josephite Mormons—in the State of Iowa, and wherever they are, no matter in what part of the country, are among the best of our citizens in all respects."

Such is the reputation today of the people of the church which was founded by and which follows the teachings of Joseph Smith.

For fifty-three years, Young Joseph led the church founded by his father, and when he died in 1914, the Kansas City Journal gave him this editorial tribute:

He was the prophet, but first of all he was the Christian gentleman and the good

Zion Will Be - By EMMA SMITH KENNEDY

WHEN I THINK OF ZION, I think of a clean city with well-kept homes and streets—a city that has no dearth of trees and flowers.

I came to Independence as a child. At that time, it might have been called one of the waste places that needed rebuilding. There were a few prosperous business places and a few lovely homes, but the streets were narrow and unkept.

There stands out in my memory the "public square," as it was called in those days. It was pretty and neat, except for the courthouse, which was always surrounded by teams. Everything raised on the farm was loaded into wagons and brought to the square. In the early fall there was wood, corded and ready for the buck and saw. It was good wood—hickory, oak, bitternut, and walnut, with the lighter species for firewood. There were great loads of corn, too, both yellow and white, and it was no rare thing to see herds of hogs and cattle being driven past to the cattle yards of Kansas City. What a scurrying there would be at the cry of the driver as the cattle made their way over the old Lexington Road, now Highway 24. We could hear the grunts of the hogs as they rambled over the yards when the gate was open. It took a hurried chase to get one bolder than its fellows back to the herd. It was a good idea to get indoors since, tame as they might be at home in their own feeding lot or pasture, the drivers put fear in many of the animals.

Around the public square and at the edge of the sidewalk were railings for the horses. Let Saturday come and it was as hard to find a hitching place as it now is to find parking space. There were several nice churches, but the one I loved most was the Liberty Street Church. It was not new even then, as the cornerstone states it was built in 1837. What faith it represented then, I cannot say, but as I went to the old Ott School, I used to look at those windows and wish I could go to such a church. As it was, I went to our little brick church on East Lexington. When I walked past the courthouse, I had to go by the many saloons, and how I hated that part!

AS I LOOK at the schoolhouses of our children, memory brings back the one the town boasted of. It had been a hospital in Civil War days, and its walls were scarred with the marks of battle. When it rained, we played "Hide the Thimble," and the best hiding place was in some of the bullet holes in the walls.

Coming from the farm, I got a thrill from watching the old lamp-lighter as he trudged from corner to corner of the square with his ladder to light the four lamps. He was a little man, not at all clean, but he seemed to take pride in his lamps. The standard time came from the old town clock that still runs. Many times I reached the spot where I could see that old clock only to find it was almost 9 and I was blocks from school. When that "dong, dong" came, I thought, I'll be tardy. Right then I would do my best running to avoid that dreaded mark.

We enjoyed the town as youths. The big treat was showing some newcomer the points of interest—the "public square," the Ladies Finishing School where young women learned to waltz, and the public springs on East Lexington. I was told by an old colored mammy that as a girl she had dipped her cup in its sparkling depths and served a drink to my grandfather, Joseph Smith, as he drove up to water his horse at a trough near by. That good old soul, bent from her labors as a slave, was proud she could tell me of her act of kindness to Joseph Smith.

We would also show newcomers the house where Governor Boggs had lived and where he was shot from a window. It stood across the street from the driveway to the Campus. It was a log house that had been framed with siding. Later it was removed, and another home built.

The streets were covered by rock broken by the city's chain gangs. It was a memorable sight to see the prisoners being brought in wagons, some standing, some sitting on the edge of the wagon box. They were herded into the jail that still stands, although it has been remodeled.

AT THE CORNER of Osage and Lexington there stood a grand old tree right in the pathway. The water had washed the dirt from its roots until they formed a seat where many rested in the heat of the day. The street was a good step down, and one, not knowing, could get a bad fall, but nobody bothered to fix the street. Many times we children hid there in play.

On Spring Street and Lexington was a tiny spring and a mudhole the year around, except in the very hottest weather. Farther down the street was a fine spring from which we drank and cooled our feet as it ran over the street to the pasture near by.

Independence was a quaint old town then, with a dark history of many battles. Those who lived here loved to tell all the history, true and false. When we moved here, we heard much of the Temple Lot, some things were true and some fantastic; and the weird or ghostly was told and retold. The one that still causes me to smile was that some night there would come a temple, large and white, up out of the ground. It would be wonderful and beautiful, built without man's hands, and God would dwell there.

That was over fifty years ago. As I used to look at our city and see the unkept streets, the neglected old buildings and back lots, I would think, "How slow is the growth of this, our Zion," and in my heart I was unable to call it Zion, the Beautiful. Then light came to me. In Enoch's time it took 365 years to prepare Zion. In the sin around us: the suffering and wrong, the want and crime and low morals of the people, I see the best sign for the need of Zion. The Lord took Zion because of the wickedness in the world. The saints in Enoch's day had to contend, as we are now contending, with the powers of darkness, and as we grow in numbers and strength that darkness will abide in and around us. We, our children, and their children will be surrounded by the great power of evil.

If we would have Zion, we must band together with a strong will to keep the law and keep love alive. That is what will build Zion—love one for another and hearts made pure from living the law. So Jesus lived and wants us to live, and nowhere will we get this love, this desire to live righteously as in a prayer service.

The first prayer service I attended was in the old Methodist Church, South, on Maple Avenue. A neighbor asked me to go, and as I went into that quiet old church, my young heart melted. While I do not remember a word of prayer, song, or testimony, I can yet feel the devotion of that hour. Those who worshiped there were not of our faith, but they prayed, and to me it was uplifting. It is in such hours that we can visualize. When we get a spiritual Zion, we will be able to get a material Zion with her clean streets and homes that are beautiful both inside and out. When our city has no saloons, no vice, no evil, God will smile upon us, and the wall of his love will surround us. Then the words, "Don't go up to Zion, for she is terrible," will be fulfilled. It will be terrible to any who cannot keep the law of love.

This is the Zion I have ever held in my mind—a place in which we shall be protected from the darkness of evil and evil-doers, and each will be guided by the Spirit Jesus had when he said, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." With that Spirit, we can walk close to the power of evil and darkness and have no fear, for "perfect love casteth out all fear."

I once knew a man who told me, "By nature I am angered quickly and retaliate to an angry remark with one a little more ugly. Now I have no desire to respond to anger with anger; I find it does not rile me as it did." That man has grown in the grace of the Lord. As I move among our people, I find many who tell the same story, "What I once loved, I now despise."

Each can have Zion and feel the lift of life abundant. To build Zion, we need to build lives consecrated to God. God will redeem Zion, for he has said, "I will redeem Zion in my way and my time."

A Task for Youth

By Roland W. Scott

YOUR FOUNDATION PATTERNS of life are being sketched in line by line by your everyday acts. While the pattern is never completed in this world, some of the lines you have drawn, in a thoughtless, impulsive, and unguarded moment, you may wish to erase; but this may require a lifetime because they have been etched in by Mother Nature with permanent pen.

The redemptive power of Jesus Christ will render assistance in helping you to erase some of the lines, but memory carries on.

When you look into a mirror you may see reflected a face of youth and beauty. But what you see is not the real you. Having a dual nature, the real person is represented by the pattern lines you have drawn over an extended period of time.

If you have been trailing with the multitude and have been lavishly sketching in life's pattern with material lines, the real you is emaciated, half starved, and underdeveloped. You are a very sick person. Strange as it may seem, one may be utterly unconscious of this condition, in fact may seemingly be happy in it. But in no way is the spiritual body (the real you) lacking in first importance when compared to material beauty.

YOU HAVE YOUTH, you are not tired, you have courage and enthusiasm, loyalty and love, but do not forget that you are walking in a world that has lost its way.

The dark and sinister forces of materialism which are endeavoring to destroy civilization are not across the ocean—they are not 3,000 miles away. They are in your midst, and they will welcome an opportunity to assist you in forming the background of your character. Their insidiousness is made the more subtle because of their adoption by good though misguided persons who do not commit the cardinal sins but unceasingly indulge in senseless follies which do not reflect the spirit of the Master.

To place this condition squarely where it belongs, "We wrestle not against flesh and blood but against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

The eyes of heaven are centered upon you. Divine forces are willing to help you combat the monstrous evils of this day; only through the power of the Holy Ghost, which has been freely bestowed upon you, will it be possible to develop the "real you" and maintain a spiritual equilibrium.

You will eventually take over the leadership of this people and bring to pass the great spiritual advancement necessary to be worthy to walk with the Master when he comes.

Be careful in the evaluation of this work that you do not underrate the importance of it. The consecrated, concentrated efforts of all will be required to accomplish this most sacred task intrusted by Deity to mankind.

Polygamy - Bigamy - Crime

By ISRAEL A. SMITH

A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH writes us from Orlando, Florida, that Mormon elders recently visited her home, and a lively discussion followed concerning the fundamental "differences that persist" between their church and ours. The heresy of polygamy was advanced by our member, and the Doctrine and Covenants was quoted: "He that keepeth the law of God hath no need to break the law of the land."

A rather strange and bold defense was interposed by these Mormons when they asserted that at the time in question (the 1840's) polygamy was not a crime in Illinois or in the other states. If we are to presume this statement was made in good faith, we are forced to hold that the young elders are grossly ignorant of the facts, or if in the least informed, they are either lying outright or are disingenuous to the point of dishonesty.

It may be that they are guilty of a bit of sophistry, taking refuge behind the fact that the term polygamy was not used in the criminal statutes of the times. This is sheerest quibbling, because polygamy involves more wives than one, whereas bigamy consists of having at least two wives; a polygamist is and always has been a bigamist. In brief, polygamy is bigamy, and the criminal code is not concerned with the motivation, whether a man has taken the extra wife or wives because he thinks it a divine transaction or does so for purely fleshly or unworthy purposes.

The Mormon people should not so soon forget the Woodruff Manifesto of 1890—that masterpiece of empty expression and evasion. Neither should they so soon forget George Reynolds, polygamist and legal guinea pig, who was offered up on the altar of a test case, in order, it was generally supposed, to save the "higher-ups" from being crucified on the Golgotha of the criminal statutes. The case finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States and was decided in 1879.

Let us introduce first the situation which provoked the people through the National Congress to enact the law, and second, the law itself under which Reynolds was prosecuted. Then the decision.

Clandestinely a few in the days of Nauvoo until August 29, 1852, and openly, brazenly, and publicly thereafter, the Mormons practiced polygamy. The national government did not assume jurisdiction of the marriage question in the United States—that was a matter for the states to decide; but it could act with respect to the territories, and Utah was a territory. So in 1862 the Edmund-Tucker Law was enacted.

This law was as follows:

An Act to punish and prevent the Practice of Polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disapproving and annulling certain Acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person having a husband or wife living, who shall marry any other person, whether married or single, in a territory of the United States, or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall, except in the cases specified in the proviso to this section, be adjudged guilty of bigamy, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years;

Provided, nevertheless, That this section shall not extend to any person by reason of any former marriage whose husband or wife by such marriage shall have been absent for five successive years without being known to such person within that time to be living; nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been dissolved by the decree of a competent court; nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been annulled or pronounced void by the sentence or decree of a competent court on the ground of the nullity of the marriage contract.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following ordinance of the provisional government of the state of Deseret, so called, namely: "An ordinance incorporating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," passed February 8th, in the year 1851, and adopted, re-enacted and made valid by the governor and legislative assembly of the territory of Utah by an act passed January 19th, in the year 1855, entitled "An act in relation to the compilation and revision of the laws and resolutions in force in Utah territory, their publication, and distribution," and all other acts and parts of acts heretofore passed by the said legislative assembly of the territory of Utah, which establish, support, maintain, shield, or countenance polygamy, be, and the same hereby are, disapproved and annulled: Provided, That this act shall be so limited and construed as not to affect or interfere with the right of property legally acquired under the ordinance heretofore mentioned, nor with the right "to worship God according to the dictates of conscience," but only to annul all acts and laws which establish, maintain, protect, or countenance the practice of polygamy, evasively called spiritual marriage, however disguised by legal or ecclesiastical solemnities, sacraments, ceremonies, consecration, or other contrivances.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any corporation or association for religious or charitable purposes to acquire or hold real estate in any territory of the United States during the existence of the territorial government of a greater value than $50,000; and all real estate acquired or held by any such corporation or association contrary to the provisions of this act shall be forfeited and escheat to the United States: Provided, That existing vested rights in real estate shall not be impaired by the provisions of this section.

Approved, July 1, 1862.

But the Mormon polygamists persisted in their illegal, unlawful, and immoral practices under the plea of freedom of religion and defied the national government. George Reynolds was arrested, charged with the crime of having more wives than one. Upon conviction, he carried an appeal to the highest court in America.

Let us now read the decision of the Supreme Court, the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Waite on January 6, 1879, and reported in United States Supreme Court 98, page 145, et sequitur..

The question is, whether religious belief can be accepted as justification of an overt act, made criminal by the law of the land. The inquiry is not as to the power of Congress to prescribe criminal laws for the Territories, but as to the guilt of one who knowingly violates a law which has been properly enacted, he entertaining a religious belief that the law is wrong. Congress cannot pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids such legislation. Religious freedom is guaranteed everywhere throughout the dominion of the United States, so far as Congressional interference is concerned. The question to be determined is, whether the law now under consideration comes within this prohibition. The word "religion" is not defined in the Constitution. We must go elsewhere therefore to ascertain its meaning; and nowhere more appropriately, we think, than to the history of the times in the midst of which the provision was adopted. The precise point of inquiry is, What is the religious freedom that has been guaranteed? In the preamble of the Act introduced in the Virginia House of Delegates by Jefferson in 1775, religious freedom is defined, and after reciting "that to suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his power into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on the supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all religious liberty." It is declared "that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its officers to interfere when the principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order." In these two sentences is found the true distinction of what properly belongs to the Church and what to the State. In a little more than a year after the passage of this statute the Convention met which prepared the Constitution of the United States. Five of the States, while adopting the Constitution, proposed amendments. Three—New Hampshire, New York, and Virginia—included, in one form or another, a declaration of religious freedom in changes they desired to have made, as did also North Carolina, where the Convention at first declined to ratify the Constitution until the proposed amendments were acted upon. Accordingly, at the first session of the First Congress an amendment was under consideration. It was proposed, with others, by Mr. Madison. It met the views of the advocates of religious freedom and was adopted. Jefferson afterward, in reply to an address to him by a committee of the Danbury Baptist Association, took occasion to say: "Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God, that he owes account to none other for the faith or his worship, that the legislative powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions, I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their Legislature should make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, thus building a wall of separation between Church and State. Adhering to the expression of the supreme will of the nation in behalf of the rights of conscience, I shall see with sincere satisfaction the progress of those sentiments which tend to restore man to all his natural rights in opposition to his social duties." Coming as this does from an acknowledged leader of the advocates of the measure, it may be accepted almost as an authoritative declaration of the scope and effect of the amendment thus secured. Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order. From that day to this we think it may safely be said, there never has been a time, in any state of the Union, when polygamy has not been an offense against society, cognizable by the Civil Courts and punishable with more or less severity. In the face of all this evidence it is impossible to believe that the Constitutional guarantee of religious freedom was intended to prohibit legislation in respect to this most important element in social life—marriage: while from its very nature the sacred obligation is, nevertheless, in most civilized nations, a civil contract, and usually regulated by law. Upon it society may be said to be built, and out of its fruits spring the social relations and social obligations and duties with which the Government is required to deal. In fact, according as monogamous or polygamous marriages are allowed do we find the principles on which the government of a people to a greater or less extent rests. An exceptional colony of polygamists, under exceptional leaders, may sometimes exist for a time without appearing to disturb the social condition of the people who surround it; but there cannot be a doubt that, unless restricted by some form of constitution, it is within the legitimate scope of the power of every civil government to determine whether polygamy or monogamy shall be the law of social life under its dominion. In our opinion the Statute immediately under consideration is within the legislative power of Congress. It is constitutional and valid as prescribing the rule of action for all those residing in the Territories and in places over which the United States have exclusive control. This being so, the only question which remains is, whether those who make polygamy a part of their religion are excepted from the operation of the Statute. If they are, then those who do not make polygamy a part of their religious belief may be found guilty and punished. While those who do, must be acquitted and go free. This would be introducing a new element into our criminal law. Laws are made for the government of actions, and while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with practices. Suppose one religiously believed that human sacrifices were a necessary part of religious worship, would it be seriously contended that the civil government under which he lived could not interfere to prevent the sacrifice? Or, if a wife religiously believed it was her duty to burn herself upon the funeral pile of her dead husband, would it be beyond the power of the civil government to prevent her carrying her belief into practice? So here, society under the exclusive dominion of the United States prescribes as the law of its organization that plural marriages shall not be allowed. Can a man excuse his practices to the contrary because of his religious belief? To permit this would be to make doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land; and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself. Government could exist only in name under such circumstances. Criminal intent is a necessary element of crime; but every man is presumed to intend the necessary and legitimate consequences of what he knowingly does. Here the accused knew that he had been once married and that his first wife was living. He also knew that his second marriage was forbidden by law. When, therefore, he married the second time, he is presumed to have intended to break the law, and the breaking of the law is a crime. Every act necessary to constitute a crime was knowingly done, and the crime was therefore knowingly committed. Ignorance of a fact may sometimes be taken as evidence of a want of criminal intent, but not ignorance of law. The only defense of the accused in this case, is his belief that the law ought not to have been enacted. It matters not that his belief was a part of his religion; it was still a belief, and belief only. Upon

The Color Line - By MRS. S. C. BETHEL

AS A CHILD, I lived in a German neighborhood where each property owner took pride in the appearance of his property, and the homes were small well-cared-for cottages with lovely lawns, trees, and shrubbery. I spent many happy hours in that small community.

Then one day one of the neighbors sold to a colored family. Indignation rose high among the property owners. First one sold and then another. Soon there were few white families left in the neighborhood. My grandmother lived in the same block we did, and mother refused a careful consideration of the whole case, we are satisfied that no error was committed by the Court below, and judgment is consequently affirmed.

So, two Mormon elders, in their eagerness to defend polygamy as a principle of salvation—for that has been and still is the Mormon belief—enunciating from the highest places in their ecclesiastical organization, cast their barque way out in the center of a great vacuum and aver bigamy was not a crime in the various jurisdictions during the Nauvoo period. But a Chief Justice speaks in the Reynolds case, and none—not even a Mormon apologist—can be heard to the contrary.

Polygamy was a heresy foisted upon a portion of the church by Brigham Young and his associates without even the semblance of approval by the church either before or after June 27, 1844, when Joseph Smith was killed. It was not a doctrine of his church, and can never be a doctrine of true Latter Day Saintism. Why do Mormons continue to defend it?

When one reads Truth, a grossly misnamed journal, fostered by one Joseph W. Musser and other polygamous fundamentalists in Utah, one must be very hardy not to become nauseated. It is too bad this sinister movement is entrenched right under the shadow of the Temple.

to move away as long as grandmother was alive. She was very old and needed the help that mother could give her, so we stayed on.

One day when I was about nine years old, mother sent me to a store some five blocks away. With my arms filled with groceries, I stepped to the door to leave the store. Surrounding the entrance were a dozen shining, black faces. Those Negro youngsters were brandishing razors in the air and yelling, "We'll carve your heart out." I ran screaming back into the store for Old Pete. He went to the door with me and asked what it was all about. They said that I had called them "niggers." I tried to tell them that I hadn't, but they would not listen. Old Pete called his aged mother to look after the store while he took me home. The next day I walked down the street by the side of a policeman. I don't know which I was more afraid of—that big, uniformed officer or the colored children he was taking me to. It was Saturday, and they were all gathered on a vacant lot. Again I tried to explain that I hadn't insulted them, but still they accused me. The officer told them to leave me alone, and told me to see that I didn't call them "nigger" again. I was furious.

The following Monday I started out for school alone. Behind me about a block were about all of the Negro youngsters from several streets around. I was too frightened to run. As I took a quick frightened look over my shoulder, one little girl my own age was stealing up behind me. She said that they did not want to hurt me. Another little colored girl who lived on our street had told them that I was not the one who had been rude to them. She said they wanted to be friends. After that I had no further trouble with them, but, as I grew up, I harbored feelings that were not wholesome.

One day after becoming a member of the church, I was walking down a street in a small western town with my three-year-old son. We met a Negro woman with her little boy. My young son asked, "Mother, what's the matter with that little boy's face?" He had never seen a Negro before. I turned to the mother and said, "I am so sorry," and I was sincere. With a sad expression and a kind voice, she answered, "I know; I understand."

Since then, I have given this race question much thought.

THE OBJECT of the gospel of Christ is to change men's lives. When we are buried with Christ in baptism, we arise to a newness of life. Many have testified to this change. It has brought new life for me. Who are we to withhold such blessings from these people?

It is true that change hasn't always been wrought in the lives of those who embrace this gospel. We still have white members of whom we are ashamed. There are those who continue to be indolent and lazy—those who are careless about their appearance and morals.

We find in the Book of Nephi, chapter 1, verse 18, that in the two-hundred-year period following the appearance of Christ on this continent, there were no Lamanites. "They were one, the children of Christ." In the eleventh verse, we read, "and they became an exceeding fair and delightsome people." Apparently the Lamanites became white like the Nephites. The thought occurred to me that that same thing could take place again. During the millennium, all races could become fair and delightsome. But that is not the question. The question is, "Are we able to heed an admonition to regard not the color of the skin but worship in love and unity?" We can try. That will be our part in this study in black and white.

The Land of Zion — By GERALD GABRIEL

But verily I say unto you, I have decreed that your brethren, which have been scattered, shall return to the land of their inheritances and build up the waste places of Zion; for after much tribulation, as I have said unto you in a former commandment, cometh the blessing. Behold, this is the blessing which I have promised after your tribulations, and the tribulations of your brethren; your redemption, and the redemption of your brethren; even their restoration to the land of Zion, to be establishd, no more to be thrown down; nevertheless, if they pollute their inheritance, they shall be thrown down; for I will not spare them if they pollute their inheritances. Behold, I say unto you, the redemption of Zion must needs come by power; therefore I will raise up unto my people a man, who shall lead them like Moses led the children of Israel, for ye are the children of Israel, and of the seed of Abraham; and ye must needs be led out of bondage by power, and with a stretched out arm; and as your fathers were led at the first, even so shall the redemption of Zion be. Therefore let not your hearts faint, for I say not unto you as I said unto your fathers, Mine angel shall go up before you, but not my presence; but I say unto you, Mine angels shall go before you, and also my presence, and in time ye shall possess the goodly land.—Doctrine and Covenants 100: 3.

AND IN TIME YE SHALL POSSESS THE GOODLY LAND

WHEN WE BECOME aware of the number of Saints who are in the goodly land, we are inclined to believe this revelation given in February, 1834, has this day been fulfilled. The word possess, according to Webster, means "to make the owner or holder, as of property, power, knowledge . . . to maintain a condition of control." In the light of this definition, the number of Saints in the area of Zion do not possess it, but are as yet in "bondage" as spoken of in this revelation. Three out of every four are devoting the greater part of their energies to industries that produce products to hinder the causes of Zion; working in hopes of obtaining financial security and the modern conveniences to which they have every right, but realizing too, that these same industries can check one from their pay rolls in a week's time—a loss of security and hope for an inheritance.

AS MOSES LED THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL

This part of the revelation might give us some pointer concerning our anticipations for Zion. Moses' first spiritual experience dealing with his great mission was when he was made aware of the fact, from the voice in the "burning bush," that the ground on which he stood was holy. The soil on which they lived in "bondage" was highly productive to be able to supply the many inhabitants with the necessities of life. The Nile River, which overflowed annually, brought rich deposits of soil. Since the growing season was very short, and the hot, tropical sun baked the land to a crisp after the floods receded, the slaves (the children of Israel) were forced to wade in mud to sow the seed for the year's crop. Later in the season they used crude methods of irrigation. After five centuries of such conditions, the promises given in glowing words were very appealing to the chosen people.

For the land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot as a garden of herbs; but the land whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven; a land which the Lord thy God careth for; the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year.—Deuteronomy 11: 10-12.

Note the appeals of better climate in the verses following:

That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn [small grain, not corn as we got from the Indians], and thy wine and thine oil. And I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayest eat and be full.—Deuteronomy 11: 14, 15.

A condition such as this was unheard of by the slaves of Egypt. The promised land, however, was not attained by merely traveling from the land of Egypt to it. Forty years of teaching, sacrificing, and wandering was their lot before they entered into the goodly land. When such time did arrive, Moses was commanded to, "Send thou men, that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel; of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man."—Numbers 13: 2.

The purpose of this search is explained in verses 17 through 20.

And Moses sent them to spy out the land of Canaan, and said unto them, Get you up this way southward, and go up into the mountain, and see the land, what it is; and the people that dwelleth therein, whether they be strong or weak, few or many, and what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad; and what cities they be that they dwell in, whether in tents, or in strongholds, and what the land is whether it be fat or lean, whether there be wood therein, or not. And be of good courage, and bring of the fruit of the land. Now the time was the time of the first ripe grapes.

Verse 23 tells us how productive this new land was: "one cluster of grapes, and they bare it between two [Caleb and Joshua] upon a staff . . ." The familiar description follows in verse 27, "The land whither thou sentest us . . . it floweth with milk and honey."

The highly productive land of promise was surely a "land flowing with milk and honey." The children of Israel numbering between two and three million plus the thousands of natives that were not dispossessed, lived in an area the size of the state of Vermont—whose population is only 360,000. For 500 years, from Moses until the death of Saul, they were fabulously wealthy. Loot conquered from the inhabitants, their strategic position for trade between Egypt and Mesopotamia, and the sales from the products of the soil brought to the chosen people wealth they never dreamed of.

Concern to keep the land fertile is portrayed in Leviticus, chapter 25. Verses 3 through 5 tell us:

Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof; but in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the Lord; thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard. That which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed; for it is a year of rest unto the land.

These fallow years were to bring blessings:

Then I will command my blessings upon you in the sixth year and it shall bring forth fruit for three years, and ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of the old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in ye shall eat of the old store.—Leviticus 25: 21, 22.

Leviticus also leads us to believe that unlawful grazing and burning of the land was subject to penalty, and the full value had to be paid to the owner for any damage caused by careless neighbors who permitted grazing on another's land or allowed fire to destroy the property of others.

Land as an inheritance is also promised. "The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me."—Leviticus 25: 23. Man, however, did have some responsibility, "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children."—Proverbs 13: 22.

Land under the uses of Solomon was productive as is evidenced by his squandering:

And Solomon's provision for one day was thirty measures of fine flour [240 bushels] and three-score measures of meal, ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and a hundred sheep, besides harts, and roebucks, and fallow deer, and fatted fowl And Solomon had forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horesmen. And those officers provided victuals for king Solomon, and for all that came unto king Solomon's table, every man in his month; they lacked nothing. Barley also and straw for the horses and dromedaries brought they unto the place where the officers were, every man according to his charge.—I Kings 4: 22-28.

To build the great temple and cities, Solomon had the giant trees of Lebanon (comparable to the giant trees of California) felled, leaving the land bare to erode.

Misuse of the land would bring disastrous results as warned by Moses.

The fruit of thy land, and all thy labors, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up; and thou shall be only oppressed and crushed away The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand; a nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favor to the young; and he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed, which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee.—Deuteronomy 28: 33-51.

This prophecy was fulfilled after the death of Solomon. The ten northern tribes separated over the tax issue. The Northern Kingdom was invaded and conquered. Judah fell to the Chaldeans. The Saracen hordes overran Asia Minor in the eighth century. These nomadic people had no love for the land or religion of the Israelites. They did "not regard the person of the old, nor show favor to the young." Herds of goats, sheep, horses and camels devoured all green vegetation that covered the hills of Israel. Without this protective covering, the former and latter rains washed away the fertile topsoil of the "promised land." Jeremiah tells what finally happened: "Many pastors have come upon my vineyard, they have trodden my portion under foot, they have made my pleasant portion a desolate wilderness. They have made it desolated, and being desolate it mourneth unto me; the whole land is made desolate, because no man layeth it to heart."—Jeremiah 12: 10, 11. Isaiah also describes it: "Your country is desolate, your cities are burned with fire; your land strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate as overthrown by strangers." The beautiful Jordan River became clogged with clay; great cities such as Antioch were covered with as much as eighteen feet of debris; hills became gullied and rocky. The dreamers of Israel began to realize that no great civilization could be produced nor maintained without productive soil to support it—a lesson also learned by Egypt, Rome, and other empires of the past.

The soils in Palestine today require millions of dollars to make them productive. In the earlier part of the "back to the chosen land movement," the government of the United States became concerned. Dr. W. C. Lowdermilk, an eminent soil scientist, was sent to Palestine to study their soils. At the conclusion of that study, he wrote the following, which he called the Eleventh Commandment:

Thou shalt inherit the holy earth as a faithful steward, conserving its resources and productivity from generation to generation. Thou shalt safeguard thy fields from soil erosion, thy living waters from drying up, thy forests from desolation, and protect thy hills from overgrazing by thy herds, that thy descendants may have abundance for ever. If any shall fail in this stewardship of the land, thy fruitful fields shall become sterile, stony ground and wasting gullies, and thy descendants shall decrease and live in poverty or perish from the face of the earth.

THE LAND OF ZION

And I have made the earth rich, and, behold, it is my footstool; wherefore, again I will stand upon it; and I hold forth and deign to give unto you greater riches, even a land of promise; a land flowing with milk and honey, upon which there shall be no curse when the Lord cometh; and I will give it unto you for the land of your inheritance, if you seek it with all your hearts; and this shall be my covenant with you, ye shall have it for the land of your inheritance, and the inheritance of your children for ever, while the earth shall stand; and ye shall possess it again in eternity, no more to pass away.—Doctrine and Covenants 38: 4.

Note the similarity in this Scripture to the description of the land of promise of the early Israelites. Those who knew our land of Zion a little over a century ago, knew it as a very fertile region. It was covered with fine timber and rich prairie soils. The topsoil on our globe (comparable to the thickness of the peel of an apple) was then some twelve to twenty inches thick. Today, some 45 per cent of that topsoil is eroded off. Of the remaining 55 per cent, much more of the nutrients have been removed by leaching or crop removal. In a little over a century, we have lost much of our inheritance, our children's inheritance—the land we shall “possess again in eternity” if we do not or have not “polluted our inheritance.”

We who have had the opportunity of being stewards of the land of Zion have speeded up this destructive process largely through poor management. We have planted row crops—crops that remove large quantities of soil nutrients and leave the land bare for erosion. We have not returned “my portion” to the land. Corn, an American product, removes more than twice the amount of nutrients from the soil than any of the products produced in the land of Israel. It causes more than twice the amount of erosion than of any crop grown in the land of Israel. Therefore, instead of one year in seven, it may have read, one year in three or four for corn-growing conditions. Corn is largely used to produce pork. Being high in starch content, it produces much fat to be used for lard, as well as the meat, which is a favorite of American meat eaters and is a contributor to many of our ills.

We would do well to turn aside from our sinning and accept the teaching of our Scriptures to stop polluting our inheritance and begin preparing for the inheritance of our children's children. We should build a land which we shall possess again in eternity, no more to pass away—a land that is not made desolate “because no man layeth it to heart.”

QUESTION:

In what language was the Bible first printed, and when was it issued?

ANSWER:

At the close of the fourth century, Jerome, a Christian writer of great learning, made a translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew and Chaldaic languages, and also revised an old Latin version of the New Testament. This became known as the Latin Vulgate, the latter word being derived from the Latin vulgatus, meaning common or general.

It was the Latin Vulgate that was first put in print, being issued from the famous press of Gutenberg in 1456, after four years in preparation. It is known as the Mazarin Bible, a name which was derived from the fact that an excellent copy was in the possession of Cardinal Mazarin during the seventeenth century. The first complete English Bible was printed at Zurich in 1535, and is known as the Coverdale version, though Tyndale's version of the New Testament was issued at Antwerp in 1534.

QUESTION:

How is it possible to love your enemies, as taught by Christ? Can one love evil?

ANSWER:

Of course no one should love evil, whether in friend or foe. But to love one who at times does wrong is a universal human experience, for not even our best friends are perfect. We should love them in spite of their imperfections, not because of them. The Bible says God loved the world so much that he sent his Son to redeem man. If we are ever to be fit to associate with heavenly beings, we must possess similar traits.

We do not know how far back may lie the cause of imperfections in any person, nor do we know how hard he may have tried at some time in his life to overcome them. Prenatal conditions, early environment, associations, and even physical defects and diseases may have contributed to his unfortunate condition in a much greater degree than in our own. We should therefore be charitable, sympathetic, and helpful to weaker ones around us. It is largely in this sense that we are our brother's keeper.

QUESTION:

Has the minister any right to give the Communion to little children too young for baptism?

ANSWER:

Such a procedure would disregard the law of the church as enacted in Conference Resolution Number 91, which states:

“That unbaptized persons, whether children or adults, are not entitled to partake of the sacrament of bread and wine.”

When we consider the distinctive position which this church holds in regard to divine authority and sacred ordinances of the church, the reason for this instruction is not difficult to understand. Church ordinances are subject to Him who gave them, and for the purpose which he has prescribed. We have no authority to modify them.

QUESTION:

Do all Christian sects believe that there has been an apostasy from the faith as taught in the New Testament?

ANSWER:

It has been recognized by all denominations so far as we are informed. However, conclusions based upon this belief are by no means uniform or even similar. For instance, while Protestants generally hold this view, they charge the Papal Church with having departed from the faith, various items being named which are considered contrary to the teachings of Christ. On the other hand, the Roman Catholics hold that Protestantism itself represents an apostasy from the true faith. Others hold various views in regard to what teachings constitute the true faith. Some make a general appeal to the authority of the New Testament, though not admitting that everything found there is binding today. Others make specific appeal to the sacred volume for support of particular items of belief. There is therefore no standard which is considered by all as universally binding in every particular, though it may be recognized as a generality.

The Spiritual Experiences of Elder William Clark

MY GRANDFATHER, Elder William Clarke, was president of a branch in Staffisher, England, for many years. He had all the gifts of the gospel. I am writing some of the many spiritual experiences he had just as my mother, Ann Jane Merrill, told them to me. She is now seventy-four years old and is living with my sister, Mrs. L. A. Juergens, at 617 West 17 Street, Carroll, Iowa.

If readers will refer back to the January 8 issue of the Herald to the article, "With British Pioneers," they will find the autobiography of William Ecclestone. In this feature is mentioned two cases of healing, one pertaining to a Mr. Haywood. This man had pushed himself about on a platform for about fourteen years. Why he came to grandmother's house, my mother never heard them say. But she was frightened when she answered the knock at the door and saw this crippled man. She was hesitant at first, but then thought, "He can do no harm; I'll let him in." Grandfather had quite a talk with him and told him about the gospel. He told him if he would obey and fast and pray, he would be healed. Mr. Haywood said eighteen different doctors and astrologers told him he would never walk again as long as he lived. Grandfather told him if he wanted to believe them and stay on that board the rest of his life, all right. But if he would do as grandfather told him, he would walk. So he joined the church. In a meeting after that, grandfather said, "Someone in the meeting is fasting and praying for something, and if he will keep it up, he will receive what he is praying for." Several Sundays after that, Mr. Haywood raised his head to talk, and my grandfather commanded him in the name of the Lord to get up and never get down on that board again. He lived in another town, and when he went home, his people and friends were frightened and thought he was a ghost. Mother said he was a very bright man.

ONE EVENING a group of Saints were at grandfather's home for tea. One lady asked my grandfather if the friend she had with her would ever join the church? He took a good look at her and said, "Yes, she has a head that will not let her stay out." She thought to herself, "Mr. Clarke, if you never told a lie before, you have told one now. I will never join that church." He didn't see her again until a year later at conference where she was waiting to be confirmed. This was Sister Machen as related by his granddaughter, Mrs. Ruby Ackley whose husband was bitter against the church. In the prayer meeting, grandfather got up and told her if she and the Saints would pray for him, he would take the Communion with her a month from that day, which he did.

Sometime later at a meeting, a person came to the church asking for this same Sister Machen to come home at once because her small daughter was very sick. She got up to go and my grandfather, who was on the stand, told her to sit down that the child would be all right. He said he just saw an angel go with a vial of oil to administer to her. After the meeting one man slapped grandfather on the back and said, "Well, Bill, let's go out and see if that is true." Several went, and the child met them at the door. When asked how she got better, she told them an angel came with some oil and poured it on her head and administered to her, and she got better. They all saw the oil in her hair.

WHEN MY UNCLE "DOC" was about six years old, he was brought home from school one day because part of a stove had fallen on his back and fractured it. He could not sit or stand up. His parents were going to have him administered to, but grandmother heard him telling a playmate that if he would go to church and be administered to he would walk again. Grandmother thought if he had that faith, she would get him there some way, so she carried him five miles. The other children and playmates had gone on early to church with grandfather. In the meeting an old gentleman prophesied that Brother Clarke's boy would walk when he was administered to. He did the next day.

A Mr. Pope was not able to open his eyelids. Grandfather administered to him and told him that the operation would be successful—that God would guide the hand of the surgeon. When it was over, the surgeon said he had never felt so at ease in any operation. This man was taken to many different hospitals to show the wonderful miracle.

GRANDFATHER wanted to come to America but was told his work was in England for a while. He kept longing to come and finally, after a second attempt, he sailed to Brooklyn.

In Brooklyn, New York, he was called to administer to Mrs. Potts, grandmother of B. R. McGuire, who was very ill and not expected to live. After the administration, he told the family she would get better. A few months later she was not so sick and he was called to administer to her. This time he told them to prepare for the worst, that this sickness was unto death. One son-in-law was angry at that, but a son said, "We were glad to hear Clarke say she would recover, so saying that she will not recover won't make it so, if she is not to die." But she died.

Another Mrs. Potts, an aunt of the first Mrs. Potts, had a baby who had spinal meningitis and the doctors had given up hopes. She sent for grandfather one evening. That evening his boys were dressing for a party and there was noise and excitement. So he told her he could not come then, but that the baby would be all right until he got there. The mother was angry and said, "How does Clarke know?" Her uncle who was not a member of our church said, "I am surprised at your saying that, belonging to the church you do. Didn't the prophets of old say such things?" The baby remained the same till he got there and was completely healed through the administration. The doctor was so surprised and said, "No skill of mine saved that baby."

ANOTHER SAINT in Brooklyn had a cancer. Grandfather administered to her the day before she was to be admitted to St. Francis Hospital. That night the cancer came from her. When the physician called for her the next day to take her to the hospital, she told him that it had come from her and that she wouldn't need an operation. The doctor said, "No, it could not come from you; it can be removed only by an operation." Then her husband showed it to him. He was amazed; in all his practices he had never heard of such a thing.

Grandfather often interpreted dreams for those who came to him. Sometimes they would have forgotten the dream and grandfather could then tell them just what they had dreamed and then interpret it for them.

He died in 1902 and is buried in New York State. Many Saints living now will remember my grandfather and can testify of some of these experiences.

Young Mothers, Count Your Blessings!

IF YOU ARE THE MOTHER of a clan of little people, if your hours are filled with the many and varied tasks common to mothers, now is the day to be joyful and thank the good Lord for your blessings. In short, you should enjoy life to its very fullest, for now is the day of your triumph. You, and you alone, are the center of a small universe of adoring subjects, the object of love and devotion. You are the last word in wisdom and authority. Squeeze every ounce of joy you possibly can from the hours as they pass, for this time will never come again.

It is well to remember, young mothers, that your children are only loaned to you—at best they are yours for only eighteen or twenty-odd years. Let us say that they are yours for the first twelve years of their lives; once they enter adolescence, your pedestal immediately begins to totter. From a period of accepting everything you say as fact they suddenly begin to question not only your words but also your motives, and a continual “why?” is forever on their lips.

While they are young they live in a world where things are true because mother says so, but the “teens” bring a period of skepticism—“But, Mother, how do you know?” they question. Then the stage of “I’m from Missouri, show me” follows and is trying to say the least. You look back wistfully to the days when you knew everything.

My grandmother used to say, “Little children, little troubles.” This is such an evident truth. Time out to listen to the small child’s troubles, a few kind, understanding words, and mother’s healing kiss works miracles. It’s an everyday happening.

HERE’S WHERE YOUNG MOTHERS must take a definite stand on their attitude toward the work and care of the home. Perhaps the best advice in this regard was once given by a writer who bluntly stated, “Clean your house once a week and the rest of the time, live in it!” This may sound like an extreme in leniency toward household tasks, but, no doubt, the concern of this good man was to put the needs of the children first in every respect.

There comes a time when every young mother must make the decision as to whether she will be a housekeeping mother, or a mother, housekeeping. There’s a world of difference. When the children have flown from the nest, there will be plenty of time to work toward making the home a place of shining cleanliness and beauty. It cannot be done when the children are small. If you endeavor to do so, you will only accomplish it at the expense of the happiness of yourself and your little ones. They will lose and so will you, and the loss in terms of companionship and mutual understanding is irreparable.

It is only natural for women as homemakers to want their homes attractive, to want the best furniture and accessories to beautify it. But where there are small children, it is better to purchase furniture with an eye to durability, so that the family may enjoy and use the home.

Buying the very best and most attractive furnishings opens the way to a host of problems, not the least of which is how to keep it that way. For example, a young couple bought a beautiful, costly living room suite, then, fearful of their small children spilling something on it or getting it soiled with their feet, they purchased slip covers.

By LEONA N. HANDS

These proved too expensive and attractive to run any risks of soil, so now the mother keeps the suite swathed in white sheets, which, needless to say, add greatly to her laundry work and still keep her harassed over footmarks.

Another young mother solved the problem of keeping her living room attractive by not allowing the children to enter it. But, subsequently, because their family grew rapidly, the mother and father soon refrained from using the room themselves because of the need of being constantly with the little ones. At the present time, in spite of cramped living conditions, no one of the entire family has any use or enjoyment of the living room. It remains a show place and that is all.

A kindergarten teacher once told a group of parents that she learned much about the home life of a child just by watching him in the schoolroom. The children were encouraged to play with a large, completely furnished playhouse, occupied by a doll family. The way the children assembled the members of the doll family revealed a great deal to the teacher. Some youngsters arranged a family group playing a game in the living room or around the piano singing; some had a child doll in the bedroom, kneeling by the bed in the attitude of prayer with one or both parents present (or more conspicuously absent), some placed the members of the doll family around the mother, then put the daddy on the couch to nap. A few parents found the teacher’s address amusing; others looked very thoughtful.

SURELY THERE is no more delightful company than that of children. They are so natural in thought and action, so refreshing. Their laughter with its spontaneity gladdens the heart. Too, it is pure joy to serve these charming little people with their disarming smiles and captivating ways, for it takes so little to please them. Have you not seen the stars come out in a small boy's eyes when he sees his mother take down a big mixing bowl from the cupboard? "Are you going to build us a cake, Mom?" he asks eagerly, a look of true admiration on his face.

Someone once said, "We often wonder what we laughed at before the children came along." Indeed, the fun you have, the enjoyment and laughter that come your way every day fill your life with variety and the spice of living. The experiences you have rearing your children will make your life full, rich, and sweet. They also serve to make you more dependent on God. Many of these experiences will be stored deep in memory to be taken out to refresh the mind in later years or when lean days come to give drooping spirits a lift.

TEACHING LITTLE FOLK to pray is an experience in itself. Starting with a memorized verse, they soon let their imagination carry them into unknown realms. Could it be that children commune with angels, I wonder? They talk to God as casually as if they were beholding their earthly father's face. Nothing is too big for God to do, nor too small to bring to his attention. Their prayers are all inclusive, touching everyone and everything within their limited scope of living. Consider the little girl who prayed for God to send a nice day for the picnic so everyone could have a good time and ended with, "And have a good time yourself, too!"

Do not rob yourself of the experience of listening to your children's evening prayers, each one separately. No other period during the entire day will bring the sense of unity and closeness to you and your child as does the prayer hour. Here you will look deep into the heart of your little one and become humble at what your eyes behold.

Much has been written about the prayer of faith. Faith in all its perfection and beauty is witnessed as small children talk to God. Too, you will find your own faith being strengthened, for truly a small child has much to teach an adult by the example of unquestioning faith.

This good seed of faith must be implanted early, even though the fruits of understanding may come many years later. Elder Harold Velt counsels, "Teach while the child is too young to understand, but not old enough to resist."

One writer has said that as the children of Israel were to gather the manna early, so must the manna of God—the bread of life—be imparted to the child in his early years. Until he reaches the age of accountability, a child lives in the paradise of his physical life, not comprehending or committing sin. This is the time to engender and nurture faith in God, to lay a firm foundation on which to build. All too soon the child encounters doubt and suspicion. He is indeed fortunate if he can never look back to a time when he did not know God.

WE CANNOT SPARE OUR children the hard knocks of growing up—the all too painful experiences that are bound to come their way as they grow into adulthood, the emerging from the state of idealism, the shattering of many hopes and dreams. All these are part of the process of coming into manhood and womanhood. As parents, we often can only stand by with a prayer in our hearts, even as God himself must look down upon us in sympathy and understanding, wanting to help us but knowing we must learn through experience to walk by ourselves.

After conducting an evening's service at a revival, Dwight L. Moody, the great evangelist, remarked to a friend, "There were two and a half converts tonight." The friend asked, "You mean two adults and one child?" "No, indeed," replied Mr. Moody earnestly, "I mean two children and one adult. The child has his entire life to give to God. The adult has only half a life!"

We do not know of a surety that we can save our children to the church. Certainly it is the hope and prayer of all good parents, knowing that the children of today are the church of tomorrow. It is to them we look for help in the building of Zion.

It has been wisely said that faith, along with many other intangibles, is more readily caught than taught. Just so a mother must endeavor to exemplify a steadfast faith that trusts in God whether life be sunshine or shadow—a faith to believe that God is watching over us, that he is not far from those who love and serve him, that he will care for us, come what may.

We know of a truth that a child's early language pattern is set by that of his parents. Likewise he unconsciously absorbs home influences whether they be good or bad.

DAYS FOR THE YOUNG MOTHER are full, even crowded. There is much to be done and many demands on her time and energy. Most of the older mothers will say that the happiest time of their lives was when their children were little.

It is hard for the young mother to realize the truth of such a statement when her life is so full of physical labor and the care of her children that she has no time to call her own. Often it is a wise thing for her to take inventory—to count her blessings, the greatest of which are the children who have been given into her care and keeping.

At the cost of all else, young mothers, spend your time with your children while they are young and need your companionship. Keep a song in your heart and on your lips. The bluebird of happiness has made its abode in your own small doorway!

PASCAGOULA, MISSISSIPPI.—The Pascagoula Saints are now occupying a new church home which has been converted from a community hall recently purchased from the Federal Housing Authority. The new church home is complete with chapel, classrooms for all ages, pastor's study, library, recreational hall, kitchen, modern rest rooms, heating plant, etc., and is located on Lincoln Boulevard in the east central part of the city.

District Missionary W. J. Breshears recently completed a series of meetings in the new building, the chapel being filled to capacity during the latter part of the series. Many of those in attendance were nonmember friends. A number of good prospects for membership were discovered and Brother Breshears will return following the reunion season to seek to win them to the church.

Elder J. L. Barlow is the pastor.

