NEWS AND NOTES

APOSTLE W. WALLACE SMITH

Made an introductory tour of the Gulf States District, accompanied by W. J. Breshears, district president, from November 14 to December 3. Every congregation in the district was visited, and Apostle Smith was very well received in this portion of his new field. It was the first time that some of the people of the Southland had ever met one of the descendants of Joseph Smith, which they were eager to do. The tour also served to give Brother Smith a working acquaintance with the customs and traditions of the South.

THE WORTHS IN ENGLAND

The First Presidency has received a cable from Brother Tom Worth in England as follows: "Rough crossing. Arrived safely Monday. Disembarked Tuesday." Tuesday was December 14. There had been a considerable delay on the American side, due to the strike that bound trans-oceanic shipping.

TANTALIZER

Brother N. L. Booker, 1264 N. W. 34th Street, Miami 37, Florida, writes: "We are just about off the continent for distance, but very much alive spiritually. We wonder why some of you don't ever come this way during the frozen winter months. The hurricane season is past, the thermometer stands at 82° now, the sun shines brightly every day, and we'd like to see some headquarters' folk oftener than General Conference time."

We are slaves of duty, Brother, and your invitation is very tempting. Now if somebody could only discover a mission for us there!

MERLIN, ONTARIO

Congregation had a special program on Sunday, November 21, for the dedication of the new pews in their church. This announcement will incur the admiration and envy of some U. S. congregations, who have waited a long time for their church pews, with no success. Perhaps we'd better ask for a little advice across the northern border, where folk seem to know how to get things done.

Robert T. Brown has served the Merlin congregation as pastor since 1931. A group began in 1902 and was first called the Stevenson Branch, under the leadership of Samuel Brown. The Merlin Branch was organized October 4, 1917, and in 1919 the Stevenson group offered their church building to the Merlin Branch, moved it to the new location and disposed of the old lot. Since 1917, there have been three pastors, John Dent, 1917-1927; Charles Osborne, 1928-1930; and now Brother Brown.

In honor of the occasion, the Merlin Saints produced a pretty program folder which includes a history of the branch that members will treasure.

I said to a man who stood at the gate of the year,

"Give me a light that I may tread safely into the unknown,"

And he replied, "Go out into the darkness and put your hand into the hand of God.

That shall be to you better than a light

And safer than a known way!"

—Quoted by King George V of England at the beginning of the war.

(From "The Gate of the Year" by Louise Haskins)

Time, the busy vendor,
Hawks his wares along the crowded street,
Peering after every hastening form
Which hurries by.
A sigh
Escapes his lips. Then,
"Hours?" he calls,
"Who'll take a moment?
Or a day
For happiness?
All these are free
If you will use them carefully
And well."

But people hear him not or cast his offerings
Beneath their dusty feet—

Or some snatch greedily, Sly hands unknowing what they hold.

How precious is the gift of Time.

Few spend it wisely
Where it most is needed.

But instead,
How foolishly, how blindly
We rush on Ignoring priceless treasure offered here

While Time, the heartsick vendor,
Hawks his wares along the crowded street.

New Year Greetings

WITH THIS ISSUE, the Herald begins its 89th year, its 96th volume. Beginning with Isaac Sheen as editor on January 1, 1860, soon thereafter the late President Joseph Smith was called to assist, first passing on all doctrinal matter submitted for publication, and later assuming full editorial responsibility. With him at various times were associated Elders Mark H. Forscutt, M. B. Oliver, Henry B. Stebbins, W. W. Blair, Joseph Luff, Heman C. Smith, Frederick M. Smith, Elbert A. Smith, John F. Garver, and others whose names do not present themselves to memory as we write.

Late in the last century by authority of the church, the members of the First Presidency have been accorded editorial prerogatives as editors in chief.

During the long span of years since that first issue, printed in Cincinnati, Ohio, many New Years have come and many Old Years have gone into the silence of the past. Apparently, in the midst of church cares, the editors were sometimes caught unawares, and the new volume was begun without special editorial attention or greetings suggested by the annual event of New Year's Day. But at times the editors have yielded to the inspiration of the season and have expressed sentiments commonly felt on such occasions.

It would be an interesting task to search out all of these special messages, read them, and discover what they reflected during those seventy-eight years; but interesting and educational as this might be, it would involve much time—and besides, here we are—the last day—almost the last hour when we can prepare something appropriate for insertion, as we go to press, in the first issue for 1949.

We are prone—rightly so—to elevate our predecessors to pedestals of honor and respect. We are more than likely to place our own sire high among the men who have occupied as editors of the Herald. That is my personal testimony to him as a spiritual leader, and, in passing, may I give to our readers the testimony of one very close to him, Patriarch Alexander H. Smith, his own brother, who said to me on an occasion that my father was prepared mentally and spiritually to occupy the office of president of the church when he was seventeen years of age, a statement that registered strongly in my memory when it was made.

May we go back seventy-eight years and take a leaf from the True Latter Day Saints' Herald, January 1, 1871, and give you portions of Joseph Smith's "New Year's Greeting" in Number 1 of Volume 18, both for their historical and spiritual values:

THE HERALD commences the eighteenth volume and year in a partially new dress.

It is with an increased conviction of our inadequacy to the editorial task that we begin the year; and nothing but the earnest faith of the saints, manifested by their sanction to our retaining the position, reconciles us to the charge.

It will not be long now till the Herald management will be vested in the incorporated board, representing the material and spiritual interest of the church, by an annually chosen board of five of the brethren, who shall form a body corporate, capable in law of performing all the necessary labor to advance the entire interests of the publishing department of the church.

We shall by no means regret the change; for however much we have desired to go forward, we have lacked the necessary wisdom to do so, and as a consequence have stood still

The Hope is not quite so attractive as we should like to see it; but we have so far put all the expense upon its illustration that its subscription list would bear, we can do no better.

There is not an engraver on wood, a stereotyper and electrotyper, nor a bookbinder, that we know of, in the church; and we confess with regret that we have not yet heard of any man, young or old, who has had the energy and zeal to attempt the learning of any of these trades

We welcome the year 1871 with pleasure. We have reason to believe that the present year will be one of good to the cause dear to us all; if not so marked in peculiar evidences of advancement as the year 1870, the general results will be fully realized as indicative of the good intended by the Master for Zion's children.

There should be a considerable ingathering this year, and there will be, if the elders do as they say that they have a desire to do; but the idler and the transgressor will this year find little encouragement, and less peace.

There should be the most strenuous efforts put forth to insure faithfulness, energy, industry and honesty in the saints.

If any fancy that there is too much of these commendable qualities in the church, we most decidedly admonish them to get rid of that fancy, as it is a fallacy. Nor do we by this accuse the church of evil or of wrong doing, but just state the fact, that there is no fear that we have all reached perfection's graces yet.

The good work still goes on. North, east, south and west they cry, "Come, let us hear the truth."

Remarkable evidences are occurring daily to strengthen the faith of the saints and to challenge the attention of the unbelieving. As the faith of the saints increases these evidences of God's favor will increase also, until, by and by, they will be able to say the Lord blesses continually.

All the elders should begin the year 1871 by refusing to let their lips speak evil of any, and then enter into a holy crusade against evil speaking.

The saints generally may take warning that the columns of the Herald are open to direct attacks upon evil speaking.

It is the deadliest arrow in the quiver of the adversary to destroy the peace of saints.

It is the initiatory step towards the dismemberment of the body.

It is the predatory advance guard of all the rest of the horde of mischief-makers.

We want him exorcised—decidedly.

By securing the power of doing good, a man must continue to do good, or the power confided is withdrawn; and a good reason why some elders are not good ones is, because they have ceased to exercise the powers for good originally confided to them.

We again invite our contributors to continue their good work. We shall try and exercise a guarded care that a writer's sentiment shall not suffer in passing through editorial hands, and if any one wishes to indulge in strictures upon the Herald management, it will be more pleasing to us to receive those strictures from first hands. They lose no bitterness in passing through second hands. All may depend upon that.

A manly expression of honestly held convictions can injure no one but the peevish and discontented by nature; the good, the true, and the kind and noble, never suffer themselves to degenerate into coarse invective and harsh and bitter denunciation; these are weapons they do not delight to handle.

If any are fearful that there is gross wrong and injustice done to any, there is a legitimate place of inquiry; and the one who shrinks from that inquiry when made, will be better for the enquiry being made.

We must cordially sustain each other in right doing, and suspicion and doubt are unbecoming saints.

There is very much that could be re-dated and endorsed as of the present, with assurance that the advice and counsel are still good in this day of World Wars and the United Nations.

Speaking on behalf of the members of the Presidency, Presidents Garver and Edwards, and myself, I extend congratulations to the Herald Publishing Board, Manager Kenneth Graham, Editor Leonard Lea, and their associates for what has been a successful year.

As for our readers, we add this deferred but timely "hail and farewell," heartily endorsing the message delivered by the late President Joseph Smith on January 1, 1871. We pray all Herald readers will be blessed in "basket and in store" and above all, prospered in spiritual strength and power during the year just beginning.

The New Year--

Its Meaning and Message

By NETTIE C. LAKE

THERE IS ONE continuous stretch of time. We speak of "fleet-footed" time that hastens to the boundless realms of eternity. There are seasons marked by the revolutions of planets and climatic conditions. Time is divided into days, weeks, months, and years for the sake of convenience and scientific classification. Since this is the case, why should there be any particular significance in what we call New Year's Day? It is true that time itself seems to take no note of the man-made names and artificial differentiations. What meaning and message, therefore, can there be in the calendar and customary New Year's Day?

The sudden and dramatic end of the calendar year causes a general reflection upon the achievements of the past. It's a good thing to pause and reflect long enough to take an inventory of the net results of the year's accomplishments. In the exploration and analysis of the past, we can get a line on ourselves, learn where we have made mistakes, and direct our energy to future improvement.

It is not only wise to sit down and count up the cost for the future but to sum up the expenditure of the past. We can derive great profit by making a summary of the spiritual results of the past year. A real, heart-searching and sincere facing of the facts of the past year's activity of the church would kindle the torch of our faith in Christ and make New Year's Day a memorable occasion for the advancement of Zion.

If there has been failure, there is no need to give up. As the new year dawns, turn over a new leaf, take a new start and work harder and more faithfully than ever before. Oil the machinery of life's activity, forget the blunders of the past, turn the mistakes of yesterday into the steppingstones of tomorrow and go over the hilltop of the new year with high hopes for success and the ringing notes of spiritual victory.

A NEW YEAR'S RESOLUTION made with intelligence and sincerity, not depending upon our own human strength but upon the strong arm of our Heavenly Father, may serve as a great moral stimulus and a guiding motto down through the months of the ensuing year. It is always in order, therefore, especially at the auspicious beginning of a calendar year, to express one's desire and determination for higher, better things. If we have not fully paced with the Apostle Paul in the past, then let us, by the grace of God, step into the new year, declaring, "But this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press onward, toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ the Lord."

Hope that springs eternal in the human breast should be enriched as we rise to meet the challenge of the new year. As we pause at the juncture of years to reason, to reflect upon the past, to summarize, to resolve, let us once more repeat the immortal lines of the world's best poem on hope by William Cullen Bryant, and apply them, not just in the New Year but to the futurity of our lives:

He who from zone to zone
Guides through boundless air thy certain flight,
In the long way I must tread alone
Will lead my steps aright.

THE WIDESPREAD INTEREST in the improvement of race relations as a demonstration of practical Christianity was reflected in proposals considered by the recent General Conference and the resolution growing out of them. The original Preamble and Resolutions were submitted to the Chicago District Conference by Elder Wilford E. Winholtz. These were not formally approved by the district, but the document embodying them was ordered transmitted to the General Conference "with the consent of the Chicago District for such consideration as the Conference may deem it warrants."

In pursuance of this action, the chairman and vice-chairman of the district delegation submitted Brother Winholtz' recommendations to the First Presidency for inclusion in the Conference business, with a request for such guidance as the Presidency might wish to give. The members of the Presidency greatly appreciated the courteous nature of this approach and, since whatever action might be taken would have far-reaching significance, the document was presented to a Joint Council of First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, with a request for their advice as to procedure.

The document sponsored by Brother Winholtz is printed in full on pages 104 and 105 of the Daily Herald for October 9, 1948. Briefly, it seeks to explain or delete part of the Doctrine and Covenants' statement "On Governments and Laws in General" (112: 12), to interpret a paragraph in the minutes of the Joint Council of 1894 (123: 19), and to interpret a paragraph of the revelation of 1865 (116: 4). The intent of the proposed changes is explained in the preamble as being in order "that our own house might be set in order" in relation to basic Christian concepts concerning the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man.

THE PURPOSE of the First Presidency in presenting this matter to the Joint Council has already been indicated in part. It seemed to us that on a matter of such importance the Conference was entitled to such guidance as would be made possible through prior consideration of the proposals by the Joint Council. Of course, nothing in this reference to the council was intended to restrict any debate which might be desired during Conference. The intention was rather to safeguard the rights of the body by indicating the true nature of the proposals under review.

It may be helpful in other connections to point out the nature of the approaches in the Joint Council discussion.

Our first inquiry had to do with the soundness of the positions taken in the document. Subordinate questions were: Are these positions right? Are they adequate? Do they cover the ground?

The next line of inquiry was concerned with the propriety of making adjustments in the text of the Doctrine and Covenants. The secondary queries here had to do with the precedents being set up. One was: "If we do this, where will it end?" Another was, "Should we delete from the Doctrine and Covenants paragraphs which have been there for more than a hundred years without longer consideration of the effects of such action than is possible at this time?" Asking such questions did not commit anyone to a specific reply; but the questions were quite rightfully introduced.

Pursuing a third line of inquiry, we noted that while the preamble ostensibly concerned itself with "present-day issues involving discrimination and segregation practices against minority groups in general and the Negro race in particular," its effective concern was with the status of the Negro. We therefore discussed the effect of the proposed action on other racial and minority relationships, and asked ourselves whether taking this action would not have an opposite effect from the one intended. Would not the disavowal of prejudice against the Negroes call for similar disavowals of prejudice against other groups, and would not the absence of such disavowals leave the logical conclusion that we are against those omitted from this statement?

And, as a final line of investigation, we had to ask ourselves whether the desired end could be reached in any better way than the one proposed. A seemingly innocuous conference action sometimes causes widespread reverberations. We had to anticipate any such results, and to consider alternative ways and means which might promote the desired end with less friction.

IN ADDITION to the foregoing, it may be well to observe that members of the council have reason to be very much aware of the limitations of specific legislation in such relationships as this. This type of legislation can be used, and sometimes is used, to coerce local administrative officers into courses of action unwarranted by the total situation. This is contrary to the genius of the Latter Day Work, which provides for local guidance through priesthood in harmony with generally accepted principles.

By PRESIDENT F. HENRY EDWARDS

The sober and earnest consideration given by the members of the Joint Council led to the adoption of a statement and recommendation for presentation to the General Conference. This communication included the preamble and resolutions submitted by Brother Winholtz and then made the following observations:

There is nothing in the law of the church which creates or tends to create racial inequality or racial discrimination.

To legislate with respect to a specific race raises by implication the presumption that that race has heretofore been unjustly dealt with in our church law and discipline, which we cannot and do not admit.

These observations were followed by comments indicating the judgment of the Council that it would be unwise to insert interpretations in the long-accepted text of the Doctrine and Covenants. And, in conclusion, the Conference was advised to reaffirm the long-established belief and teaching of the church, as follows:

All men are God's creatures. He created of one blood all nations and races, and in the presence of God divisions of race are transcended; "There is neither Greek nor Jew, Barbarian, Scythian, bond or free; but Christ is all, and in all."¹

At first glance it might appear that this reaffirmation, which was approved by a very substantial majority of the delegates and ex officios, does not come to grips with the issue. But any such appearance is very superficial. The resolution which was adopted expresses our fundamental faith but leaves its administration in the hands of mission and district and branch presidents all over the world. In this manner, basic principles can be put into effect with zeal and devotion and in the spirit of brotherhood, but yet with rightful regard for local conditions, for the slowness with which deep-rooted prejudices are eradicated, and for the importance of education rather than legislation in the stable achievement of our long-time goals.

THE CHURCH POSITION should now be clear. All men are God's creatures. All have a right to have the gospel preached to them. All have a right to the places for which they are fitted in the kingdom of God. No administrative officer and no member of the church can reasonably excuse himself in unbrotherly action against persons of a different color or racial origin. Nevertheless, our line of advance calls for the exercise of wisdom as well as affection, and for the recognition of our own limitations as a welcoming brotherhood, and of the hindering social conditions with which we are confronted in many places.

The solution of the problem of racial relations can be found, we feel sure, in the field of gospel functioning. But, despite our sometime impatience, the building of the kingdom of God requires growth as well as legislative action. This takes time. The promotion of brotherhood has to advance by stages, and our mission to the unconverted has to be paralleled by the refinement of understanding and procedures with the body. We feel sure that the conference action, and the soul-searching which lay behind it, will prove of great help in our growth toward the kingdom of God.

The Best Time

By ROBERT J. MILLER

ANOTHER YEAR has gone. Its deeds forever recorded, bearing mute testimony in the pages of history to the limitations and weaknesses of man. True, here and there we find recorded outstanding noble achievement, gracious deeds, loving works; but for the most part the record tells of peoples who have departed from their God, trusting more in the arm of flesh than in Christ's way of life.

We look at the past, as members of the human race, not proud of all we see and wonder what we can do to lift humanity out of the morass of evil. Individual effort seems so puny in relation to the whole, and often we would ask, "What's the use of trying?"

But then we pause and in sober meditation consider a truth of all existence. Nothing that is big is constituted of a single thing; it is composed of billions of molecules and atoms, each individually obeying some divine law and lending itself to the ultimate purpose. Society and government are the same; no one can point to a dowager or a president and say, she or he is society or government. Each exists because of millions who lend themselves to it and help in some way to make it a reality.

We are individual members of society, government, and the church of Jesus Christ. Each of us has a part to play and a duty to perform. And if many will resolve to do their best in their own way and in their place—our society will be lifted to a much higher plane; our government will become better and stronger; and the church will move Zionward.

New Year's Day is not necessarily the best time for such high resolves. But it is the best time if New Year's Day is NOW.

We Are His Witnesses

A sermon delivered during General Conference at Stone Church on October 6, 1948. Transcribed from a wire recording.

And when they had brought them, they set them before the council; and the high priest asked them, saying, Did not we straitly command you that ye should not teach in this name? And, behold, ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us. Then Peter and the other apostles answered and said, We ought to obey God rather than men. The God of our Fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins, and we are his witnesses for these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him.

WE ARE GOD'S WITNESSES. From the beginning of recorded history, from the beginning of the development of man's philosophy of life, it has become apparent that we are confused; that as a race, humanity knows not what its purpose and destiny are, and that we sometimes wander aimlessly in a maze of life's activities actually and literally lost. Because this is true, the Heavenly Father has made known his purpose for us, and the destiny for humanity which is in keeping with this divine purpose. The best means our Heavenly Father has chosen to attain this was brought to pass in the ministry of Jesus, who, as the Incarnation of Divinity in a mortal man, found it possible to demonstrate the nature and the power and the results of righteousness, in terms with which we are all familiar, for these are terms which have to do with the means of our own bodies and the desires of our own hearts, and the experiences of our own social relationships. The ministry of Jesus Christ reveals God to man in terms we can understand, because they are the terms of our own life.

The organization of the church by the Master, the setting in their proper places of the various officers and grades of ministry and priesthood, the establishment of its fundamental doctrines, and the equipping of it with the various powers and the expression of the divine power and the various gifts of the spirit are all of them due to the plan of the Heavenly Father to make known to us his purposes and his truth in terms we can understand.

The functions of priesthood are based upon the idea that men who are most sensitive to the leadings of the Spirit of God may serve as ministers to their fellow men and thus elevate them likewise in the quality of their spiritual responses. And thus the functions of the church and the members of the church are extended outward into all of the various activities and groups of men who are to bring to pass the same kind of ministry. Therefore, we read with some degree of understanding its significance the statement in the Doctrine and Covenants in section 119, "All are called according to the gifts of God unto them."

Even as the Master, with his peculiar gifts, was able to reveal the essence of Divinity in terms of mortal life experience, and as men of the priesthood are called upon to respond to the leadings of the Spirit of God in their own hearts and their own minds and thus minister to their fellows to elevate their standards of spiritual response, so also it is the purpose of the church as the body of Christ to minister to the lives, hearts, and souls of men throughout the world in order to elevate the quality of life among all mankind.

And "all are called" according to their various gifts to participate in the discharge of this tremendous responsibility.

WE ARE WITNESSES

Now, as Peter says, so likewise we shall say, "We are witnesses" of those things which are known to us. And it is true that the ministry of those witnesses who are sensitive to divine truth and who, in their understanding, have applied it to life, testing it so that they know for themselves it is true—these witnesses shall testify to those things which have become knowledge to them.

In a court of law, there are certain qualifications for the receiving of testimony from certain witnesses who may be heard. These witnesses, whoever they are, must be sworn to tell the truth—not just to tell a part of the truth, but all of the truth as it relates to those matters under investigation. They are sworn to tell only that which is true. They are sworn to bear testimony to that which in their own experience is known to them. They are further qualified by examination to tell whether their experience may be evaluated by them in normal terms. In other words, when some expert testimony is required, the expertness of the witness is tested, that the court may know whether he is an authority in the field in which he shall offer his testimony. If a medical witness is required, it is established in the beginning of his testimony that he has had training in a medical field. If it is a testimony which is required in terms of some eyewitness to the event, then it must be established that the witness was present at that event and therefore is qualified by reason of his presence. Thus, these witnesses are qualified by being sworn to the truth and by their own experience and by the authority of their training to testify to that which they know by their own experience. Hearsay evidence, guesses, opinions, judgments, evaluations, and conclusions are not admissible in a court of law.

In the work of the kingdom of God, no less than this is true. We who are witnesses of divine truth ought also to be sworn in the nature of our own lives to the truth, to the whole truth as we understand it, and to nothing but the truth as we understand it, in terms of the gospel of Jesus Christ. We ought to be qualified in terms of our own expert authority, our experience in the field in which we offer our testimony, and we ought also to be sure that as we are testifying we shall not give testimony which is based only on hearsay evidence or on guesses or on opinions and judgments; we ought to testify to those things we know, and which, because of our own experience, have become basic to our convictions about the nature and purpose of life.

QUALIFYING AS WITNESSES

How are we qualified in these ways? We are qualified by study, by experience with Deity, and on the basis of our conviction of the divine truths of the gospel and our devotion to these divine truths. Now there are some folks who, when they are urged to bear testimony to their friends of the principles and the practices of the church of Jesus Christ and of the processes that are involved in the building of the kingdom, shrug their shoulders and say, "I just don't understand enough about it; I don't know the Scriptures well enough," or, "I'm unable to explain in terms which are clear and understandable to my neighbors, what it's all about." And they depend largely on calling the pastor or one of the elders or a member of the priesthood who may be available or perhaps one of the traveling missionaries of the church. But listen—if we are to be witnesses to those things which pertain to the building of the kingdom of God, we ourselves must know that to which we bear testimony. There is no excuse for any member of the church of Jesus Christ to remain in such a mental and spiritual condition that it is not possible for him to express to his friends, his neighbors, and his family those things which pertain to the kingdom of God. He ought to be able to explain in understandable terms those things which are near and dear to his heart concerning the building of the kingdom. Unless he can, then he is not living on that level of spiritual understanding and experience which it is his privilege and opportunity to live on.

FAITH TOWARDS GOD

WE MUST HAVE faith in the gospel, in our Heavenly Father, in our Savior, in the church, and in the kingdom. The Apostle Paul in the sixth chapter of Hebrews writes of "faith toward God"; that term, I believe, is better than saying, "faith in God." It moves us in the direction of our Heavenly Father, toward fellowship with him and toward the achievement in our own lives of the characteristics of Divinity. But sometimes it does not occur to us that our Heavenly Father also has a great deal of faith in us, and that his faith is extended toward us in the same sense that he expects ours to be extended toward him.

GOD'S FAITH TOWARDS US

God has given us our right of agency in the expectation that we shall exercise that right of agency in such a manner that we shall grow in divine likeness. He gives us the right to choose, and in so doing, he exercises in us a faith that by our use of that right, we shall choose to fellowship with him. As we examine all of the resources available to us in the universe and see how it is possible that these resources may be used for good or for ill, we are struck with the fact that our Heavenly Father has a great deal of faith in us. He has confidence that in the hands of righteous men these resources shall contribute to the building of the kingdom of God. And he has the utmost confidence that the extension of the philosophy of the kingdom shall be brought to pass by our testimony, for that is the manner in which he has organized his church. He has designed that in large measure the ministry of the church shall be accomplished by men who give themselves as they have time and opportunity in their local branches, self-sustaining, self-supporting, priesthood in our various branches. With such men, we may keep our general church appointee ministry for supervisory and missionary ministry in the various congregations. That is the manner in which the church is organized. That is the pattern revealed in the Scriptures upon which the restored gospel of Jesus Christ and the church, as it has been restored in these days, have been brought to us. Our Heavenly Father has a great deal of faith in us that by using the church in this way, our membership and our self-sustaining priesthood shall carry the burden, sharing it as broadly as possible. He must believe that in the nature of man's own needs those needs can best be satisfied by this kind of organization and by this kind of ministry.

LET ALL LABOR TOGETHER

God tells us, by divine revelation, "All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together." Let those who concern themselves with the affairs of work and of business labor together with those who may be of the general ministry of the church for the accomplishment of the task which is entrusted to all.

Peter was a witness of the humanity and the divinity of Jesus. He walked with him, talked with him, conversed with him concerning the various phases of his ministry, and no doubt was able to receive from his firsthand contact with Jesus a conviction, not only of his humanity but of his divinity. Peter didn't get that all at once. Indeed, Jesus found it necessary late in his contact with Peter to remind him over and over again, "When thou art converted, strengthen the brethren." Peter probably knew of the humanity of Jesus long before he knew of his divinity. But as he did come to an understanding of the humanity and the divinity of his Master, he bore testimony of it. Along with the other apostles of those days, he said, "We ought to obey God rather than men."

By reason of his own experiences, he had a profound conviction in his heart that what he was saying was true. More than that, he was able to testify of the resurrection of Jesus, for following his crucifixion and his resurrection, the Master appeared to Peter and to others so they were able to understand that even though his body had been slain, the powers of righteousness he had revealed in his ministry were so great that death itself had been overcome. Of this Peter had some conviction and some knowledge. He saw the Master, he felt the prints of the nails in his hand, he observed him as he ate of the bread and the fish by the seaside. He listened to him as he gave them further instruction after his resurrection. Peter was then qualified by experience.

But even more significant, he was able to bear testimony of the power of his own ministry. He knew certain things because of what happened in him, and to him, and through him to others. That is the best testimony any of us have of the truthfulness of the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ. If they work in us and through us in someone else, then certainly we have authority to bear testimony of those things. We are witnesses of the truths of the gospel of Jesus Christ in so far as we know them.

We today are witnesses of restored divine revelation. Now that can be true not by hearsay; it must be true in terms of our own experience.

I once heard Apostle Oakman at a reunion in Southern California say something which has stuck with me for years. He said, "Divine revelation is not merely the communication of ideas or emotion; it is the creation within us of a new being." If we are to bear testimony to the restoration of divine revelation in these days, there must literally come to pass within us the new creature which is produced by this divine revelation. Any of us can read the record and bear testimony to it, but we don't have to do that. The record can bear testimony of itself. What we need to do is to testify that what is revealed in the record actually works in our lives and makes us new creatures in Christ Jesus.

A young man, some one hundred and twenty-eight years ago, read from the first chapter of the Book of James, the fifth verse, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." This is a promise without conditions—a promise without limitations—so far as people are concerned. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." No promise is given in the same way to every person, for all are called according to the gifts of God to them, and some gifts are experienced by some people, and others by other people. Some have one gift and some have another, and these revelations come to us in terms of our gifts.

We are witnesses, likewise, of the fellowship of the church of Jesus Christ of which we are members, but we can't be witnesses of that fellowship unless we experience it.

Those who do not partake frequently of the fellowship of the church, as it is made available in our regular branch activities, cannot bear testimony to that fellowship, for they do not experience it. Those who are here can stimulate those who are not here to attend more regularly their local branches and participate in the fellowship of district affairs—conferences, institutes, and reunions. If we are to bear testimony to the fellowship of love which we find in the church of Jesus Christ, we must be partakers of that fellowship; as we experience it, we will testify of it with increasing power—and more than that, the quality of this fellowship will continually increase among us as we join together in its experience.

We are witnesses today, or should be, of the ministry of Jesus today, as in earlier days. We are witnesses today of the fact that the Master is the Son of God, and therefore he is still alive, and is still at work, and is still interested in the affairs of mankind.

We Latter Day Saints have available a testimony from ancient America which strengthens us in this conviction by reason of the fact that here is the testimony of people who likewise saw the Master after his resurrection. We have not only the testimony of Peter and the others of New Testament days in Jerusalem, but likewise the testimony of those who lived on the other side of the world. But even that is not sufficient, for again we have only a record of testimony. If it is to come alive in our own lives, we too must have such experience with Divinity if we are to be assured that God is still interested in us and that Jesus, the Son of God, is still working with his people.

We have a further such record of this kind of revelation as we read it in section 76 of the Doctrine and Covenants—an experience enjoyed by Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon

The Gathering

By JOHN CONWAY

ONE of the eternal principles given by God to assist in man's salvation is the "gathering." Many times God has called his covenant people to gather or to move to a certain geographical location that his purposes in them might be fulfilled. Abraham and his followers complied with God's instruction to leave their homeland. Moses and his people gathered out of Egypt back to the land God had given their forefathers. The Pilgrims fulfilled a measure of this principle when they came to America.

The Bible says God is unchangeable. "For I am the Lord, I change not." Being unchangeable, God can be expected to do things in a consistent manner, and in the record of the Scriptures and our experiences with him, we find he does. In the latter day, when God restored the fullness of the plan of salvation through the prophet, Joseph Smith, the gathering was pronounced again. His covenant people, or those possessing the fullness of the gospel plan, were to gather in a designated place to be called Zion and there prepare for the second coming of Christ and his heavenly kingdom.

God's consistency has been manifest in many ways. Consider the prophets: "An angel of the Lord appeared unto Moses in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush." "Samuel feared to shew Eli the vision," which experience began Samuel's prophetic ministry. Isaiah saw a vision concerning Judah and Jerusalem. Jeremiah beheld an almond rod and a seething pot. "Visions of God" were the beginning of Ezekiel's prophetic calling—the heavens were opened to Ezekiel by the river Chebar. Paul, on the road to Damascus, saw Christ in a pillar of light and heard a voice. In the latter day, Joseph Smith saw a pillar of light, and in it a vision of God and Christ. A voice spoke. Nearly every prophet of God of whom we have record announced his prophetic calling by the recounting of a vision.

The utterances of the prophets show remarkable consonance. The basic message is the same. God is calling men to salvation—"a safe return to God."

But this salvation can come only according to God's plan—not according to the many substitutes of men.

JESUS SAID, "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." In the centuries following his death, many voices were raised. The way of Christ, by the substitutions of men, became many ways. As the time neared for his second coming and the consummation of all that had been promised by the prophets of old, the fullness of the plan of salvation, or the way of Christ, was needed anew among men. God moved again as he always had. Because men lacked a proper knowledge of him and his ways, he returned the fullness of the gospel of Christ to the earth in the latter day.

In harmony with the consistency of God's doing, this preparation for the second advent of Christ was not to be in all the world at once, but, as with the ancient prophets, "from small beginnings shall great things come to pass." Thus it was that three years after the restored church of Christ was organized in 1833 with only six members, the Lord spoke through his prophet, Joseph Smith, saying, "Behold, it is my will that all they who call on my name, and worship me according to mine everlasting gospel, should gather together and stand in holy places, and prepare for the revelation which is to come when the veil of the covering of my temple, in my tabernacle, which hideth the earth, shall be taken off, and all flesh shall see me together."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 5.

The specific location for the nucleus of that gathering was designated by God as Jackson County, Missouri, centering at Independence, Missouri. The gathering progressed, fluctuating with the welfare of the church which was determined by the consecration of its people. The gathering was, and is, to be carried on without haste, all things prepared before, according to the law governing. This law of preparation and deliberation was disobeyed, and the people were driven from the center place for a season. Many fell away from the faith and were scattered, but in 1860, the church was reorganized, and those who were faithful began to gather again in the chosen place as God had promised.

FROM TIME TO TIME, more light and understanding regarding the gathering was given. Frederick M. Smith, grandson of the prophet, Joseph, and president and prophet of the Reorganized Church said, "The gathering is a practical movement with great spiritual significance."

In April, 1947, the Lord gave this message through his prophet, Israel Smith: "The church is admonished again that all movements toward Zion and the gathering and temporalities connected therewith are within my law. . . The work of preparation and the perfection of my Saints go forward slowly, and Zion's conditions are no further away nor any closer than the spiritual condition of my people justifies; but my word shall not fail, neither will my promises, for the foundation of the Lord standeth sure."

Here is the principle of the gathering reiterated with new meaning and significance. The fruit of the gathering, Zion, or the preparation for the kingdom of God on earth, shall come as the spiritual condition of the people will allow.

"Spiritual condition of my people!" How significant those words are! The success of the gathering and all that we seek must rest upon them. What things are spiritual? How shall we divide our lives that we may place emphasis on this spiritual growth? The Scriptures throw light on our questions. In Genesis 2: 5, 6, 8, 9 (Inspired Version) we find:

For I, the Lord God, created all things of which I have spoken spiritually, before they were naturally upon the face of the earth; . . . And I, the Lord God, had created all the children of men, and not yet a man to till the ground, for in heaven created I them, and there was not yet flesh upon the earth, neither in the water, neither in the air; and I, the Lord God, formed man from the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul; the first flesh upon the earth, the first man also; nevertheless, all things were before created but spiritually were they created and made, according to my word.

As members of earth's family then, we are possessors of both an earthly body and a spiritual being, or immortal soul. The scripture says of the death of our earthly body, "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." All things being spiritual in God's sight, he must be the most concerned about the development of our spiritual being while we are on the earth. God gave the principle of the gathering because, properly exercised, it can contribute specifically toward that end.

A FAMOUS MAN SAID, "The world is ours!" At first, that idea may seem to do violence to our concept of God, but it does not. The world is ours! God created it and gave it to us, just as he has given us our bodies. When the body was joined with the spirit, man became a living soul. Man has the opportunity for association with God on a spiritual level of life when life on this earth is done. God made us for association with him, but he has committed to man the opportunity to accept or reject that association through the deeds done in the flesh. On this earth, we may develop spiritually so we may associate with God. We may here develop those attributes which will allow us to become as he is. "But then shall I know even as also I am known." "But we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him." Christ revealed the perfection of God in the many qualities of life—love, virtue, knowledge, brotherly kindness, forgiveness, etc. Christ calls all those who serve him to reveal him in the same manner that he revealed the Father—in the lives which we live. This is the purpose of the gathering and the gospel of the kingdom.

All things to God are spiritual because they were all created to this end that they might assist in our spiritual development and thus enable us to be with God and Christ, having fellowship with them and being like them.

Man has not looked at the world in this light. We have said some things are spiritual and some material. Some things of the earth concern God and some do not. But God has said, "Wherefore, verily I say unto you, that all things unto me are spiritual," and also he has said that all things were good in the day in which he created them. In like manner, all the enlightenment and assistance God has given man was good in the day it was given and had possibilities of assisting man in the development of his spiritual being. The earth on which we live, the bodies in which we are housed, the church of Christ, the social, political, and economical progress of man were all given that his purpose in us might be fulfilled. Yet there are two forces at work in the world, and time and time again the forces of evil have been able to entice man into perverting the good things of God so they would destroy rather than enhance the spiritual development of man.

The statement, "You can't take it with you," is trite, but some never wake up to this fact. In the days when their lives on this earth are nearly done, they still grasp and fight for the material things which must be left behind. It is easy for us to spend our lives trying to possess the material things of the earth without realizing why they and we are here. The majority live within the pattern of our political and economic structure without realizing that these organizations of society also have profound possibilities of contributing toward the spiritual development of man.

THE INSTITUTION OF DEMOCRACY was and is blessed of God, because, under the freedom it allows, the individual may exercise his God-given agency and bring about his spiritual growth.

The qualities of God which man, through his salvation is called to develop that he may be "like God," are not all found in devotional exercises or the home, but in the whole of life. For this reason, God has enlightened man and assisted him in the development of his political, social, and economic life. Many have mistakenly thought of religious things only in terms of prayer and devotional exercises. They have mistaken the part for the whole and missed the truth which God has revealed.

The gathering is an assembly of those who possess the godly plan of salvation into the God-designated place that they may live the whole of life together. The gathering is not a sharing of the hope of the kingdom of our God and of his Christ for two or three hours in the week, but living, working, and playing daily with those who prepare for its coming. Zion is built by those who, in their daily associations, are molding godly lives and looking for Christ and his heavenly kingdom. Our political, economic, and social structure is the framework of daily life. They profoundly affect the possibility of our development toward God. We must gather and control all these powerful influences upon life and spiritual development. Wherever we live, we must be deeply concerned about these structures of life and make every effort to turn them toward righteous ends. We must vote and be participants in community affairs. We must be a part of labor-management councils and be willing to assume responsibilities for the welfare of our brethren as well as ourselves.

To be "in the world and not of the world" does not mean to withdraw from the world to a life of selfish personal devotions. But the children of light must be "in the world and not of the world" as they use the framework of life for the enhancement of the spiritual qualities of man. Rather than daily life bringing about a degravation so the Sabbath must be a continual struggle to keep man on his present spiritual level, the Sabbath day should provide a series of upward spiritual steps which daily life supplements and confirms.

Therefore, we cannot sever from our religious life and the concern of the church, the affairs of daily life and all that affect them. We shall effectually control these molding forces of life only when we begin to fulfill the principle of the gathering, and in our gathering recognize that they are of significance in the sight of God. We must be about controlling them in the communities of the gathering, or we may as well remain scattered as we were.

When we arise to go to work, God and Christ are just as anxious about us as when we go to church. The gospel of Christ was not instituted to touch our lives alone on the Sabbath day, but to assist us in our salvation, and help us in the orderly and intelligent use of the material creation God has given us for spiritual ends.

GOD BREATHED the breath of life into the body and it became a living soul. God has committed to the church the opportunity to breathe the breath of life into society that it may become a living soul, giving every activity of life possibilities toward the spiritual development of man.

The world stands in greater need than ever before of an understanding of our Father's truth and an exemplification of his law. "The gates of hell shall not prevail" against the exemplification of his law which Zion shall provide. The selfishness and greed which pervert the powers of government and industry shall fall as Zion reveals the awfulness of sin. The influences which make lives little, narrow, and immoral shall be driven back as the purpose of life, the spiritual development of man to a Christlike measure, is revealed by those who share the godly plan of salvation. These shall show by their lives that all given by God is the means to an end—that we may be like him.

Consider the great problems of the church: (1) the loss of young people with the priceless heritage of spiritual qualities, some with the seed of priesthood, (2) the development of men of the priesthood who are able to reveal God to the people because they possess the personal qualities of Christlike life which will allow that revelation.

Consider the individual congregation. The source of the majority of its difficulties can be attributed to the state-

With British Pioneers

The Autobiography of William Ecclestone

I WAS BORN on June 18, 1864, at Shifnal, Shropshire, England, the son of George and Mary Ann Evans Ecclestone. Soon after my birth, my parents moved to a place called Gnosal, Staffordshire, and finally they moved to the town of Stafford, where my father obtained employment as a gardener.

During my early boyhood years, I attended a number of Church of England schools at Stirchley, Gnosal, White Oak, Lilleshall, Shifnal, Hanton, Chel-sy, Sigfried, and Stafford. When I was twelve years of age, my school days came to an end, and I left home to work on a farm as a hired servant, tending horses and other live stock. When I was fifteen, some other boys and I were invited to attend a class at the Church of England to learn the catechism of that church, with the object in mind of being confirmed under the hands of one of the bishops. So for six weeks we met one night a week, our chief study being the Ten Commandments, which we were expected to repeat to the minister before being confirmed. As we knelt at the altar for our confirmation, I remember there was much concern about being under the bishop's right hand, for he confirmed two at a time—one under each hand. After confirmation, we partook of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. My parents had informed me that I had been baptized when a baby, at which time the minister sprinkled a few drops of water in my face.

SEARCHING THE SCRIPTURES

After my confirmation in the Church of England, I began to search the Scriptures, endeavoring to discover if this were in harmony with the word of God. I read of John the Baptist preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins; of how Jesus came to him to be baptized, coming up out of the water after his baptism, which proved to me he must have been immersed; also of Jesus tarrying with his disciples and baptizing; and of John baptizing in Aenon near Salim, because "there was much water there"; of Jesus saying to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved"; and how faithfully on the day of Pentecost, Peter told his inquirers to repent and be baptized, and they should receive the Holy Ghost. I thank God that I remembered my Creator in the days of my youth, before the evil day came upon me, because the word of God made me strong, and I was able to overcome the wicked one.

When I was seventeen, my father called me home from the farm work, deciding it was best for me to learn a trade. I obtained a position with the firm of John Evans, engineers, a machine shop on Rolley Street, Stafford, where my father had me bound by agreement to be an apprentice for four years, or until I had reached the age of twenty-one. Here I was to learn the art of knife-making and general engineering (machinist). The knife mentioned was a die used in the manufacturing of shoes, and was used on a stamping press in the making of leather soles.

SEEKING GOD

While working at my trade, I often thought of religion, and one day while walking down the street, a man handed me a leaflet entitled "Why Should Anyone Swear?" The words in it caused me to shun bad language; on taking this leaflet to the shop where I worked, I read it to the other boys who were employed with me. We agreed to hang it up where it could be seen, making this pledge that "The first man heard to say a swear word, shall be beaten with a steel ruler," but I am happy to say that no one in the shop ever had to have that beating. This small leaflet caused us to seek God and his ways, with a desire to walk therein, and we attended the various Methodist churches, beginning to be in earnest about our souls' salvation. But these churches did not seem to satisfy my desires, as I had read much of the Bible and meditated on many of the teachings of Jesus Christ.

One night as I was returning from a revival meeting in Stafford and thinking over the things I had heard, a man came to my side and touched me on the shoulder. "Young man," he said, "I suppose you have just left the revival meeting." I replied, "Yes." He then asked me if I thought I would get any satisfaction by going there, but I told him it had not as yet entered my mind.

THE RESTORED GOSPEL

Then he began to unfold to me the Scriptures, telling of the gospel as taught by Jesus Christ and his apostles, quoting many passages of scripture which I had read and which had brought much joy to my soul. He also told me of the angel message to a man named Joseph Smith and of the priesthood authority given again to man on earth. We talked together for more than an hour before I started home. This man was Brother Joseph R. Greenwood of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

After arriving home, I retired to my room and knelt in prayer, asking the Lord if what had been told me was true. Sleep never came to me that night, as my mind seemed filled with heavenly light; my prayers continued throughout the night in much thankfulness to the Heavenly Father for bringing the glorious message to my ears. When morning came, I had fully decided to attend the Reorganized Church meetings to hear further about this great truth. These meetings were held at the home of Elder George S. Greenwood the pastor of the Stafford Branch, and I recall attending the first meeting there the following Sunday evening with a friend of mine. There were only about eight or ten present, and they were delighted to meet us. I well remember the opening hymn which was found in the Saints' Harp, number 86, and how sweet it seemed to me. The words were:

When here our minds are truly turned
To do the will of Christ the Lord,
The Holy Law that we have learned,
Fulfilling every precious word,
How calm the joy, how full of bliss,
Our minds at rest, our souls in peace,
And all is fair, and all is bright,
And all is well when we do right.

This beautiful hymn of praise touched my soul to overflowing, and I said, "Yes, Lord, my mind is truly turned to do thy will, and I want to keep the holy law and have my mind at rest and my soul in peace." I now was fully satisfied I had found the true way of salvation. Brother E. A. Webb was the preacher, and he spoke with much power, convincing me I had now found the true church of Jesus Christ. I found great pleasure in my new course of life and began to thirst after knowledge. I was given the Voice of Warning to read; this book gave me a clearer conception of God and his word and of my position before my Creator.

My mother was very much against my attending the Reorganized Church meetings, saying we would lose all our friends and that I would bring disgrace upon the family. But father viewed it in a different light, and asked mother to stop talking that way. One week end while I was visiting with my grandfather, a sweet feeling came over me with a longing desire for baptism, and the Spirit of Christ moved me to repentance.

I still continued to attend the Saints' meetings, and one night I had a vision. I seemed to be standing by a fence, near the side of a road, and as I turned to look in the direction I had to go, it appeared to be very dark. Because of this darkness, I seemed to be afraid to go that way. While I was thus meditating, a bright light shot up from the earth with a sound and swiftness which alarmed me, and it set itself high up in the heavens. Then as I turned and looked in the direction I desired to go, I saw it was as light as noonday, so I was soon on my way rejoicing.

Before I left home, I had asked for baptism, as I was fully convinced that to serve God I must be baptized by immersion for the remission of sins. I was told by the Saints that although my way had been dark, I now had received that light from heaven, which would brighten my pathway in life, and light up the way I should go. There was no baptismal font at Stafford, so arrangements had to be made for baptism at a branch about thirty miles away. While waiting to be baptized, I was much tried by the local Methodist preachers who had sought to stop me from attending the Saints' meetings. They told me I was being deluded by the Mormons from Salt Lake City, and I was even invited to accompany the Methodists on their Sunday missions some few miles outside of the town, but they were unable to persuade me from meeting with the Saints. I was always ready to give them a reason for my desire to attend, as I was fully convinced that baptism by immersion was necessary to salvation, and I was always ready to refer them to the Scriptures to prove my point. Yes, I could always show that the course I was taking was in harmony with God's Word, and the Lord blessed me with words to confound them.

One day on the street I met a young local preacher who seemed very eager to talk with me, but during the course of conversation he lifted his hand to smite me because he was unable to overcome my point in question with the truth I had presented. His lady friend hurried across the street to tell him how ashamed she was that he was unable to converse with me on doctrine without showing his bad temper. She led him away, and he was the last local preacher to give me any trouble.

DANGER AVERTED

After a time, I again requested baptism in the near-by river, as no arrangements had as yet been completed for my baptism. One Sunday morning in October, 1882, we prepared to go to the river; the air was crisp and frosty. We journeyed about two miles until we came to a quiet spot at the side of the river, where we decided to prepare for baptism. Because of much rain, the river was swollen and far beyond its banks at this particular spot we had chosen, and there was a beautiful rainbow beaming down into the water. As the elder led me into the water we went step by step for some distance, when suddenly he had a severe cramp in his foot and was forced to rush out of the water. After the brethren had rubbed away the cramp, we again entered the water, only to get to the same place when the cramp returned to his foot, and he again was forced to rush to the side. Before we entered the water for the third time the elder turned to me and said, "Young man, this is the third time I am taking you into the water, and if we are not successful this time, it is not the Lord's will for you to be baptized this morning." We went in again, and walked about the same distance as before, when the cramp again returned to the foot. We came out of the water, dressed, and went home, wondering at this strange experience. The next evening after leaving my place of employment, I went down to the other side of the river to view the place of my attempted baptism. I thanked God from the bottom of my heart for his kind watch care over us, in saving us from being drowned. For had we gone a few steps further we would have fallen into the deep rapid stream and been carried away, as neither of us was able to swim. This confirmed to me that God watches over his obedient children, and also convinced me that he is with the servants of his church. This testimony is still fresh in my mind, and the memory of it has always been sacred to me.

BAPTISM

Finally a font was prepared in the branch for baptisms, and on Sunday morning, December 17, 1882, I was led down into the icy water by Elder George S. Greenwood, who baptized me. There I made my vow to serve Christ all of my life, through good and evil report. I was confirmed the same day by Elders George S. Greenwood and Joseph R. Greenwood, who first brought the message of the gospel to me. Then I realized as never before what it was to be a true follower of the meek and lowly Christ Jesus.

I was told by the elders that, if I would do the will of the Father, I should know of the doctrine, if it were of God, and I marveled at the way that knowledge came to me. Truly the inspiration of God so enlightened my mind that all doubts and fears left, and I was ready under any circumstance to bear my testimony to the truth of God. My soul was overflowing with praise and thankfulness to him for the light of the glorious gospel with all its gifts and promises as in the days of old.

ORDINATION

The following April, 1883, I was ordained to the office of deacon, which I filled to the best of my ability, working in the branch that held many pleasant memories for me. There was a membership of about fifteen, and I was then only in my eighteenth year. I was made very much aware of the responsibility placed upon me, but I began in real earnest to do my duty.

Worship Suggestions for February

These thoughts are suggestive only, and in every case should be adapted to the local needs, according to the various age groups which may use them. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope.—Romans 15: 4.

He that hath the scriptures, let him search them. . . Yea, a commandment I give unto you, that ye search these things diligently. . . Therefore give heed to my words.—III Nephi 4: 69; 10: 27, 30.

Talk:

An appreciation of the marvelous manner in which God has prepared for us records from the very beginning of the world even down to the present, represented by the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants, giving us three witnesses of the fullness of the gospel and all things necessary for our knowledge of the plan of salvation. This may well include thoughts based on Book of Mormon Studies, pages 21-31, such as:

God caused records to be kept by the children of men from the days of Adam (Genesis 6: 5, 9, 47). These seem to have been preserved from generation to generation until the time of the Jaredites, when they brought them to this land. Then, the Lord revealed to Moses the story from the beginning and all things essential for the understanding of the plan of salvation. Moses wrote them, evidently, upon plates of brass in the Egyptian language. Subsequent authors were under the necessity of learning the Egyptian language in order to make entries upon these precious plates, even to the days of Moroni, the last of the Nephites to make entries. Moroni, the last Nephite custodian of the records, buried those which he had in his possession, and there they remained awaiting our dispensation, when through the mercies of God, the light which they contain has again come into the world.

God has painstakingly preserved all these records. The oldest records were protected from the wicked Jaredites at the time of their great wickedness and fall. The plates of brass were secured from Laban and protected from other wicked Jews in Jerusalem. Also, they were protected from the wicked Lamanites who would have destroyed them all had they been able to do so. When the records came into the hands of Joseph Smith for translation, they again were protected, this time from the enemies of the Restoration Movement.

Also, after God had given Joseph Smith the correction of the Bible, or the Inspired Version, there followed special measures of protection against enemies.

With all that has gone into the preparation and preservation of the records, how grateful we should be, and what conscientious use we should make of them!

Thoughts for Meditation:

The one everlasting, unchangeable thing in the world is the word of God. (Luke 21: 33).

THE RECORDS

Through all the world's expanse of time,
Through warfare grim or peace sublime,
Has come the sage-recorded word—
Truth incarnate from the Lord.

Treasures rare infixed in stone,
Ancient languages not known,

By Thelona D. Stevens

Skin, parchment, plates of brass—
Records live while ages pass.

Prophecies not yet fulfilled;
Human longings never stilled;
May the records that we trace
Show at last the finished race!

The Eternal Promise:

The Lord has promised: "If thou wilt inquire, thou shalt know mysteries which are great and marvelous."—Doctrine and Covenants 6: 5.

Theme: I LEARN THE CHURCH LAWS

Prelude: "Admonition," by Joseph Luff.

Call to Worship:

Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters,
And he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat;
Yea, come, buy wine and milk,
Without money and without price.

Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread?

And your labour for that which satisfieth not? . . .

Incline your ear, and come unto me;

Hear, and your soul shall live:

And I will make an everlasting covenant with you. . . .

Seek ye the Lord while he may be found,

Call ye upon him while he is near:

Let the wicked forsake his way,

And the unrighteous man his thoughts;

And let him return unto the Lord,

And he will have mercy upon him;

And to our God,

For he will abundantly pardon.

—Isaiah 55: 1-3; 6, 7, English Revised Version.

Suggested Hymns:

"Admonition," by Joseph Luff.

"Come, Tell the Story of His Love,"

No. 286.

"Jesus, the Very Thought of Thee,"

No. 283.

"Teach Me What Thou Wouldst Have Me Do," No. 305.

Suggested Scripture Readings:

Thou shalt take the things which thou hast received, which have been given thee in my scriptures for a law, to be my law, to govern my church; and he that doeth according to these things, shall be saved, and he that doeth them not shall be damned, if he continues.—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 16.

And I will be your Ruler when I come; and, behold, I come quickly; and ye shall see that my law is kept. He that receiveth my law and doeth it, the same is my disciple; and he that saith he receiveth it and doeth it not, the same is not my disciple.—Ibid. 41: 1, 2.

That which is governed by law, is also preserved by law, and perfected and sanctified by the same.—Ibid. 85: 8.

For I command all men, both in the east, and in the west, and in the north, and in the south, and in the islands of the sea, that they shall write the words which I speak unto them; For out of the books which shall be written, I will judge the world, every man according to their works, according to that which is written.—II Nephi 12: 65, 66.

He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me.—John 14:21.

Talk:

Some of these thoughts may be incorporated in a talk to stimulate desire and willingness to become better acquainted with the laws of God:

Members of the church claim with justified positiveness, "We have the gospel of Christ." Having it within our reach is not sufficient. God has made it mandatory that each individual prove himself, whether he be a true disciple of the Christ. Jesus, himself, said: "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me . . . He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings."—John 14: 21, 22.

It is impossible to keep commandments unless we know them. We can only know them by applying ourselves to the task of learning them through individual study. We may profess to love Jesus, but we prove our love by our knowledge of his sayings.

We may attempt to excuse ourselves in our own hearts and to our fellow men, but there will come a time when each must answer to God for the manner in which he has spent his allotted time, for "Behold, the way for man is narrow, but it lieth in a straight course before him, and the keeper of the gate is the Holy One of Israel; and he employeth no servant there."—II Nephi 6: 81.

Story: "The Lost Book of the Law,"—II Kings 22.

Thoughts for Meditation:

In contrast:

God condemned the Israelites:

They kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his law.—Psalm 78: 10. But they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against his people, till there was no remedy.—II Corinthians 35: 16.

My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge; because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee.—Hosea 4: 6.

God greatly blessed the Nephites during their golden age:

And there were great and marvelous works wrought by the disciples of Jesus. . . . And all manner of miracles did they work among the children of men. . . . They did walk after the commandments which they had received from the Lord and their God, continuing in fasting and prayer, and in meeting together oft, both to pray and to hear the word of the Lord.—IV Nephi 1: 6, 7, 13.

Let us consider our responsibility:

And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up . . . to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law.—Isaiah 2: 3.

Only, O Lord, in thy dear love
Fit us for perfect rest above;
And help us this and every day,
To live more nearly as we pray.

—John Keble.

Theme: I STUDY ALL GOOD BOOKS

Prelude: "Jesus Calls Us," No. 237.

Call to Worship:

Jesus calls us; o'er the tumult
Of our life's wild, restless sea;
Day by day his sweet voice soundeth, Saying, "Christian, follow me."

—Cecil F. Alexander.

Suggested Hymns:

"There's no Love to Me Like the Love of Jesus," No. 335.

"I Am Trusting Thee, Lord Jesus," No. 235.

"Look for the Beautiful," No. 209.

"Savior, Like a Shepherd Lead Us," No. 263.

Suggested Scripture Readings:

Behold, the Lord requireth the heart and a willing mind.—Doctrine and Covenants 64:7.
Treasure up in your minds continually the words of life.—Ibid. 83: 14.

Cast away your idle thoughts . . . far from you . . . Seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning, even by study, and also by faith.—Ibid. 85: 19, 36.

Search diligently, pray always, and be believing, and all things shall work together for your good, if ye walk uprightly, and remember the covenant wherewith ye have covenanted.—Ibid., 87: 6.

Talk:

The Lord has said to "become acquainted with all good books" (Section 87: 5); he urges study "out of the best books" (Section 85: 36). The best books, of course, are the Three Standard Books, the Scriptures. In a gift from heaven, God spoke on one occasion saying, "You idle your time away reading magazines, stories, fiction, which study leads you nowhere. . . . You may dig into the best books of the world, but only a little here and a little there will be good. I have given you the plain way by which you may demonstrate the great things I have given to my people Israel."

In Section 85: 21, God named many areas of study, which have been interpreted by F. Henry Edwards in A Commentary on the Doctrine and Covenants, page 278:

"The doctrine of the kingdom"—theology, the principal promises of the gospel.

"The laws of the gospel"—church procedure.

"Things of heaven"—spiritual realities and/or astronomy, meteorology, etc.

"Things in earth"—biology, agriculture, botany, etc.