PAWNEE, OKLAHOMA.—Yokama, the youth camp for this territory, was held May 29 through June 4. Raymond Yeubanks was the director and Victor Witte the business manager. Forty-six campers were present and there was a staff of thirteen plus five junior staff members. The theme was "They Witnessed and So Must We." The outstanding campfire was on Memorial Day, May 30, with a special service in memory of Bill Stephens, a camper of 1948, son of Mr. and Mrs. Otis Stephens. Other members of the staff included John Darling from the Department of Religious Education, in charge of campfires; Mr. and Mrs. N. L. Booker from Miami, Florida, cooks; Dub Couch, assistant business manager; Virginia Moorman, camp nurse; Madeline Yeubanks, music; Aarona Kohlman and Onalea Bailey, handicraft; Lorene Couch, dean of girls; Louis Bailey, recreation and dean of boys; LeRoy Thomas, work projects.

At the annual banquet, a high point of each camp, the staff members are given Indian names. Brother Yeubanks received the name of Chief Eagle Beak. Near the end of camp, the campers were pleased to welcome back Chief Bald Eagle, Bishop Leslie Kohlman, last year's director.

NORTHERN MICHIGAN DISTRICT.—The Northern Michigan District held a women's institute at Gaylord on May 21 and 22, under the theme, "The Zionie Home by Obedience to Law." Through the auspices of Apostle Arthur Oakman, Sister Pauline Arnsen was secured to give the lectures. Her subjects were, "A Functioning Women's Department," "The Zionie Home by Obedience to Law," "Fitly Framed Together," and "What Is in Thine Hand?"

The banquet Saturday evening was presided over by Sister Walton Fritz of Gaylord as toastmistress. Apostle Oakman gave the address. There were ninety in attendance at the banquet and about 200 at the Sunday services, which opened with a fellowship service at 9:00 a.m. Apostle Oakman delivered the Sunday morning address.

BRISBANE, AUSTRALIA.—Seventy Vivien Sorensen with his wife, Gwen, and their children, Beth and Marvia, returned to Australia by air from Tahiti early in March. They spent considerable time in Brisbane combining family reunions and missionary work in the Brisbane area.

citizen . . . kindly, cheerful, loyal to his own creed and tolerant of those of others, standing for modesty, simplicity, good citizenship, embodying in his private and public life all the virtues which adorn a character worthy of emulation—such is the revelation that he leaves to the world as the real interpretation of an ecclesiastical message translated in terms of human character.

Such is the reputation of a man who followed the teachings of Joseph Smith and made them operate in his own life.

TRUTHS THAT THE PROPHET TAUGHT LIVE ON Religion is not limited to preaching; it is to be carried into all the business of living. When this is done, then sin, conflict, and strife will end, and peace will reign. Toward this goal did Joseph Smith strive, and for this end will the church he founded carry forward.

June 27, 1844, Joseph Smith was killed by a mob of men who had but one desire and that was to exterminate him and drive his people from the state. They succeeded in taking away from him his mortal life, but his teachings are immortal and stand today a more fitting monument than any made of stone and mortar.

If we will emulate him and follow his teachings, we will be good citizens, and make this country a better place in which to live.

Interesting Personalities—

Irene Wolfe - Stone Church Organist

Irene Wolfe began playing the organ at Central Church in Kansas City, Missouri, when she was fifteen years old. As a very young girl she used to watch the regular organist and dream about the day when she, too, would be able to play. That day came sooner than she had dared to hope. The regular organist—a young, attractive woman—needed a substitute to play on the Sunday evenings when she had dates. Irene volunteered for the job, and her lessons began immediately. After filling the Sunday evening assignments successfully, she was invited to play at church school, and finally became the full-time organist.

It was at Central Church that she “trained” as a choir accompanist under the direction of George Anway. She gives him credit for keeping her at the organ following her first radio broadcast. “I can’t remember just what happened now,” she smiles, “but I do know that I was ready to give up for good. I wasn’t ever going to play the organ again. George spent several hours changing my mind for me, and . . . well, I’m still at it.”

After approximately seventeen years at Central, she began playing at Stone Church. The following year, the Wolfes moved to Oklahoma City where she was church organist for two years, then to Seattle for a year and a half. Returning to Independence in 1942, she has served consistently as one of the regular organists at Stone Church. In addition to Sunday services and broadcasts, she frequently plays for weddings and funerals. The notes on her copy of Lohengrin’s “Bridal Chorus” are almost obliterated by the signatures of couples she has played for—but it doesn’t really matter; she has played that famous march so many times she knows it by heart. She can’t begin to remember how many weddings she has played for, but each one has been a high light in her career as an organist. “Weddings are my favorites,” she says, “I never get tired of them.” Perhaps it is because she enjoys them so much that she is often asked to play for weddings at other churches in Independence and Kansas City. Without especially intending to be, she is serving as an “ambassador of good will” for her own congregation.

Looking back over her years of service, Irene likes to name the people who have helped her. Heading the list with George Anway are Paul Craig, director of the Stone Church choir, and Robert Miller, organist at Stone Church for twenty-five years. She gives much credit to her teachers, Elizabeth Tanner Hitchcock and Hans Feil, too.

She is as proud of the musical accomplishments of her husband, Clayton, as she is of her own. She met him at Central Church when he was tenor soloist there, and they have been adding to the beauty of religious services in branches throughout the country ever since. Clayton directs the song service at Stone Church every other Sunday evening now. Both of their children, Clayton Junior (Jack) and Mrs. Shirley Johnson, play and sing. The other member of their immediate family—granddaughter Linda Lou Wolfe—shows musical tendencies, but it’s difficult to make any predictions for a one-year-old.

Irene’s other interests include housekeeping and singing in the choir on the Sundays she isn’t at the organ. She is also a member of the American Guild of Organists. At the annual spring concert sponsored by the Community Music Association of Independence, she was one of sixteen pianists featured at eight pianos.

One who plays so often might well be expected to charge for her services, but Irene has never accepted pay for her contribution to the church. “I’m just thankful I have something to offer that is needed,” she says with much sincerity. “Playing the organ is a part of my stewardship.”—Naomi Russell.

The Pastor's Pocket Manual for Hospital and Sickroom

by EDMOND HOLT BABBITT

Here is an indispensable aid in an essential and exacting part of the pastoral ministry—a pocket-sized manual for use at the bedside of the sick. The selections are in logical, usable order—in a format as dignified as a small New Testament—and printed in a large type.

Prayer That Contacts God

By PAUL EDWARDS

LAST DECEMBER, I had the privilege of speaking over WSUI on Morning Chapel. It was a new experience for me, as I was not in the presence of those who were listening. It was hard for me to realize that they were hearing me just as if I were speaking to them directly. The veil of distance separating us was overcome by the force of radio.

However great the wonders of radio may be, there is an even greater power resident within each of us—that is our power to contact God. God seems unreal, faraway, and sometimes impossible to contact. He is veiled from us as the radio listeners were from me. But God is real, and he may be reached through the power of prayer. It transcends the distance between man and his Creator just as the radio links the speaker and his listeners. However, the nature of prayer is different. Radio uses the forces that lie outside of the person; prayer uses a force that lies inside. Radio is usually a one-way affair: prayer is a two-way connection. When we reach our Creator, we talk with him, and he also talks with us.

How do we go about praying? Do we just say a few words and call that a prayer? No. Real prayer is the meeting of the soul of a person with God. It is the process of becoming one in spirit with him. Prayer may be verbal, but it is often the communication of intelligence, ideas, and hopes between the mind of God and the mind of man. Man brings his heartfelt joys, sorrows, and problems to the Eternal Mind and, with the aid of the Spirit, is enabled to see them in a higher perspective. At the same time, he receives courage and strength to go on in the way of the good life.

The faith that God answers prayer is a requirement if one would reach him. If I did not believe I could talk with him, I would not pray any more than I would go before the microphone to speak if I did not believe in the power of radio. Even the most feeble hope is sufficient when it is relied on.

GOD DOES ANSWER PRAYER. Often when I have needed help, he has supplied it. And I am not the only one who has had prayers answered. Many Latter Day Saints have had their prayers answered, and so have people of other faiths. Nor is the effectiveness of prayer limited to any one age; throughout the history of mankind it has proved to be a vital force.

Paul Edwards describes himself as "a native Iowa boy of twenty-four." His home is near Maquoketa, and he is a member of Fulton Branch. He holds the office of priest and has served as a Zion's League leader. During the war he served with the Forty-fourth Infantry Division in Europe. He was graduated from Graceland College in 1948 and is now attending the University of Iowa. He will receive his Bachelor's Degree in sociology in February, 1950.

When we pray, we need to draw apart from the hurry, the cares, the pettiness of life. It is easier to see the whole pattern of things more clearly when we are at a distance. Parts begin to fit together in their true perspective, and we see God in his place. We observe problems that are too big for us and where we need help in things that really matter. We become concerned about them and strive to do something. We formulate desires for direction and help. These desires may exist in the mind only as ideas—maybe hazy, maybe clear cut—or they may be spoken. These desires are real prayer.

Our Father, in talking to us, gives us a sense of direction that will help us to solve the problems we have. At the same time, he gives us assurance that he is with us.

DO NOT IGNORE this tremendous force of prayer. "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of." Prayer can bring you into contact with God and help you to build a better life. God is waiting for you to call upon him. Look to him for help, and he will give it to you. He will talk to you. He will lead you in the paths of righteousness if you will only ask him.

George Meredith once wrote, "Who rises from prayer a better man, his prayer is answered."

When we thank God for answers to our prayers, we would be wise to include the times that the communion of prayer has given us clearer minds and calmer hearts, when we have gone down upon our knees in helpless anger and have arisen purged and in possession of our better selves. It is not possible always to be wise, but we can drink from the supreme fountain of wisdom in prayer. It is not always possible to maintain self-control, but we can regain it at the foot of the Heavenly Father's throne. It is not always human to keep a clear understanding of the difference between the good and the bad, the superior and the inferior, but we can clear our vision and brighten our comprehension in the divine presence.

Shall I Tolerate My Neighbor?

By NORMA ANNE KIRKENDALL

RACE TOLERANCE! I shudder now at its apparent meaning. Race tolerance seems to mean that you and your Jewish neighbor will not come to blows. You will not smash his windows or insist that he wear a distinguishing mark.

Race tolerance! It means that you must not patronize the garbage man too much, because he's Negro. He has to earn a living, so you help him by letting him collect your garbage.

Race tolerance! There are Chinese and Japanese students at the university, and you see them on the street. That's perfectly all right—no reason at all why they shouldn't go to the university.

Race tolerance! I like Mexico and love the Mexican race, and my erstwhile friends can't seem to understand why I would like to live in any country except the "good old U. S. A." It's certainly all right to visit another country, but to live there—no, indeed!

Race tolerance! Such an attitude is stifling both to the one who is tolerant and the one who is tolerated.

AND AM I TOLERANT? I'm not sure. I was born in Kentucky. An elderly Negro man and his wife lived next door. Old Mrs. Jackson had been a slave; she was kind and gentle and a wonderful cook. She's dead now, but I love to see old Mr. Jackson's shining eyes when we go to visit him.

When we moved to our town, we came into the district that made it necessary for me to go to a high school where over 40 per cent of the students were Negro. It was there I met Deac Willis, who later became a Big-Ten All-American nominee. He used to tell me about funny things that happened in football practice. No, I never visited the home of any of those Negroes, I never went to a party they attended, but I did talk to them in class, asked them for help and gave help on our lessons and spoke to them on the street. Harry G. was ebon, but I honestly thought his essay in the oratorical contest was good, and I told him so. Hank B. also played football, and he later collected our trash. Whenever he brought the truck around, we talked over high school days.

Then came college. One day in music class a Chinese girl came in and her "neighbor" changed her seat. It was automatic—I moved beside her and offered her a share of my book. Ruth and I became good friends, we shared secrets, we shared belongings. She introduced me into the Chinese students' club and later presented my name to the Cosmopolitan Club of which I became the American member. Twenty-one nationalities! Charlie Pan taught me to use chop sticks. It was there that I met John. He looked like every other Negro, but I found out later that he was a prince from a South African country.

Add Dudley in New Zealand collects stamps. Tony who served in the RAF in South Africa, described sunsets beautifully in his letters. Norah in England has sent me a beautiful willowware plate. They are all my friends.

Race tolerance! I don't tolerate those people. They are an integral part of my life. Why should I tolerate a Russian any more than I tolerate a native of Missouri? Neither of them came from my home. I've been in Missouri; those people there are no different from the people in Ohio. I've never been to Russia, but I've read all I can about them. The only great difference is the language, and I have long since dismissed language as a barrier. Most any person can learn another language.

The Steins live across the street. Their soldier son has just returned from Japan. They are as Jewish as their name; but Mrs. Stein worried about her son during his absence, just as I worried about my loved ones. We had a wonderful thing in common—we both believed that our prayers could help to bring those loved ones home safely.

One of the great authors of the past, Paul of Tarsus, was a cosmopolitan who had traveled over all the known world of his day. His conscience made him go "into all the world," and he often repeated his avowals of love for all nationalities.

When one learns to love his neighbor—Jew, Negro, Italian, or Polish—he is in the world. When children forget such words as "wop," "nigger," "dago," and "greaser," and remember only "friend," then racial equality will be a reality.

Race tolerance! There should be no such term. There should be only love for one's fellow men.

Racial Prejudice

A doctor in a Red Cross blood donation center said that the Bible claim, "God hath made of one blood all nations," is scientifically true. While the law requires the plasma of the blood of the several races to be so marked, yet there is no scientific reason why the blood of any race should not be transfused into a person of any other race. "Yet," said the doctor, "some white people are so prejudiced they would rather die than have Negro, Jewish, or Oriental blood transfused into their veins." —Cyclopedia of Bible Illustrations.

Owen Sound-Toronto Reunion

The Port Elgin Reunion for Owen Sound and Toronto Districts will be held July 16 to 24 on the shores of Lake Huron. Services will be held in the tabernacle. Two new buildings are available this year for children's worship and study. Meals will be served cafeteria style in the dining hall. The buildings and grounds are church-owned. There will be worship, classes, and supervised recreation for all ages. Apostle Percy Farrow is to be in charge, assisted by Apostle Arthur Oakman, Bishop Joseph Baldwin, Evangelists B. H. Hewitt and Benson Belrose, Missionary Lewis Zonker, Pastors Carl Muir of London and David J. Sheehy of Sharon, Pennsylvania, Mrs. Slazer of Detroit, Michigan (representing the women's department), and other local ministers. Reservations for cabins, rooms, or tents may be obtained from Mrs. Alvin Dobson, Port Elgin, Ontario.

JOHN F. SHEEHY,
for the Reunion Committee.

Two-Day Meeting at Myrtle Point, Oregon

Members in southwestern Oregon are invited to attend the special services to be held at Myrtle Point on July 3 and 4. District President and Mrs. J. L. Verhei and Elder and Mrs. Miles Whiting are to be in attendance. Sunday's activities include church school at 9:45 a.m.; Communion at 11:00; lunch at the church at noon; round table discussion at 3:00 p.m.; preaching at 8:00. A picnic will be held on Monday in the Grange Grove. Sleeping accommodations will be provided for out-of-town visitors who wish to attend both days. Isolated Saints are given a special invitation.

RUBY GIBERSON.

Missouri Valley Youth Camp

The Missouri Valley youth camp will be held August 26 to 31 at Camp Sheldon, Columbus, Nebraska. All young people in the four districts of the Northeast and Southern Nebraska, Northwest and Southwest Iowa are invited to attend.

CHARLES D. NEFF,
Camp Chairman.

Southern Indiana District Reunion

The Southern Indiana Reunion will be held at the Santa Claus Methodist Camp Grounds, three miles south of Dale, Indiana, on State Road 245. Seventy Joseph Yager, Bishop Stephen Robinson, High Priest J. C. Stuart, and Elder and Mrs. Chester Metcalf will be in charge. Rates are as follows: dormitory and meals, full time, adults, $18.00; children twelve and under, $14.00. Reservations should be sent to Chester Metcalf, 1805 Shelby Street, New Albany, Indiana.

CHESTER METCALF,
District President.

Brooksville Reunion

The Maine District Reunion will be held August 6 through 14 at Brooksville, Maine.

General church officials and appointees expected to be present are Apostle M. L. Draper, Seventies D. E. Harvey and William Guthrie, High Priest A. W. Sheehy, and Elder John Conway. Rooms in dormitories will rent as follows: two beds, $5.00; three beds, $7.50; four beds, $10.00; cot in tent, $1.50. Blankets will rent for $.35 each and pillows, $.25 each. Both blankets and pillows are limited, so campers should bring their own if possible. Meal prices are $5.00 for children under twelve, $7.00 for adults. For accommodations write to George Woodward, 48 Eaton Street, Camden, Maine. After July 1 his address will be 16½ Hylor Street, Thomaston, Maine.

NEWMAN WILSON,
District President.

Reunion of the Ozarks

The reunion of the Spring River and Rich Hill Districts will be held at Racine, Missouri, July 23 to 31 inclusive. All members of both districts are urged to attend. General church workers will be Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Bishop Leslie Kohlman, and Elders Herbert Lively, Don Kyser, and John Blackmore. Those desiring to order tents should contact Mark Mink, 3134 West Twentieth, Joplin, Missouri, as soon as possible. The grounds are beautiful and the weather is usually cool. For further information contact John Blackmore, 1906 Bird Avenue, Joplin, Missouri.

Cash Reunion

The Cash Reunion will be held August 13 to 21 at Cash, Michigan. Seventy Virgil Billings, Bishop T. A. Beck, and Elders Blair McClain and James Phillips are to be present. The usual good meals will be served. Those desiring accommodations should contact James Phillips, Sandusky, Michigan.

Gulf States Annual Youth Camp

The Liahona Youth Camp of the Gulf States District will be conducted on the reunion grounds at Brewton, Alabama, August 13 to 20, for young people between the ages of fifteen and eighteen. Applications should be made to Raymond L. Booker, 1158 Gorgas Street, Mobile 20, Alabama, who is the camp director. The fee will be $12.50, $2.50 of which should be remitted with the application.

The staff will include Raymond L. Booker, Addelean Booker, J. Henry Porter, Jack Pray, and Maurine Crownover.

A Junior High Camp will be held for boys and girls between the ages of twelve and fourteen, August 10-13, under the direction of Brother Booker and the youth camp staff. The fee for the junior camp will be $5.00, and application should also be made to R. L. Booker.

W. J. BRESHEARS,
President, Gulf States District.

A daughter, Janis Elaine, was born on May 13 at the Independence Sanitarium to Elder and Mrs. J. D. Anderson of Kansas City, Missouri. Mrs. Anderson is the former Marna Jane Holmes. Elder Anderson is president of Kansas City Stake.

DEATHS

EDIE.—Albert Gallatin, Sr., was born September 13, 1886, at Greely, Nebraska, and died suddenly and unexpectedly at his home in Council Bluffs, Iowa, on June 3, 1949. He was married to Emma Smith on September 3, 1913, at Council Bluffs; six children were born to them. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1919.

He is survived by his wife, Emma, of Council Bluffs; three daughters: Mrs. Mable Betts of Council Bluffs; Mrs. Mildred Flowers of Decatur, Iowa; and Patsy Edie of the home; one son, Albert Edie, Jr., of Council Bluffs; two brothers: Archer and Earl, both of White Cloud, Kansas; five sisters: Mrs. Edna Simpson and Mrs. Frances Murphy of Fall City, Nebraska; Mrs. Mae Scott of Hastings, Iowa; Mrs. Ethel Imel of Gravity, Iowa; and Mrs. Iona Chambers of Council Bluffs; and nine grandchildren. Two children preceded Mr. Edie in death. Funeral services were held at the Woodring Chapel in Council Bluffs, Elder V. D. Ruch officiating. Interment was in the so-called Old Mormon Cemetery five miles east of Macedonia, Iowa.

O'BRYAN.—Anna, daughter of Judge Collins and Mary Bradley, was born at Princeton, Kentucky, on March 10, 1859, and died at Louisville, Kentucky, on April 8, 1949. She was married to Henry J. O'Bryan in 1890; two children were born to this marriage. Their daughter, Anna, died at the age of thirteen. Mrs. O'Bryan united with the Reorganized Church on July 27, 1921. She spent much of her life as a teacher of the Indians at Haskell Institute in Lawrence, Kansas.

She is survived by a son, Elder Frank O'Bryan, pastor of the branch at St. Charles, Missouri. Elder H. W. Burwell was in charge of the funeral service. Burial was in the Evergreen Cemetery, Louisville.

KIEFFER.—Jake, was born November 28, 1896, near Pitts, Arkansas, and died April 2, 1949, at St. Bernard's Hospital in Jonesboro, Arkansas, following a long illness. On May 14, 1922, he was married to Matilda Ziegenhorn and was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 23, 1923. He was a veteran of the First World War and a member of the American Legion. He spent most of his life at Weiner, Arkansas, where he was a rice farmer.

He is survived by his wife, Matilda; four sons: Marvin of Fayetteville, Arkansas; Ryland, Seth, and Melvin of Weiner; and three brothers: Felix, George, and Bennie of Weiner. Funeral services were held at the Christian church in Weiner, Elder Giles Turner officiating. Burial was in the Weiner cemetery.

MAYSE.—Andrew J., was born on April 6, 1864, in Plattsburg, Missouri, and died on February 26, 1949, in Coquille, Oregon. He moved to Coos County, Oregon, in 1887, and on June 7, 1891, was married to Laura B. Krantz. Four children were born to them. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since September 6, 1902.

He is survived by his wife; a son, Emmett M. of San Francisco, California; two daughters: Mrs. Macie Neal of Coos Bay, Oregon, and Mrs. Eula Roberts of Arago, Oregon; a brother, Robert C. Mayse of Ashland, Kansas; seven grandchildren; and eight great-grandchildren. A son, Lester L., preceded him in death. Funeral services were conducted by Elder J. L. Verhei and Apostle C. G. Mesley. Interment was in the Dora Cemetery.

PETERS.—Dwight Leroy, son of Otis L. and Hattie L. Peters, was born November 16, 1906, near St. Charles, Iowa, and died at the Osteopathic Hospital in Kirksville, Missouri, on February 17, 1949. At the age of two, he moved with his parents to Lamoni, Iowa; here he became a member of the Reorganized Church when he was eight years old. In 1920, he moved with his family to a farm near Hannibal, Missouri, where he resided the remainder of his life. On August 1, 1929, he was married to Elizabeth May Park; three children were born to them.

He is survived by his wife; two daughters: Wanda Lee and Verna Kathryn; and a son, Donald Otis, all of the home; his parents; a brother, Wayne Peters of Palmyra, Missouri; and a sister, Mrs. Betty Swank of Hannibal. Funeral services were conducted at Hannibal by Stake President Emery Jennings and Elder John Vanskike.

 ABLE

When God said, "Let us make man in our image," it meant a distribution of some of his personal qualities to his children: to some, love, to some, wisdom, to some, power. Have you ever met someone to whom he gave a cupful of his omnipotence? . . . We have one of them here in our little department of the workshops of Zion. He is The Man Who Can Do Anything. He performs miracles of ingenuity, skill, and service for us every day.

You would never think that God could be served by a load of trash. But our Man thought of it. Trash disposal is one of the headaches of city life. You can't just throw things away. You must have them hauled, and you pay somebody to do it. Our Man does it on Saturdays. Why? He has a good job, and enough money. Why does he haul trash?

Yesterday the answer came out. He hauls trash for the Lord. He is saving the money he gets to put into the building fund at Enoch Hill, where they are going to build a church, and they need every work-worn cent they can get. Our Man has a tidy sum, about ready to turn in. When the building goes up, his contribution will be in it.

Omnipotence may be a big word, but not too big for our Man. He has the know-how, the can-do, and the I-will. He can do anything. He often does. And he has done it again.

 DRIVE CAREFULLY

Do drive carefully. There may be a cemetery waiting for you, just over the top of the next hill.

A Kansas City truck driver, who had no accidents in twenty years of steady work, was asked how he made his fine safety record. He answered, "I just act like every other driver was crazy."

Why not make it unanimous? Say to yourself, "Maybe I'm crazy, too!" And, to tell the truth, sometimes you are!

To be safe, you must drive for at least two fellows—you, and the button-head at the wheel of the other car.

A driver nearly crashed us the other day. He pulled out into the stream of traffic with the bland, vacuous smile produced by too many highballs. He was as blind as a porcelain owl. Who knows? He may have been one of the two hundred people killed over the holiday week end.

Sometimes I think that the term, "Week-end driver" should be spelled differently. I favor "weak-end." It is at the top of the spinal column.

Don't drink. Brother, sister, leave it alone. There's Death in that bottle. Why should you kill yourself and be brought into the presence of your Master with a hang-over?

 SHORTS

Weigh your shoes. You will have to pick them up and set them down many times before you die.

We save money on necessities so we can spend it on our follies.

It is a lot easier to believe a miracle than to explain it.

A mile in the morning seems like half a mile; a mile in the afternoon seems like two. It is all a matter of how you feel.

A Nation Was Born

The flag waving, noise, and fireworks heard and seen in United States and Canada tell of something that happened years ago. On July 1, 1867, the Dominion Proclamation, like our Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776, announced the birth of a nation. Many of us may give little thought to the significance of these events as we celebrate, nevertheless all will admit that something of world-wide significance happened on those dates.

As we view the flags and displays of fireworks (see cover picture), let us be reminded that they are symbols of freedom and truth. These two are inseparable companions. The truth about society and governments as well as the truth about the gospel "shall make you free." The symbol of truth is fire or light. While firecrackers and bursting bombs may annoy us, they also can remind us of the cost with which our national freedom has been preserved.

Introducing...

HAROLD I. VELT (page 8) was born in Craigie, New South Wales, Australia, on October 12, 1893. He was educated in the rural schools, and at first had to travel about eight miles to reach the schools. Later, through the importuning of his mother and his father's offering to build a schoolhouse and room the teacher, the educational process was more easily accessible. He finished the courses which would be equivalent to our high school at the age of twelve years and five months, but had to wait a year to receive his "certificate of merit" at the Bairnsdale school of higher education a distance of 120 miles. He received some musical education in his youth, and led the Church of England choir. At the age of eleven he began the study of violin but received no professional training until thirty years of age.

He married Evelyn Alice Haworth in 1920. They have one daughter, Viola Alice.

He began work as a "timber felling contractor and crop share corn farmer." Later he purchased eighty acres of timber land and cleared it for farming.

He has been under Conference appointment since the age of twenty-one, and has baptized 424 people. Among these were many of his own relatives, including his grandmother, parents, brothers and sisters, uncles, aunts, and cousins. He is one of the Council of Presidents of Seventy.

AARONA BOOKER KOHLMAN (page 17) was born in Wellston, Ohio, July 7, 1913. Her father is N. L. Booker, for many years a member of the missionary force and now pastor of the Miami (Florida) Branch.

Sister Kohlman has lived in the British West Indies, Jamaica, and Grand Cayman Islands; Isle of Pines; and Cuba. She has lived also in the states of Ohio, Utah, Idaho, Mississippi, Florida, Colorado, Texas, Oklahoma, Iowa, and Missouri. She says: "I like to travel and don't mind moving."

She was married to Leslie W. Kohlman on July 18, 1934, in the Graceland Chapel. They have four children: Fay, 13; David, 11; Kathleen, 7; and Richard, 3.

Sister Kohlman was graduated from the Vanleave (Mississippi) High School in 1930. She was a 1933 graduate of Graceland College, where she was a member of the Lambda Delta Sigma, Crescent Club, and the Press Club. She won first place in a short story contest.

Her hobbies are textile painting, writing, and handcraft.

She is division supervisor of the Stone Church women's department and an assistant Oriole monitor.

News & Notes

W. WALLACE SMITH IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

At the eighth Annual Convention of the British Columbia District held in Vancouver, Apostle and Mrs. W. Wallace Smith and Bishop Monte Lasater taught classes. An annual banquet sponsored by the young people was held in Stanley Park in Vancouver. It was in the pavillion immediately in front of the theater bowl of the park. Apostle Smith says, "It was a beautiful setting for a grand occasion. The British Columbia Saints are to be congratulated on having produced such a program."

Apostle and Mrs. Smith through arrangements made by Brother Sam G. Clark visited some of the isolated members on Vancouver Island, who are working under the leadership of Brother Murray Stoutenburg at Youbou, British Columbia. This little town is located on the shores of one of the island's beautiful lakes, Lake Cowichan. Its picture was sent in by Sister Marion Canning and was published on the front of the "Herald" about six months ago. Sister Canning has been hoping and praying for twenty years that someone would come to start the church work. The church now has two members of the priesthood there, Elder Murray Stoutenburg and Priest Albert Phillips, who is a practicing physician at Youbou. Both of these brothers and their families came from Toronto.

FROM A REPORT OF MERLE GUTHRIE

"The zeal and the co-operation of officers, priesthood, and membership are indeed encouraging. I personally have baptized twenty-nine up to June 1 and three since then. The major portion of credit goes to devoted local people."

MISSIONARY WORK IN TEXAS

Seventy William Haden recently conducted a series of missionary services in Stanton, Texas, where a young husband and wife were baptized. In a series in Lubbock, Texas, eight were baptized, principally young adults. Lubbock Branch began to become active about two years ago. Under Raymond Stone and William Schreier the branch has made remarkable gains. The Saints have just purchased a surplus building and adapted it to use as a small chapel with classrooms. During the last week end of Brother Haden's stay at Lubbock, Apostle and Mrs. Reed Holmes and their two oldest children also met with the Saints. There were nearly 100 Saints and friends from Lubbock and the surrounding territory present on Sunday. The group met at the municipal park and at the new church. The chief characteristic of this group, reports Apostle Holmes, is their fine missionary testimony. The members, led by the priesthood, are exercising an intensive missionary drive.

NAUVOO BUSINESS

Bishop G. L. DeLapp and Brother Harold Constance spent the week end of June 19 in Nauvoo inspecting the church's properties there.

AUDITORIUM PICNIC

On June 21, at 6:00 p.m., members of the Auditorium staff met at the shelter house in Slover Park in Independence for a picnic supper. Sixty-eight were present. All employees and appointees from The Auditorium and Stone Church and their families were invited to come.

VELT IN IOWA

Elder Harold I. Velt reports that meetings he has been holding in Dunlap, Iowa, have been successful. In a letter written Wednesday, June 15, he adds this P. S.: "Had thirty nonmembers out to meeting last night besides the members. A Dr. Walfoord, M.D., and his wife are much interested and are bringing others out through reading 'America's Lost Civilizations.'"

A New Birth of Freedom

“We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.”—From the “Declaration of Independence.”

Our Day of Freedom

On every Fourth of July, it is the custom of the citizens of the United States to celebrate the birth of freedom which came to their ancestors, the founders of the Republic, when on July 4, 1776, the Continental Congress meeting at Philadelphia adopted the great document that is known as “The Declaration of Independence.”

That declaration expressed the will of the people of the thirteen colonies on the Atlantic seaboard of this continent to be free. It expressed their belief in freedom, not only for themselves, but their faith in the principle of freedom for all people, everywhere in the world.

Three things should not be forgotten on this day: first, to thank God for the freedom we enjoy; second, to honor the memory of those who fought and struggled to obtain it; and third, to extend and give it to all other people wherever we can.

An Early Declaration

Our Declaration of Independence was not the earliest document of freedom to be issued on the soil of the Western World. In the Book of Mormon (page 717, Ether 1:31, 35) we have a declaration that was drawn up over 2,000 years before Christ:

It is a land of promise, and whatsoever nation shall possess it, shall serve God, or they shall be swept off when the fullness of his wrath shall come upon them . . . This is a choice land, and whatsoever nation shall possess it, shall be free from bondage, and from captivity, and from all other nations under heaven.

We have two great obligations in occupying this land of America: we must serve God and preserve freedom. To violate either is to risk destruction. How close we came to disaster in practicing slavery here! And how great our danger may be today for not serving God.

What Freedom Means

Politically, freedom is the highest value that an earthly government can set upon the human individual. Slavery is the lowest value that can be set upon one. In a democracy, government exists for the people; in a tyranny, people are exploited for the good of the government.

Freedom is a combination of opportunities in life, and responsibilities for conduct, that produces the greatest good for the greatest number of people. Freedom can reach its highest levels of benefit for the human race only when it is practiced under the great ethical principles and moral forces that come to us from the gospel of Christ.

Friends of Freedom

Some friendly peoples and nations have honored us by joining in the celebration of Independence Day. This friendship is gratefully received, especially in times like these. Freedom today is in danger around the earth. Those nations that have preserved the freedom of their people must stand together in a common bond of danger and defense. They have need of each other.

“A New Birth of Freedom”

Freedom, once born, is not imperishable. It was destroyed by unrighteousness and tyranny in Book of Mormon times, and the people responsible were swept away, according to the terms of the divine mandate.

Freedom has its foes as well as its friends in every generation of mankind. There are always evil powers that look for wealth by making slaves of the people. Like Pharaoh, few slave-owners ever willingly let go of a victim; and it is often necessary to shed blood to preserve freedom.

Is it not ironical that some of the very hands that penned the phrases of freedom in the Declaration of Independence also held human beings in unrighteous bondage?

President Lincoln knew that freedom, which had been born on the soil of America, died here almost immediately in the slave pens and on the human auction blocks, wherever whips were laid by white hands upon colored backs, and wherever manacles were put upon colored wrists. So he expressed in his Gettysburg address the determination,

That this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom.

If freedom is to live, it must be reborn in the ideals and purposes, the law and the society of living men and women.

Freedom was reborn in America in 1776. It was reborn again in the dreadful experience of the country from 1860 to 1865, making the “Emancipation Proclamation” effective. It must be reborn again in our day to bring freedom to other peoples around the world.

Lincoln could have chosen no more significant words than those that form the phrase, “This nation, under God.” It is the same idea that was expressed in the words of the early prophet, that freedom is something which can be enjoyed only under God, only in righteousness. It is something for America to remember today. L. J. L.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Apostle C. George Mesley, Anchorage, Alaska, June 10:

A good week end in Whitehorse is behind me, and another at Anchorage is in the making. Brother Allish met me at the airport, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, Canada, and the busy round of visiting began. I visited the church school conducted by Sister Jean Barnett (reported in the Herald). It is interdenominational in material and in support, has a staff of teachers, and uses visual aids extensively. Sister Barnett is superintendent, Brother Barnett, secretary. It is a fine contribution of public ministry.

We held Communion for our three families in Whitehorse and blessed the two children of Brother and Sister McKeever (converts of James McKenzie). They had been without church fellowship for four years.

I held a preaching service in the evening with two nonmember friends present. Every day was a continuous session from 8:00 a. m. till 1:00 a. m. The sun sets at 10:30 p. m. and rises at 2:30 a. m., and the people seem to take a cue accordingly. I spent Monday with the three families in the home of each and ministered and administered as the needs were evident.

I left Thursday by bus for Fairbanks on the "Alcan Highway." It was an interesting trip with frequent stops to deliver mail and supplies—the modern stage coach of the North. At Dry Creek we were informed that the highway above Delta was out—"indefinitely"—the result of a lead mountain slide and the spring thaw in action together. To remain "indefinitely" at Dry Creek was unthinkable. I secured transportation to Anchorage for the only other through passenger, a United States Public Health Supervisor Nurse, and latched on to an open jeep for myself. The young Californian driver was heading for Alaska to find gold. I had to wear all the clothes I could put on and take all the wind and dust that were freely given. The scenery was spectacular, and I secured some lovely pictures. The trip to Anchorage took two days, and was I glad for a berth and rest on arrival.

More from Anchorage later.

IN APPRECIATION OF THE DENTS

After many years of faithful service to the church, Bishop John C. Dent is being released from responsibility as Bishop of the Chatham and London Districts, Ontario, Canada. We publish the following well-earned tribute prepared by the

JOHN C. DENT

Presiding Bishopric after consultation with the Presidency which expresses our joint sentiments.

The late President Frederick M. Smith was very appreciative of Brother Dent's faithful and long-continued service to the church. Both members of the Presidency, as presently constituted, have also had very helpful contacts with Bishop Dent, whose work has had widespread spiritual significance. It is therefore a great pleasure to extend to Brother Dent our thanks and appreciation for his many services and our best wishes for his continued physical, material, and spiritual welfare.

To Sister Dent we extend our most sincere appreciation for the very able way in which she has sustained her husband in his labors.

The communication from the Presiding Bishopric, a copy of which has been forwarded to Brother and Sister Dent, is as follows:

It is with deep appreciation that we take advantage of this opportunity to pay tribute to Bishop John C. Dent, who is being released from responsibility as Bishop of Chatham and London Districts. We thought it would be highly interesting to the members of our church to know something more of the splendid service given by him over a long period of time.

Brother Dent's record in the church is that of a lifetime. He was born January 7, 1880, blessed by John H. Lake, baptized and confirmed in June, 1891, by Elder Samuel Brown. He was ordained an elder in 1907 by R. C. Evans and others.

He has served in various capacities since his ordination to the priesthood—as president of the Ontario Quorum of Elders, as high priest and bishop, having been ordained to the latter office on May 9, 1920, by President Frederick M. Smith and Bishop B. R. McGuire. He served as bishop of the Chatham District for twenty-nine years; for twenty-one years of that time, he has served as bishop of the London District. He served as president of the Chatham District for a period of three and one-half years, as president of the Bothwell Branch sixteen and one-half years, and as a member of the Erie Beach Reunion Committee for thirty-eight years.

However, to pay tribute to Brother

Travelog

PLANO AND AURORA

Dent is also to acknowledge the obligation of the church to his wife, Mary, who has stood shoulder-to-shoulder with him in all of his church work since their marriage in September, 1903. Brother and Sister Dent have two boys, both of whom are married, and two grandchildren. Brother Dent's paternal grandparents, his father and mother, his six brothers and sisters, his wife, and their two boys, all are members of the church.

For something over twenty-one years Sister Dent has done most of the clerical work incident to Brother Dent's work as bishop, in order that he might give week ends and such other time as he could find during the week to his church responsibilities.

Those who know both Brother and Sister Dent realize that here indeed has been a team which made an outstanding contribution to the work of the church. We of the Bishopric have had reason to appreciate not only the length of service given and the hours of work, but the efficiency of their work as well. We feel that theirs is an example of what a devoted couple can do in service to the church. If one were to add up all the years spent, they would undoubtedly approximate an amount equivalent to years of full-time service.

While Brother and Sister Dent are being released from specific responsibility, it is anticipated that they will feel free in continuing the excellent service to the church that has characterized their lives, as their health and circumstances permit. We wish them both the best that life can bring.

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC

By G. L. DeLapp

Our covering letter to Bishop Dent is also quoted:

Dear Brother Dent:

Under separate cover Bishop DeLapp is sending you a signed acknowledgment of your services in the bishopric. This will also be published in an early issue of the Herald. It seemed to us entirely fitting that this tribute should be prepared by Brother DeLapp, who—in addition to being Presiding Bishop—has many times expressed his personal admiration and affection for you. But we should feel that we had passed by a very pleasant duty if we failed to add our own expression of thanks for your

ONE NATURALLY ENTERTAINS peculiar sentiments about the place of his nativity, so it was with pleasure I accepted Elder Lloyd L. Hadley's invitation to spend Sunday, May 22, with the Saints in the Northeastern Illinois District. According to our plans, I left Kansas City on Saturday by the Santa Fe. Somewhere between Oklahoma and Chicago this streamliner lost two hours; but although it was late, Brother Hadley met the train at midnight (daylight saving time) and in due course I was safely "at home" in the comfortable Hadley residence, 1407 Monroe Avenue, River Forest.

After breakfast with Brother and Sister Hadley, and a safe journey by auto, I arrived in Plano, the city in which I was born. It was indeed a pleasure to meet old friends whom I had met there two years ago on a similar visit. Saints from Mission, Sandwich, DeKalb, Pontiac, and other places were there.

The day began with a very fine lecture by Sister Lillian Hadley on "America, the Promised Land," which was a rather complete resumé of the Book of many services to the church in Ontario and elsewhere.

At times some of the Saints have had a tendency to regard the members of the bishopric as purely financial officers. This is very unfortunate since, as you know, the work of the members of the bishopric has far-reaching spiritual significance. But because of this tendency, we have been very happy indeed to note the part that you have played in the total work of the church in Ontario, and the highly important spiritual contribution you have made on many occasions.

With Bishop DeLapp, we are movingly aware of the fine partnership which has existed between you and Sister Dent throughout your ministry; and in thanking you for your splendid contribution, we therefore hope that you will convey to your wife our appreciation and assurances of high regard.

In view of your splendid ministry, it is to be expected that the Saints in London and Chatham will continue to regard you as their friend, counselor, and elder brother.

We sincerely trust that in this continuing ministry you will be happy and well blessed.

Fraternally yours,

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,

F. H. Edwards.

Mormon illustrated by flannelgraph. At 10:45 I spoke on the Book of Mormon; Brother Hadley, district president, was in charge. After lunch I again addressed the Saints. A "capacity" congregation was in attendance both times.

The following brethren assisted at these services: Kenneth Mulvaney, Russell D. Rogers, C. C. Simpson, G. Wayne Smith, Richard Wildermuth, James Martin, O. T. Hayer, and I. E. Turner. Brother Hadley has the faculty of making good use of the priesthood. Musical numbers were contributed by Burdette Huen, Don Archibald, Gloria Settles, Betty Gregory, and Betty White.

The activities of the day closed with a service at Aurora, where I again spoke. Brother Hadley presided, assisted by Pastor L. E. Cleveland and I. E. Turner. A vocal solo was rendered by Ione Sanderson.

After this full day, Brother and Sister Hadley and I, all quite weary, returned to Chicago. I was taken to the Dearborn Station and, according to plan, I reached home feeling well satisfied with what I had heard and witnessed in the Northeastern Illinois District.

At Plano I was pleased to greet Doctor R. E. Simms, Baptist Minister, whom I met two years ago. Having common ancestors back—not too far—we are pleased to call each other "cousin." He very graciously carried an item in his Bulletin for May 22 that I was to visit Plano again.

At Plano I was pleased also to greet among the congregation Sister Bess Blair, widow of Bishop Fred B. Blair, who now lives at LaGrange.

GALESBURG

When I visited Peoria on March 20 at the suggestion of Elder Ambrose King, arrangements were perfected with the Rock Island District President, Lyle W. Woodstock, to assist at the dedication of the Galesburg church on Sunday, May 29.

Leaving Kansas City on the Santa Fe "Chicagoan" on Saturday (this time running on schedule, as it usually does), I was met at Galesburg by Brother Henry Snow. The evening being still young, Sister Snow had arranged for a dinner party at their home, 71 North Chambers Street. Here I met Pastor and Sister King, their daughter and son-in-law, Leonard Hendricks, members of the Snow family, a son and his wife (a Kirkendall from Texas), a daughter and her husband, and others whose names now escape me. After this fine repast, the evening was spent in discussion of church interests.

What Price America?

By ISRAEL A. SMITH

(A sermon preached at the Stone Church on January 30, 1949)

TODAY, I FEEL impressed to bring to your attention something which I think should be of importance to Latter Day Saints.

Behold, this is a choice land, and whatsoever nation shall possess it, shall be free from bondage, and from captivity, and from all other nations under heaven, if they will but serve the God of the land, who is Jesus Christ who hath been manifested by the things which we have written.—Ether 1: 35.

I have read in your hearing a statement taken from the record in the Book of Mormon as brought to us by Moroni in which the statement was made that this is a choice land. I do not try to confine it to the boundaries of the United States, but to all America—the northern half of the Western Hemisphere. So I do not want to be provincial in my talks, and I am glad to include the other countries.

Governor Phillip LaFollete of Wisconsin a few years ago made this statement:

We believe that this hemisphere, all of it, was set aside by our Creator for the ultimate destiny of man. Here it was ordained that man should work out the final act in the great drama of life, from the Arctic to Cape Horn that no foreign power trespass.

From a current magazine I clipped the following statement which is an indictment of our country as it stands today.

Because we have departed from the faith, the enemy has come in like a flood, subverting the teachings of the church, endeavoring to discredit the story the Bible tells, and has succeeded in dimming the light of the knowledge of the source of our greatness. The spiritual foundation on which this nation has built . . . that foundation was not laid in the doctrines of Mohammed, nor in the teachings of Judaism; neither does it rest upon the unbelief and skepticism of the atheist and agnostic, but it does rest upon the teachings of Jesus Christ and in the power of the Word of the Spirit, as exemplified in the spiritual vision of the men who signed the Mayflower Compact.

I might add this also applies to the Declaration of Independence and the United States Constitution.

WHETHER IT IS A FACT or merely a fear as to what threatens America and its greatness, I do not know. I will leave it for you to judge, but at least we know what the avowed design of some people is. William Z. Foster, who is at the head of the Communist Party of this country, made this statement:

No Communist, no matter how many votes he should secure in a national election, could, even if he would, become president of the present government. When a Communist heads the government of the United States, and that day will come just as surely as the sun shines, the government will not be a capitalist government, but a Soviet government, and behind this government will stand the red army to enforce the dictatorship of the Proletariat.

From a prominent Communist labor leader we find this statement, "We Communists do not distinguish between good and bad religions, because we think they are all bad." To indicate the "mining and sapping" at our foundations which is going on in this country, I quote Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation:

I confess to a real apprehension as long as Communists are able to secure ministers of the gospel to promote their evil work and espouse a cause that is alien to the religion of Christ and Judaism, and that it is reaching into our colleges and educational institutions.

I have read also an extract from a letter addressed to a college president by a father who said, "Education has turned her [speaking of his daughter] into a Red. She used to be a sensible girl, but now she is up in arms against everything I have stood for." When education transfers a youngster's allegiance from the United States to Soviet Russia, something ought to be done about it.

I think it is quite generally understood that America has been a land of great opportunity. It has been the goal of the oppressed and the downtrodden of many countries. I remember a friend of mine, who was Governor of the State of Iowa, saying that there are those who criticize the American government, "But," he added, "it is the only country that has a waiting list of those who wish to become citizens." Recently a Knife and Fork Club lecturer in Independence spoke of America's years in the sun and stated that America was the greatest single factor in the world today. He said he did not know whether we had reached the zenith or not. He didn't know if decline had set in, but the histories of most countries is to the effect that at some point they start downward. He decried the socialistic turn of our governmental affairs and said, "Every country that goes too far down the line of socialism does not get back."

NOW WITH LATTER DAY SAINTS we have a special belief based upon special things with respect to this country. I find at least twenty references in the Book of Mormon to "the land of promise." I find the covenant which I read to you a few moments ago and, like all covenants which the Lord has made with any peoples, it has a condition, a proviso. I wish to read it again, and perhaps to amplify it: "Behold this is a choice land," is not just a statement of fact; it is a statement of prophetic fact, because this country has certainly been a choice land if we consider land by itself. Here is the promise: "And whatsoever nation shall possess it shall be free from bondage and from captivity and from all other nations under heaven" and here is the condition, the proviso, "if they will but serve," not simply acknowledge, but "serve the God of the land who is Jesus Christ, who hath been manifested by the things which we have written." Indeed the Book of Mormon is a remarkable witness with respect to Jesus Christ.

America is recognized by many Gentiles, as a prophetic nation, and recently I saw called to the public's attention, the statement that this people has never fallen, has never been enslaved, has preserved its freedom, and stands today as the only monitor of freedom in the world. In fact, I believe that I can extend that statement to all of modern Ephraim which includes some countries on the other side of the ocean. But the question naturally presents itself, "How long will these conditions obtain?" Certainly not very long if Foster and Browder and Stalin and some others can have their way here.

Now if the Christian peoples of the world had lived up to their full opportunity and complied fully with the mandate of the Savior in the twenty-eighth chapter of Matthew to "teach the things" that he had "commanded," I do not believe the present situation would be confronting us. And there is this justified question, I think, "Is Christianity declining?" A semireligious periodical recently made the statement that Christ is a "national question." The acceptance or rejection of Christ is a national question vital to the welfare of this country. It said that the total rejection of Jesus Christ nationally is one of the most terrible facts of our times. It is not that we omit to say "Lord, Lord," but we omit to do the things he says, and we shall continue to do that nationally until we cease to do it individually.

Christ was the greatest of the prophets, yet many of his prophecies are entirely ignored. He was one of the greatest philosophers of the world. Only this last week I listened to a nationally known psychologist who pointed a number of his arguments with quotations from the Savior. He stated that the Christ was a great psychologist, and the things he quoted were psychologically true. And yet it is likely upon a popular vote that some men like the late deceased President Roosevelt would have polled more votes in a popularity contest than Jesus Christ. Christ was the great lawgiver. As a nation we believe we do pretty well toward honoring the second law of Christ, that is, respecting the rights of human beings; but certainly, if the whole law of Christ were in full operation among us, it would solve all the ills to which the United States or any other nation is subjected.

I THINK WE ARE SAFE in saying that America—at least the United States—was founded on the basis of Christianity. Here were laid the foundations of religious liberty in the Mayflower Compact. The agreement made by those who came to this country on that small ship began this way, "In the name of God, amen. We have undertaken for the glory of God and the advancement of the Christian faith." I think it would have been well if, in the United Nations, that compact and agreement between some fifty or more countries of the world, had made some kind of premise upon a belief in God. Apparently some of the nations, such as Russia, objected to any recognition of a universal God, and so it was left out. In the Declaration of Independence we find this statement: "With a firm reliance upon the protection of divine providence." We have been told in the Doctrine and Covenants that the Lord raised up wise men to establish the Constitution of the United States. It is an interesting fact that from the beginning of this country up until 1826, there were only two states in which reference was made to God in their constitutions; but from 1826 to 1861 there were eleven more. Now there are forty-three of the forty-eight states that make reference and give due recognition to Almighty God in their organic law. At least in the Eightieth Congress a bill was introduced which I understand will be pressed again in the Eighty-first Congress. It is an effort to amend the Preamble of the Constitution so as to provide for this recognition which some think should be there. If this amendment should be adopted, the Preamble will read like this:

We the people of the United States, devoutly recognizing the authority and law of Jesus Christ, the Savior and King of nations, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the people of the United States of America.

I suspect that this bill will meet with considerable opposition, because the argument will be offered that it is the recognition of a religion. But Christ is greater than any religion, and it is imperative upon us as believers in him to honor him as the God of the country as long as this nation continues to serve the God of the land, which is Christ Jesus. In John, fifth chapter, we find "He that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father which hath sent him."

I do not believe that we as Latter Day Saints are in any danger with respect to this thing. I think we will continue to serve the God of the land to the best of our ability. In fact, at the very inception of the Restoration Movement instruction was given to "hear" Christ Jesus. In his first vision Joseph Smith saw two personages and was told by one that

America as Revealed by The Book of Mormon

By HAROLD I. VOLT

BIBLE REFERENCES to Joseph's land (Genesis 49: 22-26 and Deuteronomy 33: 13-16) and "The land shadowing with wings" (Isaiah 18: 1) become strikingly more meaningful as we view them in light of the supporting history of America's sacred history, the Book of Mormon. There is a priceless treasure in certain connecting links between the Bible and this Nephite record. July 4, Independence Day, takes on new significance to us.

It was about 740 B. C. that a woe was pronounced upon "the land shadowing with wings" (Isaiah 18) through the Prophet Isaiah. It was about 600 B. C. that the Lord, through Jeremiah, directed a colony from Hazor (there was a Hazor within four miles of the center of Jerusalem) to a land where a wealthy nation dwelt alone, and upon whom a great calamity was coming from all sides (Jeremiah 49: 30-32). According to the Book of Mormon it was about the same time, 600 B. C., that the scribe, Lehi, and colony (that became the Nephites and the Lamanites of Nephite record) were commanded to leave Jerusalem for America, God's choice land, where only one living man, Coriantumr remained — only one man of a previous, mighty civilization which had been swept off by dissensions and wars after departing from the ways of the Lord.

Archaeological remains of great cities in America and the approximate times of occupation ascribed to them by modern scholars fit uniquely into the interesting Book of Mormon history of "a land choice above all other lands," and of the sweeping off from time to time of those nations that would not measure up to the standards decreed of God for this "land of promise which was choice above every other land."

(Ether 1: 30-35; II Nephi 1: 34; II Nephi 3: 8, 9, et cetera.)

A LAND OF LIBERTY TO ALL PEOPLE

In the Book of Mormon we find not only a strong backing to the Bible-asserted truth that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men and giveth it to whomsoever he will" (Daniel 4: 17, 25), but also an oft-repeated emphasis that in God's great economy for the future salvation of the world, America is destined to play an important and leading part. In early Nephite history, Lehi the scholarly prophet spoke as follows:

We have obtained a land of promise, a land which is choice above all other lands; Wherefore, I, Lehi, prophesy according to the workings of the Spirit which is in me, that there shall none come into this land, save they shall be brought by the hand of the Lord. Wherefore this land is consecrated unto him whom he shall bring. And if it so be that they shall serve him according to the commandments which he hath given, it shall be a land of liberty unto them; Wherefore, they shall never be brought down into captivity: if so, it shall be because of iniquity: For if iniquity shall abound, cursed shall be the land for their sakes; But unto the righteous, it shall be blessed forever. And behold, it is wisdom that this land should be kept as yet from the knowledge of other nations.—II Nephi 1:6-16.

From time to time the inspirational warning was repeated that "inasmuch as ye shall keep my commandments, ye shall prosper in the land; but inasmuch as ye will not keep my commandments, ye shall be cut off from my presence" (II Nephi 1: 34).

REMAINS OF PREVIOUS PEOPLE DISCOVERED

It must have come as a convincing confirmation of the foregoing, when, in the days of Mosiah, the twenty-four gold plates of Jaredite history were discovered and translated. These revealed that similar promises and prophetic warnings had been given to a previous people at various times. That these had been no idle threat was attested by the numerous bones and ruins of buildings found by the people of Limhi. These remains proved them to have been a populous and highly favored people. "The whole face of the land was covered with the bodies of the dead."—Ether 6: 57. Millions, including women and children, had been slain in devastating wars (verse 73). Upon a people, concerning whom it was written, "never could a people be more blessed than were they, and more prospered by the hand of the Lord" (Ether 4: 78) had come calamities almost too horrible to imagine. This is indicated by the inspired words of Jeremiah (49: 32) about 600 B. C. from the Old World. A complete sweeping off actually occurred. To them the Lord had said, "And there shall be none greater than the nation which I will raise up unto me of thy seed, upon all the face of the earth."—Ether 1: 20. Yet, when their hearts became hardened and they would no longer heed the commandments of the Lord, there was fulfilled the Lord's everlasting decree concerning this land of America, "For behold this is a land which is choice above all other lands, wherefore he that doth possess it, shall serve God or shall be swept off; for it is the everlasting decree of God."—Ether 1: 32.

The Nephites continued to occupy the land some hundreds of years under varying experiences of progress and spiritual blessings. They had outstanding prosperity in times of righteousness, and distress, disaster, and near calamity in times of unrighteousness. After about two hundred years of exceptional achievement, freedom, and power following the visit of the resurrected Christ to America, when both Nephites and Lamanites were righteous, they began to depart grossly from the ways of the Lord and became nationally extinct about A. D. 385 by the hands of the Lamanites, their less civilized contemporaries. The Spirit of God and his protecting care had been withdrawn from them because of their wickedness.

THE COMING OF COLUMBUS

Their prophets had foreseen this dreadful calamity, and it is with more than passing interest that we notice the detailed prophetic description given by Nephi of the coming of Columbus to America because of the Spirit of God moving upon him to do so (I Nephi 3:147), and eventually many multitudes of the Gentiles occupied this land of promise. Then this vision follows: "And I, Nephi, beheld that the Gentiles that had gone out of captivity were delivered by the power of God out of the hands of all other nations."—I Nephi 3:155. Clearly, according to the Book of Mormon, it was no accident that the United States, Canada, Mexico, and the South American countries should have become separated from the political and religious tyranny of their mother countries, separating church from state control and adopting republican forms of government.

In latter-day revelation we have this declaration concerning the Constitution of the United States:

Therefore it is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose I have established the constitution of this land by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood.—Doctrine and Covenants 98:10.

Surely "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men and giveth it to whomsoever he will."

In the Old World the Lord had raised up good and wise men to prepare the way for the greater freedom to be established in America.

George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and others were used of God in the plan for greater freedom to all people.

For the liberation of Spanish-American countries, the Lord raised up a "Washington of South America" named Simon Bolivar, who by 1828 had liberated Venezuela, Colombia, Panama, Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia from the political oppression of Spain. At the same time as Simon Bolivar began leading the crusade for independence in Venezuela, Miguel Hidalgo began the struggle for independence in Mexico, so that September 16, 1810, is to loyal Mexicans what July 4, 1776, is to the United States.

At a later date an "Abraham Lincoln" of Mexico was raised up in the person of Benito Juarez, a Zapotec Indian, to commence a movement of still greater freedom for Mexico in general, and especially for the Indians.

All of this and more—much yet to come—is marvelously foreshadowed in Book of Mormon prophecy as the moving of God's hand among nations towards ultimate freedom of religion for all people, following the political freedoms necessary to make it possible, so that God's will might be done eventually in all the earth. (See I Nephi 3:224-237; 7:21-70, etc.)

LIBERTY FOR GENTILE NATIONS PROMISED

And this land shall be a land of liberty unto the Gentiles; and there shall be no kings upon this land, who shall raise up unto the Gentiles. And I will fortify this land against all other nations. And he that fighteth against Zion shall perish, saith God.—II Nephi 7:18-20.

Evidently the Lord will not allow any dictatorial powers, political or religious, to long dominate the liberty-loving, freedom-giving forces he has set in operation on the American Continent for the emancipation of the human race. Such would be fighting against Zion, for Zion can be built only by a free people upholding and promulgating the highest standards of liberty. But the question arises, How much better are we than the Jaredites who were swept off? How much more righteous are we than the Nephites who were destroyed? Last year the United States set a bad example to her neighbors by reaching the record of nine billions of dollars consumed in liquor—a most soul destroying evil. About fifteen billion dollars annually is her expense for crime. Homes have been disrupted to an alarming degree by vice, immorality, and divorce.

Can our nation or any American nation boast any greater strength and purity than the strength and purity of its homes? Can there be any guarantee of peace and security on the basis of government and politics only?

A SOLEMN WARNING

And this cometh to you, O ye Gentiles, that ye may know the decrees of God, that ye may repent, and not continue in your iniquities until the fullness come, that ye may not bring down the fullness of the wrath of God upon you as the inhabitants of the land have hitherto done.

Behold this is a choice land, and whatsoever nation shall possess it, shall be free from bondage, and from captivity, and from all other nations under heaven if they will but serve the God of the land who is Jesus Christ.—Ether 1:34, 35. (Italics mine for emphasis. H.I.V.)

What a wonderful promise! What assurance! But President Truman truly said, while visiting the ruins of Teotihuacan, Mexico, in March, 1947, that the world must have peace or our civilization may share the fate of those which Teotihuacan's vast pyramids represent.

Such peace can be assured only to those who are willing to live unselfishly by the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ. There can be no guarantee of liberty or freedom on any other basis.

You cannot build the golden age out of leaden men.

Graceland's Place in Our Church Program

By G. LESLIE DeLAPP

An Address given to the Graceland College Faculty on September 6, 1948

IF WE WERE TO THINK too seriously of some problems confronting all of us, we might develop an attitude of gloom similar to that expressed by an individual I listened to the other day at a public gathering. He spoke of the awful things which were happening in the world, the hazards of this atomic age, and the impending disaster appearing on every horizon. After he concluded his talk, I wondered if life were really worth the living. I am conscious of the fact that he spoke some words of truth, but he overlooked some of the things of greater importance. There is much transpiring in our present world which is indicative of progress. We should think in terms that are affirmative, not pessimistic, and without a shade of gloom over our vision. We should be aware of the future with all of the dire threats of disaster which he saw all around us, but we should also look just beyond and recognize that these are also days of opportunity, the greatest days man has ever experienced in the history of civilization. I cannot help believing this, and so I am not concerned about bringing a picture of gloom and disaster.

I feel that as long as there are good men in the world (and there are plenty of them)—as long as there are men and women of vision who will seek to find a better way of life, we do not need to bury ourselves in pessimism and gloom. I think we can look forward to the future with a great degree of hope and assurance, despite the fact that we see war clouds hovering on the outer edges of our world.

RECENTLY I had the opportunity of spending some time with a very good friend of mine who is an outstanding citizen of Missouri. As we were sitting together at a community meeting, he turned to me and said, "Bishop, I had the opportunity of speaking to the student body at Graceland College." He added further that he considered it a wonderful privilege. He said, "I noticed that on the cornerstone of one of the buildings there was imprinted the word nonsectarian. I couldn't help being conscious of that in a meeting with a group of educators representing a church institution. This group included me to use my influence with the college I represent to bar teachers of certain denominations, some sixteen in number, from serving on its staff. Your church was listed among that sixteen."

I said I thought those days of the Dark Ages had passed. He answered, "I thought so, too, but you can rest assured that I would have no part of such an understanding or arrangement with that educational institution." (He happens to be on the Board of Trustees of another church-supported college.) He took that occasion to compliment our church upon the growth it has made throughout the years.

I suppose there are still people in our own denomination who question the wisdom of the church's maintaining and operating a nonsectarian institution. As one studies the problems facing us today, it seems more and more obvious that these problems cannot be solved unless there are those who have breadth of vision and sufficient understanding of the problems which our world faces to want to reach out and invite in those of other faiths. I think it is essential for our education to go beyond the confines of dogma.

On the other hand, I think we should recognize that an institution such as Graceland College should permit expression of the philosophy and ideals of its sponsoring organization. We may be in fine balance on this particular question. Certainly as we think of the function of the college, we must think of it as an opportunity of giving expression in educational fields of the ideals and objectives of the church, and there must be definite inculcation of these in the minds, hearts, and souls of the students who attend Graceland. Yet if we become introverted in our approach to the problem and concern ourselves only about ourselves, we shall surely die. Sometimes this does not seem to be acceptable to some of our church people, but I believe there is a growing understanding and conception of the particular place of our church and its educational institution as it relates to the church.

OUR EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM is so organized as to enable students to attend other institutions of learning. These institutions offer educational work far beyond our ability to procure and maintain. I am not going to go into the various factors that will ultimately enter into our decision as to whether or not we will have a four-year college. We should look forward to this unquestioningly, but whether we have a four-year college or a college in which we can get education beyond that, we must recognize that the flowing out of our youth into other institutions of learning will bring back to us something essential to our own growth.

The whole educational system has come through some drastic changes and reorganization. Our young people have been prematurely thrust into situations which normally would not have existed. The social and economic changes which resulted from the war have placed tremendous loads on educational institutions everywhere. I do not need to emphasize this. The few times I have been on the campus in recent years, I have observed that everyone was burdened by the responsibility of the great influx of students—students older in years than those in the past. Everyone was taking additional responsibility.

When we think back and compare Graceland College as organized and founded in 1895 with the educational institution it is today, and with the problems that we experienced in 1946, 1947, and 1948 because of the difference in student-body personnel, we find the situation entirely different. Yet if we go back to examine the basis upon which this institution was founded, we find the ideals and objectives very similar, although the social problems in 1895 were vastly different from those we are facing today.

During the war many of our educational institutions were reorganized in an attempt to do in a relatively short period of time what normally these institutions would have used twice the time to accomplish. We tried to speed up education. We got a lot of intellectual indigestion in trying to force into youthful minds a great deal more than those minds were capable of assimilating. I think it takes time to become educated. We can do certain things in a short while—we can give a smattering of understanding of some of the sciences, of some philosophy, etc., but education takes time. We should realize this more and more as we approach the problem of educating the youth of our church.

ONE CANNOT HELP RAISING the question as to what the future holds—especially for those of us who are interested in the education of the youth of our church. We see the development of plans and the beginning of organization for federal supervision of education, at least in the secondary schools, and we wonder just how this is going to affect institutions such as ours. Some people have become concerned lest there shall be taken from institutions of this character the things which are of greatest worth to these institutions, and lest there be imposed upon these institutions some regimented system of education. I do not think this will ever happen. Perhaps I am not qualified to judge, because my opinion is based on my understanding of the human nature and the background of the average American. He will accept so much, up to a certain point, and beyond that he will not be regimented. We will always have in America enough people who are concerned about the place of the individual to maintain these institutions which have special contributions to make to our own welfare.

They say there are two directions in which we can go. One is a system of federal education, at least at the secondary level, which might be created to compete with and ultimately to replace the present state and local control of education. The second course is a wisely-planned form of improvement and adaptation that may be developed by the local and state educational authorities. I think this second is certain to prevail. However, one should not be too sure in forecasting what the future will bring forth in the field of education; I have presented only what I think the future may hold for us in the broad sense.

It seems to us that the church must continue its sponsorship of Graceland College so that through it there may be given expression to this same basic philosophy of education which has motivated the leaders of our church in years past. It was very evident from the very beginning that our college was to play an important part in the development of the church. I believe that more deeply than do most people. I don't know just why, except that my opinion has grown out of my association with members of the faculty over a period of years and out of my contacts with the college.

I DID NOT HAVE the privilege of attending Graceland, but out of my experience in the church, it seems to me highly desirable that all young Latter Day Saints inclined toward higher education should come to Graceland. I would even go so far as to say that in most instances they should attend even if such attendance means the sacrificing of scholarships offered by other schools. There are, of course, other considerations which must govern in individual cases, but I believe there is something here to be contributed to the youth of the church that cannot be attained in any other institution of learning.

It was evident from the very beginning that the college was to play an important part in the development of our church, particularly in the field of leadership, and I do not mean in the sense of a school of religion or what has been referred to as the “School of the Prophets.” Sometimes we use that term rather loosely, thinking of an educational institution where men (and women, too, I presume) will derive an education which is something apart from the secular training received elsewhere. I do believe there is a certain area in which we can ultimately render service by setting up a school within the church, but it is not to be Graceland College, at least as I see it.

As Presiding Bishop, I find it difficult to express an opinion which may be entirely personal without the people saying that it is the position of the church. I am telling you what I think personally, and how I feel about this matter. I do not believe that Graceland will ever serve strictly as a school of religion. Some may disagree with me, but I think Graceland is a place to give the young people of our church academic training which will enable them to go forward either in a religious field or in sectarian fields of endeavor and then beyond this to other institutions of higher learning where they should receive additional training.

Our records show that most of our young people, after having attained their educational objectives, have found their places in wider fields of education, in business, in the professions, and in many instances in ministerial service to the church.

There has always been a gap between the goals of our church and the attainment of those goals, but I do feel progress has been made. I was talking with an individual the other day who spoke rather disparagingly of the contribution of Graceland, and I immediately responded by asking him just what he expected of the college. If he expected that every student who went to Graceland would have a thorough inculcation in the doctrine of the church, he was expecting too much. I do think that is how many people have felt. Certainly it is not possible from the standpoint of education. We are dealing with human nature that is varied in its background and interests. All who attend Graceland do not have the same backgrounds, and there is no system I know of that is going to insure perfection in the lives of individuals because they come under the influence of certain institutions. There will always be those who fail to measure up. If Graceland can make a contribution to even a majority who enter her doors, I shall be happy.

I SHOULD LIKE TO LOOK at some of the needs I feel may be met by Graceland. I think the instruction of students should be in the direction of teaching them to be in the world but not of it. This goes into the whole theory of our church philosophy. It is fundamental and basic to all of our ideas and the ideals of Zion to teach young men and women to stand on their own two feet with a comprehension of the purposes and goals of the church—to stand on their feet in association with other people in the world without feeling the necessity of having to make an apology for their principles. They need to develop an appreciation of the good things that are to be found in other institutions and places in the world, and an appreciation of the many fine people who do not happen to be Latter Day Saints. These things are basic requirements and should be understood by the young people of our church when they matriculate at Graceland. They should have a degree of pride for the things for which our church stands, and they should also have an appreciation of the other wonderful things in the world.

“If we had one hundred men today qualified to represent the church, I would not hesitate to urge the appointment of the entire hundred tomorrow.”

There should be the recognition of the fact that our society today is so complex that isolation either by communities or by nations is impossible. Maybe some of you don't believe this. In case you may think I am departing from my own basic observations pertaining to Zion, I would like to say further that I am convinced there should be a thorough indoctrination in the philosophy and doctrines of the church. This is essential. I am not saying it can be done in every situation; I am saying there should be the opportunity afforded to the students to become indoctrinated. You can't give this to them by the spoonful; it is born of experiences in their association with others, the exchange of ideas, and the discussion of problems. Much of this indoctrination and inculcation takes place outside the classroom, and it should not be compulsory; there can be no forced indoctrination of the youth of our church.

HERE AGAIN we find a very delicate point of balance. We can go one way or the other. Faculty members have a tremendous responsibility as they come in contact with young Latter Day Saints. Their thoughts, ideals, and points of view are assimilated by their students—and I believe not too critically. There are times when young people become quite critical and perhaps unappreciative, but my own experience with them has made me feel that for the most part they want to go along. They want to understand. They want to see our point of view. Because of that, it is important that we think clearly and have a pretty good understanding of the direction in which we are going.

"To me, the church cannot function efficiently without Graceland College or its equivalent."

We might, too, direct more of our students toward training for the professions. Someone said to me the other day, "You always harp on this question of a trained and qualified personnel." That is right. Every time we cast our eyes about, we see a need and try to find someone to fill that need. Once we add a capable person to our personnel, we do not release him very readily. We hold on to someone who can make a contribution. We lose some, but we get some back occasionally.

We find our interests as a church reaching out into the whole fabric of society, and so we need those who have an understanding and an appreciation of the problems of government and political science. We need to know something about the relation of the problems of our church to local and municipal affairs. I have been amazed recently to find how little I know about local county government—and not only how little I know, but how little politicians know. If we are going to build communities, to give expression to a better way of life, as we will someday, we are going to need those who are familiar with the problems of local and municipal government and of the state and nation.

OUR ZIONIC PROGRAM is dependent upon our ability to teach the citizens of other countries the fundamentals not only of our church, but also of citizenship in a great democracy. It is a relatively simple thing to talk about bringing people of Europe into this country, but it is a vastly different problem to bring those people over here and have them assimilated into our backgrounds of experience and our understanding of the democratic way of life. Yet as we reach into foreign fields in our missionary endeavor to teach and instruct them in the philosophy of the church, we must have qualified people who will also teach them the responsibilities of democratic citizenship, which, for the most part, they do not understand. Our efforts in the past have been quite feeble in some respects. We have tremendous opportunities open to us—opportunities that should challenge us.

If we had one hundred men today qualified to represent this church, I would not hesitate to urge the appointment of the entire hundred tomorrow, despite the fact that some people say we are holding up for a lack of financial resources. But they would have to be well-qualified, and unfortunately we do not have them. It takes years of experience to train ministers. Our work today is retarded because we do not have enough qualified, trained men from whom we can draw for appointment.

Our approach to this problem as it relates to foreign missionary work is best made by a careful selection of those we send abroad. They must be versed in the knowledge of government so that they cannot only serve the church spiritually, but also bring a point of view representative of our economic way of life made possible by academic training.

Then there are the professional contributions essential to our gathering program which can be carried on successfully only if there is an understanding of the factors which enter into community life. A lack of trained people in the fields of community planning, architecture, economics, and social service will necessarily hamper any program of community building.

In the realm of medicine, law, and dentistry there are ample opportunities to strengthen the church in its Zion program. There are twenty-one dentists listed in the yellow sheets of the directory in Independence; two of them are Latter Day Saints. That is only 10 per cent in a city where we represent over "Here we have the outlet for the best that our youth can give to the church."

25 per cent of the population. The percentage of medical doctors on the staff of our hospital is slightly better, but there is great need for more of our young men to qualify and establish themselves as physicians in the Center Place. We are very conscious of the need to direct some of the young people of the church into these professions, and I am not in any way discounting the need we have in other fields. We don't want everyone to be a lawyer or a doctor or a dentist, but we should encourage more to train in the professional fields until we have the nucleus for our clinical and hospital needs.

We have emphasized the importance of the college in forwarding the program of the church already. I would like to give my further point of view on that. It is not anticipated that every member of the faculty interpret and apply the fundamentals of our church, its beliefs, and its philosophy in everyday teaching. If there is appreciation on the part of every faculty member that the church is interested in a well-rounded development in all students, both academically and in the religious experiences of the school, what may be lacking in one faculty member may be supplied by others.

WE BELIEVE in the gathering of our people together in some central area of the United States as a part of a divine plan, and we believe that in association with those of like beliefs, a pattern of life may be established which will be helpful to society as a whole in solving the problems of family life, government, and world brotherhood.

Graceland College is located in one of the agricultural stakes in a community that was once the headquarters of the church. From other districts and branches throughout the church some of the finest of our young people have come to this community. It is, therefore, not surprising that a great deal is expected of it, and particularly of the college, by church members throughout the world. Parents send their children to Graceland so that they may be given the opportunity to secure a needed education and also that they might come in contact with the church and its philosophy. In Graceland, as in practically every other institution, there are those who are not appreciative of the opportunities afforded its students, but as one visits in the stakes, districts, and branches of the church, it is evident that in practically every center there may be found those serving who received educational advantages at our college.

The church looks to Graceland to constantly raise the standards of the teaching faculty and to broaden its curriculum and make the best contribution possible to the youth of the church. We are not unaware of the problems faced by the administration and the faculty. Unlimited funds are not available to maintain its departments nor to improve the physical plant as it should be. We have found a willingness to work within the limits of the funds available to maintain the college. There has been a growth on the part of the members of the church, not only in the awareness of the problems faced, but also in an appreciation of service rendered.

Our mutual working together in the years which are ahead may be viewed in anticipation of an ever-increasing contribution to be made by the college to furthering the objectives of the church. We look forward to a broader appreciation on the part of the church membership of the contribution that the college is making to the church. To me—and I say this sincerely—the church cannot function efficiently without Graceland College or its equivalent. This is a broad statement, but whenever the thought was expressed back in the days of the depression that it would be a good idea to close the college, those of the group who were under the necessity of meeting the financial problems relative to its maintenance felt it should continue to function. I felt then just as strongly as I feel today that if the doors of Graceland College were closed it would seriously handicap the work of the church in every branch in the United States, Canada, and foreign countries. To me it would evidence our inability to grow; it would be a turning back toward those days when people argued as to whether or not a college could contribute anything to the work.

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only those questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Are any of the renderings of the Inspired Version, by Joseph Smith, supported by any translation made since his was completed?

ANSWER:

A number of them. To illustrate, the King James or Authorized Version says in II Timothy 3:16, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable," etc. The Inspired wording is: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God, is profitable," etc. The English Revised (1881) and American Revised (1901) render it: "Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable," etc. Murdock's Syriac Version (1852) says: "All Scripture that was written by the Spirit, is profitable," etc. The Emphatic Diaglott (1864) has it: "All Scripture, divinely inspired, is indeed profitable," etc.

QUESTION:

Please state the year, day, and hour of Christ's crucifixion.

ANSWER:

The exact year is not entirely certain. John (19:31) shows that the next day after the crucifixion was not only a Sabbath but was "an high day." This means that the Passover and Sabbath came on the same day. The only times when such a combination was possible in that period were A.D. 29, 30, and 33, as the Passover always began after sundown on the fifteenth of Nisan, being prepared on the fourteenth. Early Christian tradition appears to favor A.D. 29, which would place the crucifixion at March eighteenth. The year 33 evidently would be too late, but some still hold to April 7, A.D. 30, the date on which the thirteenth of Nisan came in that year.

From the foregoing facts, it would appear that Jesus was crucified on the day before the Jewish Sabbath, but at what hour of the day has been the subject of discussion. The statement of Mark is: "And it was the third hour, when they crucified him."—15:28. But John (19:14) states that Christ was still before Pilate at "about the sixth hour," which must allow some time to elapse before he was finally crucified. This apparent difference seems best explained by assuming that Mark used Jewish time, which would be about 9 a. m., while John used Roman time, on which basis the sixth hour was about 6 a. m. If this be conceded, the crucifixion occurred about three hours after Christ was before Pilate, and no discrepancy would exist by this reckoning.

John 1:35-39 appears to support the assumption that this disciple used Roman time, for it states that two disciples followed Jesus at about the tenth hour, and abode with him that day. If this be correct, it was about 10 a. m. when they came to the home of Jesus, which agrees with the other circumstances there narrated.

QUESTION:

Were the unicorns mentioned in Scripture mythical, or are they now extinct?

ANSWER:

It is not certain what animal is meant by this term, but the Revised Version and some others render the Hebrew word, which is reem, "wild ox." Isaiah 34:7 indicates that it was an animal that lived in Palestine or Edom, but the one-horned unicorn of tradition does not now exist, if it ever did. The Douay Version renders the word rhinoceros five times and unicorn four times. About 100 B. C. it was described by Caesar as being in German forests: "Scarcely less than the elephant in size, but in their nature, color, and form are bulls." Assyrian monuments earlier than 800 B. C. picture it in the chase.

Among the other translations of the word are buffalo and roaring animal. But the Inspired Version renders the Isaiah text by the original Hebrew word reem, thus leaving the term according to its original significance.

Worship Suggestions For August

Theme for the Month: THE BEST GIFTS

By KATHERINE H. WILSON

Theme Thoughts:

The Restoration Movement, begun in 1830 under the Prophet, Joseph Smith, restored to the world the early Christian church—its original form, organization, and doctrine, accompanied by its spiritual gifts and blessings. It was thought then, as many still believe, that spiritual gifts ceased with the apostles, but we believe these spiritual gifts are an evidence of life in the church. The Book of Mormon clearly states:

And I would exhort you, my beloved brethren, that ye remember that he is the same yesterday, today and forever, and that all these gifts of which I have spoken, which are spiritual, never will be done away even as long as the earth shall stand, only according to the unbelief of the children of men.—Moroni 10: 13.

Jesus said:

For every one who asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened. If a son shall ask bread of any of you who is a father, will he give him a stone? or, if a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give good gifts, through the Holy Spirit, to them who ask him.—Luke 11: 11-14.

The theme, "The Best Gifts," immediately suggests to one that if there are good gifts, there are also better gifts. What, then, are "best gifts"?

THE LIVING CHURCH

As long as Jesus is our guide
Upon life's daily walk;
As long as he is at our side,
And we can hear him talk;
The church will live, will grow and spread Great branches wide apart
If it upon true faith has fed
With roots deep in the heart.

The living church will grow and grow
Within the heart of men;
As long as we may seek to know
Our loving Father's plan;
As long as God is yet our God;
As long as right is right;
And we reach upward, from the sod,
Toward love, and truth and light.

Theme: I CULTIVATE PATIENCE

Prayer Hymn: "Dear Lord and Father," Saints' Hymnal, No. 243.

Call to Worship:

Wherefore, beware, lest ye be deceived, and that ye may not be deceived, seek ye earnestly the best gifts, always remembering for what they are given; for verily I say unto you, They are given for the benefit of those who love me and keep all my commandments.—Doctrine and Covenants 46: 4.

Theme Thoughts:

No better lesson on the value of cultivation can be found than the instruction given by Alma on the growth of faith. To prepare, or to prepare and use, or to foster the growth is to cultivate. Alma says, "But if ye will nourish [cultivate] the word, yea, nourish the tree as it becometh to grow, by your faith with great diligence and with patience, looking forward to the fruit thereof, it shall take root; and behold it shall be a tree springing up to everlasting life."—Alma 16: 170. Life is filled with experiences whereby the "impossible" has been accomplished by patience. We are persuaded, then, to consider patience as a "best gift." Jesus said, "Bring forth fruit with patience."

A little story is told that nicely illustrates this truth.

"Grandfather, if you do not feel able to give me some money, will you give me a potato?" "A potato?" asked the grandfather, looking up from his paper.

"Yes, sir; and land enough to plant it in, and what it produces for four years?"

"Oh, yes," replied the unsuspecting grandparent only too glad to escape on such cheap terms.

So the potato was planted and it rewarded the boy the first year by producing nine; these, the following year became a peck; the next, seven bushels, and when the fourth harvest came, the potato had increased to seventy bushels.

Alexander Graham Bell walked the streets for weeks trying to sell a half interest in the telephone for five hundred dollars. He had no success at first but he held on, and today it is worth millions. There is no great achievement that is not the result of patient working and waiting.

Scripture Readings:

But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness.—I Timothy 6: 11.

For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise.—Hebrews 10: 36.

My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into many afflictions; knowing this that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing.—James 1: 2-4.

And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge. And to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity.—II Peter 1: 5-7.

Inspirational Poem:

PATIENCE

Sometimes I wish that I might do
Just one grand deed and die,
And by that one grand deed reach up
To meet God in the sky.

But such is not thy way, O God,
Nor such is thy decree,
But deed by deed, and tear by tear,
Our souls must climb to thee,

As climbed the only Son of God
From manger to the cross,
He learned, through bloody tears and sweat,
To count this world but loss;

Who left the Virgin Mother's arms
To seek those arms of shame,
Outstretched upon a lonely hill
To which the darkness came.

As deed by deed, and tear by tear,
He climbed up to the height,
Each deed a splendid deed, each tear
A jewel shining bright,

So grant us, Lord, the patient heart,
To climb the upward way,
Until we stand upon the height,
And see the perfect day.

—Author Unknown.

He that can have patience can have what he will.—Benjamin Franklin.

I do not attempt to ripen my apples by throwing stones at them. Oh, that we could be as patient with each other as we are with apple trees.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Theme: I CULTIVATE A LOVING HEART

Prayer Hymn: "Draw Thou My Soul, O Christ," No. 316.

Call to Worship:

O brother man, fold to thy heart thy brother;
Where pity is, the peace of God is there;
To worship rightly is to love each other,
Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer.

Follow with reverent steps the good example
Of him whose holy work was "doing good;"
So shall the wide earth seem our Father's temple,
Each loving life a psalm of gratitude.

—John Greenleaf Whittier.

Theme Thoughts:

Christian love is first a deep abiding love for God and Christ; then it is a showing of that love to others. "I cultivate a loving heart"—what a challenge! Someone has said:

God made a million things; the moon, the sun,
He flung the planets and the stars apart,
Created seas and mountains, and this done,
Set at his master-task: the human heart.

What of the altar of my heart? Is it bright with the flowers of love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, faith, meekness, temperance? (Galatians 5: 22, 23)
Or do I need to cleanse and purify this "holy of holies" I have dedicated first to God, then to others? What do I find?
Do I remember always that Christ gave his all for me? And that when I am irreverent, unjust, or unkind, I deny his gift. Am I brave? Am I honest? Am
I fair? Am I free from envy? Am I kind? Am I diligent, thoughtful, dependable, forgiving? Do I know how to cultivate a loving heart? Truly a heart filled with love is a "best gift."

Scripture Readings:

Behold, I speak unto you, and also to all those who have desires to bring forth and establish this work; and no one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care.—Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.

MY PURPOSE

To be a little kindlier
With the passing of each day;
To leave but happy memories
As I go along my way;
To use possessions that are mine
In service full and free;
To sacrifice the trivial things
For larger good to be;
To give of love in lavish way
That friendships true may live;
To be less quick to criticize,
More ready to forgive;
To use such talents as I have
That happiness may grow;
To take the bitter with the sweet,
Assured 'tis better so;
To be quite free from self-intent
Whate'er the task I do;
To help the world's faith stronger grow
In all that's good and true;
To keep my faith in God and right
No matter how things run;
To work and plan and pray and trust

Until the journey's done.
God grant to me the strength of heart
Of motive and of will,
To do my part, and falter not,
This purpose to fulfill.

Prayer Hymn: "Our Father Who in Heaven Doth Dwell," No. 315.

Call to Worship:

Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law. . . . Make me to understand the way of thy precepts;
so shall I talk of thy wondrous works Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law; yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart. . . . The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting; give me understanding, and I shall live.—Psalm 119: 18, 27, 34, 144.

Theme Thoughts:

It has been said, "It makes no difference what a man believes or thinks; it is what he does that counts." One who says this fails to realize that back of every act and word is thought (understanding).
To cultivate or achieve understanding first calls for comprehension or knowledge.
"The entrance of thy words giveth light;
they give understanding unto the simple."
—Psalm 119: 130.

Let "the entrance of thy words" illuminare our minds and then shall we see clearly, speak truly, think purely, and act nobly. It is through understanding we are able to adjust ourselves to the needs of today. "Zion the beautiful beckons us on."

TO WALK WITH THEE

O Lord, 'tis such a little thing to ask,
And yet it means so much to me;
I fear to meet the newborn day
Unless I walk with thee.

I want to feel my hand in thine,
Thou leading where I cannot see;
I want to know thy way is mine;
I cannot, lest thou walk with me.

Thy presence, Lord, through all this day,
From dawning seen till silent night,
Is needed, as the air, the food,
Sustaining, guiding as a light.

The choice I needs must make,
When mine so false would be;
Help me the straightened way to take,
Thy way, and walk with Thee.

Prayer Hymn: "Close to Thee," No. 319.

Call to Worship:

Call your solemn assembly, as I have commanded you; and as all have not faith, seek ye diligently and teach one another words of wisdom; yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36.

Theme Thoughts:

Among the gifts enumerated by Paul
(I Corinthians 12: 7-11), three are major gifts: wisdom, knowledge, and faith; wisdom is to be desired above the others—
"for the price of wisdom is above rubies" (Job 28: 18). The story of why Solomon was blessed by God with the gift of wisdom should be considered. "Lo, I have given thee a wise and understanding heart" (I Kings 3: 7-13). We think, too, of another young man troubled in spirit who bowed in prayer and sought God's wisdom. Simplicity has always been allied with greatness. We marvel that the great Restoration Movement was based upon a simple promise and the faith of a young lad! "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God . . . and it shall be given him."—James 1: 5.

The Needlecraft Society

(Chairman, General Council of Women)

IN THE SUMMER OF 1948, a committee from the Needlecraft Society of the General Church met with President Israel A. Smith and Bishop G. L. DeLapp to discuss the status of the society. This faithful group felt the need of some assistance, as much work was being placed on a few workers. Since Conference was imminent, the members were advised to keep on as a group and then decide what they desired to do afterward.

In the fall the secretary for the society directed a letter to the General Council of Women, making some suggestions which, if approved, should enable the group to continue to give service to the church. The chairman of the General Department of Women met with Bishop DeLapp; this letter was discussed, and certain recommendations were made.

After some consideration, the members acted upon these recommendations and invited me to meet with the group to discuss the relationship of the society to the General Department of Women. On April 20, 1949, the committee and I met with the Needlecraft Society, and the following findings and recommendations were decided upon:

1. The Needlecraft Society is to work in co-operation with the General Department of Women.
2. The society is to be considered a unit to care for needlework contributions for the conference booth sent in by members throughout the church.
3. The president of the society is to be appointed by the General Women's Department.
4. The local women's leaders throughout the church will be furnished with information which will stimulate interest in the society.

5. Reports and news items will be run in the Home Column to inform church members about the purpose of the group.

For many years the Needlecraft has had charge of the conference booth and the sale of needlework articles which have been contributed. It is expected that, with the assistance of the committee and the continued support of women throughout the church, the members of this group will continue to do their work and an increasing amount of money may be realized for the missionary fund of the church.

SUMMARY OF THE HISTORY OF THE NEEDLECRAFT SOCIETY

Mrs. W. H. Callin, Secretary

Because of so much work being placed on so few at conference time, the executives of the Needlecraft Society of the General Church appealed to the General Council of Women for advice and assistance in planning for the 1950 General Conference.

Up to the present time, the work of this world-wide society has been carried on by local women with the fine donations from members and church groups throughout the world. In answer to this appeal, Sister Arnson met with the needlecraft group, and help was provided by adding to needlecraft a committee composed of Sister Myron McConley, Sister Charles Grabske, Sister Mary Moats, and Sister Minnie Paxton. Mrs. Paxton will be our liaison officer and will give the society the benefit of her wise counsel in buying needed materials and in pricing quilts, rugs, and fancywork for the conference bazaar. Mrs. Grabske will give her assistance in suggestions for articles which will be useful or appreciated as souvenirs of Zion for our visitors to take home. Mrs. McConley, whose valuable services have been given so generously at reunions throughout the summer months, will present the worthy cause of Needlecraft Society at the reunion meetings and will endeavor to interest the church groups in the work. Mrs. Moats, who is a needlework expert herself, will give valuable assistance too.

THE NEEDLECRAFT SOCIETY, composed of women eager to use their hands and heads for the benefit of the church, was organized under the supervision of the late Sister T. J. Watkins. During the depression years, a need for a commodity shop was felt, and Sister Watkins took over the job. She held this position until the combined work and her own ill health became too much for her.

Upon the death of Sister Watkins in September, 1943, Sister Lottie Sarratt was asked to take over the supervision of the Society, which position she held until the election of officers in April, 1945. Sister Sarratt was then elected president and Sister Silvers was elected vice-president. Sister Pearl Wilcox was elected treasurer and business manager, and Sister Grace Krahl became the secretary. They were both succeeded by the present secretary who also is the treasurer.

A plea from members abroad—that they be allowed to send in articles of fancywork for the conference bazaar—was heeded and welcomed. Since the response from women all over the United States, Canada, Australia, England, and the Hawaiian Islands has been so splendid, the Needlecraft Society felt it wise to have the help of the

"All On A Summer's Day"

By AARONA BOOKER KOHLMAN

SCHOOL IS OUT; the children are home all day, every day. What are we going to do about it? Let's face facts and be honest about the whole matter. We do love our children, they are important to us, and we "couldn't do without them." Nevertheless, who of us hasn't seen the summer day dawn when we could do with less of their company,

Farm mothers have less of a problem, for even with modern equipment and methods, there is plenty of work for the youngsters—work they must do in most cases. There is plenty of space for rambles, rides, picnics, and adventuring? What farm child hasn't a favorite, private spot which enchants him? The occasional trips to town break what

General Council of Women for advice and counsel.

MUCH INTERESTING WORK is done by the women who meet weekly at the Women's Center. Over the years the quality of the needlework done on fine quilts has been recognized by many, and quilts have been sent in so that the gifted sewers, such as Sister E. L. Kelley, Sister Layton, Sister Hopkins, and others might use their fine stitches to make the finished product beautiful.

The money derived from the sales of fancywork and quilts is given to G. L. DeLapp of the Presiding Bishopric to be used for the missionary work of the church. We are looking forward to a renewed interest throughout the world in the work of this society and will welcome all donations for the Conference bazaar. All parcels should be addressed to Needlecraft Society, 1034 West Lexington Street, Independence, Missouri, and should be sent early enough to allow time before conference for pricing, marking, and cataloging, so that they may be acknowledged.

may seem to be monotony. The greatest problem—that of keeping the children constructively busy at tasks within their abilities—is easier solved, if it arises at all, than in the town or city. Nevertheless, farm mothers will find it helpful to avail themselves of any library facilities near for reading matter for the children. If possible, they may arrange for a visit in town with friends or relatives, for children on a farm long for a change of routine, too. Then Youth, Oriole, or 4-H camps are available to nearly everyone now.

In city homes or apartments the summer problem is much more acute. There simply is not enough work to keep children busy. Although Nancy and Johnny may shrink and run or loudly complain at the sight of work, a child with too much idle time is unhappy and, being so, will shortly do his best to make others unhappy too.

What, then, can mothers do about it? Opportunities differ from one locality to another, so first of all investigate your town's facilities. Is there a Y.M.C.A. or Red Cross swimming course offered? Your child can learn to swim, usually for nothing more than securing a doctor's examination and enrolling. Are there parks and playgrounds? Many cities have active supervision with various types of instruction and contests. If there are wading pools, let the smaller ones dunk themselves. If you must go with them, plan your work so that you have something to "take along"—sewing, knitting, reading, or writing. (Take a tip and try just watching and relaxing once in a while.) No pools? A hose in the yard will do, and a tub, or even a bucket, does very well for the small fry.

MOST COMMUNITIES have ball teams for nearly every age. If your son shows an interest, encourage him.

Perhaps there are art classes your child could join if he is so inclined. Most cities with art museums sponsor such classes. You may find handcraft classes available through the Y.M.C.A. or other agencies.

Assign portions of the cooking or housework to the children, according to their abilities which may surprise you. Children need responsibility. Help them to learn new skills about the home. Maybe your daughter wants to sew. Let her do it on her own as much as possible, but stand by for difficulties. If you can find space for a garden, that will help, even if it's only a window-box. If space is limited, maybe your children will want to experiment with soilless gardening.

Encourage hobbies, even if they involve horrible bugs or a horned toad. Don't let your squeamishness throttle a budding genius. If your child likes to ride a bicycle, and is of a reasonable age, teach him safety rules and let him go on bicycle hikes with friends on quiet roads. Summer is a wonderful time for teaching self-reliance. If the youngsters want a picnic, let them fix their own. You wouldn't like their concoctions, but they will.

CHANCES ARE, once you start looking, you will be surprised at the summer activities available for your children in your community.

Look ahead to a happy, busy summer, and plan to make the pleasant moments over-balance the inevitable irritations. Never be a mother who sends her children to a show every afternoon just to get them out of the house. Make each summer count for good in your family life, and "school's opening" will take you almost by surprise.

What Price America?

the other was his Son: "This is my beloved Son, hear him." And in Section 112, which is a resolution adopted by the church in a Sacred Assembly in 1835, we find some recognition of this situation from which I will read:

We believe that governments were instituted of God for the benefit of man, and that he holds men accountable for their acts in relation to them, either in making laws or administering them, for the good and safety of society. . . . We believe that religion is instituted of God and that men are amenable to him and to him only for the exercise of it, unless their religious opinion prompts them to infringe upon the rights and liberties of others; but we do not believe that human law has a right to interfere in prescribing rules of worship to bind the consciences of men, nor dictate forms for public or private devotion; that the civil magistrate should restrain crime, but never control conscience; should punish guilt, but never suppress the freedom of the soul.

Further along we read:

We do not believe it just to mingle religious influence with civil government, whereby one religious society is fostered and another proscribed in its spiritual privileges, and the individual rights of its members, as citizens, denied.

If any man sin, and we are told that all sin "we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." Certainly it is a most wonderful promise to any people, that if they but serve Jesus Christ they will have an advocate with the Father. When we get in trouble, we are always pleased indeed to be supported by some able counselor, some attorney, some adviser; and here we have Him who said he had all the power of twelve legions of angels to speak for us and in our behalf.

AMERICA, as we know it, can be lost; there are many national diseases, the worst of which would be a totalitarianism in which the person would lose his identity and R. Lord delivered a lecture on this state. We find in history that civilizations have their cycles. Dr. John

R. Lord delivered a lecture on this subject sixty or seventy years ago. He said that the history of civilizations shows that they decay at the top, and that civic virtue of every civilization wells up from the lower or middle classes. I think we can safely say one of the evils we see in our national government today is the lack of patriotism on the part of those who should be concerned in safeguarding the welfare of this country. The undue increase or accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few men is another disease. The rich get richer, and the poor get poorer. Goldsmith said, "Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey where wealth accumulates and men decay."