"Things under the earth"—geology, mining, etc.

"Things which have been"—history, philosophy.

"Things which are"—current events.

"Things which must shortly come to pass"—prophecy.

"Things which are at home"—sociology, politics.

"Things which are abroad"—international law, industry, travel, world affairs, race relations.

"The wars and the perplexities of the nations"—international law, international peace.

"The judgments which are on the land"—drought, cyclones, labor disputes, with the correctives.

"Countries and kingdoms"—physical and political geography, languages, etc.

Study, blessed by the quickening influence of God's Holy Spirit, becomes a delight. Jesus' early disciples learned this, too. "And they said unto one another, Did not our hearts burn within us, while he talked by the way, and while he opened to us the scriptures?"—Luke 24: 31. God is anxious that we should "enjoy the words of eternal life in this world, and eternal life in the world to come; even immortal glory."—Genesis 6: 62. This is possible only through the gospel.

Thoughts for Meditation:

Thou art the Truth; thy word alone.
True wisdom can impart;
Thou only canst inform the mind
And purify the heart.

Thou art the Way, the Truth, the Life;
Grant us that way to know,
That truth to keep, that life to win,
Whose joys eternal flow.

—George Washington Doane

Theme: I SEEK DIVINE WISDOM

Prelude: "Lord, Speak to Me," No. 215.

Call to Worship:

Savior, teach me day by day,
Love's sweet lesson to obey;
Sweeter lesson cannot be—Loving him who first loved me.

—Jane F. Leeson.

Seek Ye By ANN MORGAN

ONE OF THE OUTSTANDING APPEALS of our church is that it is based upon knowledge. We are not asked to believe blindly; rather, in all of our books, we are reminded and urged to see; and we are promised if we do seek, knowledge shall be opened to us.

Our very beginning as a modern church rested upon this quest for a knowledge of God and his works on earth. Joseph Smith read and followed the instruction: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." This is a wonderful promise; but as we think about it, we find that man, before he receives that wisdom, is required to do something. God doesn't promise that he will just give it to us. We must first of all go to God and ask; we must seek that for which we have a need. We have an obligation before we can expect the fulfillment of that promise.

It seems, too, that we have even further obligations; just asking isn't enough. Joseph Smith's immediate answer was really only a partial answer, but he was told to prepare himself to receive the full knowledge of the true church. He had to put forth further effort. Section nine of the Doctrine and Covenants, a revelation given to Oliver Cowdery, contains one paragraph that clearly points out the responsibility of the individual who would know. "Behold, you have not understood; you have supposed that I would give it unto you, when you took no thought, save it was to ask me; but, behold, I say unto you, that you must study it out in your own mind; then you must ask me if it be right, and if it is right, I will cause that your bosom shall burn within you." Surely herein is stated the obligation for work upon the part of the seeker.

WHEN GOD CREATED MAN, he bestowed on him mental and physical power a "little lower than the angels," and he meant for him to have an opportunity to use those powers. God respects the abilities he gave us. We know he could lay open the secrets of his universe so that we might with no effort on our part understand all things about us. But, respecting these mental and physical powers he bestowed upon us, God doesn't choose just to give us understanding. To all of us in relatively varying degrees, he gives the power to seek. We have the ability to search for the truths of his creations, and we are reminded over and over that each of us is to do so. He really didn't allow us a choice as to whether or not we wanted to know. He has commanded, "seek ye." The same wording hasn't always been used; sometimes it was, "Seek ye"; sometimes, "Know ye"; sometimes, "Prepare"; sometimes, "Study." But over and over there has been the command to learn. In ancient times it came through Paul: "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." And in latter days, we have the command given in paragraph twenty-one of section eighty-five of the Doctrine and Covenants: "And I give unto you a commandment, that you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom; teach ye diligently and my grace shall attend you, that you may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, and in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand; of things both in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and the perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that ye may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again, to magnify the calling whereunto I have called you, and the mission with which I have commissioned you."

IT SEEMS logical for us to strive to interpret these things we are to learn by using modern terminology:

1. "Things in heaven" might refer to spiritual things, but in relation to the rest of the paragraph it probably means astronomy and its related subjects.

2. "Things in earth" seems to refer to the physical and biological sciences—biology, chemistry, zoology, et cetera.

3. "Things under the earth"—geology, et cetera.

4. "Things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass"—history.

5. "Things which are at home; things which are abroad"—economics, sociology, et cetera.

6. "Wars and the perplexities of nations; and the judgments which are on the land"—government, et cetera.

7. "A knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms"—geography. Yes, we are to be an educated people. It isn't necessary or perhaps even wise that all of us should go to college to learn. There are so many ways for us to receive knowledge. But one effective method man has found for learning is group study under teachers. Our church recognized this early in its history, and it has always tried to provide opportunities for its people to learn.

We are fortunate that such groups exist for our benefit as well as our college, Graceland, whose doors are open to our youth.

Another January

JANUARY should be a favorite month. Ushered in at the close of the year, it brings with it a short period of peace and calm after the hurried Christmas and year-end activities. To most of us this period is welcome. A time when we can rest a bit, enjoy our homes and families a bit more, and finally take inventory and plan for the things we hope to accomplish during the coming year.

As we view last year's achievements and failures, the partly finished work, and the needs for the future, we must take time out to think through our aims for the year. In what way can our homes be made better and happier, our families' health and welfare improved, the community a better place in which to live? In short, we must plan our decorating, gardening, canning, sewing, community and church activities.

With all our serious thought for the future, let us not forget to enjoy one of the most beautiful months of the year. The scintillating beauty of this winter wonderland should be an inspiration and joy to all who experience it—whether we are out of doors or watching it from our kitchen window.

June may be the month for brides, but January is the bride, attired in pure white robes with her eleven attendants following. It is she whose plans for the future make our year a success or failure.

A THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK

If Christ found it necessary to spend so much time in prayer while here on earth, how much more necessary for us to do so to learn the efficacy of this great power and use it for the glory of God and his children.

Successful marriage is not so much a case of finding the right person, as being the right person.

In the past three years, the Fleming H. Revell Company has brought out three good books on prayer. No duplication is involved, because each one is different, and will serve an individual purpose. Needs and tastes in reading are as varied as those in foods and clothing. For a library on prayer, all three books are worthy of inclusion.

First Steps in Prayer, by Kermit R. Olsen. 1947. 118 pages. $1.25. Beautifully written, thoughtfully planned, philosophically sound, true to experience, this book will stand near the top of the list in any collection of works on prayer. The habitual reader and thinker, the serious scholar, the university student, will find it adequate to his deepest thoughts and needs. Good ministers will appreciate it, as it has much that is worthy of use and quotation in ministering to a congregation.

Prayer, the Mightiest Force in the World, by Frank C. Laubach. 1946. 95 pages. $1.25. This book is enthusiastic and dynamic to the point of explosiveness. It is filled with vital, down-to-earth-human-interest problems, situations, and answers to prayer. It is a book for businessmen, laymen, and those who must meet the roughness of the world at firsthand. Dr. Laubach is the man who made a personal attack on illiteracy on a large scale, and has taught more people to read than any other man, living or dead, in the Philippines and in other lands. It is an atomic energy book.

Prayer and You, by Helen Smith Shoemaker. 1948. 157 pages. $1.75. This book is gentler than Laubach's, simpler than Olsen's. While it is of interest to both men and women, it comes nearer reaching the understanding and experience of the latter, and is nearer to the heart of a woman's world than the other two. The problems and needs of children and the home, the local church and community, the individual outlook are represented here.

In all three books, the writers know that God is real, and they believe in the reality and efficacy of prayer. These are not stale academic treatises. They touch the needs of life and of the human spirit.

A Faith For You, by Brooke Peters Church. Rinehart & Company, 1948. 305 pages.

It is known that the percentage of the population interested in religion is gradually increasing, and a definite gain has been observed in the religious census of last year. This book is to help guide persons who are seeking to select a church or faith for their own affiliation. The work is fair and impartial, and should be a real help. The first three chapters are of a general character, dealing with the purposes of the book, the historical background of Christianity, and common roots and symbols of religious life.

Then there is a major part of the book that deals with the principal Christian faiths. Our church is given five pages, beginning on page 252, and the representation is a good one.

President Israel A. Smith has examined the book, and has written to the publishers regarding the statement of the Utah church.

We are glad to have our organization included in a work of this character and quality, and believe that our people will appreciate it.

Obeys Word of Wisdom

Brother James T. Stringer of Osgood, Missouri, writes his testimony concerning the blessings obtained through obedience to the Word of Wisdom. He suffered much ill health until he came into the church years ago, at which time he gave up the use of coffee, tobacco, and other worldly habits. Now he is seventy-one years of age and is still enjoying good health, sound sleep, and happiness.

Suggested Hymns:

- "Lord, Speak to Me," No. 215.
"Close to Thee," No. 319.
"Wonderful Words of Life," No. 335.
"Guide Me, O My Savior," No. 266.

Suggested Scripture Readings:

Buy the truth and sell it not; also wisdom, and instruction, and understanding.—Proverbs 23: 23.

Wherefore, be ye not unwise, but understanding what is the will of the Lord.—Ephesians 5: 17.

Seek not for riches, but wisdom.—Doctrine and Covenants 6: 3.

Seek ye diligently and teach one another words of wisdom; yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith.—Ibid., 85: 36.

For he that diligently seeketh shall find.—I Nephi 3: 29.

Whoso keepeth the law is a wise son.—Psalm 28: 7.

Talk:

One of the greatest of all the gifts of God is the Holy Ghost, by which God's children are given the promise to be led "into all truth"—if they are willing to be led. This must needs come by individual seeking, and not one who seeks is turned away. He commended some of his early Restoration servants: "Blessed art thou for what thou hast done, for thou hast inquired of me, and, behold as often as thou hast inquired, thou hast received instruction of my Spirit."—Doctrine and Covenants 6: 6.

God would bestow more gifts of knowledge and wisdom upon us if we made more use of what he has already given. Obedience to God's commandments is another of the divine requirements before spiritual gifts function. Therefore, those who would be wise will give heed to the divine commandment to study and become acquainted with the laws of God.

At the recent General Conference, God spoke in no uncertain terms, pointing out again the necessity for immediate preparation. He said, "The hastening time is upon us; the period until the next General Conference, as already provided, must be one of unusual preparation for my church as an organization, for my people, and especially for my priesthood if there shall be those who will be qualified to assume and carry the responsibilities of those who fall or fail or who are released."

Thoughts for Meditation:

For many years our thoughts have turned Toward some expansion plan,
But never could we see the goal
As well as now we can.

The way is clear, the privilege ours
Let naught retard the thrill
That comes with leading souls to do Our blessed Master's will.
—Jesse L. Bernheisel.

The past is written! Close the book
On pages sad and gay;
Within the future do not look,
But live today—today.
—Lydia Avery Coonley Ward.

The clock of life is wound but once,
And no man has the power
To tell just when the hands will stop—
At late or early hour.
Now is the only time you own:
Live, love, work with a will.
Place no faith in tomorrow, for—
The clock may then be still.
—George H. Candler.

'Tis a little journey
This we walk;
Hardly time for murmurs—
Time for talk.

—Author Unknown.

And now, little children, abide in him, that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.—I John 2: 28.

ment made by a large percentage of its members, "If we only knew each other better!" Those who succeed in building Zion must share more interests in life than those of their church.

Consider the family. How many families are truly sharing all of life together, having common ideals and purposes because all see themselves engaged in a work which is greater than the individual? The gathering and building of the kingdom offer that opportunity.

Consider the problem of each church member. How may we live a Christ-like life in the face of the tremendous forces which, day after day, impose their influence upon us to draw us away from such a life?

God has pronounced again the law of the gathering. We must gather and live the whole life together. In the communities of the gathering, we must be about controlling the framework of daily life, politically, economically, and socially, so that these powerful forces, with the church, shall contribute their God-given end of molding lives to "the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Then shall Christ come!

LETTERS

A Good Resolution

After attending a meeting yesterday, I thought how wonderful it is to be a member of a church where there is such love and understanding. Then I began to wonder if we are really deserving of these blessings when so few of us are willing to obey the commandments given us. It is not difficult to keep a few, but we are expected to keep all of them. I am thinking particularly of the law of tithing. If we are truly partners in this business of building Zion, we will give financial support to the cause. It would be a real step forward if each member would begin the new year by filing his inventory and paying his tithing. God has been good to us; it is for us to acknowledge his goodness by becoming partners with him.

Helped by Prayer

A little more than a year ago I was stricken with cardiac asthma. I wish to thank all who remembered me in prayer following the request which appeared in the Herald. I am able to be up now, although I still have to be careful, and I thank God constantly for the blessing I've received. The doctor told my husband that medical science did not save my life.

Since my illness, I have had more time for study. I am reading the Bible and will begin studying the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants soon. I pray God's work will spread the world around.

Passing of High Priest Joseph A. Jaques

The church, the Chicago District, Northeastern Illinois District, and a host of church and business acquaintances and friends suffered a great loss in the death of Elder Joseph A. Jaques, who passed away June 27, 1948, in the home of one of his sons in Glenview, Illinois, near Chicago.

The greater part of his life was devoted to work in the Restored Church. He has labored at different times in branches and district work as president of the Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and of the Northeastern Illinois Districts. He held various other administrative offices to which he gave understanding and constructive leadership. He was a great favorite with the young people and was always eager to extend himself in their behalf and to give them the benefit of his experience and understanding.

A Child's Faith

Colleen Maddess, four years and ten months old, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. S. Maddess, broke her arm while doing her tumbling exercises in acrobatic class.

She arose from the mat, stood a moment with the injured arm dangling at her side, then uttered a pitiful little cry. On the way to the hospital, although she was obviously under strain, she was quite calm and patient. She waited fifteen minutes in the emergency room of the hospital, and without receiving assistance there, was referred to her private physician's office. Again she had a considerable wait before seeing the doctors. Though her lip trembled, she greeted his appearance with a faint smile. Her face was tense and a stray tear or two escaped while her arm was being straightened and set, but she was sweet, co-operative and confident. Her physician was frank in his admiration.

Later, on hearing people relate that they suffered severe pain while an arm was being set, her mother asked, "Dear, did it hurt much when the doctor set your arm?"

Her reply was simply, "It hurt some, but God was there. He was with me when I broke it. He was at the hospital and at the doctor's office. His house [the church] is just down the street from there you know. He is with me all the time."

During the most painful periods of healing she sang "Come Learn of the Meek and Lowly" and declared with childish surety that when she sang, the pain left. Many nights when she found it difficult to get comfortable she would hum the song until she went to sleep.

If all the world could share that faith, there would be no preparation for war.
LUCILLE GILMORE in the Seattle Legionnaire.

Note of Thanks

I wish to thank the kind people who have sent cards and letters to my mother, Mrs. Christine Morgan (from Detroit, Michigan), during her illness. The prayers of the Saints have helped, and we are grateful for them.

Springfield, Ohio, Celebrates First Anniversary in Church Home

SPRINGFIELD MISSION became a branch on October 27, 1947, under the direction of Apostle D. Blair Jensen, and District President Floyd T. Rockwell (Southern Ohio District).

The picture of the church home and parsonage shows a fine building sheltered and partly hidden by beautiful and stately trees. The pastor, Orval M. Hooten, writes that the group purchased the building for $8,500 late in 1944, paying $2,000 down. They removed a partition in the left side of the house to provide a large meeting room. They financed the remaining debt through a local building and loan concern, and reduced the principal to $5,000. Financing has now been taken over under the "Houses of Worship Fund" plan, and the principal will be reduced to $4,000. General church officers have expressed great satisfaction in the program and the achievements of the Springfield group in financing this building and in carrying on the work there.

Brother Hooten lives in the second story of the house, and pays thirty-five dollars a month rent, which goes to reduce the debt. He is also able to give much service in the maintenance and protection of the property.

The building is forty by forty feet, brick walls and red tile roof. There is a dining room in the basement where dinner was served on the day the congregation celebrated its first anniversary as a branch. The location is 455 Woodlawn Avenue, Springfield 58, Ohio. Visitors are cordially invited to attend any time.

This is an example of what a small but energetic church group can do under good leadership and a practical plan.

On Kneeling

After reading the article, "Let Us Kneel," I felt prompted to write an experience I had. Both my knees were injured in a car wreck; one was severed, and it was believed I would not be able to walk again. I was afraid I would never kneel after that, and God had been so good to me, I felt there was no other way to show my gratitude than by kneeling before him. However, I was assured in a dream one night that I would be healed, thanks be to the Heavenly Father.

Is it possible that there are those who will fulfill the written word which says that some cannot endure sound doctrine? I hope we will all hold fast to the rod of iron and be worthy to meet the Savior when he comes. Pray for me.

A number of years ago, T. S. Williams was called to administer to a young polio victim and when he saw the helpless grief and distress of the parents, he vowed a vow and said in effect, "If ever I get a chance to hit this thing, I'm going to do everything I can to help conquer it."

This year he is chairman of the infantile paralysis county organization and despite the indifference of a few, despite the pressure of his own work and worries, he is trying to "hit this thing" that lurks in the pathway of every child.—Kathryn C. Metz in Lamoni Chronicle.

From This Year Forward

By CHARLES KORNMAN

There is another class of “resolutions.” Some, in the deeper recesses of their thinking apparatus, sort of hope that when they say a good resolution, they’ll get a mark in the “good” column on the books. Perhaps this is what inspired the statement, “The road to hell is paved with good intentions.” We all know people like this. They make the rather startling statement, “I’m going to file my financial statement!”

Then the sun shines its required number of times and the accounting time comes again. The little “god of things as they ought to be” asks, “Well, what’s wrong here?” “Oh, I just simply didn’t have time to do it.

But you’ve got to give me a little credit. I wanted to do what’s right.”

And there’s a third class that could use some advice from the Billiken. They are the ones who never start because they just know they can’t do it. And they have scripture to prove their point. In Ecclesiastes, the preacher makes this statement: “Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay.” This group, recognizing the weaknesses inherent in the second position and being fearful of the first, have taken their position at the other end of the pendulum’s arc. They say it is better not to start something if you’re in doubt at all as to whether or not you can finish it. Could it have been this class of people to whom the Master was talking when he said, “O ye of little faith”?

SOMEWHERE in all of the irrational approaches to life there is a position from which we ought to look at the New Year—not just those brief moments before January starts, but at the new year that stretches ahead of us every moment of our life. Perhaps here, more than anywhere else, the little “god of things as they ought to be” could be of most help. If there were such a creature extant in the land, and we were to go to him with our problem of what we ought to do to make our lives what they ought to be, he’d ask us a rather strange question: “Why do you make New Year resolutions?” And our answer almost universally would be, “Because we want to be good so that we can do good for other people.”

“Well said,” our mythical Billiken would reply. “And if that be the case, there is only one person to whom I can refer you. He is known among you as the Master. Go to him with your problem. Where I can only suggest, he demonstrates. Where I point, he beckons. Where I can only say what people have told me, he can say, ‘I have been there before you. The way is not easy, but I will help you.’” The “little god of things as they ought to be” would continue, “Go to this Man—this Son of God—because only by listening to him can you make of the things that are the things that ought to be.”

Rufus Jones once wrote, “He who wishes to realize and practice the presence of God must inform himself at the highest source and fount, must come face to face with him who was the highest human revelation of God. No one of us can interpret our longings or our purposes until he reads them off in the light of some loftier type of personality.”

As we look at this New Year with all its charm and unknown appeal and possibilities let us do so with the criterion of the isomeric relationship that Christ asks all of us to permit within our lives. Instead of making up a list of resolutions we have no intention of keeping or

JUST AFTER WORLD WAR I, a fad swept the United States in much the same manner as the “schmoo” has in our day. In its heyday, this other equally popular little fellow was pictured as a Chinese and was known as a “Billiken” or the “god of things as they ought to be.”

As I listen to some of my friends make out their list of good intentions for the New Year, I cannot but wish that they had a “Billiken” perched on their shoulder. So many of them make up a list of untenable resolutions and then immediately proceed to forget all about them. And if some interested soul mentions their negligence, they promptly reply, “Hitch your wagon to a star,” or in the more verbose language of the poet, they quote quite glibly:

Though thou hast time
For but a line
Make that sublime
Low aim, not failure

which we could not keep if we tried, let us attempt to look at this business of living and see if we can't discover some of the things that all of us can incorporate into our lives—the things that ought to be.

IN THE BOOK OF MORMON, we read about King Benjamin who had been a ruler for a long, long time. One day, with the typical pragmatic philosophy that characterized so many of those ancient leaders, he realized his days of effectiveness as a ruler were over. So he called all of his people around him—the people who had come to love him and whom he had come to love—to give them some final advice. He talked to them in much the same manner one would expect from a ruler who loved his people. He talked about the kind of lives they ought to be living, and he mentioned as the first and greatest requirement—the belief that God is and that he is the creator of all things, and that he has all wisdom and all power.

Strange, isn't it, that this wise old king of ancient days should tell his people to believe in God? Reminds one of the verse from the Book of John, ". . . believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." But too often our connotation of the word believe merely implies acceptance of the fact that Jesus is the Christ. Certainly that is one of the basic points of doctrine in our gospel, but the sphere that "belief" encompasses must also include trust and confidence in the workability of the plan that Christ gave. And so, when we come to moments of introspection to look at ourselves as we are and as we would be if we were what we ought to be, let us keep this at the head of our list of resolutions: "I am going to believe in God as well as about him!" All else stems from this one statement and its resultant influence in our life.

The thought I am attempting to portray is this: there are basic considerations to be held by everyone who is interested in becoming what

J Witness for Christ

By THE ZION'S LEAGUE COUNCIL

"To Plan and Carry Out a Genuine Missionary Activity" is the next project challenging the Zion's League around the world. Between February and May, each League from the smallest to the largest is to engage in telling the story of the church to those with whom the League most desires to share its fellowship.

Whether it be through a missionary series conducted by the Leagues themselves or in support of a branch program, it is hoped that through this project every Leaguer will earn the thrill of sharing the distinctive message of the Restoration with his friends. We like variety, and variety is one of the pleasant features of this second world-wide Zion's League project. Leaders will agree that working hard on one activity for a short length of time and then changing the type of activity is psychologically sound.

Still paying tithes and keeping a record book, every Zion's Leaguer will move into missionary endeavor during the second project period. This period of time extends from February 1 through April 30, 1949.

A. During this time, each Zion's League plans and carries out one missionary activity such as the following:

1. A cottage meeting
2. A missionary service or series
3. Systematic invitation canvass
4. Distributing literature
5. Support in some appointed way the branch missionary program.

Missionary work of any kind must be supervised and authorized by the local branch ministry. All Zion's Leagues are urged to confer with the pastor concerning the type of missionary activity he would like them to participate in. This is to help rather than disrupt the planned missionary endeavor of the branch.

Under number five, there are innumerable activities the Leaguers will find they can help with. They may furnish the music, do some house-to-house visiting, usher, decorate the church, or furnish the transportation for the series the district missionary may be presenting in the branch during February. Here is a good opportunity for the League to show that its members are, first of all, members of the world-wide church and as such are members of the local branch.

B. Each Zion's League will climax this missionary period with the Annual Restoration Festival involving one of the following:

1. A missionary drama
2. A historical party
3. A pageant
4. Other activities suggested in Zion's League Annuals.

Last year's work in the Restoration Festival proved to be a building factor for many Zion's Leagues throughout the church. Experience shows that it is a good thing when the youth of the church unite throughout the world for an intensive period of commemoration. The spirit of brotherhood and unity increases.

In Zion's League Annual Number II is to be found the message from Elbert A. Smith to the youth of the church. Obtainable from Herald Publishing House, 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri, is a twelve-inch unbreakable vinylite recording of Brother Elbert himself reading this message with a musical setting provided by the Stone Church choir. This will add reality to any commemorative Restoration Festival event, whatever it may be.

Every Zion's League will then report by May 15 to the district youth leader the activities completed in this two-point "Witnessing for Christ" program. He, in turn, will tabulate the results and send them to the Department of Religious Education by May 30, 1949. We anticipate that results of this project will be published in district papers and in the Herald.

Plan to do some missionary work this year as a part of the preparation the Lord has urged during this inter-conference period.

in which the Master appeared to them, and they record, "And, now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him, that he lives; for we saw him, even on the right hand of God." Not every person alive will have that same experience. But to every one of us there may come some kind of divine revelation, some kind of experience of divine communion, which will make it possible for us to say, "This personality of Jesus works in me so that I am aware there is something outside myself which enters into my being as I open the door of my heart and am willing to receive the ministry of his holy, divine spirit." We today are witnesses of the power of the Spirit of God in our own lives. We must "be ready always to give a reason with meekness and fear for the hope" that is within us. The most fundamental and the most significant ministry of the Spirit of God which comes to us is not to be found in the uttered prophecy nor in the healing of our bodies, but in what happens to the direction of our lives and to the quality of our thinking, and to the attitude of our heart. The healing of our spirit, the healing of our souls, body and spirit, is the great miracle of the power of God in our hearts. The miracle and the saving power of the Spirit of God is to so lift men from the lower levels of life, that their bodies do not become ill, and they are not subject to those conditions which require physical healing.

We must have the direction of our lives so affected by the ministry of the Spirit of God that we can testify it has given us direction and purpose and has pointed us toward our destiny. We are witnesses of the validity of the principles and the ordinances of the gospel. We can bear testimony to the saving grace and power which is revealed in these ordinances only as we participate in them. We suggest, especially to members of the priesthood, and also to the membership at large, that we ought to give more attention to the dignifying of the administration of the ordinances of the gospel so that these things may become powerful, dramatic symbols, vehicles of expression, channels through which the Spirit of God may come in power into our hearts and minds. We ought to do this so that baptism and confirmation and ordination, the blessing of children, and administration to the sick and all of the other ordinances of the gospel of Jesus Christ may become for us the revelation of divinity and the creation within us of divine power.

The world today is eager for our testimony. Today men and women, boys and girls, are lost—literally lost—in a confusing conflict of life purposes and philosophies and destinies, so that they know not which way to turn. Today men need to have some leadership that will point the direction of their lives so that our young people will know what to study in school, and how to study it; so that adults will know what vocations to choose and to follow; so that we will know how to organize the social, recreational, and financial activities of our homes; so that it will be possible for us to participate in all of the affairs of life in such a way that we are pointed toward the kingdom of God.

We must be witnesses who are qualified by experience and devotion to those things which we have ourselves understood by reason of what we have experienced. We are the witnesses of the nature of our own convictions and of the quality of our fellowship and of the power of truth in our own lives. The membership of this church are the witnesses of the nature of the church. And while it is true that the ordained ministry, and particularly the general officers of the church, are required to be witnesses in a special way, the world at large sees the church of Jesus Christ for what it is in terms of the lives of its members. And the kind of testimony we bear will be determined not by what the members of the Quorum of Twelve or the First Presidency or the Seventy or the High Priests or any other ordained body of men may say from the pulpit nearly so much as by the quality of our testimony as seen in our lives and habits. We are his witnesses. The kind of witness we give and the quality of our testimony depends on the quality of the people we are, and the kind of application we make of the principles to which we wish to bear testimony.

We look forward in the coming months to a period of increased and growing activity in the church. During the past year or two there has been an increased devotion to our missionary cause. In many places we are baptizing more people in present times than we have for years past, and in many places we are able to observe an upsurge of spiritual power and a renewal of spiritual vitality. In coming months and in the coming year, the quality of the spiritual life of the church and its ministry in the world at large will be tested, and we must answer to the question as to whether or not we shall satisfy the tremendous needs of the world today in providing the way of life for men. The outcome will be determined by the quality of the testimony which we as members of the church of Jesus Christ are able to bear in our own lives. May we be able to say, as did the Apostle Peter, that there are some things we are witnesses of because we know they're true, we have tested them in our own lives, we have a conviction which is built upon experience. We are witnesses of the saving grace of his gospel and of the power of the ordinances and the principles of that gospel in our lives. And because we are his witnesses, the world shall see that here is a revelation of Divinity in terms we can all understand and apply to life's needs and to life's processes. In this way, the kingdom will be built and the fulfillment of the prophecies will bring to pass the accomplishment of all we hope in the coming of peace, prosperity, happiness, and harmony for all mankind.

he ought to. This in no way implies that we are to become as robots with no differentiating characteristics, but the principles of a good life are the same for every person. Perhaps this is most noticeable in a negative way—we do not set out to become cheerful and kind and considerate with these particular abstractions as our goal and ever really achieve them. Rather, they come as an outgrowth of a striving for the abundant life that Christ offers to us. It was he who said, "I am the way, the truth and the life." And any attempt on our part to produce Christlike qualities in our life without associating ourselves with him must result in failure. We do not become Christlike by accident, nor do we "put on the new man" by listing his qualifications and then making those qualifications themselves our goals.

THERE ARE TWO THEORIES abroad in the land today. One of them says that man is not able to control his destiny—that there is an inevitable evolution in history over which he has no control. And the other, a contradictory theory, is that man has those potentialities resident within him which, with the help of God, he is able to control and direct toward a Christlike life. These two theories are in direct opposition to each other. For clarification of our position, I wonder just what the Master meant when he said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." It is possible, with the help of God, to direct our emotions, our entire thinking process, and our very actions. If it isn't possible, then why did the Master command us to do that which will require every fiber of our being to be thrown into the struggle?

Just a few days before he was crucified by the people he came to help, the Master was talking, and I think it fitting that we close with some of his words: "No man cometh unto the Father but by me If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him."

Things as they ought to be? Yes! Things as they will be? Yes—provided we are willing to take upon us the name of the Son and keep his commandments "that we may have his spirit to be with us."

GOD CAME TO ME

God came to me,
 In the still watches of the night,
 When restlessly upon my bed
 I tossed, beset
 By phantom specters of the dark,
 God came to me.
 In gentle touch,
 I felt his hand upon my brow.
 I heard the counsel of his word.
 The way ahead,
 Obscured in gloom, was now illumed,
 And I found rest.

God came to me
 Amidst the hustle of a busy day,
 The blatant roar of rushing throngs.
 He pierced the din!
 I know not if I'd have endured
 The incessant clang.
 Nor if I'd have
 Withstood the pleasure-maddened crowd.
 But, through the maelstrom of that strife,
 I felt his hand
 Draw me, with tender insistence
 To safer ways.

God came to me.
 The shamble of a wasted life
 Behind, he found a mountaintop
 Of selfishness and petty pride.
 He pointed out
 The twisted souls,
 Maimed by the heel of avarice,
 And bade me find a way to build
 A better world
 Where love rules and laughter will Echo from the hills.

I met a man once who explained carefully why it was necessary for him to drink a "little" alcohol. A "toddy" he called it. It was for his stomach's sake, he said.

Then he explained why he needed to smoke. It was to quiet his nerves.

Then he explained why he was not always faithful to his wife. Everybody knows, he said, that a man needs to have a little fun sometimes, and a little freedom.

Our Moral Foundations

PRESIDENT JAMES BRYANT CONANT of Harvard University asks the question, in an article on "Force and Freedom" in the January Atlantic, "Can there be a moral basis for freedom in a world of force?" The historical paradox involved is clearly presented in his statement, While liberty has repeatedly been gained by war, once won it can be protected only by adherence to those moral principles which were repudiated in its achievement.

And toward the end of his article, Dr. Conant makes the statement which is of major interest to us:

Our open society rests on a fundamental moral basis; once we destroy this basis, we have destroyed the essence of this nation.

We believe that statement to be true, and we believe this distinguished American leader of thought and education has done a service to the nation in so presenting it.

FROM OUR VIEWPOINT, another question grows out of this idea: "Does America today have a sufficiently strong moral basis to re-establish the freedom sacrificed in the late war, and to maintain it?"

The question, of course, immediately plunges the interrogator into a tangled web of statistics, opinions, trends, surveys, and what not. And the lazy philosopher will bring the whole discussion to an immediate halt by lifting his eyebrows to inquire, with a sardonic tone in his voice, "What moral basis are you discussing? And what is morality?"

We don't stop living to inquire, "What is life?" And we don't refuse to use electrical current in our homes while the philosopher probes the question, "What is electricity?" So, in a world of sin and suffering, where nearly every rational individual knows what is meant by the terms, we do not halt our effort to save ourselves while somebody inquires "What is morality?" The time element is important, and something must be decided and done now.

In our troubled world, we have to deal with immediate causes and consequences in human conduct. We have little time to pause now with the philosopher and his ivory-tower inquiry. We know very well he will still be there when we return, and he will have no answer for his own questions, much less for ours.

Hewing more closely to the line indicated by Dr. Conant, let us ask if the American people are good enough, if they have the moral foundations, to meet the responsibilities of the position of world leadership that world events, by crushing the old leaders, have thrust upon this people?

WHEN WE CONSIDER the course of our affairs, we wonder.

When we consider our determination to force our form of democracy upon other peoples of the world, whether they want it or not, whether they are ready for it or not, to provide a friendly world situation for our nation, we wonder about our moral principles.

When we consider our class struggles—the ethics of labor as well as the ethics of capital—our intolerances, passions, and prejudices, we wonder.

When we consider the willingness of so large a percentage of our citizenry to sell their votes for patronage, for political preferment, or like Esau to trade the birthright of freedom for the pottage of security, we wonder about our morality.

When we consider the sordid record of animalistic marriages and beastly divorces, the mistreatment and abandonment of children, the corruption we so lightly condone in all the walks of our life, we wonder.

What we face is more than an academic question, more than a philosophical inquiry. Truly, the ages must find an answer, sometime, to Dr. Conant's question, "Can there be a moral basis for freedom in a world of force?"

But the question we face right now is this, "Is there a moral basis of freedom in our country or in the world?"

THE ANSWER does not come in any clear contrasts of black and white. It comes in lights and shadows, in tones relatively dark or bright, in grays, in a penumbra, in a dim twilight.

The answer must relate to individuals, as well as to the nation as a whole; for no nation is better or stronger than the individuals who compose it, and the national morality is no more than summation of the moral qualities and standards of the citizenry.

Turning anxious eyes toward the mirror in which we shall find the answer to our inquiry, does any of us dare, outside of the most brazen audacity and persiflage, pretend that we have moral foundations adequate to our needs, and to world needs, in these times? We do not.

INDIVIDUALLY AND NATIONALLY, we need better and stronger moral and ethical foundations. We need them to survive. We need them to demonstrate our right to survive. The record of history is filled with stories of nations that perished, not for lack of military power, not for lack of economic resources, but for lack of spiritual integrity, for moral purity and strength, for ethical principles.

Individually, and nationally, we need a return to God. We need the saving power of Jesus Christ. And that is why the preaching of the gospel is the most important task in the world today.

Bishop Kelley

WE REFER to Bishop J. Stanley Kelley, a son of Bishop Edmund L. Kelley, of blessed memory and who served the church as a bishop for about thirty years, and as Presiding Bishop from 1892 to 1916.

Bishop J. Stanley on January 1 will assume new responsibilities after almost nineteen years as a bishop in Zion. He has been assigned to California. I asked Brother Kelley to write us concerning his work in the Center Place, and we are pleased to publish what he has written.

Dear Brother:

After eighteen and one-half years of church work in Independence, it is with much regret that we leave this field and move on to another. The chief reason for this feeling is the fact that the Saints of Independence and the various officers of the Center Place, including the officers and members of the various congregations, have given wholehearted support toward all efforts for improvement and progress.

With little more than six per cent of the church membership, the Saints here have consistently raised about ten per cent of the general church income, and during the first ten months of 1948 have increased this amount to more than eleven per cent. Another evidence of wholehearted support is that forty-one per cent of the membership are receipted contributors to general church income, and probably fifty per cent are contributors in tithes or offerings to some phase of church work.

In 1930 Independence was made up of nine congregations and one mission. Since that time we have acquired four additional church buildings and increased the number of congregations to fourteen. Membership in the district has increased from 5,803 to nearly 9,000; general church income has increased from approximately $35,000.00 to over $100,000.00 in this same period. Income for local church purposes has increased proportionately.

During this time, our church cemetery (Mound Grove Cemetery, North River Road) has grown from a fifteen acre plot to some fifty-seven acres of territory that is becoming one of the best kept and most attractive acreages of its kind in Jackson County. It is hoped we can continue to improve this so that the cemetery will always be a credit to the church.

We have acquired buildings and acreage for a much-needed home for elderly women of the church during the past six years. This is proving to be totally inadequate to accommodate the large number of applicants. It seems that we should continue to increase our facilities, not only for elderly women, but for elderly men who need institutional care. In this way the church will be serving its membership in an ever-growing need.

Since we began work in 1930, indebtedness in local churches amounting to $20,000.00 has been paid during the same period that the people of Independence joined with all outside districts in eliminating a large general church debt. A number of church buildings have been built and improved during this same time, and some of the congregations have built up substantial building funds. However, there has been disappointment in the amount of building that has been done during the past eight years. Our churches in the Center Place have been overcrowded for years. For a number of reasons, that need not be enumerated here, it has seemed impossible to erect church buildings fast enough. Let us hope that much can be accomplished in this respect during the next few years.

All in all, we have enjoyed our work in Independence, and will miss regular contact with many friends here. Mrs. Kelley joins me in expressing deep-felt thanks for the many kindnesses shown us, as well as the wholehearted and unselfish support during our years of residence here.

Sincerely yours,
J. S. KELLEY.

We acknowledge our obligations to Brother Kelley for services rendered through some very trying years, and for his resoluteness in helping the Presidency and Presiding Bishopric carry forward their plans for a community-minded Center Place. For service well performed, we extend thanks on behalf of the church, and earnestly commend him to the Saints of California.

We are pleased to get from Patriarch G. T. Griffiths, the following:

I highly appreciate the greetings and best wishes sent through you from the delegates and ex officios of the General Conference.

It was a source of sorrow and regret to me to miss this Conference. If the Lord wills, I hope to meet the Saints at the 1950 Conference.

Good reports were brought back to us from some of the delegates. They felt that they had received a spiritual feast, and that the church was moving forward, especially in its missionary program.

As your responsibility in your prophetic calling as prophet of the church is great, and will increase, I pray God to bless you, protect you, and give of his mighty power to direct and guide you. I have implicit trust in your integrity and ability.

Yours in gospel bonds,
Gomer T. Griffiths.

Gog Comes to America

By Apostle D. T. Williams

IN The Popular and Critical Bible Encyclopedia, under the article "Gog," we have the following enlightening passage:

This name [Gog] occurs in Ezekiel 38: 3, 14 and 39: 11 as a proper name; that of a prince of Magog, a people that were to come from the North to invade the land of Israel and to be there defeated.

In the last paragraph this article continues:

As a collective name, Magog seems also to indicate in the Hebrew the tribes about the Caucasian Mountains. According to Reinegge (Description of the Caucasus) some of the Caucasian people call their mountains, "Gog," and the highest northern points, "Magog."

The above is cited to further strengthen the thought that the "uttermost parts of the North," as set forth in Ezekiel's prophecy, has reference to none other than Gog's land—the land of the Caucasian Mountains, or "the highest northern points"—the land of Magog.

With this geographical location fixed, let us objectively peruse the picture of Gog to catch a further glimpse of his disposition and glean some idea of how he intends to bring to pass his conquest of the world and the final subjection of all its peoples.

He will, undoubtedly, use every subtle device to achieve his diabolical purpose—that of turning man against his Maker. His modern machinations will be implemented in such manner as to best poison the minds of humanity. And if it were possible for Lucifer, as we have discussed in a previous article, by such deception to infiltrate the heavenly host with his noxious infections, is it not highly probable that a like malignant penetration into the ranks of humanity would work quite as effectively and disastrously?

If this is not an unreasonable deduction, then we might well expect any and every instrument to be utilized for the ultimate defeat and enslavement of the race. Some of these instruments, if used wisely, could well be for mankind's betterment. For instance, the mere matter of knowing how to read and write, everything else being equal, should be considered an achievement worthy of human effort. But if this accomplishment, good as it may be in itself, should be manipulated for the attainment of such an evil purpose as the dethronement of God from the altars of men's hearts, then that which should have been good and helpful becomes vicious and harmful.

WE ARE ADVISED by some well-meaning people that Communism must be an instrument in God's hand, because it has made possible the attainment of reading skill by millions of the common people. If this were an achievement for freedom it would be, without a doubt, an unmixed blessing. However, this accomplishment in erudition may be turned to the enslavement of those whom it should bless. If a vicious application is made of such a worthwhile triumph, it would terminate in cursing instead of blessing.

That which should be an instrument of liberty may be translated into chains of servitude. Such seems to be the reality under the "dictatorship of the proletariat," for after men and women have learned to read, they are left no choice in this new field of adventure, for the government dictates what they shall read by dictating what Communist writers shall write. Thus all their boasted intellectual freedom is turned to chains. No foreign magazines, newspapers, books, or other literature is allowed to reach the newly-educated among the common people of Communist-controlled countries. Here, again, the wall to prevent political and economic penetration is rendered impervious to any philosophy incubated in the so-called "capitalistic mind."

Where there is no freedom of the press, there is no freedom of ideology. Here all the ideas which reach the masses of the people are precast in the mold of Communism. Here the citizen is socially ostracized or banished to a concentration camp if he dares to listen to a foreign radio program of his own choosing outside of set boundaries. Under these enslaving circumstances, the knowledge of how to read and the instrument to listen to what comes over the ether waves may become but painful accentuations of his serfdom.

THAT THE MODERN GOG is utilizing these instruments of possible enlightenment to the confusing of the mass mind within his domain is too self-evident to need elaboration. The attitude of those who direct the educational processes of the Communists and what they expect to accomplish through those channels of information is illustrated by the appended quotation cited in a recent radio address as coming from the man who heads the Communist system of education. This educator is quoted as saying: "We hate Christians. Even the best of them must be considered our worst enemies. They preach love. What we need is hate. We must know how to hate. Only thus can we conquer the world." Think of this from a man who has directed the educational program for millions of the coming generation.

That, too, is Satan's philosophy. If he can teach men to hate God and despise His people, the mission which Lucifer assigned himself and his demoniac host while yet in heaven will have been achieved. His determination to "deceive the whole world" (Revelation 12:9) will, with the assistance of this policy, accomplish its intent wherever that policy is implemented.

There were some men of semi-prophetic vision years ago able to see what was happening through this menace who gave warning of the disaster lying ahead. Arthur Hyde, a member of Herbert Hoover's cabinet, had this to say:

I have found an amazing lot of Americans who view . . . [Communism] as a benign experiment in social reorganization. My friends, they . . . crucify every institution that the American people hold dear! They crucify the home! They stultify the school! They abrogate the church! Every institution which we Americans hold to be fundamental is on the rack . . . and yet there are Americans with stomachs strong enough to view it as a benign experiment.

HOW ANY CHRISTIAN can champion such an ideology is a mystery to those who see the light of the gospel in the revelation of the Restoration Movement. There are some who assert that the strong pressure against the church by the Communist Party is manifested only in such places where the church as an apostate institution terribly abused its privileges and browbeat the common man. However, the evidence is to the contrary. The "party" has no use for the church in America. It is not wanted here. If you want to become a full-fledged Communist, you should prepare to give up God, Christ, and the church.

William Z. Foster, National Chairman of the Communist Party, has for many years been known as an ardent leader of Communism in the United States and is now the chief representative of his party in this country. Before the Congressional Committee on un-American activities, Mister Foster said: "Our party considers religion to be the opium of the people, as Karl Marx has stated, and we carry on propaganda for the liquidation of these prejudices amongst the workers."

In answer to the question, "To be a member of the Communist Party, do you have to be an atheist?" Mr. Foster said, "Many workers join the Communist Party who still have some religious scruples or religious ideas; but a worker who will join the Communist Party, who understands the elementary principles of the Party . . . must necessarily be in the process of liquidating his religious beliefs, and if he still has any lingerings when he joins, he will soon get rid of them."

Nor is the Christian who is converted to Communism at liberty to take advantage of rituals of the church, except at the peril of being expelled from his party association. Mr. Foster again makes this clear by saying, "My opinion is that a member of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union who would be married in a church would not be of any value to the Party."

The chairman of the Committee questioning him further as to what would happen to such a member, inquired, "Could he maintain his membership in the Party?"

To this Foster said, "He would not."

Chairman: "He would be put out of the Party?"

Mr. Foster: "Eventually, if not for the specific act."

Chairman: "Would it not be the same in this country?"

Mr. Foster: "Of course."

Here we have it. The answer is from one of the strong men of the infiltrating host in the "Good Old U. S. A." Gog, through Communism and his emissaries, comes to America to inform us that Communism and Christianity are not congenial. In fact, they are at war with one another. How does Gog aim to bring about the conquest of the world? By impregnating the population of the earth with confusion, by drawing down before our human eyes the iron curtain of blindness, by conspiring with the few to the destruction of the many. As Mr. William Z. Foster related at another time before a Congressional Investigating Committee, "It is not mass organization that counts. Mere numbers mean nothing. The masses only clog up the organizations' machinery and prevent the smooth working of the militants. The Communist Party is the distilled essence of revolutionary energy. It is the little leaven that leaveneth the whole lump. Its influence and power is enormously greater than its small numbers would indicate."

AS WE HAVE ALREADY observed, this war began in heaven. The first campaign of this universal conflict was waged in the courts of glory and eventuated in the banishment of Lucifer, the champion of dictatorial power.

Now the conflict is raging here among men only because the theater of operation has moved from heaven to earth. Lucifer is like other dictators—to the extent of his power, he will either rule or ruin. Speaking of their Babylon of confusion and conflict which should come, the Lord says, "Come out of her my people and be not partakers of her sins."

The indication here is that His people are still in Babylon and will continue to be there up to the time of the fulfillment of these predic-

The Ministry of Visiting the Sick

By DONALD V. LENTS

Chaplain, Independence
Sanitarium and Hospital

An address given before the Order of Evangelists during the 1948 General Conference.

Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray. Is any merry? Let him sing psalms. Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. Confess your faults one to another, and pray for one another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.—James 5:13-16.

A TWOFOLD MINISTRY

JESUS' MINISTRY WAS TWOFOLD. Latter Day Saints have never regarded body and spirit as antagonistic to each other, or centered their interest on either one to the exclusion of the other. They recognize, as Jesus did, the necessity for both kinds of healing—spiritual and physical.

In the early church, this attitude was revealed through Joseph Smith when Thomas B. Marsh was called to serve in the Quorum of Twelve and at the same time be the church physician.

God is concerned and interested in our well-being—so concerned that he commanded in our times that “a Sanitarium, a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted, be established by the church at Independence, Missouri.” The Sanitarium was to be established where patients could be removed from the influences and environments unfavorable to the exercise of proper faith to the healing of the sick. Today, the prayer of faith (as used in our Scriptures) is heard in the Sanitarium. Many times that prayer of faith has saved the sick, after the scientific skill and physical resources of men have been used to the utmost. We believe in using all these skills and the wisdom of the many technicians, etc., especially when these people recognize they are stewards over one of God's many gifts of healing.

Christ established a ministry of healing in his church. He, himself, was a healer of great skill and insight. It is well that healing and religion should work hand in hand.

Ministering to the sick is part of our total ministry and offers excellent opportunities for sharing the resources of our Christian faith. It is also a discouraging ministry at times. Most sick people want health, not religion—unless they think that religion can restore their health. Most hospital patients are more interested in going home than in being comforted. They want miracles, not prayers for miracles. They prefer the physician to the pastor.

All of us are in agreement that religion has the task of giving meaning to life. I believe we are in agreement, too, with the statement of Doctor Russell L. Dicks:

God wills health for us because of the tremendous resources in nature that work toward health. These powers function often without our knowledge. Some call this nature at work; others call it God working through nature.

Religion can and does help the sick person progress toward health. Our ministry can and sometimes does seem to release or precipitate the healing power of God.

There are times, however, when religion does not affect the progress of disease, but enables the sick person to adjust to his illness and possibly prepare for his death—if the illness is of terminal nature.

Illness (particularly if it involves hospitalization) is accompanied by unusual and sometimes strange experiences such as simply having one's meals in bed, using special sanitary facilities, enduring physical and medical treatments; wearing different garments, exposing the body for examination, and other things that the patient may regard as “indignities.”

The sickroom or the hospital ward is a rich source of opportunity and religious experience. We, as ministers with Christ and ministering to the ill, have an opportunity to devote self to the growth and development of a soul, where fear, sorrow, pain, and disappointment enter into an individual's life. We have the privilege of bringing the patient into an association with the Great Physician, which means that we must constantly be in touch with Him.

LET US NOT GROW CARELESS

With all of these opportunities, we ministers are occasionally guilty of carelessness. At times we go contrary to counsel from God. The placing of hands upon one's head, or daining him to the Melchisedec priesthood does not guarantee the knowledge, skill, insight, and understanding necessary for ministry to the sick. Ministry to the sick calls for a special type of evangelism and soul care. This next statement may appear very harsh, but it is a truism: There are some workers and ministers (at the present time) who are not qualified by personality, training, and experience to minister constructively to the ill and should be denied access to the sickroom.

The sickroom is a special situation—whether that room is in a hospital, in the home, or a wheel chair in the backyard. Conditions of the sickroom need to be studied and understood if we do not want to cause harm; and especially do we need to understand if we are to be of help to the patient.

Always remember the sick person's horizon and his feelings are limited. He, the patient, is within the one room day after day, sees the same four walls, the same nurse or nurses to come to care for his physical needs.

Illness sets the sufferer's nerves on edge. He is more sensitive to noise, ideas, people, and their characteristics or manners than he is in health. We are not surprised to find a friend that ordinarily would be calm, friendly, well poised, etc., in sickness is irritable, complaining, and disagreeable.

The need for companionship is great. Many of the world's upheavals, both personal and social, have been caused, directly or indirectly, by boredom. The need for companionship, for stimulus, for entertainment, for occupation, is probably the greatest spiritual need of the convalescent—this is beyond his need of good medical nursing and dietary care.

NEEDS TO WHICH WE MUST GIVE ATTENTION

The needs of the sick to which a friend may give attention may be identified as fear, worry, restlessness, and annoyance.

The effectiveness of your call will depend first upon the needs of the one who is ill and second upon your poise. No amount of "visiting" will be helpful if the visitor is ill at ease, frightened, embarrassed, disgusted, or overly emotional.

Always remember—a medical institution is not a rescue mission. True, a passion for the souls of men should be the possession of all followers of Christ (Doctrine and Covenants 85, "Let him that has been warned, warn his neighbor"), but it must be pointed out that zeal divorced from common sense, knowledge, and the good spirit can do much harm in a sickroom. One good illustration of zeal divorced from common sense which did considerable harm took place in a men's ward at the hospital. In this room three men had been to surgery and one gentlemen still was to go. The minister made a pastoral call and in his zeal left a tract. The tract was entitled: "What if You Should Die at Midnight?" Need we say more regarding the concern, mentally and spiritually, that those men experienced?

Never in all our ministry should we attempt to force religion or administration on the patient. After all, he is entitled to privacy if he desires it. We must always keep Christ uppermost in our hearts. Can you imagine Jesus forcing himself upon a sick man or woman? Can we who minister in the name of Jesus Christ be any less courteous or thoughtful?

HELPFUL HINTS

Here are some helpful hints for ministers on conducting a successful visit:

Discipline your emotions. In ministering to a patient, you can change the whole spiritual and emotional tone of a sickroom. You must never show alarm, sorrow, or surprise; if you do, you upset the one who is ill. Always be sincere. When you visit the sick, have your mind and your emotions disciplined and do not be surprised at anything you see, smell, or hear. More harm can be done in an instant of surprise or awkward embarrassment than weeks of visiting can offset.

If you wish to be of help to any patient, you must gain his good will. Ill-will or dislike is often brought about because the visitor is too aggressive, asks too many questions, is too cheerful, too intimate, too personal, too restless, offers unsolicited advice, talks about other people who are sick or who have had the same affliction. He just talks too much.

The best way to gain good will is to listen. Don't be too surprised at what you might have to listen to, but listen. As you gain that good will and offer your sympathy, remember that sympathy can be given in a way that does harm.

Co-operate with the nurses and the doctors. If possible, discover from him or her as much as you can regarding the condition of the patient. Never argue with the nurse if she refuses to let you see someone—be courteous and check with the supervisor or physician, explaining your interest and reason for association with the patient. If, perchance, you are requested to leave the bedside of one ill, please comply immediately and graciously, knowing that the request by that doctor or nurse is made for some legitimate reason in the interest of the patient.

As a member of the priesthood, you must never take part in the treatment of a patient. If a suggestion is given you by the attending physician or nurse, follow through. It is not advisable to discuss the doctor or his treatment. Remember, he is the specialist in medicine; you, the minister, are a specialist in things of the spirit. It is well for us to imitate the reticence of the nurse if the patient asks regarding the nature of his illness.

Try to appreciate and understand the sick person. If you are to be successful and not blunder, the conditions of the sickroom must be understood. You can tell if you have gained the good will of the patient. He will have a pleased tone of voice, will smile sincerely, shake hands, talk readily about subjects you both select, confide in you, ask you to do a favor, and hate to see you go.

You can profit by watching a physician or surgeon at work. The doctor doesn't order an operation immediately. Tests, X rays, case histories and laboratory tests are made to find the real condition. Let us be more careful in the diagnosis and treatment of the soul. There is an art to visiting the sick. Being able to listen is more than half the art.

BEWARE OF LONG VISITS

Do not stay too long in your visit. There is no stated answer to how long one should visit in the sickroom, but it is better to stay too short a time than too long. Short, frequent visits are best. Our experience at the Sanitarium is that on Monday mornings we find our patients worn out physically and mentally from their many callers and lengthy visits on Sunday afternoon and evening.

If the patient is in bed, be careful about sitting down. I would say that nine times out of ten the visitor should not be seated. Your standing will relieve the patient of the fear of your remaining longer than he feels able to have you stay. It will also permit him to talk without effort or turning on his side. As you stand at the bedside, be sure you stand in a place where you can be seen easily without any eye strain or strain upon the neck of the patient . . . all of which means, do not stand so the patient must face the light to see you.

As you minister in the sickroom, it is not necessary that you move about on tiptoes, but move about quietly and gracefully. Be careful not to kick the bed when entering or leaving the room. When a patient is in traction, be very, very careful not to get involved in what appears to be "gadgets." A slight jar may cause much discomfort to him.

Do not shake hands with the patient unless he offers. That minor movement or shaking might be painful to him.

Remember that sick people talk about themselves and those around them. They are in a new world. If carefully and wisely used, humor has a great place in the sickroom in assisting to keep up the general morale.

Many times just your presence or a cheery greeting does more good than what are called the customary procedures with the sick. Misplaced sympathy may cause the patient to go to pieces or tend to undermine his self-respect. Go slowly and listen hard.

Do not give advice, even when it is sought, unless you are certain it is desired. Even then it is better to assist the family and patient in working out their own plans rather than offering your plans for them. As the minister, do not become involved with a patient unless you are willing to make considerable sacrifice to be of assistance.

Remember, the prime purpose of your visit is to make the patient feel that somebody cares and that the Great Physician has a personal interest also.

DO NOT ARGUE WITH THE PATIENT

Never argue. Arguing is probably society's most useless form of activity. The best way to convince a person he is right is to argue that he is wrong. Your ministry is one of peace and quiet, comfort of the soul. You can disagree with the patient, if necessary, in a gentle way, without argument.

Watch your scripture reading, if you use one. Do not choose lengthy and wearing passages of the Bible, Book of Mormon, or Doctrine and Covenants. Once in a while, a favorite chapter is requested which can be shared in a fine way. It is best for you to do the reading to the patient, not vice versa.

WATCH YOUR PRAYERS

Watch the length and content of your prayers. You should avoid offering prayer before you know what to pray for. Offer a prayer that is brief and to the point. In the sick-room, the long prayer is completely out of order. Each patient is concerned with the type of prayer you offer and many times will give the need of his life in his conversation with you as is illustrated in this experience: "Chaplain, I don't want you to pray for my leg. The doctors are takin' care of that—and doin' a good job, I guess. I'd like fer you to pray for that part of me they can't do nothin' about. I've been doin' a lot of thinkin' lately."

Always depend upon the Holy Spirit. Many times the minister is anxious and forgets, or in his haste fails to accept or recognize the still, small voice giving direction.

With the very ill, do not whisper to the nurse or others in the room, even though the patient is thought to be asleep or unconscious. That muffled conversation might put the patient's brain to working overtime, thinking of the drastic things that might be happening to him. There are several other little things of which we all are or have been guilty and should attempt to correct. We should not talk of depressing or alarming subjects, telling about those we know who had this operation and got well—or didn't get well.

Most important of all, if you do not have a sincere interest in the patient, stay home. Be friendly and sincere with those with whom you come in contact. The success of an ideal sickroom visit is the naturalness of the visitor, his ability to keep himself under control without being breathless, silly, gabby, funny, breezy, or disgustingly cheerful.