We cannot stand idly by believing that God gave us this land of promise, this choice land, and say, "It is a gift of God; therefore we are always going to have it." Sometimes we look back and think we won this land one hundred seventy-six years ago, but that was only a "down payment." The history of freedoms is that you have to continue to pay in order to preserve them.

YES, WE WILL PAY an additional price, but, as I have said, we have Christ as our advocate in this important fight. Christ founded this country. We believe he builded it, and we will depend upon him to preserve it. Very often I hear the one hundred twenty-seventh Psalm quoted: "They labor in vain who build without the Lord." But I think the next two lines in that same verse are of more importance than the first; they are, "Except the Lord keepeth the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." I think that is particularly applicable to the League of Nations, the United Nations. We can have international armies and armadas and air forces, but unless the Lord is with them, these armies will be alert but in vain. The Lord must keep the city, and the Lord will have to keep the United Nations—if it is kept.

I might produce the formula for saving the situation to simple terms:

what we need is more men of good will. But to get more men of good will there will have to be more converts to the principles of Jesus Christ. Therefore as one of the many organizations and one upon whom a special duty rests, we must extend the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ. The Lord was with us in this land of promise, and he will continue to be if the nation—not "peoples" or "individuals"—and the government possessing it will continue to serve the God of the land which is Christ Jesus. We all acknowledge our limitations and our weaknesses as individuals. We indeed are ill-equipped to meet a situation of this kind; but I take courage from a little story I read in Ecclesiastes. It said the city was assailed by an army; soldiers were at the gates; but "a poor wise man" saved the city. It does not say how he saved it, but he saved the city. And yet the people forgot who he was. He comes down to us in anonymity just as the widow who gave her mite, and the "great woman" who saw an opportunity to befriend the Lord's anointed by providing him a place to lodge when he came that way. These three people came down to us unknown, so far as their names are concerned. As the "poor wise man" who saved the city, we can pray for wisdom and receive it.

Another statement from Ecclesiastes interests me: "Fear God and keep his commandments." This is the whole duty of man, very simply stated. What are his commandments? We believe that, as a people, we have a special duty to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ. We are so told in Doctrine and Covenants, and I go back of that in the closing chapter of Matthew, chapter 28, where the Savior told his disciples to preach the things which he had taught them to the peoples of the world, "teaching them to observe"—not simply making it known to them, but teaching them "to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Then came the promise, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

Briefs

DEER ISLE, MAINE.—The Maine District Conference convened May 21 and 22 in Stonington, with Elder Don Harvey in charge. On Saturday evening, Apostle Maurice L. Draper was the speaker; he showed slides and talked on church history. A prayer service was held Sunday morning at 9:30 and at 11:00 the business session was held. A motion was adopted to raise a sum of money in the Maine District towards the purchase of an automobile to be used in the district by the missionary, Seventy Don Harvey. At 2:30 p.m., Bishop Don Chesworth was the speaker. Apostle Draper spoke in the evening. The theme for the conference was "Walking in Newness of Life."

JONESPORT, MAINE.—A most successful series of meetings in Jonesport was concluded May 1. This two-week series with Elder Almer Sheehy as guest speaker resulted in twelve baptisms. A new Hammond electric organ recently purchased added much to the beauty and inspiration of the services. A Maine District Institute was held here May 28 and 29. General church men present included Apostle Maurice L. Draper, Bishop D. O. Chesworth, and Seventy Don Harvey.

NEW SOUTH WALES.—Church members in New South Wales were happy to meet Brother Marinus Laban of Rotterdam, Holland, when he visited Australia early in the year as a member of the crew of the Dutch ship "Weil-drechdt." Brother Laban is a deacon, a keen Latter Day Saint, and is happy in association with others of like faith. When in Sydney, he visited church headquarters, and had the opportunity of meeting with several of the missionary force at the home of Apostle and Sister Davey. Later, in Newcastle, he was entertained by other Saints who arranged a fellowship gathering for the young people of the congregations there. All were impressed with his sincerity and enthusiasm. He also met in Brisbane with the Saints there.

MANHATTAN, KANSAS.—A group of Reorganized Latter Day Saints have organized a study class in Manhattan. This class meets every Sunday morning at 10 o'clock in the home of Mr. and Mrs. David Karr, 607 North Manhattan Street. This group organized the class in the early part of May of this year. All persons show great interest by their regular attendance. Anyone living in Manhattan or near-by vicinity is invited to attend the Sunday morning meetings.

MOUNT VERNON, ILLINOIS.—At the evening service, April 3, the Zion's League presented a drama, "The Light of the World," the story of the Restoration and events in the life of Joseph Smith, the founder of the church. On April 6, the Zion's League sponsored a potluck supper, and Pastor W. W. Colvin showed slides illustrating the Restoration Movement.

April 10, Missionary Sylvester R. Coleman was the speaker at the morning and evening services. The Zion's League was in charge of the Easter sunrise program. Breakfast was served in the basement of the church.

Raymond Clifford Stewart was baptized at 2:30 p.m., Easter Sunday, by the pastor, W. W. Colvin, and was confirmed at 7:30 by Ed Colvin of Flora, Illinois, and Rufus Rockett of Mount Vernon, Illinois.

The interior of the church has been re-decorated.

What Does It Mean To You? By MARVIN McDOLE

ONE HUNDRED SEVENTY-THREE YEARS ago Thomas Jefferson penned a document that was destined to become known throughout the world. It opens with these words:

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed . . .

We are all familiar with at least the opening lines of the Declaration of Independence, but we frequently need to re-evaluate what it now means to us. As we grow older, our understanding of what the "founding fathers" did is deepened, but nothing so enhances that understanding as being on foreign soil. By being at a distance—both physical and emotional—we can get a better perspective of how our nation differs in its attitude about the worth of the individual. We hold that the individual has certain rights which cannot be usurped by the state. They may be abridged for a time in the case of a national emergency, but they cannot otherwise be infringed upon. This principle is based upon the sanctity and worth of the individual. It is not a new idea, but a very small part of the world believes in it. Nowhere else on the earth is human life held to be worth so little as in the Orient; and nowhere else is life less worth living. It would seem, then, that a high evaluation of human life must necessarily precede a high standard of living.

HAVING ONCE BEEN on foreign soil, I have gained a much greater appreciation of the blessings and opportunities offered by my na-

Here Is the Writer

Marvin McDole was born at Okanogan, Washington, on July 1, 1917, and grew up in Seattle. His father, Bishop D. S. McDole, died when he was sixteen; and his mother later married Apostle M. A. McConley. He attended Graceland College from 1936-38, and a photographic school in Chicago in 1938-39. In February, 1940, he was married to Agatha Kirlin, who is known to most of her friends by her middle name, Marguerite. They have two children, Phyllis Renee', six, and Dana Ernest (adopted), one.

Marvin served with the Army Air Forces from 1943 to 1945 and was attached to the Four Hundred Ninety-eighth Bomb Group. It was while he was stationed on Saipan that he was ordained to the office of elder—the only ordination of the Reorganized Church ever to take place in the Marianas Islands. He is now youth supervisor at Stone Church in Independence and is employed by the Herald Publishing House as director of audio-visual aids.

tive land. This foreign soil—the island of Saipan—has been held at various times by Spain, Germany, Japan, and now the United States. It lies in the Marianas, some 5,400 miles west and south of San Francisco, and 1,490 miles south of Tokyo. While the island is relatively small, measuring only sixteen miles in length and from two to five miles in width, it had a peacetime population of over 25,000. It was a fairly representative cross section of the Orient, ranging from the Japanese landowner and military class to the coolie class represented by the large group of laborers imported from Okinawa and the smaller group of Chamoros who are native to these islands. The principle employment on the island was growing and refining sugar. Eleven per cent of Japan's prewar sugar supply came from this one island.

Because of this economic background, the lot of the average individual was not a happy one. It is scarcely any wonder that over 10,000 civilians perished, most of them needlessly, in the invasion of the island. While many were killed in the preinvasion bombardment, most of them committed suicide or were shot by the Japanese military for reasons that are difficult for us to understand. Thousands who were attempting to surrender, both civilian and military, were shot by Japanese Army officers. The principle reason was apparently the abject fear they had of the American forces, because of the relentless propaganda they had been subjected to for the previous fifteen or twenty years. This same propaganda led to the fanatical defense of the island that resulted in the death of almost 3,500 American servicemen and over 23,000 Japanese servicemen.

AFTER HAVING SEEN firsthand the result of a totalitarian form of government, I had a deeper understanding of what Nephi was talking about when he referred to America as "a land which is choice above all other lands." The fact that it is choice becomes abundantly clear when one has the opportunity to compare it with some of the less-fortunate areas of the world.

My attitudes about my native land have developed slowly as maturity and experience have given me understanding. Only in losing my accustomed privileges and freedom for a time was I able to fully appreciate them. Let us go back and see what these attitudes were like on

July 4, 1928

While I do not remember the details of that day, it is a safe guess that I was at my grandparents farm near Sumner, Washington. I usually spent the summers, at least part of them helping with the raspberry harvest. July 4 was the outstanding holiday of summer for several reasons, but mainly because of the picnic which included all a small boy could stuff himself with. This was generally a family affair with all the relatives within range assembling at some lake. I usually tried to ride with my uncle who lived across the road, because I liked the pungent odor of the leather seats in his Model T. It was a shiny new 1927 model. Wherever we went there was a fireworks display in the evening. We had Roman candles, skyrockets, firecrackers, and sparklers. Some minor burns were considered a part of "the Fourth." After an exciting day, I would go to sleep on the way home. It had been a wonderful holiday, but why we celebrated it I didn't know, nor did I care. Nobody talked much about what Independence Day meant to them. Those were the cynical twenties when the word patriotism fell into disrepute, being associated with political pressure for soldiers' bonuses.

A few years later on

the situation had changed. The world was becoming uneasy because Hitler had just seized Austria and was threatening to invade Czechoslovakia over the Sudetenland. World peace was being threatened, but we took hope when Chamberlain said there would be "peace in our time," and Hitler said he had "no more territorial ambitions in Europe." That July 4 I was wondering if there might be another world war, but the thought didn't bother me much because the possibility seemed so remote. Pacifism was widespread in American colleges, and the arguments of the pacifists seemed valid.

Five years later, on

July 4, 1943

I had been inducted into the Army of the United States and was listed as Pvt. McDole, ASN 37531508. This was my first taste of not having perfect liberty, and I didn't like it. We reported for active duty on July 10, so I was still able to "celebrate" the holiday with my family. My thoughts were more of my wife and baby I would soon have to leave than of having an opportunity to do "my patriotic duty." I was still concerned about why I had to go and some others didn't. There was, however, a growing realization within me that if I expected to enjoy the blessings of Joseph's Land, I must be willing to sacrifice something to defend it.

July 4, 1944

meant that an even more difficult parting was at hand. While stationed at the Army Air Base, Great Bend, Kansas, I had been fortunate in having my family near me for a few short months. The inconveniences of living in a trailer camp—though it was flooded by every rain—were as nothing when we could be together. There my daughter learned to say "B-29" before she learned "car."

The POM inspection (preparation for overseas movement) had been completed a few days before, so we did not feel in a festive mood on the Fourth. We spent the day with friends who invited us out, but the thought, "Just a few more days—" was constantly with us. Twelve days later I said "good-by," not knowing if I would ever see my loved ones again. I had no idea of where we were going, except to the Pacific Theater.

was just another day in the seemingly endless chain of monotonous days and nights in the stifling heat of the tropics. The Japanese air raids had long since ceased to break the monotony, and somehow I missed them. They seldom did much damage (there were several notable exceptions) and they provided a certain amount of excitement.

Our own B-29 missions were going out with clocklike regularity. We could see the end of the war being written in the burned-out areas of Kobe, Osaka, Nagoya, Yokohama, and Tokyo. Hundreds of thousands had been killed and millions made homeless in the night fire raids on Japan's industrial areas. It made me wonder if this carnage were necessary, but I could see no other answer. These things had become so common that we had little emotional reaction to the bomb damage reports, even when one said that an estimated 250,000 people were burned to death in one night. Later figures were revised downward, but that one raid on March 9 and 10, 1945, had eliminated Tokyo as a primary target.

That July 4 was just another day to us. I had even forgotten my birthday a few days before. We had the same Army chow that we had been having for the past year. (I knew then why they called it "mess.") It was probably Argentine corned beef or Australian mutton cooked as only an Army cook could do it. Being so far from home, I don't suppose it would have tasted good even if it had been "just like Mother used to make," but we never had the chance to find out for sure.

Loneliness and monotony were the hardest things to bear. Anything that offered a change, even though it might involve personal danger, was eagerly snatched at. That explains many of the foolhardy exploits of some of the boys. We referred to it as being "island happy."

New Horizons

found me at home with my family. The joy of returning home cannot be described in words—nor could a person who has not experienced it understand. But here I was at home and looking forward to the bright new postwar world that was supposed to show up just any time. I knew what I had fought for, and after it was all over, I was glad that I had gone. Memorial Day services just a month before had a deeper meaning, because I had a vivid memory of long rows of white crosses with the Star of David here and there. Many of them were simply marked "Unknown." The greatest war of all history had come to an end. Whether successfully or not only history will tell. The cold war had not yet materialized, and the term, iron curtain, had no meaning. The future looked bright.

As I now contemplate

July 4, 1949

I have a better understanding of why Patrick Henry felt as he did. My understanding does not approach that of a person who has lived and suffered under a despotic, totalitarian government, but neither am I complacent and self-satisfied. I have seen with my own eyes what the lack of freedom can mean, but more than that, I have seen what the lack of Christian principles can do in the lives of men and nations.

Sometimes it makes me wonder why I was born white, or why I was born an American. I could become very smug and self-satisfied by following this line of thought, but I always remember the faces of the Japanese laborers as they cultivated their little plots of ground near the civilian internment camp. These were not the intelligent people of Japan; they were the exploited laboring class that expected to be told what to do. Then if, by the choice of fate, I was born into a home where I had all the privileges and comforts we enjoy, is it not my responsibility to do all that is within my power to ease the burden of these underprivileged people of the world? I believe it is.

There are many worthy organizations and agencies working toward that end. Some of them, such as the United Nations and its subsidiary agencies, are making a great deal of progress. I believe it is my duty to aid and support this work in whatever way I can, but that is not enough. It is my firm conviction that only the gospel of Jesus Christ will ever raise these people to a better way of life. It is my prayer that the day will come within my lifetime that we will see the gospel being taken to the four corners of the world. That day will come sooner if I live up to the very best that is within me.

These are the things I remember on July 4.

In the morning, Apostle D. T. Williams arrived in time for breakfast at the Snow home. At 9:00 o'clock the Saints assembled for fellowship, Brother Williams in charge. At 11:00 I spoke on matters concerning the foundation of the church. At 2:00 o'clock, the dedication services were held. I gave the address and Brother Williams offered the prayer of dedication. Brother Williams preached in the evening, and a little before midnight I was aboard a Burlington train en route home. It was Memorial Day when I arrived, and with Sister Smith, our son Donald, and grandson Joseph, we visited the graves of our loved ones in Mound Grove and offered our floral tribute in their memory.

My notes taken at Galesburg are somewhat meager, but I wish to acknowledge the unusual ministry of music by Sister Ruth Johnson of Kewanee. She is a very accomplished marimba player. Sister Margaret Myer, James Nelson, and a Brother McConnell sang.

Pastor King made the presentation of the deed and key, Apostle Williams receiving them on behalf of the Presiding Bishop, and, in turn, entrusting the key to Deacon King, son of the pastor, who pledged faithfulness in caring for the property.

Assisting at these services were Leonard Hendricks, counselor to Brother King; Lyle W. Woodstock, president of Rock Island District; William Shotten of Peoria; Ed Williams, a brother of Apostle Williams and pastor at Davenport, Iowa; and one or more others of the priesthood.

Brother Woodstock has sent us a brief historical statement about the Galesburg church for use in the Herald.

Midday luncheon was served at the church by the women of the area. It was a day I will long remember. We trust the Galesburg church (already hardly large enough for the congregation) will stand long to serve as a shrine for the Saints of the Galesburg area.

LIBERTY

Liberty Mission is but an infant among our active groups. Organized only a year ago by Stake President Emery Jennings, it has been cared for by Elder Lloyd Siebert.

When the first anniversary of the organization of this group approached, I was requested to be present on Sunday, June 5, at a celebration of the occasion. Sister Smith being indisposed, I drove the twelve miles and found a very fine and enthusiastic congregation.

At 11:00 o'clock a Communion service was held. After that a basket luncheon served all more than amply. I rather informally addressed those assembled, speaking mostly about historical incidents associated with the coming forth of the Reorganization.

Here at Liberty where the Prophet Joseph Smith was imprisoned on false charges for several months, the work of the church has finally taken root after a century has passed. May it prosper and bear much fruit.

The experience to me was pleasurable and also novel. I told the Saints that although Believe-it-or-not Ripley was dead, the days of "believe it or not" hadn't passed with him, for that day I had for the first time assisted in serving the emblems to a congregation of the covenant children. Elder Siebert and I were the only members of the Melchisedec priesthood present, and there were no priests; I was glad to assist him in this very sacred ordinance. My first ordination was that of a high priest, and when my active ministry began, I was almost always assisting in presiding. At any rate, I had never before been given the opportunity to help with the emblems.

To Pastor Siebert and those of his growing and promising flock go my sincere wishes for the group. Among those present I met Sister Brady, daughter of Sister Bivens, Latter Day Saint par excellence now living in Arizona, but formerly of Kansas City, and before that of Blue Rapids, Kansas.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Northern Michigan Reunion

The Northern Michigan District Reunion will be held August 12 to 21 at the Park of the Pines, four and one-half miles north of Boyne City on the Charlevoix Road. The theme is "Witnessing for Christ". The general church staff will include Apostle Arthur Oakman, Seventy James C. Daugherty, Elders Franklyn S. Weddle and Warren H. Chelline. They will be assisted by Patriarch Ben Hewitt, Mrs. Arthur Oakman, and the district officers. Mrs. Ella Nulph, Mary Schreur Sandell, and Mrs. Leta Babbitt are to have charge of the children's department, and Mrs. Frances Carlson will be in charge of music. Those desiring to rent tents should contact Mrs. Ada Alldread of Boyne City. Meals will be served in the dining hall as usual.

Members of other districts are invited to attend the reunion also.

ALLEN SCHREUR,
For the Reunion Committee.

Pittsburgh Institute

An institute for the women and priesthood members in Pittsburgh (Pennsylvania) District will be held at the Lock Four Church on July 9 and 10. The theme will be "Preparation in the Home." Classes will be conducted at 3:00 and 8:00 p.m., Saturday, with a business session at 7:30. Sunday's activities will include a fellowship at 9:30 a.m., a sermon by Elder Merle Guthrie at 11:00, lunch at 12:00, an open forum at 2:00 p.m., and a musical program at 2:45.

HENRY M. WINSHIP,
District President.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Mr. and Mrs. O. A. Knapp of Arkansas, Wisconsin, request prayers for their daughter, Mrs. Earnest Schneman, that she may receive divine assistance in her time of trial.

Prayers are requested for Lynda Kay Frazier, twenty-eight-month old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Derwood E. Frazier, 306 West Florida, Ruston, Louisiana. She has had a severe throat and ear infection since she was eleven months old and must now undergo an operation for which she is physically unprepared.

ENGAGEMENTS

Mark-Harris

Mrs. Gladys E. Harris of Brooklyn, New York, announces the engagement of her daughter, Doris, to Lindal L. Mark, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Mark of Los Angeles, California. Both are graduates of Graceland College. Lindal is residing in Brooklyn and attending the Polytechnic Institute.

WEDDINGS

Manuel-Barritt

Marian Louise Barritt, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ward Barritt of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Ronald Elwood Manuel, son of Mrs. Edna

Manuel of Wichita, Kansas, were married at the Reorganized Church in Council Bluffs on June 11. Elder V. D. Ruch performed the double-ring ceremony. Both the bride and groom attended Graceland College. Following a trip through the southern states, they will make their home in Wichita.

McCormack-McAninch

Thelma Delores McAninch, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John A. McAninch of Niagara Falls, Ontario, and Richard Alexander McCormack, son of Mr. and Mrs. John A. McCormack of Toronto, Ontario, were married at the Reorganized Church in Niagara Falls on June 4. Elder John F. Sheehy read the double-ring ceremony. The couple will live in Toronto.

Nott-Evans

Dorothy Irene Evans, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Evans of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and Wilson Lloyd Nott, son of Mr. and Mrs. Alvin R. Nott, also of Sault Ste. Marie, were married on May 28 at the Reorganized Church in Sault Ste. Marie. The groom's father performed the double-ring ceremony, assisted by Pastor G. A. Edwards. The couple are making their home in Sault Ste. Marie.

Kemple-Cooke

Geraldine Virginia Cooke, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Cooke of Sandusky, Michigan, and Samuel B. Kemple, son of Elder and Mrs. W. H. Kemple of Ontario, California, were married at the Reorganized Church in Sandusky on June 3. Elder James Phillips performed the double-ring ceremony. After a honeymoon trip to California, they will make their home in Kansas City, Missouri, where the groom will attend the art institute.

BIRTHS

A daughter, Linda Darlene, was born on February 23 to Mr. and Mrs. Howard E. Seeley of Mondamin, Iowa. She was blessed on Easter Sunday by Elder Clifford Cole. Mrs. Seeley is the former Lois Coffman, a Graceland graduate of 1946.

Mr. and Mrs. James B. Quirey of Louisville, Kentucky, announce the birth of a son, Tim Alan, born May 24. Mrs. Quirey is the former Evelyn Robertson.

DEATHS

FRITCHER.—Gertrude Mae, was born October 19, 1884, in Iowa, and died May 6, 1949, at the Salinas, California, Hospital. Since her baptism in 1892, she had been a faithful and consistent worker in the church.

Surviving are two sons: Ronald Fritcher of Seaside, California; and Earl Fritcher of Pacific Grove, California; four daughters: Mrs. Loretta Garrison of San Francisco, California; Mrs. Genevieve Stanley, Mrs. Gladys Henderson, and Mrs. Rosalie Schwab of Pacific Grove; three brothers: Orville, Roy, and Marvin Schrenck of Iowa; and one sister, Mrs. Allie Fritz of Ft. Collins, Colorado. Funeral services were held at the Paul Mortuary in Pacific Grove, Dr. LeRoy E. Harris officiating. Interment was in the El Carmelo Cemetery in Pacific Grove.

HOLMES.—Anna J., daughter of John and Martha Jones, was born August 3, 1878, at Canton, Illinois, and died May 16, 1949, at her home near Joy, Illinois. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on September 6, 1891, and on December 13, 1899, was married to David S. Holmes. Mr. Holmes preceded her in death.

She leaves a son, John A. Holmes of Joy; a daughter, Martha L. Mercer of Rock Island, Illinois; two stepchildren: Floyd R. Holmes and Mrs. Ruby McCulley, both of Joy; two sisters: Mrs. McClelland Diebert of Canton and Mrs. Harry Thompson of Pontiac, Illinois; and several grandchildren. Funeral services were held in the Reorganized Church at Joy, Elders E. R. Williams and W. V. Holmes officiating. Burial was in the Buffalo Prairie Cemetery.

 BEAUTIFUL WORDS

Every man worth his salt, if he has a happy home, has had (or should have had) some dealings with the language of love and beauty. He would be a poor wretch who, falling in love, did not wish to pay tribute to the queen of his heart, and find his own language too poor an instrument for the task. However, there is something he can do about it—borrow from the poets, who have a distinct advantage in these matters over ordinary, inarticulate men.

Gentlemen, would it not be a heaven-sent blessing if you could dip your pen in starlight and liquid gold to write to your beloved? Ladies, would you not think you had stepped into a fairy world if you received a billet-doux with words in it like the following?

Christopher Marlowe, working on the familiar legend in "Faustus," brought Helen of Troy before the amazed doctor of dark magic, who exclaimed,

Was this the face that launch'd a thousand ships,
And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?

Then, as his vision cleared, he paid this tribute to the most famous of all beautiful women of ancient times:

O thou art fairer than the evening air,
Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars.

Marlowe was a contemporary of Shakespeare, and there must have been something in the air that Englishmen breathed in Elizabethan times, for the Bard of Avon had it, too, when he wrote of Cleopatra,

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
Her infinite variety: other women cloy
The appetites they feed; but she makes hungry
Where most she satisfies.

It was not in his dreams, but in his sonnets to the dark lady that Will paid his greatest tribute to beauty. In Sonnet XVII he puts his task beyond the bounds of language:

Who will believe my verse in time to come,
If it were fill'd with your most high deserts?

If I could write the beauty of your eyes
And in fresh numbers number all your graces
The age to come would say, "This poet lies;
Such heavenly touches ne'er touch'd earthly faces."

In the language of love, fortunately, relevance and sense are not required. One turns the imagination loose to wander among the stars in the cobalt blue of the midnight sky, to awaken with the first faint tints of a summer dawn, or to ride in majesty with the cloud argosies in the sky on sunny afternoons.

Sirs, if you have nothing like that in your compositions, if you cannot write a good line, you can quote it. The libraries are full of ideas for you.

 POISON

You people who can't drink coffee for supper because it keeps you awake at night, should take pity on Uncle Joe. He has had to give up drinking it for breakfast because it keeps him awake at the office.

Somebody bought one of those Toy Manchester dogs for a pet. It is a pretty but defenseless little thing. Everything will be okay if some tough mouse doesn't get it.

SLIDE SET NO. 4

The Gift of the Holy Spirit by the Laying on of Hands

is now ready for distribution

In this series, we are concerned with two factors: (1) with the ordinance of the Laying on of Hands, and (2) with the spiritual reality back of it—the Gift of the Holy Spirit, as this gift is associated with confirmation of new members, ordination of the priesthood, the blessing of children, and administration to the sick.

The purpose of this group of pictures and the accompanying text is to provide material for the explanation of the fourth principle of the gospel to adult persons, at the same time showing how the church conforms to the New Testament pattern of church structure, doctrine, and government. It is specifically to help interested nonmembers to a knowledge and understanding of the church and gospel.

The manual for this set of slides has been written by Elder Leonard Lea. The slides that accompany this script are the fundamental material that will normally be used in presenting the subject of "The Laying on of Hands for the Gift of the Holy Spirit." Other slides can be added to the set, and other script material can be created, whenever the local situation or needs require it.

Fifteen slides in full color with manual.....$6.50

Extra copies of the manual, 10c

Note: These manuals are not usable as tracts as previous slide manuals have been.

LIFE AFTER DEATH

Eternal life! The promise is in nature, human experience, and the Scriptures that man is created for eternity—that the best things of this life are fulfilled in their finest expression in the eternal future. While we cannot draw accurate details, the Scriptures reveal the broad outline of life after death. This set puts these Scriptures in their logical order and diagrams the whole as a unit.

President E. J. Gleazer, Jr.

*Serving youth

President Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr.

On the cover is a photograph of President Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr., of Graceland College. The portrait captures some of the spirit of Gleazer's own "President's Message," which appeared in the '49 Acacia and is reprinted in this issue of the Saints' Herald on page 5.

President Gleazer believes in education and practices his preachments. This summer he is continuing his work toward the Doctor's Degree in Education at Harvard University.

He was graduated from Independence (Missouri) high school in 1934; from Graceland, 1936; received an A.B. from University of California at Los Angeles, 1938; an M.Ed. from Temple University in 1943. He was appointed by the General Conference to Philadelphia in 1938 and served until his appointment as Lamoni Stake President in 1943. He has been president of Graceland since 1946, and begins his fourth year as the chief executive of the church college this fall.

He married Charlene Allen in 1940. They have two boys and two girls: Edmund Allen, 8; Sandra Jo, 6; John Laurie, 2; and Susan Jane, 1. President Gleazer is thirty-two years old.

Introducing...

CHARLES S. WARREN (page 11) was born in Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, February 16, 1886. In 1907 he married Lilla M. Bullard. To them were born four boys: Charles, Harland, William, and Myron, and one daughter, Beryl.

Brother Warren worked as railroad clerk and bookkeeper for nineteen years. He has followed accountant work for a bank, a public service commission, and a public utility company. During the past year he retired because of physical disability.

Brother Warren's public schooling stopped when he was sixteen years of age, but he has continued by home study, correspondence, and night-school work to become proficient in his vocations and in his ministry.

He was ordained a priest in 1909, an elder in 1930. He has acted as pastor, associate pastor, and group elder, also as director of music, young people's leader, and director of religious education.

RAYMOND A. WHITING (page 12) was born in Clitherall, Minnesota, on May 17, 1893. He first went under General Conference appointment in the summer of 1920. He has labored as priest, elder, high priest, and evangelist.

He entered Graceland for academy work in 1921 and completed two years of studies there, then entered Kansas University, where he was graduated with a B.A. degree.

He has one daughter, Biloine, who is editor of the Lamoni Chronicle. Her mother died in 1942. On October 1, 1943, Brother Whiting married Leona Howard of Des Moines, Iowa. They live in Independence, Missouri.

VIDA M. FLETCHER (page 14) is a musician, as well as a church school and W. C. T. U. worker. She became the wife of John L. Fletcher in 1913. They have had no children of their own but at different times have taken children into their home for periods extending from two months to seven years. Altogether twelve children have thus been favored.

Sister Fletcher attended high school in Lamar, Colorado, and McPherson College of McPherson, Kansas. She has a four-year piano diploma. She has also had two years of voice training and two years in speech training. She received her gold seal leadership training certificate from the church in 1945.

Sister Fletcher has been very active in church work over a long period, and says: "I have filled about all offices open to women." She lives in Lamoni, Iowa.

News & Notes

GRACELAND REGISTRATIONS

Graceland College has room for 150 more students who have not yet applied for admission for the school year of 1949-50 which begins September 8, 1949.

The college has planned for a student body of 550 students next year. Two hundred and twenty-five sophomores are expected to return. One hundred and seventy-five new students have applied for admission and have been approved. This leaves room for 150 more students.

In order to be of service to high school graduates and others who are considering going on to college this fall, members of the Graceland staff will attend many of the reunions of the church this summer. Prospective Graceland students are invited to seek out these representatives for counsel on their educational plans.

The Public Relations office will be open at the college throughout the summer. Interested persons may write that office for information on the college, for the latest catalog, and for application for admission papers. The office is also prepared to give educational counsel and to make suggestions concerning ways of financing an education at Graceland.

The address: Public Relations Office, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa.

BAPTISMS IN NURNBERG

Elder Eugene Theys writes of an interesting happening. For the past year and a half the Saints of Nurnberg have been meeting in a small inn. At the next baptismal service, the proprietor of the inn will be baptized. It was to this same place that Brother and Sister George Baier first came and translated for Brother Myron McConley and for Brother Theys. Now Brother Baier is pastor, and his wife is the women's leader. The work in this city is making fine growth. Many fine and well-educated people are uniting with the church. The members are the kind of people who attract other good people like themselves.

FIRST ANNIVERSARY

President Israel A. Smith helped the Saints in Liberty, Missouri, celebrate the first anniversary of the establishment of their mission, on June 8. Lloyd Seibert is the pastor. The morning service was the Communion at which President Smith assisted. After the basket dinner, he talked informally to the group gathered at the table.

R. L. D. S. BOY ORATOR

David A. Leonard, sixteen-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. William L. Leonard, Independence, Missouri, won third place in San Francisco as a finalist in a boys' oratorical contest sponsored by the Optimist International club. These three boys competed Saturday, June 25, for first place and a $500 scholarship. A $300 scholarship went to the second-place winner, and a $200 scholarship to David. The candidates spoke on "Youth Looks Forward to Its Civic Responsibility." David, who is representing the tenth district of the Optimist International, won over eight other contestants in a contest in Kansas City, May 17. David will be a senior at the William Chrisman High School this fall. He is vice-president of the student council, a member of the debate team, the dramatic society and the National Forensic League. He is an Eagle Scout and is active in the Stone Church Teen-Age Zion's League.

Boys' Town

Boys' Town in Nebraska is recognized the world over for the fine work it has done in reconstructing the lives of boys who have become social problems. According to the news, another such town is to be started in Missouri near St. James. August A. Busch, Jr., president of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Company, has given $25,000 for the first of a projected group of fifteen dormitories for the boys.

A friend makes the comment that it is significant that no place in all the brewing industry offers an opportunity for an investment in human welfare. The president of the company had to go outside of his own business to do the good he wished to do.

Nothing said here is intended to detract from the credit Mr. Busch should receive for the gift. What he has done is commendable and should be appreciated. Certainly, the boys who are given an opportunity to grow into useful and happy manhood by that gift will be grateful.

We deplore, of course, a business like brewing that depends upon human misery for its success. The American people must share with the operators the responsibility for the existence of the business and for the harm it does. Those who buy the beer, drink it, vote for it, and insist upon it are ultimately responsible for the traffic. The "stay-at-home vote"—those who refuse to go to the polls—are responsible too. The next time you see a drunk lying in the gutter, ask yourself, "Am I to blame for his presence there?"

The Three Uns

Our friends turned the car radio on as we were returning home on a Sunday afternoon. The Greatest Story Ever Told was the serial, and the episode was "The Widow's Mite." The rich man came down from his pedestal to ask the poor widow to take care of his motherless son.

"When can you come?" the rich man asked.

"I am ready now," she replied. She had been ready since she first saw the unhappy lad, and he had reached out his hands to her, only to be refused by his father.

In all the realms of literature, are there any finer words than those four? "I am ready now" is like great organ music beating upon the heart.

Ask almost anybody to do a bit of work or go somewhere, even in the service of God, and you will get a string of excuses reaching from here to Nova Zembla, or reasons for delay that would melt quartz. Very few will answer, "I am ready now."

Make any kind of request in church work, and people will say, "There is something else I must do," or, "I haven't time to prepare."

The coming of the kingdom of God is delayed because of the three "uns." We are unprepared, unavailable, or unwilling.

Henry van Dyke told a story in "The Legend of Service" of how the Lord God sent a young angel to see which of three servants loved him best. The test was an order to go immediately on a hard mission of service. One asked, "Why?" and one asked "How?" both missing their chance. The third asked "When?" and went immediately. It is the servant of God who says, "I am ready now."

"The Three Uns" have robbed God and the church of many years of valued service, and have delayed the coming of God's kingdom.

Reunions

An Independence pastor, Ted Scott, recently spoke to his Englewood congregation about the Zion reunion. His remarks fit you, too, and your reunion. He confessed that he had begun his attendance as a "reunion taster"—one who drives in for a service or two and then goes home. He liked the flavor of what he found there, and the next year he decided to take his family and enjoy all of it. They have been going each year ever since. He is like that—thorough about what he does.

"The trouble with some of you folk," he said, "is that you are just as I was. You drive in one afternoon, beat the children to the boats, or take the tennis courts from the young people, and deprive regular campers of their privileges. You talk to your friends during announcements when you should be listening. Because you haven't been there to get the spirit of the meetings, you sit like a wall of silence in the prayer service and wonder why your hearts are cold while the campers are enjoying the spirit of the occasion. It takes several days of exposure to get the best out of a reunion. Go and stay for all of it, and you will rejoice."

That is quoting Brother Scott rather freely—perhaps a little too freely. But it was what he meant, and it was good for us.

Reunions are planned for continuous attendance, although the officers adjust them to heavy week-end visiting. But people who bring little dippers to reunion take little away. The real program is sustained by those who stay and camp and help. They get the greatest benefits from the reunions.

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Sister Catherine E. Griffiths of Willoughby, Ohio, writes under date of June 9, 1949:

Brother Griffiths deeply appreciates the messages of love and sympathy extended to him, through you, from the Presidency and Joint Council and other brethren in Independence.

Every night he prays for the welfare of the church, especially for you and those who assist you in the great responsibility of guiding its members.

On June 2 he reached his ninety-third birthday. He spent a quiet day at home. Repeatedly he asked me how old he was and the date of his birthday. His memory is very poor at times; at other times it is very clear.

He seems to be stronger now and is able to walk a little, but his condition is not good.

All the Saints in Kirtland are very kind to us. This is a source of comfort to me in these days of anxiety and sorrow.

A note from Sister Evelyn A. Velt passes on to us the following paragraph from her father, Brother William J. Haworth, superannuated missionary of Australia. This family is passing through the valley of sorrows. We quote:

After explaining mother's condition, he goes on: "We leave her in the Lord's hands. They are gentle, tender hands, and I am sure that we can trust him. Mum and I have lived past our allotted span and so, though it is hard to take, I long since made my adjustment when I began to get angina pectoris However, I've seen seventy-eight summers and the best part of seventy-seven winters, and I haven't any reason to fear to meet God. I know that Mum is the same so we take consolation in the fact of the good spiritual times we have had in this life and in the wonderful promise of something surpassingly better in the beyond. What a great thing it is that this life does not end all! It is sweet, and we both want to enjoy to the full what is left of it for us, but we do not forget that the good book says that the allotted years of man are seventy and, if by reason of strength we continue after that, it is borrowed. So we shall borrow what we can and then go on to a fuller, richer life in that rest that is prepared for the people of God."

Brother Haworth's address is 29 Hubert Street, Leichhardt, Sydney, N. S. W., Australia.

"Aid" for Retired Preachers

The June 20 issue of Time carries a story about the failure of one of the greatest of our churches to care properly for retired ministers and their widows. A western minister writes an open letter to the Episcopal Church Pension Fund. From this we learn retired ministers of that faith receive about seventy-five dollars per month. Some aged widows of deceased clergymen get as little as thirty-one dollars and, at least in one instance, but twenty-seven dollars monthly.

Quoting from this letter:

The church, which preaches the brotherhood of man, and the primacy of love, provides for priest and wife in their old age just about half the sum needed to maintain a minimum standard of life. It is conduct such as this, conduct bringing religion into disrepute, which in the age of Jesus was called the desecration of God's name.

We are glad to be able to say we have done more for our released appointees and for "church widows" than most other religious organizations.

Letters are being received from members of the church who live in Alaska after being visited by Brother C. G. Mesley of the Quorum of Twelve. Brother Robert A. Allish, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, Canada, writes:

We wish to thank you from the depth of our hearts for sending Apostle Mesley up through this Alaska Highway and Whitehorse. He came to us so understandingly and full of love, and has been a tower of strength to all he met and visited. I am sure he will have much to tell you when he next sees you. Like all good things, partings must come, but the memory will live on for a long time as something to be cherished. Our hearts have been made glad, and in deepest sincerity we say, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet to guide us in these latter days."

Brother Cecil A. Roley, Anchorage, Alaska, writes:

Just a word of appreciation for making it possible for Brother George Mesley to visit the Alaska and Yukon Territories.

He arrived last Thursday evening and has been busy as a beaver ever since. We didn't realize that there were as many Saints around here as he found. It develops that there are about twenty. Yesterday afternoon at 2:30 we had a Communion service with about twelve present. In the evening we had another service which we all enjoyed very much. As Brother Mesley said after the services yesterday afternoon, what we lacked in numbers we made up for in spirit. I am sure that everyone greatly appreciated being able to have him present.

Tuesday he is to speak to our Kiwanis Club, and Tuesday evening he will address the Mariners Club of the Presbyterian Church. Wednesday he goes on to Fairbanks.

Thanks again for making this trip possible. We assure you of our appreciation for the help he has rendered.

Notice to Members in Beardstown, Illinois

We have been advised by our book steward in Beardstown, Illinois, that the Illinoian-Star of June 24 carried an advertisement of good religious books published by another denomination but bearing the signature of "Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints, 1301 Monroe Street, Beardstown, Illinois, or Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri."

This is to advise the Saints in the Beardstown area that this ad was not placed by any representative of the Herald Publishing House and does not represent official advertising of this organization. Some of the books listed in this ad are carried in our general religious line. Undoubtedly the person who placed and paid for this advertisement had the interest of the church and publishing house in mind, but this is not consistent with the policy of the publishing house, and in no way do we accept responsibility for the ad appearing in the Beardstown paper.—Kenneth L. Graham, Mgr.

So You're Going to College

YOU ARE EIGHTEEN and have just had one of life's big moments as you walked across the stage in the high school auditorium and were handed that little piece of paper which closed the door on twelve years of schooling. But for you the school bell will ring again, for you have decided that you are going to college. We'll not take the time to debate the issue of job versus college—that controversy can be discussed for hours. We shall just recognize that more young people are going to college each year and that more of these young people are Latter Day Saints. So you have felt that for reasons carefully thought through you would be one of the two and one-half million students who will enroll in college in September, 1949.

There is one phrase of the problem not solved yet, though, and it is important to you. What college should you attend? Notre Dame has its football team; Southern California has a fine climate, it is said; Cornell has a beautiful campus; Harvard has prestige; cousin Jane attended the University of Missouri. But which for you?

There are certain financial factors, too, that complicate the decision. All in all it becomes quite a mental merry-go-round, and any helpful suggestions would be gratefully received. Here are a few.

WHO WANTS TO SIT ON THE SIDE LINES?

Select a college for the opportunities it offers for participation. Too often we see the effects of the malady "spectatoritis." Half of the people who are qualified to vote do so when there is a red-hot election—the other 50 per cent sit on the side lines and watch.

Did you ever sit with 100,000 people and watch twenty-two men chase a little inflated pigskin up and down the football field? In the church

25 per cent of the members take an active part; the other 75 per cent wait until Easter, Christmas, or a family funeral to enjoy the facilities provided by the few. We don't take time to read books any more; we read digests of books. Instead of having picnics, tramping through a storm, climbing a mountain, falling in love, we sit in a moving picture theater and watch other people have all the fun. One of the very real matters of concern to thinking people today is the tendency for

Graceland President's Message

(Reprinted from the 1949 Acacia.)

Rising brick walls stand as triumphant testators to the dominant theme of Graceland life, 1949—Graceland builds! You have shared that spirit. But may it be that construction has been not so much in brick and stone as in manhood and womanhood. For your church and your communities have desperate need for builders of humanity.

Know this, then—that no amount of dreaming can raise one girder or strike one joint. Dreams must become plans through the application of disciplined thought. Plans take form as skillful hands produce an interpretation. And it is an insignificant structure a man can build alone. The great project specifies another quality — co-operative spirit. And the finished building reveals that rare but essential material—the ability to carry a worth-while task through to completion.

So a man builds a life—so a citizenry builds a nation—and so a church will build the kingdom of God.

fewer and fewer persons to be active, to do things, to have the fun, to participate, and thus to grow. You should select a college where this is not the case.

You have the right to expect the opportunity to participate in classroom activities, athletics, music, and club life. Some persons are recognizing that in the process of mass education, with hundreds of people in a lecture room, and even with a very efficient academic factory, the individual can be smothered and destroyed.

For at least the first two important years, select a college where you can be recognized as a participating person.

EXPERIENCE IS THE TEACHER

Select a college that sees education as experience and consequently where teaching is a shared experience by teacher and student. Learning is not a kind of mental transfusion. We learn that which we experience. Teaching at its best is the Mark Hopkins' type with a teacher of his quality at one end of the log and the student at the other. If this companionship method of teaching is sound philosophy, then choose the school for the quality of the teachers who will share your life.

And quality is evidenced by more than the magical letters after the name. Choose teachers of wholesome personality. Persons who themselves are socially adjusted. Too often those who have not been able to face the rigors of the world have sought sanctuary in the peace of an educational institution.

For the first two years particularly, be not so concerned with the endowment of an institution, its beautiful campus, or its winning football team as with the manhood and womanhood of those teachers who will be your companions in the search for truth.

NO IVORY TOWER FOR ME

And select a college that believes education must be life-centered—not a retreat from reality. Once I was sitting in the sixth grade, listening to the teacher telling us about cows. She even drew a picture of a cow on the blackboard. While covering a yawn I looked out the window and across the road to a pasture where I saw a beautiful, genuine Holstein cow. Even though I was young and inexperienced, it seemed to me that it would have been much more interesting if we had walked out of the building and had seen the real cow—perhaps even milked it.

So many times classrooms become stuffy with the dry dust of academic trivia. You are to be a citizen, a parent, a church member, a breadwinner, and, above all, a person. Select a college where the educational concerns are related to life today—the life of your nation, your world, your church. If Communism is a present problem, then you should expect to learn something about Communism and about democracy. If family life is a problem, you should expect attention to be given to the building of sound, happy homes.

Choose a college which is in the main stream of the activities you consider to be vital and important.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

You are not a freak if you haven't decided definitely upon what you are going to do vocationally. A child is much surer of what he is going to be when he grows up than you can be.

And there are other problems you are wrestling with right now, too. One is the church and God and the whole religious concept. And there is the matter, too, of thinking a bit about the home you want to establish some day. Take this tip—select a college that is set up to help you get a sense of direction.

Those first two years away from home are mighty important. You'll want persons to talk to, the right kind of persons who have the time, the understanding, and the inclination to help.

Many problems are lifelong in solution, but it helps to have some good counsel when the going gets a little rugged.

WHO WANTS TO BE NARROW MINDED?

Real education isn't confined to the classroom, so it is a good idea to select a school that offers broad experiences, where the people don't all eat cornmeal mush or fried clams. There are some dietary tastes that give the first prize to lobster or grits and gravy or abalone steak or fried chicken. And there are the dialects associated with those tastes, and ideas, too, that are quite different.

Select a college that isn't provincial but one that provides the stimulation of diverse backgrounds over a common denominator that provides unity of understanding. To live with the English, Hawaiian, Australian, Canadians, Easterners, Westerners, and so on, is in itself one of the finest educational experiences to be found. If you go to college with the same gang that grew up with you and in the same town, possibilities are somewhat limited.

SO WHAT?

Select a college where you can talk back. It is not good for the organs of mental digestion to swallow all professorial gems without examination. It is a God-given right and power to ask, "Why, how, for what reasons?" The spirit of curiosity which is akin to the divine intelligence is too often suffocated and laid to rest by the time the diploma is presented. In the day in which we live, it is vitally important for us to recognize that inquisitiveness is a pier upon which a sound democracy is built. And there are many in our society who are attempting to remove that privilege of free men.

WHAT ABOUT THE CHURCH?

Just one other suggestion for those of you who are members of the church. Select a college where there are enough young people of your faith to provide the fellowship which strengthens and supports. It's depressing to be separated from those who talk your religious language, especially at a time when you are thrusting down your own foundations to the bedrock, and the soil in between is also hard.

GRACELAND?

Graceland attempts to provide an environment and a program which meets all of these requirements and more. We invite you to investigate the educational opportunities available to you at Graceland.

Write the Public Relations Office for information, catalogs, application papers. Talk to a Graceland representative at your church reunion this summer.

Graceland's year begins September 8, 1949. Aim your educational sights at that date and that place, and you'll be well on your way to a life of worth and happiness.

A Threefold Development

By HARLEY MORRIS

WE RECOGNIZE that the church of Jesus Christ is distinct in structure, function, and goal from other institutions. We need now to see that this can be true only to the extent that it is different in composition. In the final analysis, the church is composed of people; and it is they who give life and vitality to whatever ideals or program the church puts forth. Hence, it is from an analysis of peoples within and without the church that we gain insight into the peculiar contribution the church makes to social living.

Writing to the Hebrews, the Apostle Paul admonishes them to progress beyond the initiatory ordinances—the principles of the doctrine of Christ—toward the ultimate of “perfection.” To another church, he states that the structure and spiritual functioning of the church is designed for the “perfecting of the saints.” Frederick M. Smith defined sin as the difference between what we are and what we might be (perfect). All of this gives us a rather vague impression of there being an ideal spiritual condition toward which we should be striving. We need, perhaps, to explore more deeply into the concept of “perfection,” since, obviously, it is the purpose of the church to produce perfect men and women.

When the rich young ruler came to Jesus, seeking direction by which he might inherit eternal life, Jesus' first requirement was concerned with the quality of his standard of conduct. “Keep the commandments.” And when the young man reassured him on this point, our Lord went at once into the final process: “If thou wouldst be perfect, sell that thou hast and give to the poor and come and follow me.”

WE ARE CONVINCED that, in this admonition, the mechanics prescribed are of less significance than the principle involved. Disposition of earthly possessions and distribution to the poor was a challenge of special meaningfulness to this young man because he had much wealth. To another the challenge might be worded differently but involve the same fundamental principle. We need to return to the young man's question to catch the full significance of that principle: “What must I do that I might inherit?” This seeker was concerned with one problem. He possessed the elements so frequently thought to be essential to full and rich physical existence. Now he had time to think of eternity—an extension of his favored position into the forever. Were there no poor in Palestine? Apparently yes—from our Lord's reply, but the young man was not concerned with these. Were there no social problems that his position as a ruler would help him adjust? Undoubtedly; but he could not be bothered with them. For the present he could not see beyond the shadow of his own personal ambitions. It was to look beyond the concentration of his own little world that Jesus challenged him. It was this reorientation of perception that constituted the essence of perfection and the finality of salvation. Anything short of this is not salvation in the final analysis—it is still in a process of becoming. “When that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall vanish away.”

Perfection for the individual, then, is a quality of expanded perspective—a quality of life that reaches outward to others and upward to God. Love for God and for others is the capstone of divine law, the ultimate of all prophetic revelation.

IF THE WORK of the church is the perfection of man, two postulates are at once suggested: (1) man is perfectable, and (2) the structure, function, and philosophy of the church must be the essence of efficient realization of this perfection in man. Granting these, we have in our hand a yardstick by which we can measure the church both as to purpose and progress.

Perfection of personality—the spiritual aspect of man's being—is not an isolated entity that can be developed distinct and apart from the other two aspects of his nature: the mental and the physical. Rather we see it as a component of the essence that is man, that acts upon and reacts to the stimuli generated by his entire being and his entire environment—man is a “whole,” a unit, an entity. Just as the trinity of the Godhead is three in one, so man is a threefold being made in the image of God, and destined, if God has his way in man's life, to become in reality the essence of perfection. In the task of perfecting such a being, the church must foster a program that enters constructively into the threefold area of life.

In the area of personality, the church offers first of all the ordinances of individual regeneration. The essence of this is a cleansing of the life of the dregs of sin and supplanting them with positive patterns of conduct. The rebirth of baptism is a rebirth into a world peopled with opportunity for self-sacrifice and the development of “other-mindedness” in point of view and contact. To be effectual, the church must do more than present this reorientation as a philosophy. It must recognize the influence of physical and social environment upon the individual and look toward a reconstruction of that environment so it will contribute to the process of perfection rather than distract from it. The social program of the church has this as its purpose. The Gathering is the initial step toward its realization. But the Gathering contributes toward this goal only as it consists of a bringing together of individuals who have made significant progress toward regeneration and whose perceptions have been re-oriented outward and upward.

The intellectual component of man must be fed and developed to a level comparable to his spiritual-social growth. This is the distinct function of the Holy Spirit. The promised work of the Comforter was that "He will lead you into all truth." We err if we set limits for the definition of the word all. The church fails in its program if it neglects its educational function.

THE DISTINCTIVE MESSAGE of the church is its program for the threefold development of man. In a world torn by war and class conflict, the message of the church has timely significance. In a world confused by conflicting philosophies, the logic of its message sounds with timely clarity. Where every other approach has been tried and failed, the divine plan offers timely promise.

Man has tried to solve his problems by creating social institutions—and the end is not yet. Educators have sought to plumb the universe of truth and have produced the seeds of intellectual confusion and the processes of self-destruction.

The churches of men have concentrated on a process of individual regeneration and have achieved an era of spiritual stagnation.

The church of Jesus Christ endeavors to bring together all three, drawing from each a contribution to the successful realization of the other.

With such a program, we can say with the men of old times: "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ for it is the power of God unto salvation."

Most men who think they are thinking are merely rearranging their prejudices.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only those questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Please tell me all about the "Pearl of Great Price." I see the Utah people have as its author Joseph Smith. Was it not a small magazine at one time?

ANSWER:

This work was first published by F. D. Richards at Liverpool, England, in 1851. As its title page indicates, its "choice selection" of material includes various extracts alleged to be taken from the work, revelations, or history of Joseph Smith, some of which contain a number of incorrect quotations, and therefore are not entirely dependable. Some of the work is also known to be contrary to the recognized teachings of Joseph Smith, and is therefore judged to be spurious. Since its first publication, some matter has been added that materially increases its unreliability in this respect.

The work constitutes a small book that the Utah faction accepts as being in harmony with its teachings and practice. The part on plurality of wives was not in the book as originally published, and its later edition seems to have been caused by the polygamous teaching and practice of the Utah faction after being established in Utah some years after the death of Joseph Smith. The book itself has never been recognized by the Reorganized Church as having any authority, but any matter in it that is quoted correctly from the Doctrine and Covenants or other work of Joseph Smith is better understood by consulting the more complete original sources.

QUESTION:

Is there any difference between revelation and inspiration?

ANSWER:

These terms are often used in different settings, although in some situations they might be used interchangeably. One of the differences, strictly speaking, would be that revelation is the making known of something not previously understood, while inspiration is the illumination or supernatural influence which enables one to receive the thing revealed. That which is revealed is also called a revelation, the word being employed in more than one sense.

Divine inspiration, it is understood, comes from God, as also does divine revelation. However, it is conceivable that one might be given a revelation by means of an angel or other method which would not involve any particular supernatural inspiration on the part of the one receiving it. It is also possible that a revelation might be given which would require divine inspiration to comprehend. Probably one would usually be "in the Spirit" when receiving a message from God, and would to that extent be inspired.

QUESTION:

What history did the lost 116 pages of the Book of Mormon manuscript contain?

ANSWER:

They are said to have contained an abridgment of the record of Nephi down to the reign of King Benjamin (see Doctrine and Covenants 3:10). The account as published in the Book of Mormon was evidently taken from the regular or more complete plates of Nephi, which contained details not found on the abridged plates.

QUESTION:

Are there more than twelve apostles mentioned in the New Testament?

ANSWER:

Besides the twelve apostles named in Matthew 10:2, we are told that Judas was succeeded by Matthias in the apostolic office (Acts 1:24-26). At a later time Barnabas and Paul were divinely called to that office (Acts 13:2; 14:14), and Paul himself refers to James, the Lord's brother, as an apostle (Galatians 1:19). Paul also mentions Silvanus and Timotheus as if they were apostles (1 Thessalonians 1:1; 2:6). Others are mentioned in a manner suggesting the office.

A Reasonable Service —

By ESTHER BROCKWAY

ONE OF THE PURPOSES of the Spirit of God is to inspire us to serve the Lord by helping each other. In order to make it possible for us to help others, the Lord has blessed us in varying ways with talents he intends us to develop. There are some things we must do for ourselves to carry on life; we must eat, for example, and many of us must work for our daily bread. Eating is necessary to maintain life, but the kind deeds we do for others are the things that give life meaning. The man who has only money has nothing.

The person who looks upon the needy around him with a sense of compassion feels a deep-rooted desire to offer his assistance. The needy are not just the poverty-stricken—they may be a church school class that needs teaching; a lonely neighbor who needs to be visited; a discouraged person who needs a kind, cheerful word; an unemployed man who needs assistance in finding a job; or a sick mother who needs help in her home because she cannot do her work. And the whole world needs the story of the Restoration preached in power, with a Zion community as an example!

Anyone whose eyes are opened to the many needy people around him will be confronted with the problem of frustration and disappointment that he cannot do more. Someone said to Brother McConley during last Conference that he broke down from overwork while he was in Europe. He said it was not overwork that broke him down; it was seeing the things he wanted to do for those people but could not. Jesus spoke the same thought when he said, "O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! Ye who will kill the prophets, and will stone them who are sent unto you; how often would I have gathered your children together, even as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."—Matthew 23: 37.

THE POOREST WAY of meeting the problem of frustration is to say, "Oh, what's the use? What good can I do?" and then quit trying to do anything. God expects from us a reasonable service. He knows all of us face the limit of twenty-four hours a day, one third of which we need to spend in sleep. The other two thirds we must use with wisdom and judgment, not driving ourselves beyond our strength. Many people have talents that the circumstances of life have not permitted them to develop to any great degree or are otherwise hindered by their environment. Surely the man in the parable who had five talents and was commended for developing them had not reached the limits of what God wanted him to become—or he would not have been given five more.

According to the dictionary the word reason means "a sane or sound view or consideration; right thinking." A "right-thinking" God is not going to demand of people more than they can give. "Reasonable" means "just, fair-minded." Sometimes in our discouragement, we feel that the Lord has required too much of us when he expects us to build Zion. If we have any faith in him and comprehension of his love, we know it is within our power, or he would not ask us to work at it.

Laman and Lemuel faced this problem after the Lord commanded that group of people to build a ship to cross a great ocean. They said it could not be done, and they argued with Nephi about it. He answered them: "If God had commanded me to do all things, I could do them. If he should command me that I should say unto this water, Be thou earth, it should be earth; and if I should say it, it would be done."—Book of Mormon, page 59, verses 157, 158. So he went to work, and finally they helped, but the fact that they crossed the ocean in the ship and came to the promised land had no effect on their faith, because they had no desire to render a reasonable service; they were spiritual paupers and wanted everything done for them.

On the other hand, what is the judgment of God on people who really do the best they can under their circumstances and continually yearn to do more? That is a vital question and affects all lovers of righteousness. The amount of good any of us can do in relation to what needs to be done is so small that we feel if we are rewarded only for our good deeds, we will not have a very rich reward. Will the Lord consider our desires on the day of judgment? "As he thinketh in his heart, so is he."—Proverbs 23: 7.

MANY PEOPLE restrain their evil desires for fear of the judgment of their neighbors or fear of the police or because they lack opportunities to carry out their ideas. People who refrain from committing many of the outward sins and crimes but whose desires are continuously evil are hardly fitting themselves for heaven.

Many scientists spend time in their laboratories to discover the causes and cures of the diseases which plague the world in order to prevent and relieve suffering. They may claim to be irreligious, and their ideas about God may seem to be childish, but their very efforts to help others are as a prayer to God, and he gives them light and help in their efforts according to their capacity to receive. In the same way, the community chest worker who is sincerely interested in solving the problems of his community finds favor and help from God. Even the truck driver or train engineer, who although profane in speech, starts out the day with the thought, "I must drive carefully so as not to hurt anyone," finds favor in the sight of God.

It is as if he said, "Dear Lord, please quicken my intelligence that I will not cause misery and suffering to my brethren on the highways." Men who conduct safety campaigns to stimulate others to thoughtful, intelligent driving and walking are blessed of the Lord.

According to section 76 in the Doctrine and Covenants, the honorable men of the earth will receive a reward far beyond that which we can understand because they have desired righteousness according to the light they have had, which is a reasonable service from them. Nevertheless, the Lord prefers as his servants devout Latter Day Saints, not from any narrow-minded sense of favoritism, but because their devotion to the Restoration makes it possible for him to enlighten them by his Spirit as they work to bless other people; and they become more effective in their ministry than those not so enlightened.

There are many good people throughout the world who love righteousness and are genuinely concerned that peace be not taken from the earth. They see the tragedy of starving children, realizing that they are innocent victims and yearn to help them. These good people yearn for light, yet walk in darkness. They may not know how to pray, but their righteous desires are as a prayer to the Lord just as surely as if they were taught the more formal ritual of prayer and actually expected God to answer, according to Latter Day Saint concepts.

The Lord is moved with compassion for these good people, who are just as helpless to meet the situation as the little children they would serve, and for that reason he will go through all nations by the power of an endowed priesthood that they might have an opportunity to develop their righteous desires in Zion. For the sake of the righteous in the church and the good people who yearn for an opportunity to serve, but cannot in war-torn countries like Germany and China, it can be truly said, "He that keepeth Israel neither slumbereth nor sleeps."

RECENTLY WE HEARD a sermon in the Stone Church by a member of the Presiding Bishopric. On our way home we were discussing the sermon and the stimulating thoughts presented. The bishop mentioned, among other things, the problem of keeping men in the field in the face of increasing inflation. A friend said she enjoyed the sermon greatly, but there was nothing she could do to help keep the men in the field. As she spoke, I suddenly saw the whole question of keeping men in the field in an entirely different light. Ordinarily we are prone to view that problem as a purely financial matter. So I said, "What makes you think you have never kept a man in the field? Have not there been times in the past that some missionary would have given up in discouragement except for the kind, helpful words you were able to speak at the right moment? Haven't there been other volunteer helpers whom you have been able to help, encourage, enlighten, and teach? That is just as important as paying tithing."

If we are to keep missionaries in the field, they must have our moral as well as our financial support. That means we must bear witness, as we have the opportunity, to the fact that Jesus lives, and we must encourage others to serve him by helping others. He also expects us to bear the afflictions, disappointments, and trials we cannot help with cheerfulness, patience, and faith. Surely this is a reasonable service!

Salutation to the Dawn

For yesterday is but a dream
And tomorrow is only a vision.
But today, well-lived,
Makes every yesterday a dream of happiness,
And every tomorrow a vision of hope.
Look well, therefore, to this day!

When God Finds Me

By C. J. Lant

THERE WAS a great deal of searching on my part until I found the gospel, then the search for God really began. The greatest rejoicing on my part, however, will be when God finds me.

Perhaps many things have been seen and heard with material eyes and ears, but the real sight comes when things are seen with the soul. We are told that the eyes are the windows of the soul.

No doubt Joyce Kilmer, veteran of World War I, saw and heard with his soul when he wrote his famous poem, "Trees." The story of how he came to write those words tells that for days he had looked out across No Man's Land and admired the beauty of a tree. When the hour came to prepare for the advance, the area was shelled continuously all through the night. When daybreak came, he saw the ruined trunk of the tree, standing where once a thing of beauty had stood. It was under the spirit of inspiration that he wrote the poem.

Joyce Kilmer had had an awakening; no doubt he had found God. Perhaps God had found him, too, because he was a new creature. Incidentally, I had the pleasure of meeting his son during World War II. Like his father, young Kilmer was serving in a company with many other young men whose fathers had served in the same organization during the First World War. He was seeing things through material eyes, but—if he survived the South Pacific battles—perhaps he has learned to see things through the windows of his soul.

"Many are called, but few are chosen." Wherever God finds us, there are many things we can do for him. One of the most pressing is to "rebuild the waste places in Zion." Especially is this true of those near the Center Place.

Man's Plan and God's Plan

A MINISTERIAL CALL in the churches of the world usually means an opportunity for a minister to advance from a student to the pastorate of a church, or from a small church to a larger one with increased responsibility and remuneration.

In going to his church, such a minister finds himself solely responsible for the religious life of his congregation. If he is able to find willing workers among his people to help in the church school, music, women's work, etc., he considers himself most fortunate, because any deficiency he or his family cannot supply or that he cannot have cared for by volunteer service may mean his failure as a minister. Sometimes if he is called to a large and wealthy church, he may have another minister provided to be his assistant, but in any case he personally is responsible for the growth, development, and spiritual welfare of his congregation.

He has no other ordained men to help him and share the responsibility with him, except in the event that he is provided with an assistant.

He has to do all the preaching, presiding, pastoral visiting, and much of the teaching. It is his duty to supervise all teaching, musical, and social activities. For any failure he must answer to his board.

In other words, the success of his congregation depends solely upon his personality, the soundness of his own ideas, and his personal ability to put them into operation.

IN WHAT WE BELIEVE to be the plan of God, as outlined in his revelations to his church, the very opposite is true. He has provided for a minimum of four ordained men in each congregation: an elder, priest, teacher, and deacon, each having his appointed part of the ministry and responsibility. The elder presides over all the priesthood; the priest is to specialize on home or family duties; the teacher should offer counsel when there are differences between individuals and encourage members to attend church, the deacon is to see that the church is an inviting and clean place where people will feel at home and love to gather.

If there are more than one of any of these orders of priesthood, the better for the work; for each ordained man is equally responsible before God for the spiritual welfare of the people and shares in the responsibility of the whole in accordance with the authority of the priesthood which he holds—the Melchisedec priesthood (elder) ministering in spiritual things, and the Aaronic priesthood (priests, teachers, and deacons) ministering in temporal things or the letter of the law, with spiritual objectives always in view.

IN GOD'S PLAN a pastor is not a boss or dictator. He spoils his ministry when he assumes such an attitude, for he circumscribes himself and his congregation to one man's viewpoint. God says, "In the multiplicity of counsel there is wisdom." A minister's success depends upon his ability to practice self-abnegation and to recognize that every other man of the priesthood in his congregation is also responsible for the spiritual welfare of God's people. There used to be an old adage on a large banner in the Stone Church school which read, "The successful worker is not the one who can do ten men's work, but is the one who can cause ten men to do ten men's work."

The pastor is to preside over the priesthood in his congregation, and one of his primary qualifications is to be "humble and full of love." He should try to make every man associated with him in the priesthood feel that he too shares (as in fact he does under the law) the responsibility for the spiritual life and welfare of the people to whom he is called of God to minister. If he is humble and full of love, he will be big enough to listen to and use suggestions of his brethren, sometimes even in preference to his own. In so doing he will help develop those of the ministry working with him. The very fact that he holds back his own ideas makes a bigger, better man of him and wins the smile of approval of God himself, for he is practicing the injunction of the Master, "In honor preferring one another."

By CHARLES S. WARREN

MEN OF THE PRIESTHOOD who are not made to feel that they share in the responsibility of a congregation but are simply taking instructions from the pastor to do this or that, cannot do their best. They cannot be blamed if they are not as active and diligent as they should be when they are working merely because of a sense of duty.

Ministers of other denominations have envied our pastors because they have so many ordained men qualified to share responsibility and make constructive suggestions, while they have had to depend solely upon themselves for all things necessary to make their work a success.

God has indeed blessed his church abundantly, and if his representatives will be like their Savior—meek and lowly in heart and humble enough to follow his plan—their work can and will be effective in preparing a people, as Paul said, "called to be Saints"—or, as the Lord says, "a peculiar people," fitted and worthy to be with him when he establishes Zion, the pure in heart, where the celestial law shall govern, and where only those who are keeping the celestial law can live.

Why I Am A "Reorganite"

BY RAY WHITING

A FEW YEARS AGO I found myself in a room with four Mormon elders. After being introduced as an elder of the Reorganization, I was asked by one of them why I was a Reorganite and not a Brighamite, to which I gave the following answer: "I am a Reorganite instead of a Brighamite because my religion makes Joseph the Martyr a true prophet and God a champion of truth; the Mormon creed makes Joseph Smith, Jr., a false prophet and God a liar."

They seemed to think this quite a joke and asked me how I got that way. I said, "I got that way because the Reorganization believes in the prophecies of Joseph Smith and their fulfillment, while the Utah church does not." They all assured me that they did believe in the prophecies of Joseph Smith and in their fulfillment. So I turned to Doctrine and Covenants 1:7 and asked if they believed the following: "Search these commandments, for they are true and faithful, and the prophecies and promises which are in them shall all be fulfilled." Again all four elders agreed that they did believe these "prophecies and promises" and that if they had not all been fulfilled, they would be ultimately.

We next turned to Doctrine and Covenants 98:1-4 and read the promises concerning the Saints who were driven out of Independence in 1832-33:

Verily, I say unto you, concerning your brethren who have been afflicted, and persecuted, and cast out from the land of their inheritance, . . . And they that have been scattered shall be gathered. . . . Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritances; they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion.

I asked them if the Brighamites believed in the "redemption of Zion" and in the "gathering" of the scattered Saints. Once more I was assured that they did believe in the return of the scattered Saints and in the redemption of Zion. They said that it had not come to pass yet, but that it would be accomplished, because the "prophecies and promises shall all be fulfilled."

Turning to Doctrine and Covenants 100:1-3, I read:

Verily, I say unto you, my friends, Behold, I will give unto you a revelation and commandment, that you may know how to act in the discharge of your duties concerning the salvation and redemption of your brethren, who have been scattered on the land of Zion . . . I have decreed that your brethren, which have been scattered, shall return to the land of their inheritances and build up the waste places of Zion. . . . Behold, this is the blessing which I have promised after your tribulations, and the tribulations of your brethren; your redemption, and the redemption of your brethren; even their restoration to the land of Zion. . . .

These elders of the Utah church readily agreed that while this had not yet come to pass, it would be fulfilled. Reading still farther in paragraph three we found:

Behold, I say unto you, The redemption of Zion must needs come by power; therefore I will raise up unto my people a man, who shall lead them like as Moses led the children of Israel, for ye are the children of Israel, and of the seed of Abraham; and ye must needs be led out of bondage by power, and with a stretched out arm; and as your fathers were led at the first, even so shall the redemption of Zion be.

Once more I was assured that they believed there would be a man raised up "like as Moses" who would lead the scattered Saints back to Zion, but that this Moses man had not yet been raised up. Then we discussed the parable given in Doctrine and Covenants 98:6-8, which says "you may know my will concerning the redemption of Zion," and further, "And the Lord of the vineyard said unto one of her servants . . . go ye straightway unto the land of my vineyard, and redeem my vineyard, for it is mine, I have bought it with money." We all agreed that this "servant" was the same as the "Moses" man, who was to "redeem" Zion or to "redeem my vineyard."

AFTER ALL FOUR of the elders had agreed repeatedly with the above Scriptures and said that the scattered Saints had not yet been gathered and that Zion was not yet redeemed, I asked them, "Where are the Saints that 'had been scattered, they and their children'? Can you name any of them who were 'driven' out of Zion? Or their children? Where do they live? For to them was given the 'decree' that they should be gathered back and build up the 'waste places of Zion.' You men said it had not been done yet, but that it would be done, for every prophecy and promise 'shall be fulfilled.' So where are they?"

The only answer anyone can give is that those who had been driven out are all dead. Not a single one is still living. Therefore, if the promise made to the scattered Saints was to be fulfilled, it must have been during the lifetime of those who were driven out. The promise was to "your brethren who have been . . . cast out of the land of their inheritance, . . . they and their children." If they are all dead (and they are), and if it has not been done yet, as the Brighamites say, then the prophecies failed; the promises were not kept. This would make Joseph Smith a false prophet and God a liar.

With the Reorganization, it is quite different. Young Joseph took the leadership of the church and sent out a proclamation "to all the scattered Saints." (See the Church History, Volume 3, pages 294, 295.) I quote: "In the name of the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, I now call upon all the scattered Saints, upon all the broad earth, to arise and shake off the sleep that hath bound them these many years, take on the armor of the just, calling on the name of the Lord for help, and unite once more for the emancipation of the honest in heart from the power of false doctrines and the shackles of sin." He sent out missionaries to the factions, wherever the Saints had scattered, and brought them back by the hundreds—the very ones who had been driven out of Zion. He led them from Amboy to Plano, then to Lamoni, and finally back to the land of Zion; there, in the lifetime of those who had been driven out, "they and their children" assisted in the re-establishing and building up of the "waste places of Zion" according to the promises made by the Martyr.

The "Moses" man was raised up, the scattered Saints did return, the church was re-established, Zion's promised redemption was fulfilled, the "vineyard" had been "redeemed," and "after many days all things were fulfilled," for "so shall the redemption of Zion be." This had to be during the lifetime of those who were scattered; and the only man, the only leader of all the factions who even claimed to have gathered the "scattered Saints, they and their children" back to the land of Zion, was Young Joseph. He alone stands out as the "redeemer" of Zion. Through him the "prophecies and promises" made to the scattered Saints found fulfillment.

TO "REDEEM" means to repossess what was once lost. One cannot redeem what he has never possessed. The early Saints had gained some possessions and had a foothold in the land of Zion and were driven out. Not until then did God talk about a "redemption" of Zion. There was nothing to "redeem" before. Prior to that time, God said to "bring forth and to establish my Zion." During the lifetime of Young Joseph, the church was re-established in Independence, waste places were purchased and rebuilt, and the Saints reinhabited the land of Zion.

I then asked the Utah elders if their church was practicing stewardships, the storehouse principle, and inventories, and they answered affirmatively. I said, "If you are, and if, as you say, Zion is not redeemed, then you are wrong again," and turning to Doctrine and Covenants 102: 10 I read, "And let those commandments which I have given concerning Zion and her law, be executed and fulfilled after her redemption." Then I said, "Your church is trying to execute these laws before her redemption, while the Lord said it should be done after her redemption. With the Reorganization, Young Joseph first went about bringing back the scattered Saints to the land of their inheritance; then, at his death, President Frederick M. Smith began to "execute" the laws which would build up this Zion, where the early Saints had left off. If the "redemption" of Zion means Zion in her perfected state, why would the Lord tell the Saints to wait until Zion was perfected and the work all done before they began to "execute" and "fulfill" the "commandments which I have given concerning Zion and her law"?

THEREFORE, to be a "Reorganite" makes Joseph the Martyr a true prophet; it makes Young Joseph the Lord's "servant," who was to "redeem my vineyard"; he was the "Moses" man raised up by the Lord. To be a "Reorganite" puts the stamp of approval also upon those who have followed Young Joseph, for they are putting into execution those commandments which will build up this Zion.

For further support of the above, let me quote from the third volume of Church History (page 261) which shows that the early elders of the Reorganization believed Young

Joseph to be the one "mighty and strong." In what Elders Samuel H. Gurley and Edmund C. Briggs delivered to Young Joseph Smith as the word of the Lord, we find this: "A Zerubbabel in Israel art thou. As a nail fastened in a sure place, so are the promises unto thee to make thee a restorer in Zion—to set in order the house of God." And on page 400 of the same volume we find that Elder J. W. Briggs, in a challenge to debate the Utah elders, said, "But in fulfillment of the promise, God has called forth one mighty and strong to set in order, or reorganize the house of God. And that this one so raised up is the seed of him to whom the promise was made."

In the Herald of June 16, 1926, coming from the pen of Elbert A. Smith, then one of the presidents of the church, we find:

In 1833 the Saints were driven from Zion. No one was allowed to remain. They were driven with violence and bloodshed. The outlook seemed hopeless. But that very autumn the Lord said: "Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritances; they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 4.

That prophecy is self-evidently true. No man could have made it in his own wisdom. It has been fulfilled within very recent years. Today we have nearly five thousand Saints in the organization at Independence and other thousands near by in the stakes. This thing the Lord said should occur, and he has brought it to pass through the Reorganization.

In this same article, quoting from a revelation given to Jason W. Briggs on November 18, 1852, we read this:

And in mine own due time will I call upon the seed of Joseph Smith, and will bring one forth, and he shall be mighty and strong, and he shall preside over the high priesthood of my church; then shall the quorums assemble, and the pure in heart shall gather, and Zion shall be re-

Gracious Living — By VIDA M. FLETCHER

ONE OF THE ULTIMATE goals of our lives is that we may be able to live graciously. No matter how difficult life may be, most people cling to the hope that in time they will have the means necessary to live pleasantly and have leisure time to enjoy it.

The young man with modest salary hopes for the day when he can supply the means for the nicer furniture in his home, the higher priced car, and the more expensive kinds of recreation, which, to him mean more gracious living. The wife hopes for the time when she can have a maid, less work in the home, nicer clothes, and more time for being a companion to her family.

To most people the term "gracious living" implies ample means, leisure time, and the indulgence of pleasure in ways that appeal to each in his particular desire. We like to have friends about us who share our interests, and we like to be generous and hospitable to them. We want to be gracious and genteel, to be looked up to as those who live on a higher plan.

Perhaps we unconsciously place too much emphasis on the need of material wealth for gracious living. The fashionable and popular ways of life require plenty of financial means. But is there any material price we can pay in order to have that refinement of character, that spirit of kindness which marks those who really know the meaning of gracious living? We have felt that rare atmosphere amid the humblest of circumstances, where mere gratification of pleasure had no consideration.

THE POPULAR IDEA of gracious living is being brought to the fore in many ads in the popular magazines. Scenes are pictured in homes of comfort and beauty. The people are handsome, well-bred, attractively dressed, and charming. The pictures advocate the idea that these people have reached their goal of "gracious living," but in every instance there is a bottle of intoxicating beverage of some sort blending in with the color scheme. The idea is to subtly but forcefully suggest that in order to live graciously, we should use alcoholic drinks. It is only a step further to insinuate that even if we lack the beauty and comforts of the homes pictured, we can still be hospitable and friendly by serving such beverages.

Judge Matthew Hill of the Supreme Court in Olympia, Washington, is in constant contact with the problems of life of a great many people. He says that "gracious living" via the bottle produces results that are out of harmony with the idea portrayed in the liquor ads. Does not the "sot" strike a sour note in the symphony of praise for liquor as the brightener of all joys, the lightener of all sorrows, the symbol of hospitality, the accompaniment of all friendly intercourse, the thing that gentlemen (and ladies) naturally take before, during, and after meals—in short, the token and indispensable ingredient of "gracious living"? The judge, who handles divorce proceedings, tries criminal cases, and presides over trials involving injuries resulting from traffic accidents, sees concrete evidence that alcoholic drinks are the source of misery and suffering in many forms.

He recalls the case involving the assault and raping of a girl by two young men from good families. They were clear-eyed, fine appearing boys about twenty years old, of whom any parent could have been proud. These good people could not believe their boys were guilty. It was difficult to reconcile the appearance of the boys and their loved ones with the story of bestiality that came from the witness stand. But the evidence of their guilt was irrefutable. Their only defense was that they had been drinking after attending a public dance. They could not remember what happened between the time they left the dance hall and the time they sobered up in jail. They had drunk that which took away their intelligence, their sense of decency, everything which distinguishes man from beast.

The judge says he thinks of that case every time he reads an ad that seeks to leave the impression that beer or whisky is an indispensable adjunct of gracious living.

THE MORE WE LISTEN to the experiences of real judges, not the fictitious "Old Judge" of the liquor ads, the more we check the records of prosecutors, the greater is our conviction that crime does not enter the lives of thousands until their behavior levels sag under alcoholic influence. At the same time and from the same source, they acquire bravado and abandon caution.

In the liquor ads, the men of distinction are always poised masterfully, the women beautifully groomed and refined in appearance. There are no bars, no brass rails, no dim lights. There is no unseemly coarseness in the relations of men and women in high-priced lounges or low-priced taverns. Police blotters and the court records tell a different story. Judge Zottoli of Boston states that 90 per cent of the adults imprisoned in Massachusetts broke laws because of drunkenness. Records of New York City reveal that half the murders in that city were involved with liquor.

J. Edgar Hoover asserts that 28 per cent of the crimes committed in the United States is attributable to liquor drinking. But of course much of the tragedy for which alcohol is responsible is not a matter of record—probably less than half of it is. Many people hide their shame and guilt, and the courts have no record of them.

CASSIO, in Shakespeare's Othello, when questioned regarding a crime he committed while drunk says,

"I remember a mass of things, but none distinctly; a quarrel, but nothing wherefore. O God, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains! that we should, with joy, pleasance, revel and applause transform ourselves into beasts!"

Judge Hill says further that it has long been recognized that when nations or individuals give themselves up to drink, there is a loss of moral sense. The restraints, the controls, the inhibitions last acquired are the first ones released. Drink is a major factor in the number of illegitimate children born, the degradation of commercialized vice, and the spread of venereal diseases. The evidence mounts that it involves a waste of time, money, character, health and life, to say nothing of the social wreckage it causes.

Alcohol adds nothing good to "gracious living." Rather it contains the elements of destruction for any home using it.

Why I Am a "Reorganite"

inhabited, as I said unto my servant Joseph Smith; after many days shall all these things be accomplished, saith the Lord.—Church History, Volume 3, pages 200, 201, and Doctrine and Covenants 98: 6-8.

Then Elbert A. Smith comments as follows:

You hear much about prophecies. Here was one that time has tested. There were three outstanding points. First: a son (the seed) of Joseph the Martyr, was to come forth and preside over the church. Second: the quorums were to be reorganized. Third: the Saints were to return to Zion. No man could know that these three things would occur. The sons of Joseph were but lads. No one could know that they would live to manhood; or living, ever take up their father's work. But in 1860 "Young Joseph" came. He did preside over the high priesthood, and who shall say that during his more than fifty years of presidency he was not mighty and strong. The quorums were reassembled, everyone of them. The Saints did return.

Those three things which the Lord said he would do, he has done through the Reorganization.

IN A PROPHECY given through this same Elbert A. Smith at the Stone Church during a Communion service on April 7, 1929, among other things the following was said:

When my servant, the prophet, had completed his task, he was taken from the earth, and great darkness came upon the minds of many of the people, and division came in, and sorrow and shame entered into the hearts of thousands, until many felt that my work was forgotten in the world and had failed; but I raised up the son of the prophet, and he became as one mighty and strong to lead my people.

In one of the darkest hours I gave the promise to my people, Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritances; they and their children with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion.

Behold they have returned, and are returning, even to this day, and you are here as a testimony before me that the promise has been kept.

That promise has been kept; the Saints have returned, Zion is redeemed, for "so shall the redemption of Zion be." Therefore, let the Saints go forward and "build Zion" and keep those "commandments which I have given concerning Zion and her law . . . after her redemption." God has worked, and is working through the Reorganization. The latter-day prophet is true, and the word of God has found fulfillment.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

The Zionite Home - By LOIS LARSEN

THERE IS ONE FIELD in which the woman is and should be the chief administrator—and that is the home. In speaking on the home, as in classes on child training, I always have the feeling that people are looking at me with a sort of “physician-heal-thyself” look, for goodness knows neither my children nor my home is perfect, but please keep in mind that in talking of the Zionite home I am referring to an ideal—a definite and not easily obtainable goal.

There is a difference between the Zionite home and a good Christian home. There are many fine homes created by worthy and high principled people, but a Zionite home is one which takes its religious guidance from our particular religious philosophy and one which considers itself a unit in our particular way of living in a definite place called Zion.

Zion—no more than our community or nation for that matter—will never be any stronger than its homes. There may be all kinds of hospitals and offices, storehouses and meeting places, there may be buildings of brick and wood—and I hope of marble and granite—but unless all these are based on a strong, firm, foundation of well-established homes—homes created and maintained by consecrated men and women—then there will be no hope of a permanent Zion.

This subject of course is inexhaustible, and I shall try to mention only one or two of the many positive qualities necessary to a well-adjusted home.

One of these is security. Financial security is not only desirable but necessary in the present economic setup. When Zion is established, this will be automatically taken care of by the financial law. There will be the hospital, the storehouse, and the general church resources in case of emergencies; but until then, it is well to take advantage of the safeguards we do have, such as savings, insurance, hospitalization, and wise investments. There is another form of security however, perhaps more intangible but just as necessary, and that is family security—the feeling that you have your relatives to back you up; not just a mother and father, but also uncles and aunts and cousins and grandparents.

SOME YEARS AGO in Independence three little boys started to kindergarten on the same day and in the same place. There were two brothers

JULY

Warm, isn't it? With July comes the Fourth. Years have passed since our forefathers declared they could no longer tolerate oppression and agreed that men are created equal and have the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Our slums, institutions for defectives, our ultra-rich suggest inequality. Laws must be made and enforced to protect our rights, but certainly there still burns our forefather's love of right and equality. If not, why do we as a nation anxiously and prayerfully await the outcome of one single life in danger? Why do we sacrifice our youth in foreign lands that right may prevail? Why keep our Statue of Liberty as a monument to welcome the tired, the poor, the huddled masses? The Fourth of July festivities may be frivolous, but underneath our thinking is clear.

For most of us July means vacations, reunions, camps—and at home, food preservation. Regardless of where we are, the family's health must be watched; light diet, plenty of salt, mind off the weather, and fingers away from the poison-ivy patches. Let's enjoy July!

and a cousin, and in the general drifting around and getting acquainted process they became somewhat separated. Another child, who was starting out early to assert himself, came up to the smallest brother and put up his fists with an invitation to fight. Almost instantly on either side of his would-be victim there appeared respectively a brother and a cousin, and instead of one rather timid little boy, he had three waiting quietly and firmly for him to start something. Needless to say he took his bullying elsewhere. The kindergarten teacher said it was the finest example of family solidarity she had ever seen.

We hear a great deal about the four freedoms and freedom in general. That is as it should be, for freedom—both in concrete and abstract form—is a vital part of human development. The ideal home must of necessity be one in which there is controlled freedom. The home in which any one person, husband or wife, mother or mother-in-law, grandparent—or even in some cases—a child is the dictator can scarcely function to the best of its capacity. Tyranny can be just as maddening in small ways as in national affairs. Co-operation and direction are necessary, of course, just as traffic laws are necessary in order to prevent hopeless tangling of people and machines, but when we start out for a drive, we are free to go to the mountains or the beach as we choose, as long as we obey the traffic rules. So the family must have freedom of decision and action. Independence of thought, which is so necessary to adult development, is gained only by being allowed to think. Families may be cliff dwellers—I mean apartment dwellers—by choice, but there is no need for them to shut up dreams and ideas and personalities in little caves and leave them there. Let there be an atmosphere of spiritual space. It will pay. In the Zion-ic home, there is no place for petty suspicions or spyings. Trust and confidence will breed trust and confidence, and they are essential in successful home life.

THERE IS A STORY in one of the old books of Grimm's Fairy Tales. I think it is called "Fairy Gifts." It tells about several little princesses who were permitted to name the gift each would receive from her guardian fairy. One asked for beauty, one for wealth, one for power, and so on. The last one thought for a while and then asked for the gift of "a quiet spirit." The story goes on to show that she had asked for the best gift of all, as beauty fades, wealth begets avarice, and power creates enemies; but the quiet spirit leads to a tranquil, useful life and many loving friends.

It would be wonderful if some fairy could give us this and the other attributes of a well-rounded character, but most of us have to work hard and not always too successfully for them—especially for the quiet spirit. There are many ways of attaining serenity. We probably each have our own—prayer, meditation, music, gardening, perhaps some creative work. But whatever means we use, it is well to try for this goal, for the home in which there is an atmosphere of peace and unhurried attainment is apt to be a most pleasant place.

This by no means implies that the home should be static. The Zion home must have a definite and constructive building program of its own. It may be the education of children, or the building of a new house, or the development of a family business. The members of the home must be alive and eager to take part in worth-while activities of the community or town.

And there are many material qualities stressed by those who are trained and qualified to teach home-building—cleanliness, beauty in the home, careful buying and budgeting, co-operation, etc. I sometimes wonder if cheerfulness is mentioned enough. "To eat our meat in gladness" is very sound advice and certainly affects us both physically and mentally. Thankfulness is another virtue sometimes neglected. Most of us have so much to be grateful for that it is almost a sin to worry about what we have not.

There is an old jingle—I believe my grandmother taught it to me:

When you're tired or feeling blue,
Something for somebody else go do.

It is bad poetry but very good philosophy. There is no use putting your house in order and cultivating all the good and positive virtues in the world if you cannot be of service to others. I recently finished a book of nearly 400 pages entitled New Techniques of Happiness, and really the whole book could be summed up in one sentence. The only way to be truly happy is to help someone else find happiness. When we find peace of mind and freedom of soul and joy in our religion, these things must be shared with others or they will dry up at the source, but in sharing, we can double them.

There is much good and helpful material both in the church and out, on building a satisfactory home life. Members of the priesthood are taught home counseling and advising. Sister Alice Burgess has an excellent quarterly on the subject. The Herald often has good articles, and Daily Bread for June seems to be on the general idea of home and family. All I can add is to urge you to have faith—faith in the home as a major source of good—and faith in the Zion home as the basis of a sound and workable Zion.

Are You One of These?

"I don't talk about people, BUT . . ."
"Of course I'm no beauty, but isn't she HOMELY?"
"Well, I didn't hear this myself, but so and so said . . ."
"I simply can't see what she sees in him . . ."
"Well, now, if you want my advice, I say to . . ."
LOUISE.

Picked From the Periodicals

By Aarona Booker Kohiman

June magazines contain, as might be expected, considerable subject matter pertaining to marriage and home life. However, other subjects are also covered.

"Making Marriage Work," Ladies Home Journal, is a regular monthly feature that is worth-while. One problem discussed this month is "Wives Who Work," and any wife who works, or prospective bride planning to continue working out of the home, would profit by reading this.

"Profile of Youth" is a report on American young people being compiled by Ladies' Home Journal; the first installment appears in the June issue. What are the facts about our teen-agers? What do they think about morals, religion, etc? You may be shocked; if so, you have all the more reason for reading and thinking. These are conditions confronting our church youth.

"My Marriage Was on the Rocks," McCall's, discusses three marriages that almost went to pieces but were saved because the principals were willing to adjust and change.

"This I Remember," McCall's, is an account of very modern history by Eleanor Roosevelt and is of interest to all, regardless of one's political views.

"Don't Swat That Fly," Woman's Home Companion, tells of better and surer methods for eradicating the pest.

"Gray Market Babies," Woman's Home Companion, may help us all to understand that, "it takes skill to graft from one family tree onto another."

"Being the Parent You'd Like to Be," Parents' Magazine, is an article that should help to make you feel that you are not really a failure as a parent, and yet inspire you to be a better one.

"Were You Ever An Adolescent?" Parents' Magazine, discusses what phases one may expect in the development of an adolescent.

"A Guide to Book Sets for Children," Parents' Magazine, is the first of two articles describing and evaluating objectively the many book sets available.

"The Age to Marry," Good Housekeeping, may be of help to young people in love and to their parents as well.

"Have You Forgotten About Love?" Family Circle, is another article concerning the marriage relationship.

"Teen Scene," a monthly feature of Family Circle, contains a good discussion of allowances, also the question of family baby-sitting.

AS OTHERS HEAR US

By William Patterson

WHILE PREACHING at the Walnut Park church recently, I noticed my sermon being recorded by wire recorder. This knowledge brought self-consciousness, and I became more cautious of my language, intonation, and diction. In the afternoon, the record was played back to me, and, as I listened I felt to paraphrase the words of the Scotch poet, Robert Burns: "Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us, to hear ourselves as others hear us."

I distinguished errors of which I knew I was not guilty, heard sounds from the congregation of which I was absolutely oblivious, and was surprised to think "I talked like that." Had I not known it was a record of myself, I would have thought it the voice of another. Listening to the record, I heard the disapproving cries of protest from babies, wriggling in the arms of embarrassed mothers, and pondered why Jesus said of them, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

The record left out nothing of good or ill. How frequently we have heard the expression, "You ought to hear yourself sometimes." That's a good idea. Wouldn't it be nice if each family had a wire recorder centrally placed in the home to make daily records to be "played back" in the evening. What would we hear—raucous grumbling, nervous complaining, harsh criticism, ingratitude, or impudence? Or would we hear sweet tones of well-modulated family life expressing appreciation, happiness, love, and unity?

When conditions, problems, and adverse attitudes make inroads into our matrimonial domain, wouldn't it be nice to have a recording of our wedding ceremony when with pleasant, vigorous, and triumphant voice we answered the minister's question regarding our life's covenant . . . "Yes!" . . . "I do." When forgetting God and our baptismal covenant, couldn't we use a recording of our baptismal ceremony and confirmation prayer to reaffirm these covenants of life's committal? When the somber daily family tasks make life appear drudgery, wouldn't it be helpful to hear again the minister bless that babe and its parents before the congregation? Wouldn't the prediction of promise enliven our hearts and bring faith, hope, and charity into our lives?

I wonder if heaven has a recording department, and the "recording angels" have the records of our lives filed away to be played back on the Judgment Day. If so, will it be possible to sneak into that filing room and "snip out" some of our records? No, I don't suppose so. We'll just have to be more careful with our recordings.

Jesus must have had this in mind when he said, "Every idle word shall be had in judgment." Again, "The words I speak the same shall judge you at the last day." He could have also said: "The words YOU SPEAK shall judge you at the last day, too."

Galesburg, Illinois, Church Dedicated

ABOUT 1916, Sister Leah Denton and several other Saints began holding church school in the Denton home. They continued to meet in the homes of various members, and the church school grew. Soon a fund was started to erect a meeting place, and Sister Nina Cook donated the lot on which to build.

On December 16, 1923, the branch was organized, and the congregation met in the basement of the church which had been started. Elder E. R. Davis was district president and Ed Jones was his assistant. John Garver was the apostle in charge. These three men conducted the organizational meeting. At one service, Frank Hendricks of Rio, Illinois, was ordained an elder and appointed to serve as pastor. There were seventy-one charter members. Today total membership is 136.

On May 29, 1949, Saints from all over the Rock Island District joined the Galesburg congregation in dedicating the church. President Israel A. Smith and Apostle D. T. Williams were present for this occasion. Pastor Ambrose King presented a clear deed of the building to Apostle Williams who accepted it in the name of the church. It was indeed a happy occasion for the Galesburg Saints to realize this dream of many years.

Life Span

Some go on having the time of their lives but robbing their lives of time. Others act as if living were a life-sentence pronounced on them at birth. Occasionally such afflicted ones try to escape by taking a dose of poison, thus attempting to steal a march on time. This is something we cannot rightfully do. We were not consulted about our coming here, and beyond behaving ourselves and being worthy of life, we haven't much to say regarding the length of time allotted us.

—Edith G. Beggs.

MONTANA DISTRICT.—District President V. W. Ditton and Brother Joe Ballantyne of Dore, North Dakota, made a trip through part of the district during the week end of June 4 and 5, holding services at Hindsdale, Montana, at the home of Brother John Hentz and visiting several Saints at Fort Peck and Glasgow, Montana. Sunday, Saints from Opheim and Fort Peck met with the group at Hindsdale.

DESELN, ILLINOIS. — Missionary Wayne Smith conducted a series of cottage meetings in Deselm, Kankakee, and Wilmington, Illinois, and Lowell, Indiana, during the month of April. On April 24, 1949, a baptismal service was held at the Central Chicago Church. Five candidates were baptized: Mrs. Elmer Kahler, Mrs. Remmel Rogers, Carol Ann Hanabarger, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Loverin. A beautiful confirmation service followed. Elders Earl D. Rogers, V. Leslie Rogers, Russel D. Rogers, and Elmer Kahler assisted Missionary Wayne Smith in the confirmations. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Loverin were also blessed. This service completed three family units. Elder Smith and family are now residing at 1054 South Fifth Avenue, Kankakee, Illinois.

ESCATAWPA, MISSISSIPPI. — A Leadership Training Convention for the Mississippi Region of the Gulf States District was conducted in Escatawpa on June 11 and 12. The theme was, "Building Better Latter Day Saint Family Life," as applied to the responsibility of every member. The workshop method of classwork was used and High Priest Franklin Steiner of Mobile, Alabama, directed the convention. He was assisted by District President W. J. Breshears of Pensacola, Florida, Elder Raymond L. Booker of Mobile, and Elder A. Nolle Barnes, Escatawpa pastor. The Escatawpa, Pascagoula, and Vanclave Branches and the Ocean Springs-Biloxi group were well represented in attendance.

HIBBARD, INDIANA.—Children's Day Sunday, June 12, will ever be a memorable occasion in the minds of everyone in the Hibbard Branch. For the first time in two years, baptisms were held. At eight o'clock in the morning in a beautiful setting at Lake Matinkentucky at Culver, Indiana, Mrs. Jane Brooker and Edward Smelser were baptized. The officiating minister was Priest John Smelser. At the church school hour, the children presented the service. Two children were blessed. At 11:00 a.m., the confirmation services took place with Elders J. W. McKnight, Buchanan, Michigan, and George Seamore, Glean, Michigan, officiating. At noon there was a basket dinner followed by a preaching service in the afternoon by Elder George Seamore. Preaching services were also held in the evening.