HOW TO LEAVE A SICKROOM

It is a very easy and simple thing to leave a sickroom, but most people find it difficult. If you are seated, arise from your chair and say, "I must go now," or "I will see you again soon." Go to the door, smile, and wave, then leave. There are some people who take at least ten minutes to leave the sickroom. Only four simple steps involved: Get up, say good-by, go to the door, and leave.

THE LAYING ON OF HANDS

In the laying on of hands for the sick, the blessing given will depend upon the faith of all participating—the officiating elders and the patient.

I certainly believe in the laying on of hands, and I know that the gift of healing continues today. Since my assignment as chaplain of our Sanitarium and Hospital, a number of incidents have come to my attention wherein the gift of healing took place. It is a genuine part of the gospel, but it must be exercised with wisdom. The laws of health, sanitation, diet, hygiene, etc., cannot be defiled with the expectancy that we shall be relieved of all penalty concerned with the breaking of such principles.

The statement of Brother Elbert A. Smith fits in well here:

Nor does belief in the gift of divine healing mean that we are not to give proper nursing and medication to the sick. The fact that Thomas B. Marsh was called by revelation to be a physician to the church in 1830, and later that position was held by Doctor Joseph Luff and by Doctor Teel, the further fact that the Lord commanded the building of a sanitarium—all this indicates that our belief in divine healing is not by us considered inconsistent with the practice simultaneously of proper nursing and medical treatment.

James lays down several definite steps connected with the approach of the member or nonmember and minister toward the ordinance, and emphasizes certain things to be observed to make effective its usage.

First: Responsibility for calling the ministry rests upon the one needing administration. It is a personal responsibility, and unless the patient himself requests it, it is doubtful if proper preparation has been made. Of course, this situation is altered and changed in the case of a child or an individual who is unconscious.

Second: James states, "let him call for the elders," implying that more than one elder should be called to administer to the sick. In the majority of experiences, this advice and instruction should be followed. The Lord has blessed one elder many times and will continue to bless him, when only one elder can be present; but it is wise to observe the rule given by God which is re-emphasized in Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12.

Third: The prayer offered should certainly be given "in faith believing." The essence of that faith is "Thy will be done." It is this prayer of faith with humility and sincerity that makes possible the restoration of the sick to health and redemption.

Fourth: Be sure to anoint with oil in the name of the Lord. In the Reorganized Church, we believe that the head should be anointed, even if it is another part of the body which is afflicted. Do not bathe the head in oil—one drop on the forehead will surely be sufficient. Remember, there are times when a patient will not have an opportunity for a shampoo for weeks, and a large amount of oil in the hair can be very disconcerting and messy.

As this rite is entered into, definite preparation must be made by the elders and the patient. The minister must remember that this rite of healing is a spiritual function. Try to create a spiritual atmosphere.

I feel that the prayer of anointing should be a brief supplication asking the presence of God and a direct charge to the individual being administered to. In the prayer of anointing, beware of taking the whole of the administration into your hands and leaving your brother at a loss with nothing else to pray for.

With the prayer of confirmation of the anointing, be careful of the length of your prayer. Know why and what you are praying for. Offer a brief prayer, and one to the point. Remember—in the sickroom, the lengthy prayer is completely out of order. Also in this prayer never prophesy over the sick. Once in a while, some men, unwisely and moved by their own sympathy, have yielded to the impulse to promise recovery—such a promise is not a part of the administration. At one time there was such a misuse of the gift of prophecy in this regard that the Lord gave us a warning which is certainly applicable today. Read section 125: 15 of the Doctrine and Covenants.

Occasionally ministers become careless with the actual process of the laying of hands on the head of the patient. There are many times when the patient is very upset by the slightest jar, and discomfort is caused. It would be well in such cases to just touch your fingers to the head of the individual. When the patient is lying down, be careful not to cover his eyes, nose, or face with your hands. This is a very little point to the one officiating, but to a sick person it may seem to be an insurmountable object.

Following the administration, when the patient has been assured that you will continue to pray for him, leave him to meditate on the experience. Then remember him in your prayers.

Hospitals, physicians, and pastors alike recognize the truth that "Man shall not live by bread alone," that there is something hidden in the human breast which responds to the complete ministry of healing. All who are affiliated with institutions of healing are grappling with the underlying issues of life. Physicians and pastors may differ in their respective approaches and, at times, appear to be at odds with one another. But there is a basis upon which both can meet and are meeting today. This basis is a sane, intelligent, scientific, and Christlike approach to the fundamental issues of life, be they physical or spiritual.

LET OUR MINISTRY BE ABOVE CRITICISM

Conditions in Germany

The following article was written at the request of Bishop G. L. DeLapp. The author says, "This is a rough report of the present situation in Germany. The shortness of time did not permit me to give many figures or to deal with all subjects. I have probably forgotten a number of points which might have been of interest, and I am unable to speak at all about Eastern Germany. I hope, however, that I have succeeded in supplying a general idea of happenings here. If questions arise out of these impressions, I will be glad to receive them." His address is Pfinzingstrasse 1, Nurnberg, Germany (American Zone).

TRYING TO GIVE a viewpoint on economic conditions in present-day Germany is a fairly intricate undertaking because of the manifold factors contributing to the situation. The darkness on the economic horizon received a few bright patches not so long ago, viz., the inclusion of western Germany into the ERP and the German money reform. These two measures are perhaps the most important economic events towards the beginning of recovery—a recovery long overdue.

After the collapse in 1945, industry and communications had come to a complete standstill, but soon the paralysis gave way to new hope and enthusiasm, however to lead from one disappointment to another. No German really quite understands any more if the delay of reconstruction is entirely due to defeat and its aftermath, or to a planned policy of economic procrastination or perhaps to unforeseen political developments.

The division of Germany in four zones is, of course, the main factor for serious economic setbacks. The Eastern Zone formerly provided a great share of agrarian produce. The German textile industry had its chief center in Saxony in the Eastern Zone. The same applies to many other trades, such as the optical industry. This made adjustments necessary, and now we have already the beginnings of industries here in the Western Zones which previously were exclusively at home in the Eastern Zone.

The population problem adds considerably to the existing difficulties. Millions of people of German origin were removed from their homesteads in Czechoslovakia, Poland. There are the countless refugees from the Eastern Zone itself. Over three million came from Czechoslovakia, and the total figure is probably about fifteen million who moved or were pressed into the already overpopulated Bizonia (American and British occupied territory). The French Zone so far refused to accept refugees in any great numbers.

The chances to ease the pressure by emigration are very slight. The only possibility to leave Germany at present is for miners and farm laborers to accept a service contract for France. The United States has announced a plan to allow 28,000 Germans to come to America annually, but it is not sure yet when the plan will take effect.

A FEW WORDS about housing are in order. Towns suffered most severely from aerial destruction, and there it is that the dwelling problem is felt very keenly. An example will suffice: Nürnberg, a city of 450,000 inhabitants in prewar days, lost forty-nine and one-half per cent of its dwelling space by total destruction. Only twenty per cent remained intact or suffered slight damage. In 1948, 330,000 people live in Nürnberg again. Where do they live, and how do they dwell?

In rural districts, dwelling conditions are not much better, even if there were no destruction, because these districts have had to absorb most of the influx of new citizens from the East.

The average number of persons to one room in Bizonia is two and one fourth. One cannot dwell long enough over this figure!

At no time was Germany in a position to feed her population from her own soil. Now when the overpopulated industrial western part is separated from the fertile eastern part, a good harvest is certainly a great blessing, but it will not change the situation entirely. The 1948 crop was a very good one, and already during the summer, the benefit of sufficient vegetables and fruit and potatoes was noticeable.

During the last three years since the termination of hostilities, the main problem for the German population has been food. Even the ordinary man in the street could figure out that Germany could not feed herself; for that reason, any news item and assurance by food authorities regarding forthcoming help was eagerly believed. Unfortunately, however, the discrepancies between promises and realization did not go unnoticed.

The generous help of individuals and organizations in America is gratefully admired and also beneficial in a material way. This assistance in times of great need will be remembered in gratitude by all concerned.

The official rations for November, which can only be supplemented by vegetables and potatoes, are as follows: bread and flour (together) twenty-three pounds; cereals (including coffee-ersatz) three and one-half pounds; fourteen ounces of meat; one pound six ounces of fat (butter, margarine, lard, etc.); two ounces of cheese, three pounds of sugar; nearly two pounds of fish.

This is the ration for one person for one month, representing 1,497 calories per day. This standard has now been maintained since spring of this year (which is an improvement as compared with previous periods, when at the same time no additional vegetables were available). An immediate further improvement does not appear likely.

THE GREAT PROBLEM for German industry and trade is to find its prewar level again despite handicaps. Such handicaps are war destruction and damage to manufacturing plants and buildings, dismantling of works, and the shortage of essential raw materials, because those materials—particularly coal and timber—were withdrawn from Germany.

When eventually it was realized that the Morgenthau plan would not work and that Germany could not be entirely excluded from industrial activity, improvements began to set in. It is estimated that production is now in the neighborhood of seventy per cent of 1936 peace-production. This sounds very encouraging and certainly is a wonderful step forward.

But other factors should be regarded as well, so as to show how inadequate this production is and how difficult it will be to reach a reasonable price balance with it. Peace production (i. e., normal commodities) during 1939 to 1946 was practically nil. There was increased wear and tear during the war. There is an enormously increased population, wanting the simplest household articles. Those unlucky ones who lost their homes and belongings either through bombs and fire or through revenge action, have to begin anew with everything. But the others who kept their belongings will have to replenish a lot.

Unless raw materials are made available in greater quantities in order to step up production to full capacity, demand will for a long time be higher than supply, entailing an unfortunate reaction on the price level.

News has appeared about goods bought for Germany or raw materials on the way to Germany. Yet, intended imports were curtailed before they became effective; the ERP figures are said to be reduced, and German industry and trade are still waiting to replenish raw materials so as not to interrupt the manufacturing process.

As a matter of fact, many industries are already slowing down production, fearing they soon will be without raw materials altogether. Goods are becoming scarce again just as before the currency reform; prices are soaring, and confidence in the new German mark is already in danger of being shaken. However, the authorities have definitely declared that there will be no increase in money circulation, and if what one of the leading Americans in Germany said comes true—that at the beginning of 1949 there would be more raw materials in Germany than there would be coal to handle them—then all these misgivings can be discounted.

THE MONEY REFORM has underlined the division of Germany into two parts. On June 21, 1948, the Deutsche mark replaced the Reichsmark in the Western Zones. The Russian Zone had its currency reform about a week later.

Prior to the money reform, the Reichsmark had actually long lost its value, yet owing to price stop and wage stop, officially it was still the basic currency. A worker would receive his 50. Reichsmark weekly wages to pay rent, fares, and food at officially fixed prices. Anything beyond that was just unobtainable, unless on a barter basis or via the black market. The less scruples a man had, the better he fared materially; therefore, any decent, thinking, honest person could only have one wish—to end this state of affairs, even at the expense of losing hard-earned savings.

The twenty-first of June, 1948, created a certain lack of funds and demand for money. All kinds of goods—household articles, electrical goods, pharmaceuticals, etc.—which formerly had been almost unobtainable, appeared on the market. Textiles, shoes, and substantial foods (meat, butter, fats, bread, flour, sugar, cereals) remained rationed as before, but there was a good supply of potatoes, vegetables, and fruit.

At the same time, authorities introduced a greater measure of freedom of trade, doing away with ceiling prices in all decontrolled goods.

Unrationed goods, however, went up in price immediately and, in many cases, beyond the reach of the working man.

Shopkeepers, possessors of goods, seem to be in the old powerful position, because there cannot be a saturation of the market yet. The trade unions are advocating the reintroduction of a price stop, whereas the authorities want to give prices free play to find their own level.

If the present development continues, then the "man in the street" has not gained anything by the money reform. However, there is reason to believe that the climax has been reached and things will develop more favorably for the purchaser.

Great efforts are being made by German authorities to obtain more freedom of action, especially in foreign trade matters. At present, the JEIA (Joint Export Import Agency US/UK) still decides over German exports and imports.

Export has been and will have to be Germany's mainstay in the future, even more so than before, if the country is ever to become self-supporting again. Export is a highly individualistic affair and cannot be governed from an administrative body, however well-meaning that body may be.

Another factor of considerable importance would be the introducing of foreign private capital in German enterprises. At present, this is still unworkable, owing to US government objections. Many German undertakings, stripped of their reserves by the money reform, would willingly accept new funds and a mutually satisfactory agreement could ensue.

REGARDING AMERICAN OCCUPATION FORCES, I think it is unanimously agreed in Germany that they are the most unobtrusive and considerate in everyday life. Any German would prefer to live in the American-British Zone if he had the choice.

Yet, mistakes have been made. In 1945, every German was ready to greet the Allied Forces, especially the Americans, all liberators from a regime which had become oppressive and overbearing. Now, after the enactment of nonfraternization, three years of privations—which no one can still believe to be the aftermath of the war—Germans regard American soldiers and officials more soberly. The mutual contact is always friendly, and there is no ill-feeling or hatred. I am of the opinion that the local American authorities in Germany are really trying to understand German needs, and if they could follow their own judgment, a lot of things might have improved more already.

The immediate future will probably bring (with the customary delays) the promised supply of raw materials and keep industry going. The money reform will gradually show its effect in money shortage and force prices to remain steady or even to come down somewhat. Once that anticipated stability has set in, economic life for the individual will make sense once more, because he can save for a certain thing—a piece of furniture or a suit of clothing—without fear of never being able to catch up with climbing prices. If there is no increase in money circulation, there may even be a mild deflationary result.

Export restrictions will disappear, in so far as a lot of red tape will be dropped, which up to now surrounded every single export order. I believe fifty different forms had to be filled in for every contract.

Most Germans readily understand that a military administration is not the equivalent of democratic government and make all allowances, yet hope that one day there will be a peace treaty and a fully responsible German government.

If the world is allowed to develop on peaceful terms, and the other nations are eventually prepared to accept Germany as a useful member, this country will again be a land where the work and industry of its people—despite all handicaps—will produce moderate prosperity.

The necessities of reconstruction, high taxes, and the cost of occupation administration will be factors which vouch against any living standard above that of a third-rate nation, at least for some time.

THE SOUL-SHAKING EXPERIENCES most Germans have had have made them look more after inner values. I am sure that a few years from now we shall have a great cultural revival here, a natural outlet of creative power. The cultural activity of the Catholic and Lutheran Churches is remarkable, and they are definitely powerful agents in public life now, perhaps more so than ever before. The churches were least affected by the national-socialist doctrine. In all other spheres of life, the national-socialist party had been able to gain influence to a much higher degree, and most men in responsible positions in administration and business had become party-tainted, either wholeheartedly or half-willingly. All Nazi-tainted persons were subjected to denazification trials and meanwhile removed from their jobs.

The churches, unimpaired in their status, retained their strength and their corps of spiritual leaders, and today Germany is more truly represented internationally by its churches than by any other institution, political or otherwise.

People in Germany are tired of politics, especially the extreme forms. They wish to be able to work and live peacefully and plan their lives. If basic conditions are only slowly improving, there will be no fear of radicalism. I strongly believe that life in Germany will turn away from external things not only out of dire necessity but as an expression of having found true values. When this expression takes shape and form, it will most likely be of such ethical worth as to be regarded as atonement.

Church life has generally become more intense, and the need for tranquility in the souls of those millions who have had to pay the price of war is apparent everywhere. They are looking for a silver lining on the horizon and for the right to hope again. They all want peace—peace as only strong faith in the redeeming figure of Jesus Christ can give.

tions. The challenge to “come out of her” is, I believe, chiefly a challenge to His church. Here we have a responsibility to show the world the way of Christ and the manner of his kingdom.

Many are following after the evil concepts of Gog because they have not seen a demonstration of the principles of the gospel as enunciated by the Angel’s Message of these last days. The kingdom of Christ must be set over against the kingdom of Satan with such clarity that the eyes of the honest in heart will not be blinded to its splendid vision, but can readily differentiate between the glorious beams of beneficent revelation and the lurid glow of Satan’s deception.

There are some who think that our vivid interpretation as set forth in these articles cannot be right because it is asserted in the Book of Revelation 20: 8 that Gog will come after the millennium and the “Little Season.” This problem we wish to discuss in a future issue under the heading “Gog’s Swan Song.”

PART II

AT this time, Elder George S. Greenwood was president of Stafford Branch, Elder C. H. Caton was district president, and Elder Thomas Taylor was the president of the English mission. Brother Taylor at times paid us visits at Stafford Branch, and his wonderful testimony confirmed us to the truth of the work in the most striking manner. I also remember Brother Seville who preached for us.

I was always ready to tell the gospel story, and each day I would be found telling the message to my fellow worker, Jim Richards, who was a member of the Primitive Methodist Church. He at first did not care to discuss the different thought in religion, but I continued to tell him about the gospel I had received and finally handed to him a copy of the Voice of Warning to read. The next morning, after he had read the book, Jim seemed changed both in manner and countenance. After entering the door, he took one flying leap over the anvil, which stood in the middle of the shop. I said, "Jim, you seem quite happy this morning." He replied, "Yes, I indeed should be happy, for I have seen that light you have seen." I asked him how he saw it. Then he related to me a vision he had seen. He said he seemed to be walking down the street with his companion Dick Lloyd, when they came to a second-hand bookstore. They started to look at some books which were on sale outside the store. He noticed a Book of Mormon, but his friend Dick thought he should put it down. Being curious, Jim decided to open the book to find out what it contained, but to his surprise, he could not read a word of it and wondered why. While he continued to turn over the pages, however, he said, "All of a sudden, that light you told me about, went up and set itself in the air. I opened the book again and could read every word of it and I was made glad and my soul rejoiced. Don't you think I should be glad at heart?" he asked.

We both wept together, and joy came into our souls as God had indeed seen fit to bless both of us with this superior light of his great truth.

I said, "Jim, you have in the past listened too much to your friend, Dick Lloyd, who persuaded you not to listen to me, and consequently your eyes have been blinded to the truth. But you know now that what I have told was truth, so you must come to our meetings and hear more." He said he would be at the meeting with me the next Sunday morning; and true to his word, he was there.

HIS FIRST CONVERT

This was a prayer meeting, and I shall never forget the prayer offered by Jim, part of which was as follows: "Oh, Lord, like thy servant, Paul, I have been kicking against the pricks, but now I turn to thee for forgiveness for my wrongdoings. Help me to serve thee. I am ready, dear Lord, to make my covenant with thee in the waters of baptism, to serve thee through good and evil report to the end." He soon afterwards was baptized, thus becoming my first convert, and a little later was ordained to the office of teacher. He later secured a better place of employment where his salary was almost doubled, and most Saturday evenings one would see Jim with a basket of groceries on his arm, visiting the poor Saints. Neither Jim nor I was yet married, and we were very dear companions, being always together in our spare time. Most of our evenings were spent with the Saints in their homes, singing, talking, and rejoicing together for things pertaining to eternal salvation. We loved to be with our older brethren and hear them tell of their experiences in the church.

TWO CASES OF HEALING

When we visited the home of Brother George S. Greenwood of Stafford, he related a wonderful case of healing. He told of how Brother Haywood was terribly crippled from arthritis and of how his feet were drawn up to the waist. The heels of his boots were cut away, and in some manner his feet were strapped to the back of his knees. But by the use of a pad in each hand and a cap on each knee, he was able to crawl around from place to place. But Brother Haywood was a man of great faith in God's power. Then Brother Greenwood told us of how one night there came a knock at his door, and on opening it there stood before him a tall gentleman, standing quite upright like any other man. On inquiring his business, the man asked, "Don't you know me, Brother Greenwood?" and he replied, "No." Whereupon the man continued, "I am Brother Haywood from Handley." He walked into the house upright and strong, and declared God had healed him. This caused both Brother Greenwood and Brother Haywood to rejoice together and praise God. Brother Haywood preached that night. This testimony was confirmed to me some years afterwards by his son, whom I met at Leeds. I also handled the knee caps and boots which had been worn by Brother Haywood when he was crippled.

There was another remarkable healing at Burton-on-Trent of a Sister Hickling, who was suffering with cancer. Her brother, George Potts, who was the president of that branch, together with other elders, administered to her, and she was completely healed. No trace of cancer was left, much to the surprise of the doctor. This case was reported and printed in the local newspaper at Burton-on-Trent, the doctor confirming the fact that Sister Hickling did have cancer. If Brother George Potts, who later went to Brooklyn, New York, were living, he could give further particulars of the case as it happened.

We were all indeed a happy, united band of Saints at Stafford; love reigned in every heart; we all worked together, and our aim was to spread the truth which had become dear to our souls.

Up to this time, Stafford branch did not have a meeting place, so we made up our minds to secure one. After one was obtained, Jim and I were soon making the seats and building the pulpit for the preaching of the word, and everyone was busy decorating the room. We felt the Lord had directed us in reviving the work in the town of Stafford. Previously, we had been holding our meetings in the homes of the Saints.

THOMAS TAYLOR

On one occasion, Elder George S. Greenwood was invited to Birmingham to preach and asked me to accompany him. We arrived there on a Saturday evening and stayed at the home of Elder Thomas Taylor. Hearing his experiences would take away any doubts of this work's being true. He had been to Utah, thinking the Mormon church was true, but was deceived, and left by night with team and wagon. With the Danites close after him, he traveled about two thousand miles across the prairie, finally reaching St. Louis; in this way, he escaped from the Mormons. He stayed in St. Louis for a few years, where he worked at a gas meter company, after which he returned to England. Although the first elders of the Reorganization had visited him many times in an endeavor to reclaim him to the church, he said he had fully made up his mind to have no more to do with Mormonism after his experience at Salt Lake City. He said he was willing to give them food or money or anything else they needed to help them, but they must never expect him to join with the Reorganization. However, the elders continued to visit him, and he treated them kindly, but still refused to have anything to do with Mormonism. One night after being visited by the elders, he had a vision. He said the Savior came to him and told him to receive those men, as they were His servants, and to join with them. So he received them and their message. These elders were J. W. Briggs and Charles Derry.

Thomas Taylor also related many other of his experiences as one of the pioneers of the church in England. For me to hear these was a wonderful experience in itself.

One Sunday I met with the Saints in Temple Row for the first time, and the prayer and testimony meeting in the afternoon did much to confirm me in the work. I shall never forget this meeting; the Spirit of God seemed to fill the room. The very place appeared to be wrapped in divine sweetness—even the doors were clothed with quietness. The floors were covered with soft carpets; no latecomers were heard, and such a stillness in the meeting seemed to invite the Holy Spirit. Brother Kirtland gave the first testimony; then Brother Seville with his Welsh accent melted the meeting in tears of joy and blessedness. Brother and Sister Taylor related some of their wonderful experiences in the church, and others followed in turn. For the first time in my life, I heard the gift of tongues through Sister Caton, also interpretations, prophecies, and exhortations. These caused me to say, "Surely God is with this people and is mindful of them as in the days of old."

PREACHING THE GOSPEL

I had been in the church about a year, when the mission conference was held at Stafford. I invited my father to come out to hear our elders preach. He did, and, after hearing the gospel, decided to be baptized. This gave me great joy, as my parents had been much troubled about my joining the church.

In July, 1885, at the age of twenty-one, I finished my apprenticeship and left Stafford, where I had had so many happy experiences, and went to the county seat of Norfolk, Norwich, to work. In this city of about thirty thousand people was a cathedral, a large market place, and a castle. I believed I had a message to give the people and felt the weight of that responsibility resting upon me, so I began to tell those I met of the gospel. Then the Spirit of the Lord moved upon me, and I preached every Sunday evening in the market place to crowds of people. At the other side of the market, a minister had held meetings for years, so I stood as far away as possible from his company of listeners and began to read the Scriptures in rather a loud tone. This attracted many of his listeners who came to hear what I had to say, and with much earnestness, I held the people for more than an hour, for the Lord blessed me with a goodly flow of language. For four Sunday evenings I was found in the same place, preaching the gospel; and the cries of the people sound in my ears today: "God bless you, young man, you are on the right way. May God be with you." I stayed in Norwich for only one month; but in that time, I preached four Sundays, and I might add the meeting of the other minister was discontinued on the third Sunday night I preached.

IN NORWICH

As one of the pioneers of the church in England, I always felt I had something of infinite worth by coming into it—so much so that it changed my whole life, and I seemed to live in the consciousness of the abiding presence of God. Though many of us had no great learning, we seemed to be afire with the message of the gospel, and we told that message in a way which converted others. The ministers of today need to cultivate personal piety and God-consciousness if they would touch souls with their message.

When in Norwich, I stayed at the home of a Mr. Pendle at a cafe known as the "Golden Ball," which was not far from the castle and right across the street from Colman's mustard factory. This Mr. Pendle treated me as one of his own, and after he and his wife and another young man had heard me preach, he became very much interested. I believe that if I had stayed longer in that city, many would have been baptized. But being a deacon, I had thoughts come into my mind like this, "Young man, what would you say if someone asked for baptism? You know you cannot baptize." This gave me some concern, so I decided to leave town for home. I had been working for a man named Mr. Brown; both he and his wife had heard me preach, and he begged me to stay with him. Finally he offered to give me his business if I would stay, as both he and his wife were over seventy years of age. But that did not appeal to me, so after four weeks in the city of Norwich,

I packed my trunk and went home. On the way, I stopped off at Leicester, where I secured a place to work, agreeing to start in a week's time. Then I continued to my home in Stafford.

CONFERENCE AT BIRMINGHAM

Soon afterward I went to Birmingham, where the mission conference was being held. This was in the early part of August, 1885. Here I again met our esteemed Brother Taylor, who was then president of the British Isles Mission. I told him of my experience in the town of Norwich, and I shall never forget his words to me. He said, "Young man, why did you not send me a letter? I would have been with you the next day, and anyone who asked for baptism, you would have had the authority to baptize." Before the conference closed, I was ordained on August 5, 1885, to the office of priest. I am sorry to say that I have not visited Norwich since, though many times I have had a desire to do so, as I still believe a good work could be done there.

The next week after the conference, I went to Leicester to work at my trade as a knifemith, but I did not know a soul in this city. The Saints' Herald came to me each week and kept me informed about the church and the gospel, and I was always ready to tell others of the angel message. I was again moved upon to preach, and each Sunday evening I would preach in the market place or the broad streets, crying repentance and telling the gospel of the Blessed Son of God. Often I would begin with the poem:

The love of Christ doth me constrain,
To seek the wandering souls of men,
With cries, entreating tears to save,
And snatch them from the gaping grave.

This poem seemed to give me inspiration, and soon a crowd would gather, and God indeed blessed me in the delivery of his word.

Perhaps the most valuable result of all education is the ability to make yourself do the thing you have to do, when it ought to be done, whether you like it or not; it is the first lesson that ought to be learned; and however early a man's training begins, it is probably the last lesson that he learns thoroughly.—Thomas Henry Huxley, quoted in Good Housekeeping.

The Game of Hearts

FIRST OF ALL, let's not get confused. This is not a matrimonial column with a ways and means committee to help someone find a mate. Rather this article is addressed to that vast number of people, whose ratio is daily increasing, who have heart disease or heart trouble in one form or another. And if you have only recently become a member of this world society whose headquarters seem to be the U. S. A., this is especially for you. I, myself, am a full-fledged member.

Somehow it helps to know that you're not alone in this thing—that there are not just two hearts that beat as one but literally thousands.

Heart trouble is Public Health Enemy Number 1, heading the list of fatalities in the entire North American Continent. However, it is common knowledge that for the comparative few who are stricken fatally with the first attack, there are thousands who survive the original onslaught along with repeated attacks. One of the things medical authorities are concerned about is why heart trouble in the past forty years has jumped from fourth to first place in fatalities. It has been suggested by some eminent physicians that our eating habits have played a prominent part in this change. As a nation, we have changed to refined foods of all kinds. We insist that bread, the staff of life and our main food, be as white as snow, forgetting that only a small part of the life-giving quality is found in the white flour after the present-day refining process is completed. Thus we rob ourselves and our children of a vital source of energy when we serve only white bread.

By LEONA N. HANDS

Prepared cereals (timesavers) have almost entirely replaced the more nourishing cooked cereals of twenty years ago. One of our local physicians made the remark that in his opinion the only benefit derived from eating prepared cereal was from the milk or cream served with it.

A questionnaire that one of the children brought home from school was sent out to determine how many school children were eating breakfast. To me this was an odd question until I read further that many children were evidently sent to school without their morning meal. The teachers were concerned because they had discovered that the pupils who were eating breakfast were doing better work in the classroom.

The next eye opener came from the office where a member of the family was employed. Almost the same type of questionnaire was given to the office workers. "Do you have eleven o'clock fatigue?" it read. "Eat breakfast!" Then followed a suggested breakfast menu starting with fruit juice and including a cooked cereal.

AS HOMEMAKERS, we have a big part to play in the health program of our families and nation. Some of us during the war reasoned that it was easier to serve the quicker prepared cereals and foods, perhaps thinking somewhat like the old lady who said, "What don't fatten will fill." Then to even things up, we bought our families their vitamins at the drugstore, forgetting we were establishing new eating habits for our children which would be hard to break away from—forgetting too, that as mother leads the way and sets the pattern, so daughter follows when she has a family of her own.

If you have heart trouble, it definitely matters what you eat, for most cases of heart trouble are accompanied by a degree of stomach trouble. A plain, nourishing diet will pay dividends in better general health. It doesn't take long to recognize the foods that cause gas or distress, which in turn often discomfort the heart. Rich foods, gravies, pastry, cake, and especially highly seasoned foods fall in this category. Here's where you bid a last good-bye to the pickle family. From now on you only have a nodding acquaintance with them and their close relatives—mustard, catsup, etc.

Here is an amusing incident which wasn't at all amusing at the time it occurred. I suffered a heart attack at two a. m. last New Year's morning. It was severe enough that my family not only called the elders but also thought it wise to have a physician. Our own family doctor was vacationing on the West Coast. My husband tried repeatedly to get someone to come, and finally succeeded in getting a new doctor who was just establishing a practice in our city. He blustered in (he was a very big man with a large, red face and high cheek bones), listened to my heart and snapped at me, "Now if I had that heart, I wouldn't drink, and I wouldn't smoke." He bit off the words and put special emphasis on the smoke and drink. "Why," he continued, "I wouldn't even drink tea and coffee." Which proves the Word of Wisdom sometimes keeps strange company. He then proceeded to give me a hypo and stalked out of the room. It wasn't until the next day after I had had some rest and was breathing easier that the full impact of his words struck me. No doubt he thought I was a New Year's eve celebrant. Inasmuch as I have never indulged in either, the family thought it was a good joke, and if anyone happens to think I look a little pale, he invariably quips,

- - - a home column feature - - -

"If you'd only stop drinking and smoking, you'd be perfectly all right."

HEART TROUBLE seldom strikes as a thief in the night. Usually the warning signs are given over a long period of time. General fatigue, shortness of breath, and suffocation are "slow down" signs; when they appear on your highway of life, take heed. Do not wait until you are seriously ill before you consult a physician. Doctors advise people over forty to have a yearly checkup. Personally, I'd say thirty-five is not too young for an annual physical examination. That's when heart trouble came my way, and I have met others who have encountered it in their thirties. An ounce of prevention is worth, many times over, a pound of cure.

Heart trouble isn't something you catch either. It is something that the Marthas (the housekeeping mothers) with their time budgets, ironclad schedules, their passion for order and spic and span houses, leave themselves wide open for. Few of the Marys with their gentle, unhurried ways and mild manners get heart trouble. However, it's surprising how many of the Marthas are really Marys at heart. Secretly, they mourn over the good books they never have time to read, the studying (and meditation) they would do if only time would permit.

Heart trouble changes all that. It brings a period of readjustment, a right about face to a new set of values, a recognition of restrictions, and ceilings on physical labors. Does this mean the end of everything? No, but the change does not come overnight; it is a slow process. I like the words of my grandmother, "No door ever closes but another opens!" How very true this is. Allied with this thought are the words of Jesus, "Behold, I have set before you an open door," an open door to other fields of endeavor, new thoughts and ideas, new labors.

KEEP AN OPEN MIND and look for the compensations that come to you, for indeed they do come with every sorrow and tragedy. Count your blessings. They are innumerable. Watch for the "extras" that God strews on your pathway. You can find them daily if you look for them. There are many, many things harder to bear than heart trouble.

Look about you and see the crosses that some of your brothers and sisters have borne so bravely. Now you are coming a little closer to the understanding you have prayed for. You are more concerned about spiritual things. The Scriptures are full of new meaning. "Listen and behold!" "Be still and know that I am God." "Run not before him!" "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength!" The gems of the Bible unfold in all their beauty a source of strength and comfort daily. Take heart and meet the challenge of a handicap!

You have entered the "game of hearts" for the remainder of your physical life. Follow the rules closely, play the game fairly, and cultivate a healthy, wholesome, attitude toward your daily life. Contrary to other games, the last ones to finish win. Be a winner.

Periodic Health Examinations

From the Information Department of the Missouri State Medical Association, 623 Missouri Building, St. Louis 3, Missouri.

An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Some diseases strike suddenly, and within a few hours there is a quick transition from health to illness. Most of these are the contagious diseases such as measles, scarlet fever, pneumonia, etc. Prevention must depend on measures to isolate the sick person and hinder the passage of the cause from one individual to another.

Other diseases are insidious in onset. For weeks, months, or years the person does not feel quite up to par, but there is nothing he can put his finger on. Or perhaps the sense of well-being is not altered during the early stages. How are we to prevent this group which comprises some of the most important of the diseases of advancing years—diabetes, cancer, and high blood pressure? Many believe that the periodic health examination is the answer. Perhaps the beginnings of the disease can be discovered by the physician and steps taken to cure it or prevent further progress.

A report by Catherine MacFarlane, Margaret C. Sturgis, and Faith S. Fetterman in the Journal of the American Medical Association shows what can be done to prevent cancer in women by discovery of the process early. Nine hundred and sixty-one women from 30 to 80 years of age made many visits to the clinic for periodic examination during five years. A total of 9,111 examinations were made. Eleven cancers were discovered as the result of these examinations, and another seven patients reported lumps which were proved to be cancer. All were promptly treated, and the disease was cured.

All cancers must first be one-sixteenth inch in diameter before they are large masses which can be felt as lumps. During the early stages, the cancer does not spread widely and can be cured by one of several forms of treatment.

Why not give your doctor an opportunity to help protect and conserve your health? A regular examination and consultation every six months may reveal the warning signal of a coming disaster.

Everyone heeds the advance reports of the weather bureau and plans his life and activities accordingly. Storm signals at Cape Hatteras have saved many lives and ships. What is good in the world of affairs is equally beneficial in the orbit of the most precious of all things—human life.

BOOKS

Human Destiny, by Lecomte du Noüy. Longmans, Green and Co., New York, New York, 1947, 289 pages. $3.50.

REVIEWED BY DR. L. J. MARSHALL

This book has been attracting the attention of many readers in this and other countries since its publication in 1947. The author was a distinguished French scientist who had spent many years in the United States. He held degrees from a number of our leading educational institutions and was the author of many books. Human Destiny is a thorough discussion of history, science, and philosophy, and is very interesting and stimulating to a thoughtful reader who is really concerned about the destiny of the human race.

The early chapters of the book are scientific, and rather technical and obtuse for the average reader; but the latter two thirds are clear and understandable. In this portion of the book, the author gives much time and space to the discussion of man's moral and spiritual development and the effect that development will have on the final destiny of the human race. He gives special attention to the part education will play in the character of our future civilization and stresses the importance of beginning education in the young and tender years of the child's life, while the faculty of memory is at its most sensitive and enduring stage. He states that the first ten years of our lives are the most decisive in determining our future direction; therefore, they should be filled with the most constructive material. He, of course, believes in the modern doctrine of evolution and contends that man is sprung from a different embryo than that from which the material world and lower animal kingdom has come. He gives a fascinating description of man's search for, and changing conceptions of God. He thinks in terms of millions of years in his discussion of time. He refers to Jesus as the only perfect man evolved so far, but believes men will continue to improve in character. The happiness of the race depends on the religious unity of thought and action, and men will believe in peace when the church demonstrates that it can exist. The author believes in an improved human race and an increasingly desirable human destiny. You will enjoy the book, even if you do not understand it all and disagree with some of it.

A Greater Generation. Ernest M. Ligon. 157 pp. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1948. $2.50.

Why do you send your child to church school? You expect him to learn some of the Bible and Book of Mormon stories, the history of the church, the doctrines of the church. All these are supposed, directly or indirectly, to mold the child's character toward the Christian ideal, but often the treatment is too indirect to have much value.

Character is the chief concern of this third book of Dr. Ligon, who has been for several years the director of the Union College Character Research Project at Schenectady, New York. A number of churches, Y.M.C.A.'s, and private schools all over the country are now co-operating in the project, and no church which has entered the program has later abandoned it. The project is based on two hypotheses: first, that the Christian philosophy of life as summed up in the Beatitudes is the one on which the noblest possible character can be built; and second, that the discovery and application of the laws governing character can be accomplished by use of the scientific method. Thus a greater generation may be reared. The best methods yet devised by education and psychology are put in practice by Dr. Ligon, but he continually revises them in the light of the results obtained. He does not expect every teacher to have a college degree in psychology; lesson plans are made up with sufficient helps that the teacher can handle the current assignment.

One of the emphases is fitting each lesson to the individual children in the class. Another is the laws of learning: exposure in the most attractive manner, repetition both in the home during the week and down through advancing age levels as understanding grows, understanding as evidenced by the child's words and actions, conviction on the part of the child of the value of the lesson, and application in daily life situations.

The Character Research Project depends for its success on an unusual amount of effort from both teachers and parents. At the beginning and end of each term of study, the child is given a series of psychological tests. The teacher has an interview with the parents to discuss the results of the tests. There is a weekly class for the parents. Both teachers and parents make reports which are used in revising methods and materials. Children are excused from attendance only for reasons which would be valid in public schools. In spite of these demands, participating church schools have found an increasing number of parents who wish to enroll their children.

Wartime Heralds for Holland

During the war, very few, and for a long while none, of the copies of the Herald reached our church members in Holland. This leaves a gap in their files that some of them would like to fill. With an order for books sent to Bishop Harold Cackler, one of our local church officers there has requested that Saints in the U. S. send him copies (postage should be prepaid) of the Herald published during the war. Send to: Anton Compier, Rozemarijn Straat 44, Rotterdam, Holland.

MOBILE, ALABAMA.—The Annual Gulf States District Priesthood Institute was held in Mobile, Alabama, on December 10, 11, 12. Sixty-seven priesthood members were present from the three-state area of Mississippi, Alabama and western Florida. The theme was "The Priesthood Examines Its Task," and emphasis was placed on "The Priesthood face the task together," "We analyze our task," "We seek effective methods of improvement," and "We determine to follow the greater vision."

An open forum was conducted to open the Institute on Friday evening; the discussion topic used was, "Improving the administration of the ordinances and sacraments." Classwork began on Saturday morning with the following: "Increasing our effectiveness through proper decorum," A. Orlin Crownover; "The need for improved statistical records," W. J. Breshears; "Missionary opportunities for the standing ministry," Franklin Steiner; "The evangelist shares through counseling," Evangelist A. D. McCall; and "Facing the task to the point of action," W. J. Breshears. Classes were also presented for pastors, Melchizedec priesthood, and Aaronic priesthood members.

On Saturday evening, eighty-six priesthood members and their wives attended the annual priesthood banquet, which was served by the Mobile women's department.

On Sunday, two fellowship services were conducted, and Evangelist A. D. McCall delivered an inspiring sermon. The institute closed at noon.

TAMPA, FLORIDA.—Apostle W. W. Smith, District President W. J. Breshears, and Patriarch Edward Carter were present for the December Communion service. Apostle Smith spoke, and Elder Breshears gave an illustrated lecture. Patriarch Carter will conduct missionary meetings in all the Florida branches during the winter.

DUNN CENTER, NORTH DAKOTA.—Seventy E. Y. Hunker visited Dunn Center over the Thanksgiving holiday; special services were held on both Wednesday and Thursday nights. Elder Ferd Hammel of Salem, Oregon, spoke several times in September and October, and District President V. W. Ditton of Fairview, Montana, has given illustrated lectures. The women's department sponsored the redecoration of the church interior recently.

The Importance of Friendliness

I read with interest the recent editorial on friendliness, and I should like to relate an experience I had a short time ago.

I am a student at Brigham Young University, and while on a field trip with five members of the Utah church, the conversation got around to religion. After a few comments, one fellow said, "I have never been treated so friendly as I was in Nauvoo when returning from my mission." He went on to mention a Mr. Smith and commented further on the friendliness of our people at Nauvoo.

I have accepted this as a challenge, and I am passing it on in hopes it will help our people to strive for a higher plane of friendliness.

Letter of Testimony

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church for ten years, during which time I have had many spiritual experiences. Sometimes I have felt that my sins were unpardonable, but the Spirit of God has helped me to a brighter life. I feel that I should mention the importance of patriarchal blessings. It is not enough just to receive one; it must be used as a guide in life. Other blessings will follow if we heed the suggestions given.

I have found several helpful policies which I wish to pass on to Herald readers. Always sing a hymn from beginning to end—not just snatches of it. When discussing religion, be specific—don't talk generalities. Obey the rules of good health if you expect the Spirit of God to be with you.

I trust we shall go forward in this beautiful work, supporting the church loyally throughout our lives.

Correction

In the letter, "Texas Reunion," appearing on page 18 of the December 11 Herald, the next to last paragraph should read: "Communion service was one of the high points of the reunion. A young elder, Joseph Berry, planned and directed this service." The original read: "A young deacon, Joseph Berry, planned and directed this service."

NELSONVILLE, OHIO.—The women's department held its annual Christmas party on December 14. Following a chicken dinner, a short program was presented and gifts were exchanged. The women of The Plains Branch helped to provide the meal. Mr. and Mrs. Don Hanna gave a large picture of Sallman's "Head of Christ" to both congregations. Approximately seventy-five persons attended, including several from Columbus.

BALD KNOB, ARKANSAS. — The Zion's League presented a program for the church school on Christmas Eve using the theme, "Love Came Down at Christmas." Mrs. Dale Edwards was in charge. The League has adopted a family in Germany to which it sends a box each month. Boxes are also mailed monthly to members of the League attending Graceland. Money for these boxes is raised by serving Rotary dinners.

TEXARKANA, ARKANSAS. — A dedication service was held on Sunday, November 21, for the new church home recently completed. The building was made available through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Sybil Smith. It was completely remodeled and painted by members of the congregation, so that nothing was expended for labor. Benches were designed by Charles Hill and constructed by the men; Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Jackson have loaned their piano for use in the church.

The building will seat over eighty persons. Already nonmember interest is increasing, and it is hoped the group may soon be established as a branch.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—All Zion's Leaguers in Independence and visiting Gracelanders joined for a three-day Yuletide Conference held December 27, 28, 29. It was the first such event in nine years, welcoming back an honorable custom of providing the young people of the Center Place with some of the finest instruction available over the Christmas holidays. The theme of the conference was "Prepare Ye," and the emphasis was missionary. There were lectures, forums, discussions, a fellowship, and a pageant. Among the leaders who instructed were Apostles Reed Holmes, Maurice Draper, and Charles Hield, President F. Henry Edwards, Bishop G. L. DeLapp, L. F. P. Curry, and Vern Brown. The city-wide Zion's League cabinet planned the event under the leadership of Carl Mesle, Director of Youth Work in Zion.

God's Way

By BETTY SANFORD TRIPP

IN THE STILLNESS OF THE ROOM, no one spoke. For a moment Ellen stared frantically about her as if looking for some means of escape from this ominous silence. Her brother Jeff cleared his throat noisily, and all eyes in the room turned upon him. His voice, when he spoke, was shaky and squeaked a little so that it didn't sound like Jeff.

"Madge is right," he said, "Ellen ought to be punished this time, but I don't want any part of it."

It sounded melodramatic—like some of the stories she had read. The whole scene was unreal—a page out of a novel.

"What do you think we should do, Ellen?" Her father's voice was controlled.

Reality came rushing back to her. The frozen look disappeared from her face. Her eyes focused upon her father. Just how serious was it to them, this time, she wondered? Her father was sober, silent, unsmiling, waiting for her reply. She had never seen him this way before, and she knew he was very angry. She wondered if he'd forget for a moment maybe that he was a good Latter Day Saint and say what he was thinking.

Jeff's head was bent and his eyes were shielded when she moved her gaze to him.

Her sister, Madge, stared back defiantly, then blushed a little and lowered her eyes. She had been the one to tell on Ellen.

But when Ellen's eyes came to rest upon her mother, she felt the sickness in her stomach that she had come to associate with shame. She raised her hand as if to speak—to apologize to her mother, but let it fall back limply to her side.

"Ellen!" The one word of address from her father made her jump instinctively. "You will go to your room, and you are not to come out again until we call for you."

She moved on leaden feet. It was a long way to her room. She smiled a little to herself. It was like walking the last mile, she thought. The condemned woman—she laughed a little. She knew their eyes were upon her. She opened the door, closed it quietly behind her, and sank down wearily on the couch. All the bravado was gone from her face, and she suddenly realized she was tired. The pictures of today's adventure paraded themselves across a screen in her mind.

THE SAME ARGUMENT had arisen every week at this time—whether or not Ellen had to go to League. As always her folks had won out, and Ellen had had to cancel a date to go swimming with her friend Peggy and a couple of fellows. She had been resentful and disgusted with her folks. Why did they have to be so stuffy? What difference did it make whether she went to these silly meetings or not? Nothing ever happened. She wanted to have fun. She wanted to do the things the other kids in town did. All through high school she had listened to her folks and stayed away from dances, but she had been bored with everything and everybody at church. Church twice on Sunday—while other kids slept all morning and danced all evening! And church on Wednesday night—while other kids went to parties! And to League every Thursday—while the other kids played “ditch ‘em” around the town. It just wasn’t fair. She could really be popular if her family would only let her. Joe Perry told her so one night when he had picked her up on the corner after a show. Now she had taken to relying on her own judgment about what to do and whom to date, and this afternoon she had left the League meeting early to join Peggy and the fellows at the pool. Joe smiled down at Ellen from his five feet eleven and a half inches, and she knew she was going to have fun. First they had gone for a long ride around Beacher’s Point; then they met another couple and, with Peggy and Jim, had stopped for a drink at the “Hang Out.” Ellen had never been there before and thought it was the most exciting place she had ever seen. Joe had laughed at her for staring and called her a “sweet kid.” The next thing Ellen knew, it was eight o’clock, and she had been expected home from League at four. She knew she was in for it—this wasn’t the first time it had happened.

One day Jeff stopped her and ventured a remark. "Look, Sis, if I didn't think the world of you I wouldn't bother to say anything, but I've always thought you were just about tops, and so I'm gonna' stick my chin out and tell you something."

SITTING ALONE NOW in the silence of her room, Ellen thought about her family’s indignation. Dad hadn’t always been a member of the church; he had joined after he and Mom were married. Everyone knew he had sown his “wild oats” plenty before that time. What right had he to criticize? And Madge had dated fellows no better than Joe Perry. Jeff—he might have some right to say something. He was a priest in the church and as devoted to it as he could be, but then, he’d had a personal conviction that the things he believed in were right. There’d been no personal conviction of anything in Ellen’s life.

She left her mother’s reaction until last. Mom had been hurt. That’s what Ellen hated about this sneaking around. Mom was genuinely the finest person in the world. She trusted and believed in her children, as well as in everybody else and their children. She was always looking at the good things in people’s lives.

But that didn’t mean she wasn’t up on the latest of what was going on around her—quite the contrary; she knew all those things too. It was the sad look on Mom’s face that always made Ellen sorry she was like this; and time and time again she had promised herself she would do the things Mom wanted her to do—but it just wasn’t any use. Why should she give up her good times and her friends just because the church people didn’t approve of them? And what gave them the right to think she was so very wrong? They said they had their standards of conduct from God, but how did she—Ellen—know there even was a God? She’d never felt any of this so called “spirit.” Sometimes she thought it was just all nonsense. If it hadn’t been for Mom saying she knew there was this power, Ellen would never have tried to believe it. If there was a God, he wasn’t interested in her. Of that, Ellen was thoroughly convinced.

Suddenly, without realizing it, Ellen was crying. It wasn’t because she wanted to be this way; it was just that—yes, what was it? Why was it she didn’t believe in God and couldn’t be like Jeff and Madge and Mom? It might be nice once in a while to know that someone really cared when you were hurt and bewildered and confused.

HEARING THE DOOR OPEN, Ellen quickly brushed the tears from her eyes and then relaxed as she realized her mother wasn’t going to turn on the lights.

“May I sit in here with you a few moments, Ellen?” Ellen murmured a reply and felt her mother’s presence in the room. The faint aroma of her favorite perfume was in the air.

Ellen’s voice was more sarcastic than she had intended when she asked, “Well, have they reached a verdict?”

She was glad it was dark and she couldn’t see her mother’s face, but she could imagine the pain on it when she heard the hurt in her voice, “We’re not going to punish you, Ellen.”

“You’re not?” Ellen echoed in disbelief. Always before they had taken away a privilege—she’d been denied the car or something. More than once she had protested that she was too old for this sort of thing, but her father had insisted that as long as she was living under his roof, she was to be under his guidance which, after all, was only fair, Ellen knew.

Her mother’s voice in the darkness sounded old and tired. Ellen felt a moment’s panic as she realized her mother had not been well lately and these situations did not help any. “Ellen, you’re out of school now. You have a job of your own. You’re old enough to come and go as you please. We’re sorry we’ve continued to treat you as if you were a child. Your Dad and I have given you the fundamentals for a happy, useful life in this world, but somehow you have failed to find the opportunities hidden in these things. We have tried to show you by our own lives that it’s important you keep yourself clean not only physically, but morally and spiritually as well. You think we’re old-fashioned and, well—maybe we are.” Her mother’s voice had grown shaky, and she stopped a moment. “I can’t blame God, Ellen, for your failing to follow the path we had chosen for you, although at times I have been rebellious. It’s not easy to sit back and watch those you love miss the way.

New Horizons

I really believe God is concerned with you and is trying to help you, but he has given us our free agency and will not force anything upon you. It is through your own negligence and refusal to seek him that he is not able to help you. I can't help feeling, dear, that you are on the wrong track, but if you choose to do these things and are happier in doing them, then we are not ever going to reprimand you again."

It had been a long speech, full of many poignant thoughts, and Ellen was weeping silently when her mother went out and closed the door behind her.

THUS IT WAS that Ellen discontinued going to church. She had had a big struggle within herself that night; she had said to God, "If you'll prove to me that you are really a power that can control my life and that you really do care what I do, then I'll go as mother thinks I ought to. If not—" She had waited impatiently for an answer to her prayer—for two days—and then decided that God wasn't interested. So she had completely broken connections with the church. She realized her mother was hurt and bewildered, and she doubled her efforts to do good things at home, but nothing, she knew, could atone for her late hours and her refusal to participate in church work.

One day Jeff stopped her and ventured a remark. "Look, Sis, if I didn't think the world of you I wouldn't bother to say anything, but I've always thought you were just about tops, and so I'm gonna stick my chin out and tell you something. These fellows you're dating aren't like the ones you've known at League all your life. They haven't the moral standards they should have. They're not half good enough for you."

That night Ellen found herself once again upon her knees. "Give me a sign, God," she pleaded. "Help me know if you're ever going to help me, because I'm in love with Joe, and he has asked me to marry him. Can't you let me know if this is right or wrong? Everyone else thinks you care, and I'm willing to take a chance, God. I don't know how to pray, that's true, and I'm probably not worth it, but can't you tell me?" She lay awake a long time, waiting for an answer to her prayer but nothing happened. The next day when Joe asked her again to marry him she said, "yes." She knew her folks would hate it, and she knew Joe would never get along with them, but at least she'd be away from the torment of her conscience that she received at home every time she looked into her mother's eyes. If there was a God, he should have answered her before now.

* * * * *

ELLEN SAW the justice of the peace with tear dimmed eyes. This wasn't the wedding she had always dreamed of with a long white gown and flowers decorating the little church. But here she was—with Joe's hand tight around her own, and Joe smiling down at her, making her heart skip a beat. She looked again at the shabby office, stale with the smell of cigar smoke, and thought, "Oh, God, what am I doing? I've been wrong. I know I have! There is something better in store for me than this." And then quite suddenly Ellen was no longer standing beside Joe. She was all alone—alone in a place she had never been before. She looked around, but the light was so penetrating in the place and so compelling she could see nothing. The pounding in her ears was like the beat of drums. It grew louder and louder, and she felt a burning deep down in her lungs. Then she felt as if her body were feather-light. Suddenly the spirit of Ellen Gordon was no longer, and the spirit of God was. For the space of a breath, she and God were one and the same. She knew it. She didn't have to wonder. She didn't have to guess. She knew what it was, and she knew God had answered her cry. As suddenly as it had begun, she felt the pounding residing. She felt the little pulse that had been jumping madly about in her throat become stilled, and she felt the quietness of the Spirit of God and the peace and assurance of knowing that God is. She knew now what her mother had meant about the Spirit of God. She turned from the justice of the peace and from Joe and went home.

THE HOUSE WAS IN CONFUSION.

Jeff met her at the door, his eyes swimming with tears. "Ellen, it's mother! She had an attack and is in a coma. She's dying."

Ellen's legs gave way and would no longer support her. She sank on the couch heavily. "Jeff," she whispered brokenly, "She can't be. She can't go until she knows—"

"Know's what, Ellen?" His voice was alarmed. "Ellen, what have you done? You haven't—" Jeff couldn't go on.

Ellen thought of how close she had come to marrying Joe and smiled through her tears. "No, Jeff, that isn't what I want to tell her. I want to tell her I've found God."

Jeff stared at her through his disbelief, yet there was no denying that something had happened to her. "Then mother hasn't failed" he murmured.

"Jeff," she was suddenly very sober. "The doctor? What did the doctor say?"

"It's been coming for a long time, Ellen. If she comes out of the coma he can save her maybe. If not—" his voice broke, and his eyes clouded. "We've had her administered to. Brother Farrell is in the room with Madge and Dad."

Ellen left him then and went into her mother's room. The woman on the bed looked very tired. Poor Mom! She had had a good life—always working for the other fellow, always helping out, being the good neighbor. People had never appreciated her the way they should. Ellen hung her head as she realized that she above all had failed. As she looked down into the peaceful face, Ellen felt her throat clog with tears, but she also felt a strange peace reach out and envelop her. Once again the Spirit of God was with her. Strange that it should come to her. It should have come to Jeff or Madge or Dad. If only she had it all to do over again—but that could never be. Her only hope for amendment was to live and study and practice the teachings of God from now on. But how could she? "Oh, Mom, Mom," she cried, "don't die. I can't live without you to help me. Oh, dear God, let her live. Let her know what has happened to me. I need her more now than ever before." Ellen raised herself to look once again upon the beloved face. Never had her mother seemed so beautiful. Hesitantly, she reached out a finger and touched her mother's cheek. The softness of the skin brought back the poignant memories of days when Ellen believed that no one in all the world had such soft and lovely skin as her mother. And the hands that lay folded on the covers—long, shapely fingers, wrinkled a little from hard work. How many times she had read poems about mothers and never once realized they had described her own. She saw her mother through the eyes of love and felt the ache for the unfed gratitude due her mother that was wedged too deeply in her heart for tears. She leaned over and laid her young cheek against her mother's. "Mom, you've got to wake up now and come back to me. I've lots to tell you. You'll be glad to know, Mom, that God finally showed himself to me and that I've promised to serve him the rest of my life. I don't deserve it, I know, but I'm going to try to make you and him proud of me. I need you, Mom. Won't you come back and help me? You've never failed me before."

There was no response in her mother's face. Ellen fell to her knees and hid her face in the bed covers, crying, "Father, I know you can bring her back. But maybe she's too tired. Maybe she deserves this rest.

Will you tell her for me that I'm sorry and that I'll make it up to her a hundred times over? That I'll carry on for her?"

It was then that Ellen once again saw the brilliant light circling around her. It flowed in through the windows of the room like a great tidal wave; it enveloped the bed, the woman there, and the girl kneeling on the floor. Then Ellen arose from her knees and found herself looking at the most precious sight she had ever beheld—the blueness of her mother's open eyes.

lence that must be accepted if we plan to minister as Christ would have us. He says:

As we minister to the sick, we must keep in mind that many doctors and nurses are openly antagonistic to Christianity, or at least skeptical about its value in the sickroom. Let us not give them opportunity to criticize our ministry to the sick. Let us learn how to minister and care for the sick so that the doctor will say, "I like to have that man call on my patients. He always leaves them better than he found them."