VANCLAVE, MISSISSIPPI. — The Vanclave Branch recently completed its first Summer Vacation Church School which was considered successful in every detail. The enrollment was thirty-five, composed of eighteen boys and seventeen girls. The daily average attendance was twenty-seven, twenty having perfect attendance records. The current cycle of Vacation Church School materials, "Stepping Stones to Zion," was used as the theme, and Mrs. Myrtle Jennings was the principal, being assisted by ten adult teachers and helpers. Vanclave is a rural branch in southern Mississippi, a part of the Gulf States District. Elder Albert G. Miller is the pastor.

District Missionary W. J. Breshears of Pensacola, Florida, conducted a series of missionary meetings here from May 29 to June 5 and baptized nine persons as a result. Those baptized were: Mrs. Mattie Howard Jennings, Robert Moe, Clyde Parrish, Sylvia Holden, William A. Tanner, Theodore R. Tanner, Mack S. Inabinette, Joseph McMillan, and Jo Ann Hawley.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO.—The eastern Colorado youth camp was held June 12 through 19 with forty-two campers and the staff present. Houston Hobart was the director and John Darling of the department of religious education was co-director and business manager. Ward Hougas, district president, was present for five days of the camp. One of the surprise features of the camp was a trip through the state penitentiary at Canon City. The fellowship service held Wednesday evening in the Garden of the Gods was an outstanding experience of the week. Campers came from Colorado, Kansas, and Wyoming. Other members of the staff included: Marguerite Eagan, music; Charles Claas, dramatic presentation and recreational program; Anne Claas, dining room and assistant music leader; Mildred Sheehy, campcraft; Richard Marolf, devotions and photography; Robert Fishburn, nature study and campfire assistant; Jo Anne Rutherford, R.N., nurse; Myrtle Stephenson and Grace Gates, cooks.

DES MOINES, IOWA.—A building, rent-free, recently procured in the Fort Des Moines area is housing the new mission of which Don Cackler is pastor. There are 900 families of young people and their children in the area.

The $30 previously paid for rent by this mission is going toward the building fund. A mission in West Des Moines has recently been opened. The group has outgrown the one room rented in the school building. When they went to the authorities, they procured at no extra price the use of a large room the size of the main auditorium in the Des Moines church, and also the use of a piano.

Sister Florence Freeburg directed a vacation church school beginning June 15, for eighty children in the Des Moines Branch. Thirty-eight people have been baptized in this branch since the first of the year. Eighteen more are ready.

RIDGEFIELD, WASHINGTON.—The Ridgefield Mission was organized into a branch Sunday, June 5. District President Jack Verhei presided, assisted by his associate, Miles Whiting. Invocation was given by Brother Walter Christensen from Bakersfield, California, a missionary for many years, who baptized many in this mission.

The following officers were elected: Pastor, Milton Becker; secretary, Phyllis Snead; treasurer and publicity, Ruth Phillips; church school director, Ralph Chapman; young people's leader, Roy Becker; women's leader, Edith (Kit) Chapman; music director, Shirley Phillips; librarian, Norma Becker; historian, Marguarite Kempe; social leader, Frances Roth; auditor, Charles Kempe; building committee, Robert Snead, John Roth, Jr., and Ralph Chapman.

It was voted unanimously to purchase a church building. There were sixty-eight present.

The Pastor's Pocket Manual for Hospital and Sickroom

By Edmond Holt Babbitt

Here is an indispensable aid in an essential and exacting part of the pastoral ministry—a pocket-sized manual for use at the bedside of the sick. The selections are in logical, usable order—in a design as dignified as a small New Testament and printed in large type.

Hymn Meditation

By ALETA RUNKLE

*Our God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal home.*

Isaac Watts.

The records speak on and on. You have healed the sick, comforted the sorrowful, relieved the oppressed. You have made the blind to see, the deaf to hear, the lame to walk.

Generations have died and been replaced. Empires have flourished and decayed. But the eternal God spans the æons of time. The one sure refuge of strength lives on. Though all about us should change, we need not fear. "Our God, our help in ages past" is near.

OUR HOPE FOR YEARS TO COME

You were there then; you are here now; you will be there tomorrow.

The caprices of men will change. Tomorrow will be different. Men will wear away, struggling to legislate right. The sons of Satan will poison thinking. Evil will augment its destructive forces. Rumbblings of war shall weary the oppressed. Civil strife shall seethe in the land. Men shall starve. The earth, itself, will writhe in unrest, heaving in quakes and volcanoes. So the prophets have said. When these come, it may seem as if you had forgotten. But you will stand on the thousand hills. Your hand will reach down to your children; your ear will bend to their prayers. To those who will look up, you will speak peace.

We read further from the vision of the prophets for the years to come. Those who will hear your voice will be called to Zion. And it shall be as Enoch's city—unconquerable, indestructible. The power of righteousness shall make its walls impregnable. Within its gates, Zion will be untouched by the ravaging forces without. The land will

From before the world You were there. You and the Son stood on the rim of Creation and looked through the years. You knew we would need you. You could read the eternal annals of history.

We can only look back to what past ages have written. We see your mighty hand stretched over the centuries. You were the comfort of Adam, the voice of Enoch, the strength of Moses. You heard the cry of the penitent, exalted the lowly, succored the distressed. When Adam called, you spoke quickly. To Enoch, you gave bold speech—rivers turned to new channels; mountains humbled into valleys at his word, and the unbelieving trembled in his presence—all because you spoke through the mouth of Enoch. No foe dared charge the gates of Enoch's city. Enemies learned that the mighty God stood in the legions of Zion.

When all other men forgot, there was Noah. So few of all the earth remembered—just his family. Those eight would seem such a profitless gain. Cast them away with the others and begin anew. But you are not only the shield of the mighty, but the guard of the few. If all the earth but one should rot in sin, you would be his defender. You would not leave him alone.

You heard the cries of the Israelites in their bondage and remembered the covenant with their fathers. For their deliverance you plagued the Egyptians, turned rivers to blood, cast up a highway in the midst of the seas. You sheltered their band with cloud by day and fire by night. When they murmured, you showered manna upon them. When they turned from you to their old gods, you chastised, but did not forsake them.

When the Jaredite barges were swallowed in the sea, you preserved them. You lighted their ships with your finger. For 344 days you directed the winds toward the promised land. Not once did they cease blowing nor change direction.

You walked with Lehi's family through the wilderness and made their raw meat sweet to them. You pleaded with them in their iniquities. You stood at Nephi's side and taught him to build a ship. You were always there to help.

be fruitful and abundantly supply of its strength. There will be no want, no envy, no greed. There will be no war; the redeemed will live in peace. The city shall be known with fear in all the earth because you stand on Mount Zion. You shall speak from her towers and from Jerusalem in a mighty voice that shall reach to island outposts. At your command the waters shall flow back; barren deserts shall bloom; mountains shall crumble. The wicked who sought to destroy your words shall be consumed. Zion shall stand triumphant.

All of this we see in the words of the prophets. Our faith is stronger; our joy increased. We bow our hearts now to you, "our God, our hope for years to come."

OUR SHELTER FROM THE STORMY BLAST

Just now we are afraid, God. We are afraid of tomorrow. There may be war, depression, unexpected personal tragedy. We face pain. Some are afraid of loneliness. We may be hungry, ill-clothed. We feel we might not survive the shock of such disasters. These "storms of life" appall us.

Of all people, we of your church should know our "shelter from the stormy blast." We should be a people of faith, of quiet assurance. When vexing problems distress, teach us to lean on you. We should let our optimism be contagious. We need to speak in tones of hope with confident conviction that you will hear our cries.

We may not escape all of the unhappiness we should like. As long as we live among the conditions of greed and unequal distribution, we shall be subject to price fluctuations and faulty workmanship. In a world of crime, we cannot expect to remain untouched. In wars, we too shall suffer. If we were gathered in Zion, you could shield us more freely from political corruption, economic injustice, and international disasters. We are slow to hear. We are as the Israelites who turned away so often in the wilderness. But in days past, you have eased our pains—even as those of the Israelites. You have sheltered us from misfortune and disaster. You have been our guardian and our guide.

You have said that Zion shall be. Through the ages the word has gone forth from your mouth and not returned unto you void. We can safely trust in this promise. We can give time, energy, and money to build the walls. We need not be afraid. Our God shall shelter us from the stormy blast.

AND OUR ETERNAL HOME

Time now is but an hour of eternity. We shall live in other days. We shall walk with Abraham, Jacob, and John and talk with them of the good things. Your radiance will be everywhere. It will shine in the thoughts we speak; it will brighten the smiles of those we meet. We shall be stimulated to new understanding. The quest of curiosity shall be appeased; the thirst of unknown mystery shall be satisfied. We shall have much to learn—new exciting discoveries to make. Each unfolding secret will hold the joy of unlocked treasure.

There can come no harm, no pain, no ills to plague our spirit. We shall be strong in the power of immortality. There will be no unhappiness in all the land. Singing and laughter shall praise your holy name. Love shall weld the bonds of the kingdom. Men shall speak without anger. There shall be no hatred, no malice. Content shall expand each soul.

There shall be no fear. We shall trust in your strength. You are the everlasting God, our Maker, our Redeemer. Your eye pierces the heavens; your hand holds creation. Of whom shall we be afraid? Surely goodness and mercy shall follow us all the days of our lives, and we will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

What Comes Naturally?

By Warren Chelline

There are many activities which, although they might be considered "natural," are still repulsive to us. I suppose the natural way to eat our dinner would be to use our fingers, instead of knives and forks. In fact, if we were to eat our food really naturally, we would snatch what appeals to us, crawl off to a dark corner of the forest, and gorge ourselves into a stupor. Then, when sufficiently thirsty, we would fling ourselves into the nearest puddle, and gulp great draughts of water.

But we have learned that it is much pleasanter to sit down to a table and try to remember our manners. The beastly behavior, which might be considered more natural, has become unnatural; the more refined standard has become desirable.

And so it is "natural" for men to be selfish, proud, cruel, and vindictive. But the institution of the church is designed to help folks stop doing what comes naturally, and substitute such "unnatural" virtues as love and humility.

When a savage goes courting, he picks an attractive maid, clubs her to insensibility, then drags her off by the hair to his cave. That's the "natural" way to do it! But a modern swain, treating his lady friend with gentle affection, keeps asking, "Wilt thou?" until she finally wilts. Devious and "unnatural"—but much more acceptable in these days.

Let us practice the "unnatural" way of the gospel of Christ until it becomes the most natural thing in the world.

The test of good manners is being able to put up pleasantly with bad ones.

DEATHS

SEVERY.—Fred A., died June 11, 1949, at his home in Clayton, California, at the age of ninety-eight. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church for about fifty-six years. Born in Boston, Massachusetts, he came to California with his parents when he was a little over a year old, crossing the Isthmus of Panama on muleback, then taking a steamer to San Francisco. He spent his childhood in Stockton, California, entering the newspaper business in 1895. Newspapers which he published or served in an executive capacity include the Mill Valley Enterprise, Calaveras Prospect of San Andreas, Santa Cruz Surf, Santa Cruz Sentinel, Stockton Mail, Stockton Independent, and the Sacramento Record Union. He loved poetry and was a frequent contributor to the Herald. He also worked in the state printing office and served as a printing consultant throughout California. Mrs. Severy preceded him in death.

Surviving are five sons: Albert D. and Delmar of Oakland; Fred A., Jr., and Frank of Albany, California; and Chesley of Clayton; two daughters: Mrs. Thomas McKee of Berkeley, California, and Mrs. Earl C. McMoran of Richmond, California; a sister, Mrs. Amy Potter of Stockton; fifteen grandchildren; and twelve great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held in Oakland.

BUTTS.—Joseph Edgar, son of Dennis and Polly Butts, was born April 14, 1866, near Moorhead, Iowa, and died at his home in Decatur, Nebraska, on April 27, 1949. He was married to Lucina Williams on February 23, 1889; eleven children were born to them. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1878, was ordained a teacher on September 11, 1892, and an elder on May 28, 1899. He served as pastor of the Decatur Branch for many years.

He is survived by his wife, Lucina; four daughters: Mrs. Alta Mann, Miss Ethel Butts, and Mrs. Eunice Robinson of Decatur, and Mrs. Iris Taylor of Ottumwa, Iowa; three sons: Stephen of Missouri Valley, Iowa; Orrin of Lamoni, Iowa; and Derrel of Red Oak, Iowa. The other four children died in infancy. Funeral services were held in the little white church he built forty-nine years ago in Decatur. Elders A. L. Livingston and Lester Hunt officiating. Interment was in the Hillcrest Cemetery in Decatur.

ROBINSON.—James, son of Sarah and James Robinson, was born May 7, 1873, at Geneseo, Illinois, and died May 28, 1949, at his home in Melcher, Iowa. On October 3, 1895, he was united in marriage to Hattie Saker; one daughter was born to them. A member of the Reorganized Church, he was ordained a priest in 1914 and an elder in 1916.

He is survived by his wife; his daughter, Edith Swanson; three grandchildren; and two great-grandchildren. Robert Zimmerman was in charge of the funeral service. Burial was in the Graceland Cemetery in Lucas County.

SKINNER.—William Harvey, was born in McClelland County, Texas, on August 17, 1887, and died May 28, 1949, at the Booth Hospital at Covington, Kentucky. He joined the Reorganized Church in 1896 and was married to Dora Hargis. Four children were born to them. He was in the plumbing business for many years until ill health forced him to retire.

He is survived by his wife, Dora; a daughter, Juanita; three sons: Dexter, Weldon, and Jule; four sisters: Ella Richardson, May Richardson, Eva Edwards, and Mary Gravatt; and three grandchildren. Services were conducted by Elder Claude Barker of Middletown, Ohio, at the Connley Funeral Home in Latonia, Kentucky.

HOLMAN.—Susan Emer Jarvis, was born October 9, 1854, in Marion County, Illinois, and died April 17, 1949, at Wayne City, Illinois. She united with the Reorganized Church early in life and was an active worker in the church school and music department. She was married on November 21, 1878, to Lafe Holman, who died in 1885.

Surviving are three sons: Ira Holman, Wayne City; Mark Holman, Independence, Missouri; and Lyle Holman, Grayville, Illinois. Funeral services were held in Wayne City. Elders Harry Henson and Sylvester Coleman officiating. Interment was in the Powers Cemetery in Xenia, Illinois.

CRAVEN.—Anna Marie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. L. Taylor, was born November 25, 1896, in Myrtle Point, Oregon, and died June 1, 1949, at the Mast Hospital in Myrtle Point, where she had lived her entire life. For thirty-four years she had served the community as a telephone operator, part of that time as chief operator. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 4, 1908; for years she was branch secretary, teacher, and director of music. On February 25, 1929, she was married to Milton Craven; one son, Melborn, was born to this union.

Beside her husband and son, she leaves a sister, Mrs. Tella Hall of Coquille, Oregon, and a half-sister, Mrs. Thomas Dickson of Myrtle Point. Funeral services were held in the Schroeding Mortuary, Elder J. S. Giberson officiating. Interment was in the Myrtle Point cemetery.

BURTON.—Wilfred George, son of Wilfred and Fern Burton, and grandson of Joseph and Emma Burton, was born February 24, 1917, at Los Angeles, California, and died August 9, 1944, from wounds received in action against the enemy when the B-17, of which he was navigator, was shot down over Germany. Final records show that death came following a leg amputation at a hospital in Komarno, Hungary. Bill, as he was known to his family and friends, was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1925. He came to Independence, Missouri, with his parents in March, 1931. Here he was graduated from William Chrisman High School in 1935. On Easter Sunday, 1938, he was married to Gayle Dolores Payne. He enlisted in the Air Corps in November, 1942, and was called to active duty on February 4, 1943. He left for overseas on July 2, 1944, with the rating of second lieutenant. Official notification of his presumed death was received by his family in December, 1947. His body was removed from its temporary grave in Czechoslovakia and brought to Independence on May 28, 1949. He had been awarded the Oak Leaf Cluster and Purple Heart Medal.

He is survived by his wife, Gayle Burton Suydam, and his son, Billy Junior, who was born after his death, both of Lebanon, Missouri; his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred Burton of Independence; his grandmother, Mrs. G. W. Nimmo of Santa Ana, California; and other relatives. Services were held at the Speaks Funeral Home in Independence, Patriarchs L. J. Ostertag and Elbert A. Smith officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

THORNTON.—John, son of John and Ann Thornton, was born August 23, 1863, at Bloomington, Wisconsin, and died in Winterset, Iowa, on May 4, 1949. He was married on September 27, 1892 to Fannie Lhommedieu; three children were born to them. Mrs. Thornton and one child, Elza, preceded him in death. He became a member of the Reorganized Church while living in Colo, Iowa, and was later ordained to the office of elder. He spent the last seventeen years of his life in a wheelchair.

He is survived by a daughter, Mary Estella, with whom he made his home; a son, Reuby John Thornton of Wichita, Kansas; two brothers: James Thornton of Colo and Will Thornton of Bloomington, Wisconsin; a sister, Mrs. Agnes Handy of Mason City, Iowa; and two grandchildren. Funeral services were held in Colo, with Asa Smith of Winterset in charge. Burial was at Colo.

DAGGETT.—Clyde Otis, was born on September 18, 1884, in Glendorado, Minnesota, and died on May 2, 1949, at Santa Barbara, California, where he had made his home for the past twenty-seven years. A member of the Reorganized Church, he was serving as church school director at the time of his death. He had been maintenance man of the Peter Cooper Bryce estate, where he was held in high regard.

He is survived by his wife, Clara Mae; two sons: Beauford L. and Clyde O., Jr.; a daughter, Mrs. Margarite Byers all of Santa Barbara; a brother, Merton Daggett; and a sister, Mrs. Irma Dennison, both of Monterey Park, California; and seven grandchildren. The funeral was held at the Welsh and Ryce Chapel, Evangelist Louis J. Ostertag officiating. Interment was in the Goleta, California, cemetery.

BAILEY.—John William, son of Patriarch and Mrs. J. J. Bailey, was born March 3, 1884, at Brown City, Michigan, and died May 15, 1949, at a hospital in Sandusky, Michigan. He had been visiting friends and relatives in Michigan for several weeks. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church as a boy and was a regular attendant and supporter of the church throughout his life. On January 9, 1910, he was married to Celia Ann Hopkins. He had made his home in Independence, Missouri, since 1920.

He is survived by his wife of the home in Independence; two sons: William Elmer, also of the home, and Everett (by a former marriage) of Independence; two daughters: Mrs. Vernetta Morgan of Dearborn, Michigan, and Mrs. Duelda Dutzel of Independence; three sisters: Mrs. Margaret Johnson of Midland, Michigan; Mrs. Emma DesJardines and Mrs. Maude Wilson of Sandusky; two brothers: Frank Willard of Port Huron, Michigan, and Robert Herman of Carsonville, Michigan; and one grandchild. Funeral services were conducted at Sandusky by Elders James Phillips and Harold Muir, and at the Walnut Park Church in Independence, Evangelists William Patterson and James W. Davis officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery in Independence.

MELLINGER.—Ellen L., died at the home of her son, Theodore Mellinger, in Dawson, Rhode Island, on April 12, 1949, at the age of sixty-eight. Her husband, Joseph A. Mellinger, preceded her in death nearly two years ago.

Surviving are five sons: Theodore of Dawson; Raymond of Vanderbilt; Henry of Connellsville, Pennsylvania; Lewis of Layton, Pennsylvania; and Dwaine of Guy's Mills, Pennsylvania; five daughters: Mrs. Maude

Harris and Mrs. Leona Carlson of Connellsville; Mrs. Edith Gidley of Morgantown, West Virginia; Mrs. Keturah Lynn and Mrs. Gertrude Swesey of Dunbar; two brothers: Joseph Maxon of Perryopolis, Rhode Island, and Alma Maxon of Delislow, West Virginia; four sisters: Mrs. Rose Meredith of Salem, West Virginia; Mrs. Pearl Whitring and Mrs. Melvina Davis of Morgantown; and Mrs. Emma King of Fairmont, West Virginia; her step-mother, Mrs. Agnes Maxon of Morgantown; twenty-nine grandchildren; and ten great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the home of her son, Priest J. W. Winters and Elder Samuel Winship officiating. Interment was in the Mt. Washington Cemetery in Perryopolis.

* FULLER BRUSH MAN

It is always fun to see a legend in the making. Who knows but some day, the Fuller Brush Man, like the cowboy, the Indian, Paul Bunyan, and Johnny Appleseed, will become the subject of books and light operas?

Down in the pretty Ozarks of south Missouri, the legend is still in the making. In one large area of the country, there is no ambulance, and none of the natives have a car large enough to carry a really sick patient over the miles of mountain roads to a hospital. There is just one car suitable for this job, and everybody knows it by sight a long way off. It is the car of the Fuller Brush Man.

The story reads like the Parable of the Good Samaritan. For the Fuller Brush Man gets many a call that, while not in the line of duty, is certainly in the column of mercy, and he always comes when he is needed. He isn't satisfied with the first visit. He goes back to visit the patients, to see how they are, and to encourage them.

Perhaps this story will get back to the home office; perhaps not. If it does, it will add another little chapter to the growing legend of a memorable American character.

* HOW TO WRITE POETRY

Some years ago I saw an advertisement in an author's magazine offering poet's supplies for sale. Judge me if you will, but that is my bait, and I'm the kind of a fellow who bites for it. There was a special "poet's pencil" with very soft lead. Yes, indeed, it would need to be very soft for me, and a big eraser on the other end. I would need a whopper there.

They also had some poet's paper—thick and tough for hard usage. I was broke at the time, or I would have put in a supply big enough for a new version of "Paradise Lost." As it was, I didn't get any. Perhaps that is the reason why I have never written any good verse.

How do you write poetry? Almost anybody knows how, though few manage to do it. You can make your own formula. In case you're interested, here is mine.

First, you write something on a piece of paper. Anything will do for a beginning, because, second, the next thing to do is erase it. Repeat this three or four times until the paper is a ruin, when you discard it and start with a fresh sheet. Or maybe that's wrong. A famous American woman poet never starts a poem on a fresh sheet of paper—its vast terrible blankness frightens her. She much prefers to get an old scrap of paper that already has something written or printed on it, and go squiggling her lines down the margins like interlopers.

Anyway, you keep writing and erasing and changing papers until you are disgusted with the whole business. Then you tear it all up and go fishing. This point is critical. If you can keep your mind on fishing, you were never meant to be a poet. Just keep fishing and never go back to poetry again. The fish may outwit you, but that won't matter.

However, if fishing seems utterly innocuous, unimportant, and inane—and if the poetry keeps troubling your mind, you are a doomed man. Go back to your pencils and paper. There is no cure for you.

Well, this is the parting of the ways. That's a mighty nice fly rod. What will you take for it? I think I know a pool where there's a speckled trout waiting for exactly the right kind of a temptation. Good-by!

Jesus Christ Among the Ancient Americans

by PAUL M. HANSON

A notable book that you'll want to have on your bookshelves. The purpose of this work is to focus attention upon evidences from some of the foremost authorities in the field of American archaeology in relation to the BOOK OF MORMON. This not only represents authority and years of research so far as the manuscript is concerned, but it is a fine piece of printing. A full color photograph appears in the front of this new edition.

Let Us Worship

by CHRIS B. HARTSHORN

A manual of helps, interpretations, and plans for leaders of worship, ministers, department leaders, parents, and all who assist in worship services or seek to understand the spirit of worship. The book is not limited to any one age group, but may be used with equal benefit in the several departments of church work, for women's groups, organized classes, and family worship. It is appropriate for all general worship situations.

The first six chapters discuss the nature and functions of worship and the philosophy back of it.

The other fourteen chapters give suggestions and specific helps on such subjects as: the call to worship, prayer, music, drama, pictures, the offering, planning services, the "worship center," and the use of the Scriptures.

News & Notes

WE ARE HAPPY to present this issue of the Saints' Herald as a tribute to our work and our membership in Australasia. The idea was developed when President John Garver and Bishop Walter Johnson were in Australia. A letter written to Brother Garver suggested he solicit the staff of The Standard to provide the lead articles. While these brethren responded promptly and well, some unexpected circumstances have delayed the publication of the issue.

Elder Hermann Peisker, mission president, wrote his editorial, came to America for a few months' labor and to attend the October, 1948, Conference, and died August 5, 1948. President Garver made his contribution with great difficulty because of the illness from which he died on March 3, 1949. In this issue is presented the last messages of these two stalwarts to the church.

We want the church to know more about this important mission and those to whom the church is so greatly indebted for its sturdy growth. We salute the Australasian Saints, particularly those of the ministry.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

Introducing...

CHARLES A. DAVIES (page 5) was born in Perth on March 4, 1906, and married Elsa V. E. Alberts in 1929. They have two children: Marjorie Elsa, 18; and Robin Charles, 16.

Brother Davies was graduated from the Unley High School in 1922, and attended the Victoria Training School for Teachers. He obtained his certificate in 1925. During the next four years he taught and also acted as senior housemaster at Hale School, Western Australia, until he entered general church appointment in 1929.

Brother Davies was ordained a priest in 1928, an elder in 1929, a high priest in 1941. He served the church as appointee-pastor at Adelaide, Brisbane, Auckland (New Zealand), and Newcastle City area, which consists of four congregations. He is a member of the district presidency, and acted as mission interim-president prior to the arrival of Apostle Davey.

Brother Davies is associate editor of The Standard, and author of the Church Member's Manual, which was first published in Australia and later printed by Herald House. He is founder of the "developing institution known as Wandell College." This provides periodic training courses in residence for young people over sixteen years old.

ALAN S. FRATER (page 10) was born in New Hebrides, South Pacific, on May 11, 1909. He was married to Sylvia Jacka on August 27, 1938. They have two children: Maurice, 10; and Alison Ruth, 7.

Brother Frater received his academic training from Scotch College, Melbourne, finishing in 1925. He then went on to Melbourne Teachers College, where he received his certificate in 1929. He followed the teaching profession for twelve years.

He worked at the church headquarters in Sydney from 1942 to 1946, when he received his General Conference appointment. He is the mission director of religious education, managing editor of The Standard, and statistician for the Australian Mission. He is a high priest and counselor to the president of the South N. S. W. District.

DONALD A. ALBERTS (page 13) was born in Adelaide, South Australia, in 1915. In 1938 he married Marjorie Franklin. They have three children: Ian, 8; Betty, 6; Nancy, 5.

Brother Alberts' training has been in the professions of salesmanship and engineering. He was ordained a priest in 1935, an elder in 1940, a high priest in 1945, and a bishop in 1948, while attending the General Conference. He accompanied Elder Hermann Peisker to America and was with him during his last illness just prior to the Conference.

AUSTRALASIAN MISSIONARY INTEREST

There is a definite upswing of missionary interest in the Australasian Field, according to a report from President F. Henry Edwards. Elder Floyd Burdekin, recently appointed, is busy at Tuncurry, New South Wales, and reports good interest. At Campsie, in the same district, five have been baptized and more are expected to join the church soon. Brother Vivian Sorensen, recently transferred to Australia from the South Sea Islands, is busy in the north and has some baptisms to his credit. Brother John Imrie, another recent appointee, is finding good support among the branch officers and members at Adelaide and is developing a promising missionary endeavor. Elder Sydney Jacka has recently held services in Carnegie and Bendigo with good results.

BAPTISMS IN OTTAWA

Evangelist John R. Grice reports that he had a very successful series of meetings at Ottawa, Canada, in the forepart of June, at the close of which six were baptized in the Ottawa River.

PRESIDENT EDWARDS ATTENDS GROUND-BREAKING

President F. Henry Edwards was in Topeka, Kansas, on June 26, to attend the ground-breaking ceremony for the new Reorganized Latter Day Saints church there. He preached at the morning service, at which Saints from Manhattan and Lawrence, Kansas, were guests of the Topeka congregation. After a basket lunch, the dedication service was held in the afternoon. Clifford Christensen is the branch president.

DARLING AT YOUTH CAMP IN MICHIGAN

John Darling of the Department of Religious Education spent the week of June 27 at the Park of the Pines Youth Camp in Michigan, as director of the camp. Others from Independence, Missouri, who were members of the staff included Aleta Runkle, campfires, and Marge Hulmes, camp nurse. During the week end of June 26, Brother Darling was in Kalamazoo, Michigan, for a Religious Education institute.

LARGE ORIOLE CAMP

Miss Edna Easter, director of girls' work in the Department of Religious Education, headed the staff of the two girls' camps held at Gardner Lake, near Excelsior Springs, Missouri. The first camp, June 25 to July 2, had ninety campers and a staff of seventeen. The second camp, July 2 to 9, had registrations on the Wednesday previous of about seventy-five campers. Most of the girls attending these camps are Oriole girls, though any church girl of junior high age is welcome.

SUCCESSFUL YOUTH CAMP AT EXCELSIOR SPRINGS

One of the largest enrollments ever had for youth camp at Gardner Lake was for the second camp, June 18 to 25. There were fifty-four campers, plus the staff. Carl Mesle was camp director of both camps. One of the most enjoyable activities for the campers was fly-fishing. Russ Pearson, business manager the second week, caught the largest fish on his first try, a two-pound bass.

APOSTLE HOLMES AT REUNION

Apostle Reed Holmes left July 2 for his first reunion assignment, Camp Horizon, Arkansas City, Kansas. Other members of the staff will include J. D. Anderson, president of Kansas City Stake, Bishop Earl T. Higdon of Far West Stake, Myron LaPointe, pastor of Wichita, Kansas, Branch, and Elbert A. Schmidt, president of Kansas District.

Australia Greet America

THE CONTINENT OF AUSTRALIA comprises some of the most ancient land surface of the globe. It was separated from other land surfaces very early in the geological history of the earth and developed types of animal, bird, and plant life unknown elsewhere.

The fact that the Australian aborigines constructed no homes, built no cities, extracted no gold, silver, or precious stones from the earth, and developed no civilization beyond that of roving tribes, enabled them to live in security and freedom from invasion by more cultured races who might have coveted their possessions.

As a result, the island continent of the Southern Hemisphere was not only the latest to be discovered by the European explorers but also the latest to be colonized and developed as one of the outposts of the British Empire.

Due to its isolation and distance from the older civilizations, its growth to nationhood has been slow. Other countries and colonies received the greater number of emigrants who sought asylum, freedom of conscience, worship, et cetera.

FIRST MISSIONARIES

Soon after the British Isles received the ambassadors of the Restoration and the work became established there, the minds of latter-day apostles turned toward the sparsely-populated land where the main settlements were just beginning to advance beyond the status of penal colonies. Men and women with the pioneering spirit were emigrating in large numbers, and groups from the same neighborhoods settled in the same localities in Australia.

In the year 1840, Australia welcomed the first missionary of the Restoration when William Barrett was sent from the British Isles Mission to this land by Apostle George A. Smith. Of the work accomplished by Brother Barrett, we fail to find any record today.

A few years later, William Anderson was sent to Australia and was successful in establishing the first known branch at Montpelier, Wellington, New South Wales, in 1845.

During the dark and cloudy days, many families of Saints emigrated to Australia and settled in the Northern Rivers district of New South Wales. With the usurpation of Brigham Young and the establishment of Salt Lake City and Utah as the Land of Promise, the majority of these Saints remained only a short time and, as shipping became available, returned to Utah.

THE BLIGHT OF POLYGAMY

It was a sad day for many Latter Day Saints when news began to be published of the establishment of polygamy as a doctrine and practice of the church in Utah. Most refuted the charges, and many decided to make Australia their permanent home.

In 1852, Elder C. W. Wandell was President of the Australasian Colonies Mission, and it was not long before the "constant influx of Australio-Californians who are . . . more or less prejudiced against us by California newspaper stories" caused him to write, "During my absence at Melbourne, many base lies were told of the Saints in Zion, and with so much plausibility, that I was obliged to return and refute them."

In 1853 he left the Australasian Mission. On his return to Utah he discovered the rumors he had heard were not far short of the truth. He turned aside from the latter-day work for many years and engaged in business. The work in Australia was

ELDER WANDELL RETURNS

The "Isles of the Sea" were never forgotten of the Lord, and in April, 1873, he gave the name of C. W. Wandell as one to be set apart to labor as a Seventy. It was not until some months later that the one man already equipped by experience for work in Australia was discovered, brought into the Reorganization, and informed of his commission.

Shortly afterwards, he was appointed in company with Elder Glaud Rodger, and after delays and missionary work in the Society Islands, on January 22, 1874, they stepped ashore in Sydney. Australia greeted the first missionaries of the Reorganization to her shores without demonstration.

Elder Wandell immediately contacted his old friends, eager to inform them of the Brigham Young usurpation and the apostasy of the Utah church. He remained in Sydney during the short period of his life and brought a number of the early Saints into the Reorganization. Elder and Sister Ellis and others later held membership in the Balmain Branch.

It was logical that Glaud Rodger, who had united with the church in Scotland, and who had turned from the apostate church when he went to Utah and discovered the evils being taught and practiced there, should go to the Newcastle and North Coast areas where the Saints from England, who refused to go to Utah, had settled.

Before long he organized the Report of Status of Houses of Worship Revolving Fund

Recently we placed in the hands of the First Presidency and each member of the Quorum of Twelve an analysis and summarization of the Houses of Worship Revolving Fund. We think the following information will be of interest to the membership of the church:

Total appropriation to the fund	$400,000.00
Total loans made up to May 26, 1949	273,215.00
Amounts repaid up to May 26, 1949	35,535.40
Total amount on hand as of May 26, 1949	162,320.40

Of this amount there have been actual commitments as of the same date, of $40,600.00, which would have left a balance available to loan of $121,720.40. However, there are applications in hand, some of which have been approved, and others of which are eligible for approval, amounting to $177,750.00, which would leave a shortage of $56,029.60, if all applications now on hand were to be approved. This means that new applications will be approved only as loans are repaid to this fund.

The $273,215.00 was made up of forty-seven loans, which would make an average of over $5,800.00 per loan, and covered congregations in twenty-two states and provinces of the United States, Canada, and Hawaii. In addition to this, supplementary loans have been made from the Houses of Worship Loan Fund (not the Revolving Fund) totaling $157,406.81, at an average of $5,621.67. These loans covered congregations in sixteen states and provinces.

Undoubtedly there are many other congregations that are in need of this type of assistance, but it is obvious that if they are to receive such help, it will be contingent upon the repayment of the loans already made to other congregations. It seems highly essential that we call this to the attention of stake, district, and branch officers, urging all groups to meet payments as they are due, and if possible to make additional payments during these present years when conditions are more favorable than they may be at a later time. The whole purpose of this Revolving Fund was to ease the burden of congregations in need of church facilities that had not been provided during the years of depression and the period of war.

We advise strongly against congregations obligating themselves to outside indebtedness. We believe it will be possible for the church to meet most of these situations through the Revolving Fund established, if every congregation to whom a loan has been made will assume responsibility for repayment even beyond the stipulations of the agreement with our office. It is unfortunate that the loan fund is not sufficient to meet all the present needs, but it is quite apparent that much good has been accomplished through the appropriations made for this purpose.

The placing of these funds has imposed a heavy responsibility upon the general officers concerned, and it has not been possible in all instances to satisfy all parties concerned, but we believe that equitable distribution has been made, and it is our hope that the fund will continue to serve the interests of the church as a whole.

Respectfully submitted,
THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC,
By G. L. DeLapp.

Elder Roy A. Cheville was in Birmingham, England, from Oxford, the week end of June 19. He reports an inspiring women's rally of the Southern District, with Sister C. W. Allen in charge.

When Brother Cheville wrote, Apostle Jensen had already left England for Scandinavia, but before doing so had "done everything one could wish" to make Brother Cheville's visit profitable and enjoyable.

Dr. Cheville was in Holland the week of July 2 and then went on into Germany where he has an interesting and helpful schedule worked out. He reminds us that English Mission Day is being celebrated at Nuneaton on July 31 this year in place of the reunion which cannot be held because of adverse local circumstances. We shall be glad to have the Saints throughout the church keep the British Saints in mind at this time.

Elder V. D. Ruch of Council Bluffs, writes:

June was a month of baptisms in the Council Bluffs Branch. At our three baptismal services, a total of thirty-four people were baptized. On June 8, four were baptized; on June 12 (Children's Day), twenty-three united with the church, and on June 29, seven more were baptized. Of these thirty-four, twenty-seven were children, three were married people, and the other four were young people. The Underwood Branch also used our font one evening for baptizing seven new members. One of the candidates with the Underwood group became a member of the Council Bluffs Branch and will attend here. Crescent Branch also baptized two children in our font last Wednesday evening.

We were pleased to have Apostle P. M. Hanson with us on Sunday evening, June 26; he delivered an illustrated lecture on his recent tour in South America. His lecture, titled, "Among Ruins of Ancient Civilizations in Peru and Bolivia," was enjoyed by a large Sunday night attendance. Brother Hanson has been fortunate in getting many good pictures of those South American ruins. They will be a valuable addition to the visual aids of the church.

The Church in Australia

By Charles A. Davies

IT IS MORE than seventy-five years since Charles Wesley Wandell and Glaud Rodger came to our shores with the message of the Restoration as interpreted by the Reorganization. From the first members—the two or three good souls who were old contacts of Brother Wandell when he was in our country before—to the membership of the church in Australia today—some 3,000 souls—is a long story. This story is covered somewhat in another article in this issue of the Herald. I shall try only to give you a picture of the church operating in Australia today.

OUR RELATIONSHIP

One fact Australians would like to emphasize is that despite the variation in temperament and culture—differing naturally from our cousins who, like us, moved away from the parent stock in Britain—there is in our hearts a sense of belonging to the common brotherhood of the church in all the world. That common bond is deeper than anything else.

It may appear to a visitor that Latter Day Saints here are first of all Australians. That might be because differences are most observable at first. It may even be true of some of us who have not yet fully caught the vision of the Zionite hope, but wherever the message of the Restoration Movement is truly appreciated among us, I am sure we are first of all Christians in outlook and Saints in faith, which characteristic knows no boundaries of land or sea, of color or political allegiance. Members of the church in Australia may live and think as British subjects, but with this difference our national loyalties are absorbed in an all-embracing loyalty to the King of kings whose kingdom we aim to establish with his aid.

EXTENT

The leadership in Australia, therefore, is endeavoring today to cultivate this sense of oneness with church members throughout all the world. There are, naturally the problems of variation in cultures, calling for understanding in the attempt to follow the lead from our American headquarters. Differences in such details as would be observable between our country and another are also evident between sections of our own nation, because of the vast extent of our continent which has a similar area to that of the United States. Scattered over an area of three million square miles, our church membership of 3,000 operates in forty-five congregational centers. Again we have a variation in types of groups. There are nineteen city congregations, seventeen in country towns, and nine in rural districts; these, in turn, range in membership from the largest branch of almost 400 to a branch with little more than twenty.

REGIONAL DISTRIBUTION

A large proportion of our membership is centered in the eastern states, where organization into districts is possible as in the United States. The largest district is that of Southern New South Wales which has a membership of about 1,000, while in the district comprising the state of Victoria, there are 560 members. The third district, Northern New South Wales, numbers 400. Some 500 Saints are gathered into branches that, because of location, cannot be given district affiliation. These members remain under the general supervision of the mission presidency. Several hundred who do not live within reach of the normal functions of a branch or group remain on a roll of isolated members.

Australia faces the common problem of having a working force at least one third below that of actual enrollment. Thus, with the rest of the church, we are challenged to sincere participation in the program of Zion.

LOCAL ORGANIZATION

The organization of our local work in Australia is planned on the lines set out by the General Church. There may be some lag between the work here and the more advanced program of the Center Place because of our geographical isolation. Any retardation in this respect should, in the future, become less with the development of speedy transportation and mail communication. Independence today is no further away in time than some country towns were a very short while ago. The regular organization of the branch is operating in all our churches, with the pastor and priesthood serving in ministerial capacity with the aid of the church school and other departments and groups. In two areas, Newcastle and Brisbane, urban areas form a composite branch for more efficient operation as in certain cities of America.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

The fillip given to the program from the training of leadership in the various sections of church life has found progressive response in Australia. Throughout the mission there is a growing corps of workers both of priesthood and lay members with some degree of training for their tasks. This is especially encouraged in church school work by the Mission Department of Religious Education. Wherever possible—and particularly in the organized areas—some opportunity is offered from time to time for sound technical help in the field of teaching and ministry. From headquarters in Sydney, New South Wales, considerable help is given by the mission director through brochures and counsel. Some personal mission coverage has been possible by this minister, who associates his task with his missionary appointment. Elder Frater has encouraged all workers to qualify for standards of credit with the General Department of Religious Education. Reunions are providing a very favorable focus for the development of such training procedure also.

OTHER TRAINING

Isolation has been to our detriment in the matter of accessibility to Graceland College. While American young people have on their own soil that wonderful institution, Australians have been limited in help through that means. Therefore we have been faced with the task of either bringing into existence some local training center of our own, or of making the tremendous adjustment required for the journey to Graceland, possible so far only for a very few. Apostle Mesley, with the aid of Sister Mesley and a staff of appointee ministers, conducted three training schools during his period of supervision in Australia. These were arranged especially for those entering into missionary appointments and produced some fine young men. Others, not anticipating general church service, also benefited.

In this connection, though opportunities at reunions and camps were presented, the need of a more intensive engagement was realized. This had its fruition in the establishment of a periodic training school under the name of Wandell College, so named by the first student body of twenty-five young people after the first Seventy to Australia. This institution, now well established, has given efficient help to students from most parts of Australia and New Zealand. The project had the encouragement and help of the mission president and the mission director of religious education. I have served as principal, together with a staff of well-qualified lecturers, each of whom has a degree or diploma in his respective field. The college has been held in the Newcastle pastoral home. Eighty different students have been in residence there for varying periods, for both general and priesthood courses, and have attended 300 lecture hours so far.

DEPARTMENTS

The Zion's League functions in all the organized branches of the church. There is a mission-wide leader, Brother Leslie Dalziel, and each district has a leader who in turn gives help to the local units. The Zion's Leaguers of Australia have sponsored a number of very practical projects, and their efforts have been invaluable in such endeavors as the raising of money for the purchasing of church-owned homes for missionaries under appointment; the maintenance of locally sustained junior appointees (to a considerable extent), and for assisting the Tahiti Mission in acquiring a printing press.

The department of women is well established throughout the mission. Under the leadership of Sister Nancy Parkes, who is a member of the General Council of Women, the women in the various branches have a constructive program for the furtherance of the aims of the church. In Australia, as elsewhere, the women are the backbone of practical effort.

Studies in harmony with the general program are pursued.

Junior clubs, such as Orioles and Scouts have found difficulty in becoming established in our church groups. Sister E. Stalder and Elder K. Cramp have been appointed to vitalize the work of these two movements respectively. The absence of trained leadership is a factor militating against the efficient functioning of these departments. The size of the majority of our branches is another factor involved in this work that points us to the missionary task of the church and towards the establishment of branches of efficient operating strength.

MISSIONARY PROGRAM

The revival of missionary emphasis throughout the General Church in the recent period has begun to be evident in our land. During some years of necessary emphasis upon the stabilization of administrative programs, much was done to bring about greater harmony with general policy. Such periods tend to overreach themselves and to intrude into the period when vital missionary energy should be set free. Such a period we have faced and are facing, but there is an awakening, and with the return of our delegates from America and the arrival of our new apostle in charge, Roscoe E. Davey, we are experiencing a marked quickening in tempo in the field of evangelism.

At the time of this writing there are seven ministers under general appointment in Australia, giving their full time to church work. Thus the bulk of missionary endeavor falls upon members and priesthood of the local churches in accordance with the revelation, "Let him that is warned warn his neighbor." A large majority of the seven million people in our country have not yet heard of the angel message. Our largest city numbers one and a quarter million, and there are all the smaller cities and towns throughout the land that are in need of the gospel plan revealed and given us to promulgate. Truly the field is white.

Land of the Dawning - By Blanche Mesley

AUSTRALIA is a land of contrasts and surprises. A land of vast, undeveloped areas and large modern cities; of arid desert and rain forests; of lush, tropical verdure, and more snow-covered country than the whole of Switzerland; of brilliant sunshine and winds raging at sixty miles an hour. It is a land where seasons are in reverse from those in the Northern Hemisphere—where Christmas comes in mid-summer and Easter in the fall; where trees shed their bark rather than their leaves; where there are birds that have wings but can't fly, yet are as fleet of foot as a greyhound; where kookaburras laugh contagiously, and lyre birds and brologas dance a stately measure; where many creatures native to the country are absolutely unknown elsewhere.

Nowhere is this element of contrast and surprise more dramatically seen than in the aborigine and his weapon, the boomerang. These aborigines are people of the Stone Age, the oldest inhabitants on earth—thousands of years older than any other race in existence. Only a few precious relics remain of the Stone Age man in Europe, but here in Australia we have the Stone Age race still surviving 200,000 years after its counterpart in Europe. The boomerang—an invention of the Australian aborigine—is one of the most amazing weapons known to man. It employs the same aerodynamic principles as the modern airplane. Few people understand the scientific principles underlying the flight of the weapon—especially the return of the boomerang—which has no parallel in any other part of the world. In cross-section, the shape of a boomerang in return flight is similar to the wing of an airplane, and the peculiar twist or bias put into the weapon makes it resist a deflecting force. This is the exact principle used in the modern gyroscope, though employed for centuries by this Stone Age race.

AUSTRALIA IS BIG—approximately the same size as the United States of America, with about twice as much coastline—so we find wide variations in temperature, climate, ways of living, home building, occupations, trades, et cetera. The west coast of Tasmania has been compared to Ireland with its rains and mists. Much of the southern part has been compared to the Mediterranean with its warm summer and long hours of sunshine. But in the Australian Alps, winter sports can be enjoyed for several months. Inland there is a large area of desert country resembling the Sahara, surrounded by a semi-fertile belt with low rainfall. The wheat plains and sheep country of the South East river basin have been compared to the Caspian Steppes of Russia; the tropical north of Australia with the monsoon area of India; and the heavy rainfall of the North Queensland coasts to the Madras coast of India. With such a range of climate, Australia can produce almost anything that will grow—from sugar, cotton, pineapples, and bananas in the north to some of the world's best apples in the orchards of Tasmania.

Although Australia is a large country, her population is small—fewer than eight million people, fewer than the number in New York City alone. Half of these people live in the six state capital cities (Brisbane, Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, Perth, and Hobart) and the large towns around the coast. Each one of these capital cities is distinctly different from the others and each is lovely. Looking from King's Park, one sees Perth as an unquestin Place, Sydney; nor have I ever worked at a place more alluring than the Mitchell Library in its magnificent Sydney setting.

Transportation in these central cities is similar to that in other metropolitan areas. Hundreds of people come in and out by electric train, streetcars, busses and ferries; hundreds of private cars carry many more.

THE RURAL AREAS are places of particular and characteristic beauty. The eucalyptus trees—commonly called “gums”—are magnificent in coloring and majesty. Just as pines have a characteristic aroma, tralian breed developed from the original Spanish Merino stock. From these sheep the wool clip averages three hundred million dollars a year. Around thirteen to fourteen million head of cattle are raised every year—again with breeds especially adapted to their environment and purpose. Dairy products from Australia rank extremely high in local and overseas markets.