He further states:

In ministering to the sick and dying, many shoddy compromises take place in the name of religion. Hospital work calls for a highly skilled ministry, and the hospital room in reality is indeed a gold mine of religious experience.

In closing, the prayer of faith does save the sick, when men call in righteousness and in faith.

The Beautiful Northwest

P. S.

* PHOTOGRAPHS WANTED

Within the borders of British Columbia is contained some of the most distinctive and beautiful scenery of all Canada, and of America. A part of the beauty is the heavy forestation which the ample rainfall makes possible. Vancouver Island is a favorite spot for travelers and photographers.

Concerning our cover picture, Mrs. H. B. Canning, who obtained the photo for us, writes: "Youbou is secluded on a gently sloping shelf running from the foot of the mountains to the lake front on the north shore of Cowichan Lake. Its name is derived from the names of two early settlers, Mr. Yount and M. Bouton. 'Cowichan' applies to the lake, the river, and the bay. It is an Indian expression meaning 'warmed by the sun.' The lake is from one half to two and a half miles wide, and twenty-one miles long."

On this part of the Pacific coast, the touch of winter rests rather lightly in comparison with the sharper temperatures of places farther inland.

"Herald" Editors are much in need of fine quality pictures taken by church photographers, particularly those which feature church buildings, properties, reunion and camp grounds.

Most immediately needed are pictures of our churches, which should be in our hands soon for February issues. Stories about the churches—how they were financed, when they were built—will be appreciated, too. Up to the present time, our photographers have generously supplied us with a goodly number of fine quality pictures, but our supply is running low, and we need new materials to plan future covers.

Camera artists will have observed our requirements in the pictures we have used: sharp in detail, good contrast in light and shadow, carefully selected quality in composition. Prints four by six can be used, though eight by tens are better where they are available.

On a general invitation like this, a few photos will be sent that cannot be used. When this happens, we try to explain why, pointing out how photography may be improved so that pictures will be usable.

We express our thanks to photographers for excellent work already submitted, and take this means of inviting their splendid co-operation in continuing the quality of "Herald" covers which all have so much enjoyed.—The Editors, by L. L.

AMEN!

Isn't it about time we should give attention to our pronunciation of "Amen"?

Whether you pronounce it "aymen" with the common people, or "ahmen" with the high-collar crowd, the dictionary will give you adequate authority. The choir must sing it "ahmen" because that is the more musical sound, and we sometimes think that it would be an advantage if the minister would conform to that style, although it is hard for him to overcome old habits.

Either way, please let the word be pronounced. Not whispered, not grunted, not murmured, but pronounced. If its meaning, "So let it be," is worth anything to us at all, we ought to pronounce the word like a word and not like an apology. Some people tack "Amen" on at the end of a prayer as if they didn't know what it is for, nor whether it should really be there. An "Amen" ought to have some force, some faith, some assurance, some conviction in it. It needn't be shouted or boomed—and shouldn't be. But there is no particular piety in being limp or apathetic.

One pronunciation that a number of people use is markedly weak and ineffective; it is a way of flipping the end of the word up into the air on a rising tone that sounds uncertain and querulous. Speech is a form of drama, and no matter what flights the orator may take, he should return to the earth, when he finishes, with a descending tone. Only a question is permitted the rising ending. Good prayer lifts us up to God; and the function of "Amen" is to bow us reverently out of His presence and return us to the earth.

"Amen" notifies the congregation that the prayer is over, except in those faiths where every paragraph of a prayer ends with it, or where each petition is regarded as a separate prayer. In most churches, it is a convenient vocal period for a prayer. And a prayer ought to be ended with a period—not with a vocal comma nor a semicolon nor a dash.

What Are We Waiting For?

A LETTER, written before the recent holidays, contained a sentence that stood out, not for its boldness of script, but for its boldness of thought:

My husband and I always like to figure out our tithing for the year before we do our Christmas shopping. Then we are sure that we are not spending any of the Lord's money for our Christmas presents. It gives us a happy feeling to know that this obligation is met.

This young woman and her husband do not wait. They prepare ahead of time for the work and obligations to come.

JANUARY is a waiting month in many American homes. The farmer is waiting for spring, when the ground will thaw and he can go to work. The salesman, who finds travel difficult, waits for storms to subside and roads to clear before he can start on his trips. Merchants wait for customers to arrive, who do not enjoy shopping in the cold weather. Mother waits for the longer days and warmer weather to begin the principal annual house cleaning.

But wise people in all walks of life do not simply wait. They take this time to read and study and plan in preparation for the busy times to come, when there will be no opportunity for such things.

SO MUCH OF OUR LIFE is spent in waiting for something to happen. Sometimes it happens. Sometimes it does not. In either case, the investment of time is gone.

In our small town, there was a young man who spent hours sitting in the sun, on the doorsteps of places of business, wherever he could rest without being stepped on by busy people. Asked about his plans one day, he smiled and said, "I'm waiting for my ship to come in." He didn't know that you have to send ships out before they can come in.

A neighbor remarked that opportunity passed by him every day, but he never saw it. Years later, he was still waiting, but the light was gone from his eyes and the smile from his lips. He had given up any real hope. It was easier to wait.

The difference between success and failure lies in what you do while you wait.

I VISITED a small branch. They had a neat church building which they only half filled. There were many neighbors around, living in good homes, conducting thriving businesses, tilling good farms. There were opportunities on every side to tell the story of the church.

"What are you doing here?" I asked.

"We are waiting for a missionary to come," they replied. Their young people were growing up, going away to school, remaining away to go into business and professional life, marry, and establish homes. There was no important work in that branch to call them back.

A CHURCH MEMBER in California wrote, telling us about his activity:

We are off the beaten track of travel here, and no missionaries ever come this way. But I keep busy distributing tracts and telling the Gospel story to whoever will listen. There are some splendid people here, and I think a number of them are interested. I have always wanted to be in a branch, but fate seems to have arranged my life to work alone. But, anyway, I find a lot of happiness in talking to people.

This brother writes to us every few years to let us know how things are going. He hasn't done much waiting. Like Enoch, he seems to have found out the secret of walking in the presence of God. I have often wished he could manage to tell that secret to others.

An elderly member was at work on something in his front yard.

"What are you doing?" I asked.

"I'm building Zion," he replied.

We both understood by his answer that he was referring to his long-range plans, not to his immediate job. In his home there was a Zion of happiness and peace. It was a church home, and church activity was one of the principal interests there. As far as possible, he had built a part of Zion for all to share in who might visit his home. And he extended the spirit of his home to all of his dealings in business and social life with other people.

Many people have moved to Independence during the war and since. War psychosis has sent many of them here. A desire to gather has sent others. You might say some are atomic bomb refugees, and others are kingdom seekers. Some are "waiting for Zion," and some are working for it.

"What are we waiting for?" a woman member exclaimed to me, somewhat impatiently. That question usually implies that we have everything we need in resources and people to go ahead with full scale operations now. If the questioners had been engaged in pastoral work here for a dozen or more years, as the writer has, they might have a different opinion. It takes much longer to develop human building material than it does to gather physical resources.

Our people have many resources of mind and spirit, of ideals, devotion, and material things. With these resources, they could—and some day will—accomplish splendid things. But they also have some problems to solve and some faults to correct before they are fully ready for the greater tasks before them. Can we face our situation, can we examine ourselves realistically? We are not waiting for Zion. Zion waits for us!

Gog's Swan Song

Two Gogs

THERE ARE TWO GOGS referred to in prophetic scripture, but they are centuries apart, both as to the prophecies predicting their coming and the time of their actual appearance on earth. The first is a person; the second is a nation.

Ezekiel's prophecy dealing with the Gog we have been studying about in a past series of articles was delivered about 587 years before the coming of Christ in his first advent. The second Gog, predicted by John the Revelator during his banishment to the Isle of Patmos in the year A.D. 96, was to come centuries later. The responsibility of campaigning for evil in the first instance was laid upon a powerful leader—Gog; in the second it is laid at the door of two powerful nations—Gog and a companion people, Magog.

The first Gog is to make his appearance on earth prior to the second coming of Christ (Ezekiel 39: 21-29); the second Gog is to appear with Magog on the theater of operation one thousand years after Christ's second advent, plus the "little season" mentioned in Revelation 20: 3.

These two powers could not possibly have been the same in the prophetic mind. The first Gog is to gather his mighty armies from the north (Ezekiel 38: 15; 39: 2), while Satan is to mislead the second Gog and Magog, as the prophet says, and "deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth . . . to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea."—Revelation 20: 8. The latter Gog, therefore, must come from the north and the south, the east and the west. The first Gog was to come "against the mountains of Israel," but the second Gog is to compass the "camp of the Saints."

The question which naturally arises here is: "Why are there two such gigantic powers with like names in the prophetic panorama, and what will be the ultimate fate attending each?" The answer to this justifiable query is in part that the name is more the appellation of a disposition than that of any one individual or group. The fate of each will be made clear as we proceed. These two powers have come separately into the perspective of prophecy. Each will fulfill the description given in the imagery of the seers as they have been inspired to speak for Divinity.

We have already seen that the first Gog is one who lends himself with complete abandon to the will and wiles of the devil, thus becoming wholly subservient to Satan as the "number one enemy" of God. He is the high priest of Lucifer's religion. He presides at the altars of deception all the while he entices, inveigles, and coerces our common humanity to kneel with him before the lurid flame of a false and treacherous sacrifice. Thus he leads millions against God and disciplines them for battle and ultimate death.

JEHOVAH DENOMINATES the evil power mentioned in the Book of the Revelation also as "Gog" because it will be engaged in a like vile purpose as will the Gog of Ezekiel. The war for the conquest of God's throne and his divine authority will still persist in this last vicious expression of evil. This closing battle of Gog and Magog against Divinity pictured in the revelation is the death struggle of Satan. In final desperation, he will concentrate all on one throw of his demoniac dice. Thus he will strive for the victory before the last advent, as also he will just prior to Christ's being seated on the throne of everlasting power as King of kings and Lord of lords one thousand years later.

Prior to this latter development, during a blessed period of peace, prosperity, and divine education, called the millennium, Christ will have been teaching his people the way of salvation. This beneficent period of one thousand years will have seen Satan bound so effectually that he could not for that course of time tempt mankind. But Lucifer has not, as yet, given up the battle. Now again he will organize men, this time for the last struggle. Indeed, he will organize with such genius as he has never before displayed.

A Present-tense Gog

AS IT HAPPENS, the Communist Party all through its history has allied itself with the powers operating against Jehovah, who seeks the freedom of the human race from every species of sin and its concurrent and resultant bondage. This evil genius will utilize its every power to crush liberty and compel men to its way of unholy living.

Will Durant went to the northern habitat of this modern Gog with sympathy for its people and with the hope of discovering great things about the new way of life that Communist leaders were supposed to have instituted. He returned to write of "The Tragedy." In it he gives us the following sad picture:

By Apostle D. T. Williams

Surely the time has come . . . to speak out about this new slavery, to call it clearly and bluntly what it is . . . It has terrorized the public with marching armies, secret police, merciless penalties, and a million spies. It has deported or shot hundreds of thousands of men and women solely for political heresy and nonconformance. . . . It has suppressed all freedom of speech or assembly, and, in effect, has raised a thousand obstacles against the freedom of worship and belief.

Thus the first Gog places himself in contravention to God's plan of human salvation whether he comes against the mountains of Israel from the "uttermost parts of the north" before the second coming of Christ, or whether later to make war on the "camp of the Saints" more than a thousand years after our Savior's second appearance, it matters little.

Must Fail of Objective

THAT THESE FORCES OF SATAN bent on world conquest and a resulting universal kingdom is bound for a goal impossible of attainment is foretold in Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream. After prophesying, through the vision of the great image, the rise of several world powers, such as Babylon, the Medes and Persians, the Grecians, and the Romans, Daniel goes on to advise us that when these have reached their zenith and descended again to the dust of the threshing floor there would not be another kingdom of world-wide predominance until the coming of the kingdom of God.

In witness of this, note these prophetic words:

And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes [of the image], part of potters clay and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay, and as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken.

And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay.

And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to another people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever.

When, therefore, Gog comes like a wolf from his lair out of the far north to "take a spoil" in "the latter days," his fate is already sealed, and his doom is foretold in "the word of the Lord which cannot be broken." He shall come like a scourge upon the fold of a people that "dwelleth securely" "to carry away silver and gold, to take away cattle and goods, to take a spoil," but his ambition for universal power cannot be realized. The nations of this world will have lost the adhesive cement which in the past has made it possible to compel them to cleave together. "They shall not cleave one to another" says Daniel.

Concerning the situation of war and conflict thus created, the Lord says: "I will magnify myself, and sanctify myself, and I will make myself known in the eyes of many nations; and they shall know that I am Jehovah." Thus comes Jehovah to take a hand in this decisive hour in human history.

The Challenge

THUS, TOO, does the Almighty cast the gauntlet in the face of Gog, "the Prince of Rosh," as he thunders, "I am against thee, O Gog." "I will call for a sword against him unto all my holy mountains, saith the Jehovah. And with pestilence and with blood will I enter into judgment with him: and I will rain upon him and upon his hoards and upon the many people with him an overflowing shower, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone."

It is self-evident, therefore, that Gog will not have the power to compel all the kingdoms of this world to come under his banner. This means the defeat of his colossal purpose—the conquest of the world, physically and spiritually.

But perhaps the greatest disaster of all which God will visit upon his earthly arch enemy will be when the Almighty so confuses the minds of this Satan inspired host that "every man's sword shall be against his brother" (Ezekiel 38: 21). Here added to what appears as atomic powers exploding from above will be the utter blinding of everyone concerning the identity of the other members of this great army. What confusion! God's people will not have to destroy the enemy—they will kill each other.

Thus shall be brought to pass the prophetic prediction:

I will turn thee about, and will lead thee on, and will cause thee to come up from the uttermost parts of the north and I will bring thee upon the mountains of Israel.

I will smite thy bow out of thy left hand and will cause thine arrows to fall out of thy right hand.

Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou, and all thy hoards and the people that are with thee: I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort, and to the beasts of the field to be devoured.—Ezekiel, chapters 38 and 39, Revised Version—Standard American Edition.

Thus falls the enemy of God and the scourge of his people—the first Gog to appear on the theater of operation.

The Second Gog

THE SECOND GOG coming over a thousand years later, who is pictured in the revelation with his confederate, Magog, determines to accept the leadership proffered by Satan in the war against God. Here the objective is still the same—to

Bronze Bust of Late President Frederick M. Smith Presented to Graceland College

I, one of Graceland's first students, was privileged to witness a very interesting event at Graceland College on December 20. After several postponements, I had appeared for a short talk at student convocation; but the "main event" was the presentation of a bust of Graceland's first graduate, our late President Frederick M. Smith.

On the rostrum were President E. J. Gleazer, Jr., President Emeritus George N. Briggs, Doctor Roy Cheville, Miss Beryl E. Judd, Student President Bernard Butterworth, and myself.

After an introductory statement by Doctor Cheville, the life-size bronze bust of the late president was unveiled by Miss Carolyn Walden and Miss Janet Harris.

Miss Judd, who is a daughter of Elder Percy Judd of Australia, on the United Nations representation from that country, made the presentation in the following words:

During the General Conference of the church in April, 1947, we, the youth of the church decided to have as our project for the next year, "Missions Abroad." The sum of money we set as our goal was $25,000, the first $3,000 of which was to be spent in obtaining two bronze busts of the late president, Frederick M. Smith. One of these was to be given to the general church, for the Auditorium, and the other to Graceland.

The total $25,000 that we wanted to give to Missions Abroad was not quite reached, but we did get $18,000, and the first $3,000 of this was given to these two memorials.

You probably remember the presentation of the first bust by Brother Dick Cheville, the Saturday of the last General Conference. This stands today in the Auditorium at Independence, Missouri, as a loving tribute to Brother Smith.

Brother Frederick was a wonderful supporter of Graceland; he was the first graduating class to go from here, and one of which we can be justly proud.

This is one of the finest tributes we can pay to such an outstanding man. I feel proud today, together with you that we were willing and able to give to such a good cause.

Brother Gleazer, I should like to present this to you, as a representative of the youth of the church everywhere. This was made possible by the contributions of the youth of the church here in America, across the sea in Hawaii, in Europe, in England, in Australia, and in the Society Islands. I hope it will serve as an example to the youth of this school for all times that as they look upon it, they may strive to become men and women of such faith and courage as they see depicted therein.

President Gleazer then accepted the gift on behalf of the College, after which he introduced me for my address, which was largely unrelated to the matter of the bust, though I made reference to it in my opening statement.

Bernard Butterworth made response to my remarks on behalf of the student body. At the close of the convocation, pictures were taken of the bust with President Gleazer and myself standing beside it, one of which is shown in connection with this brief account.

The students gave evidence of a reverent regard for Graceland's first alumnus who, graduating in 1898, became identified with the Quorum of the First Presidency in 1902, and served as President of the Church from April, 1915, to March 20, 1946, the date of his demise.

These busts were made by Doctor Avard Fairbanks, formerly of Michigan University, from a clay model made by him for which President Smith posed a few years ago.

Across the Desk

Several years ago Bishop C. A. Skinner was interested in some discussions of personal evangelism conducted by one of the brethren. Bishop Skinner is a salesman, and personal evangelism looked like good church salesmanship, so he decided to try it out. The following letters tell the rest of the story to date.

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Independence, Mo.

Mr. C. A. Skinner:

A year ago in September you stopped at our station in Chatsworth, and we had a nice talk together. Later the literature and book, The Call at Evening, arrived. I did not get to read the book until late in December when I was housed on account of mumps. This story is so sincere and true, I must let you know how I truly appreciated it, and I have let many others read the same; they all agree it truly is wonderful. Therefore, I am enclosing a check to you for the furthering of the blessed teaching of true Christianity. Could you tell me where near here is a Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints?

Yours,

George E. Dennywitz

Make Me Believe

BY RUBY
TINKHAM

MIKE'S FINGERS trembled as he pushed the antiquated doorbell on Reverend Brown's big, old-fashioned house. Through the large window in front, he could see the slight figure of the minister ensconced in his favorite leather chair, poring over one of his priceless old books.

A smile played around Mike's good-natured face at the thought of the man's surprise when he opened the massive oak door and saw him standing there on the step.

Of course, Reverend Brown wouldn't know that he, Mike Ferrel, one of the city's most promising young business executives, and all-around athlete had walked around the block three times before he had nerve enough to ring the bell. He also wouldn't guess that tonight's visit had been postponed for more than two years, in fact, since Donny had had pneumonia.

The minister's welcome was everything Mike had expected, and he felt good in the familiar old room again with its worn furniture and the countless books.

There were no questions or surprise, just a warm handshake and a quick smile followed by, "My, it's good to see you again, Mike. How are Mary and the boys?"

THEY CHATTED EASILY, reminiscing along the way, until Reverend Brown inadvertently mentioned the fact that he had not seen Mike at church lately.

Mike tightened up like a taut piece of string, and strain showed plainly on his handsome face. He got to his feet, and his restless movement seemed to fill the already crowded room.

"That's why I'm here, Sir. I can't see any sense or purpose in my going to church feeling as I do, but Mary insists I should talk it over with you."

The little man gazed kindly at his harassed visitor and chose his next words with care. "Knowing you as I do, Mike, I feel you must have a very good reason for making a statement like that."

Mike turned and faced him resolutely, "Yes, I have. I've thought about it for a long time now. You know how it is with me—brought up in the church—married in the church—religion on the right of me—religion on the left of me—but what have I gained by it? I don't feel any particular allegiance to Jesus Christ. I've found just as good people out of the church as in it." He wheeled around and started pacing the floor, running his hands through his unruly hair.

The minister watched him thoughtfully and spoke up calmly, "That's not all, is it, Mike?"

Mike came to a sudden stop, and there was visible effort in his choice of words, "No, that's only the beginning. The truth is I don't believe in God at all. There is no Jesus Christ. It's all a fairy tale to soothe the hurt feelings of a bunch of ninnies!"

He acted as if the saying of it was a relief, sank into a chair and turned defiantly to the man sitting there quietly before him.

"I know, you think I'm crazy—that I've lost my mind, don't you?"

REVEREND BROWN made a tent out of his fingers and took his time about answering. "No, Mike, I don't think you're crazy at all. I think you're beginning to wake up, and that's always a good sign. You're not the first man to question whether there's a God or not. Every man asks himself that question at some time or another in his life. It's the answer you get that's important. I remember when I was a little boy about eight years old, I had planned on a fine Christmas with a new pair of ice skates. My Father, being a minister with a poor parish, reluctantly broke the news to us that our Christmas had gone to some widow with a sick baby. I shall never forget how I stood there in the middle of the floor with tears running down my face and shouted hysterically, 'I hate Jesus Christ. I wish he'd never been born!'"

Mike spoke up hesitantly, "Yes, but you were just a child then."

THE OLDER MAN smiled in retrospection. "Mike, that was just the beginning of my rebellion. I swore I'd never be a minister. I said I was going to work and make money and have a decent home and good things to eat and enjoy life. None of that 'Amen' and 'Bless his name' stuff for me. And the funny thing is, I really meant it. I decided to show the world just how far a minister's son could go the other way—and I did."

He dropped his head, and Mike looked at him with incredulous amazement. He couldn't believe it. This mild-mannered man once a hellion? Why, it was impossible! He'd always thought him a meek, preachy sort of individual.

The minister continued quietly, "One day I found myself in a ward with a lot of other men who were recovering from the same thing I was—too much liquor, too many parties, and the wrong kind of women. Well, Mike, when I looked around at those poor, unfortunate souls, I said, 'Good Lord, where did all these wretched creatures come from? Why doesn't somebody do something for them?' Then when my shaking hands tried to hold a razor, and I saw my own face I thought, 'By heaven, I look just like the rest.'

"Then I made a decision. I was going to do something. I didn't know what, but I was going to do something. I wasn't going to work for God. Oh, no, nothing like that! I was through with God. I was going to do something in spite of him.

"I went into welfare work and a funny thing happened, Mike. People you help have a habit of endowing you with power that really doesn't belong to you. They keep coming back and saying, 'God bless you for your kindness,' 'You gave me new faith,' 'Now I can believe in God,' until they converted me—the man who hated God!" He paused, and then continued reflectively, "You might say I found my God in service."

MIKE GOT UP and slowly paced the floor again. He was thinking hard. Finally he broke out with, "Yes, that may be all right for you. But how about me? My world is different. I'm a materialist. I have to compete every day with other men who make it as tough as possible for me to succeed. It's my job to make a good living, supply security for my family, and plan for the future. I'm not trying to save other people's souls, I'm trying to make peace with my own. Why should I believe there is a God, and that he is interested in me?"

The minister replied patiently, "Mike, if you came in from outside, cold and tired, and stood over the register and felt the warmth come up around you, would you say there was a fire in the furnace?"

"Of course."

"Then don't the good things in your life prove to you that there is some force for good outside yourself? For instance, if I asked you to take a paper and pencil and write down all the good things in your life on one side, and all the bad things on the other, which would predominate?"

Mike spoke hurriedly, "Why, the good, of course."

"Doesn't that prove anything to you at all, Mike?"

Mike squirmed a little. "Maybe—but that's all so vague and uncertain. I want something I can sink my teeth into, something I can make work for me. Not just something that happens by chance outside myself. Do you understand, Sir?"

"Indeed, I do understand, Mike. Have you ever talked about it to Mary?"

"Yes, and no. Mary and I are different kinds of people. Mary thinks everybody and everything are fine and good and wonderful. Mary doesn't ask questions or find fault. She just loves people."

REVEREND BROWN SMILED. "That's a fine quality, Mike. Only the truly great can live by love alone. They are like children who instinctively by-pass the rougher roads of experience and go straight to the point by love alone. You are a lucky man, Mike."

"I know, Sir, but I can't be like that. I have to know things. Now take the time Donny had pneumonia. The night of the crisis, Mary said, while we were at the hospital, 'We'll go home, Mike; Donny will be all right.' I just stood there, shocked, incredulous to think she could leave that sick child and go home to bed. Why, it was inhuman! On the way home I couldn't stand it, and I burst out, 'Mary, how can you leave him up there all alone. He may die. Why, I'd think you'd be down on your hands and knees praying for dear life.'

"I'll never forget how she looked at me. And then she laid her hand on my arm and said, 'Mike, I have been praying. That's why I can go home. I know Donny's going to be all right.'

"All that night while I paced the floor desperately, waiting for the phone to ring, I think I hated Mary. In the morning when we went back over, Donny was sleeping quietly, and Mary just stood there and smiled at me, and I felt like some kind of a worm.

"What I want to know is, if there is a God and he told Mary Donny was going to get well, why didn't he tell me too? Am I such a heel?"

"Maybe he was trying to tell you, Mike; maybe he tried hard through Mary, but you wouldn't listen."

Mike wheeled and faced him stubbornly, "Why didn't he tell me, himself?"

"Mike, listen to me a minute. Aren't you trying to limit your God? Suppose you and I were discussing a business deal tonight, and I told you I'd let you know what my decision was in a couple of days. Would you be surprised if I came to your house, or called you over the phone, or maybe sent you a letter or a telegram?"

"No."

"Well, if man has devised all these ingenious ways of communication, why do you limit God to speaking to you in person? Can't you allow him the freedom of expression you expect for yourself?"

"Well, I'm not going to get down and grovel before him in prayer, if that's what you're driving at!"

Reverend Brown looked startled, and he spoke almost sharply, "Good Heavens, Mike, prayer is a privilege not a mandatory form of obedience. God never meant man to grovel—that's why he gave him two legs instead of four. He has always meant that man shall stand up with him, not crawl around on his belly. The important thing is, how many men, with the exception of a rare few, have ever been able to stand up to God?"

MIKE FALTERED A LITTLE and then came back determinedly. "All right, granted there is some force for good and that force is interested in me, is it something I can use any time and anywhere—even in my business?"

The minister replied with assurance, "What do you think, Mike? Would you say that a great man who gave his spare time to trying to save some poor wretched souls in hell would be interested in going into business with a fine prospect like you?"

Mike's question came quickly, anticipating the answer, "Okay, then, how am I going to discover this marvelous source of power? And don't tell me to read the Bible. I'm sick and tired of this harping on 'Love thy enemies' and 'The meek shall inherit the earth' stuff!"

Reverend Brown leaned forward and forced Mike to meet his eyes. His answer was deliberate. "Mike, you are sick and tired of Mike Ferrel. You are dissatisfied with yourself. You are the eternal man on the everlasting quest for something greater than himself—something to give his allegiance to."

He held up his hand as Mike started to speak.

"Let me finish, son. I'm not going to tell you to read the Bible. But I wouldn't think of advising you to take some strange man into business with you. I'd say, 'Mike, investigate this man's character. Get some good references. See what he can contribute in the way of resourcefulness, ingenuity, and stamina.' Then, and then only, would I say, 'Go ahead, Mike, you've found a real partner.'"

Mike stared thoughtfully at the floor and then asked, "Suppose I do accept him—and I don't say that I do, mind you—but if I should, how then am I going to use him in my life?"

"Well, Mike, if you were to take a new partner into your business, what would you do? Would you ignore him and try to outwit him at every turn? Or would you sit down and talk things over with him and discover how you could best work together? If you did not always agree—and two people seldom do—you would probably give a fair trial to both methods until a profitable conclusion could be reached. No doubt, there would be many times your personal feelings would have to be put aside, for the business itself would seem much more important. You have already said you are a materialistic man. All right, put it on a material basis. Put him to the test; make him work for you. But be as fair and honest about using his methods as you would your own."

MIKE SAT SILENTLY, his eyes intent on his shoe. "Suppose I do try it? How do I know it will work for me? I may make mistakes. I may get discouraged. How do I know I won't do something wrong?"

"Mike, when you were a little boy and fell out of that apple tree in the back yard, did your parents look at your broken arm and say, 'Mike isn't any good now. He's deformed. We'll have to give him up as a bad job and concentrate on the other children.'"

Mike grinned in remembrance, "No, I really had it swell all that summer. I didn't have to mow the grass or work in the garden, and Dad used to take me with him in the car because I couldn't play with the other kids."

"It's the same way upstairs, Mike. There's a ratio of about ninety-nine to one on the people who care whether you get lost or make a mistake."

Mike sat quietly, deep in thought. There was serious concentration written all over his rugged features. His next question came slowly, "Suppose I can't figure things out? Suppose I get mixed up and can't find the answers I need?"

THIS TIME the older man leaned forward kindly, "Mike, everybody makes mistakes. Nobody knows everything. But one mistake doesn't necessarily mean that the whole structure is wrong. We don't throw the multiplication tables away because the answer to one problem comes out wrong. We go back and check the problem until we find the right answer. Even those contracts you are so proud of are not infallible. When one of them lands you in court, you don't give up your whole business; you simply make up your mind that the same error will not appear in the next one."

Mike got to his feet and grinned

sheepishly at the man in the big chair. "I hope I haven't spoiled your evening, Sir, but Mary insisted I come, and I'm glad I did. At least I got a lot of things off my chest."

Reverend Brown laid his hand affectionately on Mike's shoulder and said softly, "I'm glad you came, too, Mike. It's good to get things out in the open and look them squarely in the face. You could help me, son. I've always wondered just how far a man could go with character and ability should he choose to incorporate the teachings of Christ in his work. In fact, I'd like to write a book on that very thing."

Mike felt the blast of winter air as he opened the big door, and he turned with his good-natured smile and held out his hand to the minister. "Good-night, Sir, you've helped me a lot."

The old man smiled in return and answered, "Come back again, Mike. Remember me to Mary and the boys." And then he added wisely, as if an afterthought, "Oh, yes, I don't think that's a new idea you have there. I'm sure it says something in the Bible about a twelve-year-old boy taking God into his business."

Pleasure's Crisis

In everything worth having, even in every pleasure, there is a point of pain or tedium that must be survived, so that the pleasure may revive and endure. The joy of battle comes after the first fear of death; the glow of the sea-bather comes after the icy shock of the sea bath; and the success of the marriage comes after the failure of the honeymoon. All human vows, laws and contracts are so many ways of surviving with success this breaking point, this instant of potential surrender.—G. K. Chesterton, What's Wrong with the World.

Of Faith and Works

BY STEPHEN A. BLACK

OUR MEMORIES PLAY tricks on us sometimes, and sometimes we forget unpleasant things much too soon. When we do this, we lose the lesson learned in suffering and defeat. But I'm sure many of us remember the early 1930's—first the stock-market crash, then the great layoff of workers, then the scarcity of markets; there was no demand for the piles of goods stored in warehouses, because people had no money to pay. Many remember the long breadlines, the march on Washington, and the men, women, and children selling apples on the streets. There was discouragement everywhere, and men lost faith.

In the Middle West, we began to hear about the dust bowl. Men's greed had set the stage. Through the postwar years, men had overploughed and overplanted, preparing the soil for the winds to come. So, when the rains ceased and the winds came, the skies over the prairies were aflame with dust. There were no roots to hold the soil. Men ate dust with every meal; it blew in through the cracks of the houses, under the doors, around the windows, wherever there was a small gap. The great wheat belt of Kansas became a land of desolation; men lost faith and moved away by the thousands. During the drought years, 150,000 farmers moved out of the dust bowl—but a few remained. The story of their faith and courage is now known. One young man, when asked why he stayed, said something like this, "I had faith in the prairie, and I just couldn't pack up and leave it."

In the general Epistle of James, second chapter, we find: "What profit is it, my brethren, for a man to say he hath faith and hath not works? can faith save him? Yea, a man may say I will show thee I have faith without works: but I say, show me thy faith without works and I will show thee my faith by my works." It is important that we have faith in each other, but it is more important that we have faith in the teachings of Jesus and show our faith by our works. The kind of works James points out are these: Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. Love those that hate you. When compelled to go one mile, go two willingly. When smitten on one cheek, turn the other. Have faith in yourself even when public opinion is against you.

IN MARCH, 1942, newspapers carried the story of a popular thirty-four-year-old movie star who refused to bear arms for his country. It was not because he was afraid, for he offered to serve with the Red Cross in any of the war theaters. He said he would like to serve his country in a constructive way, not a destructive way. After spending several months in a conscientious objectors' camp, he was inducted as a noncombatant and trained with the Army Medical Corps in Berkeley, Texas. He then requested front-line duty, and his request was granted. He was sent to the Pacific, where he served twenty-two months and took part in three beachhead invasions—Hollandia, Leyte, and Luzon. During that time, he won three battle stars, yet never carried a weapon. General Carlos P. Romulo, McArthur's famed Filipino aide, in his book, I See the Philippines Rise, had this to say about Lew Ayres: "There was a spiritually remote look in the eyes of this handsome young actor who had known so much of worldly success, and who had risked everything rather than violate his faith in the divinity of man. He had made that protest bravely, and had won the respect of all." Ayers put his feelings into words saying, "To me, war was the greatest sin. I couldn't bring myself to kill other men. Whatever the cost, I decide to remain true to myself." It takes a great deal of faith sometimes for us to be true to ourselves—it takes great works—and great courage.

DO YOU BECOME DISCOURAGED? In your opinion, is your life not worth living? Do you want to give up? What would you have done if you had been the American captain of the isolated group of soldiers in the Battle of the Bulge? These men were tired, hungry, miserable in body and spirit. They had been fighting for days; they had withstood the worst the Germans were able to give them with bomb, cannon, and machine gun, from the air and from the ground. They were surrounded by the enemy. But when the Germans sent a message, asking the Americans to surrender, that captain's one word answer will be remembered as long as men speak of faith and courage. Although his answer was sharp and to the point, his deeper feelings and thoughts on that day were probably these: "I have faith in the men under me and faith in my country; I can't lay down my arms and surrender." Are you saying, "I have faith in the gospel of Jesus Christ, and I can't let myself become discouraged despite conditions around me"? How is your faith today? Is it ready for the next test?

Latter Day Saints, since the organization of the church, have believed in a Christian community, where there are no rich, no poor, and where the needs of the people, both spiritual and temporal, are to be had by the faithful and pure in heart. In the year 1831, this revelation from God came through Joseph Smith, the prophet:

And thus saith the Lord your God, if you will receive wisdom, here is wisdom. Behold the place which is now called Independence, is the center place, and the spot for the temple is lying westward, upon a lot which is not far from the court house; wherefore it is wisdom that the land should be purchased by the Saints; and also every tract lying westward, even unto the line running directly between Jew and Gentile.

God, the Creator

BY EVAN A. FRY

Shortly after this revelation, the Saints started moving in to Independence. They bought lands, built homes, and established businesses. They came in large numbers. They established the first schools and the first printing press in Jackson County. But many of the new converts were overzealous in their beliefs. They were intolerant of the pioneers who had settled the land before them. They forgot they were living on the frontier of the west, where anything could happen and very often did. Trouble arose between the Saints and the early settlers, and the Saints were driven out; they were only a few of the many victims of those troubled times. Although they were driven from their homes in the winter with the few belongings they could carry with them, they had faith that they would return. Later came this promise from God: "Zion shall not be moved out of her place, not withstanding her children are scattered; they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritance; they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion." And so it has been. For the past fifty years, the children of those who remained and were faithful have been gathering to the center place and building up the waste places of Zion, saying in their hearts: "We have faith in this gospel and the hope of Zion, and we must tell our friends and our children about it."

AND SO THE YOUNG MAN of the prairie felt that because he had faith in the prairie, he could not leave it when his family and neighbors moved away to escape the swirling dust. He got a job from one of the farmers who remained; he worked hard and saved a few dollars. His employer let him farm seventeen acres on his own several years later. He prepared the soil

Hear ye the word which the Lord speaketh unto you, O house of Israel: Thus saith the Lord, Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them. For the customs of the people are vain; for one cutteth a tree out of the forest, the work of the hands of the workman, with the ax. They deck it with silver and with gold; they fasten it with nails and with hammers, that it move not. They are upright as the palm tree, but speak not; they must needs be borne, because they cannot go. Be not afraid of them; for they cannot do evil, neither also is it in them to do good. . . . But the Lord is the true God, he is the living God, and an everlasting king; at his wrath the earth shall tremble, and the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation. Every man is brutish in his knowledge; every founder is confounded by the graven image; for his molten image is falsehood, and there is no breath in them. They are vanity, and the work of errors; in the time of their visitation they shall perish.—Jeremiah 10: 1-5, 10, 14, 15.

SINCE TIME IMMEMORIAL, idolaters have made one quite unreasonable mistake in logic. They take wood or stone or metal and fashion an idol to which they ascribe deity and life and power superior to their own. They value the creature more highly than the creator. They believe that the thing they have made—the thing which cannot even stand alone without being propped up or nailed, the thing which has not even the power of locomotion without man's help—is superior to themselves, the creators of it. Jeremiah says: "Be not afraid of them; for they cannot do evil; neither is it in them to do good." Without man, and the power and intelligence and direction of man, nothing he has created has the power to harm him. Men have to start every machine, put together every chemical formula, guide and direct every process, before anything which is either beneficial or harmful to them may be created by them. A machine may injure a man, but not until someone starts it. An automobile may kill a man, but not until someone drives it or fails to control it as he should by setting the brakes when it is unattended. A gun can kill, but not until someone moves the trigger.

MAN HAS MADE a great many things—not in the shape of himself—which in some sense of the word are idols, because they are things on which he depends for protection, for strength, for prosperity.

May we mention only one or two to establish what we mean by example. Some men have set up money as their god; they have increased the supply of paper currency on the theory that with plenty of paper money, they could enter the promised land. And that god failed. People found they had to carry a suitcase full of money to buy a postage stamp and a truckload to buy a meal. The French people not so many years ago built the famous Maginot Line, and so sure were they that it would protect them that they sat back to eat, drink, and be merry. That god failed them too. The latest, most popular idol men have set up in our day is the atomic bomb. I believe there is some danger lest we regard it as the French regarded their Maginot Line, and an equal danger lest we begin to fear it as the people of Jeremiah's day feared the idols or gods they had made.

Let us get this straight in our thinking: the atomic bomb in and of itself is nothing to be afraid of. It cannot hold itself upright without props or nails; like the idols scorned by Jeremiah, it must needs be borne, because it cannot go. You can combine it with a guided missile, as recent press reports insinuate has been done, but the bomb can't do it by itself. Alone, it cannot do evil, nor can it do good. It is absolutely and completely dependent on its creator—man—for its being, its life, its power. It is man that gathers the material, puts it together, starts and guides and directs the trip to the target, and sets in operation the reaction that produces the explosion. Without man, there would never have been any atomic bomb; and unless some man initiates and completes the process, none will ever be dropped on another city. We need not then fear the atomic bomb, but the men who would use it.

THERE IS ANOTHER THING which we often and easily forget, however; although man controls the atomic bomb and all his other devilish and beneficent inventions and discoveries, God can control man. Just as the atomic bomb is the work of man's hand, man is the work of God's hand. Can the work say of him that made it, "He made me not"? Can the thing framed say of him that framed it, "He had no understanding"? Men have come to the place where they have such a high opinion of their own intelligence and skill and cleverness and power that they are saying to God, "We have no further need of you," and of God's laws, "We know how to defy those laws." And even some of our devout and God-fearing people have fallen into the pattern of thinking that looks with alarm upon the wicked devices of wicked men, and fear those men with a deadly fear, because they have forgotten that the creature cannot defy his Creator—that man, the thing made, cannot say to his maker, "I have no need of thee."

Unfortunately, many of us in these troubled days are developing a philosophy or an attitude of mind that says in substance, "With plenty of atomic bombs and airplanes and tanks and guns and trained men and submarines and battleships and aircraft carriers and bombers, we shall be safe." I call on you to examine the pages of history, which bear witness to the fact that every time this philosophy has been tried out and followed by godless, wicked men, it has resulted in their destruction.

Jeremiah, for one, observed this philosophy and wrote: "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man [and may we interpolate, in the fleeting things made by man] and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. . . . But blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is." Another wise man observed, "Unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

IN THIS WICKED and predatory world, I for one am not yet prepared to say that we should scrap all our battleships, planes, tanks, guns, guided missiles, and atomic bombs. But I do believe we are in desperate danger if we set them up as demigods, and depend on them alone for the protection of our nation, forgetting our own Maker and Creator who has power to remove any man from the scene and thereby render completely powerless the weapons he controls. We can be surrounded by a Maginot Line, covered with an umbrella of planes, protected by battleships anchored prow to stern along every inch of our coast, and lulled by a stock pile of atomic bombs as high as the Rocky Mountains—and still this nation will go down in destruction if we forget God, our Maker. The creature cannot say to the creator that it is now independent and free and strong to depend entirely upon itself.

For the same reason, we should not allow ourselves to become hysterical about the potential dangers of the atomic bomb or modern biological warfare to our civilization or our nation. We need not fear such things so long as we trust in God. All of these terrors depend on man for their creation, for their direction and control; and men depend on God. Whenever any man or any nation has forgotten God, that man or nation sooner or later has been swept off the face of the earth, and all its inventions and weapons and diabolical contrivances with it. "Why be afraid of a man that shall die," asks Isaiah, "and forget the Lord, who stretched forth the heavens, and laid the earth's foundations?" God is our maker. Certainly nothing we make can defy or overthrow him or those who trust in him.

Prayer of a Weary Pilgrim

Another day has ended, Lord,
And now to thee I come,
Though one day less on earth to walk,
I'm one day nearer home.

So little, Lord, to offer thee,
In word and thought and deed,
I pray thy tender mercy, Lord,
I only feel my need.

Help me to pray, "Thy will be done,"
To fully trust in thee,
Assured whate'er the morrow brings,
That thou wilt walk with me.

and planted nine dollars worth of seed he had purchased with his savings. That year he harvested a fair crop. The next year, he rented 140 acres. When the crop was ready to harvest, a severe hailstorm beat most of it into the ground. But the next year he started over again, because, you see, he had faith in the prairie and refused to let a hailstorm destroy that faith. In the 1940's, the rains returned, and those who had faith and remained started to reap a fortune. In 1947, John Krissy, the young harvest-hand of the dust bowl, planted 54,000 acres and harvested 1,750,000 bushels of wheat—a crop valued at $2,700,000. He showed his faith by his works.

We must remember that faith is an action word. Jesus tells us to ask, to seek, and to knock. We cannot seek without action; we cannot ask without prayer; we cannot knock without courage. To have Christian faith, we must take action. Faith without works is dead.

It Isn't Too Hard to Say,

"No, Thank You"

UNLESS you are a hermit, or someone so much like Al Capp's "Repulsive Jones" that you have no friends, you can never escape the necessity of making decisions on the liquor and tobacco questions. Sometime in your life, if it hasn't already happened a dozen times, somebody is going to invite you to have a drink, and do it in the kindest and most friendly way possible. You'd better get ready for it now.

If it were the devil himself, clad in sable cloak (in the manner of the Faust legend), the cloven hoof appearing below his neat spats, and a sinister leer on his evil lips, you would resist him with all the strength of a beleaguered soul. But it doesn't happen that way. It comes to you, usually, with a look of bland innocence on the face of a harmless appearing friend or fellow worker. The danger is just as great as if the arch-enemy himself were there—barbed tail, pitchfork, and tongue of flame.

How do you refuse such an offer when you really don't want to drink? Can it be managed without seeming to be a sissy priss, or giving offense?

A friend writes of her experience in an office, and tells how she managed to refuse and got away with it.

This was the first Christmas I have worked in a small office and was invited into the back room with the rest of them for a drink. I have worked in other offices, but they have always had larger staffs, and what I did was not as noticeable as where there are only six in the office.

You see, I don't drink, and I was wondering how I could get out of it gracefully; but I didn't expect the party to start so soon! It was only Wednesday morning, and Christmas was not until Saturday.

Well, they were beginning to go back into the little room and were asking me to come on back and have "one." I was frustrated and didn't know how to do what I wanted to do. I didn't want to go back into the little room, but how to get out of it was something else. I went out of the office, but I couldn't stay out all morning, so I decided to come back and face the situation. When they said, "Come on back and join the party," I simply said, "I'd rather not." They were very nice about it and didn't insist. It wouldn't have done them any good if they had, but of course it was easier this way.

I don't know why I'm different than they. I think it's because my parents are, and I know they want me to be. My church does not approve of drinking, and if my church disapproves, then God must. First of all, I want to do what would please Him.

Christmas is the birthday of his Son, and I want to celebrate it in the right way. My idea of the right way is to do things that would please Him. My husband and I always like to clear our tithing up for the year just before Christmas. By doing this, it seems as though we are doing something for the One whose birthday we are about to celebrate. We really aren't giving him a gift, however—only paying a debt which we owe. It gives us a good feeling to take some of our money and pay our tithing—when we take so much of it to buy gifts for ourselves and others. He asks for so little in comparison to what he gives.

I really don't mind sitting alone in the outer office. I don't mind going to lunch alone and letting the others go out together (I know they will be having drinks again before they eat). I honestly do not care! I don't feel I am missing anything!

And if by missing these things that don't count, I can keep from missing the things that do, is it not better? We should realize that if we do the things which would make God happy, he can make us happy—and he wants to. It seems to me that it is wiser to try to please God, who has so much to offer us, than to try to please anyone else. What does man have that compares with what God has to offer?

So, I find that I'm glad I am different! Not being able to join "the gang" doesn't bother me in the least. Perhaps I'm just not tempted as much as some, but I hope

I can always be strong enough to resist those things which are worldly, and which I feel are not appropriate for the occasion we have just celebrated.

Whether you say, "No, thank you," or "I'd rather not"—or whatever you say to keep from accepting the poisoned cup—hardly matters. You can say it without preaching, without condemning others, without involving yourself in an argument. It is simply a matter of your personal preference and your decision. And very often, if you are clear and firm but kind about the matter, you will find, as our correspondent found, that people will respect your decision and abide by it.

Have you tried saying, "No, thank you," or "I'd rather not"? It isn't hard to do, and it works like a charm.

Now, and Then

"The age in which we live should be distinguished by some glorious enterprise, that those who have been so long oppressed may, in some period of their lives, know what it is to be happy. This unfortunate generation has already paid its just tribute to misery. What calamities has it not suffered? Many have perished in the bosom of their country; others have been obliged to wander with their wives and children through inhospitable lands.

"Let the leaders contrive to put an end to our present troubles. The treaties of peace are insufficient for their purpose; they may retard, but cannot prevent our misfortunes. We stand in need of some more durable plan, which will forever put an end to our hostilities, and unite us by the lasting ties of mutual affection and fidelity."

This quotation is not from Walter Lippmann, Raymond Swing or Dorothy Thompson, but from the Panegyricus by Isocrates, who lived in 400 B.C.

Worthy Conservations

BY B. MILDRED NELSON

Address Given at the Women's Conference Class

A CONSERVATION is the act of protecting, guarding, preserving, preventing loss of or injury to an object, a person, or a unit. That's easy. But when one puts with that definition the word worthy, it brings into the picture the entire area of decision-making, of choosing, of evaluating. What are the things that are of real worth? What are the conditions, the results we should expend efforts to preserve, to protect, to guard, to prevent their loss or their injury?

In discussing the subject with a friend who is primarily interested in the sociology of the family, I found his first reaction was that perhaps the family unit should take precedence, since it is everywhere showing evidence of decay. But as we thought further about the subject, we began to realize that preservation alone is of little consequence. There is no reason to preserve or protect the form of a home, the form of a government, even the form of a church, unless that form serves some useful and worthy purpose. There is no reason to protect time or energy or money unless it is used in accordance with our stewardship.

Our purpose as women of the church has been stated every time we have met during this Conference. I need spend no time trying to impress upon you the enormity of the task to which we have been called. It is great—sometimes so great that it stupifies us.

FREQUENTLY OUR REACTION is that of the woman who left home for a week to care for a sick friend. She left a busy husband and three lively children behind. Upon her return, the house was a mess. Newspapers were scattered promiscuously over the furniture; dishes were piled unwashed in the sink; beds were unmade, crumbs littered the floor; dust covered everything as a mantle. Our lady wandered through the house a little dazedly, looking for one clean spot. There simply was none. With a deep sigh she cleaned off one chair, sat down and knitted a washcloth.

Often the great task before us appears so stupendous that it becomes intangible. It blinds and frightens us. We can see no place in which to start; so we, too, sit down and knit a washcloth!

Now relaxing with a washcloth once in a while is just good business. In the case of our story, it probably gave our lady a chance to calm down a bit. Perhaps it prevented an explosion, conserved the family unit, and may have warded off an ulcer. We must relax once in a while if we are to work effectively the rest of the time.

But when we sit down in the midst of our great task to relax with a "washcloth," we must be certain first that it is a well-chosen, nicely designed washcloth, and second that we do not find the knitting so satisfying we forget to clean up the house.

You know the "washcloths" with which you relax. Perhaps one is the reading of stories that regale one with laughter as those in Thurber's Carnival, "The Night the Bed Fell on Father," "The Night the Ghost Got In," "The Dog That Bit People." Perhaps it's beautiful poetry or prose which, for the moment, transports you beyond reality into a world of forgetfulness, recreation, and new vision. Maybe it's actually knitting or crocheting. It might be a good radio program and we won't attempt to define good. It could be figuring the family finances. Possibly it's shopping (by window or pocketbook), a hobby, keeping a beautiful house, serving a lovely meal, caring for the children, or even working in the local women's department.

Each activity is good in itself, and some I highly recommend. The difficulty arises when we become so engrossed in "knitting washcloths," so involved in one phase of our lives which we enjoy that we use the activity as a means of rationalizing our inertia and forgetting about the rest of the work that should be done.

The needle of our lives all too frequently revolves in one narrow groove of the record from which should come the sweet harmony of the symphony of abundant living. We let it go 'round and 'round and 'round sometimes for the sheer joy of doing the thing we think we like, little knowing how much more complete would be our happiness if we could hear the entire symphony. Sometimes we do it because we like the sense of martyrdom we get from limiting our lives. Sometimes we do it because it helps us escape the frustration that might come with facing a great task squarely. Always it means procrastinating the larger tasks—the tasks that when tackled and completed would put aright the disordered house and bring abundant living.

We know full well we must develop a quality of righteousness and spirituality in our homes and branches that exceeds anything which we have yet experienced or achieved. Had we already realized those qualities Zion would be. And it is in our homes that we learn the art of living together and thus prove the gospel practical.

WHERE DO WE START? We started W ages ago. Dr. Link tells us that one of the best ways to be certain we have a good chance to live three score and twenty years is to start a few years before we are born, advertising for parents who have come from a family that lives long and well. So, too, it is an indisputable fact that our "choice" of a home into which to be born is of great import in the kind of a home we in turn establish. Children of happy marriages have a much better chance for happy marriage than children who have not had the privilege of loving and seeing love manifest continuously.

Perhaps it is love which is lacking in our homes and branches and has deterred our spiritual development. Perhaps it is faith or knowledge or strength we lack. One need which we most readily recognize, it seems, is the need for more time. No one of us ever has quite enough time in this busy world to do all the tasks, enter all the activities in which we need and want to engage. It just isn't possible. And because it isn't possible, we may have to establish some standards by which we choose the ways in which we shall spend our time. If more time would make possible the accomplishment of all the many worthy tasks and activities from which we excuse ourselves because we have not the time, perhaps it is one element which, being of real worth, deserves our protection, our efforts to prevent its loss or injury.

LET'S LOOK at the women's program in our branches and take a couple of "for instances." First of all, there are meetings. Maybe we are spending too much time in meetings—just for the sake of having meetings. I know we have been commanded to meet together often, but it is also true that the "purpose of the church is not to keep people busy. Its purpose is to serve." There is no excuse for any meeting that is not designed to fulfill a real need of the people who are to attend it. That doesn't mean we should stop having meetings. Rather it means we should start making meetings really worth-while. No meeting should ever be planned unless the planning has been predicated upon the question, "What is the need of this people?" And we're very clever people indeed when it comes to hiding our most severe needs. Only God knows what the real needs of the people are. Since only he knows, to plan intelligently means that we must ask him to supplement our intelligence with divine dictation.

Meetings that are worth the time they take are not the full responsibility of the leader. Your response may make or break a meeting for you and for others. When we give close attention, responding intelligently and without prejudice, to the leadership of a speaker or teacher, it is often surprising how much we learn and are inspired; there is nothing like an appreciative audience to stimulate a speaker to really give his best.

It is much easier for us just to have meetings than it is to accept responsibility for those who attend or should attend those meetings. It's very easy for us to say, "We provided the meeting. If she didn't come, it's her own misfortune." It might be wise for us to take some of the time that would otherwise be spent in meeting to examine the meetings we do have. If a member does come, does she get the food that feeds a hungry soul or eases the burden of a weary body or mind? Perhaps it would be better to use that time visiting her home. Maybe she's ill. Maybe a baby is expected. Maybe she's alone, afraid, in trouble. Perhaps she doesn't know anyone cares. Maybe she doesn't know the church has anything to offer. Fortunately, friendly visiting is a definite program of the women's department. Remember, the friendly visiting program does not limit that friendliness to those designated as leaders.

When every meeting is designed under divine guidance to feed those who attend, when every person who attends a meeting goes with the purpose of giving as well as of getting, when we who attend meetings love each other enough to assume the responsibility of carrying on beyond just a meeting, then our meetings will become worth the time we spend on them. They will cease to be "washcloths" and become a part of the larger task that is ours to do.

THE DINNERS we serve and the bazaars we hold may well be two other phases of our women's work which we should examine to see whether they're worth our time. I am not opposed to dinners or to bazaars; they promote sociability, they give good experience, and I don't know what we'd do without them until a few more of the people who call themselves children of God assume their stewardship responsibilities concerned with finances. But we can get so busy with feeding people and making money that we lose sight of the more important phases of our responsibilities as a part of the church of Christ.

No dinner should ever be served that does not have as its chief purpose furthering the fellowship of those who serve and those who are served. When we serve dinners, to make them worth the time they take, we must bear in mind the fact that the dinner is not of primary importance. It is what happens to people that really counts. If the promotion of the oneness that must be a characteristic of Zion is ever uppermost in our minds, then our dinners and bazaars may be worth the time we give them. Even then we must plan in such a way that the women, too, get rich spiritual food. Women cannot live by bread alone, either. All too often we find ourselves busy in the kitchen with Martha when we should be sitting at the Master's feet with Mary. I think we do it because we take pride in satisfying the gustatory whims of our menfolk. Somehow we've come to believe that a generous and delectable Sunday or near-Sunday meal is the only type that will please them. If that's what the men want when they meet together, it's about time we take a hand in educating them. Their Doctrine and Covenants reads just as ours does: "And on this day—let thy food be prepared with singleness of heart, that thy fasting may be perfect" (Section 59, paragraph 4).

People truly in tune with the Spirit of God are willing sometimes to subject their physical needs and wants to discipline for the sake of dearer food. I have experienced the blessings that come on such occasions. You have experienced them also. How much more often those rich spiritual experiences could be ours if only we were willing to train our physical appetites to serve us rather than master us!

OUR REGULAR HOUSEHOLD DUTIES should come in for their share of scrutiny with respect to the conservation of time. Often these duties keep some of us from participating in either meetings, dinners, or any other church or community activity. They keep the rest of us from giving the services we would like to render.

Housekeeping is very important. Homemaking is vastly more important. A part of homemaking is reaching outside the home—meeting people, enlarging interests, being one with the family. To do a good job of homemaking may require that the homemaker learn new and quicker ways of housekeeping that will give her the time necessary for more important activities. She may have to learn to wash dishes once a day, if there are enough to last that long, and some place to stack them neatly away after they are rinsed—be sure to rinse them after every meal, and dry the silver, too. Certainly washed with the new detergents and rinsed properly with hot water, glass, china, and pottery dishes should be allowed to air dry. Never contaminate them with a towel. It's lots faster and much more sanitary the new way.

Make your own pastry, biscuit, muffin, gingerbread mixes and have them always ready at a moment's notice. Use your freezer to save hours in the kitchen.

When you prepare vegetables for cooking, use a good scrub brush freely, a paring knife sparingly, if at all. The food will be better, the task less than half as long.

Make a good chopping board and chopping knife standard equipment in your kitchen and see the tasks of making salads and chopping vegetables for cooking become one of almost unbelievable speed and enjoyment. Use both hands when you work. One may be awkward at first, but it can be trained.

Use a pressure saucepan for quick meals that usually take a long time to prepare. It's like a game. The pot roast, vegetables, meat, and all cook while you set the table and make the salad. If you have handled it properly, there are as many or more vitamins left in the food as there would have been by any other method of cooking.

Use attractive place mats at the table—plastic ones you can wipe clean with a damp cloth if you like—and paper napkins to save hours of laundry. Use beautiful linens sometimes, surely, but gracious living and courteous table etiquette can be taught without all the laundry that their constant use requires.

Get a few pieces of the right equipment for the jobs that must be done. Have really good knives, one for paring and coring, one for slicing meats, one for breads, one for chopping. Build a wide ironing board on which to iron flat work and men's shirts if you don't have an ironer. Learn to use the attachments for your sweeper and your sewing machine, the deep well and broiler of your range. Plan and arrange the furniture, especially that in the kitchen, to save steps and hours of labor.

Take a few minutes every morning to plan the work of the day so that it progresses step by step with as little backtracking as possible. You won't be able to follow your plan, but there will be enough of it practicable that it will pay big dividends.

Make habits of as many routine tasks as possible. Speed and efficiency will follow. You may even get so that you can do two tasks at once.

We could go on and on. I can't even suggest an exhaustive list of ways in which you may be able to save time. To really show them to you in such a way that you would learn them would take hours more. But if I can stimulate you to begin to know about them enough that you'll go back and search out those who can teach you, I shall have accomplished much. There is not one method of time-saving which I have mentioned that is not included in some lesson taught by one of the specialists in our office at Ames. I'm certain that extension services in other states, Alaska, and Hawaii offer similar materials. If they don't, your school home economist might like to earn an extra few dollars now and then giving you a night lesson. Hire her. The time you'll save may well be worth many times her fee.

Housekeeping should be well done, but it should leave time for the larger tasks—being a companion to one's husband, to children and friends, teaching love and respect for others, for God and for fellow men by visibly practicing it, making it possible for young people to share their home with others, helping the very young to assume responsibilities that give the feeling of really belonging in the family, recognizing family and time as parts of this vast stewardship of ours over which we reign for such a short while.

TIME IS A PRECIOUS POSSESSION, worth guarding, preserving, protecting. Just as we must expend the soil to reap benefits from it, so, too, we must expend time if it is to enrich our lives. It's the way in which we spend them that determines whether we condition them to continue to produce effectively for us and for future generations. Often we find we can spend time most wisely if we make a budget of it, then make a habit of spending it according to that budget. It may even be wise to keep accounts to learn where the leaks are; for time, too, is a part of our stewardship.

Time is the stuff of which life is made. Guard it well. Spend it wisely. Truly it is a worthy conservation!

We know there are only twenty-four hours in a day, so we don't often expect God to grant us more time from sun to sun. But we have somehow fallen into this complacent attitude, "He who gave me this task to do will give me strength to do it." Sometimes we add a bit petulantly, "If he doesn't, it's just his hard luck. He'll lose my services."

Maybe God will give added strength under certain circumstances and under certain stresses, just as he sometimes inspires the minds of our ministry on occasions to give expression to ideas they had never known to be true. But just as those inspirations usually come after much thought and prayerful preparation, so, too, the energy to complete the task usually comes when we comply with the laws that govern the increase of strength. We know energy comes in our list of worthy conservations, and I think we could list it among our stewardships. We have been given the capacity for energy and knowledge enough to make it possible for all of us, with the exception of a few who are physiologically defective, to have energy in abundance. To have it, though, requires some compliance with law.

That which we have must be expended according to plan in such a way that we do not dissipate it unnecessarily. All too many of us are like the woman who never thought her house was clean unless her back ached.

Last year as we toured Iowa, displaying various methods of saving labor and energy, I was amazed at the number of times women and men pooh-poohed the idea of sitting down to iron and to peel potatoes as unworthy of their consideration because it was so easy that it would indicate laziness on their part. Well, it isn't an evidence of laziness for one to spare herself at her household tasks. It's just good common horse sense. All the extra energy that's left may then be channeled into happy family relations, really good times, worth-while activities that contribute materially to our avowed good in life.

Almost all the devices we mentioned as time savers are also energy savers. There are many others. Sit down when you work as often as you can. It takes almost a fourth more energy to stand than it does to sit. If, at the end of the day, you find your energy only three fourths gone instead of completely used, you can think of worth-while ways to spend the rest of it with your family doing things that are fun.

Make your ironing board adjustable so that it may be made just the right height for you, sitting or standing. Build a lap board that pulls out from a table or cabinet to fit just above your lap so that you may sit to peel, chop, and prepare foods. Adjust the heights of working surfaces so that perfect posture may be yours. You'll feel much less tired at the end of the day.

Plan the workroom for laundry, cleaning, and canning, on the first floor instead of in the basement if you have the chance to choose. It takes almost two times as much energy to walk down a stairs than it does to cover the same distance on the level, and nearly four times as much to walk back up the stairs. Each trip down and up the stairs, even empty handed, will cost six times as much of your energy as would have been expended in walking the same distance on one floor level. There'll be fewer accidents, too.

Learn how to lift. Squat beside the load and lift it close to you. Let your knees and leg muscles do the work instead of your back. Carry heavy loads on your shoulders or head instead of extended in front of you or balanced on one hip. There will be fewer chiropractic and osteopathic adjustments needed if you will and, again, fewer accidents. Use long, sweeping, graceful motions instead of short, choppy, fluttery ones; they take less energy and give you a sense of grace and well-being that carries through all your activities.

THE WAYS of saving energy are numerous, but before we can save it, we must acquire or maintain it. We must sleep. It's a physical need which none of us can ignore and still maintain our energy at a point high enough for efficient performance of our everyday tasks.

Often we attribute the wise saying, "Early to bed, early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise," to Benjamin Franklin. But did you know that God, too, found the subject of sufficient importance to warrant his admonition to us concerning it? Section 85, paragraph 38, of the Doctrine and Covenants is a definite part of the Scriptures to which we should pay especial attention. We find the instruction, "Cease to sleep longer than is needful; retire to thy bed early, that ye may not be weary; arise early that your bodies and your minds may be invigorated." And in section 119, paragraph 9, "Take sleep in the hours set apart by God for the rebuilding and strengthening of the body and mind; for even now there are some even among the elders, who are suffering in mind and body, who have disregarded the advice of the Spirit to retire early and to rise early that vigor of mind and body should be retained."

To sleep well requires a clean conscience, a healthy body, and an untroubled mind. Physical relaxation and wholesome faith are two of the prerequisites. The source of our energy is in our foods. We can neither expend nor maintain something we have not. To give our bodies a chance to fulfill the purpose of their creation we must eat properly.

Somehow the people of God have always been concerned about the quality of performance of the physical forces which constitute a part of their steward-

LEICESTER

I believe I preached the first gospel sermon in Leicester and also in Norwich for the Reorganized Church. I often made my stand in a street called Humberstone Gate, right in front of the Secular Hall (a place where the Atheists met). Sometimes the people from this hall would be in the crowd and ask catch questions, but God stood by my side, and my answers were too much for them. On one occasion, they invited me to visit with them in their refreshment room. I willingly consented, but during our conversation, they were confounded with my answers. I told them that such things as we can see above the handiwork of man—the sun, moon, and stars—could not come by chance; some power made them and set them in the firmament, and man could not do that work. I told them that God—the great creator, the supreme being, the wise designer and maker of heaven and earth, the all-powerful, should be worshiped. I left my testimony with them.

The men in the shop where I worked would often seek my counsel on doctrinal points. One day they were talking about sinning against the Holy Ghost and, becoming somewhat confused, they decided to have me settle the matter. I listened to what they had to say and then asked, "How did you receive the Holy Ghost?" knowing they could not sin against it unless they had received it. I then showed to them from the Scriptures how the Holy Ghost was given, calling their attention to the Acts of the Apostles 2:38 and 8:17. They were much alarmed at these scriptural references, but closed their eyes to the truth. I was still in my twenty-first year and continued to preach in the streets of Leicester.

NOTTINGHAM

About a year later, in 1886, I went to Nottingham, which was about thirty miles away, where there was a small branch of the church, and had my name enrolled there, removing it from the records of my home town, Stafford. Nottingham branch was organized on February 22, 1885, by Elders Thomas Taylor, C. H. Caton, and George S. Greenwood of the Birmingham District. Elder W. Shepherd was president of the branch; Brother A. Wibberley, priest; Brother George Cope, teacher and secretary; and Brother W. Coxon, deacon. While I was at Nottingham, I continued working as priest and baptized five young sisters into the church. There was a Mr. Wright who was lame and had to walk with a supporting stick. Just before going into the waters of baptism, he said to his wife, "Missus, if there is any truth to this work, after I am baptized I will be able to throw my stick away." After baptism Brother Wright did hurl his stick across the street, and his wife picked it up and carried it home.

A BRANCH IN LEICESTER

After two months in Nottingham, I decided to return to Leicester to work again at my trade as a knife forger. I continued to tell the gospel story to all I came in contact with. Some time later a few Saints came from Nottingham to Leicester to live; they were Brother Henry Pearce, Sister Wright, and her daughter, Polly. So we were able to have our little meetings in the Saints' homes and invite our friends to come and meet with us. We baptized several until we had sufficient members to organize a branch; I baptized the first member in Leicester in April, 1888.

I attended a service at the Methodist church one Sunday afternoon and, being asked to take part, I gave a short talk. At the close of the service, a man came to me and said he would like to hear more of this gospel. He became so interested that he attended our meetings and later joined the church. The neighbors could not understand what had made such a change in the family, for he began to dress more respectably, and bought for his wife a new dress and hat—which was something she had not had for years. The gospel certainly picked this man up out of the gutter, and the family was made happy.

One day I came in contact with another man who was a leader of a mission. He came to hear me preach and finally believed, but still held to his mission. One day he said: "Mr. Ecclestone, I believe you have the truth, also the right to baptize, and I want you to baptize me." He had a mission with a membership of about seventy persons. I wondered why he came to me, as we numbered only about six or eight, and he had never asked me to preach to his company at the mission. So I felt led to ask him what he intended to do if I did baptize him. "Oh," said he, "I will go back to my mission." I replied, "Now, Mr. Robinson, if I baptize you, I expect you to be with this church, and labor for the same, and teach the same gospel as you have heard me preach. Only on these conditions can I baptize you." But this he was not prepared to consent to, and I did not baptize him.

EVIL ENTERED IN

Soon after this experience, one of our brethren became acquainted with a man in this city who wanted to be baptized, so we baptized him. I was at this time boarding with one who knew the man we had just baptized. An hour after the baptism, while eating dinner together, my fellow boarder said to me, "William, I hear you are on friendly terms with Simons, and I would like you to know that the woman he is living with is not his wife; his real wife lives elsewhere." This came as a great shock to me, and my heart was made sad to think I had taken down into the water that morning a man who was living in adultery. I wrote to the district president telling him of the circumstances, and we decided he should not be confirmed.

Soon after this experience, Satan seemed to enter in among the members of the branch because we did refuse to allow this man Simons a place with us in the church. We became divided and met in separate meeting places for some months. But a little later, all seemed ready to meet together again and be a united band of Saints.

MARRIAGE AND HOME

About this time I began to think a home of my own would help me care for the new responsibilities now placed upon me. I had become acquainted with a young sister in Birmingham, whose name was Frances Charlotte Munslow, and after some months of correspondence and exchange of visits, we decided to share with each other the responsibilities of life. So on March 30, 1891, we were married at the Old Edgbaston Church, Birmingham, England. We at once made our home in Leicester, which is forty miles northeast of Birmingham, and we continued in our church work.

In the same year, on September 27, the Leicester Saints were organized into a branch by Elders Thomas Taylor, C. H. Caton, and George S. Greenwood. We were to be known as the Leicester branch, and although I was a priest at the time, they elected me to preside over the group. I continued to work in this office until June 6, 1892, when I was ordained to the office of elder, remaining as president of the branch.

One man had an unusual vision while I awaited his joining the church. He said he saw the Book of Life in the hands of an angel, but could not find his name written there, but said he saw my name was written in that book. He said he saw me weeping and asked the angel why. The angel said, "He is weeping for love of you." Next day he wrote to me, asking for baptism, as he too wanted his name recorded in the Book of Life. This man was our faithful brother, John Thomas Norton, whom we baptized on January 3, 1892.

On January 14, 1892, a daughter was born to us whom we named Frances Charlotte. In the fall of 1892, J. W. Gillen, Senior, made a visit to Leicester, staying at our home while he held a series of meetings. I continued at my trade as a knife forger at the anvil until the summer of 1893, when I was requested by a firm in Leeds, Yorkshire, to go there to work.

A MOVE TO LEEDS

So with my wife and child, I moved to Leeds, which had a population of about 300,000. Here we were enrolled as members of the branch. There was quite a large number of Saints in this city, and they gave us a fine welcome. This is where we first met the Rushton family, and John W. Rushton, who was a priest at that time, was about nineteen years old. While in this branch, I continued to labor with my brethren among the Saints, and John W. Rushton accompanied me in the local missionary work at Ardsley, Lower Wortley, and Meanwood.

One night about nine o'clock, I was called upon to go to the home of Brother Bosomworth who lived at Lower Wortley; his children were all sick with the fever. On the way I called for Elder Dalley to accompany me, but found he was unable to go along. So I next called for Brother Seekins, who surprised me by saying he could not go as the case had been reported to the police, and we would get into trouble. A policeman happened to be staying at his home. I said, "Brother, if there were no one sick at Brother Bosomworth's home, we would have no need to go; but as they are sick, it is our duty to go; if you are unable to accompany me, I shall go alone." "No, Brother Ecclestone, you shall not go alone," he said, "I am going with you." By the time we arrived there, it was about 10:30 p.m. We found a pale form sitting by the fireside, and our hearts were touched with sadness. We prayed and administered to the little girl, and after comforting them, we made ready to leave. But Brother Bosomworth said, "No, Brethren, come upstairs; we have two boys who are sick, too." The boys looked as if dead, but we administered to both of them. Turning to one of them, I said, "Now, boy, you will soon be better, won't you?" He immediately smiled and said, "Yes." Two days later they were all up and playing, to the astonishment of the doctor and others who knew their condition.

On April 29, 1894, another daughter blessed our home; this one we named Alice Ada. May Elizabeth was born on April 21, 1896. While in Leeds, we did all we could to build up the work, and we have many pleasant memories of it.

RETURN TO LEICESTER

When Missionaries Heman Smith and James Caffall came to Leeds, they persuaded me to return to Leicester, as I was needed to take care of the work there. I was at that time contemplating a return to Norwich, but during the waiting period, I received a letter from a firm in Leicester asking if I would come to work for them, which I agreed to do. In April, 1898, we moved back to Leicester after being away five years, and we were well received. We found the branch in a somewhat disorganized state, but soon the district authorities came over and set it in order. I had, in the meantime, fully made up my mind not to be president of the branch, but two days before the meeting for the election of officers I received a vision. I thought I was in the company of two of the local elders, and we were riding on a streetcar (one of the old-fashioned steam cars). We seemed to be headed toward town. Suddenly I noticed we were slowing down, and turning to one of the elders, I said, "See, Brother, we are going to stop," but he refused to take notice. So I turned to the other brother and asked him if he would attend to the fire, but he too did not seem to pay any attention. So I threw off my coat, rolled up my sleeves, and began to do the necessary work which would set the vehicle in motion again. We soon seemed to move along nicely.

After this vision, I decided to occupy any place they asked me to in order to move along the work in Leicester. At the meeting for the election of officers, my name was the only one considered for the presidency of the branch, so I accepted that office. The other brethren of the branch did their work faithfully to aid the progress of the church.

On May 21, 1899, a son was born to us whom we named William Alexander.

PRESIDENT OF BIRMINGHAM DISTRICT

I remained as pastor of Leicester Branch until 1902, when the church, through Edmund L. Kelley who was at Leicester, selected me as one of the seven to go on a mission chiefly in the Birmingham District in England. At the same conference held at Summerfield, Birmingham, in the spring of 1902, I was elected president of the Birmingham District, also sub-missionary in charge of the district. I moved under these new assignments, visiting and preaching in the branches and villages and other small towns, and baptized four at Nottingham. It was a busy year for me in this new line of work, but a very joyous one, and I recall many happy experiences.

While thus engaged in missionary work, I was sent to Sheffield to assist Elder William H. Greenwood, our work being to visit every member of that branch and report our findings of conditions to the president of the mission. I was at Sheffield a little over a week, but my time in the mission field was very short (about eight months) chiefly because of the poor financial conditions then prevailing in the mission.

At this time my daughter, May, became seriously ill with diphtheria, which caused me to hurry home. She passed away January 14, 1903. Because of financial conditions, I felt the need to request my release from the mission field to support my family, and so returned to my former trade at Leicester as a knife forger. The muscles of my arms had grown tight; this caused me great pain as I endeavored to hammer the red-hot steel into shape upon the anvil. The doctor said there was not much difference between the condition of my arms as they were then and the pain from a broken arm.

GENERAL CHURCH LEADERS

Soon after returning home, I was again called upon to lead the Leicester Branch as pastor. The missionaries sent to England always found a welcome in our home, and in 1903, we had the pleasure of entertaining Brothers Joseph Smith, R. C. Evans, and John Rushton. At the time my wife was suffering with a very weak wrist, and was not able to cut and prepare the food. So before the three brethren left the house one morning, they administered to her. Before doing so, Brother Joseph anointed the wrist and wrapped it up with his handkerchief, then prayed to God that she might be healed of this affliction. I waited day after day to see if my wife had any more suffering, but I never did hear her complain again about her wrist. Truly Joseph Smith left a blessing and a testimony with us that he was a man of God

In 1904, when our son, William, was five years old, he took the measles, and we noticed in him a change for the worse. His eyes became set, and he seemed to be in a coma, so we hurriedly called the doctor. When he arrived and sounded the boy's back, he told us a solid mass had collected, and that he was in the last stages of pneumonia. He blamed us for not calling him sooner and said unless the congestion was removed before morning, he could not live. This was at 7 p.m. I at once called in Elder J. T. Norton, and we administered to him. The boy began to mend and by 10:30 we went down stairs to get some supper. While we were eating, we heard him call his mother, asking if he could come down stairs and have something to eat. By morning he was better, and we could not keep him in bed, so I wrapped him in a blanket and held him on my knee by the fire. I had him in this position when the doctor arrived. On finding him out of bed, he asked, "Whatever are you doing with the boy out of bed? He was so ill I did not expect to see him alive this morning." I replied, "It is not a question of what I am doing, but what I am compelled to do, as we are not able to keep him in bed." After he had examined the boy, he was so surprised to find him free of pneumonia that he wondered how it came about. To God only could we give the praise for his tender mercy to us. This was indeed another remarkable case of healing.

Throughout the years we had meeting rooms at 27a Loseby Lane, one on Welford Road near the Welford Place, and one in the Tower Buildings near the Clock Tower. I tried hard to fulfill my duty right up to the time when we left Leicester for America in August, 1920. I was president of Birmingham District for over thirteen years, and was pastor of Leicester Branch close to thirty years. I baptized about thirty souls into the church while in Leicester, and a total of about fifty souls throughout the British Mission. I was ordained to the office of high priest at the mission conference which was held at Manchester, August 6, 1916, under the hands of Apostle U. W. Greene, George W. Leggett, and Thomas Jones. We sailed from Southampton, England, on August 12, 1920, on the liner, "Finland," and arrived in New York City on August 21. During our crossing, I was able to have a good conversation with a Catholic priest. We journeyed on to Independence via Buffalo and Cleveland and arrived in St. Louis on August 23, 1920. We stayed there for the night at the home of Sister Rush Volz. We also had the privilege of visiting at the home of Brother and Sister Price while in St. Louis. We left there on Tuesday, August 24, 1920, and arrived the same day in Independence, Missouri, at 6:30 p.m.

ADDENDA

(By author's son, William A. Ecclestone.)

After arriving in Independence, William Ecclestone still continued to be active in church work and served in many capacities. For the first year here in Zion, he assisted Elder Arber in local missionary work in the Mount Washington area and vicinity. He was also supervisor over several different groups in the Stone Church area for many years, and for about eight years had charge of the prayer services at the church. He used most of his spare time in visiting the Saints, and his notebooks bear record of numerous visits. One of his favorite "hobbies" was to seek out those Saints who had become "careless and indifferent" toward the church and their souls' salvation. In this arduous task, he was most successful in "reclaiming" many to the church who would otherwise have been lost.

When Elder William Ecclestone resigned from group work in October, 1941, he sent the following letter to the

First Presidency:

Dear Brethren,

As supervisor of district number six in the Stone Church area, I feel the time has now come for me to relinquish or resign from further responsibility. For nine or ten years, I have worked joyfully and faithfully to carry out this duty for the good of Zion. As my strength will permit, I shall always be found doing my bit to encourage the Saints to right living and faithfulness. I am now in my seventy-seventh year. I joined the church fifty-nine years ago, was called to the ministry three months later, and was always found at my place of duty without fail throughout my various callings, both in my home country and in America. I shall always be found ready to do all I can until the summons home be heard.

Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM ECCLESTONE.

William Ecclestone passed away at the Independence Sanitarium on September 30, 1944, after one week's illness. Funeral services were held at Stone Church on October 3, 1944, with Apostle F. Henry Edwards in charge, assisted by Elder Joseph Bates. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery, Independence, Missouri.

In presenting this autobiography, I can truthfully testify to the great faith my father had in his Heavenly Father and of his wonderful testimony of the truthfulness of this work, also of the fortitude and courage he demonstrated in expounding the gospel of Jesus Christ. The Lord indeed did bless him with a strong body and an outstanding alertness of mind, which added greatly to the forcefulness and effectiveness of his ministry. Although he worked long hours (and worked very hard) behind the anvil as a knifemith most of his life, he was always found at his post of duty wherever and whenever he was needed. He was the president of the Leicester Branch in England for about thirty years, and president of the Birmingham District for about thirteen years, which necessitated much corresponding, visiting and traveling.

There are many interesting experiences which he could have included in his autobiography, but I have given only that which was found in his own handwriting in order to keep this manuscript original. I have endeavored to link together all of the many manuscripts and notes which have been found since his demise, and the only changes made were where errors occurred, or where I thought it necessary to add words tying in one manuscript with the other in order to make a full and connected life story.

I remember one night when three well-educated and determined Mormon elders came to our house, and in a discussion which lasted until 4 a.m., father was able, with the power of God, to both amaze and confound them. After a brief nap, he left for his employment at 6 a.m. I also remember the seemingly endless discussion with a Seventh Day Adventist, who lived next door to us; this man was also confounded at every turn of doctrine. As a boy of about ten years of age, I used to accompany my father in local missionary work around Leicester in the villages of Rothley, Whetstone, Lutterworth, and other places. Father would go down on one side of the street, and I would be on the other side, taking tracts from door to door and inviting people to come to Leicester and attend our meetings. At times father would preach in these villages while I would continue to give out tracts. Although my father's education was very limited, I have seen him many times confound men of learning, because of the great enlightenment he received through the Spirit. He has many times said in testimony, "Surely the Lord has been with me all the days of my life," and from what I can remember of his ministry, I can truthfully endorse his testimony, as I have never seen a man exercise such faith and courage as he did. I hope this autobiography will be the means of

The Highest Calling

BY ALTA DOUGHERTY

WHY ARE THINGS AS THEY ARE? Since our discovery, centuries ago, that we have intelligence, we have been asking ourselves this question. In our restlessness, we have been searching—searching for an answer that would bring a lasting contentment. We look at our social world and add to our first question by asking again—“How can we make it better than it is?”

Many a GI in World War II made a promise to himself and to his God that, were he spared, he personally would dedicate his life to bringing about a new society—idealistically, a social order in which all parts would be mutually dependent upon each other and, in this mutual dependence, there would be peace and contentment.

Now the time has come to keep that promise, but the finger of responsibility points not only to those who have already given so much—it points to you and me. It brings a challenge that far too many of us are shirking. Everyday someone says, “I have no responsibility. I owe nothing to this world.” Are we not guilty?

We have only recently awakened to the realization of the power that is given to us. From the beginning of time, there has been a force that has caused man to continue his quest to solve the mystery of life—the mystery of why things are as they are. The answers to many quests that began centuries ago are now being unfolded before us—the splitting of the atom, the miracle of flying, modern psychiatry. We hold in our hands the product of the work of centuries. Now who can say, “I have no responsibility, for I owe nothing!” The power of all mankind in all channels of the universe is ours—ours to use creatively in organizing a new world.

WE MUST LOOK to the One from whom this power has been given, the One who has been behind this restless searching, for our guid-

Alta Dougherty was born in Independence, Missouri, which has been her home all of her life. She was graduated from Graceland College in May, 1948, after taking a general college course. June 1 found her employed as secretary for the assistant to the manager of the Herald Publishing House. ance. We must look to our Maker for insight in integrating the different aspects of this power to form our single world.

Let us not stop in our endeavor to solve the mysteries of the universe but, as we go on, use the insight and power we now have. Let us use it to wipe out prejudice, self-satisfaction, and laziness—use it to arrest disease, crime, and poverty. These form the solid wall between society now and society as it should be. On the other side of that wall lies the brotherhood of all races; there a helping hand is extended to those behind, and there is useful work for all. Never again will we have the mental and physical illness, treachery, vice, and squalor that is caused by man's degradation. We have all heard stories from the great Book of all times about a city called Zion. If Enoch's city of old was a marvel of beauty in structure and in human understanding, think what is possible in the world today. With the knowledge that has been passed to us and with each day's new discoveries by courageous men and women, we have in our possession the capability of recapturing and surpassing that previously conceived city where “men lived in righteousness and were one of heart and mind, and there were no poor among them.”

UNREAL? Not at all if we accept the challenge. Not if we use whatever talents and abilities we have at our command. Doctor, journalist, musician, teacher, homemaker, laborer—all are called. Not if, in answer to the call, we start from the beginning and attempt to make our lives worthy of becoming an example. We should seek to so walk that the attitude and philosophy of our day-to-day life can be the means of helping others onward to higher planes of living. And it is not unreal if we realize the value of education—if we take our learning in all its phases and apply it in our lives.

Let us lift our eyes to see, open our minds to comprehend, and with a broadened perspective become the disciples of a progressive way of life that had its birth with the Son of God. Let us look to the future and place our hand in the extended hand of the Master, ready and will-

UNPREDICTABLE

BY DOREEN TRUDELL

YES, being human, I am unpredictable. Each day's activities and happenings bring to me situations in which I must react in one way or another, and usually each situation comes upon me or leaves me with a different feeling or mood. For these feelings and moods, I have many friends. Each friend has his particular place in my unpredictable make-up. Take, for instance, my friend Paul. Paul is a serious fellow who thinks deeply upon things that are of value and worth. I go to Paul when that drive or incentive for good and greater things becomes strong within me. What a grand experience this is to both of us! We will build a better world—a world with a true brotherhood.

But, being unpredictable, I may want to be frivolous and laugh and make merry. Now let me see, who can share this mood with me? Why, Dick, of course. And what a happy time we have! There seems to be nothing better than a hearty laugh to make the world seem right again. Yes, Dick and I will build a happy world—a laughing, joyous world.

We are told that "in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." At times, the heavens and the earth afford me much satisfaction and joy. A walk through the fields with a sharp eye and a keen ear brings me a feeling of humbleness, for I am so insignificant compared to all that is around me. At such times, I like Emily as my companion. She, too, has a deep sense of feeling for the beauty of nature.

ing to do our part for the salvation of man, remembering that though nothing worth-while is ever easy, and the climax of our efforts may come far too late for our mortal eyes to see, the light that shines from our goal will burn through all time to come and on into eternity.

This can be seen in her eyes. No, Emily and I do not talk on such occasions. We walk silently—reverently looking at the world about us that was given to us by God to do with as we choose. Emily and I will build a world of beauty in which there is a love and an awe for God.

Life brings many problems and sorrows with it. For these I need very understanding and loving friends. But God being all wise took care of this for me; he gave me an earthly father and mother. They understand and are always able to help me make the rough places smooth. Yes, I will build a strong world. My parents have given me a sure, firm, strong foundation upon which to build it.

But just as precious to me as these living friends are my silent friends and companions who stand by waiting to help at any of my unpredictable moments. These are my books. No matter what mood I find myself in, I can always go to them and find the help and companionship I need. Because of these silent friends, I will build a wiser world—one with wisdom, understanding, and knowledge.

In the words of the poet:

Three things life gives to me
Whatever else Fate may send.
My heart is filled with gratitude
For books, and trees, and friends.

Sparkle

He was very, very old, the farmer with whom I fell to talking, but his eyes still sparkled with an inward happiness. Finally I said, "I wish you'd tell me how you've kept the twinkle in your eyes."

At once he replied, "I make the most of all that comes and the least of all that goes."—Contributed by Esther Fishburn.

How About You?

ONE OF OUR FAVORITE CHURCH HYMNS is Number 292, which has to do with obedience to God. Beginning with "It may not be on the mountain's height, or over the stormy sea; it may not be on the battle's front, my Lord will have need of me," the song carries a refrain that enters into more articles on submission to the divine will than any other hymn we have:

I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord,
Over mountain, or plain, or sea;
I'll say what you want me to say, dear Lord,
I'll be what you want me to be.

Observing the ease with which so many church members sing the song and disobey its spirit, some unknown poet has penned the following lines. And if any of our readers can give us the writer's name, we shall appreciate it.

I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord—
Real service is what I desire;
I'll say what you want me to say, dear Lord,
But—
Don't ask me to sing in the choir!

I'll be what you want me to be, dear Lord—
I like to see things come to pass.
But—
Don't ask me to teach boys and girls, dear Lord—
I'd rather just stay in my class!

I'll do what you want me to do, dear Lord—
I yearn for the kingdom to thrive;
I'll give you my nickels and dimes, dear Lord,
But—
Please don't ask me to "tithe."

I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord—
I'll say what you want me to say.
I'm busy just now, with myself, dear Lord,
I'll help you—
SOME OTHER DAY!

ships. That concern must have been in David's mind when he sang, "I will go in the strength of the Lord." There is little doubt that it was in the mind of Daniel when he asked of the prince of the eunuchs, "Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days." Surely it was in the mind of God when he gave us instructions in these latter days not by commandment or constraint but by revelations and the word of wisdom, and I should like to turn to this latter day instruction with you now, for within it lies one of the keys to this worthy conservation—the conservation of the energy necessary for us to accomplish the task to which we say we have become converted. We'll start at the end. "And all saints who remember to keep and do these sayings, walking in obedience to the commandments, shall receive health in their navel, and marrow to their bones, even hidden treasures; and shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint; and I, the Lord, give unto them a promise that the destroying angel shall pass by them, as the children of Israel, and not slay them."—D. and C. 86: 3.

THINK OF ALL THE TIME we could use effectively if those promises were fulfilled in us. Think of all the achievements that could be ours if only we believed them enough to try them!

How many of you have spoken sharply to your children or to a friend because you were tired or nervous? How many of you have stayed at home from church or some other worth-while activity because you were "worn out"? How many times do you know that you should visit a friend, but you just don't have the energy? How often could you answer the questions of your children and your neighbors more satisfactorily if you had some of that hidden knowledge promised there? Where else on earth can you find such a promise so specifically given?

And what does it require of us to obtain fulfillment of those promises? We must give our bodies a chance. They must have the best balanced diets of the best foods that we can possibly obtain. The physical examinations that proved large portions of our young manhood unfit for military service also indicated that much of that unfitness came from bad eating practices.

To correct this deplorable situation, nutritionists, physiological chemists, and other qualified scientists throughout the country were called together. Their assignment was to devise some simple food plan which all the people of the United States might easily follow to make certain that such man power wastage need never happen again. The result was the basic seven food plans known as the National Food Guide.

It takes only a moment to compare the National Food Guide with the words of wisdom which fell from the lips of the prophet more than a century before it was devised—a century before much of the information on which it is based was known. Outlined in paragraphs two and three of section 86 is, without exception, the simple food plan which represents the best that science now has to offer. And that offering is of enough significance that nutritionists state without fear of contradiction that those who will actually use the foods as they should be used can become a superior people.

". . . And I, the Lord, give unto them a promise"! We have had the key to unlimited blessings all these years, but few have used it to gain entrance even to the store of energy for which we feel so great a need.

Truly these two—time and energy—are worthy conservations. They have been found worthy to receive the consideration of God himself. Surely they are worth the time and effort it takes for us to learn of them and practice them effectively.

Brethren:

Supplementing our telephone conversation this morning, I am enclosing the letter, together with check received from George E. Dennewitz. The letter is self-explanatory.

I received a great thrill as a result of this experience. It shows what could be accomplished along the line of personal evangelism if only a fraction of our membership would concern themselves with this phase of the gospel work.

I trust that you may be able to use the letter and check to good advantage, and hope that in the near future some of our representatives may be able to call on this prospect.

Yours very sincerely,
C. A. Skinner.

The check enclosed by Mr. Dennewitz was for $20. We have sent him a receipt and have arranged for one of the brethren to call on him. We sincerely trust that he will see his way to join the church, but even if nothing more happens than has happened so far, Bishop Skinner has had a happy experience, and in Mr. Dennewitz we have won a good friend.

strengthening the faith of the Saints, and that to our younger men of the ministry it will bring a greater incentive to stand fast courageously and fearlessly in the face of adversity and for the defense of this great work which we know is true. I trust that all who have read this life story enjoyed the experiences contained in it and sensed the enthusiasm demonstrated by my father all through his life, because he knew this was the true church of Jesus Christ upon the earth. Father often used in his sermons a quotation from the Scottish poet, Robert Burns, "Man's inhumanity to man has made countless thousands to mourn." Because he recognized this to be true in the world, it seemed to spur him on to do all he could for fallen humanity, as he disliked to see a man suffer an injustice. I personally feel I have been left a great heritage and consequently am endeavoring to do all I can to hold up the banner of righteousness and promote the cause of Christ.

Yours in Gospel Bonds,

A PERSONAL TESTIMONY

I add a word of personal testimony in confirmation of what our departed brother has related. It was a great pleasure for me to be associated with Brother William Ecclestone in church work in England. He gave much encouragement to some of us who were young and of tender years.

Always he was devoted to the church and gave the best he had for the advancement of the cause he loved.

Many times I enjoyed his company and the fine hospitality of his home. In England, wherever our brother labored, people who have known him bless his name.

He belongs to the elect group of those who loved God and demonstrated that love for him in service and to his fellow man.

The history of the Reorganized Church in England is enriched by the life and service of such men as our friend and fellow servant, William Ecclestone.

JOHN W. RUSHTON.

BULLETIN BOARD

Northeastern Nebraska District Conference

The Northeastern Nebraska District conference, which was to have been held in December, will convene January 15 and 16 in Omaha, Nebraska. There will be a dinner for members of the priesthood and their wives (single men may bring a friend) on Saturday evening at 7 o'clock. President Israel A. Smith and Apostle D. T. Williams are to be present.

ALBERT LIVINGSTON,
District President.

Personal Experiences Wanted

The editor of Stepping Stones would like for Saints throughout the church to send in experiences with permission to use them as story bases for use in Stepping Stones. True experiences of a spiritual nature and of a testimonial nature will be most appreciated. Since the publication is for boys and girls of junior and junior high age, those incidents about young people particularly will be welcome, though true experiences concerning any age are acceptable. Experiences besides healings are especially invited. Typical Latter Day Saint testimonies make good stories. The simplest experiences, the kind that Saints everywhere share in prayer and testimony meetings, are the ones being sought. In writing them, the author is asked to give as many details as possible. Some material might not be acceptable, of course. Such is to be expected in making a general plea such as this, but for the most part, sincere, coherent testimonies demonstrating the love of God and the experience of his children with him when they seek to obey him will be found acceptable. Send them to Editor of Stepping Stones, Herald Publishing House, Independence, Missouri. Saints living in Independence and wishing to share experiences may telephone the Publishing House, and an interview might be arranged.

take the power from the Almighty and the forces of righteousness and break forever the freedom of mankind. Satan is the leader of this vast army marching against God (Revelation 20: 7, 8). These nations are numbered as the "sand of the seashore for multitude." During the period of Lucifer's involuntary incarceration, previously mentioned, these nations will have apparently been immobilized as far as warfare is concerned. But Satan "goes out to deceive the nations . . . Gog and Magog to gather them together to battle." (Please note this Gog and Magog are nations, not leaders.)

This is the devil's last chance, and in his fury and desperation he determines to make the most of his demoniacal opportunity. Having tempted this last Gog, he brings him also to the slaughter—such a slaughter as no human hand will be lifted to turn aside. His war now is not against a weak humanity, but against a matchless and all powerful Divinity. God has determined to fight this last battle himself against his age-long enemy who comes himself to battle.

So the dramatic moment of decision, after these many centuries and millenniums, has come. "Gog and Magog . . . went out upon the breadth of the earth and compassed the camp of the Saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them."—Revelation 20: 8, 9. What an ending! What a slaughter! What a tragedy!

Result of Waring Against God

NOW WE ARE COME to the final result of all this waring against God and his truth—now comes the end of the fighting and also the fighters; the curtain is drawn at last upon such a scene of destruction as the world has little dreamed possible. The ultimate result of physical and spiritual death is in fulfillment of the sentiment, "They have sown the wind and they shall reap the whirlwind"—Hosea 9: 7. Not only have they been slaughtered in their bodies, they have been killed in their spirits.

And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night forever and ever.—Revelation 20: 10.

Thus ends in the last book of the Bible the vivid word picture of the great war which was started before the world was created. Satan is here punished for all his crimes against the angels of heaven and the men of earth. All through the vast panorama of human history, it has been the one objective of the enemy of God to take from mankind his most precious privilege—the right of self-determination.

Through it all, Satan has been the chief antagonist of God and of all good. The black nightmare of human contention, where man is led to kill, rob, browbeat, and enslave his fellow men—whether through Communistic or capitalistic interests—it has been the same war waged by the devil against all righteousness. It has been a Cain versus Christ, a Gog versus God.

And now has come the ultimate and fateful climax. As the first phase of the mighty struggle ended in heaven and Satan was cast out only to continue his fight here among men, so now the devil is to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone where he can no more deceive mankind nor pollute the nations of the earth.

God's Victory

It is now the day of righteous victory for the righteous forces of all time. This chant of the victorious multitude wings its way through the celestial courts above and reverberates from mountain and crag to the oceans and seas of earth:

Now is come salvation and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ; for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night.

And they overcame by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto death.

Therefore rejoice ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them.—Revelation 12: 10-12.

Thus will end in eternal disaster the efforts of all those who do what lies in their power to break the affectionate rule of God in the hearts of men. Thus, too, is God's purpose realized in the salvation of those who have been faithful to him and his Son, Jesus Christ. Jehovah's work will now be crowned with the glorious success anticipated by the sages and seers of all ages.

"This is my work and my glory," said the Father, "to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man."—Doctrine and Covenants 22: 23. God can bring this purpose into reality only by defeating evil and guaranteeing to all their free agency. Since Satan was determined to defeat God's purpose of giving men the right of free choice, God had no choice other than to bring about his fall from heaven and his ultimate defeat on earth with its attending disaster of banishment to the lake of fire and brimstone—complete separation from God.

Those who have espoused Lucifer's cause should expect no other treatment than that accorded him and their sinful and self-appointed earthly leaders. For in all this we see the challenge of Jehovah to unrighteousness. Here, too, is the way of right and Christ's promise to those who follow him:

"You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free," and, "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." Free forever!

LIFT THINE EYES

P. S.

Seek not for life here in this barren plain
Where man meets brother man with lifted sword,
Knowing violence. Once? No, these many times;
They pay no heed nor seek to hear
The chimes of peace.

Is there no hope at all for baffled men?
Must they go forth like robots once again?
They see no farther than these man-made prison walls,
Rising sharply on all sides to hem them in,
Shutting off escape to those therein
Who long to see beyond, where heaven calls.

These walls are only shadows of the fears
Which haunt men's minds.
To anyone who casts out fear
Is born a new horizon:
Mountains looming high to eastward,
Mountains touched with dawn glow in the east.

Lift thine eyes and see the mountain range,
Daring those who have their stomachs full
Of too much war and aftermath of hell.
A new day waits for those who see beyond
These paltry walls.
Lift thine eyes to these everlasting hills
And know that peace is near.

MARTHA FORD FLORO.

* A MISSION

Brother Earnest A. Webbe of Kirtland, Ohio, has been known for years for his devotion to the Word of Wisdom. In a New Year greeting we have just received, he writes, "No greater honor could have come into my life than a commission to teach this counsel to the benefit of the Saints." May we commend to the people of the church this splendid zeal and devotion. If all of us will give equal support to all the aspects of the gospel, the work of the church will go forward much more rapidly in the future.

* IN STRIDE

Telephone conversations produce interesting new sayings. We collected this one from Grace Pennell Tousley, Public Relations Counsel for the Independence Sanitarium: "What we want is something that will help us keep up with the Joneses and ahead of the Johnsons." And for that matter, the San is doing very well indeed.

* "IF I HAD TIME"

How often have you heard people use those words to begin some weak alibi for a failure? How often have you used them yourself?

Pause a moment, Brother, and Sister—you have time enough for this. Let's look at those words and see what they mean.

If you had time, you'd want to live a thousand years at least. Of course. Who would ever want to die, to give up the happy adventure of life, having new experiences, meeting new friends, seeing new places? And if life isn't a happy adventure, you aren't living.

Fate grants us no special privileges. It distributes time impartially to all: just enough for today, no more, no less. Time comes to us as manna from heaven came to the Children of Israel in the wilderness; they gathered what they could use for one day; any surplus would spoil.

We cannot save today's unused time for tomorrow; we cannot borrow tomorrow's time for today.

"If I had time" Remember, you have as much time as anybody else, in any given day. You have as much time as President Truman has, as much as Henry Ford or Thomas Edison had. YOU CAN'T INCREASE YOUR TIME, BUT YOU CAN PUT ON MORE SPEED.

When we look for time to accomplish important work, we expect to have it in long, uninterrupted periods of leisure. But life seldom grants us that boon. However, there are many little bits of time—ten minutes while waiting for supper, twenty minutes or more at another time, and so forth. These bits of time can be used to great advantage for work and study.

A busy New York man tired of wasting the time on the interurban train commuting to and from work. So he got a clip board and began writing. In a year he finished a novel and had it published. All this while other people just looked out the windows. You can read your Sunday school lesson in fifteen minutes. You can read a chapter in a book in the same time. You can plan a worship service, or work on some bit of handcraft in short periods of time. In the time that you and I waste or rest, other people would accomplish something fine.

We really have lots of time, if we would only learn to use it.

The Pastor

TWO MEN are of outstanding importance in the church today. One is the missionary, whose work is converting people to the gospel of Christ. The other is the pastor, who takes care of them after they are converted.

Our missionary training program is steadily expanding and improving, and has brought many able young men into this branch of church service, with splendid results both at home and abroad.

In pastoral and priesthood training, the church is now entering a new period in which the effort will be intensified, the literary resources expanded, and the number of men engaged considerably increased.

The First Presidency have recognized the need of the church, and have appointed Dr. F. M. McDowell to carry out a program, under their supervision, of education for the priesthood, which is being presented now. The first in a series of announcements will be found on page 12 of this issue, and we trust that all who are interested, and all who should be interested, will read the announcements carefully.

GOOD MEN can be found in almost every branch who can offer a fine prayer, preach a good sermon, direct a prayer meeting, or teach a church school class. The ability of such men is recognized in secular society, where they own and manage businesses and conduct professional work of a high standard.

Yet many such branches, having among their membership men of ability, are without effective pastoral leadership, except in the cases where the church can send a General Conference appointee.

But the cost of maintaining a man under General Conference appointment is very high now, and still rising. In one way or another, the branch that receives the ministry of a full-time pastor must expect to provide for his support. Only the larger congregations can carry this burden. Besides, most of the men under appointment are needed for traveling and supervisory work.

What is the answer to this problem? One answer is to enlist good local men in a training program that will qualify them to act as pastors to local congregations.

A CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS is going out to the church today. Good men are needed to take the training offered by the church now, in order that they may prepare for a better and more important service to the church.

To men who already have some experience in church work, as well to those who are taking their first steps in it, the priesthood training program offers great opportunities for development and service.

At some times we have found among the church membership an expressed idea that the time would come when our congregations would be led by trained, professional, full-time ministers. That possibility seems far away today, and it is undoubtedly fortunate for the church that this is so. A vital, expanding gospel evangel will always depend upon the power of devoted volunteers.

There are men and women who have learned, through the great experiences of life, to love God. They have found brotherhood in the Savior, Jesus Christ. They cannot give full time in service to the church, but they can give part-time service, and sustain themselves, without cost to the church and its people. It is among these good people that the church finds its volunteers.

SPECIFIC KNOWLEDGE AND ABILITY are required of the successful pastor. Note that we said, "the successful pastor." He can acquire this knowledge and ability from his own experience, or he can obtain help from study. Usually a combination of both study and experience is best.

The good pastor may or may not be an able preacher. But he must, first of all, be a godly, sincere, righteous man who loves his people. He should be a fair organizer, able to look ahead and plan programs for the spiritual development of his congregation. He should be adept in getting along with people and in solving the problems that inevitably arise.

Almost anybody could be a pastor if there were no problems or difficulties. Misunderstandings, difficulties, and situations are bound to come up as long as people, even Christians, are human. The good pastor must be able to meet them as they come. If he is untrained and inexperienced, he will be upset many times. If he knows what to do, he can protect the church and save himself. That is the object, in part, of the program of priesthood training now offered.

THE BLESSINGS OF GOD are given in rich abundance to those who serve him in the work of the church. Who can tell, unless he has known through personal experience, how great a part those spiritual blessings and rewards play in the lives of men who have given years of volunteer service? It cannot be described. It can only be lived.

The building of God's kingdom will require the labor of many hands, the devotion of many hearts, the thought of many well-informed minds. Some of these may be giving full time to church work. Many more will not. Some of our ablest ministers are those who know life, as well as religion, from firsthand

The Aaronic Priesthood in

GOD HAS PLACED in the church two priesthoods, and he has differentiated between them in these words:

There are, in the church, two priesthoods; namely: the Melchisedec and the Aaronic, including the Levitical priesthood. . . . The power and authority of the higher, or Melchisedec priesthood, is to hold the keys of all the spiritual blessings of the church. . . . The power and authority of the lesser, or Aaronic, priesthood is to hold the keys of the ministering of angels, and to administer in outward ordinances—the letter of the gospel—baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, agreeably to the covenants and commandments.—Doctrine and Covenants 104: selections from paragraphs 1, 9, and 10.

We may be sure that this differentiation is real, that it is important, and that it is permanent. In the Doctrine and Covenants, section 104, we find that the bishop holds the keys of the Aaronic priesthood, and paragraph 32 refers to these as keys to the ministry of temporalities.

The term “temporal” refers to a time limitation in the sweep of eternity. It has concern with man as a mortal and with his mortal relationships. It is concerned with a human being, living in a human society and endowed with the obligations, privileges, and relationships that society imposes. Man, in the temporal sense, is physical man, living in a physical environment and subject to all the laws of the physical creation.

We are told that the Melchisedec priesthood is concerned with spiritual affairs.

The term “spiritual” refers to the timeless aspect of human personality—that part of man which does not lose its identity in death, and which, in life, is not dependent upon the nourishment of physical environment or the fellowship of mortality.

We believe that man essentially partakes of his dual nature—that he is both temporal and spiritual. We believe that in him this duality is blended—integrated and mutually dependent; that his temporal existence is not a distinct, isolated experience, but rather a segment in his eternal spiritual existence.

The distinctions are now clearer. The Aaronic priesthood is concerned with man in that limited segment of eternity—the now of human existence—and in the areas and aspects of his mortal life. As we investigate further into the elements of physical and social environment of man, we shall expect to become aware of the place of the various orders of this lesser priesthood in ministering to him on that level.

PERHAPS A WORD needs to be said concerning the term “lesser.” The adjectives “lesser” and “greater” are without exact meaning, except in their relationship to context. We have, therefore, a tendency to associate meaning to the words in terms of our pattern of values. If, at a conscious or subconscious level, we are concerned with status, we will interpret the phrase “lesser priesthood” as being a priesthood with less status. The meaning thus attached is a projection of our own thinking rather than that which in fact, is meant. Because of the phraseology, we are apt to project power, authority, dignity, or other preconceived ideas into the passage. Even those who had been intimately associated with Christ did not escape the pitfalls of status seeking; and when they argued about “who would be first,” Jesus told them, “He who would be greatest, let him be servant of all.”

The terms “lesser” and “greater” as applied to priesthood are related directly to the “temporal” and “spiritual” aspects of priesthood. That which is lesser is limited in its ministry to the temporal, mortal, physical aspects of life, and human relationships. Since it is God-ordained, it commands all the authority, all the power, all the spiritual insight necessary to minister on that level and so is perfectly qualified to minister on that level. The Aaronic priesthood, therefore, on the level at which it is ordained to function is not and cannot be designated as lesser if the term carries any connotation of inferiority.

The terms “lesser” and “greater” are meaningful, then, only in terms of the level of ministry. Few who believe in God and in the spiritual world would deny that physical existence, though an integrated part of the spiritual sweep of human existence, is nevertheless a limited period during which the individual is restricted in movement, knowledge and sensitivity. Paul worded it thus, “Now we see through a glass, darkly, then face to face.”

In terms of level of existence, the temporal is in every way “lesser” than the spiritual. And it follows that ministry at this level, though perfectly ordained for this level, will be “lesser”—restricted in all essentials of ministry—to ministry at the spiritual level.

Church Structure

By Harley A. Morris

IN ORDER TO GAIN AN UNDERSTANDING of the Aaronic priesthood and its place in the structure of divine plan, we need to analyze life experiences at the level of its ministry—the mortal level. But, first of all, we shall need to see, if perhaps vaguely, the place and function of mortal existence in eternal destiny. I say we shall see the relationship of this life to eternal purpose vaguely because, from our point of observation, we are not able to see beyond the rims of our horizon and hence can only conjecture what lies out there.

From where we stand, then, we see the present as an essential part of eternity—a time when we can develop our moral natures through the exercise of conscious will. For us, it is a time of choosing—a time of deliberately organizing our lives to conform with the divine will. We see it as a conflict between the demands of physical desire and the pleadings of moral conscience. We see its termination in the successful subjection of the physical and the entrance of mankind upon a process of spiritual evolution and refinement. This was clearly implied in Jesus' reply to the Pharisees when he said, "Do you not understand that in heaven they are neither married or given in marriage?"

We have not detracted from the importance and dignity of life when we have thus identified it as a part of the eternal order. The learned university professor dares not look with contempt on the first-grade teacher. He will remember that he but builds on the educational foundation she laid. It is equally true that temporal living is a preparation for an eternity of tomorrows. The superstructure cannot be more enduring than the foundations that undergird it. There is, therefore, a significance and dignity in today that must not be ignored, and the very importance of this present lends dignity to those whose calling is to minister primarily to it.

TEMPORAL EXISTENCE begins in heterosexual relationship. Pregnancy is an incapacitating experience that places upon the sexes the demand for compatible interdependency. The human infant is more defenseless and dependent for a longer period of time than any other living creature. His needs for food, shelter, and training in self-sufficiency require the existence of a family relationship in which there is a division of responsibility and a sharing of experiences. The long developmental demands of the human infant are, however, a racial asset, for it makes possible the transmission from the mature generation the culture, ideals and technology that have accumulated through the ages. In thus freeing the individual of the necessity of original experimentation, and discovery, it insures the progress of the race.

If our thesis that temporal life is an important preparatory experience in the divine plan for eternity is correct, it follows that God will provide aids and safeguards to utilize to the fullest the family relationship. We find such provision made in the setting apart of the Aaronic priest. The duties of the priest, we are told, are to "visit the homes of the members, exhorting them to pray vocally and in secret, and to attend to all family duties."

In this significant passage, God has recognized the inherent importance of family life and has provided for its ministry. Some have wondered why God has not given more explicit instructions concerning the exact duties of the priest in the home. Those who have been so concerned have not carefully analyzed the instruction given nor appreciated the ways of God. Let us look a moment at the words of revelation.

THE PRIEST is to "visit the homes." He is to carry his ministry to the family. He is to be concerned about them. He will not be satisfied simply to provide a worshipful and intellectually stimulating environment at church. He will carry the needs of the people on his heart and seek them out where they live, thus expressing in his ministry the Lord's deep love for his creatures. God is concerned with the quality of his people, and he realizes what every teacher and psychologist learns—that children reflect the qualities of their home. God is, therefore, concerned with the quality of the home and provides for ministry in the home, to the home. "The priest shall visit the home."

The priest shall teach them "to pray." In twenty years of church ministry, I have seen only one consistent effort to teach prayer at church.

The fault is not in those who administer the church program. The fault is in the church environment. Church is not the place to learn prayer or worship. The foundations of a worshipful relationship with Deity are laid in the experiences of the home. A high quality of faith and confidence in God does not spring full-grown into the mature soul. Men and women reflect in their lives an extension of their childhood faiths. And children catch the spirit of worship from the attitudes of their parents. A spiritual

WE ARE GLAD to submit herewith a comparative statement of income for the first eleven months of 1947 and 1948. It is to be noted that the 1948 income is slightly under that of 1947. Just what the total will be for the full year cannot be determined at this date, as the reports for the month of December are not all in; but there are indications that the total income for 1948 may be considerably under that of 1947, as we had an unusually large income during December of 1947, in which month the income amounted to $235,000.57. As soon as reports are received, we will submit an additional statement which will include the month of December.

In the meantime, we wish to express our appreciation for the fine co-operation given by officers and members of the church and to suggest that we put forth effort during the year 1949 to increase our income to offset the definite increase in expenditures necessary because of the appropriations made by the Conference of 1948, which expenses indicate an increasing service to the membership of the church in every field of activity.

Respectfully submitted,

Official Announcement

To All Pastors of All Branches:

Pursuant to the action of the 1948 General Conference, we call the attention of branch and district and stake presidents to Sunday, April 24, which has been set aside as Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing Day. We recommend that special services be held on this occasion with emphasis on the church hospital and school of nursing. We are calling attention to this important event now so that programs may be planned well in advance.

Excel in Scouting

We are justly proud of the excellent work being done by some of our members in the Boy Scout movement.

Many years ago, the first scouting troop west of the Mississippi River was organized at Independence, Missouri, with Elder William O. Hands, "Daddy Hands," as scout leader. Some of the boys who got their first training in this troop have been identified with Scouting ever since, and today two of them, Howard P. Andersen and Elvin K. Luff, both of Independence, occupy high positions in Scouting. Both have been given the Silver Beaver Award.

Brother Andersen was recently elected president of the Kansas City Council, and Brother Luff was re-elected as the leader of the Covered Wagon Area, which includes Independence. H. Roe Bartle, Chief Scouter of the Kansas City Council, in a recent letter to the undersigned stated that the Kansas City area had captured more "God and Country" awards than any other area, which I think speaks well for the influence of our church organization in Scouting, because we have a large membership in this section.

Just recently we have been advised that the pastor of the Centralia, Washington, Branch, Elder William W. Belcher, has been given the Silver Beaver Award after twenty-five years in Scouting, having started in 1923 in charge of a troop in the Portland Branch.

We extend to these brethren our hearty congratulations for their splendid record.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

On the first Sunday of the year, the patients at the Sanitarium received "Your Sunday Morning Visitor," an attractive folder prepared by Chaplain Donald V. Lents. On one side of the folder is the Epitome of Faith and on the inside is a brief and cheerful editorial and some other pleasant and light-hearted comments. We congratulate Brother Lents on the development of this additional tool for use in the fine work he is doing at the Sanitarium.

Death of Bishop E. L. Traver

News comes of the death on January 3 in Florida of E. L. Traver, for many years bishop of the Southern New England district, a leading business man and church officer of Boston. Plans were for the funeral to be held in Somerville, Massachusetts, on Saturday, January 8. Though illness kept Brother Traver out of active life for a time, he rendered a distinguished service and accomplished great good for many years.

God is calling for workers. He needs those who are willing to study and prepare. Perhaps he may be calling and needing you. "Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest." Throughout the church, there will be those who will hear the call and arise to say, "Here am I. Send me."

Naming Lineage in the Patriarchal Blessing

A Few Words of Caution

BY ELBERT A. SMITH

THE GIVING OF BLESSINGS, though important, is not the most important function of the patriarch—who is also an evangelist. The blessing is not mandatory to each person, as is baptism. It is permissive. It should be sought out of an urgent, personal desire and not because of any mass appeal to go and get a blessing or undue pressure from any other person. It is a very personal matter.

Nor is the naming of lineage the chief function of the blessing. That is optional with the patriarch, according to the spiritual direction that he may have. The law says that the patriarch may "if so led, point out the lineage of the one who is blessed."—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 3.