WE FOUND the Australian people to be laughter-loving sport-enthusiasts, as all who have followed the fates of the Davis Cup team and the “Ashes” would expect. They are by no means frivolous, however. Being unusually straightforward, they find it difficult to tolerate insincerity. They are thrifty yet open-hearted, generous and quick to respond to those in need. Their skills in trades and professions are a constant source of pride, and the philosophy running hand in hand with such skills is an unexpected joy. As I write, I remember a good plumber friend—an excellent workman—who during his rest period would balance his cup of tea on his work-stained knee and quote stanza after stanza of poetry both classic and commonplace. Then there was the doctor who would take a few minutes from his busy practice to tell of his student days in Vienna and from there branch off into European troubles and insist that the only possible solution lay in “fulfilling the law of Christ.” And there was my milliner—an artist and a most understanding gentleman who made the best hats I ever have worn—all the while helping me to see deeper meanings in “the trivial round, the common task.” Grand people, the Australians!

They are mostly of British extraction, which means they speak the king's English. But because of their background and their progressive spirit, this is enriched with musical and expressive words from the aborigines, and enlivened by some American colloquialisms coming to them via the movies, and further varied by national idioms. Thus tionably picturesque city. Sydney harbor is thrillingly beautiful at all times. Adelaide, seen from one of the neighboring hills on a chilly autumn night is a veritable carpet of glittering lights. Melbourne gives one a feeling of stately graciousness. Brisbane town hall is one of the loveliest. Much beauty is to be found in these large, modern cities, but loveliness is not their only offering. Here there are well-stocked stores, excellent libraries, well-staffed hotels and restaurants of high quality. Each capital city has its fully accredited university, and institutes of culture and learning abound. I have never seen a more attractive business street than Mar-so do the eucalyptus—at once stimulating and invigorating, yet soothing too. The flowering trees—golden wattle, lavender blue jacaranda, cream, orange, or scarlet gums; the hundreds of varieties of wild flowers; the exquisite ferns and gum tips; the clear, sweet songs of birds and the flash of their brilliant plumage combine to make pictures and perfumes that make description altogether impossible. All one can do is thank God for having permitted him to experience such prodigal beauty and remember it forever.

Further out are the huge cattle and sheep ranches known as stations. On these stations are raised about a hundred twenty-five million sheep per year, including some of the world famous Peppin sheep, an Austheir language is expressive, colorful, and flexible.

When it comes to considering some of the achievements of these splendid people, my admiration knows no bounds. In giving even such slight mention of Australia's achievements as is here possible, three factors must be emphasized: that Australia has such a small population; that she has a history of only approximately 150 years (when America was a nation, Australia's first settlers were arriving); and that she is a self-governing dominion, making her own laws and framing and executing her own policies.

COLONIZING AUSTRALIA was a tough proposition at first. Gradually, however, the country became settled and an organized government developed. In time each state had its own parliament and self-government. Then the six states united in a single federation with a constitution very similar to that of the United States. Australia's system of government stands midway between that of the United States and the United Kingdom, but the Australians did not stop at simple political action. They were among the first people in the world to adopt the secret ballot, votes for women, free and compulsory education, industrial arbitration courts, and far-reaching social legislation. Old-age pensions are paid to men over sixty-five years and women over sixty. Invalid pensions are paid to people who are unable to work. A maternity allowance is paid to all mothers for prenatal and postnatal care; and child endowment is given to the age of sixteen for all children in excess of one. Medicine and hospitalization is available free of charge. The most distant stations are taken care of by a well-organized "flying doctor" service, with aerial ambulance and flying dentist, as well as a fully trained medical man.

Education in Australia is free and compulsory to the age of fifteen. The large cities provide preschool care, kindergarten, grade and high school, technical colleges, agricultural colleges, school of mines, and university. In the rural areas there are few preschool or kindergarten groups, but older children are given transportation to and from school in regularly scheduled busses. Children in isolated areas are taught by radio, beginning with the kindergarten of the air and going all through the grade and high school into adult education. Regular lessons are set, textbooks provided, examinations held, and instruction expertly given by both radio and correspondence.

FOR MANY YEARS Australia has been mainly pastoral and agricultural. Volumes might be written on her contribution in this field alone. During the past ten years, however, her industries have grown enormously. Mining for gems, gold, and coal—always a major industry—has received fresh impetus. Engineering in all its phases—road building, shipbuilding, bridgebuilding, the manufacture of airplanes, precision instruments, et cetera—is forging ahead swiftly and steadily.

Nor are the arts neglected. All phases of music are given the highest attention in schools, concerts, recitals, and individual study. The Australians are a singing, music-loving people. Painting and sculpture are encouraged by exhibitions, the use of loan collections, excellent teaching, and the development of Australian talent. The field of literature is particularly attractive. Both classics and moderns are studied in the schools, and libraries are plentiful. Legends and folklore are

Reunions in Australia - By Alan S. Frater

WHEN SAINTS IN AMERICA and Europe are wrapped in their winter furs, with snow on the ground and the tinsel of Christmas decorations adorning their homes, Australians "down under" are basking in the warmth of summer skies, and the many opportunities for out-of-door activity are eagerly grasped.

It is natural, then, that the Christmas-New Year period is the time for vacations. Schools are closed, and many industries shut down for two or three weeks.

It is equally natural for the church in Australia to look upon this period as the time for reunions.

In thinking of church reunions, it is wise to repeat here, as has probably been mentioned elsewhere, that readers should try and visualize the scattered condition of the Saints. Australia, comparable in size to the United States, has a total population comparable to that of New York City. The Empire State building alone houses more people than many of Australia's larger towns. The sparse population is found mainly along the eastern and southern seaboard, and in these areas are the Saints. Branches extend from Brisbane on the eastern coast to Perth and Fremantle on the southwestern corner of the continent—a distance by rail of 3,307 miles. One branch and some scattered members are in New Zealand, over 1,000 miles across the Tasman Sea from Australia. The Australasian Mission's total enrollment is 3,300, which means that there are not many Saints in any one locality. Reunions held in the Mission must therefore be on a comparatively small scale.

TIONA

Tiona Reunion is the exception to the rule. The coastal area of New South Wales from Sydney northwards is the most thickly populated part of the Mission with over half of the total church membership, and so it is natural that a reunion ground should develop on an extensive scale for these members. One has been established at Tiona, where about 700 campers gather each Christmas season.

To Elder J. W. Davis goes the credit for finding the property subsequently purchased by the church for reunion purposes and named "Tiona"—the Tahitian word for "Zion."

It is a remarkable place, located on a strip of land about 250 yards wide with the rolling Pacific Ocean on one hand and extensive Wallis Lake on the other. There are eighty acres of land in the church's possession, with remarkable groves of palm trees, beautiful beaches (the ocean beach is about seven miles long, sweeping in a perfect curve) and fine camping facilities.

The original committee responsible for its purchase and setting up as a reunion ground consisted of Apostle Myron McConley, Bishop G. Lewis, and Elders W. J. Haworth, E. Wright, J. W. Davis, and G. H. Parker.

The first Christmas reunion was held there in 1924, and there has been no break since that date in spite of war scares and restrictions in 1941 and 1942. At first, the management of the property was in the hands of a registered company, the shareholders of which were all church members; but in 1946 these shareholders voted for voluntary liquidation of the company and a transfer of the property to the church. The property is now controlled by a mission conference-appointed board of management under the direction of Bishop D. A. Alberts.

The present members of the board are R. K. Watters (secretary), J. V. Maples, H. Peisker, J. H. Jenkins, W. Engel, H. Ley, J. A. Corbett, C. A. Dickinson, H. Anderson, and W. J. Swain.

FROM A PHYSICAL ANGLE, the reunion grounds are well-equipped. In addition to tenting facilities, there is an abundant water supply piped through the camping area, electric lights in all tents, avenues, meeting tents, and other public places, a store where food may be purchased by campers, a dining hall, and many other facilities. An attractive cottage on the grounds houses the caretaker and his wife, Brother and Sister J. Maples, whose duties include caring for campers who at times other than the reunion period use Tiona's unique camping facilities.

Large tents house the reunion services. Quite recently a permanent stage was erected as part of the general meeting tent, which seats about 300 people.

Spiritually, educationally, socially, and physically, the reunion program each year is very comprehensive. All age groups are provided for, and each day's activities adequately cover the needs of children, intermediates, young people, young adults and adults in prayer meetings, worship, study classes, music, recreation, preaching, sacraments, and social fellowship. Usually the reunion period covers about ten days.

Tiona's pride is the Green Cathedral, an open-air chapel on the shores of Wallis Lake. The spot was found by Apostle Mesley in 1939, and to his inspiration and energy we owe this lovely, hallowed spot, dedicated to worship; fringed with towering palm trees, it is a delight to all who worship God in the beauty of his creation. The baptismal font is in the shallow waters of the lake twenty yards from the shore, immediately in front of the cathedral's rustic stone altar.

Use of the Green Cathedral is limited to such services as Communion or prayer meetings. Each evening during the reunion, a "Sunset Reflections" service is always a highlight, as is the New Year's Eve Vesper, also held there by candlelight. Campers are encouraged to use the cathedral daily for meditation—"fifteen minutes a day with God."

Though the majority of reunionists are from New South Wales, each year there are some representatives from the adjoining states of Queensland and Victoria; occasionally South Australia, West Australia, and New Zealand are represented.

MARYSVILLE

Victoria District in recent years has developed a Christmas reunion for Saints in the southern states who are unable to travel long distances to Tiona.

For some years, one of the outlying branches from Melbourne, the capital, such as Hastings (thirty-five miles to the southeast) or Euroa (ninety-three miles northeast) was chosen, and local Saints helped in accommodating the visitors.

For the past three years, however, Marysville, about forty-five miles east of Melbourne, in the hills and the heart of the big tree country, has been chosen as the ideal situation for reunion purposes. It is fairly central to all Victorian branches and has adequate facilities. Elder S. Jacka, district president, has been the motivating power in the establishment of a suitable reunion spot there.

Our reference to the "big tree country" reminds us of a long-standing dispute as to which is the world's tallest—California's sequoia or Victoria's mountain ash. Marysville township is situated in the heart of the mountain ash country and is surrounded by glorious mountain and river scenery.

At present, civic facilities and grounds are used for the reunion, but it is hoped that a tract of land can be purchased from the Crown Lands Department of the State in the near future. When this is done, permanent facilities will be possible.

The 1947 reunion had an attendance of nearly 100 persons, and under church leadership, an adequate program covering the needs of all age-groups was presented from Christmas to New Year's Day.

J. Y. P.

These cryptic letters which stand for "Junior Young People" represent the vacation church school conducted by Elder S. Jacka for the teenagers of the Victoria District immediately after the reunion period.

First at Hastings, now at Marysville, this annual school—covering from two to three weeks' study and youth fellowship—has played a vital part in the development of Victoria's young people. The majority of the vital youth of the district today are products in part of J. Y. P. which is run by the students themselves under missionary supervision.

NAIRNE

In Adelaide, South Australia, is one branch (Norwood) with a group of young people isolated by distance from Tiona, Marysville, and J. Y. P.

Under the wise leadership of Elder and Sister Frank Rixon, these young people have gone, year after year, to Nairne, which is situated in the lovely lofty ranges near Adelaide and there have conducted a youth camp of study, worship, and recreation.

For 1947, the enrollment was too great for the limited accommodations available at Nairne (a hostel granted to the church for such a purpose by the National Fitness Council of South Australia), and so for the first time tents were used, and another spot, Ambleside, was chosen.

The place may change from year to year, but the spirit of the young people and their devotion to the cause of the church is embodied in the name "Nairne," which typifies Adelaide's endeavors to conduct a reunion for its youth.

OTHER REUNIONS

Owing to the scattered nature of the Saints, smaller and more distant centers are not able to conduct reunion activities regularly. Though such places as Brisbane, Queensland, or Auckland, New Zealand, arrange reunion activities as occasion permits, or hold "home-coming" services, there is nothing of a permanent nature other than the reunions outlined above.

CLUBS, SOCIETIES, ETC.

From time to time, branches or groups of branches organize clubs to cover various phases of church activity, such as literary or debating societies. The "Kimmor Club," of Sydney, a literary society of the 1930's, is an example. Too often these clubs are of short duration, either because of lack of enthusiasm or because the enthusiastic promoters of such schemes are not able to continue their leadership and leave the projects in the hands of less able leaders.

At present, the only club of this kind in Australia is the "Sydney Culture Club," a very recent body which grew out of a men's club that had functioned for about three years. We look with hope to the future of this body and other similar organizations that might develop within the church to help in the development of the Saints.

CONCLUSION

Australia is blessed with long summers, lovely nights and days, and people who can enjoy these advantages to the full.

With nature's gifts at Tiona, Marysville, and elsewhere, the fellowship of the Saints and their friends as they gather annually at these lovely spots with the Spirit of God pervading all, makes reunions in Australia a worth-while and lasting contribution to the work of the church in the Australasian Mission.

Could you use a full-time assistant pastor in your branch?

The "Herald" of July 25 tells how this is possible at a cost you can afford.

General Conference Appointees for Australia

THE CHURCH has been fortunate throughout the years in the quality of the men assigned to full-time ministry in the Australian mission. This is as true of the new men under appointment at this writing as of those who have gone before and set the pace for them by good life and diligence in service. Current appointees, all of Australia save Apostle R. E. Davey, their supervising minister, are hereby commended to the General Church as well as to the church in Australia as worthy of trust, and from whom the best of good works may be expected.

CHARLES A. DAVIES was born March 4, 1906, and was married in November, 1929, to Elsa Alberts. To them have been born two children: Margery, eighteen, and Robin, sixteen. Brother Davies has served the church as priest, elder, and now as high priest. Prior to his full-time ministry, he qualified as a schoolteacher and taught in Victoria, serving as senior housemaster and in other capacities of this profession.

Appointed in 1929, Brother Davies has ministered in Southern Australia, Queensland, New Zealand, and New South Wales. He has functioned as a pastor, a district president, and, during recent months, as acting president of the mission. Elder Davies also has sponsored priesthood and leadership training classes at Wandell College in Newcastle; edited the first edition of Membership Manual, and carried responsibility as associate editor of The Standard.

ALAN S. FRATER was born in New Hebrides in 1909, the son of a Presbyterian missionary of some renown and a man of devotion and unusual ability. In 1929 Brother Frater married Sylvia Jacka of the state of Victoria. They have two children: Maurice, eight, and Alison, seven. Prior to his assignment as a representative of the church and following his training as a teacher, Brother Frater taught school in Victoria. He has served in the office of priest, elder, and high priest.

Since 1942 he has been doing clerical work for the church at its headquarters in Sydney, has served as mission statistician, mission director of religious education, and as managing editor of The Standard. His labors under full-time appointment since 1946 have carried him into various states of the Commonwealth.

DONALD A. ALBERTS, born in 1915, was married in 1938 to Margery Franklyn of Adelaide. To them were born Ian, eight, Betty, five, and Nancy, four. He has ministered as priest, elder, and high priest; at the late General Conference, he was ordained a bishop and returned to Australia to serve as bishop of the mission.

Prior to his full-time ministry, Elder Alberts worked as a salesman and sales manager. He has served the church since 1943 as bishop's agent for the mission, mission treasurer, chairman of the Board of Publication of Australia, chairman of the Tiona Board of Management, and chairman of the trustees of the mission homes. Brother Albert's work in connection with the bishopric has carried him into all the states of the Commonwealth, which experience has further fitted him for the work of bishop, in which office he is henceforth to serve.

SYDNEY JACKA was born in 1918. In 1944 he married Beryl Jenkins. They have one child, Peter, a year old. Brother Jacka has labored as an elder and high priest. Under his first appointment, he was locally sustained. Since 1942 he has served full time on support of the General Church. He has ministered under appointment in Northern New South Wales and Victoria, his current assignment being president of the Victoria district. Prior to his appointment as general church representative, Brother Jacka worked as a compositor and linotypist, which experience contributed to his qualifications as editor of The Guide, the mission youth paper which was recently discontinued.

A. R. GUNNING, born in 1918, married Mitta Jacka in 1944. They have two children; Ronda Mae, four years, and Barry John, three months. Brother Gunning has served the church as a deacon and an elder. His first assignment was one in which he was locally sustained. He has labored under appointment at John's River and in New Zealand, and serves at this time as missionary pastor at Auckland, where he has labored for over three years. Prior to his appointment, Brother Gunning was what is known as a furniture machinist, which has qualified him to work as a handyman at the mission headquarters and church building in Auckland.

FLOYD POTTER, born in 1918, was married to Gertrude Moxham in 1942. Two children have been born to this couple: Brondon, four, and Marcina, one. Prior to his appointment, Brother Potter worked as a salesman, which has contributed to his qualifications as a Seventy. He has labored as missionary since 1940, was ordained a Seventy in 1947, and has served in New South Wales, Southern and Western Australia, and New Zealand.

JOHN D. IMRIE, appointed to represent the church in Australia at the recent General Conference, was born in 1924. He married Valerie Parton in 1947. He has ministered as a deacon, priest, and elder. Brother Imrie has served the church at Newcastle as young people's leader and

Church Publications in Australia

By D. A. Alberts

FOR ALMOST HALF A CENTURY the church in Australia has had a uniquely progressive program for publishing church news and literature. This seems to have had its genesis in, and has since been maintained by, rather a "printing conscious" group of church leaders in, or closely associated with, mission headquarters. For several years the mission owned its own printing establishment and built up quite an extensive business in church and outside printing. Although this interest was disposed of in 1933, there has since remained two church-member commercial printers with plants close to mission headquarters, and in more recent years a third, all of whom together with members of their staffs have been most sympathetic to church publication needs. They have given generously and consistently of their time and facilities to the work of the church, making possible the continuance of a high level program in the field of publicity and literary publications. All three of these men, with the mission president and mission bishop's agent, constitute a mission-elected board of publication today. The church is most grateful for their contribution.

Probably the most outstanding achievement over the years has been the regular monthly publication (with an exception of only one five-month period) of The Standard—an official church journal that has supplied a distinct need in helping to bind together branches and members which are separated physically by distances of up to 3,000 miles. First this was a printed magazine of eight pages, but it has come through stages of mimeographed form (in depression years) to the 1947-48 model which is a forty-eight page digest size, two-color printed job, having a four-color pictorial cover depicting a different Australian scene each month. Contents cover official church news, branch notes from throughout the mission, articles of high quality by Mission General Church staff and others, and regular features under the headings "Personally Speaking," "Questions People Ask," "Help for the Asking," and "Gems From Our Reading."

It has separate sections for women, young people, children, and religious education. Such an attractive and high quality magazine is made possible only by the gratis printing facilities available—the subscription rate of twelve shillings (approximately $2.00) per year, barely meeting costs.

DURING THE YEARS 1939 to 1947, another mission-wide publication, The Guide, was sponsored by the Zion's League Council, exclusively for youth. This too was of excellent quality and was most popular. It was recently discontinued only because of staffing problems and rising production costs. It actually was the forerunner of the "new" Standard and performed a unique ministry during war years by being sent gratis to more than 200 young servicemen and women.

Through the years, many tracts and some full-length books have been published. Principal among the books were Man Here and Hereafter, A Royal Priesthood, and Fall of Babylon by W. J. Haworth. The more recent and most outstanding tract was The Christian Social Order—an edited series of addresses by the late President F. M. Smith, covering a widely discussed topic. Three thousand of these were attractively printed in two colors and distributed through the 300 priesthood members of the mission. Few, if any, of these ventures have returned fully the financial outlay involved, but they have fulfilled their purpose in making available materials especially suited to the needs of the mission, particularly during times of very limited supplies from the Herald Publishing House. However, the sale of other church books and mimeograph service has contributed a small margin of profit to compensate for such losses and to maintain a basis of self-support through the years.

DURING WAR YEARS, heavy restrictions were placed on the importation of books from the United States, limiting adequate material for church leaders. A series of mimeographed brochures was published in an attractive style to meet this problem. Containing an average of over 100 pages, these books covered such topics as: "Beliefs of Our Neighbor," "Instruction in Storytelling," "Teacher Training Counseling," "Parents and Their Problems," "Women's and Zion's League Department Helps," "Poem Selections," "Stories for Worship," "Oriole Leaders' Handbook," "The Work of the Deacon, Teacher, and Priest" (each under separate cover), "Service Planning Series for Special Events of the Year," and "Great Hymns and Their Writers."

In all, twenty-five brochures have been published. To ensure that this excellent material reaches as many of our people as possible, leaders invite enrollment in the mission-wide "First Fifty Club." Members of this club have first opportunity to purchase any Latter Day Saint publications. Books, tracts, or brochures are mailed on approval for three days, after which they may be returned or charged. Very few Saints return material after having had due opportunity to scan it. Present membership of the club is almost three times the original fifty.

The Church in New Zealand

By A. R. Gunning

FROM COAL-MINING NEWCASTLE in New South Wales, Australia, the Dickson and Stewart families moved in 1888-89 to coal-mining Kiatangata below Dunedin in the South Island. From the United States, Paul M. Hanson and D. E. Tucker of the Quorum of Seventy came in 1902 to minister to the scattered Saints and establish the work in New Zealand. Brother Hanson stayed a few months, then moved to Australia. Brother Tucker stayed four years, living and working under extreme pioneer conditions and organizing a church school which met in the Masonic Hall. This union of devoted Saints and diligent ministry was the beginning of the work in New Zealand. These essential values have characterized all subsequent work here.

With the passing of Brother Dickson in 1914, and the moving out of the Stewarts from 1906 on, the church center shifted from Kiatangata to Dunedin. Here Brother Robert Hall, Apostle Hanson's convert, later mayor of Saint Kilda, a prominent figure in most city-wide public institutions, a candidate for parliament as a representative of the Labor Party, engaged in street preaching and in church school activities in association with Brother A. LeBherz, a 1909 addition from Australia. Their work bore fruit in the branch which was organized in this city in 1911 by Mission President W. J. Haworth.

At the death of Elder Hall and the moving northward of the LeBherz and Murdock families, this branch was sadly depleted, and in the passing of the years became defunct. Even the consistent and sincere labor on the part of Elder Robert Taylor, also of Australia, failed to re-establish it.

A prominent figure in the work in the South Island was Seventy Hinman W. Savage from America.

Many speak affectionately today of his ministry.

The trend of migration was northward. Even Elders Tucker and Hanson finally worked their way to Auckland in the North Island. Elders Savage and A. V. Robinson, general church appointees, moved to the North Island and settled in Auckland.

Thus we had a band of loyal Saints and General Church appointees at Auckland. Here they were diligent in their endeavors to preach the gospel. Regular weekly waterfront services and public discussions were held. With the arrival of Elder G. J. Waller from Hawaii on business in 1921, the prayers of the Saints were answered, and branch organization was effected.

IN 1922 a site was chosen for a new mission headquarters. The section purchased was a veritable pile of rocks, but land costs were high. Under the leadership of M. A. McConley, J. H. N. Jones, A. L. Loving, and A. V. Robinson, the present building was begun. This building was to include a combined hall and homes for two missionary families. Today the church here has a valuable property which is a landmark in the district, a center of religious activity, social life, and fellowship. Many have been brought into the fold through the consecrated endeavors of the missionaries and Saints. At present there is a flourishing branch, a large church school composed mostly of nonmember children, and a fine group of young people here.

With the passing of the years, many changes have taken place. The once flourishing Dunedin Branch is now defunct and only a few Saints remain there. These include Sister Stone, widow of Elder Hall, and Sister Rasmussen, who was instrumental in converting Andrew Scott, who attended Graceland College in 1946-1948.

Wellington, the capital city has a number of Saints, but no organization has been effected. Elder A. L. Loving labored there for sometime, doing good work. Approximately eight families are scattered over the vast expanse of Wellington with no leadership available to draw them together as a constructive and effective witness of the Restoration. Elder A. L. Loving also labored in the King Country, Rotorua District, Coramandel, Thames, and Hauraki Plains. As a result of these efforts, the Kerepehi Branch was organized. Elder Cyrus Loving from Australia, now the pastor of Bowraville Branch, was its president. He was succeeded by Elder W. Herkt. However, this branch was disorganized in 1937 after the removal of key families, including the branch president, to Auckland.

GENERAL CHURCH APPOINTEES who have labored in New Zealand are as follows: P. M. Hanson, D. E. Tucker, H. W. Savage, M. A. McConley, C. G. Mesley, A. C. Barmore, A. V. Robinson, A. L. Loving, J. H. N. Jones, G. Lewis, W. J. Haworth, R. Taylor, H. Peisker, A. E. Loving, C. A. Davies, Floyd Potter, and A. R. Gunning.

Our only active branch in New Zealand at the present time is Auckland. Elder A. R. Gunning is the only missionary in this land, and while acting as pastor missionary at mission headquarters, he also visits the other groups biannually to keep contact with the many isolated Saints.

Auckland Branch has thirteen members of the priesthood actively engaged in the work. Six of these were ordained in May, 1947. There are four elders—including Elder A. LeBherz who remains as one of the few active links with the past, four priests, three teachers, and two deacons.

There is an active Zion's League under the leadership of F. Boyle. The young adult organization, known as the "Fireside Group," is in its second year of activity with J. LeBherz as leader.

Our most effective work is done in the church school. Here we find a large percentage of nonmember children. The missionary conducts an annual canvass of the neighborhood for new scholars. This has proved an effective means of maintaining our school. A loyal band of consecrated teachers assists in our school, meeting monthly for study.

Apostle Mesley and Pastor Floyd Potter launched a building fund project in 1944. The fund stands at over 600 pounds now. With prevailing English traditions, it is imperative that we have a separate church dedicated solely to worship. With funds in hand and with interior fixtures in the present building plus diligent work, our dream will be realized.

Ministry to other community organizations and welfare work is regularly given by the pastor missionary in an endeavor to further enhance the good name of the church.

The growth of the church in New Zealand is truly a story of hard work, courage, and devotion. We are indebted to the early pioneers for their devotion and character. With such a background, we of today move forward to complete their work and raise aloft the banner of Jesus Christ and his restored gospel.

Hunter River District Branch, which later became the Wallsend, Hamilton, and Teralba Branches. In 1876 he organized a branch at Bungwahl; this later became the basis of the Tuncurry and Laurieton Branches. In 1878, Brother Rodger went to Victoria and established the work at Queensferry.

OTHER PIONEERS

Elder J. W. Gillen succeeded Brother Rodger in 1879 and, after laboring in the already existent branches in New South Wales, proceeded to Victoria where he built up and organized the Queensferry Branch.

From June, 1882, members of the Australasian Mission carried on alone. With great joy they welcomed Elder J. F. Burton and his wife, Emma, and their daughter, Addie, in December, 1884. Apostle and Sister T. W. Smith arrived a little later.

By 1890 the work had become firmly established at many points, and during the ministry of the Burtons, the Saints began to build churches. Edifices were erected at Tuncurry, Hastings, Wallsend, and Hamilton in quick succession.

The first district in Australasia was organized on December 31, 1887, by Apostle T. W. Smith. This was comprised of the Queensferry, Leopold, and Hastings Branches and was known as the Victoria District. Apostle Smith also organized the New South Wales District with branches at Wallsend, Sydney, Tuncurry, and Argent's Hill.

The work of the church in New Zealand began as a result of the Stewart, Whaler, Manning, and other families moving there from Australia. Seventies Paul M. Hanson and D. T. Tucker were sent to New Zealand in 1902, and, as a result of their labors, a branch was established in Dunedin. New Zealand has always been cared for in connection with the Australasian Mission.

With the passing years the work was carried to Southern Australia by Elder J. H. N. Jones, to Western Australia by Elder C. H. Davies, P. M. Hanson, and others, and to Queensland by Elder John Kaler. Today, one or more thriving branches of the church operates in each of these states.

In the seventy-five years of the Reorganization in Australia, the Mission has welcomed and been ministered to by the following General Church men:

Of the First Presidency—Patriarch Alexander Smith, 1901-2, President J. F. Garver, 1947-48.

Presiding Bishopric—Bishop Walter N. Johnson, 1947-48.

The Twelve—T. W. Smith, 1886; C. A. Butterworth and J. W. Wight, 1902; Gomer T. Griffiths, 1914; Paul M. Hanson, 1916 and 1920; J. W. Rushton, 1920; M. A. McConley, 1922 and 1924; C. F. Ellis, 1924; G. G. Lewis, 1932, C. G. Mesley, 1938; R. E. Davey, 1948.

Patriarch—F. G. Pitt.

High Priest—C. Ed. Miller.

Seventies—Glaud Rodger, C. W. Wandell, J. Kaler, Gomer Wells, A. C. Barmore, J. W. Davis, E. F. Robertson, J. F. Burton, D. E. Tucker, H. W. Savage.

Australia recognizes and appreciates the rich ministry received over three quarters of a century from men who have left home and loved ones to answer the call to service.

REVERSE LEASE LEND

While the church in Australia acknowledges her eternal debt to the General Church in the process of her ministry in world evangelization, she has endeavored in some degree to repay the investment in a number of her sons who have gone to America and served under General Conference appointment.

Apostles G. G. Lewis and C. G. Mesley both served the church in the homeland and returned to give years of service to Australia.

Elder H. I. Velt has served over twenty years as a Seventy and today is one of the Presidents of Seventy. Evangelist William Patterson and High Priest John Blackmore have occupied in responsible positions and have shared in forwarding the interests of the church.

We feel that in these men we have an investment in the General Church in the Center Place and anticipate that in the coming years both America and Australia will be blessed by an ever-increasing fellowship that will make for greater efficiency.

In the meantime, "Australia will keep faith."

Stepping Stones to Zion - By Verda Bryant

VACATION CHURCH SCHOOL for 1949 with its theme, "Stepping Stones to Zion," is over. The surplus supplies, notes on daily programs, stencils, etc., have been carefully filed away for use (or at least reference) in 1952.

The ten days of school, an achievement program, and a Sunday morning service are over—all except the good feeling around my heart, for I received during this period a spiritual tonic so potent that I want to climb the towers of Zion and shout the news to the whole world.

In Independence fourteen congregations participated in the vacation church school activity. At Stone Church, with an enrollment of about 200 children, we sensed from the first, a spirit of good fellowship and purpose which spread over the school as all worked together with the single aim—to create for the Lord's little ones a clearer conception of the stepping stones to Zion. There is power in a course of study which takes us into the future, beginning with NOW, which even the smallest of the children sensed immediately, and to which they readily responded.

I was supervisor of the primary department with seventy-six little six-, seven-, and eight-year-old boys and girls. Our worship services, stories, study, and music were done as a group activity with the notebook work, handcraft, and games divided into nine individual classes. I was assisted by sixteen workers who united their efforts with mine to accomplish our task. Fifteen of us—busy mothers and workers all—attended every session of the school, the achievement program, and the final Sunday morning service.

The first day we discussed the meaning of our theme, and I was informed by an almost unanimous group of children that they knew what stepping stones were—of course, it was a Sunday school paper. With that as a starting point, we went on to learn of stepping stones on the lawn and stepping stones in a creek. We talked of how we must step on each stone so as not to fall in, and also how we must step on each stone which leads to Zion.

WHERE DID WE BEGIN? As a starting point for our study, we placed a huge map (about 8' x 4') of the Stone Church area on a piece of Bristol board; this was the center of our worship each day. The streets had been marked in black crayon, and pictures of the Stone Church, the Auditorium, and the Sanitarium were added to help the children get their sense of location. This we called the "City of Zion." Then each child made a little house on which he wrote his name and address, and each little house was pasted upon its proper street.

But houses alone are not enough to build Zion—it takes people. Each day the children brought pictures of people and things that they thought were needed to make the kind of city to which Jesus could come, until almost every available space on the map was covered. Children—happy, clean, playing, helpful children—parents, pets, and toys found their places in the "City of Zion" as did cars, trees, and flowers (even the four roses from the liquor ad, minus the printed matter).

We wanted the children to feel that they must put themselves into the building of Zion; this was attempted by using symbols which they clearly understood. Each day a different part of the body—children readily understand the function of the various parts of their bodies—was stressed in connection with the lesson.

The children made notebooks with a page for each day which they either colored or to which they added some item to impress the lesson more indelibly upon their minds. Upon the cover of this notebook was an outline of a child to which they daily added the part of the body then being stressed.

We made life-size replicas of each child by actually drawing around each one, using wide, white wrapping paper. These replicas were to represent their perfect selves as they must be to walk and talk with Jesus when he comes to Zion. Each day a part of these replicas was completed by crayoning or by adding cutouts for eyes, lips, ears, and heart. Seventy-six replicas of boys and girls were thumbtacked to the classroom walls.

The day-by-day addition to both their notebooks and their replicas helped attendance. (Sixty of the seventy-six enrolled had perfect attendance.) One tiny girl told her mother she must not miss a single day because if she did she might "limp."

The head expressed preparation—thinking—about "embarking in the service of God." The daily theme, "Follow Me," was explained as the feet. "Faith" prompted a study of prayer, which meant we used our knees while kneeling. The stewardship lesson, which included stewardship not only of our money but also of our time and talents brought to their minds the skirt (or pants) because money is kept in pockets. The lesson on "study," which included the story of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, showed the necessity of using our eyes; and the one on "obedience" brought the addition of ears. After the lesson on "love," the blouse (or shirt) with a heart upon it was added. In order to serve each other, and thus serve God, there must be hands. The lesson on "The field is white" required lips to tell the story of Jesus to the world. During the final lesson on "onward to Zion," we held a short dedicatory service in which each child presented a completed replica—his perfect self—to Pastor Glaude A. Smith, as the representative of Jesus at Stone Church. During this ceremony each child expressed his desire to help build Zion.

MY OWN STORY of vacation church school dates back to early in April when Helen Elledge, who was to be the primary department supervisor, asked me if I would assist her as one of the teachers. I told her I would be glad to if it didn't entail much preliminary preparation on my part for I was busy teaching a Blue Bird leadership training class and directing various other Blue Bird-Oriole activities, which would occupy my time until shortly before the vacation church school was to start.

The press of these activities prevented my attending all except the last two sessions of the city-wide vacation church school training class held the last week in April. During this training period, our Stone Church principal asked Helen to sit in on the kindergarten class as she did not yet have a supervisor for that department.

When the Manual was handed to me on Thursday morning, I experienced a thrill that embraced my whole being. We should be thankful that the church is publishing vacation church school material in keeping with our own beliefs, and that consecrated workers are willing to give their time and effort toward that end.

For two days I sat in the primary training class, offering almost nothing to the discussion, but my mind was racing over a track of yet uncrystallized ideas.

The Manuals for the various departments of the vacation church school are outlined to cover departmental classwork for from forty minutes to an hour. However, the size and nature of the Stone Church necessitates that the children be in their various departments all but about twenty minutes of the three-hour daily session, so I knew much supplementary material would have to be added.

Helen was as thrilled with the kindergarten materials as I was with the primary, and she suggested I take the primaries. The next two weeks were full ones for me, with Blue Bird-Oriole work, but I could not get the vacation church school out of my mind. I even found it necessary to pray for ability to concentrate upon my other work, because ideas for the primary department even occupied my dreams.

When, less than a month before the school was to start, the principal called and requested I take the primaries, I replied that I should refuse, but I was so challenged by the subject I had to accept.

With a two weeks' vacation scheduled between then and the time the school opened, I immediately went to work. Within two hours I had a staff of ten to help me. We met together, and I outlined briefly the thoughts which had been running through my head. Several excellent suggestions were made by my co-workers, including the one regarding the large replicas which was contributed by Daisy Deaver. I went home and made a more tangible outline. We met again two days later. I hunted through coloring books, in magazines, through dozens of stories and pictures. My co-workers brought poems, pictures, and stories. It seemed as though I would only sense a need and from somewhere it appeared. My typewriter, light table, and mimeograph were very busy the next few days.

Two weeks before the opening of the school, thirteen women met at my home to assemble the mimeographed material. We used an envelope for each teacher for each day of the school with all the required material and supplies for that day.

I showed my material to Helen and explained to her how the whole supplementary material was unfolded to me almost like the turning of pages in a book. With misty eyes she asked, "Do you know why?" To my negative answer, she said, "I fasted and prayed, living on fruit juice alone for a whole week, that you might see this primary work and take the job of supervisor."

With that knowledge as a background, and with the Primary Manual and my inspired material, I returned from my vacation and began the schoolwork before my bags were unpacked.

DID THE CHILDREN learn anything about stepping stones to Zion?

One little girl quickly took her auntie to task for making an uncomplimentary remark about a friend by challenging her, "Is that the kind of talk that will help build Zion?"

One young man, who put a new crop of gray hairs in my head by his mischievous antics, brought more pictures to place in the "City of Zion" than any other child.

One youngster brought a picture of Christ to put above our "City of Zion" so He could look down upon us and guide us.

One little boy prayed that we all might remember the lessons we were learning and apply them in our lives throughout the whole summer.

One youngster, who fidgeted and apparently paid no attention to the sermon during the concluding Sunday morning service, forced me to realize that children have a "right ear" which hears all when grown-ups think they hear nothing. The pastor was telling us that when children are accustomed to family prayers, it is not long before the tiny ones will say, "Let me pray." This restless fidgety child, whose mind was apparently far away, whispered in my ear, "My little sister [about three] can pray."

The generation to which I belong may never build Zion, because we are too complacent, too self-satisfied, and too "sot" in our ways. Since Zion is to be built (and God has said that it shall be), it is the youngsters of today who will accomplish the task—youngsters who have learned from their earliest understanding that it takes all of themselves, the very best they have to offer, to bring about the ideal of which we dream.

It is the job of my generation to bring to them the glorious vision of Zion, to build into their lives the necessary attributes, and to create within them a sincere desire to put their shoulders to the wheel from their earliest childhood, and to keep at the work constantly until the vision becomes a reality.

VACATION CHURCH SCHOOL, with its thirty hours of concentrated study toward the training of these children, costs. It costs time, labor, effort, and work. It costs the sweat of the brow and creates tired and weary bodies, but the return to both the pupils and faculty cannot be measured. Every congregation of the church throughout the whole world should be making this investment in its youth.

However, vacation church school has not cost me, it has paid me. There is no more satisfying compensation than the assurance that you are touching the lives of the little ones of whom Christ said, "of such is the kingdom of heaven."

My stepping stones to Zion have been across the clouds. I thank God for the privilege of participating this year, and for the measure of his Spirit which enabled me to be an instrument in his hands.

being collected and preserved, and the country is producing a literature of unusually high quality. This includes some first-class children's books (featuring their own native animals, birds, and trees) excellent stories of Australian adventure (true to fact and well written) stories of Australian history in the form of historical novels that are outstanding in concept and treatment—many other novels and poetry of exceptional merit.

And what of Australia's status in world affairs? The Commonwealth of Australia is an independent and democratic nation. It is one of the United Nations and before the war sent its own representative to the League of Nations. It sends its own minister to foreign capitals, and as one of the members of the United Nations, Australia is having a voice in the making of the peace. The Commonwealth's Minister for External Affairs (Dr. Evatt) many times has made it clear that Australia is willing and ready to assume her share of world responsibility. She is prepared for the future and has full confidence in her destiny. Australia is a great country but has a long way to go before it is fully developed. It is a country with a past of distinction, looking forward to a future of worthy achievements.

more recently as associate pastor. Prior to his appointment, he worked for a steel company at Newcastle, attending night school over a period of five years to qualify as a metallurgist.

ALVIN FLOYD BURDEKIN, also appointed at the recent General Conference, was born in 1915; he married Laura Peisker in 1941. They have three children. Brother Burdekin has ministered as an elder since 1940, has been a diligent and devoted worker with the young people, and has otherwise served the Leichhardt Branch at Sydney, of which he is a member. For some years prior to his appointment, he was a police officer in New South Wales; more recently he held an executive position at Sydney in this service.

These appointees constituting our present missionary force of the church in Australasia are thoroughgoing, young, vigorous, devoted, and promising. They are now joined by Apostle R. E. Davey, who serves as their supervising minister. It is anticipated that through their ministry, in association with the many willing and capable local workers, the cause in the Australasian mission shall be strengthened and advanced.

hymnal, a printed, clothbound selection of over 250 hymns was first published in 1936. This hymnal contained many of the old Zion's Praises hymns for church school work, as well as some from the new Saints' Hymnal. This has recently been reprinted and continues to be a most popular help to branches and reunions throughout the mission.

Membership Manual by C. A. Davies, now well-known throughout the church, was compiled in Australia for publication and has since been printed by the Herald Publishing House for general distribution. This manual was printed separately in Australia for local use.

Through all the activities of this department, we have attempted to keep our people informed concerning the program of the church and their responsibilities thereto. We are grateful for the voluntary work of the many who have helped in a material way to achieve this.

HERALD HOUSE

Briefs

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI. — Following the serving of the Communion at 11:00 a.m., June 5, at Stone Church, Apostle E. J. Gleazer and Bishop G. L. DeLapp under the direction of the First Presidency set apart Brother Lloyd L. Bland to the office of high priest. Brother Bland is the church auditor. The Communion service together with the two outstanding solos by James Stanley provided an excellent setting for the ceremony of ordination.

The Stone Church Junior and Senior Zion's Leagues joined in a week end retreat at Gardner Lake the week end of June 5. Pastor Glaude Smith was in charge of the retreat and Doris Oakman, Senior League leader, helped in arrangements. Flag raising was held Saturday morning under the direction of Bert Johnson and Edgar Van Fleet. There was a water carnival in the afternoon planned by Marian Davis. At a round table discussion in the evening, Ed Van Fleet, Bert Johnson, Lloyd Wise, and Bob Fredenburg gave talks and the group joined in the discussion of the subject, "Be Ye Also Ready." The evening campfire was under the direction of Jeannie Deal. After campfire, the group boarded the boats and locked them in a circle in the middle of the lake for a hymn sing. Sunday morning they had an early prayer and fellowship service and at 11:00 Glaude Smith presided at a Communion service, giving a pastoral talk, "The Elect According to the Covenant." At 2:00 p.m., the camp closed with a lakeside service led by Bob Fredenburg. About fifty young people were present.

Two Latter Day Saint boys are included among the five boys chosen from William Chrisman High School to attend Missouri's Boy's State. They are George Lund, son of Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Lund, and George DeLapp, son of Mr. and Mrs. G. Leslie DeLapp. Missouri Boy's State is a citizenship training project sponsored by the American Legion, Department of Missouri. The boys are selected by various local organizations and will go to Kemper Military Academy at Boonville. The slogan of Boy's State is "Democracy Depends on Me."

The Cantanina Chorus, under the direction of Mrs. J. T. Westwood, Jr., gave its annual spring concert at Stone Church on June 10. This group of thirty-five young women perform a service to the congregations of the center place, and are always willing to sing for services and weddings, besides filling regular engagements at their home congregation, Stone Church.

The Annual Vacation Church School began Friday, June 3, with registration day at ten branches. Three schools opened on June 10: Mount Washington, Englewood, and Sugar Creek. Mrs. Violet Sackman is city-wide supervisor for the schools and Clair Green is the pastor co-ordinator.

The first meeting was held in the new College Street Mission church on July 6. It was the midweek prayer service. On June 24 an ice cream social was held in the Stone Church annex for the College Street church fund.

TABOR, IOWA. — Six new members were added to the church at the close of a two weeks' series held in March by Seventy Harold I. Velt. The church was filled on Sunday evening, June 19, when Apostle Paul Hanson showed a portion of his slides of his recent trip to South America.—Reported by LESTER I. HUNT.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS. — On June 23, Pastor Almer W. Sheehy, George Armeson, legal counselor, and Treasurer Ralph M. Hardy completed the purchase transactions to the property at 11 Summit Street, Somerville, Massachusetts. This will be the parsonage for the Boston Branch. It is a comfortable nine-room house, heated by oil and the interior is well decorated.

mechanism

The "Entertainer" 300 holds 50 slides in Readymounts or 25 mounted slides in the upper magazine. Pressing the plunger changes slides and feeds them on through the projector to the storage compartment where they stack in correct order for the next showing. The "Entertainer" gives maximum illumination with a 300-watt lamp. The "sharp-to-the-edges" screen image is the result of a completely new design of optical system with coating of all optical elements. The new oversize condensers plus the coating have resulted in an increase of over 40% in screen brilliance. The high angle micro-tilt elevator controlled by the front knob gives smooth, effortless placement of the screen image. With Morocco Bronze and satin chrome finish, and a smart two-tone lift off case, the "Entertainer" 300 is being introduced at

Youth in Action

By Paul H. Henricks

STANDING ON THE SIDE LINES to observe Zion's League development in Australia, you'd have seen a variety of phases and changes crammed all too quickly one on top of the other into its short twelve years' existence. The final results have been good, but the in-between gropings and gear changes were many.

The Zion's League in Australia has achieved much, but its achievements have come after a period of natural growing pains. Its initial teething came in its endeavor to find suitable and appropriate methods of expressing itself in an interesting and helpful way. Here it had to combat age-old prejudices to the effect that no church service could be complete without a sermon or address, or at least class study.

No sooner had this first negative reaction been overcome, than our country found itself in the midst of a war in which over 200 of the young men and women of the mission enlisted and consequently were separated from their home branches and Leagues. That the League carried on as successfully as it did was a tribute to the courage and leadership qualities of the fine young girls of the church who kept it going . . . successfully enough to fill four mission-wide projects in record time and with results beyond expectations.

Today, as a maturing adolescent, the Australian Zion's League can count itself successful if for no other reason than that it has succeeded in uniting the youth of the church in this mission. Visualize a mission of 3,200 members, with no more than 500 young people of Zion's League age. Separate them into some thirty branches, and scatter them over a distance of nearly 4,000 miles—the distance between Fremantle and Brisbane, the two most distant centers—and you have one of the major problems of young people in Australia.

PLAYING A BIG PART in uniting the young people in this scattered mission was their youth paper, Zion's League Guide. Through its influence, young people kept abreast of the developments and activities of Leaguers in other centers so that today there is scarcely a Leaguer in Australia that has not heard of most other young church members in every part of the country. The consequent common interest and ideals of young people in the direction of the church have thus been fostered. Typifying this has been the keen interest shown by all Leagues in the four mission projects successfully conducted since Zion's League's inception. The Guide was recently discontinued as a separate magazine, and the League is now represented in The Standard, official publication of the Australian Mission.

These projects, entered into with some trepidation on the part of mission leaders, merely served to challenge young people to efforts and results far in excess of those sought or expected. Three of these projects involved the support of local appointee missionaries during their training and initial two-year appointment. The fourth was completing payment on the headquarters mission cottage.

TYPICAL of the splendid support of youth throughout the mission was that of Perth and similarly situated Leagues. These young people—as far as 3,000 miles from mission headquarters, and thus far from the resultant personal interest and contact involved in new missionary appointments—were among the most enthusiastic and practical supporters of these projects.

Reunions, too, have played a big part in this uniting in spirit. At the Tiona, Marysville, and Nairne camps, young people have had the very real joy of fellowship under ideal conditions. Here many members from smaller branches have met and mingled for the first time with large numbers of young people.

It was at one of these reunions—Tiona, 1942—that the young people of this mission received through Apostle George Mesley a most outstanding spiritual manifestation. The one hundred young people present counted this inspirational message a landmark in their church experience as they were exhorted to "build and not betray."

Missionary endeavor has had its place in the program of most of the Leagues of the mission. To the forefront in enthusiasm have been the Brisbane Leagues with their evangelical street meetings. Balmain and other Leagues have carried out very successful door-to-door canvasses seeking young members for the church school.