No one should be urged to go to the patriarch merely to be told his or her lineage. No one should be unduly disturbed if the lineage is not named in the blessing given. There may be one of several good reasons. The chief functions of the blessing are not to delve into the past or to reveal in detail the future; they are to comfort, counsel, if necessary admonish, sometimes rebuke, encourage, bless, and—above all—help the person in all ways to conform his or her life to the teachings and Spirit of Christ.

The primary question is not, "Who was my ancestor long, long ago?" More important and searching is the question, "Am I now, today, bearing well the name of Christ and keeping his commandments that I may grow to be worthy of any inheritance that may come to me now or in the great beyond?"

Concerning Pride of Ancestry

There is a certain justification for pride in one's family or tribal ancestry, if it is honorable—and an incentive, also. At its best, ancestral pride may bring satisfaction and incentive. At its worst, it becomes arrogance and snobbishness. The Jews had a bigoted pride in tribe and, even while plotting to kill Christ, boasted to him that they were of the seed of Abraham. They were rebuked by him (John 8: 33-42).

Paul had cherished a great pride that he was "of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law a Pharisee."—Philippians 3: 5. As such, he persecuted the Christians. Converted to Christ, by comparison, he counted all those things of lesser value. His joy and glory were first of all in Christ. He came to see that for those "baptized into Christ," who had "put on Christ," there "is neither Jew nor Greek," but all are "one in Christ" (Galatians 3: 27, 28). Let us not fall into the error of overestimating the matter of naming lineage.

Some years ago I met a very intelligent and fine-appearing representative of the Utah Mormon faith. Learning that I was a descendant of Joseph Smith, founder of the church, he seemed much impressed and shaking my hand said, "One thing is sure, Joseph Smith will take care of his own family throughout the eternal ages." I replied, "I do not know about that, but I am sure that Christ will take care of his own."

Are you of Christ? That is the question, first, last, and all the time. With these qualifying thoughts in mind, let us inquire concerning the background of this custom of sometimes naming the lineage of the person receiving a patriarchal blessing.

Concerning the Twelve Tribes of Israel

This takes us back to the twelve tribes of Israel, which is a broad subject. The Jews are of Israel, but not all Israel were or are Jews. The tribe of Judah was one of twelve tribes. The naming of lineage in the blessing does not, as a rule, go back of or outside of those twelve tribes.

One of our church girls who married a fine man of Japanese extraction said to me that she had noticed that blessings given to Orientals never name lineage. That, I suppose, is due to the fact that, in all probability, Oriental races go back farther in history than the dispersal of the twelve tribes. I consoled her husband with this statement: "I am not so much concerned with where you came from as I am concerned with the direction in which you are going—and I think you are going in the right direction."

God made covenant with Abraham and gave him certain wonderful promises. His descendants were to be as the sands of the sea in number (not limited to Jews alone). In him and his seed should "all the nations of the earth be blessed." Many of the promises and prophesies made concerning Abraham and his posterity have been fulfilled. Others are in process of being fulfilled.

The nations of the earth have been blessed through the seed of Abraham. From them came the law and the commandments, the prophets and the apostles, Christ and his church, and the Scriptures—including ing the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants.

In due time, Jacob, the grandson of Abraham, became the father and progenitor of twelve tribal families. Before his death, Jacob gave a patriarchal blessing to his sons. Most outstanding were the blessings given to Judah and Joseph. And those two became the leading tribes.

We are all very well acquainted with the character of the blessing given to Joseph. It figures prominently in our church belief. It was stated of him, "The blessings of thy father hath prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors, unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills; they shall be on the head of Joseph." The blessing given to the progenitors of Jacob, so far as landed estates were concerned, was limited to the Holy Land—a rather small but historically important bit of territory. The children of Judah, the Jews, are still fighting for possession of that inheritance. The children of Joseph were to have an inheritance much greater, reaching to the "uttermost bounds of the everlasting hills."

We learn through the Book of Mormon that children of Joseph inherited ancient America, a vast territory far beyond that given to Jacob's progenitor, Abraham. Lehi, a descendant of Joseph through Manasseh, with his family, founded an ancient civilization in the Americas.

In Deuteronomy, chapter 33, we find that Moses also blessed the twelve tribes and particularly dwelt upon the glories which were to be the inheritance of the children of Joseph and the richness of the land they should inherit; he declared they should be the "ten thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of Manasseh."

In Genesis 48: 13-19, the record is given as to how Jacob blessed his grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh, (Joseph's sons). Ephraim was the younger but received the greater blessing. Of Manasseh he said, "He shall become a people, and he shall be great." But of Ephraim he said, "His seed shall become a multitude of nations." Many, when they speak about the Hebrew peoples or Israelites, think of the Jews. They were only a part of the tribes of Israel. The children of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, were to become nations, particularly so in the case of Ephraim.

The "Ten Lost Tribes"

Following the exodus from Egypt, the twelve tribes of Israel were given their inheritances in the Holy Land. The Jews are there yet—or again. After the death of King Solomon, the tribes became divided and the ten tribes were known as the "Kingdom of Israel" in the north of Palestine, while the Jews (Judah) and at least a part of the tribe of Benjamin were known as the "Kingdom of Judah" in the south. There seems to be some confusion about the course taken by the tribe of Benjamin as a whole. The tribe may have been divided. In the First Book of Kings, chapter 12, verse 20, it is stated: "There was none that followed the house of David, but the tribe of Judah only." In the same chapter, verse 23, Judah and Benjamin are classed together, historically they are so treated: "Benjamin remained with Judah" (Jewish Encyclopedia, Volume 16, page 664). And: "Judah and Benjamin formed the southern kingdom under the name of Judah" (The Enduring Word, by Christiana Salyards, page 243).

About 719 B. C., Shalmaneser overthrew the Kingdom of Israel and carried the ten tribes captive into Assyria. The Encyclopedia Americana says of them, "to be lost forever." However, we and many other believers in Bible prophecy hold that they were not lost forever. We believe they have figured and will continue to figure in human history under divine direction.

Where are the lost tribes? In our own history in years gone by, some few of our people speculated that they were at the North Pole in the so-called "North Country." They had the idea that up around the North Pole there was a mysteriously warmed region where those tribes found sanctuary and some day they would be discovered; but the north polar region has been crossed and recrossed by airplanes, and that idea has been found to be without any foundation in fact. There was an even more fantastic theory held by some that there is a hole in the earth at the North Pole and that the twelve tribes were within the interior of the earth, mysteriously lighted and sheltered while they waited the time of their return. That strange notion is no longer advocated.

The theory seems much more reasonable that those tribes are lost only to the vision of the historian, and their posterity may be found in some of the countries of Europe, in the British Isles, and in America. Those countries of Europe and the British Isles might be spoken of as "north countries" as compared to Palestine. Certain Scriptures indicate that those tribes of Israel had gone into the "North Country" and would return from the "North Country" (as in Jeremiah 31: 8-10; and Doctrine and Covenants 108: 6).

The Books of Esdras were not accepted by compilers of the Bible as "canonical," but they did often appear in older editions of the King James version as among the so-called "Apocryphal" books. In the second Book of Esdras, there is a purported historical statement about the ten tribes that is of considerable interest:

Those are the ten tribes, which were carried away prisoners out of their own land in the time of Osea the king, whom Salmanasar the king of Assyria led away captive, and he carried them over the waters, and so came they into another land. But they took this counsel among themselves, that they would leave the multitude of the heathen, and go forth into a further country, where never mankind dwelt, that they might there keep their statutes, which they never kept in their own land. And they entered into Euphrates by the narrow passages of the river. For the Most High then shewed signs for them, and held still the flood, till they were passed over. For through that country there was a great way to go, namely, of a year and a half: and the same region is called Arsareth.

Then dwelt they there until the latter time; and now when they shall begin to come, the Highest shall stay the springs of the stream again, that they may go through: therefore sawest thou the multitude with peace.—II Esdras 13: 40-47.

The advocates of the so-called "British-Israel" theory hold that Anglo-Saxons are of Israelitish descent from the ten tribes, Ephraim predominating. While we may not agree with many of their conclusions, some of which are highly speculative, perhaps we can agree with one of their main propositions, as it accords with the fact that by far the greater number of patriarchal blessings given in America and Britain that name lineage give it as of Ephraim.

According to their theory, which accords with the passages from Esdras just quoted, the ten tribes made their escape in a body from Assyria and went north, crossing the Euphrates and on up beyond the Black Sea, turning to the West into Northern and Central Europe, and up into the Scandinavian countries (leaving colonies and groups behind). In different groups and at different times, they are presumed to have made their way into the British Isles and their descendants eventually into British colonies and America. (At least the theory may be worthy of thought and study.)

Apparently the proponents of this theory do not attempt to differentiate among the ten tribes as of the present but regard them as pretty much merged "in Ephraim." They find place names in Europe and along the routes presumably taken over the centuries that are claimed to be of Israelitish origin. As, for example, Denmark is supposed to be "Danmark" or "Dansmark" from the tribe of Dan; and the name "Anglo-Saxon" is claimed to be from "Isaac's sons."

Biblical Genealogy Simple

Biblical genealogy was comparatively simple. It traced family lineage through men only and, as a rule, ignored the mothers. It was literally "our forefathers." For example, Matthew, in the opening chapter of his gospel, gives the genealogy of Joseph, the foster father of Jesus, from Abraham down to Jesus, though Joseph was only the foster father. The genealogy of Mary he did not give at all, and she was the mother of Jesus. Jesus inherited nothing by blood relationship from Joseph. All that Jesus inherited biologically was from his mother and her side of the house. And it must have been through her that he was of "the seed of David according to the flesh" (Romans 1:3) and heir to "the throne of his father David" (Luke 1: 32). With such a precedent, maternal lines must be reckoned with in our lineage.

The Family Tree Like a Net

It has been very well said that the ancestry of a given person, called the "family tree," is more like a net than a tree, meaning that there are lines branching out in every direction, crossing and recrossing. Each of us has one father and one mother, two grandfathers and two grandmothers. Thus far it is rather simple. One step back, and we have four great-grandfathers and four great-grandmothers. A step farther we have eight of each, and then sixteen of each. The number increases mathematically and rapidly to an astonishing total if we push it back far enough. In other words, there are blood streams coming into our persons from many directions and from many ancestors. The various mothers in this ancestry probably contributed as much and sometimes more than the fathers to the characteristics of their posterity.

America the "Melting Pot" of Genealogy

It goes without saying that American lineage is mixed, so many

racings having contributed to the population in the United States and Canada. This mixing and crossing of lines accounts for the fact that sometimes two members of one family are named as of different lineage in their patriarchal blessings. One brother may have inherited some very marked characteristics from a father or grandfather, or mother or grandmother, while the other brother (or sister) inherited marked characteristics from another line of descent: and thus one might be named as of Ephraim and another of Manasseh or even of Judah or Benjamin; just as one brother may be more German and another more English when there has been a mixture of German and English blood in parentage.

In the naming of lineage, I have noticed that sometimes a statement is expressly made that a person is of the lineage of Ephraim; while in another case the statement is made that the person's inheritance shall be with Ephraim; which may mean by appointment rather than by descent.

Tribal Lineage Mixed

The Jews, during much of their history, observed strictly their laws and traditions concerning marriage and kept the tribal strain rather to itself; but it was not always so, even in the Holy Land, nor is it always so in modern times.

At the time when the Jews were carried away into Babylon (the ten tribes having already been taken away to Assyria) there were remnants of the various tribes left in Palestine. (As late as in the time of the apostles, Luke mentioned a woman in Jerusalem "of the tribe of Asher" (Luke 2: 36). When the Jews returned to Jerusalem, those remnants were still there. Smith's Bible Dictionary says of that situation:

During and after the captivity, the Jews laid aside their prejudices, forgot their peculiar tribal pride, and became one nation . . . and since that time no one of them is able to trace his lineage to any particular tribe, but may reasonably claim to have the blood of the whole twelve mingled in his veins.—Edition of 1892, page 50.

If that be true, though Jews are predominantly of Judah, in a family presumably Jewish, there might be an outcropping in one member of the family of long latent but strong racial traits marking him logically as being of Benjamin or some other one of the tribes, rather than of Judah. In such an event, two members of that family might receive patriarchal blessings assigning them to two different tribes.

The ten tribes, with Ephraim at their head, even in the days of the Northern Kingdom in Palestine, were never as zealous as the Jews to observe Mosaic laws and customs. In fact, they were quite given to apostasy and dabbled in idolatry and heathen customs, and not only married among the heathen "gentiles" but crossed and recrossed tribal lines in marriage, which probably continued after they were carried away in captivity. The Jewish Encyclopedia says of them:

Under the dynasty of Omri and thereafter, tribal divisions began to be ignored, consequently the whole Northern Kingdom was often poetically called Ephraim (Hosea 5: 3, 4; Isaiah 7: 4; Jeremiah 31: 17-20).—Volume 4, page 35.

If that be true, it is possible that even when the lineage is predominantly of Ephraim, there may be a strong admixture of other racial lines which may crop out in a family in one member and not in the others. So one may be called of Judah, and one of Ephraim.

You will observe by now that this matter of tracing or naming lineage is not such a simple thing as it might appear to be. All through history, even among the isolationist Jews, love has broken over racial lines and brought into families new strains to be reckoned with. Do not flatter yourself that you have a purebred and unmixed lineage right back to Abraham or Judah or Ephraim or Benjamin—or even back to the "Mayflower."

The Value of Naming Lineage

This matter of naming lineage, unless it be in the case of a Jew of Jewish name and physiognomy, or perhaps an American Indian, would seem to be a matter known only through the spirit of prophecy, or we might say by the "discernment of spirits."

To me, it is not of primary importance in the blessing. Obviously not, because it is optional with the evangelist. As it is stated in the revelation, he may "if so led point out the lineage of the one who is blessed."

The reasons for naming the lineage and the reasons giving it significance may be that in some cases it is a comfort and an inspiration to people to feel that they are descendants of Ephraim or Manasseh or Judah or Benjamin. Personally, I believe that the blessing is much more concerned with the future of the individual. It is more important to know which way he is going from now on; and the counsel given to him, the blessing concerning his soul, the rededication—if we may call it that—should be forward-looking for the shaping of his own life, rather than dwelling too much upon the far distant past from which his ancestors have emerged.

The Significance of Naming the Lineage

This matter, however, may have a forward-looking phase to it—looking forward to the return of Israel, the various tribes thereof, and the appointment of inheritances to those various tribes during the millennium. This seems to be the phase on which the older patriarchs dwelt. For example, here is a quotation from a blessing given by John H. Lake in 1904:

Adopted into the family of God, you are his and belong to the tribe of Ephraim, and when the time comes that the allotment shall be made by the direction of Jesus Christ, you shall receive your inheritance with that tribe, and there occupy and carry out the purposes of God in the great thousand years.

Those patriarchs were evidently looked forward to the millennium when they named the lineage of an individual. I suppose there is scriptural support to their theology. For example, in Matthew 19: 28, it is said that Jesus is to judge the twelve tribes of Israel. And in Revelation 7: 4, it is stated that of the twelve tribes, one hundred and forty-four thousand were sealed.

There are many things in the prophecies concerning the future which are very speculative. This seems to be one of them on which we do not have too much light. While the Spirit may direct the patriarch in particular cases to point out the lineage of the individual which would indicate the inheritance to be received in the distant future, I think that the blessing is more concerned with the needs of the individual now, in his life here, to make due preparation to enter into the finest inheritance possibly obtainable under the providences of God.

John was content to leave many things to the future. He said, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but this we know that at his appearing we shall be like him." Our main concern should be to become like Christ and trust the future in his hands. The man who accepts Christ as his Savior is of his spirit and whole-heartedly obeys the gospel; he may feel absolutely confident that, in the due time of the Lord, he will receive the finest inheritance he is able to enjoy and fitted to receive.

The Best

"The enemy of the best is not the worst, but it is the second best, and if we today, any of us, accept anything but the best, we are sinning."
—W. Wallace Smith.

What Are You Worth?

By Evan A. Fry

What I tell you in darkness, that speaks ye in light; and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house tops. Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows.—Matthew 10: 27-31.

WHAT ARE YOU WORTH? Is there anyone who cares whether you live or die? Is there anyone who appreciates you for what you really are, or does everybody ignore you? If you habitually have the feeling that no one appreciates you, and that no one cares for you, you need to change your ways and start thinking more about other people and the good you can do for them. It is from the ranks of the introverts—those people who are always thinking about and feeling sorry for themselves—that the suicides come. We can bear the most burdensome of sorrows and griefs and troubles if we know that others are depending on us and appreciate and love us; but when we get to feeling that we do not count in life, that we are not important to anybody, that no one believes in us or cares about us—it is then thoughts of suicide are most apt to enter our heads.

What are you worth? Who cares for you? Who will notice whether you live or die? Many of you saw the motion picture which was built around this theme. A certain timid angel—Clarence by name—who had never yet won his wings for helping someone on earth, was assigned the case of a man who was just about to jump into the river because of the troubles that had piled up on him, plus this feeling that he was no longer noticed or loved and was no longer of use to anyone. You will remember—if you saw the picture—that Clarence rescued his client from the river, dried him out, and then set out to show him what the town and the lives of several of its citizens would have been without the humble and often unnoticed efforts of this man who thought his life didn't matter.

CASUAL, INCONSEQUENTIAL things very frequently have far-reaching and highly important consequences. I recall a certain afternoon in my life, when I met on a certain street corner a certain good friend of mine. Why either one of us should have been there is still a mystery to this day, because it was off the beaten trail for both of us. But that chance meeting set off a chain of events that shaped the course of my life for the next four years and brought me experiences which are still important to my outlook on life today.

Very often we influence the lives of others, and even alter the course of those lives, so casually, so quietly, so unobtrusively, that we never even dream we have had any influence at all. Another experience of mine—if you will pardon me for talking so much out of my own experience—illustrates what I mean. At the end of one of my college years, the college yearbook or annual was distributed as usual, and each student was circulating his copy among his classmates and friends for autographs and perhaps a bit of comment under his picture. Mine circulated with the rest, without my paying very much attention to where it went or who wrote in it. Not until the next day as I was turning idly through it did I discover a signature under a certain friend's picture, and a line which went something like this: "You were the one who convinced me that I should join the church." I hardly recalled even talking to this friend about religion, but by thinking hard, I finally remembered what was to me a purely casual and not at all lengthy conversation on the subject one day as the two of us were engaged together in some work about the campus. In every life there are just such incidents, when one life touches another for good—or perhaps for evil—without any awareness of the thing that has been accomplished by the contact.

IN THE EYES OF JESUS, every human soul is precious. Jesus did not come to teach an esoteric, mystical doctrine to a chosen few who could understand, while denying himself to the masses as incapable of comprehension. He instructed the disciples whom he trained that his gospel was for all, and ordered that it be proclaimed from the house tops. Jesus was expressing his Father's attitude toward mankind—the attitude of a Father who loves and cares for all things, great or small. His love, his interest, and his care are found manifest in the tiniest fragments of matter, in the lowest forms of animal and vegetable life, as well as the highest—in the humblest man or woman, as well as in the most prominent or important. If he cares for and provides for the sparrow, and numbers the very hairs of our heads, as Jesus said, he certainly will care for us, who are of more value than many sparrows.

Each of us is a center of God's love and watch care—a center about which God is making all kinds of things circulate for our blessing and our good. No matter what you need, no matter what you want, that thing is in God's inventory of supplies, and he can supply it to you if it is his will, and if giving it to you will be for your good. A God who numbers the hairs of your head certainly keeps track likewise of all the things needful for your daily sustenance and blessing. Every soul is precious in his sight, and each soul is the center of a definite portion of God's love and watch care and interest.

Not only may each of us rely on God in the assurance that we have not been forgotten or misplaced or ignored by him, but we may be sure likewise that the thing we can do, the contribution we can make, the influence we can wield on other lives is essential and necessary to the well-being of the world in which we live. No man is so small or so inconsequential that his work is not somehow important to the sum total of the work we all are laboring together with God to accomplish. We never know when someone may need just the thing we, and we alone, can do or say to clear up a problem, to dispel the clouds of gloom, or to give that little extra push of encouragement that will mark the turning point of a life.

THAT PRINCIPLE is well illustrated in the story that is told about the composition of the hymn, "Let the Lower Lights Be Burning." This hymn was inspired by a tragedy which befell a certain vessel that was trying to make the harbor at Cleveland in one of those terrible storms which sometimes make the Great Lakes more dangerous than the open ocean. According to the story, the harbor was marked on one side by a string of lights placed along a low stretch of land that guarded the entrance to the harbor. On the other side of that narrow opening was a single lighthouse, placed on a high spot of land. As the vessel searched in the blackness and storm for the harbor entrance, the captain searched first for the "lower lights" which would indicate that he was

A certain wise man has said that if the world should suddenly come to an end, the majority of men would be found saying, "Some of these days—when my ship comes in—I'll do big things. Just wait and see."

Is it possible that a number of the members of the priesthood have succumbed to this "some of these days" disease?

There Are Opportunities For Priesthood Education Now

Plan Your Program and Follow Through

You have heard that the church has appointed a full-time supervisor of priesthood education—that big things are being done for the Aaronic priesthood in independence. There will be lots of new material, manuals, and books for the priesthood, so you're saying, "That is what I have been waiting for. When this new material comes along, I'll really get going with my study and ministry."

But Why Wait?

Surely it now appears that the church means business in priesthood education. Great plans are being made. New materials are being printed. They will be just what you need. But please don't wait for them. Remember, there is no magic in new books.

Get Started Now

All the new materials in the world, however practical and attractive, will never eliminate the need for painstaking study and diligence in the work of the ministry. There will be no magic formula such as "success in ten easy lessons." If you are looking for a magician's wand or some royal road to effective ministry, you are doomed to bitter disappointment.

These Opportunities Are Available Now Why Not Use Them

Opportunities for priesthood education are even now knocking at your door. Here are some of them:

- Priesthood library
- Selected materials for study and reference
- The leadership training series
- Church school
- Local priesthood meetings and classes
- Regional and district institutes, conferences and reunions
- Graceland College
- Supervised priesthood activities
- Carefully selected materials (from outside sources)

nearing the entrance. Then the appearance of the "upper light" in the lighthouse would give notice that it was time to turn in. But on this particular night, the lower lights were all out because of the heavy storm. By the time the captain saw the lighthouse, it was too late to change the course of the vessel to bring it against the wind and into the harbor entrance. According to the imagery of the song, God's lighthouse beams eternally, but to us he gives the keeping of the lights along the shore. Let us keep them burning brightly for the benefit of some who may be lost or discouraged or beaten by the storms of life.

The Origin of the Book of Mormon

By ALMA RANNIE

The story of an early attempt to account for the Book of Mormon.

WHENEVER THE LORD undertakes to do a work among the children of men, we find extraordinary and unusual events accompanying it. Those who believe that God is in the work attribute these events to divine power. The nonbelievers are very apt to say they are accomplished by human power or maybe an evil power. On the day of Pentecost, for instance, when the gift of tongues was manifest in such great power, many of the people did not see any divinity in it. Some of them said that the men who did that wonderful preaching were drunken with new wine. In the early days of the church, Joseph Smith healed a woman with a lame arm. It was a well-attested fact. A historian of the day, who did not believe in miracles, explained it by saying that when Joseph Smith commanded the woman to be whole, he spoke in such a bold and assuring manner that it produced a sudden mental and moral shock which electrified the rheumatic arm. When the Book of Mormon was published and presented to the world and the wonderful story of its coming forth was told, a great many people did not believe it. Some of them said it was entirely of human origin. The first book ever published against the church advocated that theory. Others took it up and made a plausible story out of it—so plausible that a great many read and believed it. If any doubts or misgivings creep into your mind while you are reading this, do not be unduly alarmed or disturbed. Follow this story to the end, and I assure you the Book of Mormon will come out vindicated.

We should bear in mind that Joseph Smith was first told of the Book of Mormon in 1823, and the printing of it was completed in 1830. Between the years 1809 and 1812, there lived, in northern Ohio, a man named Solomon Spaulding. He was a graduate of Dartmouth College and an ex-minister. He possessed a good imagination and evidently liked to write stories. He wrote one called Manuscript Found. This is the one we are going to discuss in this story.

MR. SPAULDING WROTE that near where he lived, there were the remains of an ancient fort, and one day as he was walking alone "forming various conjectures respecting the character, situation, and numbers of those people who far exceeded the present Indians in works of art and ingenuity," he happened to tread upon a flat stone. This stone lay on top of a small mound of earth. He was curious to know what was under this stone, so he got a lever and raised it. He found it was the cover to a cave, the sides of which were lined with stones, and down inside were some rolls of parchment. They were manuscripts, written in an ancient language, but as the story goes, he was able to translate them. One of these rolls contained the history of the man who wrote it, and also an account of the "great and powerful nations, considerably civilized and skilled in the arts of war, that once occupied this land, and fought many a bloody battle." Mr. Spaulding said he translated part of this roll and called it Manuscript Found. He intended to have it published, but was not successful. He often read from this manuscript to his friends and neighbors.

were in it. It says that the man who wrote the roll did so for the benefit of the people who would occupy this land at some future time. According to the story, the man who wrote this roll lived and wrote in the fourth century A.D. He said he would deposit this history in a box so that the ravages of time would have no effect upon it. He had an unusual name. He and some others with him came to this land from across the ocean. During the voyage, a tremendous storm came up. They were in great despair and "on bended knee poured forth incessant supplication to the Almighty." At length one of the crew stepped forth and said that a voice from on high had penetrated his soul, and the inspiration of the Almighty said if the sails were set in the proper manner, they would soon reach a safe harbor. They finally reached land in safety. The manuscript also told about a man who had in his possession an extraordinary stone. He evidently was a man of prominence and position among his people. He could look into this stone and see things present and to come and also see hidden treasures. He would look "firmly and steadfastly on the stone and then raise his prophetic voice." Another thing mentioned in the manuscript was an animal larger than an elephant and very useful to the people. Horses were also mentioned. Priests and high priests were mentioned. The manuscript was full of peculiar names. Great battles were fought; in one of them 100,000 were slain.

In 1812, Mr. Spaulding moved to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. It was while living there that he took his manuscript to a printer for publication, but, as before stated, it was not published. He moved to Amity, Pennsylvania, taking the manuscript with him, and died there in 1816.

WE MOVE AHEAD now in our story to the year 1830. Some eighteen years have passed since Mr. Spaulding left Ohio, but some of his old neighbors were still alive and still living there. There was a prominent minister living near Kirtland, Ohio, who enters our story here. He was a sort of independent preacher. He preached some of the New Testament doctrines literally, just as they were taught back in the days of Christ and the apostles. He was a great orator and had quite a following. He had come into Ohio some years previously from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where he had resided for a time. In the fall of 1830, four young men, Oliver Cowdery, Parley P. Pratt, Ziba Peterson, and Peter Whitmer, Jr., came into this community around Kirtland with the Restored Gospel. It was a new and strange story, especially the story about the Book of Mormon. These young men stayed about six weeks and converted quite a few people. Among the converts was this prominent minister. His name was Sidney Rigdon. Some of the new converts were ordained and started preaching. The gospel spread, and there was great excitement in that part of the country. Finally, the message was taken to the community where Mr. Spaulding had lived when he wrote Manuscript Found.

Among those who heard the preaching were some of the old neighbors of Mr. Spaulding. The elder doing the preaching told about the Book of Mormon, of course, that being one of the chief features of the Restoration. He no doubt told how the young prophet found the golden plates in a stone box. Perhaps he told how a lever was used to pry off the stone which served as a cover. He undoubtedly told how the writing on these plates was translated by the aid of two stones which gave the young prophet supernatural power. Those of the people who read the book learned that it told of several great nations that once inhabited this western continent, that they were a civilized and cultured people and fought numerous and bloody wars with thousands being slain. They read that the book was to be of great benefit to those who would come after, that it was written or compiled about the fourth century A. D., and that it was "hid unto the Lord that it might not be destroyed." They read about the terrible storm which threatened the destruction of Nephi and his people as they were coming across the water, also about the animals which the ancient inhabitants of this land had, the horse and the two strange animals that were undoubtedly larger than an elephant and useful to the people. They read about priests and high priests. They noticed the many peculiar names in the book.

THESE NEIGHBORS OF MR. SPAULDING noticed a marked similarity between the Book of Mormon and Manuscript Found. Quite a few people in this community joined the church, but among those who did not there developed a group that was very bitter in its opposition. They determined to overthrow the church and began gathering material for a book for that purpose. They heard that the former neighbors of Mr. Spaulding said there was a similarity between the Book of Mormon and Manuscript Found, so they decided to capitalize upon it. One of their number went to these old neighbors for "statements" which they published in their book. The following are some of the things that were in these statements.

John Spaulding, Solomon Spaulding's brother, said that the historical matter in the Book of Mormon, names, etc., were nearly the same as were in his brother's writings. He said he remembered that his brother wrote in the old style and began nearly every sentence with "And it came to pass."

Martha Spaulding, John's wife, said that when she read the Book of Mormon, it brought fresh to her recollection the writings of Solomon Spaulding. She said she had no manner of doubt that the historical part of the Book of Mormon was the same as she had read and heard read twenty years before. She mentioned the old style of writing and the expression, "And now it came to pass."

Henry Lake, Solomon Spaulding's business partner, testified that when his wife read to him from the Book of Mormon, she had been reading but a few minutes when he was astonished to find the same passages in it that Solomon Spaulding had read to him twenty years previously. He mentioned the frequent use of "And it came to pass."

J. N. Miller, who boarded in Spaulding's home, testified that when he examined the Book of Mormon, he found in it the writings of Solomon Spaulding from beginning to end, but mixed up with scripture and other religious matter. He said the names Nephi, Lehi, Mormon, and others were brought fresh to his recollection.

Aaron Wright said he remembered that Spaulding traced the journey of the first settlers to America from Jerusalem as given in the Book of Mormon. He also stated he knew the historical part of the Book of Mormon to be the same as he had read and heard from the writings of Solomon Spaulding twenty years before. He said the names, especially, were the same without alteration.

Oliver Smith said that when he heard the historical part of the Book of Mormon, he at once said it was the writings of Solomon Spaulding.

Nathan Howard, Artemus Cunningham, Joseph Miller, and Rud-dick McGee, who boarded with the Spauldings, made similar statements.

One of the men who was in the meeting in Conneaut when the elder read from the Book of Mormon, was a Reverend Abner Jackson. He said the Book of Mormon followed Spaulding's manuscript too closely to be a stranger to it. He said the same names, the same people, and the same difficulties appeared in both at the same places. He said the Book of Mormon account of the battle of Cumorah resembled the closing scenes in Manuscript Found.

Spaulding's daughter declared the Book of Mormon was largely her father's work. Mr. Spaulding's widow declared the Book of Mormon was a wicked remodeling of her husband's book.

THE OBVIOUS THING for this group of opponents to do was to get Manuscript Found, if possible, publish it, or at least excerpts from it, and let the public see it was the basis of the Book of Mormon. So they sent one of their number on this errand. The manuscript was in a trunk at the house of a relative of Mrs. Spaulding, now Mrs. Davidson, in Hartwick, New York. Mrs. Davidson, who was then living in Massachusetts, gave this man permission to borrow it. Now the book which these men were getting up, was to be printed by Mr. E. D. Howe. He ran a printing office in Painesville, Ohio, was the publisher of the Painesville Telegraph, and one of the group of bitter opponents. The man who was sent to get the manuscript turned it over to Mr. Howe; but when the book, which they entitled Mormonism Unveiled was published, there were no comparisons in it between the Book of Mormon and Manuscript Found—just the "statements" of these old neighbors of Mr. Spaulding that parts of them were identical. The public never had a chance to compare Manuscript Found with the Book of Mormon, because shortly after the manuscript was turned over to Mr. Howe, it disappeared. These opponents, however, emphatically declared that Manuscript Found was the basis of the Book of Mormon. The church just as emphatically declared it was not. The controversy started then went on for years. The elders in the old church and in the Reorganization had to meet this "Spaulding theory" wherever they went. Our representatives, in defending the Book of Mormon, would claim that E. D. Howe had Manuscript Found destroyed because he was afraid to let the public compare it with the Book of Mormon. Our opponents claimed we were afraid to let the public make such a comparison, and that we were responsible for its disappearance. They said we paid $400 for it. Anyway, about this time, the man who got the manuscript bought a farm for $400, and where else did he get the money if it wasn't from selling the manuscript? According to the story, this man was previously without means. Our opponents claimed that Sidney Rigdon was the "go-between" for Manuscript Found and the Book of Mormon. They said he became acquainted with the contents of Manuscript Found when he was living in Pittsburgh, and then during the years just previous to the publication of the Book of Mormon, he would make secret trips back to New York and talk things over with Joseph Smith. Sidney Rigdon, of course, denied this, but the charges and counter charges, accusations and denials went on unabated.

IN 1839, five years after Mormonism Unveiled was published, Mr. Howe sold his printing business. A Mr. L. L. Rice and a partner were the purchasers. In the purchase were included a number of books, manuscripts, papers, etc. Mr. Rice was an anti-slavery editor and, during the ensuing years, quite a number of anti-slavery manuscripts accumulated in the office. In 1879, Mr. Rice went to Honolulu, Sandwich Islands—as they were then called—to live with his daughter. Among other things, he took with him a number of these old papers and manuscripts. In 1884, a Mr. James H. Fairchild, president of Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio, was visiting Mr. Rice. During the visit, Mr. Fairchild suggested to Mr. Rice that among his old papers there might be some valuable old anti-slavery manuscripts that would be nice to have in the library of Oberlin College. Mr. Rice acted on this suggestion, and as he was looking through the collection, he came upon a manuscript, rolled up in a piece of coarse wrapping paper and tied with a string. On the outside was written "Manuscript Story-Conneaut Creek." Mr. Rice's curiosity was aroused, so he unwrapped the manuscript and examined it. On the last page was this statement, "The writings of Solomon Spaulding. Proved by Aaron Wright, Oliver Smith, John N. Miller, and others. The testimonies of the above gentlemen are now in my possession." Signed, D. P. Hurlbut.

Mr. Rice and Mr. Fairchild, being conversant with the history of Ohio, recalled that a story written by Solomon Spaulding, which had mysteriously disappeared, had figured in a somewhat bitter religious controversy a number of years previously. They recalled that this story was claimed by some to be the basis of the Book of Mormon. They believed what they found was this long lost manuscript. Mr. Fairchild wrote an article to that effect for the Bibliotheca Sacra, published in Oberlin, Ohio. Quite a few papers and magazines reprinted the article, and it wasn't long until the church officials heard about it. Of course they were more than mildly interested. Mr. Rice received a number of suggestions as to what to do with the manuscript. Mr. A. B. Demming of Painesville, Ohio, who was getting up a book of some kind (undoubtedly against the church) wanted it. Mrs. Dickinson of Boston, who was getting up a book to show that Solomon Spaulding was the author of the Book of Mormon, wanted it. She said it at least should go to Spaulding's daughter. Joseph Smith, president of the church at that time, suggested that it be placed in the Historical Society in Chicago. No doubt there were other suggestions.

Make the New Year Count

By STELLA B. OMOHUNDRO

NOW THAT THE NEW YEAR is well launched, and we've shared in the good resolutions of our family hearth, let's make a secret one for "just us women." We won't talk about it much until it begins to bear fruit, for too many times before we've hinted at what we have in mind.

This year, we're going to make or take time for ourselves, and one reason we're going to keep it secret is that we're just not sure whether we can make our dreams come true or not.

Most homemakers feel that, given a little time all their own, they can develop some hidden talents which have been buried under the demands of homemaking. But somehow they haven't figured out a spare hour in the routine of cooking, washing, ironing, mending, and being general trouble-shooter to squeeze out time of their own, in spite of the advertisers who proclaim anyone can be a lady of leisure if she owns their washer, ironer, dishwasher, etc.

This year it's going to be different. How many times have you been baffled at a question of international relations your husband raised while reading the paper? How many times have your children "stopped" you with some problem they brought home for school? How many times have you said to a friend who wanted help, "I haven't time," "I don't know how," "I'm too tired"?

You and I are going to change that this year. We're going to steal time—if we have to—and by the end of the year, we're going to be more individualistic; we're going to know a few answers and develop a few skills.

If you're one of those women who work by a rigid schedule, it's going to be a little tougher—but you can do it. In planning your program for the week, arrange with a friend or neighbor to shelter your children when they come home from school. Fix a regular time when you're not "at home" even to your family.

For the more haphazard worker, when the notion strikes you to follow your own pursuits, do what has to be done in the way of washing, ironing, meal planning, and such, but do a lick and promise job on something else and deliberately shut your eyes to mending that will wait.

A GOOD START is in reading—some book that you've planned to read for yourself to see whether it is as good as everyone says. Scan through the accumulated magazines around the house for articles that will give you a boost.

Get away from the house, where you've tended to develop "cabin fever," and see a good movie or go hear a lecture.

Of course, you won't go far in this resolve until you begin to want to learn more about some special subject or phase of homemaking of which you are particularly in need of more information.

Then you'll get yourself a plan of action. There is no need of stumbling along by yourself in a path on which many have gone before. Most women have wished they knew more about interior decoration so their homes would be more pleasant. Perhaps you would like to study flower arrangement, gardening, child guidance, sewing, knitting, crocheting, handcrafts, or literature for children or adults. The field is unlimited for any true homemaker.

One of the first things the foresighted woman will do is to start a personal file. A scrapbook will come later, but a better way to start is with ordinary files. You can buy some folders from any office supply shop. Get the habit of clipping. You can't hope to keep up with the worthwhile magazine articles, so enlist the aid of your friends, the children's teachers, your librarian.

Then look around for group aid. In the field of sewing, knitting, crocheting, and other hand skills, your department stores will prove a big help. Also many larger towns and cities have night-school work available under the direction of adult education. Likewise, in the specialized fields of child guidance and literature for different levels, you can find such helps.

If you still find absolutely no aids, circulate around your friends with similar interests and start a group for study. Write to church headquarters, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, for suggestions of materials for group study. Find out what your state universities and colleges have to offer.

THERE IS ALMOST no limit to the number of ways you can develop yourself in your line if you once determine to start.

If you need a place to store your accumulations, get some kind of a filing cabinet. You can frequently get a cheap, wooden drawer. I saw one acquired by a determined hobbyist, Mrs. F. M. McDowell, for her collection of madonna paintings. In its original state, it was no thing of beauty. It was secured from the War Surplus Administration—a three-drawer file of wood and cardboard. To make it blend with the furnishings of her home, she first covered it with the wallpaper of the room into which it was to be placed. Then she clipped faces of duplicates from her files and pasted them on

Woman's Calling to Worthy Citizenship

By MRS. SABRIA BIRKBY

THE HIGHEST CALLING of woman is motherhood. Parenthood is partnership with God. Never was woman's responsibility greater in the home, the church, and the world. Every day and every moment seem filled with possibilities for good or for evil, and often a woman must make the choice for her husband and family as well as for herself.

Our lives, to be at all endurable in this fast-moving age, must be conditioned in stability and peace of mind. There is scarcely a magazine anywhere which does not remind women that these blessings are in her hands to bestow upon or deny her family. As never before, discoveries in child psychology are emphasizing the necessity of a right start in the life of a child. They strongly reiterate that the first two or three years will establish the child in mental health or ill-health, in a well-adapted or maladjusted personality, in right trends or twisted patterns of living. All agree the best-equipped institution with the most expert personnel cannot equal the drawers. Far from being an eyesore, this file was a thing of beauty in itself.

Just give yourself a chance to let your imagination work and your pursuit of your personal interest will make you more interesting to yourself, less prone to complain of being circumscribed by household routine, but—what is more important—you will be stimulating to your family and able to make a worth-while contribution to your school, your church, and your community.

It's up to you. Will the end of 1949 see you developing along with your children? Or will you, at the end of this year, have that old feeling of being left behind to scrub and mend while your children and husband go out to develop and grow by facing the "bigger problems" of the world?

a wholesome hour with an intelligent mother who loves and cares for her child. They urge greater care, more frequent medical checkups for the family, and a less demanding schedule with wholesome recreation and, above all, relaxation and peace in the home.

This brings us to woman's greatest task—making religious training a reality in the home. Building a strong spiritual foundation is the major responsibility of a mother. She must be equipped mentally and spiritually to interpret the children's everyday experiences in terms of Christ's love and his purposes for them, going forward in love and fellowship to present a limited front against the evils that beset our homes and families in this age. What sort of family life will unfailingly produce responsible, thoughtful, courageous men and women? Deep-thinking people today are looking to the home and church as a means of making this and other lands better, more secure, and more bountiful. There must be, in the home, a fellowship of obedience to take the place of a false parental authority based merely on human commands. Proverbs 22: 6 tells us: "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it." We must teach our children that they may have reserves—physical, financial, social, and spiritual.

THE NATIONS OF THE WORLD have established an organization for the purpose of achieving peace. This, so far, has failed. To establish peace, one (nation or individual) must live in the world and be a functioning part of it. We must teach tolerance of peoples and nations, regardless of color, race, or creed. "God made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth."—Acts 17: 26.

The hope of the future to bring about peace lies in our teaching our children the love of neighbor, gentleness, calmness, self-reliance and patience.

A great scientist has said the hope of the world that civilization may not be utterly destroyed is that we give our children a firm foundation in the teachings of Christ. It is only through the love of Christ that the world will survive.

Elsie Robinson, in a recent article, said, "Now is the time to stand steady. Maybe Russia has the atom bomb, maybe she hasn't, but this is sure, our blackest picture lies in American character. If the trigger finger in our own spirits runs amuck, if we go loco, if we stampede, we are lost. Our safety lies in American character." We all must stand shoulder to shoulder black, white, yellow, red, or brown, and face this thing with steadier pulse than we have ever known. Dare to rise above fear and prejudice, superstition and ignorance.

In order to build strong character, years of training are required. It takes the richness of good, clean, invigorating environment. It takes a deep enduring conviction that Jesus is the Son of God. It takes parental love, sacrificially forgiving and perpetually evident. It takes service and friendship. Peace and happiness are the result of service. Service is the opportunity for personal growth in our contacts with and our reactions to others.

WE MUST teach our children to make wise choices. A woman's primary duty is to her family and home, then her church, then her community. Just as a pebble, when dropped into the water, first causes a tiny ripple, then larger ripples, until it spreads far out into the stream, so woman's influence is felt. The CERTAIN SOCIOLOGISTS speak of social distances or gaps which exist between individuals. These gaps keep us apart socially unless through knowledge and understanding they can be bridged. Because of these social distances, the human family has been segmented; unity, understanding, and cohesiveness have been absent from our relationships.

Bridges Are Out - By PAUL FRACCASCIA

It has been said that bridges are wonderful inventions. Through the ingenuity of man, brick, mortar, and steel can hold the physical world together. Bridges have made possible the spanning of physical distances and can figuratively hold the world together. To bridges, man has added railroads, ships, and planes; all are a part of making possible a physically related, united world.

Human stuff is more than brick, mortar, or steel. It can't be forced into shape with physical tools. It must be molded through love, intelligence, and understanding. It must be motivated with ideals, challenges, crusades. Because it is more difficult to hold the human world together, human relationships have not kept pace with physical progress. Scientific and physical knowledge and its application have advanced beyond the knowledge and application of the social and spiritual. The very obvious result is social and spiritual lag.

In this analysis, we can point to one real factor. It is evident that the point of human emphasis has been upon the physical. In our standards of values, we have implemented physical and material progress and have neglected, to a great degree, the social and spiritual values that are so essential for a well-balanced, integrated Christian world.

Physical bridges are certainly a must in our present world; any person with the least bit of knowledge of engineering will agree. If physical bridges are an essential, how about the bridges that make possible human understanding and co-operation? What about these bridges that cannot be seen with the naked eye and yet are so important to the progress of man? They are invisible yet quite tangible and concrete as far as the spiritual and social phases of relationships are concerned.

BRIDGES ARE OUT all over the world. Some of these bridges can be replaced readily with brick, mortar, and steel. Other bridges when destroyed leave as debris, hatred, sorrow, suffering, distrust, and disintegration of body and mind, and of society in general. These bridges must be built by engineers of the soul. They won't be built with brick and mortar, but with love, charity, understanding, sympathy, and knowledge.

There is a great gap, natural as it may be, that exists between you and me. This gap is composed of individual differences. No two of us are alike. We don't always think parallel thoughts. My behavior pattern, my philosophy, my background, may differ from yours. None of us act according to a fixed pattern. Yes, often we are inclined to emphasize our difference and broaden the distance of our relationships. This negative burr can create nothing but discord and dissention. Let us recognize that, in being a part of the human plan, we were created—not molded. A bridge built of tolerance, love, and understanding can span the distances that separate us as individuals. Thus we can rapidly become a part of a harmonious human brotherhood.

THERE IS ANOTHER DEEP CHASM that seems in many cases to be broadening and threatening to segment the peoples of the world. The bridges between races, kindreds, and tongues, have been slow in taking form. Negroes and whites still are not brothers. English-speaking peoples and those of other tongues do not as yet have a common vocabulary. Jew and Gentile have not as yet found common grounds. It may have been your fortune or misfortune to be of Caucasian heritage. By the wisdom of God, you might have been of Mongolian or Negroid ancestry. Your father might have spoken French, Italian, or Greek. Is this a basis for dividing us up and keeping us from being a genuine brotherhood? We, the people, make up the human race. Prejudices, discriminations, segregation, and ill-will can keep us apart. It will take a great piece of engineering to bridge the distances between races, kindreds, and tongues. It is a real sociological feat. Yet, as Christians, we know that this bridge must some day be built and relate us all as brothers.

Another gap that tends to keep us apart is the distance between national philosophies. We try to build for world peace, for security and international understanding, yet at the planning conferences for all nations, we lack comprehension. We base our reasoning on different values. Our national objectives differ. Our policies and practices vary. In spite of these differences, we have enough in common to make us want to minimize the nationalistic distance. We are living in the same world together, and if we're going to continue to do so, can't we do it peaceably? National philosophies may never change. Authorities recognize that if national philosophies change, they do so very slowly. We can help catalyze change. Better yet, we can help draw nations closer together by building bridges of understanding, co-operation, and enterprize. If such bridges were erected, we could then be assured of a peaceful, well-balanced world.

YES, BRIDGES ARE OUT and must be built to connect a segmented world. They may be invisible bridges, yet they are real. They must make God's world an integrated sphere of harmony and love. These bridges can't be built with brick, mortar, and steel. Their superstructures have been drafted on the drawing board of God. They will be realized only when their blueprints are impressed upon the heart and minds of all Christian peoples. You and I, in our lives, can help build bridges and span chasms that tend to keep the family of God apart.

Mr. Rice, however, decided in favor of his friend Mr. Fairchild and finally sent the manuscript to Oberlin College. When the church officials heard of this, they went into action as speedily as possible. Elder E. L. Kelley went to Oberlin College and obtained a verbatim copy of the manuscript from Mr. Fairchild. He sent it to church headquarters, then in Lamoni, where it was published by the Herald Publishing House and placed on sale.

A READING OF THE MANUSCRIPT will show that there are those similarities to the Book of Mormon, mentioned previously in this article, but it will also show the unreliability of the "statements" of the neighbors of Mr. Spaulding. The manuscript is not written in old Bible style, the expression, "And it came to pass," is nowhere to be found in it. The same passages do not occur in the Book of Mormon and Manuscript Found. The names Lehi, Nephi, Mormon, etc., are not found in it. It does not tell about any settlers coming to this country from Jerusalem. It does not "follow the Book of Mormon too closely to be a stranger to it." When these opponents of the church got the manuscript and read it, they found these things out, but they went ahead and published the "statements" of Spaulding's neighbors anyway. It is very likely the neighbors never made these "statements" as they were published—chances are they were altered. Anyway, the public never had a chance to see the originals of these "statements." They were undoubtedly destroyed. Men of literary merit, who compare the Book of Mormon with Manuscript Found, say there is no connection between the two. Mr. Rice and Mr. Fairchild so stated right from the first. Numerous others have given the same opinion.

What, then, was the object of these men in starting such a far-fetched story? D. P. Hurlbut, who was one of the most active of these opponents, had been an elder in the church, but had been twice expelled. After the second expulsion, he swore he would have revenge, so he joined this group of opponents and went to work gathering material for the book, Mormonism Unveiled. Before he got through, his conduct became so scandalous that the rest of the group refused to let his name be connected with it. They substituted the name of E. D. Howe as the publisher. Howe, as before stated, was one of the group. He was mad because his wife and other members of his family had joined the church. Some years later, Elder E. L. Kelley, who had numerous debates with our opponents, interviewed Mr. Howe. The interview was as follows:

Q. Why did you publish a work claiming that the Book of Mormon was the Spaulding romance?

A. Because I could better believe that Spaulding wrote it than that Joe Smith saw an angel.

Q. Are those your grounds?

A. Yes, sir, they are; and I want you to understand that you can't cram the Book of Mormon down me.

Q. Do you swallow the Bible?

A. That is my business.

Q. Have you not published a pamphlet which does not endorse the Bible?

A. Yes I have.

So you see the character of the instigators of the Spaulding theory. They were motivated by revenge and a determination to overthrow the church, but they failed just as dozens of others have since. Mr. Hurlbut and Mr. Howe have long since been forgotten, but the Book of Mormon lives on. It has triumphed over every kind of opposition. Men have tried to account for it in various ways, but the only satisfactory one seems to be held by those who accept its story as true.

The material for this article was taken from Mormonism Unveiled, by E. D. Howe; Manuscript Found, by Solomon Spaulding; Braden-Kelley Debate; Church History, by Heman C. Smith; Story of the Church, by Inez Smith Davis.

Another Tribute to Adolphus Edwards

I was glad to see the recent tribute in the Herald written by E. J. Benson about Brother Adolphus Edwards. It was my good fortune to know the Edwards family when I was a boy. I have been among the many to be blessed by his ministry, and it was he who baptized me into this church fifty-four years ago. My father was superintendent of the tin mill at Irondale, Ohio, where Brother Edwards was employed. When my sister, Elizabeth, who was attending school at Cleveland, came home for the wedding of my oldest brother, she took typhoid fever and died several weeks later. Since the nearest branch was fifty miles away, the funeral was held on the front porch of our home, with Brother Edwards giving the sermon. Those who heard him speak were astounded to know that "one of the mill boys" could deliver such an eloquent sermon. The owner of the mill, a Mr. Banfield, told him later that a man of his ability had no business working in a tin mill. Mr. Banfield, who was chairman of the board of trustees of the Presbyterian church—the largest in that community—offered him the pastorate, but Brother Edwards did not accept.

May we all, as this fine man has done, give our talents without reservation to the cause of Christ. David Lewis.

Guided Paths

BY WARREN CHELLINE

SEVERAL MILES off the rugged coast of Maine, serenely lies the island of Vinal Haven. Years ago it was a place teeming with activity; the stone quarries were employing large numbers of workers, and the harbor was the home port for many a world-plying sailing vessel. It was a focal point for the preaching of the gospel, too, as many of our missionaries visited there, converting a large percentage of the people and making Vinal Haven the headquarters for the work of the church in that district.

But now the old quarries are still, deserted, and overgrown with bushes. No longer is this a spot echoing with the clatter of draft-horse teams, shouting stonecutters, rollicking seafarers, and brawling stevedores. Now the island is once more a cool, green, quietly refreshing place of beauty, where the hardy New Englanders wrest a sustenance from neat gardens and near-by fishing grounds. Every year the "summer people" descend on this island and enjoy the genuine hospitality of these folk (and there is none more sincere than the deep friendliness of a true New Englander). Here the visitor discovers that the island is exactly what the name Vinal Haven denotes—a snug, cozy refuge from whatever dashing seas there are.

And the work of the church continues steadily on the island. Many of the Saints have moved to the mainland cities, where their contributions in such spots as Springfield, Massachusetts, have been exceptional; but those remaining at home are still valiantly carrying on their duties as gospel workers. They are typical in the traditional pattern of New England thrift and industry—community leaders well thought of by their neighbors.

SO IT WAS that early one morning in the fall of 1943, I started toward this island in the company of another young missionary, Albert Scherer, who had recently come from his home in Canada to join me. Al is now a member of the Quorum of Seventy and serving as president of the mission in Holland. At that time we were both Aaronic priests, very young, and very new in the experience of the mission field. We left the town of Stonington, which is at the tip of Little Deer Isle, in a small lobster boat that was going in our general direction. The ocean was exceptionally rough that day, and every time we slipped into the waves' trough, we lost sight of the islands completely. All we could see was the sky overhead—and not much of that.

At last the fisherman at the tiller veered into a tiny cove and put us ashore with our luggage. We stood and watched the small boat pull away, leaving us alone on the rocks. Feeling for all the world like forlorn castaways, we turned to explore our landing place. Evidently this was one of the old deserted quarries with the hewn ledges now densely overgrown with low shrubs and young trees. There were absolutely no signs of life—no buildings, no telephones, no chimney smoke—just the deserted countryside and the crashing of waves on rocks.

We hunted around until we found an old path that evidently led somewhere, so, hefting our suitcases, we started to follow it through the woods. When we came to a dirt road, we felt more sure of ourselves, but still did not know which way to turn. We decided to turn left, which, fortunately, proved later to be right.

BY THIS TIME our grips were beginning to get uncomfortably heavy. We were carrying everything we owned—probably about eighty pounds each—and the weight seemed to be getting heavier with each step. We stepped off the road into the woods and hid our suitcases in the bushes, marking the place so we would be sure to know it, and walked on toward town. Ever since we have referred to that little hollow where we checked our luggage as "Gladstone Glen."

After that it was easier walking, and we soon came to the edge of town, asked a few questions, and found our way to the home of Brother and Sister Barton, where we were to stay. They welcomed us warmly, helped us retrieve our luggage, and made us feel very much at home. We spent two weeks there on the island, visiting with the people every afternoon and preaching every evening at the church. It was a busy, enjoyable schedule, and toward the end of our stay, we had a most interesting experience. Was our Heavenly Father interested in the work we were doing? Listen to what happened, and I think you will agree that he was . . . very much.

IT WAS SATURDAY EVENING, and we were walking along a dirt road on our way home. We had spent all day tramping along those island roads, stopping at many of the cottages to visit with Saints and friends, and trying to interest some of our nonmember prospects in being baptized at our services the next day. We were tired and dusty—and hungry! Early in the afternoon we had eaten some lobster sandwiches, but that seemed ages ago, and now it was dark. We both were looking forward to the cold milk, fresh bread, and good food we knew would be waiting for us at “home.”

I'll never forget how big and bright the moon was that night as it rose out of the ocean and sailed higher and higher overhead. As we swung along together, we talked about our work in the mission field and especially of our labors there on the island. Occasionally we would sing snatches of hymns; I remember how we enjoyed singing “Where Wilt Thou Put Thy Trust,” “Organize My Church and Kingdom,” and “My Jesus, I Love Thee.”

Now we were nearing the end of our hike, and we could see the cheerful windows of the Bartons' farmhouse on the hillside ahead. We had worked hard, walked far, and done all our duties for the day—or had we?

Suddenly we stopped walking and looked at a little path that led off to our left. We knew that just a few steps down the path was the cottage of a fisherman and his family with whom we had visited several times. They had attended some of our services and seemed very interested in the gospel, but when we had suggested baptism, they declined, saying that they were not ready to take that big step yet. There was really no logical reason for us to call on those good people again that night. But, by the grace of God, we were led by his spirit, not logic, for we turned to each other and said in the same breath, “Let's turn down here and visit with these folks again.”

We knocked on the cottage door and waited several minutes with no response, although a pale light was shining out through the windows. Then as we knocked again, the door did swing back. The fisherman stood there holding an oil lamp, squinting to see who we were. When he recognized us at his door, a smile came over his face, and he almost shouted, “Come in, friends, come in! We were just praying together, and we were praying that you would come see us tonight. The Lord has sent you!”

The young people in that little home had decided they would like to be baptized, but they wanted us to talk to them some more first. So, knowing that we were out of town, the whole family had knelt to pray for us to visit them, and our first knocking on the door had interrupted their prayers.

BROTHER SCHERER and I are separated now, as the work of the church has taken him far afield to the missions of Europe. Both our lives have been filled with rich experiences in ministry, and we trust they shall continue to be rich, but I am sure we will never forget the incident that night on the island of Vinal Haven, as the power of the Holy Spirit guided our feet down the pathway in answer to a family's fervent prayer.

A remarkable experience? No, not really. What could be more natural? What could be more ordinary? We have been promised in the Scriptures:

In all thy ways acknowledge him,
And he shall direct thy paths.

And even now, as I write the account of this testimony here in my quiet room in a Michigan city, that same directing spirit bears record that such a guiding influence will always be employed in the lives of those who love and serve the Lord.

More Speed

Our most popular delusion is the idea that we could succeed if we had more time. We wouldn't. We would fritter it away as we do now. What we need is to put on more speed in the time we have.