ZION'S LEAGUE IN AUSTRALIA has made and is making progress. Unlike one of our bush fires, it has not carried all before it. It has, in fact, fallen short in many respects, chiefly to the extent of the lack of effort put into it by individual Leaguers. It has fallen short inasmuch as it did not reclaim a very high proportion of its servicemen and women. Again it has lost many opportunities of winning a large number of visiting servicemen and Beware — Man-killer!

I WAS HANDED a pamphlet today. Across its cover were spread the words, "Cancer Is a Man-Killer." In part this pamphlet read, "X ray, radium, or surgery, either singly or in combination, are the approved methods for treatment of cancer. There is no short cut. Beware of quacks! Salves, pills, ointments, herbs, and the like will not help. The effect of all quack cures is the same—disillusionment and death!" The pamphlet went on to tell of the symptoms of cancer and preventive steps which could be taken to protect oneself. These were some of the truths men had recognized in regard to their physical well-being.

Just as there are quacks in the physical sciences, there are quacks in the spiritual realm against which we must guard. Although he later found himself entangled, King Saul recognized this fact when he said, "Let witches and sorcerers from my kingdom be gone." We daily hear the advice of spiritual quacks in the doctrines of the many "isms," tellers of half-truths and self-fashioned prophets. Their words are made to sound attractive and logical to some of the weak reasoning of the human mind.

women who passed through various branches and Leagues during the war. It has fallen short—and still is—to the extent that we lose far too many of our young people. These things acknowledged, the church in Australia is still better for the Zion's League movement. It has been the biggest factor in memory in the development of young people in the church. It is a success in Australia to the extent that young people, more than ever, are aware of the goals and standards of the church and of the purpose of God. More important, they are doing something about them.

To this extent, the youth of the church in Australia have become united in action for Christ.

By William G. Searles

SIN IS THE DREADED MAN-KILLER of the soul. We have learned that it has only one "approved" treatment—faith, repentance, laying on of hands—indeed, there is no short cut. Christ specifically laid down these principles.

Just as cancer goes through several stages, the man-killer, sin, goes through various stages. If discovered early, it can be treated readily, and recovery is usually rapid. However, in the later stages it responds to treatment slowly, and the possibilities of effecting a recovery are fewer. Maybe we should come to recognize some of the symptoms of sin better. Undue concern in self, loss of foresight and vision, putting secondary things first, failing to seek God's counsel and blessing are a few. As regular physical check-ups are made for various diseases, regular checks should also be made on one's spiritual health.

WE SHALL KNOW the spiritual quacks—deceivers, false teachers, and workers of darkness—by comparing their wares with the words of one whose stature and perfection is to be our single standard and guide.

The years of the last decade have seen many governments and political philosophies rise and fall. They fell as they failed to fulfill their expectations and purpose of leading men to a satisfying and more perfect purpose. Their fall was the evidence of their failure to apply the "approved" treatment. Men have given up their physical lives and gone to their graves. We who live on could lay them to rest, knowing they had lived as Christians and had died unto Christ as they had lived. At the opposite pole, we see men who perish before our very eyes for want of the divine and saving light, despite the fact that they live on physically. This light could be theirs if they would follow that divinely simple but effective treatment for sin. Yes, the effect of all quack cures is the same—disillusionment and death.

May we have God's help in leading men to see the spiritual counterpart of a seemingly apparent physical truth.

J Never Realized . . .

SICK IN BODY and bruised in spirit, I came home to Zion where I could be cared for more adequately. I had received administration but now, again, I needed more help, more strength, which I knew our Heavenly Father alone could give.

In preparation for the visit of the elders, I lay thinking of this sacrament of our church and how wonderful it was that we could count on God. It seemed quite fitting, too, that we were not always able, of ourselves, to receive the blessing God had for us, but needed to ask for the prayers of the elders in our behalf.

On that evening there were not three hearts lifted in prayer but many in addition to my family. Old friends, good friends had called, reminding us that I would not be forgotten before their family altars. What a beautiful and comforting thought that was. What a humbling thought.

Surely I was held up before the Throne of Mercy to receive the blessing which slipped so quietly over my weakened body.

I never realized . . . that if the combined desires of our hearts, expressed in that togetherness of our prayer and faith, could accomplish so much good within a physical being . . . what we can do as a church when we will join hearts in this perfect unity and hold up our hands to God.

LOUISE SCOTT WRIGLEY.

Brown of Saginaw, Michigan, was born November 5, 1921, at Fountain, Michigan, and died of injuries received when he was shot down over Holland on November 30, 1943. He moved with his parents to Saginaw as a small child and was graduated from high school there in 1939. He attended Alma College for a year and a half before enlisting in the Air Corps on January 29, 1942. He took his training at San Antonio, Texas, and East St. Louis, Illinois, receiving his wings on November 10, 1942. He was sent to England in June, 1943, as a fighter pilot with the Eighth Air Force. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since March, 1930.

Besides his parents, he leaves a brother,

Ralph, Jr.; three sisters: Mrs. Calvin Martin, Mrs. Gerald Harris, and Mrs. Robert Cramp-ton; his grandmother, Mrs. Estella Brant; and his grandfather, Fred Kirby. Military funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Saginaw, Elder Lewis Grice officiating. Interment was in the Roselawn Memorial Gardens.

BLALOCK.—Ulysses A., was born November 17, 1867, and died at the Papago Veterans' Hospital in Phoenix, Arizona, on May 24, 1949. He was a Spanish-American War veteran and had spent his last years in Arizona. He is survived by two sisters: Mrs. Amy L. Vanmeter and Mrs. Rella Petreoe; and a step-son, Clarence Haskin of Cactus, Arizona. His wife preceded him in death. Funeral services were held at the Memory Chapel of the A. L. Moore and Sons Mortuary, Elder Marion M. Blakely officiating. A graveside service was conducted by the Spanish-American War Veterans. Interment was in Greenwood Cemetery, Phoenix.

GREEN.—Ann M., was born October 21, 1885, and died May 12, 1949, at her home in Kansas City, Kansas. She had lived in Independence, Missouri, many years before moving to Kansas; while in Independence she became a member of the Reorganized Church. She was a strong defender of the gospel and loved to talk about the good qualities of the church. She is survived by her husband, Dole Green, three sons: Paul F. Paine and Charles E. Bailey of Kansas City, Missouri, and John R. Bailey of Independence; a sister, Mrs. Edith Kraus of Eskridge, Kansas; three grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery in Independence.

DAVENPORT.—Blanch Freeman, was born February 6, 1872, in Wisconsin, and died May 31, 1949, at the home of her daughter and son-in-law at Soldiers Grove, Wisconsin, where she had been cared for during her long illness. On August 19, 1889, she was married to Phillip Davenport, Sr., who preceded her in death on February 7, 1946. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since June 21, 1903, and was active in women's work.

Surviving are two children: Wesley of La-Crosse, Wisconsin, and Bessie Fish of Soldiers Grove; a brother, Oliver Freeman of Soldiers Grove; two sisters: Mrs. Olive Smith of Des Moines, Iowa, and Mrs. Maud Brookings of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; four grandchildren; and seven great-grandchildren. Two children preceded her in death. Elder Jasper O. Dutton was in charge of the funeral service. Interment was in Montgomeryville Cemetery.

HALL.—Ernest Bruce, son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Christopher Hall, was born August 16, 1894, at Georgetown, Ontario, and died April 24, 1949, at Guelph, Ontario. He was married to Christina Demmons on August 3, 1927. He was a member of the Anglican Church until March 10, 1947, when he was baptized into the Reorganized Church. On December 12, 1948, he was ordained to the office of deacon and gave unstintingly of his time to the church during the remainder of his life. Death came suddenly and unexpectedly following two strokes in the same evening.

He is survived by his wife; a son, Lorne; a daughter, Ruth; a sister, Miss Gladys Hall; and three brothers: Robert, Chester, and Walter. Elder F. C. McLean conducted the funeral at the Reorganized Church in Guelph. Interment was in the Woodlawn Cemetery.

COWEN.—Rebecca Aurilla, daughter of Enoch E. and Rebecca M. Bradley, was born October 29, 1873, in Benton County, Arkansas, and died June 21, 1949, at her son's home in Kirkwood, Missouri, following a fall down the basement steps. At the age of two, she moved with her parents in a covered wagon to Webb City, Missouri, where she lived until 1938, at which time she made her home with her daughter in Independence, Missouri. She was baptized in 1892 and was an active member of the Webb City church for many years. On February 4, 1896, she was married to Frank H. Cowen who preceded her in death on May 1, 1929. She was visiting her son at the time of her fatal accident.

She is survived by her daughter, Nelvita Cowen of Independence; a son, F. Arthur Cowen of Kirkwood; a sister, Mrs. Florida Bradford of Independence; and two grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Glaude A. Smith at the Speaks Chapel in Independence and by Elder John Blackmore at the graveside in the Webb City Mount Hope Cemetery.

GOULDSMITH.—Nelson R., son of Claude and Emma Gouldsmith of Independence, Missouri, was born April 28, 1902 at Nebraska City, Nebraska, and died May 25, 1949, at the Independence Sanitarium. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since a small boy.

He is survived by his wife, Louise, of Independence; his parents, and a sister, Mrs. Mary E. Bryan of Tulsa, Oklahoma. Funeral services were held at the Roland Speaks Chapel in Independence, Elder Evan Fry officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

 STORM

Tornadoes have taken thousands of lives this year and destroyed millions of dollars in property. The tornado cloud is a special type, easily recognized—black, menacing, and terrible as the spirit of evil.

On a recent afternoon there was one here in Home Town. It spread out like a great smothering blanket, and though there was a thin rim of light around the horizon, it was as dark as night overhead. To the west there was a slender line of a funnel reaching down from the clouds to the homes below, a snake appearing thing. . . . There must have been some prayers going up at the moment, and after a long interval the funnel withdrew back into the cloud again. Then the storm dissipated into a heavy but harmless rain.

You may laugh at those who pray about the weather. But if you had ever been in a tornado, you would pray, too.

 "Yo HO!"

Garland Tickemyer, at the recent Berkeley Appointee's Institute, taught the men to breathe "from the diaphragm" as part of the speech training course. An excellent exercise for this is a sturdy "yo. HO," giving a push from 'way down deep. The fourteen men got the idea and enjoyed it so much that soon "Yo HO" was the greeting password for them wherever they went.

On a Saturday which they had free, the men, under the leadership of Seventy Russell Ralston, drove in three cars from Berkeley to San Francisco for a sight-seeing tour. They visited Chinatown, saw Muir's Wood, had a picnic dinner, and enjoyed a pleasant day of recreation. On one occasion they were in a tiny shop in the midst of Chinatown, all fourteen of them looking at the curious merchandise and keeping the clerks very busy.

George Mesley moved to the door and restless to be on the way, called out, "Yo HO!" As if they had rehearsed for two months, the men turned immediately from what they were doing and moved out the door in a body. It wasn't until they were out of the shop that they became conscious of their own extraordinary behavior. Glancing back through the door, they saw looks of surprise and puzzlement on the faces of the clerks, as they no doubt wondered what sort of an organization they had been waiting upon.

 ILLUSIONS

Our illusions about ourselves are endless and amusing. . . . A man thinks he can do anything if he can get the latest and best machine or gadget. . . . A woman will tackle any job in the world if she can begin with a pretty costume, specially designed for it. . . . A preacher has faith that he could redeem the world if he could only find the right words. . . . Gangsters would be happy if they could find a really perfect racket—with no rivals, no police, no jails. . . . A boy could make the whole world behave with a new toy pistol, a badge, and a cowboy hat. A girl, with a permanent and a new dress. . . . To your pet dog, a nice, ripe bone is a passport to heaven. . . . The party boss is sure the country would be saved if he could get everybody to vote a straight ticket—his ticket.

And Editors? Oh, they would settle for an article—a good article—a really good article!

THROUGH THE WEST DOOR

By Roy A. Cheville

This book commemorates Graceland's first fifty years of service to the church. You who read the pleasant pages of this book will soon discover that it is a love story—a record of love for young people, and a desire to help them. It is a story of the vision and devotion of Graceland's founders, and it tells of the persistent effort of a president to gain recognition for the growing college.

An Assistant Pastor

THERE IS NO CHEAPER WAY for a branch to maintain an assistant pastor than to get the Saints' Herald into every home. That does not intimate that the group as a congregation will have to pay the subscription price and give it to every family. But that those who could not or would not get it otherwise should be thus nurtured. Isn't it just as important in the culture of Saints that the Herald is not absent from the weekly diet of those who feel they cannot afford it, as it is that such members are not kept from the pews they cannot fully support?

But suppose your branch had 100 families. It would cost only $350 (in the United States) to send fifty-two issues into each home during the year. What quality could be bought in an assistant pastor for that? Would you expect him to be informed on all the church activities—its departments, its missions, missionary activities, official statements, news from the branches, letters from the members, and the happenings at headquarters? The Herald has all these and more. The subscription price, $3.50, seems like a lot until you compare it with the upkeep of an auto or an evening out with two meals. The Herald has a week's meals of choice, sustaining food for the whole family.

Mr. Branch President, here's your opportunity to have an efficient assistant at a price you can afford. Make this your branch motto: "A Herald in every home."

Introducing...

DONALD O. CHESWORTH (page 5) was born in Fall River, Massachusetts, September 21, 1910. He left high school in his sophomore year to work in a broker's office. He continued his high school education in night school and business college. In 1929 he entered Graceland College, where he completed his academy and junior college work and then went on to Iowa University, where he received his bachelor's degree.

Brother Chesworth was ordained a priest in 1934, an elder in 1938, and a high priest in 1941, when he became a member of the Kansas City Stake High Council. He was ordained a bishop in 1946. He has done pastoral work in Kansas City, Missouri, Kansas City, Kansas, and Detroit, Michigan. He also served as district president for the Detroit-Windsor District. Since 1946 he has been assigned as bishop of the Eastern Mission, which includes the New England States, New York, Eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Washington, D. C.

In 1936 he married Alice Catherine Lane. They have one son, Donald, who is seven years old.

L. WAYNE UPDIKE (page 7), who last wrote for us on the subject of "Baptism and Church Membership," a serial in two parts in the issues of April 30 and May 7, was introduced to our Herald readers at that time.

BESSIE MAY (CHRISTENSON) TAYLOR (page 12) has contributed frequently and well to the Herald columns during the past six years. She was born in Crescent, Iowa, baptized in Holden, Missouri, and is now living in Lawrence, Kansas, where she is employed part time while working towards a degree at Kansas University in the School of Education, majoring in history.

Sister Taylor has been employed by the Lawrence Social Service League as store manager for the past twelve years, except for a little time when she was on a leave of absence as a foreman in the stenciling department of the Hercules Powder Company during the war.

She was married in 1921 to George Ellard Taylor. To them were born four sons: Wesley, Edgar, George, and Herbert. The three older boys served in the Merchant Marine during the war, and two of the older sons are still in the service, holding the rank of engineers. The two younger boys are students in Kansas University with their mother.

Sister Taylor has been a widow since 1932. She is active in civic affairs and as a church school teacher. Her special interest is "archæology of the Book of Mormon."

News & Notes

GAINS IN MUSKOGEE, OKLAHOMA

Apostle Reed Holmes reports that nine were baptized on Children's Day in the Muskogee Mission. Pastor William Howard baptized the nine candidates. District President Victor J. Witte preached the closing sermon after the confirmations were cared for in the afternoon. Elder and Mrs. Howard moved to Muskogee and purchased a grocery store and have been active in the work of the church. They looked around for a place that needed help and chose Muskogee, Oklahoma. Apostle Holmes comments that the group there is excellent and enthusiastic.

CHURCH DEDICATION

On Sunday, May 29, the Galesburg, Illinois, Branch dedicated their church, after the completion of payment for its recent redecoration. The Saints of the Rock Island District joined in the event at which President Israel A. Smith was a guest. He preached at 11:00 and gave the dedicatory address in the afternoon. Apostle D. T. Williams offered the dedicatory prayer and accepted the deed and the key on behalf of the General Church. District President Lyle Woodstock was also present and helped with arrangements.

CHURCH AMATEUR RADIO NETWORK

A group of Reorganized Latter Day Saint amateur radio enthusiasts have formed a "network" and contact each other by code or phone. They are eager to get all Reorganized Latter Day Saint radio hams to contact them. The group is sparked by Clarence (Bud) Resch and Ammon H. Davis, brothers-in-law, of Independence, Missouri. The following men have made contact with one another:

BAPTISMS IN NEBRASKA

Seventy J. Charles May reports that the series he held in Gering, Nebraska, were proving successful. Four were baptized on June 26 and a baby was blessed. Two family circles were completed. Four or five others were deeply interested, and Brother May planned to remain in Gering for cottage work for several days. Some of the Torrington, Wyoming, Saints were present Sunday, and there was a total of sixty-four present for the 11:00 a.m. preaching service.

GOOD REUNION SPIRIT

Apostle D. T. Williams reports two good reunions, one in the Des Moines District and one at Aledo, Illinois, for the Rock Island District. He, as apostle in charge, was present at both reunions. Other members of the staff at Des Moines included Bishop Walter N. Johnson, Evangelist Ray Whiting, and Miss B. Mildred Nelson. Bishop L. Wayne Updike, Ray Whiting, and Mrs. V. D. Ruch were members of the staff at Aledo.

Cultivate the Best Gifts

“The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. ¶For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; ¶To another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; ¶To another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues: ¶But all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.”

—I Corinthians 12: 7-11.

Theme for August

The pastoral theme for the month of August is adapted from a line by Paul in I Corinthians 12: 31, “Covet earnestly the best gifts.” Modern translations give different renditions of the statement: “Cultivate the higher endowments,”—Goodspeed; “Set your hearts on the higher talents,”—Moffatt; “Ever seek to excel in the greater gifts,”—Weymouth; “Earnestly desire the higher gifts,”—the new Revised Standard Version. At this point the Emphatic Diaglott differs from the other translations of the Greek text in removing it from the imperative mood and making it a simple declaration of fact: “You earnestly desire the more eminent gifts.” Unable to judge the validity of this difference, one can only observe that it seems to be harmonious with Paul’s purpose, so apparent in the context.

The Link

It is a principle of literary interpretation that no statement should be isolated from its context. Such isolation may lead to misunderstanding or to unfairness to the author. Chapter thirteen of our Scripture lesson is a part of the context of chapter twelve. They are parts A and B of a single thought; they go together.

Part B of the discussion of spiritual gifts is introduced by the literary device known as the “connecting link”—in this case a disjunctive—the words “and yet” which have the force of “but.” After all of the discussion of the spiritual gifts, Paul says, “And yet I shew unto you a more excellent way.” There is one quality, he informs us, without which all these gifts are valueless. That word, rendered by the King James version, is “charity.” The Diaglott and the modern versions call it “love.” In giving this emphasis, Paul is in perfect harmony with Jesus in his statement of the Law of Love—“the first and great commandment.”

As we think of the many problems in human relations that arise in our congregations and among our people, we are aware of the great importance of the cultivation of that one supremely good gift—the gift of being able to love others, to love them when we do not agree, to love them in spite of our faults and theirs.

A Recent Admonition

The Latter Day Prophet gives a wise admonition in reference to the cultivation of the gifts: “Seek earnestly the best gifts, always remembering for what they are given.”—Doctrine and Covenants 46: 4. The words that follow indicate that the gifts are for the benefit of the faithful members of the church, and not for curious sign seekers.

Other Gifts

The list given in I Corinthians 12 includes the principal spiritual gifts, but it does not include all of the “best gifts.” Some people have a gift or aptitude for music, some for teaching, some for administrative work, some for preaching, some for evangelism, some for testimony, some for comforting the discouraged, some for prayer, and many others that make rich and valuable contributions to the work of the church and its service to the people.

In the great democracy of God, all kinds of people (except the evil, who suffer from misdirected good) with all kinds of talents and powers are needed. If you have not found a use for your gift, be sure it is not God’s will that it should be wasting. Perhaps you need to find a way to hitch your power to God’s work. A horse without a harness can pull no load. A motor with no transmission is useless. A talent with no practical application goes begging.

Our Obligation

Whatever capacity you may have for helping others is a gift from God. It is a part of your stewardship, and you are responsible for its use and development.

In the Parable of the Talents (Matthew 25: 14-30), Jesus made clear the fact that unless we cultivate our gifts and powers, they will languish and we will lose them. The legs of the runner are developed for speed, the arms of the laborer acquire power, the soul of the Christian worker is increased in strength as it serves. Continued inactivity reduces anything to a state of weakness. The capacities of the mind and spirit will likewise fade and fail if we do not keep them strong in use.

One further thought: Are you seeking happiness in life? Then use your gifts. The happy people are those who do, who grow, who develop, who serve. In any public park, look at the faces of those who walk and those who sit. Which ones are smiling? You know the answer! Begin work today. L. J. L.

Information Wanted

Our church members have been very helpful through the years in getting information into our hands when they have seen misrepresentations in books, magazines, and newspapers. We greatly appreciate their help and co-operation.

We have asked quite a number of our appointees to do research work for us, and we feel they will likely be of special help. However, it is a matter in which members generally can be of assistance.

INTERVIEW WITH A COLORED MINISTER

Some little time ago when traveling by rail from Los Angeles to Independence, I noticed one colored civilian passenger in the Pullman coach. This was not such an unusual sight as it would have been some years ago. Colored men in the uniform of the armed services are not an uncommon sight in Pullman and day coaches. The fact that this civilian was received in the Pullman coach and in the diner without comment indicated some changes since the day when Booker T. Washington would have been barred from such privileges.

This particular man of whom I speak was well dressed, dignified in his bearing, and obviously well educated and well bred. I took occasion to talk with him and, as expected, found him to be a minister. He represents a very well-known and influential Protestant Church and has traveled extensively throughout the United States. In response to my questioning, he said in substance that he believed the relationships between colored and white people in the United States are improving. He was not in favor of any radical legislation or radical endeavors of any sort to force the issue. He felt that the relationship between the two races is in process of evolution and requires patience, tact, and good will rather than arbitrary action of any sort. He felt that his people were quite well treated in Los Angeles. While not barred by law from some of the better hotels, he said there were ways of making Negroes feel that they had best go somewhere else, but, as a rule, he thought they were well received in shops, hotels, and some of them held quite favorable positions in various lines of county and city services. He considered Oregon about the best state in the union in regard to its treatment of Negroes; Missouri among the worst of the so-called "border states."

I questioned this man in particular about his feeling in the matter of mixing the two races in church congregations. He replied that it is the rule of his church that congregations shall be separate. They are to co-operate in various ways and may exchange friendly visits, but he believed it to be the wish and judgment of his own colored people that they should meet in separate congregations. Under present conditions he felt that was the better course for them and for the white people. Situations vary in different localities, and in many places the situation may be in a delicate and even dangerous balance, and lack of wisdom in forcing the issue in almost any locality might do more harm than good for his people.

I was interested in his reactions on behalf of his people, as they represented the judgment of a colored man obviously intelligent, educated, and of rather wide experience in travel and church administration. Furthermore, the question is one that we ourselves as a church must consider and decide upon before we accomplish any work of considerable consequence among colored people. Shall we endeavor immediately to mix them in with white congregations? Or shall we establish missions among and for colored people, and presently organize them into branches, ministered to by colored men, divinely called and trained for that work, trusting the course of time and development of good will to bring about increasingly better relationships and understanding between the two races?

There is no question but that this racial problem is of considerable importance in the United States and Canada, and in the judgment of the man I have quoted conditions are improving. They are on the upgrade, with better understanding and co-operation. Radicalism and lack of wisdom on the part of either white or colored people in any locality, no matter how good the intentions, may result disastrously.

So far as we as a church are concerned, we never have accomplished much by haphazard, hit-or-miss methods in reaching the colored population. If and when we are ready to attack the problem with any hope of success, we must do so with a well-defined, well-organized program, and with a definite decision as to the best way in which to minister to and organize converts from among the colored people. While our decisions cannot be made for us by some other church, the experiences of the peoples of other churches are worth taking into consideration. ELBERT A. SMITH.

Stewardship

By Bishop D. O. Chesworth

"The same heavenly messenger added a caution to me that I must have no other object in view in getting the plates but to glorify God, and must not be influenced by any other motive but that of the building of his kingdom."—Joseph Smith's account of his experience on the night of September 21, 1823.

THE YOUNG MAN who said these words and was to become the American Prophet received further instruction at each annual interview with this messenger respecting what the Lord was going to do and how and in what manner his kingdom was to be conducted in the last days.

From revelation received since that time, we have learned that latter-day stewardship is extremely important in the earthly kingdom which is to be established.

A sense of personal responsibility—stewardship consciousness—has been developing from the dawn of history. The idea prevailed among primitive peoples that there must be some relationship between human beings and divine power. Primitive worship therefore took the form of offering sacrifices to the gods in recognition of their creative power, in order to secure their favor. This offering of sacrifice was followed by the devoting of a separated portion of one's property to uses of religion: firstlings, or the first animal born, the first fruits, the first part of crops harvested, etc. The principle was general in that to the god the first and best must be dedicated.

From the "law of first fruits" there emerged the law of the "tithe" which was originally a tax levied on grain and the products of the soil. This law was widely prevalent and in operation among the Babylonians, Phoenicians, Persians, Egyptians, Ethiopians, Greeks, Romans, and others. Though mainly religious, the tithe was also political and sometimes represented both taxation for the state and offerings for the temple worship. For Old Testament background, let us consider the Hebrew tithe. The custom was made obligatory by legal statute. We find three distinct records of laws concerning tithes in the Pentateuch, namely Deuteronomy 14: 22-29 and 26: 12-15; Numbers 18: 20-32; and Leviticus 27: 30-33. The first seems quite modern when we include the "money tithe" along with that of corn, oil, flocks, and seed. If distance prohibited the carrying, then the people could turn their goods into money and bind it up in hand temporarily.

THE CHURCH has always taught stewardship, more or less, although spasmodically and intermittently. Through the years of the Christian Era, it was chiefly taught from the viewpoint of externalism, meaning outward rather than to the heart and to our way of life. The chief, if not the sole purpose of this teaching was to reap an immediate harvest of funds. Prior to the twentieth century, the use of the word stewardship was limited almost altogether to property relations; whereas now it is clearly evident that the primary purpose of stewardship is not the increasing of church finances or augmenting budgets, but rather the development of saintly character. The full consecration of the entire self, the practice of living on life's highest level, the richest possible experience through the management of life and all its resources for God and the good of all is made possible through stewardship.

Nothing that we have of personality, powers, or possessions is exempt from the law of stewardship. Christ covers the whole range of man's accountability. When related to property, it embraces all the methods both of acquiring and distributing wealth, money-making, money-giving, money-saving, and money-spending. Let us remember, however, that stewardship is vastly greater than the money question. The personality of God is included in it. Money-giving should be an act of worship lifted out of the sphere of the legal requirement into the realm of love.

"The love of Christ constraineth us." Love in action is stewardship. Love conquers selfishness. The thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians is not mere sentiment; it is sound, practical, stewardship philosophy. "Where love fails to win, force is hopeless." I am reminded of two people who felt at liberty to comment on my ministry one time in the following expressions, "You should be more stern," and "You should use the strong arm." Responding to each situation, I reminded these men that unless we could succeed through the method of Christ with love, we were working in vain.

TO UNDERSTAND STEWARDSHIP we must understand the attitude of Jesus toward the whole of life. The acceptance and practice of this principle is the undergirding force of the whole Christian movement.

For this reason a program of education and promotion of stewardship is of primary importance in the life of the church. Requisites for success in this phase of the work are faith, prayer, personal dedication, able leadership, good planning, consistent work, and adequate materials. Jesus taught that all man is and has are gifts from God—a stewardship.

G. Ernest Thomas in To Whom Much Is Given suggests that there are various avenues of stewardship such as man's total responsibility with reference to his opportunities, his personal service, his use of small things, his exercise of educational talents, his conduct of business or professional life, his creation of wealth and use of money, his social heritage, his opportunity for spreading the gospel of Christ, and his individual service through his church.

ONLY A CHURCH whose members accept and practice the principles of stewardship can meet the needs of our world in this hour. The summons to stewardship came like this, "How is it that I hear this of thee? Give an account of thy stewardship."—Luke 16: 2. Jesus came asking probing questions. This one is part of one of the most familiar parables of Jesus. It is the story of a steward who was accused by his master of wasting the goods entrusted to him. The man tried desperately to cover his record of neglect and waste. When his mistakes came to light ("Be sure your sin will find you out."—Numbers 32: 23), he heard his master's voice speaking words of rebuke, "How is it that I hear this of thee?" As Jesus spoke, each of the disciples saw himself as the steward who had been entrusted with a portion of the kingdom. We can't escape the personal implication here, though far removed by time and distance from the place where these words were uttered. The voice of the master pierces the barriers of selfishness and greed to reach the human heart.

Jesus used "steward" and "stewardship" on many occasions, enabling his followers to get a clear picture of their privilege and responsibility as recipients of the gifts of God. But in America the word stewardship was forgotten. Representative of national trends, the words getting, building, and expanding were used rather than giving, sharing, and loving.

Perhaps the words Jesus used are old fashioned. So is the idea of the kingdom of God, especially in a world when kings and emperors find their thrones tottering. The kingdom philosophy may not be a popular idea, yet no word gathers up more completely what Jesus brought so triumphantly to his followers. It will remain the best and richest hope for a world in which men may live together in harmony. Take the cross—it is old fashioned too, yet it remains as new and as challenging to the faithful disciple today as it was to those who lived in the first century. As the word and meaning of the cross still live, so must the word and idea of stewardship live; for this concept is the gift of Christ to his followers. For him it pictured more perfectly than any other word the unending gifts of the Heavenly Father and the duty of men to use those gifts wisely and well.

AFTER THE SAINTS were established in Ohio, they received word (Doctrine and Covenants 42) concerning the basic law for the church. In his book, Fundamentals, President F. Henry Edwards lists the following as principles of the law of stewardship from this revelation:

The basic motivation of stewardship is love of God and men. Those who truly love God will remember the poor and consecrate of their properties for their support. Every man must be made accountable to the Lord as a steward. The surplus created by stewards is to be used for the poor and needy and for the extension of the kingdom of God. Observance of this law is essential to salvation.

He further states:

Stewardship is a spiritual principle and an economic method. As a spiritual principle it lays on the steward the obligation of becoming profitable to God and to his fellows. As a practical procedure, stewardship introduces a new motivation into industry and economics. It substitutes for the profit motive the service motive of the true Christian. It then calls for efficiency in management and a sane and businesslike creation of goods and resources and their utilization for maintaining individual and group standards and extending the purpose of Divinity. Stewardship is a solution to our industrial ills if it is made to work. This requires, first of all, genuine conversion; for stewardship is primarily a spiritual enterprise, and its economic fruits are grown only from its spiritual roots.

When we refer to stewardship, we would not overlook the place of tithing. We should recognize that the greatest benefit in tithing comes back to the tithepayer who has, in his participation, broken the backbone of greed and covetousness. So often one who hasn't the grace to tithe gets a distorted view of wealth and becomes dominated by the unworthy cravings of a selfish heart. More than that, he breaks the close fellowship with God. One cannot worship God in sincerity when he knows he has robbed him.

We remember that statement of the wise man of old, "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase; so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."—Proverbs 3: 9. Surely this plan would save us from greedy hearts and from the most subtle and deceiving sin of covetousness, which sin leaves our lives barren of spiritual blessings and paralyzes the Lord's work.

Take a look at this sin called covetousness. It is seldom named, yet is one of the world's besetting sins. Certainly it is sly and artful, likely to escape unsuspected and unreproved. We pass it over with charity, for there is no discipline for the covetous man, and he often sits in the seat of power. Yet this philosophy of life was condemned on Mount Sinai—"Thou shalt not covet." And the great teacher of his-

The Abundant Life - By L. Wayne Updike

A Radio Sermon delivered on June 19, 1949, over KMBC

SOME YEARS AGO I was persuaded by a group of young people to go with them on a roller coaster. As we ascended the highest hump, all was noise and laughter, but as we began the rapid descent, the young man just ahead of me was the only one who had sufficient breath to shout. His voice carried to me the excited words, "Boy, I'm living!"

That little incident has remained in my memory. At various times I have heard people say, "This is really living!" And very often I've asked myself, "Just what is it that makes people happy?" This interest is increased when I read in the Scriptures that Jesus said, "I am come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly." What did he mean?

Today people spend millions of dollars and a great amount of time going from place to place, looking for interest and excitement. To stay at home for an evening is boredom. Others say, "I work such long hours, I don't have time to live." What constitutes the abundant life to which Jesus referred? What are the basic characteristics of a happy people? What is it that makes one person grow old sweetly and look forward to the hereafter with a great deal of anticipation, while another person becomes cynical and sour?

IN SEARCHING for the answer to these questions, I have found a few things that are important. Happy people work in harmony with God and their neighbors. I have never seen a person at his best when he was at discord with the forces around him. Neither have I observed an idle person who was happy for very long. Happiness involves a recognition of the fact that God has work to do. He has no intention of being inactive. He has plans for mankind. The abundant life, then, demands an active interest in God's plans for us.

This is the implication in the Scriptures which establishes that God is creator and that men are stewards for him. There is no reason for our stewardship apart from a purpose to get something done.

A rich life involves a desire to include all men in that active relationship. To find something which is worth-while and increases our happiness is one thing, but to continue in its appreciation is quite another matter. Continuing joy requires continuous sharing. It also requires wisdom. We know more in general today than did any previous generation, but with all our knowledge, we are still rushing here and there in search of pleasing activities. It takes time and effort to cultivate the qualities of patience and perseverance. We need the ability to take the overview in any situation. As we become more able to see situations in the wise, long-time view, the natural result is increasing satisfaction in living.

A HAPPY PERSON has both ultimate and intermediate objectives. Sometimes we see things which should be accomplished but which are so far away and so difficult to achieve that in the striving for them we lose heart and are diverted to other activities of little or no importance. The abundant life requires that objectives shall be designated in such plain terms that the vision of the ideal continues to carry us forward. But more than this, we must see that there are intermediate steps to be taken along the way. Someone has said, "Live in day-tight and hour-tight compartments." I would make one exception to that. Refuse to worry, but never slam the door upon pleasant anticipation. Set up objectives for today, but also keep in mind the objectives for tomorrow. Look forward to the joys that can be yours. Jesus did not say, "Sufficient unto the day are the joys thereof," but rather, "Take no thought for tomorrow; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." If you would be happy, therefore, set for yourself worth-while objectives and begin to anticipate their achievement.

Probably the most important of the characteristics which make the abundant life possible is the practice and ability of taking Jesus as a personal standard. Whenever we waver from the way toward the abundant life, we need some sure-fire method to restore us. If we are in the habit of feeling that Christ the Savior is with us, interested in us, and sharing in the goals we have set for ourselves, our life will have stability. No other one thing can do as much for an individual who seeks to live a rich and abundant life as to become acquainted with Jesus the Christ. Acquaintance with him may come through a study of the Scriptures. It may come by personal devotions. It may come through an observation of the wonders and beauties of the creation of God. Or it may be by the influence of the still, small voice which is available to men and women who place themselves in a position to hear. Regardless of how this influence of Jesus comes, it is always good for people. Every time you contact the Master, you are lifted up, and your life becomes richer.

You will readily see that all these characteristics stand upon the foundation of a faith in God and in his Son, Jesus Christ. You can't work out harmonious relationships with God unless you first believe there is a God. You can't be successful in taking Jesus with you as a constant companion to give you stability in life unless you feel that the Spirit of Christ is actually available.

OUR GENERATION is in desperate need of many things. But the supreme need, the need overarching and undergirding all other needs, is for a great creative Christian conviction. The call is for men and women who are utterly convinced about and completely committed to the truth and implications of the Christian revelation. God has spoken, God is speaking, and God will continue to speak if men will listen. God has acted, God is acting now, and God will continue to act if men will obey him. He has made known, and he continues to make known his divine intention. That is revelation, that is Christianity.

These basic convictions underlie every successful effort to work out the abundant life. If these convictions are not already yours, question yourself carefully to see if they might become yours in the near future. Whatever lights fail—and many have failed, and others are failing all about our broken world—the light of God in Jesus Christ will not fail. Let us be convinced about that. It is probable that the best of men will sometimes betray their highest ideals. And it is quite possible for good men to be betrayed by what they honestly believe to be the highest ideals. But it is utterly impossible for any man to be betrayed by the light and love and life of Jesus Christ.

The clue to the meaning of history is the divine intention which is revealed in Jesus Christ. It was Pindar, the Roman poet, who said, "Find out what you are and become it." We do not drive a new car for twenty minutes without trying to discover the use of its smallest gadget. Yet some of us have lived for decades without having spent a single day wrestling with the all-important question, "What is the meaning and purpose of my life? And what shall I do to express that meaning and fulfill that purpose?"

Pause, think, consult, listen to God. Discover the purpose of your life, your reason for being. And then, at whatever cost, believe and act in accordance with your discovery. Your life has a purpose, and, with the aid of Jesus Christ, you can find and understand that purpose. Understand it, and you can find direction and happiness.

LIFE IS NOT MEANT to be a crib or a trough at which we feed, grabbing for ourselves whatever is within reach and, if our position is advantageous, getting more than our neighbors. Life is an altar to which we are commanded to bring whatever we have and are. At it we surrender our sins and in return receive cleansing of soul and freedom of mind. It is an altar before which we seek and see and share those ultimate insights and values which alone give life its beauty, significance, security, and romance. Every human heart may welcome the tender invasion of the very life of God. It is possible for the soul of man to be so filled with the love of God that everything man does can be given meaning and placed in its proper setting. Everything man owns can play its proper part in working out the purpose in his life.

Let these convictions grow. Let them become the roadbed for your train of thought. Make them your constant companions. Thus you can come to realize that this is life eternal—to know God and Jesus Christ, his Son.

Edmund L. Kelley

Whatever has been said or written in reviewing the life and work of E. L. Kelley with its inestimable value to the church, the most appropriate tribute is found in the words, "He walked by a supreme faith in God."

He was born November 17, 1844, of Latter Day Saint heritage. This was the year that the church experienced one of its darkest hours, caused by the assassination of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. His father died while he was a boy, but the influence of the latter-day work was kept alive in the home, and he was baptized a few years after the Reorganized Church was established.

As a student in the university, a teacher, and a young lawyer, his interest in the church grew, and he was guided toward his major life work. He was ordained a priest in 1877 and a few years later an elder. In 1882 he became counselor to the Presiding Bishop. He then moved with his family to Kirtland, Ohio, where he was instrumental in securing title to the Kirtland Temple property for the Reorganized Church as the lawful successor of the original church.

In 1891 he became Presiding Bishop of the church, and continued in this office until 1916. During these years he represented the church in the famous Temple Lot case in which the church gained right to this property in Independence as the rightful successor to the original Latter Day Saints Church, only to have the decision reversed by the Appeal Court on the grounds that too much time had elapsed before action was begun.

Down through the years he was one of the guiding hands of a fast-growing organization. During this time the church built the Saints' Home, Graceland College, and established many branches and missions throughout the world. He traveled to all parts of the United States as well as to the British Isles and Europe in the interest of the church.

The great influence he had, however, should not be measured in his accomplishments, though they were many, or in his service to the church, the results of which continue on. His greatness was in his character as shown by his quiet, unshakable faith and his devotion to duty.

Like others of his contemporaries in the early years of the Reorganization, he was caught up with the spirit of discipleship under the call of latter-day revelation. His confidence was never shaken in the ultimate triumph of truth as taught by the latter day gospel.

"Not By Way of Compulsion or Restraint"

By Israel A. Smith

CIRCUMSTANCES suggest I give consideration again to the Word of Wisdom, which I will do as objectively as possible. I assure my readers that I do this without bias or prejudice, and with entire good will toward any who have differed or who may disagree with my conclusions or the process by which I have reached them.

In the first place, I must say I believe the Word of Wisdom is authentic, that it should be observed, and that observance will be rewarded according to its terms. I believe the only penalty—if indeed there is any penalty for nonobservance (which I cannot discover in it)—is a failure to realize the benefits of the promise.

In the second place, I believe tea and coffee, whether hot or cold, are injurious if taken into the human body. But I cannot agree that they come under the ban of "hot drinks" unless they are actually hot.

I am sure all or most of us have been guilty of some loose or illogical thinking with respect to Section 86. I submit that the section is couched in simple and common words, the accepted definitions of which were and are well understood. Further, I contend there is no ambiguity in the section itself; neither is there any conflict between it and any other section or provision of the law found in the Three Standard Books.

Under this state of fact, there could not have existed and there does not now exist any occasion or need for an "interpretation."

Here is an authoritative statement of The American Encyclopedia, Volume 12 of the 1922 Edition, pages 290 and 291, under the title, "Interpretation."

It is not the office of interpretation, then, to add anything to the text of the writing. Its function is only to discover and set forth what is in it

So far as legal interpretation does make use of the rules of grammar and the laws of language, it does not differ from the process employed by every educated and intelligent listener or reader when engaged in discovering the meaning of a speaker or a writer the courts proceed under rules which have been laid down in the long course of judicial interpretation

The more important of these rules are as follows: 1. When the language of a writing is plain and unequivocal, there is no occasion for interpretation. Even though the court may believe that the language employed does not express the intent of the writer, it will not enforce upon words a meaning which they cannot fairly bear. When words admit of but one meaning, to put another upon them is not to construe a writing, but to alter it. In case of a statute, it is not to interpret law, but to make one. . . .

2. The grammatical and ordinary sense of words is to be adhered to Eminent English judges have called this the golden rule of construction.

With these points in mind, I will consider some other aspects of the question.

SINCE MY LETTER to the Utah Mormon Elder appeared in the Herald, I have received a number of letters from earnest members who find themselves in disagreement with what I wrote. This reflects a wholesome condition. I would not have our Saints accept without question, as if originating ex cathedra, every and any expression of opinion coming from my pen. By the same token, I claim a personal right to consider the law and reach conclusions without fear of criticism, valid or otherwise. Above all, I do not propose to stutify my judgment merely for fear of running counter to what some hold to be established rule or precedent, because they too often so hold on insufficient evidence.

I was interested in a letter which came to me from eight college students at Des Moines, in which reference was made to the "view" taken by Elder F. Henry Edwards in his Commentary on the Doctrine and Covenants. As I read what this writer said, I cannot accept the construction that he was attempting to interpret the words hot drinks as meaning tea and coffee, regardless of whether or not they were actually hot when consumed. Undoubtedly he was writing on the assumption that they were drinks universally hot or heated when taken into the body. Besides, this book was not published as an authoritative interpretation of law; such was not the prerogative of the author. By reference to the title page we find it was referred to as "a brief historical treatment." Again in his foreword, the writer suggests it is "a study of the historical background," etc.

A common error of some members in writing on the subject is to refer to penalties for nonobservance. This indeed reflects loose and erroneous thinking. If there be penalties for nonobservance, then Section 86 must be mandatory. There must be positive prohibitions to create sanctions or penalties.

But the Word of Wisdom is not law in the sense that it is mandatory or compulsory. That is expressly stated in the section.

The Word is a promise of benefits for observance; but there is no penalty provided for failure to observe. In the latter case, one simply is not entitled to enjoy the rewards offered.

These young college students called attention to a letter written by one Ebenezer Robinson to the late President Joseph Smith in which Robinson quoted the Prophet Joseph Smith. I find this letter was written in 1880 and published in the Herald of that year. In it Robinson stated that in 1835 Joseph Smith told him the term hot drinks meant tea and coffee. Here a very aged man was giving his testimony about an incident that occurred forty-five years before. To say the least, such testimony is incompetent under the "hearsay" rule, not coming within any of the recognized exceptions to the rule of evidence barring hearsay.

Besides, it is on just such incompetent evidence that the Mormon Church has greatly modified and in some cases enlarged the law of their church. How have they attempted to establish polygamy as a principle of salvation? By hearsay testimony and that only. How do they attempt to establish Adam-god and plurality of gods doctrines? By hearsay testimony alone. We have denounced such methods and demand they produce competent evidence in these matters.

Now I will not add to or detract from the words actually used, and I cannot read into Section 86 the words tea and coffee. My training as a lawyer prevents such a thing.

WE ARE TOLD by some who have delved into dietetics and the effects of various things on the human system that iced drinks are as harmful as, if not more injurious, than hot drinks. Why not take a short cut in this matter of "interpretation" and read into the section the words iced drinks?

We are told by some doctors that cocoa and chocolate are even more deleterious than tea and coffee. Why not, on the theory that both cocoa and chocolate are usually consumed in a more or less heated condition, or at least prepared by heat, hold that the words hot drinks in Section 86 were meant to include them, too!

I must add some place that after setting out my position at some length, the young students (referred to) wrote me a very understanding and gracious letter, but expressed the fear that what I had written to the Mormon elder needed some clarification. While I think I was explicit enough, I have been inclined to oblige them in this statement.

An interesting suggestion was made that some of us should take what they termed the "stricter" view in order to "insure compliance" with the provisions of the section. I could not admit that in my thinking there was either a "stricter" or a "milder" view, and I do not assume to wield any influence to compel observance of the Word of Wisdom. Whenever I do that, I add a factor that is not in the equation—in fact, one the Word itself completely bars, that of compulsion.

A sister in California adds her testimony. She heard James Whitehead, who at one time was secretary to the Prophet, say that after Section 86 was given, members at Nauvoo ceased to drink tea and coffee and began to drink "hot milk"! From this she concluded it was the "stimulants" instead of the heat in tea and coffee that were injurious. This is more testimony of the "hearsay" kind.

But doctors say, I am told, that heat in any drink or food makes it dangerous and harmful.

ELDER ELBERT A. SMITH in the Herald in 1914 is quoted as saying that, in his mind, "the term hot drinks was intended to include tea and coffee," and that they "are covered by the general term." Now, I can agree to this if the tea and coffee, when taken into the body, are hot. With all due respect to the opinions of others, I cannot bring myself to believe any drink that is not hot comes under the ban of "hot drinks." It stretches my reasoning power past the breaking point.

The action of a church conference at Far West is referred to in which unanimous action to withhold support from stores and shops selling spirituous liquors, tea, coffee, and tobacco was adopted. This did not single out tea or coffee. It applied to the sale of all of the things named. This was undoubtedly an arbitrary action, binding only on the majority that voted for it; but it does not have the force or effect of an official interpretation of the Word of Wisdom as relating to "hot drinks," and therefore is not binding on the members.

This good sister says, "Let us not confuse our members with our private interpretations on the Word of Wisdom when the lawful interpretation is stated in certain and positive terms." Here she assumes something which is most certainly not in evidence, because there has been no "lawful interpretation" in "certain and positive terms" of the words hot drinks.

My attention is called to the Section 122 of the Doctrine and Covenants, paragraphs 1 and 2; but a reading does not show it has any bearing whatever on the specific question.

I am also referred to the Church History in which an account of a high council meeting is given. It appears that certain members refused to partake of the Communion because the "elder administering it did not observe the Words of Wisdom to obey them." A discussion followed, and the decision reached was that "no official member in this church is worthy to hold an office, after having the Words of Wisdom properly taught to him, and he the official member neglecting to comply with or obey them." Also on May 28, 1837, at a general meeting of the church, it was resolved "that we will not fellowship any ordained member who will not or does not observe the Word of Wisdom according to its literal reading."

None of these incidents help us in the least in resolving the immediate question. And I call attention to the specific provision in the last quotation, "according to its literal reading." Even at that time it was apparent members were trying to be legal in the matter. Also, the Word of Wisdom covers a number of things besides "hot drinks."

A superannuated seventy writes also about my letter. He mentions the Ebenezer Robinson letter, to which I have made reference.