“Come in, friends, come in,” he said. “We were praying that you would come see us tonight. The Lord has sent you.”

DEATHS

HOPKINS.—Thomas, son of William and Gwen Lloyd Hopkins, was born in Cumbuck, Glamorganshire, South Wales, on June 3, 1859, and died at his home in Lucas, Iowa, on August 26, 1948. Although he had to quit school and go to work in the mines when he was nine years old, his desire for education and musical training was great. He would walk two miles every evening after work for choir practice, and was selected to sing at the King's Palace. He received his third diploma from the Tonic, Sal Pa college in June, 1880. On July 7, 1880, he came to America, eventually settling in Lucas, Iowa, where he spent the remainder of his life except for the winter of 1891, when he lived in Seymour, Iowa. In July, 1882, he was married to Hannah Stone; four children were born to them. Although baptized into the Baptist Church in Wales, Mr. Hopkins became a member of the Reorganized Church in 1893. He was a devoted worker in the church; a member of the former Lucas orchestra; leader of the miners' band; secretary of the school board for thirty years; councilman for two years; and town clerk for twenty-two years. His wife, two daughters, and a son preceded him in death.

He is survived by a daughter, Mrs. Gwen Ryun of Lucas, with whom he made his home following the death of his wife. Services were held at the Reorganized Church in Lucas, Elder John Blackstock officiating. Burial was in the Fry Hill Cemetery.

VOLZ.—Jennie Clark, was born on October 5, 1886, near Crosswell, Michigan, and died on October 21, 1948, in a Pontiac, Illinois, hospital following an automobile accident which occurred as she was returning to her home after General Conference. She spent her girlhood in Crosswell, later moving to Minden City, Michigan, where she was married to William C. Volz on December 25, 1907. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church for fifty years and was a teacher in the church school department.

She is survived by her husband; two sons: Clark and Harry Volz, both of Minden City; two daughters: Mrs. Helen Hodson, New Orleans, Louisiana, and Mrs. Ruth Wood, Harbor Beach, Michigan; a brother, Mose Clark of Crosswell; and eight grandchildren. Funeral services were held in the Minden City Reorganized Church, Elders James Phillips and Harold Richards officiating. Interment was in the Minden City cemetery.

GIMBLETT.—William Farley, was born March 23, 1883, in New Castle, England, and died December 11, 1948, at the General Hospital in Los Angeles, California. He came to America in 1911 and made his home in California in 1923. A member of the Reorganized Church, he held the office of deacon. He was never married and, for the past five years, lived alone.

He leaves a brother in England, and a sister Mrs. David Drysdale, of San Diego, California. Services were held at the Alexandria Funeral Home, Elder V. L. Lum officiating. Burial was in Rose Hill Memorial Park at Whittier, California.

ROBINSON.—Amanda Caroline, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Yancy Smith, was born in Tunnel Hill, Illinois, on January 6, 1864, and died at the Independence Sanitarium on December 1, 1948. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on November 28, 1886, and on September 10, 1909, was married to James M. Robinson.

Besides her husband, she leaves two daughters: Mrs. Lottie H. Leigh of Independence, Missouri, and Mrs. Iva O. Reeves of Torrington, Wyoming; three sons: William C. Ernest L., and Joseph H. Robinson, all of Independence; twenty-seven grandchildren; thirty-eight great-grandchildren; and one brother, Isaac M. Smith of Independence. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Glaude A. Smith at the George C. Carson Chapel. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

TAYLOR.—Jacob, was born February 3, 1863, at East Garafaxa, Ontario, and died November 18, 1948, at Grand Valley, Ontario. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church at Garafaxa on December 3, 1887, and remained a faithful member until his death. He was married on December 7, 1887, to Melissa Baker; they celebrated their diamond wedding anniversary last year. Seven children were born to them: six daughters: Mrs. George Cunningham, Mrs. Robert J. Farthing, and Mrs. Gordon Richardson of Grand Valley; Mrs. George Peden of Guelph, Ontario; Miss Vida Taylor of Toronto, Ontario; and Mrs. Gilbert McArthur, who preceded her father in death on September 7, 1948; and a son, Hillard Taylor, of East Luther. She was baptized on October 2, 1904, into the Reorganized Church by her father, Matthew Davis. On August 26, 1926, she was married to Roy L. Wilcox at Stone Church in Independence; twin sons were born to them. She was ever faithful to her covenant; cheerful, kindly, and helpful to those about her; a good wife and mother.

She is survived by her husband, Roy; her twin sons, Robert M. and Roy W., who are stationed at Fort Leavenworth with the Army; her father, Matthew Davis of Independence; two sisters: Mrs. Pearl Upp of Independence and Mrs. Effie Jane Evans of Kansas City, Missouri; and a brother, Virgil Inman Davis of Hollywood, California. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Glaude Smith at Stone Church. Interment was in Floral Hills Cemetery in Kansas City.

need is great today for women to interest themselves in civic affairs and world problems. The foundation of national greatness can be laid only in the industry, integrity, and spiritual elevation of the people. Children should be educated with regard to the great social duties and prerogatives that await them in after life. It is for women to bring an incorruptible integrity, dignity, and intelligence to society. They should be worthy keepers of the morals of their families, churches, communities, and nations. They should guard zealously against any infiltration of a lowering of standards.

The problem of the world is spiritual, not material; it is one of education and growth. We do not grow without effort. We need to keep the lamps of faith and hope burning if we are to progress to a worthy and effectual citizenship in Christ's kingdom.

Teach me to feel another's woe
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to other's show
That mercy show to me.

—Alexander Pope

The Aaronic Priesthood in Church Structure

church grows out of the spiritual homes of a generation ago. We tuck into bed each night tomorrow's church. God, who sees beyond the petty ambitions of today, is concerned with that church of tomorrow. It is no wonder that he provides for carrying into the childlife of today the spirit of faith and worship through the ministry of the visiting priest.

I could preach a sermon on the significance of the direction given to the priest to teach prayer "vocally and in secret." Only those who have found release in pouring out their souls to God can realize the therapeutic value of feeling that in him they have a friend who listens and understands and helps. Secret prayer is more than a mouthing of words. It is a catharsis that cleanses the soul from doubts and anxieties and admits the revealing light of understanding into obscure problems and hidden motives. It is a value that opens into the tired heart a reassuring presence that drives out fatigue and strengthens resolution with a new courage. God is aware of the complexities that confront and confuse us, the tensions that exhaust our emotional energies, the temptations that deplete our moral reserves. He provides in prayer a way of renewing our spiritual resources, and through the ministry of the priest, God does his part in assuring that from childhood on man shall be aware of this way. The priest shall teach them in the home to pray in secret.

But religion is more than a secret thing. Religion is a social experience. Man grows in strength from contact with man. And from men united, there emerges a product greater than the sum of the individuals. We have quoted until it has become trite the exiomatic promise of God, "Where two or three are met together in my name, there will I be in the midst of them." Too often we have used it as a justification for the sparsity of our congregations when less complacency and more diligence would have doubled the number. When Philip heard the voice of Jesus in Galilee, he went immediately to find Nathaniel. It is so today. He who has talked with Divinity will want to share that worshipful experience with another. And they who have shared will find in the sharing a multiplying of spiritual power in themselves. God knows that the spiritual experience defies all the laws of mathematics, because it multiplies even as you divide and share it. He knows that the reality of this fact is only realized as it is experienced, and he provides that this experience will be the early heritage of every child by sending into the home a priest with the commission to "teach them to pray vocally."

THE CRIME of modern civilization is the things it has done to the family. Hitler and Stalin have no monopoly on technics for supplanting the home with mechanized and institutionalized child care. The encroachment on the duties and prerogatives of the home have gone on apace in every land. From the time a child is born, he is fed from a bottle dangled in his mouth by a mechanical gadget suspended above his crib on a spring. A nurse changes his clothes with antiseptic efficiency. A cook takes his specially prepared food from a can. A mechanical walker teaches him his first steps. A blaring radio stimulates his first babble. When he is two years old, a station wagon calls for him and trundles him to nursery school where he learns to talk and play and think. In the next twenty years, the girl learns to cook from a domestic science teacher, to sew from a domestic arts teacher, to walk gracefully from a physical education teacher, to talk in the approved fashion from an English teacher, to think along approved lines from a political science teacher. She is taught the acceptable in art, music, and literature from people who have learned from people who have learned from people who have learned. A psychologist teaches her that religion is a narcissistic sex urge, that only those believe in God who have unnatural parental affection, that tender emotions are but crude rationalizations of base sensual desires. The mill grinds on, turning out a standardized product that has lost its individuality, the elation of personal dignity, and its sense of mission and destiny. Faced with the frustration of living in a world from which the meaning—but not the pain—has been eliminated, man loses himself in anti-social gratification of physical urges or escapes from the pointless whirl of reality by neurotic eccentricities.

Our highways become a maddening rush of power-crazy motorists headed no place and in a feverish hurry to get there. Crime stalks the streets ready to snatch at a purse or bludgeon a luckless wayfarer. Hotels and flophouses flourish as ill-concealed brothels. Gambling and vice accumulate pots of money to bribe the people's representative. The rich get richer and the poor—who used to get children—realize that they must pervert the impulses of nature or swelter in the soot and smell of city slums.

When will mankind learn that the soul of civilization lies in decent and orderly family life, where two parents share together the task of preparing tomorrow's people for tomorrow's task? God knew it, and he sent into the home a priest with the admonition to teach the members to attend to all family duties.

Here, then, in the realm of family living is the distinct area of responsible ministry for the priest. He shares the task with no one, and only when he fails shall the elder enter in a substitute role.

LET US TURN NOW to another aspect of temporal living. The child does not always remain with his roots attached to the secure foundation of the home. Adolescent rebellion is a sign of budding maturity. Self-sufficiency generates impatience with the established life of a parent's home and launches the young adult into a world of new associations. The child, growing up in a family circle, will abandon his self-centeredness for a broader identification of this self with the family interests.

As the temporal life is a preparation for the broader experience of the spiritual, so family life is the preparation for broader experiences in the society of men.

The function of the church is to take up where the family leaves off. Through the church school and youth groups, the church introduces the child to other children with common ideals and common experiences. The program of the church must be such as to advance these experiences in a manner that the child can feel he is sharing in the tasks of the church just as he has always shared in the tasks of the home. When he is able to so share, he grows in the feeling that this is his church, and there comes about a further identifying experience. He and the church become one. He loses himself in its mission. This is the significant truth symbolized in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, where every member takes into his being the life and mission of Jesus and becomes one with him in the ministry of salvation.

THE CHURCH is an institution uniting divergent temperaments and personalities in a common task. Blood lines and paternal authority hold the family together. In the nature of things, the church is not so securely knit. Mature men will resist any restricting chains. They will yield only to the pleadings of love and the negotiations of sympathetic understanding. Here is an area of ministry of supreme importance to the divine plan. And to this task, God called two other orders of the Aaronic priesthood—the teacher and the deacon. Their duties are listed in Doctrine and Covenants 17: 10.

They are to watch over the church, to be with the members and to strengthen them. Section 83 calls them to be standing ministers to the church. Theirs is certainly not an inferior role. Indeed, theirs is a key responsibility in the maintenance of the local congregation.

But theirs is more than a general commission. Specifically, their task is to oil the gears of meshing personalities and to bring together without clash the divergent individuals drawn in by the net of the gospel. Knowing that inequality is the source of covetousness and greed, they are to see that iniquity—the sin of “un-equity”—shall not exist in the church. This is not a negative task; it is a positive challenge to find the means of bringing together the needs of one and the surpluses or bounties of another. It involves the care of the poor and ministry to the needy.

The teacher, with the assistance of the deacon, shall be concerned with sin wherever it shall rear its ugly head, for he knows that God does not look upon sin with favor in the least agreeable ounce—that no institution can speak for God if her own skirts are soiled with the mire of wickedness.

But these ministers for God have much more to do. The nature of man is such that he needs the mutual support of other like-minded individuals if he is to retain his spiritual potency. If God could have saved the souls of men without a church, we may believe he would have done so. It is inherent in his nature that man must share with man or lose his humanness. The church is not a ream of paper decorated with diagrams of lines of authority. Neither is it a book relating God's dealings with man in other ages. Whitened temples do not make a church. No, a church is first and foremost people—people with common ideals, loyalties and purposes, people with shared experiences, people in fellowship bound together by their sense of unity, people meeting together to worship and study and plan for the onward progress of the plan. The teacher, assisted by the deacon, shall see that the members of the church do meet together often.

Finally, the teacher, assisted by the deacon, has the problem of individual ministry. He watches over the membership, helping each one find his place and duty in the church and respond to his obligation to labor therein.

I am challenged to dare to think what would happen in this church of ours if members of the Aaronic priesthood would consecrate themselves to the task assigned them and release the elders for the work of evangelism which is specifically theirs.

Thought for the Week

Have you ever considered that the longest journey is begun by taking a single step? Or that the most beautiful character is a combination of simple traits developed through the years?

“Not what we give, but what we share, for the gift without the giver is bare; Who gives himself with his alms feeds three, himself, his neighbor, and Me.”—James Russell Lowell.

PRESIDENT GARVER

President J. F. Garver is still seriously ill at his home at 307 West Kansas Street, Independence. He is receiving the best available medical attention, and also administration by the elders, and all are indulging the hope of his early recovery.

APOSTLE HANSON

Apostle Paul M. Hanson is recovering from injuries received in an automobile accident near Clarinda, Iowa, on Saturday, January 15. He is at the Municipal Hospital in that city, and from a statement made by phone on January 20, Brother Hanson is up and about the hospital, and will soon return to his home.

MARLIN, TEXAS. Arthur Rock, pastor, had baptized three persons before the beginning, a few weeks ago, of a series with Seventy Z. Z. Renfro. At the conclusion of the series, nine more were baptized, making twelve. In eighteen months, 39 persons have been baptized in this place. The Saints here finished and dedicated their church in 1947. They needed a pastor and united in prayer for help. Brother Rock, who was attending Baylor University at Waco, Texas, specializing in radio journalism, came to the church, the Saints believe, in answer to that prayer. They are very happy for the splendid service Brother Rock is giving them.

Brother Renfro, reporting the above facts, wishes to inform his friends that he is recovering from the throat operation which held up his work for a time. In spite of it, he has baptized 31 persons since the operation—making a total of 108 in the last two years.

DES MOINES, IOWA

Another report to Apostle D. T. Williams comes from Herbert Scott, pastor at Des Moines, Iowa. Brother Scott is author of a fine new book, "How to Increase Sunday Night Attendance." He reports: "Last week Ralph Wicker and I went to Melcher, Iowa, where we have fifteen L. D. S. families. We visited them and the result was a desire to have services there. We arranged to meet in the home of Elder and Mrs. James Robinson and open a mission on January 30. Last night we organized the West Des Moines group. Brother McDonald and I have been visiting every Tuesday night there conducting a class. Now the group has grown to over 25 members and they want Sunday services. We plan to start January 23. Recently we baptized four new members as a result of the efforts of the group."

INDEPENDENCE AND JACKSON COUNTY celebrated the inauguration of President Harry S. Truman by giving one of its principal arteries of traffic a new name—"Truman Road." Beginning in Kansas City as Fifteenth Street, it became Van Horn Road on its way to Independence. Subject to our early pioneer street plan, it dwindled to an alley and finally stopped. However, as Truman Road, it will be cut through and join one of our main roads across the county to honor the name of the most prominent citizen of Independence, of Missouri, and of the nation. . . . Colonel Robert T. Van Horn, who loses by this change, was a pioneer statesman, went to Congress, owned and published a newspaper, the "Kansas City Journal of Commerce," which later became the "Kansas City Journal," and in recent years, after a varied history, went out of business.

An International Boy

One of our younger missionaries, Michael Eugene Theys (son of Seventy Eugene A. Theys) has been called "The International Boy" by his barber (klapper in Dutch), because he speaks in three languages. He keeps up his American English in conversation with his mother, but occasionally teases her by talking in Dutch, which he is learning rapidly from his friends, both young and old. And when his father comes home from Germany, where his principal work is, the lad talks with him in German.

Mickey is going to kindergarten this year, the usual age at which Dutch children begin their education. He was three last November 16.

Prayer for Baptisms in 1949

WE ARE PRAYING for a great ingathering in 1949. There are many reasons why we should pray. Let us all do it: daily in our personal and family devotions, frequently in our worship together. Let this chain of prayer reach round the world and bind the whole church together and to God.

There are many reasons why we should pray for the souls of men. Perhaps the first of these reasons is that honest and earnest prayer is always followed by honest and earnest work; and we need to do plenty of such work for our own sakes and for the Kingdom's sake.

Again, honest and earnest prayer is always followed by an endowment of the Holy Spirit; and we need such an endowment for our own sakes and for the Kingdom's sake.

Then, too, honest and earnest prayer, followed by an endowment of the Holy Spirit, guarantees modern miracles of salvation; and we need to witness and to share in such miracles for our own sakes and for the Kingdom's sake.

And yet again, honest and earnest prayer, followed by an endowment of the Holy Spirit and attested by miracles of salvation, commends the Cause to many who will never be reached by mere logic or debate; and we need those who listen with their hearts as well as with their heads, for our own sakes and for the Kingdom's sake.

And still again, honest and earnest prayer, followed by an endowment of the Holy Spirit, attested by miracles of salvation, and attracting many who listen with their hearts as well as with their heads cleanses community life; and we must cleanse community life for our own sakes and for the Kingdom's sake.

And yet once again, honest and earnest prayer, followed by an endowment of the Holy Spirit, attested by miracles of salvation, attracting many who listen with their hearts, and acting as a cleansing agent in community life, lifts up the hearts of the faithful and gives them a foretaste of certain victory in Christ; and we need such a foretaste of victory for our own sakes and for the Kingdom's sake.

Baptisms in 1948

Nineteen forty-eight was a good missionary year for the church. The figures just to hand show that 3,706 baptisms were reported. This is the highest total since 1930 and is 217 better than last year, which was also a good year.

For purposes of statistics, we count our baptismal gains in numbers and percentages, but behind these figures stand an impressive number of fine people from every walk of life who have joined us this year in the pledge of discipleship and in fellowship under God. If all of our new kinsmen in Christ were together in one place at one time, there would be enough of them to organize a stake or they could immediately take rank among the largest districts in the church.

At the Stone Church in Independence those who are baptized during any month are officially welcomed into the church at the communion service of the following month. This is an excellent practice which might well be copied in many places. But many have not been in any such fashion officially welcomed. We hope that these will accept from our hearts our assurances of comradeship in the great Cause.

F. H. E.

Missionary Emphasis

Wednesday morning we visited the group of fine young men who are meeting at the Appointees' Institute at the Auditorium. All of them have had experience in church work, and carrying some responsibility of importance. Meeting together, receiving instruction from church leaders and departmental workers, under the direction of F. M. McDowell, they are improving their ability to serve. They will soon return to their fields of labor.

One of these young men was converted in a local congregation of Independence. Engaging in personal missionary work as a volunteer, working under local direction, he won many converts to the church. Last year, simply doing part-time missionary work, he baptized twenty-two persons. Now he has been called into full-time work under appointment.

A friend of another faith, a minister, stopped with us for a visit. During the conversation, he mentioned a laymen's movement in which members of the church—those not ordained nor under appointment—are trained for personal contact missionary work. They are given instruction in how to tell people the message of the church, to extend an invitation, to explain and answer any questions. They do not visit homes indiscriminately. Members of their congregations give them names and addresses for their "prospect" lists, and they visit these. Fine results are being realized.

Our present generation of church members needs a return of the missionary zeal and activity which characterized our parents and grandparents in the church. They told the gospel story, and the church membership increased steadily. Today, too many of us leave that work for the missionaries, and the gains have lagged. Once more, the members of the church must go into action.

FAITH FOR THE FUTURE

Faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen.—Hebrews 11: 1, Revised Standard Version.

THE BIBLE is a book of places and of people and of experiences and of stories. It invites us to look at these experiences, rather than to plod through wordy definitions; but in this text, for once, the Bible is a prosy schoolmaster that says, "Faith is the assurance of things hoped for." And the very next minute, the writer becomes an artist and paints into this definition all the beautiful pictures which help us to see the rich and vivid and soul-stirring things that faith really comprises. The pictures crowd the canvas. "By faith, Abel;" "by faith, Enoch"; "by faith, Noah"; "by faith, Moses." And soon this prosy definition begins to glow with meaning and significance because it shines in the faces of men and of women who live by faith.

What is faith? Jesus called it an essential to all worthy living. "Without faith it is impossible," he said, "to please God." "Ye believe in God," he said, "believe also in me."

If he found faith anywhere in a disciple or a stranger on the highway, he expressed his delight in it; many times he said, "Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace." And on one occasion, he said, "If ye have faith so much as a grain of mustard seed, ye could say to the mountains, Be thou removed into the sea," and that thing would happen.

Faith is the whole of human living according to the words of Jesus, "He that believeth shall be saved," and he that hath not faith shall be condemned. Faith is not blind credulity, either. Faith is not flogging ourselves to accept something we simply cannot believe. Faith is not covering over something that we half suspect to be false.

Faith is something that invites us to put our belief out in the open and to explore and to examine it. Science, history, and criticism are all welcomed by faith rather than banished by it. And if we protest any time to the questioning of people, in regard to our place, we are admitting that our life is built on a foundation we dare not trust. We are demonstrating thereby not our faith but our fears, for rightfully understood, faith is never opposed to reason; faith is the ally of reason. It is basic to all reason. It is faith that plants its flag on the land that is unknown, and then invites people to explore it.

I LOST A VERY GOOD FRIEND last week; he died of the dread disease, cancer. I'm glad, and I know you are, that faith and science working together are launching an increasing attack on this scourge of mankind. And how must that attack proceed? By reason? Yes. By all the weapons of knowledge and experiments that science can bring. Medical science can explore, but before that scientific process can even begin, faith must walk out to plant a flag on this unknown land. Without faith, no scientist, no doctor, no experimentalist, no technician would ever engage in the crusade against cancer. These men are saying in effect, "We do not know how this thing happened. We do not know how this scourge has fastened itself upon mankind, but we do believe it can be conquered."

Without this belief, without this faith, not one step, not one dollar, not one experiment would be invested to find ultimately the cure for this disease which afflicts us. Let faith be lost, and science would be helpless. The cure for this difficulty will come because faith and science work hand in hand. The cure for cancer, if we were to apply the text, is the assurance of things hoped for and a conviction about things not yet seen.

Faith is the birthright of mankind. We all have faith as surely as we all have doubts, and when you have doubts, it's wise to keep them to yourself. Nobody gives a rusty nail about your doubts, but everyone is blessed and helped by your convictions, by your faith.

The precious things of life are built by our faith, not our doubt. Our affirmations, our soul's convictions, bless mankind and lift the world toward God. But let us turn to these pictures in this chapter—not to the definitions, but to the pictures—to learn what are the ingredients of a faith for the future.

This chapter in the Bible, the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, has been called the "Hall of Heroes," and at the distance from which we have to view these people—Abraham and Joseph and Moses—they are an assembly of heroes. But what fools they must have seemed to the people who were their contemporaries. They wouldn't recognize them as heroes; they would say, "They're crazy." They were thought mad to do the things they did.

BY FAITH, we are told, Enoch walked with God. He didn't cover the world; he didn't sell men's souls down the river to possess a million dollars. He walked with God. He didn't strive and spend all his days to the accumulation of things that were not eternal. He probably had a little shelter from the storm, a stack of fuel to keep him warm, and some clothing and food, but this was all he asked. He didn't hurry breathless from one unfinished task to another. He didn't hop from twig to twig to twig as the sparrows do, and sometimes we do. He walked—he walked with God. He was convinced there was a living presence around him and within him. If ever a man tested the modern poet's words, Enoch did:

Speak to him, Thou, for he heareth,
And spirit with spirit can meet,
Nearer is he than breathing
And closer than hands and feet.

And Enoch did speak with God. Perhaps the first time he spoke he heard no answer. He never heard a voice. Perhaps he had to train himself to know how to speak to God, and to know how to listen and hear when God spoke to him, but he clung to his faith, and soon he had companionship with God. Then his contemporaries said of him, "Enoch walked with God."

I have always liked the little girl's definition of this story. She heard the lesson in Sunday school one day, and when she went home, she told her mother about it. This was her version: "God and Enoch used to take long walks together, and one day they walked a little further; and God said to Enoch, 'You must be tired. Come on home with me.'"

God and Enoch walked a little further, and Enoch by faith, saw some things that were priceless and eternal and worth the devotion of his life.

"By faith Abraham went out, not knowing where he went." Could anything be less logical than that? If I were to say to you, "I'm going," and you asked, "Where?" And I replied, "I don't know," you'd say, "He's crazy." But by faith, we are told, Abraham went out not knowing whither he went to "look for a city, that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God." So he sacrificed home and friendships and business associations and pleasure. If we have a visual eye, we can see him riding across the desert on his camel, with the mocking laughter and scoffing of his friends ringing in his ears, to look for an unknown city. Where would the adventure lead him? He wouldn't know, but he knew that if he went forward to give obedience to the commands of God that had come to him, that which he would find would make a contribution to the great purposes of God for all mankind. And he says, "What we have once seen to be true, by that let us live." If the truth fades, then let us still travel on that in the memory of the truth, until the truth once more becomes a present vision. Let us go out to search for the city whose maker and builder is God.

LOOK AGAIN AT MOSES—"by faith Moses." He's almost the strangest of all in this "Hall of Heroes." He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God. He deliberately rejected the finest opportunity for advancement that the world of his day had to offer him. He threw aside the treasures and the pleasures and the power of the Egyptian court which could have been his for the taking. And he chose something else.

What was the rival attraction? It was the opportunity to be persecuted with a mob of slaves. We call Moses a hero now. We rate him as one of the two or three greatest prophets the world has ever known. But suppose he were living in our day and did the things he did then—what would we think of Moses? How would he stand up in our estimation? In spite of the opportunities that were his, he went out to give himself in service to the children of God, to be misunderstood, to be persecuted, to be rejected by them, and to traverse with them for forty years the wilderness of Sinai.

The climax of folly in these interesting pictures that reveal the truth of this definition in the Bible is not completed with Moses. We are told that by faith men met violence of fire; by faith they accepted torture for conscience' sake, and pleaded not for deliverance, because they hoped for a better resurrection; by faith they were torn asunder, they wandered destitute. And the reward of faith wasn't the fact that everything went smooth for them; the reward of faith to them was often death. "These all having received a good report through faith, died." This language is cruelly blunt and makes doubly clear to us the fact that, though we walk by faith, these people walked by faith in the purposes that were God's purposes. They did not always obtain their objectives in this life; they did not achieve the kingdom in their day.

But listen—by every test we know, by every truth we can explore we know these people have their own reward; we know these people have made a contribution to our day that is eternal, and though Moses himself may not have some definite part in the final triumph in the kingdom of God, the kingdom could not be achieved if it were not for the work done by Moses, Enoch, Abel, and other worthy men of faith all down through the ages. And we are where we are in the opportunities that we have to make a contribution to tomorrow because of the faith that has been demonstrated and

Elder Jack A. Pray, Chatham, Ontario, writes:

At every Christmas season, we notice the emphasis placed upon the advent by other denominations. Services are held on Christmas Eve, or in the morning. While thousands of other Christians go to church, we Latter Day Saints are at home sleeping or having our gift exchange.

Sister Pray, being a former Roman Catholic, always calls my attention to this matter, and I have heard many of our faith express their feelings in favor of our having a more especial emphasis.

Is there any way you could encourage all of our congregations to institute a Christmas Eve service?

We, this year, attended a service at 11 p.m. in a beautiful church in Indiana, but it was disappointing. The service, though well arranged, was cold and spiritless.

Thanks for the suggestion, Brother Pray. We shall be pleased to hear from others on the subject.

We are pleased to give our readers the benefit of President Gleazer's message when he responded to the presentation to Graceland College of the bust of the late President Frederick M. Smith on December 2:

I consider it a great honor to receive this bust of Frederick Madison Smith for Graceland College. It seems to me that its presentation to the institution of the youth of this church has singular appropriateness. For President Frederick M. Smith loved young people. I shall not soon forget the hours he took from his busy schedule to talk with me about my life's plans and the way they might be related to the program of the church. There are many young men and women throughout the church who can testify of the encouragement and stimulation which came to them through this prophet and leader.

And Brother Smith was deeply interested in education. He sensed so many times the greatness of the work to which we have set our hands and the imperative need for minds and hands skilled through training and discipline. His life was the best witness to his estimate of education's importance. Constantly his advice to youth was, "Go on, go as far as you can go in training for your work." The contribution of spiritual guidance he did not discount but felt that man should sharpen his God-given intellect through the educational processes made available to him.

Frederick M. Smith loved Graceland College. After two years at a large state university—the University of Iowa—he returned to Lamoni and enrolled as a student in that new, small, unknown church college just beginning its existence in the France Block in downtown Lamoni. And in 1898, he was graduated as the entire class of that year. In his commencement oration, Graceland's future and purpose was his theme.

In the good spirit of this hour, we receive the bust of Frederick Madison Smith from the young people of the church and for the new library which will bear his name, but even more, we dedicate ourselves anew to the hopes and dreams our fathers in the church have had for this place of learning.

From Elder David Donaldson, Route 2, Pensacola, Florida, under date of January 2, 1949:

Today I am celebrating by ninety-eighth birthday by attending church and partaking of the sacrament of our Lord. My membership is with the Bellview group. Elder L. G. Tipton is pastor.

I was baptized in the year of 1874, by Elder Ned Powell at Milton, Florida, and ordained to the Aaronic priesthood in the year of 1877. I am able to handle myself well and go about if some one will go with me, as I am not able to see very well, but my mind is clear, and I do enjoy meeting with the Saints.

Today I was asked to bear my testimony and am happy to say that I know this to be the true church of Jesus Christ. I have the testimony and am happy in the fact that the world cannot take it away. Truly it has come with power and much assurance. I have seen the sick healed and the broken-hearted given strength. I only wish I had the chance to tell of the many wonderful testimonies I have received over such a long period of years. Jesus is coming. I do not believe it will be long, and he will come to claim his bride, the church. I sincerely pray we will all be ready.

Brother Heman C. Smith came to this country as a missionary about the year of 1877-78, and I went on a mission with him, helping him in every way I could. The country was wild with very little means of transportation, so we made our way to Choctahatchee Bay and hired a Negro boy with a skiff to take us on an extended trip. Night came on and as Brother Smith and the Negro slept on the beach, I gathered some driftwood and made myself a bed in a tree; so we journeyed on into the heart of Florida, talking, preaching, and visiting wherever we had an opportunity. We baptized eleven at Gainsville, Florida, and organized a small branch. This journey took us about two months. If one made this journey today it would take only hours, but then it was quite an undertaking; but we were full of zeal for the work and counted it but a little thing.

On our return trip, we made our way to the Gulf of Mexico, and took passage on a two-masted schooner. After several hours out, we were overtaken by a hurricane and had to ride out the storm. Brother Smith was very sick, but I managed to stay up. After many hours, we sighted land and the storm died down; we landed at Pensacola and made our way home.

I pray that the grace of God will be with us all and his church will eventually be victorious.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Daily Bread

This is the first year the church has published Daily Bread, a pocket-sized monthly guide for personal and family devotions. At the recent General Conference, sample copies of Daily Bread were passed around among the ministers and delegates and met with instant and warm approval. However, the initial subscription list is not as high as we had hoped. Word from the Herald House indicates 2,797 subscriptions on January 18. I had hoped we would have twice that many by this time. We are not primarily interested in the number sold, but we are very much interested in the spiritual growth of the Saints. I do not think anyone can read Daily Bread regularly and in the mood of worship without being greatly enriched thereby. I do not think any minister can study Daily Bread without finding therein many sermon suggestions and illustrations. And I do not think any branch whose members use Daily Bread consistently will fail to receive a marked endowment of the Spirit and a steady growth in understanding and effectiveness.

Christmas Will Come Again

By J. A. Koehler

CHRISTMAS, 1948, IS OVER; even the "shouting" is over. But Christmas will come again.

There will be "another [Christmas] day;" and another, and another—another day, probably, that will be very much like yesterday.

Yesterday was a merry day; we had "glorious" times—one kind of glorious time, for this person and another for that. There was laughing, and there was crying. No matter how stout the heart, there was melting to tears—tears of sympathy and of pity and tears of hopes deferred, which "maketh the heart sad." But, all in all, it was a good day.

Nothing determines the goodness or badness of days more than attitudes. Personality has much to do with making Christmas time bad or good. I know one person who had a very good time giving away about everything she had to give. Others may have had a bad time because they did not get. Yesterday was not a good day for some, because what they got was not costly—because the price was not high. But there are others, even though they received nothing costly, who had a good time on Christmas, because to them, "Tis the thought that gives the gift its value; it is not what the price list tells."

Many widows and orphans and distressed persons shared the joys of others on Christmas Day. But that amelioration, for all but a few, will not be enduring. They will still be objects of pity when "tomorrow is another Christmas Day"—should they live to see that day. Christmas is not their "salvation."

NOR IS CHRISTMAS the salvation of nations. We said, "Peace on earth, good will to men," but did nothing effectual about it. Christmas or not, there will not be peace on earth tomorrow. Even had all the rich emptied their pocketbooks to give to all the poor yesterday, the conditions of peace on earth would not have been fulfilled. For except we exceed that righteousness, "we" shall not enter the kingdom. There must be good-willing of another category to bring peace on earth. We should know that after more than 1,748 celebrations of a nativity.

Personal righteousness, personal good-willing, is not the only determinant in human affairs. It is not the only willing good-doing that is requisite to peace on earth. Persons cannot perform the offices of peoples; and it is the good-willing of peoples—which, of course, are composed of persons—that conditions peace on earth. So, notwithstanding more than 1,748 Christmases, we shall not have peace tomorrow.

"Good will toward men." What kind of "good will"? Good will to which men? These are some of the questions raised by the record of Christendom's good-willing. For when Protestants had power to do so, they persecuted Catholics, as Catholics persecuted Protestants when they had the power to do so. And that was after we had celebrated more than a thousand Christmases. In fact, after nearly 2,000 celebrations, there is still some of that "good will" in "Christian" blood. And there may continue to be such "good will" unless we get some different ideas about "the Nativity."

OUR IDEAS about the birth of Jesus emerged from a milieu of apostasy. Both Messianic Christianity and prophetic Judaism had gone "by the board" when the first certain traces of the Christmas festival were found between A.D. 180 and 192. The tendency of every religion is to have "one language and one speech." So, long before you and I were born, Christendom had come to have a Christmas way of talking about Jesus.

Nor is it surprising that one of the best men of the Christian world—about 450 years ago—wrote, "Away in a manger, no crib for a bed, the little Lord Jesus laid down his sweet head," and so on and on, as in the majority of the songs we sing at Christmas time. It does seem that such songs must have been written for little children, not for big men.

Now there is nothing to indicate that this is a good way of talking about Jesus, but there is something which indicates that it is bad. And if it is bad, it might prove to be a good if something should happen, as it did at the Tower of Babel—something that would cause us to "not understand one another's speech," so that, through having gotten other ideas, we might come to talk about Jesus in a very different way.

I am sure that those miracles of history, the Hebrew prophets, looked forward to Jesus' day much more understandingly than the "great" men of Apostasy looked backward. I am sure, also, that it is in the light of the religion of those men, who "spoke as they were moved upon by the Holy Ghost," that Jesus is to be truly appreciated. And I am quite as sure that "cribs and cradles," and all such like, is not the language of that appreciation.

But before we quote that language, let us reflect a moment upon the characteristic of prophetic Judaism. And a very little reflection, to whoever remembers the Bible story, should suffice.

EVER SINCE THE DAY that "God said unto Abram . . . I will make of thee a great nation" (Genesis 12:1-3), the men who "were moved upon by the Holy Ghost" were engrossed with ideas of and plans respecting the constitution of "society" as one of the two determinants in human affairs. So that the characteristic of prophetic Judaism was this: it was a civil-mode Kingdom-building religion. Israel was a "nation-minded" people. And I do mean "a people." Prophetic Judaism related "a people" to God as an instrument of nation-blessing, or of accomplishing God's purpose in man. "In thee shall all the families [the nations, that is] of the earth be blessed." (See Genesis 12: 1-3 in connection with 18: 18.)

Abram "looked for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God."—Hebrews 11: 10. And in the light of that nation-blessing mission—that nation-blessing through the building of "a city"—we may interpret Simeon, when he spoke respecting the advent of Jesus (which of natural necessity was as a babe), "A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel."

What Simeon said was that which other prophets of the coming Kingdom had said—as Haggai said, "I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of Hosts." What Simeon said is that which prophecy as a whole had said. And no passage in that prophecy sums it up more beautifully than this:

For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder . . . to establish it with judgment and with justice . . . And his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.—Isaiah 9: 6, 7.

Unto "us." Unto this "house." Unto this "people." Unto this "nation." Isaiah 9: 6, 7 is but another form of the prophecy that "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee [and unto this people] a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me [a civil-mode Kingdom-builder]; unto him shall ye hear-en."—Deuteronomy 18: 15. And it is because "God so loved the world" that "unto us a child [was] born." God gave "his only begotten Son" because he would have "the government"—the government of "good will" toward all men.

IT IS NOT NECESSARY to quote all the testimony. Surely you must know that it all adds up to this: the birth of Jesus has "national" significance. And that significance is this: "the government" shall be ordered with judgment and established with justice under his enlightening and inspiring influence—not under his "power" as some still believe. "The zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform this." And "of the increase of his peace" there shall be no end; because of the increase of his "government" there shall be no end—a government, the seat of the authority of which is to be the seat of the civil authority of "my people."

What did Jesus do to assure that one day "the government" would be ordered with judgment and established with justice? Not that which Moses had done, for that was wholly unnecessary. Jesus did not concern himself with the question of the social constitution as a determinant in human affairs, but with the question of personality. For the only hope of "the government" is a body of "persons" who will to do the good unto men that can be done only through the means of godly government. Jesus only looked forward to the day (which has not yet come) when some "people" shall understand the meaning, the institutional implications, of the "New Commandment," so that they shall do something about the "old." For the commandment to make human society, to make the government, the community, the "city," an incarnation of "the word," is as old as Bible religion itself. Enoch understood that. So did Abram and Moses and all the prophets. And so did Jesus. That is the thing for which he taught his disciples to pray, "Thy Kingdom come," that is to say, "Thy will be done on earth," or in earthly relations, as is indicated in Genesis 1: 28 and in many other places.

That is the willing good-doing without which there can be no peace on earth.

Herod knew something about Judaism. So it was not because "a child" was born that he sought to take its life. He feared no mere birth of a child. What he feared was a real competitor in the business of human living together. He feared because it was written that "out of thee shall come a governor."

Think of how helpless we are severally, however good-willed we may be, to do that which must be done to bring peace on earth. Only peoples can do that, and they can do it only through government. There is no way to make the Christmas spirit effectual except through institutionalizing the good will of him whose manhood, instead of whose infancy, we should celebrate at Christmas time.

Christmas will come again. And if, when it does come, we shall endeavor to express the "Restoration" appreciation of Jesus, we may be hard put to find better language than this:

"Unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder"—the government which Restoration calls "the cause of Zion"—"to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice." And because of the increase of his "government" and peace, there shall be no end, he shall be called, Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, THE PRINCE OF PEACE!

The Thorn in the Flesh

By Evan A. Fry

Lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, Lest I should be exalted above measure. For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake; for when I am weak, then am I strong. I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me; for I ought to have been commended of you; for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing. Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.—II Corinthians 12: 7-12.

A CERTAIN NEWSPAPER COLUMNIST whom I often read with much interest recently based his daily column on a list of the world's richest and most influential men—a list compiled sometime during the late 1920's as I remember. The story of the column had to do with what has happened to them since. Not one is still rich. One was mercifully paroled from prison just in time to die at home. One died impoverished and in debt to his friends. Some were touched by scandal and died in disgrace. Several died by their own hands. Not one is now a prominent or influential figure; not one died rich. I refer to this story only because it illustrates a point we very often fail or refuse to recognize—that it is usually in those who seem to be the strongest that we find the most abject manifestations of weakness. If I were to ask you to name a list of the world's most powerful men, selecting them from any and all ages of history, your mind would revert to the great military men such as Cæsar, Alexander the Great, Napoleon, and Hitler who a few years ago was a powerful man all the world feared. Where are they? All dead, their power gone, their ambitions frustrated before they died as weak, pitiful men.

On the other hand, the demonstrations of strength in those who are looked upon by the world as hopelessly handicapped and weak are so numerous and so unremarkable that we regard them almost as commonplace. Edison was deaf; Steinmetz, a hunchback; Stevenson, a tubercular; Franklin D. Roosevelt, a paralytic; Byron was club-footed; Glenn Cunningham was horribly burned and told he would never walk again; Milton was blind; Francis Parkman was so nearly blind that he wrote volume after volume of his historical works by following the wires on a frame arranged over his paper, while suffering excruciating headaches. And the roster of men who have overcome disadvantages of their environment is still longer—George Washington Carver, born a negro slave; Lincoln, born in a log cabin; Poe was an alcoholic; Cowper was melancholic to the point of insanity. Strength is very often manifest in apparent weakness.

One who is under an infirmity of body or an infirmity of environment is often so cautious of what strength and opportunity he has, and so well-disciplined from within, that he accomplishes more than the person who is completely free from infirmity or disability or obstacles to achievement. It is literally true that many if not most of the people who achieve, do so not in spite of their infirmities, but because of them.

JESUS NEVER PROMISED his followers immunity from trial, infirmity, or weakness. In fact, he specifically warned to the contrary: "In the world ye shall have tribulation." But he added, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." The tribulation of the world—the thorn in the flesh—comes for some specific end, by God's permission, if not by his appointment. It comes to us not out of God's caprice or willfulness, but for a purpose. Our task is to strive to see the purpose and the message of our own particular thorn in the flesh or to find how it may be turned to our good. We do not need to presume to judge another or to tell him why he suffers while we, for the moment, go free. The characters who sat down with Job and attempted to find the cause of his tribulation in some secret sin thought him too stubborn to confess compare quite unfavorably with Job himself, who, after plumbing the depths of despair, emerged with at least a partial answer to the problem of why all that evil had come upon him.

Bodily infirmities or weaknesses, or tribulations from without, tend to do several things for us—if we will let them. They cut up the pride and conceit we have in our own strength—which seems to be natural for all who have always been healthy, strong, independent, and self-reliant. Such people tend to come to the conclusion that the source of their strength is within themselves, and the source is inexhaustible. Sickness and infirmity teach us we need to take care of ourselves, that we are in the long run not limitless or independent sources of power, but dependent on a power outside ourselves. They teach us that all the functions of the body are not necessary to an intellectual or a spiritual experience—that the body is designed to serve mind and spirit, not to rule it. How often have you seen it happen that weakness of body brings a new strength of spirit? How often have you gone to see someone you thought needed cheering up and comforting because of some physical affliction, only to find that you yourself had been cheered and strengthened by the very presence of the one you went to comfort? Weakness of body may bring strength of spirit. Blindness of the physical eyes may bring light to the spiritual sight, as it did in the poem of "The Blind Ploughman," who thanked God for taking away his eyes, that his soul might see. Pain may bring peace which could not be found in the self-willed impetuosity of health.

The weaker we are, the more obviously any achievements and triumphs which come to us are Christ's. He is essential in our lives, as he was in the life of Paul, who said, "I can do all things through Christ, which strengthened me." Paul's "thorn in the flesh," whatever it was, must have been particularly hard for him to bear, for it was something which seemed to keep him from the service he wanted to perform for his master. Yet his very weakness and tribulation brought him into places and situations where he could never have gone in his own strength. Only a fool would have deliberately chosen to go to Rome in chains as a means of spreading the gospel there; but when that trial was forced upon Paul, he made even that ignominious state and helpless condition a means of preaching Christ and bearing witness in the very court of the Cæsars.

THERE ARE TWO WAYS of making a burden lighter. One way is to take off some of the burden; the other is to give the bearer strength to bear it. In Paul's case God did not remove an ounce of the burden; rather he increased it to the extent that Paul could humbly brag that he was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles. But he made the burden lighter by giving Paul strength to bear whatever tasks were placed upon him, and whatever trials came to him.

Weakness, illness, and tribulation are not things to be cherished or sought after as good things in themselves. But they are useful if they make us realize our limitations and our dependence on God, and provide against that weakness by partaking of his strength. Not until we know

"As a Man Thinketh"

By STEPHEN BLACK

"AS A MAN THINKETH in his heart so is he." This true statement is found in the twenty-third chapter of Proverbs, verse seven. King Solomon was renowned in his day for his wisdom, and yet this statement has as much significance for us today as it had in the days of ancient Israel.

Another wise man, Marcus Aurelius, who lived somewhat nearer our time, wrote in his book, Meditations, "Our life is what our thoughts make it." Although this was written over eighteen hundred years ago, we find it is just as true now as when it was written. Today we find that our thoughts influence everything we do and say. They condition our bodies, influence our choice in the products we buy, determine those with whom we associate and cause us to vote the way we do; but most important, our thoughts determine the God we worship.

Some of us are like the man who devoted his life to the getting and saving of money. This man kept a shop, and in his shop he kept a safe. And in the safe in the back of his shop, he kept his life savings. Each night he would open the safe and add the day's profits to the amount already there. He would count it, rearrange it, and then lock the safe again. And as the hours rolled by day after day, the thought of all this treasure stored in the back of his shop molded a strange quirk in his already avaricious character. This peculiarity was discovered by a holdup man one night as he stepped into the shop. The shop was vacant except for the proprietor. The bandit stuck the gun in the shopkeeper's ribs and marched him into the back room and demanded that he open the safe. When the shopkeeper hesitated, the holdup man told him to open the safe or he'd kill him right there. The shopkeeper slowly turned and looked the holdup man in the eye and, with deep feeling, said, "Kill me if you want to. I've my life savings in that safe, and I'm not going to open it." The bandit looked at him in amazement, and stepping back, replied, "Man, you sure do love money." Then he turned on his heel and walked out of the shop.

In the same situation, few of us would have been so lucky as the shopkeeper. We would have been robbed or shot or perhaps both. Although most of us do not go to this extreme, we do, nevertheless, turn our thoughts toward this same materialistic god, and if we were confronted with the sudden choice of serving God or mammon, we would follow after our thoughts even as our friend the shopkeeper. "Our life is what our thoughts make it."

CERTAIN SCRIBES AND PHARISEES came to Jesus, and when they saw his disciples eating with dirty hands, they found fault. It was their custom to wash before they ate—which is, of course, a very good idea. But when the Pharisees pressed Jesus for an answer, he accused them of following after the traditions of men rather than keeping the commandments of God—of honoring God with their lips, while their hearts were far from him. He also pointed out that honoring father and mother was more important than the tradition of washing hands. But the Pharisees had made the word of God of no effect because of their traditions. In other words, their minds were so centered on keeping the customs of their fathers, that when it came time to think of the things of God, their thoughts were clouded. Christ pointed out that thinking was no longer characteristic of the leaders of Israel, and went on to say, "There is nothing from without, that entering into man, can defile him, which is food; but the things that come out of him; those are they that defile the man, that proceedeth forth out of the heart." Later, the disciples asked the Master for an explanation, and he said, "Whatsoever thing from without entering into the man, cannot defile him because it entereth not into his heart, but into the belly, and goeth out in to the draught, purging all meats. That which cometh out of a man, defileth the man. For from within out of the hearts of men proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness; all these things come from within, and defile the man." From this we know that Jesus recognized the importance of pure thoughts in the hearts of men. We also know, if we follow the Scriptures, that we may become like the Pharisees—good, according to tradition and in the sight of the world, but in the sight of God, our thoughts may damn us and retard or even destroy our chances of redemption in this life.

EVERY MAN'S THOUGHTS are his companions. Most of us are very careful in the choice of our friends or companions. A good companion can indeed change the course of a man's life. And so a bad companion can involve us in things not of our liking, and may, after long association, destroy us completely. In view of this, then, why are we surprised when we read of an outstanding citizen—a good man morally and in every other way—who suddenly falls? In looking into this man's life, we find that his companions and friends are all that a good man's should be. What then has caused his downfall? Some of us might conclude he was mentally sick, and that conclusion would probably be true. For in spite of his outward companions, his thoughts—which were his inner companions—slowly molded his character so that when the supreme test came, his reaction was one that brought about his fall. "We cannot tell by looking at the leaves of the trees, from where its roots are sucking sap." If we would really know a man, we should find out what he is thinking, for "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he."

The French philosopher, Montague, said: "A man is not hurt so much by what happens as by his opinion of what happens." To illustrate this truth—there were two financiers caught in the stock market crash in 1929. Both of these men lost their entire fortune. One of them took in the situation and thought to himself, "Well, I'm broke, but in a way it will be a blessing, I won't have to worry all the time about how I'm to keep my fortune. I can spend my time in making a living in some way; I always have, and when I go home at night, I'll be able to sleep without taking pills." This man had healthy thoughts and made the necessary adjustment without too much difficulty. The other man's thoughts, when he found out he had lost everything, went something like this: "All that I had in this world is gone. I worked for sixteen hours a day, went without many of the comforts and pleasures of this life to create my fortune, and now it's gone. I can't face life without my money; I can't live without it." And so he leaped out of the twentieth story window of his office building and took his own life. Here were two men who had lived similar lives, yet when confronted with a crisis, reacted differently because of the thoughts they had companioned and fostered during their lives.

WE HEAR A LOT about environment and the effect it has on the lives of young people. No doubt it is true that it does have an effect, but the effect it has depends a great deal upon the way the young person thinks about his environment. If a youngster says, "I am a victim of circumstances. If I were born and grew up on the other side of the track, I would be better than I am." That sort of person is just kidding himself. But if his thoughts are healthy, he'll be thinking, "I may live in a poor neighborhood, and I may not have all the advantages some of the others have, but I'm going to take advantage of the opportunities I do have, learn to live a useful life, and make my own way." Many times we find this difference in thinking right in the same family, and as two children grow up, one will become a good citizen and the other will become a criminal. One contributes to society, and the other becomes a social liability. "Our life is what our thoughts make it."

A man who will do great deeds must first have great and noble thoughts, for all things are created first of the spirit. Evil is created first by the evil spirit and good by the godly spirit. Our thoughts are spiritual; even though they are evil, they are spiritual. They will motivate our course and mold our character. We might wear a mask throughout most of our life, hiding our evil thoughts, but the day will come when we least suspect, and we will be unmasked and all the world will know the quality of thoughts that have shaped our character.

THE TWO GREAT COMMANDMENTS emphasize the necessity of love—first of God and then of neighbor. If we would be in harmony with these commandments, love should motivate our thinking. If thoughts out of harmony with these commandments should continually come to mind, we must quickly put them aside and practice thoughts of God. In other words, "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind." If we turn our thoughts toward God, he will surely turn his thoughts toward us,

This Earth on Which We Dwell

IT WAS A PROTAGONIST of divine creation who wrote: "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed." But the statement, as I have read it, accurately describes the basis of the "understanding" of every person who has reached a conclusion on the matter. That the worlds exist needs no proof, but proof is demanded as to by what power they were "framed."

Most believers in evolution "understand" through faith in the teaching of some learned professor of college or university. The average believer in creation by the divine being "understands" because he was taught by a clergyman that God made the world out of nothing during an epoch-making week of seven days. According to this belief, God spoke, and where nothing had stood, there appeared a world.

The Restoration Movement teaches that the elements are co-eternal with God. By this it must not be understood that we believe there was no creation. We do accept the facts of creation, as stated in the Word of God. When God began his work upon this world, it is stated, "The earth was without form and void." He gave it form and organization and made it habitable and capable of sustaining man and beast. He worked with "eternal elements"—oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, and the various gases which can be formed into solids, and, at will, reduced again to gases. These processes may have been going on for ages before Adam.

Let us consider these three "understandings" in the order in which we have stated them. Here is a scientific statement by Arthur Dendy, D.Sc., sponsor of the science division of the University Reading Course:

Above us is the heavens, with the sun and moon and stars. On clear nights, we see hazy patches of light which modern men call nebulae. It was from one of these that our solar system was evolved. Those hazy patches of light are in reality vast expanses of flaming gases which some day will cool down. In their centers will be suns similar to that which terrestrial man calls "the" sun. Part of the nebulae will concentrate in masses of various magnitudes and revolve around the parent body.

In the case of our solar system, they are the planets: Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, etc. Each of these will eventually cool. It will pass through various well-defined stages. The heavier gases will first condense. They will include vapors of the heavier metals, among others, lead and bismuth. When the temperature drops below 100 degrees Centigrade, water will condense and the first seas come into existence. As the planet gets cooler and cooler, more elements and compounds will condense and solidify.

One day the earth may become so cool that the oxygen and nitrogen of the atmosphere will liquify. Animal and plant life will then have to modify its present breathing apparatus or perish.

ALL THIS IS ANATHEMA to the orthodox believer in the dogma that God, merely by the power of his word, said, "Earth come forth," and as quickly as I can flick my fingers, the earth was created and within six days was prepared as the habitation of man. We would not limit the power of the Almighty in our understanding of the creation, but we do desire to bring it into strict agreement with the facts recorded in Genesis. The worlds were framed by Jesus Christ, not by any "hey presto" methods:

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made.—John 1:1-3.

It is quite true that the revelation of Genesis does not give us in detail God's method of creating earth and water; but the record does inform us that in the process of creation waters which were above the firmament were separated from the waters beneath the firmament, and later, the waters beneath the firmament were gathered together into one place and consequently dry land appeared. After that, the creation went on to make the earth a suitable habitation for mankind.

In the absence of instruction in the Bible as to the manner in which the earth—in fact, the universe—was made in relation to the solid earth and water, I see no objection to acceptance of the explanation of the formation of planetary systems as stated by Professor Dendy. In fact, creation, as Moses relates it, with regard to this earth may have followed upon a destruction of life in a previous earth era, in the very manner Professor Dendy stated as a possibility:

One day the earth may become so cool that the oxygen and nitrogen of the atmosphere will liquify. Animal and plant life will then have to modify its present breathing apparatus or perish.

Suppose such a calamity did engulf the earth that existed prior to seven thousand years ago—what would be more natural than for the beneficent Creator to rectify matters by separating the waters from the land above and below the firmament just as is stated in Genesis?

TO SOME, this claim may be rather startling, for both orthodox Christian and evolutionist seem to believe that this earth has been the continuous habitation of some form of life. Geology does not favor such a conclusion. Human and animal remains have been uncovered in various parts of the earth. What is more, they have been found in various strata of rock which clearly indicates that they lived at different times in the development of the earth as we now know it.

Think of it! Geologists have exhumed fossilized bone remains of great animals—mammoth larger than any animals known in human history, fossilized plants, fruits, reptiles, fishes, mammals, insects of which man has never seen a living replica!

One geological discovery after another has set thoughtful men thinking more and more about a previous history of the globe. Such remains have come from North America, the snows of Siberia, Java, Africa! Why does not history tell us of them?

Whence came these fossilized remains? And why do the fossils found in one stratum differ so widely from those found in others? Mother Earth is a vast museum, the numerous rock-terraces of which many intelligent geological students have long been studying. Yet, so far no person by his own wisdom has been able to furnish a synopsis of the prehistoric secrets recorded in imperishable rock.

The mystery surrounding the many palpable evidences of life upon the earth prior to that detailed in history, sacred or secular, has intrigued many earnest persons. It was upon this very theme, doubtless, that Milton invoked divine aid when he wrote:

Sing heavenly muse, that on the sacred top of Horeb or of Sinai didst inspire That shepherd who first taught the chosen seed

In the beginning, how the heavens and earth

Rose out of chaos.

He referred to the inspiration given to Moses under which was written the story of creation recorded in Genesis. Chronologists have figured that the events there recorded took place some six to eight thousand years ago. In the light of the geological discoveries I have cited, I was forced long ago to the conclusion that the earth has been inhabited, destroyed, and made over several times during the ages in which its materials have existed. Milton was right when he wrote that "the heavens and earth rose out of chaos."

MOSES, IN GENESIS, wrote, "The earth was void and without form" when God began the work of creation then recorded by him. This does not lend itself to the view that God made the earth out of nothing in six days. If words mean anything, they mean that the earth existed in an empty or void condition. It had no form. God proceeded to give it both form and contents.

To the man and woman he first created, God said, "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth." Replenish! What does the word suggest? Primarily it means to "fill again." Would it not, then, be proper to conclude that the earth had once before been filled with man and all the things necessary to life and sustenance?

How did such a prior earth pass away? We are not informed. There is a record, according to sacred history, of how the "world that was before the flood" passed away; but that was not a complete annihilation of the earth or its inhabitants.

It must not be presumed that the "passing away" of the pre-Adamic earth connotes the destruction of its structural matter. It is a generally conceded scientific fact that matter is eternal. Circumstances may change its form, but it will always continue in some state or other.

Professor A. Cressy Morrison, former President of the New York Academy of Sciences, in his book, Man Does Not Stand Alone, makes the following statement:

We are still in the dawn of the scientific age, and every increase of light reveals more brightly the handiwork of an intelligent Creator. In the ninety years since Darwin, we have made stupendous discoveries; with a spirit of scientific humility and of faith grounded in knowledge, we are approaching even nearer to an awareness of God.

He states seven reasons for this expression of faith. Foremost among them is this:

By unwavering mathematical law, we can prove that our universe was designed and excuted by a great engineering intelligence.

THE FOLLOWING are his reasons for making this statement, and I quote them for the double purpose of revealing this great and marvelous engineering intelligence and to show, also, a number of ways in which global destruction could have taken place several times:

(1) The earth rotates on its axis one thousand miles an hour; if it turned at one hundred miles an hour, our days and nights would be ten times as long as now, and the hot sun would burn up our vegetation each long day while in the long night any surviving sprout would freeze. Did some force slow down the rotation of the earth at one time, resulting in chaos and the denuding of its population?

(2) The sun, source of our life, has a surface temperature of 12,000 degrees Fahrenheit. Our earth is just far enough away for this eternal fire to warm us. Did the sun, at sometime by chance, come so near to the earth that it brought about ruin and disorganization?

(3) The slant of the earth, tilted at an angle of twenty-three degrees, gives us our seasons. Either chance or a divine edict could do away with this tilt, in which event "vapors from the ocean would move north and south, piling up continents of ice." Indeed, scientists do talk of an ice age.

Anthropologists who are assembling the 15,000 year old fossilized remains of the Tepexpan man, who was dug up from an Ice Age swamp in Mexico, believe that Ice Age men may have been taller than modern man.—Sydney Sun.

(4) If the moon was 50,000 miles away instead of its actual distance, the tides would be so enormous that twice a day all continents would be submerged and even the mountains would soon be eroded away. The flood had nothing on this possibility!

Concerning Zion

By EDITH BARWISE

III Counting the Cost

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman seekingly goodly pearls, who, when he had found one pearl of great price, he went and sold all that he had and bought it.—Matthew 13: 47.

For which of you intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have money to finish the work?—Luke 14: 29.

And the woman being with child, cried travailling in birth and pained to be delivered.—Revelation 12: 2. And she brought forth a man child.—Revelation 12: 5. And the dragon prevailed not, against Michael, neither the child, nor the woman which was the church of God, who had been delivered of her pains, and brought forth the kingdom of our God and his Christ.—Revelation 12: 7.

WHEN JESUS began his ministry, throngs of people followed him, attracted by his mighty works; yet Jesus was no high-pressure salesman and had no wish to inspire ill-considered decisions. As an ambassador representing the Ruler of the universe sent to build up the kingdom of God on earth, he was not willing to take second place, so he demanded an undivided allegiance. Disdaining mere popularity, he declared, "He who loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he who loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me."—Matthew 10: 32. One halfhearted fellow was told, "No man having put his hand to the plow and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."—Luke 9: 62.

Jesus wanted men to count the cost and, having determined to do what he commanded, to plow straight ahead toward the goal of the kingdom. If we want Zion, we, too, should count the cost. Great value demands a great price. Each of us is the merchantman. Zion is the wonderful pearl worth all that we have and are.

THE EXTREME COST of the Zion kingdom is vividly pictured in Revelation, chapter twelve. A woman is in labor. Her pains and her cries tell the price she must pay for her child, for anesthesia was not known in Bible times. Verse seven says the woman was "the church of God," and the child she brought forth was "the kingdom of our God and his Christ"—Zion.

This kingdom child will not be herself nor any part of herself, but another body formed within the mother organization. This child is both the result and the purpose of her union with Christ. Only by obeying the will of her Lord can the church bring forth the kingdom of God and his Christ. The cost will be great, but Zion will bring joy like a mother's joy in her child.

When we talk of Zion, someone always murmurs, "But they have tried so many times and failed." Tried what? The Lord's way or some deviation from it? Remember, "Zion cannot be built up unless it is by the principles of the law of the celestial kingdom."—Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2. Any other way is an error that, no matter how sincere we may be, will fail. Trial and error methods are too discouraging and too slow. Our past failures and the "hastening time" should impel us to "seek the Lord" that we might establish his righteousness—his right way (Doctrine and Covenants 1: 2). For he has one; and in his law, we have been told what it is.

We must search the Scriptures. Sincerity and good intentions will not prevent failure, but obeying the principles of the law of celestial kingdom will. Prayerful study, then, is part of the price.

The Lord said: "I will speak unto my servant Edward Partridge, and give unto him directions; for it must needs be that he [the bishop] receive directions how to organize this people, for it must needs be that they are organized according to my laws, if otherwise, they will be cut off."—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 1. Then he gives the promised directions. Study them, and study those given to Enoch (Doctrine and Covenants 77-81, 101). Now do you see why we failed? We tried otherwise, and were cut off.

THE PRICE OF ZION will include all ideas of personal advantage or selfish gain. Since we seek a condition of unity, we must give up such divisive aims. Anything that gives one brother the advantage over another or enables him to profit at the expense of another, will prove a wedge between them. God does not try, as we do, to put Zion into the old bottle of the Babylonian economic system. He has given her an economic system and a law of her own—a celestial law. There is nothing celestial or sacred about personal advantage or selfish profits.

Zion will be no place for loafers. We have been commanded not to be idle (Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12), but Zion laborers and worldly laborers have different motives. The world labors for money. It is the standard of value. Everything is valued in terms of money—money to be gained, used, or hoarded, all in the interest of self. Even a man is valued for his money, no matter whether he got it by labor, trickery, or theft. In Zion, a man will be valued for his spiritual stature and for his service to his fellows. His motive will not be the love of money but the love of mankind.

The Prophet Nephi, foreseeing our days, said, "But the laborer in Zion shall labor for Zion, for if they labor for money they shall perish."—II Nephi 11: 109. Zion is a people, a collective unit, so Zion labor will be in the interest of the group. The more service a man can render, the greater will be his social importance. This is the meaning of "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant."—Matthew 20: 27.

A WISE BROTHER once observed, "I notice when folks talk about Zion, they go down the road about so far, then they go round and round." We do, too. The cost scares us. When we begin to realize that Zion is not going to be a Christmas gift, nor to be had at basement bargain prices, we hesitate. We read, "And, behold, this is the way that I, the Lord, have decreed to provide for my saints; that the poor shall be exalted, in that the rich are made low; for the earth is full and there is enough and to spare."—Doctrine and Covenants 101: 2. About here the rich start going round and round, with Zion the beautiful still only a dream.

But before the rest of us begin to smile, we should read, "Woe unto you poor men whose eyes are full of greediness, who will not labor with their own hands."—Doctrine and Covenants 56: 5. You see, the ease-loving poor, who have been waiting for the church to give them an inheritance, are no better than the money-loving rich. Now some of the poor may start going in circles, too, saying, "If we have to work for an inheritance, we'll do without a Zion organization." But surely some of both rich and poor will obey the Lord's commandment, and take advantage of the "privilege of organizing themselves according to my [Christ speaking] laws" (Doctrine and Covenants 51:4). It is a privilege not had at present but something to look forward to and prepare for.

"The work of preparation goes forward slowly" (Doctrine and Covenants 140:5), yet a revelation given in 1831 says: "It needs must be necessary, that ye save all the money that ye can, and that ye obtain all that ye can in righteousness, [a right way] that in time ye may be enabled to purchase lands for an inheritance, even the city."—Doctrine and Covenants 48: 2. This is a work in which we all can share.

Our Heavenly Father has all the power there is, and his Zion will be, but it is our privilege to share in his plan. Money honestly earned and devotedly saved will be our share in the Zion plan. We are entitled to our needs and just wants, but are told to repress unnecessary wants. Buying candy, gum, and soda pop, for example, is not a sin, but money spent in this way cannot purchase an inheritance; only money saved can do that. It is a question of what we want most—the sweets of self-indulgence, or "the kingdom of our God and his Christ."

Let us stop going in circles.

Opportunities For Priesthood Education

Opportunity No. 1 — The Priesthood Library

The Priesthood Library was founded in 1945 by the late President Frederick M. Smith. It was his purpose to make available to the ministry of the church in attractive and permanent form an ever-growing library. Included in it were to be books of proved worth over a period of years, as well as new, practical up-to-date materials for ready reference by the men of the ministry. Four of such studies are now available. Why wait? Determine now to build a really worth-while library worthy of your profession.

Balancing Our Program

THE PLANNING OF ANY PROGRAM will, of course, involve the leader of the group as well as the program chairman. Perhaps this chairman will be an elected officer. Some groups give this responsibility to the assistant leader, or perhaps she will be appointed. In any case, she is to work with the leader in making her plans; they should consult the pastor concerning the needs of the group. Following this consultation with the pastor, the program chairman should choose several—from three to six—possible themes for study during the year. These should be presented at a general meeting of the women, and each woman should be given an opportunity to express her choice. This can be done quickly by asking that each write a first and second choice on a slip of paper and leave it at a designated place. From a study of these, the chairman can try to satisfy the desires of her group, and each woman will feel that her particular interest has been considered. When the program is finally complete in detail, it should be presented to the executive committee, composed of the officers, for suggestions and final approval. This sounds complicated and will involve time, but it will also assure a balanced program and one that will answer the need of a particular group.

It is a good idea to elect officers in the spring. They then have the full summer to make plans for the coming winter. If possible, these plans should be completed, and those who are to have part in the program contacted in time for year-books to be ready for distribution at the September meeting. If, when the women gather for the first fall meeting, a completed program for winter meetings can be presented to them, they will be stimulated to set aside those dates to study and share experiences with the group.

WHAT SHOULD THE PROGRAM INCLUDE? We have been admonished that our purpose is to aid in the establishment of Zion, and that to build Zion, we must improve conditions prevailing generally in our homes. Our people must develop their powers of appreciation of better things in all home factors—architecture, location of home, setting of home, community life and atmosphere, neighborhood ethos, internal appointments and decorations, home atmosphere, health, education, and religious activity. The late President Frederick M. Smith said, "There is now and always will be a parallel development of the material expressions of this people and the spiritual development. It is necessary for both to progress in a parallel course in order to reach the highest possibility of each. Until we do have a richer and more Christian social relationship, we cannot and will not develop the spirituality necessary for us to qualify to meet Christ."

We, the women, have been directed to study and to set a high standard in all factors pertaining to our homes. To us falls the development of material expressions in that parallel development mentioned by President Smith. To the ministry falls the responsibility of guiding our spiritual development. Now that does not mean that we are not to be concerned with spiritual development, for in most homes the religious guidance of the children falls largely on the shoulders of the mother. She must be schooled in religion; she must be thoroughly familiar with the church books; and she must have a spiritual understanding of the meaning of life if she is to be capable of directing her children toward their highest possible development in Christian living. This she will gain by participation in the program of the church outlined and executed by the ministry. Every woman should be encouraged to study and participate in the full program of the church, that she may constantly increase her spiritual understanding. However, if, as a people, we are to have that parallel development in material expressions which President Smith deemed so essential, it is up to the women to provide stimulus and material for such development. Our program must fadge with the policies and activities of other departments, and it must also supply that which is not given by other departments.

As we contemplate the goals ahead of us, I am overwhelmed with the responsibility that the women of the church should be ready to assume. Zion is to be built, and each of us must make his contribution in whatever capacity his particular talent lies. Therefore we must choose wisely when we choose the women who are to plan our programs and direct our study for each successive year. Every meeting consumes precious time, and we have none of it to waste if we are to carry our full load on this road to Zion. To the program chairmen who have been chosen to direct our study, we would say:

First — Know your particular group of women. Not only those who come to meetings regularly

but the whole of your potential group. Our programs must be planned to stimulate the interest of those not coming as well as those who are regular attendants. As we make plans, we should ask ourselves, "Why has Mrs. Jones not been coming? Do we offer the thing that would be helpful to her? Do we know Mrs. Jones well enough to understand what she might need?" Then make a friendly gesture and learn to know her.

Second—Look at the age range of your group, not only those coming but the potential members. Does your program appeal to only one age group? If your numbers are sufficient, perhaps you should offer a double program—one that will appeal to the older women and one that will interest your new homemakers. However, if you number less than twenty-four, I would not advise a division. A varied program would be better.

Third—Consider the talent available in your own group, both that already developed and that which might be developed. Is Mrs. Smith shy and quiet because she has never been asked to assume responsibility or stimulated to participate? Ask her to help plan a devotional service. Perhaps she can give a brief report on a book or take charge of a food committee. Often people will surprise you with their hidden capacities.

Fourth—Consider your possible outside helps, that is, local people who may be invited as guest speakers. These include teachers in your schools, specialists in your community such as doctors, nurses, students of child care, psychologists, home decorators, book-reviewers, and ministers of other churches. Among the ministry you will find educated, cultured people who are trying to make their community a happier place. They are people we would like to have know us and the principles for which we stand. The best way to tell our story is to make a friend.

Fifth—Let the size of your group determine your meeting place. I would strongly urge that you plan sufficiently small groups that at least a part of the meetings can be held in the homes. There is more opportunity to develop a close friendliness toward and a real understanding of the women in whose home you have been graciously entertained than the woman who merely sits beside you in church. These home meetings should be an integral part of the year's program and should be as carefully planned and as meticulously carried out as any larger meeting.

Sixth—The frequency of meetings may be determined by the community in which you live. If your town is small with few social and educational functions, you should have more meetings than those in a community where there is more activity. Be sure that you do not conflict unduly with worth-while functions in your community. Latter Day Saint women should be active in Parent-Teacher Association work; they should aid in Scouting and Oriole work; they should participate and be recognized as supporters of any project that is for the good of the community as a whole. Therefore, as you plan your program, consider what other organizations will be demanding time from the members in the group.

The number of meetings for any given year should also be influenced by the number you can plan and execute well. When you call your women together, be sure they will be given something of stimulus—something they will take home to ponder in the days to come, something that will give them courage to meet their problems anew. Always extend a feeling of cheerful, warm friendliness.

Shall you meet through the summer? Again, this will be determined by your particular situation. Some of our groups do meet through the summer months, for they feel there can be no real vacation for anyone if the tasks that lie ahead are to be accomplished. We can't afford to cease our study and work, except for needed physical rejuvenation. Summer meetings might be lighter in content, but they do keep us in touch with each other and give our thoughts a lift. They also afford a contact with the group to aid the program chairman in the formation of her plans. In each community there are many who are at home during the summer who would enjoy the stimulus and inspiration from a planned meeting. If you have not been having summer meetings, you might try them this year to see how the women respond. Remember to give these meetings just as much thought and just as careful planning as you do your winter programs.

NOW LET US CONSIDER the problem facing the program chairman in a small organization and plan a program with her. For an example, use a small congregation, because the majority belong to small groups. Some of the women might be teachers, some wives of teachers, some mothers of young families, some grandmothers, some have had more than average opportunity for education, and others have had very little. Can you imagine a more difficult group to plan for? The goal is unity and friendly interest in each other. The one thing that each has in common with the others is her faith and her earnest desire to build a home and rear a family that will be worthy of a place in Zion—a force so strong that any of our groups can be unified around it. Suppose this group is in a community that offers considerable in the educational and cultural field.

All of this poses a problem for the program chairman. The interests and age range of her members are wide, and the group is small. In addition to these problems, she knows nothing should conflict with good things offered by the community. After much consideration, she recommends home meetings. Then she urges only one meeting a month, and plans to make each a "high light" in the activity of the woman. After consultation with the leader and the pastor, she feels the greatest need of the members is an increased understanding of each other and appreciation of the others' interest and ability. Therefore, she decides to choose from her group a speaker for each meeting and ask that she talk on whatever is of real concern to her. Each meeting will be opened with a five or ten minute devotional service. Sometimes it may be the reading of a poem, sometimes the singing of a song. Quotations from one of the Three Standard Books may make minds receptive for the program that is to follow, or a quotation from some other good book might be fitting. Whatever is used should be followed by prayer. These devotional periods will also be in charge of various members. It seems best not to designate these women at the beginning of the year, for by leaving this part of the program flexible, there is opportunity to ask new members to participate. The person to have charge of the devotional period will be asked to provide for it from three to four weeks before she is to respond. This will give her ample time to think over the unifying of her material with that of the main speaker.

The devotional period will be followed by whatever business is necessary before turning to the talk or study for the day. When this is followed by the serving of simple refreshments, the women have an opportunity to share thoughts stimulated by the talk as they increase their feeling of friendliness for each other.

NOW WE SHALL LOOK AHEAD through the year to see what topics might be chosen by the various speakers. These have been used in an actual group:

1. The recreational program of the local community. This was concerned largely with the program for teen-agers.

2. Foods—how to buy and conserve. This was given by an expert in the community.

3. The traditions of Christmas throughout the world.

4. The history of one's own community.

5. The church's attitude on scouting and Oriole work, etc.

6. Effective family worship.

7. Reports on conference.

8. Family budgeting.

9. Parliamentary law.

10. Six short book sketches.

11. Party.

In addition to this program, the chairman suggested that the women form a book-circulating group. Anyone wishing to participate purchased a book she would like to own. Then a system for circulating the books was set up so that each had an opportunity to read the other books. At the end of the circulation period, each person's own book was returned. This will explain the book reviews of the tenth meeting. Ten-minute comments were given on the most popular books. Would you like the list of books the group is circulating this year?

Five of them are novels, one a diary, one a collection of writings, three are on personal improvement, two on home beautification.

Red Plush, by Guy McCrone. A novel of the Victorian period.

The Solid Rock, by Gladys Walters. One of our church novels.

Pilgrim's Inn, by Elizabeth Goude. An introspective novel.

The Divided Heart, by Mina Lewiton. This deals with the effect of divorce on the child.

North of Heaven, by Biloine Whiting and Josephine Skelton—two of our own girls.

White House Diary, by Henriett Nesbeth, the White House keeper during President Roosevelt's tenure of office.

The Best Works of Clarence Day, by Clarence Day.

Growing Together, by Rhoda Bacmeister.

Mind and Body, by Dr. Flanders.

Stop Annoying Your Children, by W. W. Barr.

Book of Furniture and Decoration, by Joseph Aronson.

Thank You, Mr. President, by A. Meriman Smith.

Kitchens Near and Far, by Herman Smith.

How to Conquer Your Handicaps, by Marie Beynon Ray.

LET US LOOK at another program that would fit such a mixed group as this. Another year these same women chose as a main theme for study, "The Faith of Our Children"—a topic to interest anyone with a family, but how about those whose families have not arrived or whose families are grown? Any grandmother or potential mother would be interested in this topic to a certain extent, therefore, since the group was small, it seemed wise to make an effort not to overemphasize to the point of losing the interest of the grandmothers and the newlyweds. Again it seemed wise to intersperse with topics of sure interest to all. This particular group began its year with a family picnic. We always understand the woman better whose husband and children we know also, and it is usually up to the women's department to plan family functions. If you arrange for such an affair, do it well—make it a happy time for everyone. Provide organized fun for the young folks, plan early and separate feeding for little tots with someone to look after them, so that the parents are free to be sociable and the little ones do not become too weary and irritable waiting for the adults to be ready for food. Arrange your food and tables attractively. In other words, make it a party.

It is usually stimulating to have one or perhaps two guest speakers during a year. Ask anyone who might be near you and is qualified to talk on the topic of the year. The talks for this particular program were as follows.

1. Helping our children to know God. Source material for this came largely from books by Mary Alice Jones. She has written a series of three titled Tell Me About God, Tell Me About Jesus, and Tell Me About the Bible. These are written for young children. She also has written a book for adults called The Faith of Our Children.

2. A Christmas program and party which had meaning for all.
3. Guest night. A specialist spoke on the guidance of young children to an understanding of religion.
4. The child's understanding of Jesus.
5. Home decoration.
6. The child and religious books.
7. Recipe exchange.
8. The child's prayer.
9. Book sketches.
10. Installation of new officers and a revealing of secret pals.

Another program that would be helpful for such a group is planned for this year. The opening meeting is a social gathering for the families in the form of a wiener roast. Again there will be two guest speakers, one early in the fall and one in the spring. For other meetings, members of the group have been asked to take charge. For a general theme, one of the new pamphlets recommended by the General Council of Women has been chosen, but the varied interests of the group have also been remembered. The pamphlet, New Vistas Unlimited, by Alice Bolon is to be the main study. There are eight lessons in this which will be stretched over the full year with the insertion of such topics as home decoration, health, and introducing the child to music.

IF YOU ARE in a community that offers little of civic or cultural activity, you should meet more than once a month. This will allow you to expand your program, but do remember to offer something which will both aid and interest all members of your group.

For an organization that is large enough to divide into meetings for young homemakers and those of other interests, I would suggest separate programs for each group with a planned series of consolidated meetings for all. For instance, if the divided groups meet during the first week of each month, they should all meet together, perhaps, during the third week. If two meetings each month are more than the women can attend, I would suggest only two or three general meetings during the year. This will require the planning of three separate programs by the program chairman. She might have an assistant to help with the two small groups, but each of the three programs should be planned in detail and speakers contacted before the first fall meeting.

There are any number of suggestions to be made for activity on the side. One group has endeavored to keep in contact with its young girls by assigning club mothers when the girls enter junior high school. The club mother does nice things for the girl throughout the year much as the secret friends or pals function. The girls remain eligible for a secret mother each year until they marry or enter business.

Institutes are being held in more and more places. I would urge that you remember an institute is a school to which our leaders go for helps to bring back to the group. Therefore the institute must be planned to give constructive help and information. Time is precious, and every period must be of value to those attending. Include helps in what to teach, how to plan it, where to find it.

These I know are only meager bits of concrete help for you. However I have tried to point out the value of a varied program, keeping in mind always that our goal is to build homes Zioniac in character. When the job of program chairman falls on your shoulders, remember the many helpers and supporters you have. Turn first to your leader and your pastor for suggestions; then, with their desires in mind and your own knowledge of your group, formulate several possible program subjects. Present these to the group for expressions of chief interest. Then plan your program in detail. At this point you should ask your leader to call a meeting of the officers so that you can present your program, ask for suggestions and final approval. It is then ready to be prepared in booklet form to be distributed at the first fall meeting.

May we remember always that our goal is important, that we can progress toward it only one step at a time, that each year's program can hope to be only one step forward, and that we must constantly keep in mind growth in all fields enumerated by President Smith if we are to finally achieve our purpose of establishing Zioniac homes, whose members reflect the teachings of Christ in their lives and who will develop through the process of intelligent growth into courageous, loyal, active, zealous, faithful, humble Latter Day Saints worthy of residing in "Zion the Beautiful."

Flinch not, neither give up nor despair, if the achievement of every act in accordance with right principle is not always continuous with thee.—Marcus Aurelius.

Progress Through Sharing

By BOB ANDERSON

THE SLANTING RAYS of the winter sun rimmed the horizon. High above the snow-covered earth rolled huge white clouds, slowly moving through the massive untracked cushion of the atmosphere, moved by currents of air scarcely distinguishable to a lonely observer on a hill overlooking the campus. Smoke hung above the stack, black and dirty against the pale blue of the sky and the white of the clouds. The orange-red glory of the departing sun reflected in rebounding beauty from the brick-red walls of the halls; it tinted the dormant ivy and the bare, frosty trees until they shone with an awesome splendor.

Alone in the midst of this splendor, a mere person seemed insignificant and inconsequential in the face of such an overwhelming display of the tremendous power of a universe that could be either man's greatest blessing or his scourge. What might be man's fate, for example, if left without warm clothing and food to the ravages of the atmosphere where the temperature hovered near the zero mark? Obviously he is dependent upon his universe and often ignorant of his relationship to it. What is man's place in this world? Is he ruled by his environment, or is he master of it?

BUT LET US go back again into history and see some of man's other encounters with this tremendous and basic consideration. For centuries, in his walk, he saw the birds float through this life-giving medium that surrounds our earth; he wondered what supported them, and he longed for wings that would enable him to speed through the air unhindered by natural obstacles also. He tried, but he found that something was lacking; he did not yet have under control all the knowledge or know-how that would enable him to share with the birds their absolute domain. Step by step, he harnessed his universe—the internal combustion engine, steel and other metals that were light and strong, the balloon that enabled him to rise into the air yet lacked directional variability; he was still at the mercy of the winds of the universe. At last the Wright brothers put together knowledge and control of their universe and flew in a machine that was heavier than the air which supported it.

Early man depended upon the voice and billows of smoke to carry the messages he wished to send his neighbors, but his acquaintances were limited by the distance sound would carry or smoke might be seen. He could do very little to expand his horizons, for he could not travel far; the universe was still his master. It is to the everlasting glory of men, living and dead, that they can go peacefully and happily through their days, yet hope for something better in their relationship with others and with surrounding nature. Samuel Morse was one of these, and he acknowledged his challenge and responsibility for his conquest of nature when he sent his first message, "What hath God wrought?"

WE COULD GIVE many illustrations on this ever-changing relationship of man and his universe, but there is no need to proceed further, for we see that the universe which surrounds us and gives us air to breathe, food to eat, and water to drink is so intrinsically tied up with the life of man that to separate the two is of little value. It is no more sensible than to try to separate the body and the soul of man. The two are made one for the other. Through the years of recorded history, we have witnessed in man's living a gradual conquest over the elements of nature. At first each man was largely self-dependent, but with the passing of time, he has become more and more dependent upon his neighbors for certain of his basic wants and needs.

These facts should make us less selfish and more community-minded, for we control such a negligible part of our environment that it should not be possible for us to withdraw into our own narrow caves, yet we have exhibited such a tendency to an alarming degree. The battle no

“I Cleanse My Soul”

By MARIE GOSLINE

WHEN I THINK of the proper way to pray, I like to remember the little grandmother in Maxim Gorki's, "The Story of My Grandmother." I also like to remember the story of Hannah in the Bible. Then I cannot forget Luis, our olive-skinned Ladino driver who took us through the country of Guatemala.

As I remember the grandmother, I think of the words of an old song:

Have you been in the garden with Jesus?
Have you walked with him, talked with him there?

Have you been in the garden with Jesus?
All alone with your Savior in prayer.

Many times each day she was alone with her Jesus. It might have been while she was scrubbing the floors; it might have been while she was stewing the "borsch"—but always Maxim, the little grandson, could hear her mutter her prayers. Her Savior was not like that of the longer seems to be between man and nature, but between men over the elements of nature. Many no longer seem satisfied with what is sufficient, but seek to control what rightfully belongs to their fellow man.

THIS IS NOT TO SAY we need to describe our Zion in terms of communism, but it does indicate to us the need for discretion and genuine regard for others. We must retain our personal initiative, for without it, existence becomes a dull passage from the cradle to the grave rather than a test of our fitness to survive and serve others. Through the efforts of men past and living, we are given the fullness of the universe that we might enjoy the highest cumulations of blessings to which we are entitled if we follow the pattern set by the Man of Calvary, who lived not only for himself but for all others made in God's image.

grandfather's—cold, cruel, relentless, unforgiving, and mean. Grandmother's Savior was just the sort of a person she was—kind, gentle, forgiving, common, and oh, so good! He was with her all the day—even when grandfather beat her. Grandfather said his prayers morning and evening, each time putting on a regular show in front of the "icon." But grandmother said hers simply as she went about her work. Needless to say, it is to the Jesus of the grandmother I like to turn! Just as he was her strength, her aid, her help, her everlasting friend, he will be mine—if I can have some of her faith.

I would also like to have the faith of Hannah to be able to pray the way she was able to, to receive the spiritual uplift and relief she did through prayer. You remember the old story of how she went to the temple. The last verse of the story has always stayed with me. "And she went her way and was no more sad." If I have the faith of Hannah, I will be able to cast my burdens on the Lord as she did, for she knew he would take care of the matter in his own time, in his own way. If I have the faith of Hannah, prayer will bring not only relief, but also joy to my soul!

LUIS, our little driver, was a devout Catholic, and while we could probably teach him many truths, he likewise could teach us a feature or two of his own faith that was good. Whatever his creeds and beliefs were, he was still my brother. One Sunday morning I asked him if he had been to confession the night before. I told him that in my country good Catholics went to confession each Saturday night. "Not here," he said. "But once a year—just the day before my birthday—I cleanse my soul!"

Then I thought, "Do I leave communion service, still bearing the same grudges, carrying the same heavy burdens, or do I go away a freer, better person for having attended? Do I actually cleanse my soul?"

PERHAPS as I sit in communion service, if I can silently whisper the words of the old song:

If I have wounded any soul today,
If I have caused one foot to go astray,
If I have walked in my own willful
way,
Dear Lord, forgive!

If I can say this to myself, perhaps it will help me to have faith and believe in the Jesus of Gorki's grandmother. If I can say these words thoughtfully and prayerfully, they will help bring the joy of Hannah's heart to mine. Perhaps they will also help me to "cleanse my soul!"

Illusions

My dreams leaped up a ribboned sky;
And my illusions clung around,
A phantom star, somewhere up high,
A light to which my heart was bound!

One shining star had pierced the night;
And greater ones were yet to come,
But then, I could not judge the height,
Or know the depth, from which it sprung!

My star shone high, above them all;
Describing arcs of solar light;
And then as quickly did it fall,
With dreams, to plummet out of sight!

strengthening us in our weakness and permeating us with his eternal love so that we, in turn, may reflect that love in our thoughts and in our dealings with our neighbor. We should ever strive to commune with God, not only in the quiet grove but in the market place as well. We should walk humbly in the sight of God, not thinking more highly of ourselves than we ought to think. The Apostle Paul said, "If a man thinketh himself to be something and is nothing, that man deceiveth himself." Our life is what our thoughts make it, let us lift our thoughts to God continually so that when we are confronted with the reality of a sudden decision, we will not be like the shopkeeper in the story, whose thinking was muddled by avarice, but like sons of God surrendering our will to that of his, saying, "Not my will but thine be done."

It may be well for us to heed the advice of Paul to the Philippians:

Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

(5) Had the ocean been a few feet deeper, carbon dioxide and oxygen would have been absorbed and no vegetable life could exist. Prehistoric earthquakes could have brought this chaos to an earth before this one had they unduly deepened the ocean.

(6) If our atmosphere had been much thinner, some of the meteors now burned in space by the million each day would be striking all parts of the earth, setting fires everywhere.

Here are half a dozen of the many ways in which previous forms of the earth could have been destroyed. The facts of science prove the existence of animals and humans in ages that were pre-Adamic. Was Providence trying to perfect a global security such as we now enjoy by following the method of trial and error? Or were pre-existent men wiped out by God because of wickedness?

Here is something I cut from the pages of the Sydney Sun:

RELICS IN DESERT OF NINE FOOT MEN

A group of amateur archaeologists claim to have discovered in Colorado desert caves, relics of an ancient civilization, whose men were eight or nine feet tall.

Howard Hill, spokesman for the expedition, said that several well-preserved mummies were taken from caverns in the Colorado desert on the Nevada-California border.

Discoverer was Dr. Bruce Russell, retired Cincinnati physician, who found caves containing mummies of men, animals and implements of culture 80,000 years old.

Giant men appeared to have worn skin garments of medium length, with knee-length trousers.

Texture of the material resembled grey, dyed sheepskin, but was obviously taken from an animal unknown today.

Professional archaeologists, including Dr. Viola Pettit, of London, plan an expedition to the caverns shortly.

ENGINEERING INTELLIGENCE has given us many things that are common today—the telephone, telegraph, aeroplane, radar, radio, and television. We know that none of these marvelous human achievements came by chance. We bow to the master minds who gave to the world these marvels. Did I say we bow to them? Well, just once and then the wonders become so commonplace we even forget the names of the inventors.

It took a whole colony of scientists to discover the energy that the greatest of all engineering intelligences had placed in an atom, believed for centuries to be the smallest thing known to science. Now the atom is split every-which-way and its tremendous energy put into the most destructive bombs known to warfare.

I say we know none of these things just chance to be. How, then, could the marvelous and mysterious universe of which this earth is a part have just chanced to be? Could Edison, Marconi, or any of the great intelligences known to science or the world of letters have created it? If it were possible to make a gigantic Frankenstein of all the learned scientists of the ages, would he approach the infinite intelligence revealed in the smooth-working of the universe?

THE RESTORATION MOVEMENT agrees with science as to how worlds are formed in the nebulae visible in the heavens. But it was not from such a start as this that the creation mentioned in Genesis took place. As a preface to the story of creation written there, God said to Moses:

Worlds without number have I created, and I also created them for mine own purpose. . . . An account of this earth, and the inhabitants thereof, give I unto you; but behold there are many worlds which have passed away by the word of my power, and there are many also which now stand, and numberless are they unto man . . . as one earth shall pass away and the heavens thereof, even so shall another come.

There seems to be no satisfactory ground for the belief that the world was created out of nothing.

Science agrees with the Restoration Movement as to how worlds are framed. But only some scientists will concede that the worlds were framed by the Word of God, Jesus the Christ. Some, like Professor Morrison, believe that the earth and the planetary systems were created by a great engineering intelligence.

Well, they may call him that; but we of the Restoration Movement call him God, the Eternal Father, Infinite and Eternal, the Framer of the heavens and the earth.

worked out in the lives of godly men and women in our immediate past as well as in the long procession of men of faith going right back to the beginning of time.

WHAT IS FAITH? It is what this text says it is. It is certain assurances, certain great convictions in our life. It is the assurance of Enoch that there is a great companion unseen but ever near. It doesn't matter what tomorrow may bring—atomic or otherwise—if you have within you the assurance Enoch had that there is a God and that you can walk and talk with him, tomorrow's atrocities will not concern you at all, for you will expend yourself in doing the things of God that come to you because of your companionship with him today.

What is faith? It is Abraham's assurance that in the midst of all sin and graft and rottenness of the modern world, there is a better city, a city without war and without oppression and without greed. If you lose faith in this city of God, not only will you be lost, not only will this church be lost, but the cause of God could be lost. For only as that faith is kept alive in the hearts of men and women who come to know God, will that city of his planning be redeemed.

What is faith? It is Moses' assurance that conscience and compassion are better than all the courts of

Pharaoh—that these things which seem to beckon men today into courts of power and glory cannot achieve the purposes of God, that conscience and compassion, that ministry to the needs of mankind are far more important than all of the courts of Pharaoh.

What is faith? It is these assurances, and others. It is the conviction that Christ is alive, not dead—that he is risen, not in prison, in a tomb.

What is faith? It is the assurance that the kingdom of God can be established—that Zion will be redeemed. You cannot achieve these things in your life by sitting down and reasoning about them, reasonable though they may be. You cannot experience faith merely by reading the definitions of faith, eloquent and instructive though they may be. The proof of faith lies in the venture of faith, in the launching forth, in the planting of the banner in the unknown land.

The main evidence for your faith is beyond the fact that faith is in you; it is in the living of the faith that is yours—in the daring to do the things this assurance residing within you bids you do. It is by no means certain that the world will honor you. It may scoff at you. It may laugh at you. It may call you a fool, while you live, and you may be a hero only after you are dead and gone.

It is by no means certain that all or part of life will be smoothed out before you as you walk by faith. You may receive the promise, and you may pass on as other men have passed on, seeing the city from afar, but you will see it, and you will have a part in its contribution if you walk with God by faith. And as you walk, you will travel with a light in your eyes, and a peace in your heart, and a song on your lips that the world knows not of. You will walk the upward way with the Christ who has gone before, and with all the worthy men down through the ages who have invested their life in this great adventure of faith that makes the future possible and the redemption of all God's purposes and all God's planning a reality. May we so walk, each of us, in understanding and in joyous adventure together with a faith to meet tomorrow's need that will help to make possible God's great purposes for us and for all mankind is my prayer.

DISTINCTIVE CHURCH BUILDINGS

NEWS AND NOTES

For our cover pictures during the month of February, we are presenting photographs of some of our church buildings, together with articles about them. Other church buildings have been represented at various times in the past, and we hope to receive good photographs of yet others in future months.

There is clearly evident among many of our people a desire to improve the locations of our church buildings and the quality of the architecture used in them. Wherever conditions have warranted it, local congregations have received encouragement and help from general church officials.

May we extend to the skilled photographers of the church an invitation to contribute good pictures of our church buildings? If it were possible, we would have all of our cover pictures related in some way to church work; we especially like to receive pictures by our own people. Other fine pictures, of course, are welcomed and appreciated. A high quality of photography, composition, and camera artistry is needed for these covers. We appreciate the many good pictures that have been sent in the past.

AGAINST RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

At Amherst College, the local chapter of a national fraternity initiated a Negro student. The chapter was then expelled from the national organization for its action. The trustees of Amherst took action against this move by ruling that by 1951 all fraternities at the college would have to furnish proof that there was nothing in their national constitutions that would forbid the pledging of a man because of his "race, creed, or color." Amherst is one of the finest schools of the country.

FIRE

The destructive fire which swept through a number of business buildings on the City Square and South Main Street on the morning of Inauguration Day, January 20, proved to be a disaster for some of the best and most important business concerns of the city. Because the services rendered by these concerns were an important contribution to our community life, we will feel the loss very keenly. It should be noted with appreciation that the leaders of these concerns are making all possible moves to re-establish their business services, especially in the fields of hardware, printing, and office supplies. The Herald House is happy to be able to extend its services to one of these fine concerns, with which we have had the best of business relationships for many years, the Lambert-Moon Printing Company, of which a church member and prominent citizen of Independence, J. Orrin Moon, is owner. For the present, the work of printing will be done on our machines.

By an odd quirk of fate, two liquor stores in the vicinity of the fire were spared from destruction. Why, no Christian citizen can understand. Certainly they were and are not needed in the life of the community. Nevertheless, although there has been no noticeable shortage of such institutions, a number of new licenses for the distribution of liquor have been granted. Perhaps these are straws on the camel's back that will some day bring about the possibility of a remedy through local option.

WEATHER

All over the nation, winter weather has made headlines in the news. Life, both human and domestic animal, has been destroyed. Homes have been lost. Community organizations and business have been put to heavy expense. And, not least of the consequences, church attendance has been affected.

Some of our pastors have used direct mail, with printed messages, to reach members of their congregations. Others have employed the telephone. In some churches, members of the priesthood have gone out to visit, and especially in cases where there has been sickness or other distress in the homes. We are all aware that extra efforts must be made, in order that when normal conditions return, the break in the continuity of church service will be minimized, and church work will go on as before.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA

In a note to Apostle D. T. Williams, V. D. Ruch, pastor at Council Bluffs, Iowa, reports: "We have completed arrangements for the purchase of the Washington Avenue property for our new church site. It cost us $20,000. There is a strong wish here to get started building this summer. We need more room quite badly. . . . We have about $85,000 in our building fund at present. . . . I think our branch has done remarkably well in raising its building fund to its present amount."

Messages That Win

It Was a Pleasure

Some years ago, to visit the north-eastern Oklahoma territory in company with Brother Amos T. Higdon, who was then district president in that area. I had an assignment to do some preaching, as Brother Higdon's voice was giving him trouble then.

I will never forget what Brother Higdon said on the morning after my arrival. I think it must have been the explanation of his very successful ministry.

"Now, Brother Lea," he said, "I'm going visiting. I spend a great deal of time visiting the Saints. I would be glad to have you come along if you care to. You can remain here and study if you wish. I'll be starting in a little while. Would you care to come along?"

Naturally I wanted to go. We had many a fine visit that day. In a friendly and interested way, Brother Higdon talked to the people about their life, their work, their problems, and above all, some good word about the gospel. And generally we prayed with them, too.

We met many people who had been converted by the personal ministry of Brother William Patterson, who is now serving in the Quorum of Evangelists. Many others had been converted by Brother Higdon.

One thing I observed. These people had begun their conversions in their homes, during the visits of these church men and others among their neighbors and friends. They never would have gone to church in the beginning. But they came there in the end. Their hearts were won by visiting in their homes. Later, their minds were convinced by sermons in the church.

Everywhere we went, I observed a high personal regard and appreciation for the men who had first brought the gospel message to their homes. Brother Higdon always said something in the way of personal testimony that helped the people.

The visiting did me a lot of good too. I am still happy to be exchanging greeting cards every Christmas with some of the fine people I met on that trip. Fortunately, I had done my book work at home. I am glad I was free to visit.

Like a Shepherd

Let the reader forgive us if there is considerable personal material in this editorial. But it seems to work out best that way.

Brother E. W. Lloyd worked for many years for the Standard Oil Company that has a great refinery near Kansas City. But at heart he has always been a shepherd of souls. So he worked by day and went visiting in the evening, seeking opportunities to tell the gospel story. He distributed tracts, lent books, administered to sick and isolated persons, gave them encouragement and hope. Above all, he left them with the impression that someone in the church cared about them.

When the time for his retirement came, the event was celebrated with a dinner. He received a pension, a beautiful gold watch, and expressions of appreciation from company officials.

"Now," he said, "I can give my full time to church work." And he did, not needing or receiving financial support outside his own resources.

Brother Lloyd has gone far afield, into many out-of-the-way places, to visit members who have lost contact with the church, those that are sick, those that have become discouraged. In a way, he is a shepherd to lost souls. And he tells the gospel to anybody who shows the slightest flicker of interest. He has a wonderful enthusiasm and bears a splendid testimony wherever he goes.

These are just two experiences out of the book of life. And what are the messages that win? "God loves you." "God cares about you." "Pray to God over your troubles and problems, and you will receive strength and help. I know. It has worked for me. It will work for you if you will give it a good trial."

There isn't much more to be said than that, is there? This kind of work is something that you, too, can do. It is the work of Christ. You can serve him.
L. J. L.

President Garver

The Presidency have been furnished with the following statement as to Brother Garver's condition by Charles F. Grabske, M. D., Church Physician:

President John F. Garver, who has been quite ill at his home during the past several weeks, continues to suffer considerably.

He was a patient at the Sanitarium in November, 1948, where an exhaustive diagnostic survey was made and consultations made with specialists skilled in the medical and surgical fields in closest touch with his ailment.

It is with much regret that I report that the progress of his recovery is disturbingly slow.

All of his associates in the councils of the church have been solicitous about Brother Garver. He has been visited by them from time to time, and he has received administration very often. However, on account of the apparent continued progress of his affliction we now, in full harmony with his own feelings, request the prayers of the Saints in his behalf. Man's extremity is God's opportunity, and we have not relied and do not now rely solely on the science or skill of those who are learned in the healing arts. Our hope rests on Him who shapes the destinies of men and nations, and our trust in his providence remains constant and undiminished.

Branch Procedure

WE RECENTLY HAD AN INQUIRY from a newly-elected pastor who wanted advice as to "branch business procedure." His concern is most natural, and probably everyone who has ever served as a presiding officer has had a like concern.

A few years after the church established headquarters at Plano, Illinois, the Saints there established "Rules for the Government of Branch Business Meetings." They were published in the True Latter Day Saints Herald for August 15, 1875, and the writer suspects that President Joseph Smith had quite a bit to do in preparing them.

These rules are published primarily for their educational value, as a matter having historical interest also, and we do not want any to feel that they have any binding effect on the church or any subdivision of it. Nevertheless, we believe they can be read and studied with profit to all members, especially to those who are called upon to preside.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

RULES FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF BRANCH BUSINESS MEETINGS

1. It shall be understood that these meetings are held for the purpose of transacting church business, pertaining to, and affecting the Plano Branch, of the Church of Jesus Christ, only; and that it is not proper for these meetings to discuss and decide questions of law or church government, other than those especially defining what shall be branch action in given cases.

2. The branch officers are to be THE officers who shall preside over, and have charge of, these meetings; and none others shall preside, except by vote of those present at any meeting, or by the courtesy of the officer present, whose right it may be to preside at the time.

3. The officers of the church who will be recognized by these meetings, are: (1) a presiding elder who has been regularly chosen by vote of the branch; (2) a priest, or priests, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch; (3) a teacher, or teachers, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch; (4) a deacon, or deacons, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch; (5) a secretary, or clerk of the branch, also regularly chosen by vote of the branch.

4. It shall be the duty of the presiding officer of the meeting to preside over the same during its session; to enforce the rules of order and an observance of the same, with decorum and propriety; to secure, so far as he is able to do so, a due respect and regard for the laws governing the church, as contained in the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants, and prevent these books from being treated lightly, jestingly, or disrespectfully.

5. Every proposed amendment or addition to, or alteration in, these rules, shall be made out in writing, and handed to the clerk of the branch, who shall present the same to the first regular business meeting thereafter, when it may be discussed at the option of the meeting; but no vote shall be taken for its adoption or rejection, until the succeeding regular meeting. Motions to amend, defer, or lay on the table, will be in order and permissible, at any time after said proposition to amend, add to, or alter, is presented, moved and seconded. If adopted, it must be by a two-thirds vote of all the members present.

6. The rules of order governing the consideration of resolutions involving discussion may be suspended by a vote of the members present, but such suspension shall be only for the time which shall expire during the consideration of the resolution pending when such motion is made.

7. These meetings shall be held on the evening of the first Monday in each month, commencing at seven o'clock during the months of November, December, and January; and at half-past seven o'clock during the remaining portion of the year, except when the usual holidays fall upon that day, when it shall be the duty of the presiding officer of the branch to name the second Monday in the month as the time of holding said meeting, giving due notice from the stand of such change of time.

8. There being the number of _____ members on the branch record roll of names, a less number than twenty-five members being present shall not be a quorum for the choosing of officers of the branch meetings, nor for the purpose of amending, adding to, or altering rules of order. For the transacting of all other business, six or more members, including a branch officer, present at any regular meeting shall constitute a quorum.

9. It shall be considered the duty of every member of the branch to attend the business meetings of the branch at the regular sessions thereof.

10. The meeting shall be opened by prayer, or by singing and prayer. The order of business shall be as follows: (1) the reading of the minutes of former meeting; (2) reports, communications, and suggestions from the presiding officer; (3) reports of the officers of the branch other than the presiding officer; (4) reports of standing committee; (5) reports of special committees; (6) reports of delegates from the district conference; (7) reports from delegates of the branch to general or district conferences; (8) reports from delegates of the branch to general or district conferences; (9) report from the secretary, or clerk of branch; (10) report of the bishop of the church; (11) report of the financial clerk of the branch; (12) business made the special order of the meeting; (13) unfinished business; (14) new business; (15) deferred business, subject to call; (16) business before laid on the table, subject to call; (17) adjournment to given date, other than regular time of meeting; (18) adjournment; (19) communications from General Conference, High Council, President of Church, and Secretary of Church, shall have precedence of order.

11. The order of debate is as follows:

(1). No resolution upon which discussion may arise shall be debatable until reduced to writing, moved and seconded, and placed on the secretary's table, and announced from the chair by the presiding officer.

(2). No motion shall be discussed, or voted upon, until it is made, seconded, and announced from the chair, by the presiding officer.

(3). When a resolution, or motion, is properly placed before the meeting, it may be disposed of in any one of the following ways: it may be withdrawn by the mover and the one seconding it, by the consent of the meeting, if request to withdraw be made before any discussion is had upon said motion, or resolution; it may be amended, but no amendment to an amendment will be considered in order; it may be deferred to a given time, or made subject to call; it may be referred to a committee, standing or special, for examination and report; it may be suspended by a substitute, but a vote upon the substitute resulting in its adoption shall be final, as to the original for which it is offered; it may be postponed indefinitely, to a given time, or subject to call; it may be laid upon the table, and it may be put upon its passage and adopted or rejected.

(4). When a resolution or motion has been discussed, and it appears that no one present has anything further to urge respecting it, the presiding officer shall ascertain whether the meeting is ready to vote upon the question; if it shall appear that the meeting is ready to vote, the presiding officer shall then rise to his feet and say: "So many of you as are of the opinion that the resolution should be adopted, (or the motion prevail, as the case may be,) please signify it by saying AYE." After the affirmative vote has been taken, he shall say: "Those of you who do not favor the resolution, (or motion,) please say NO." In no case shall a motion be declared "passed," or "lost," unless the "yeas" and "nays" have first been called; nor shall the secretary record the result of any vote, until it is announced by the presiding officer; and such announcement, shall be made by said officer as soon as it has been ascertained, and before he resumes his seat. The presiding officer may vary the form of words given above, to suit the case, and may ask for a show of hands, or for a rising vote; but the presiding officer shall not, in the presenting of the question to be voted upon, use any terms that convey other meaning than that contained in the motion, or resolution. Any person present during the discussion of any motion, or resolution, who may be of the opinion that it has been sufficiently debated, may move "that the question be now called:" or say, "I move the previous question," or "that the vote be now taken," which, if seconded, the presiding officer shall at once put before the house; if the motion prevail, the resolution, which has been discussed shall be read, or the motion stated, and the vote be taken; nor shall the motion, "that the vote be now taken," be debatable; nor shall the presiding officer put any resolution, or motion, so discussed, until it is apparent, by motion or otherwise, that the meeting is fully ready to vote.

(5). Resolutions, or motions, upon which no discussion may arise, shall be put by the presiding officer, after he shall have given proper warning by asking, "Are you ready for the question," or by saying, "If there be no objection, the vote will be taken."

(6). No one shall be permitted to occupy more than — minutes in any one speech to a motion or resolution under consideration, nor to speak more than once until all have spoken who may desire to speak; except when the rules shall be suspended, when it shall be in order for any one to speak as often, and as long as they may wish, provided that any one may, by vote of the meeting, be given more than — minutes time, not to exceed thirty minutes, in all.

(7). It shall be permissible for the president, or any member of the meeting, to call any one speaking to a question, to order, if they be indulging in personalities, using profane or indecent language, or speaking in a rough, boisterous, or unruly manner, or when not speaking to the question. When any one is so called to order, they shall cease speaking and shall sit down, when the one calling him to order shall state to the presiding officer the point of order, but shall not be permitted to offer remarks to the subject under consideration; upon such statement the presiding officer shall at once decide, and the one called to order shall proceed, subject to such decision; time lost in settling points of order shall not be lost to the one speaking. Appeal from the ruling of the presiding officer may always be taken to the meeting, and the form of the question shall be, "shall the chair be sustained,—those favoring it say yea;" "those opposed, say nay;" and the vote shall be a finality, the presiding officer being entitled to the privilege of stating his reasons for his decision, before the vote is taken.

(9). It shall not be in order for the presiding officer to enter into the discussion of any question pending before the meeting; he may, however, state his opinion upon a request of the meeting. Should he vacate the chair for the sake of engaging in the discussion, he shall be subject to the rules governing other members, and shall not again take the chair until after the vote is taken; nor shall he be entitled to vote, unless the person called to the chair in his place does not wish to vote; and should he so vote, and there be a tie, the one so presiding shall cast the deciding vote.

(10). No one shall be entitled to be heard in any business meeting, until they shall rise to their feet and address the presiding officer, by saying, "Mr. President," "Bro. President," "Mr. Chairman," or "Brother Chairman"; and should more than one rise at once, the presiding officer shall designate which one is entitled to the floor.

(11). It shall be deemed out of order for members to rise; move about; whisper; talk aloud; shuffle their feet noisily upon the floor, or with their hands upon the seats; change their place of sitting, unless in cases when the room is not properly warmed, when any one is upon his feet speaking to a question; or at any time when necessary. All persons offending against the rule shall be subject to reprimand from the presiding officer.

(12). All questions arising upon parliamentary practice shall be decided by the presiding officer, without debate; and any standard manual shall be considered as the standard of authority.

(13). The clerk or secretary of the branch shall keep the record of the minutes of the meeting, and shall perform all the necessary duties pertaining to his office.—Herald, Volume 22, pages 509-511.

The Serpent Motive in Ancient Mexico and Central America

By PAUL M. HANSON

THE MOST HIGHLY VENERATED and beloved of the gods of pre-Spanish Mexico was Quetzalcoatl, who was regarded as a true god who benefited mankind. The name, composed of two words, Quetzal, and coatl which in the Aztec language means serpent, is usually translated "Feathered Snake," or "Plumed Serpent," but without a knowledge of the quetzal, much of the beauty and richness of meaning in the name of the deity is obscured in the translation.

The quetzal is considered by bird lovers one of the most beautiful birds in the world. One writer has described it in the following words: "It is a bird that gleams in the light, like the head of the hummingbird, which seems made of precious stones or iridescent jewels which in one light are topaz, in another opal, and in still another amethyst." Often the tail is flashed open and closed suddenly, this causing the beautiful tail coverts to vibrate and display their exquisite colors.

It is clear to be seen that Quetzal, a part of the name of the bearded white deity, suggests what is beautiful and precious. So highly esteemed were the plumes of the bird that the word quetzal was extended to describe anything very precious. Not only did the quetzal play an important role in the life, religion, and art of the ancient people of Mexico and Central America; it also still possesses symbolic importance, being now seen on the coins, stamps, and shield of Guatemala.

One of the features first attracting the attention of visitors to many of the ruins of ancient civilizations in Mexico and Central America is the plumed serpent in sculpture. It is conspicuously present and expressed in innumerable forms; sometimes a portion of the head being so highly conventionalized as to be recognized only by a practiced eye. To the uninformed, the scene is strange, fantastic, and unintelligible, and to such it would be easy to conclude the emblem was connected with idolatry. It is the emblem of Quetzalcoatl. It was found not only in the books, sculpture, and buildings of the Aztecs at the time of the Spanish Conquest, but also it appears in the ruins of the Toltecs who long preceded the Aztecs in the valley of Mexico, in the ruins at Xochicalco, Chichen Itza, Uxmal, and Teotihuacan, and in the earliest known of the Maya ruins, at Tikal, Copan, Palenque, Yaxchilan, et al.

Examples of plumed-serpent sculpture in ancient Mexico and Central America, like those in our illustrations, give an idea of the beauty and symbolic power in the emblem of Quetzalcoatl.

Illustrations of similar sculptures could be presented almost without number from before the Christian Era to the time of the Spanish Conquest.

What is the explanation of coatl being incorporated into the name of Quetzalcoatl? It appears appropriate for the rich and beautiful plumes of the quetzal to have been used to symbolize what the people felt was precious and divine in Quetzalcoatl; but one may ask, What about coatl? If one believes that coatl can have no relation with anything except the serpent of deception in the Garden of Eden, to "that old serpent, the devil," of course all that one will see in the sculpture of the plumed serpent will be what is grotesque and barbaric.

Are the bird and serpent features thus united, to be attributed to mere artistic caprice?

Herbert J. Spinden, writing of "The Serpent in Mayan Art," says: "The serpent motive controlled the character of Mayan art and was of first importance in all subsequent arts in Central America and Mexico. . . . Mayan art is strange and unintelligible at first sight, but after careful study many wonderful qualities appear in it. . . . As we break away more and more from the shackles of our own artistic conventions, we shall be able to appreciate the many beauties of ancient American sculpture."¹

The Plumed Serpent on Altar O at Copan, Honduras. a, West side of altar. b, East side of altar. After Maudslay.

He further says:

"When we can bring ourselves to feel the serpent symbolism of the Mayan artists as we feel, for instance the conventional halo that crowns the ideal head of Christ, then we shall be able to recognize the truly emotional qualities of Mayan sculptures."²

Pál Kelemen, referring to pre-Columbian American art, says:

"Various cultures have very different ideals of beauty . . . the grotesque and horrifying, often repulsive to us but nevertheless strikingly effective, played a much larger part in their art than in ours."³

J. Eric Thompson says of Quetzalcoatl:

"His worship as the feathered serpent was very widespread over Mexico and the Maya country. A serpent with feathers attached to its scales is the commonest art motif in aboriginal middle America, and this doubtlessly represents the god."⁴

The emblem is most unique, but certainly it would be more strange if the first half of the name of Quetzalcoatl referred to what was rich and beautiful and the latter half signified what was evil, or the devil.

The Serpent Bird, composed of the quetzal with a highly conventionalized serpent's head, such as is perched upon the cross in the Tablet of the Cross from Palenque, appears to be simply another way of expressing the idea intended to be conveyed by the Feathered Serpent.

Thomas A. Joyce says, "The practice of representing a particularly high and mysterious deity by means of a symbol only has many parallels in the religious history of mankind."⁵

Mr. Spinden says of Mayan art: "Doubtless the art reacted strongly upon the religion which gave it birth, filling that religion with symbolism and imagery. The two worked hand in hand. The spreading of the religion meant a spreading of the art, and the graphic representations of the art rendered the religion intelligible."⁶

When, or by whom, the feathered serpent was first employed as a symbol of Quetzalcoatl is not known.

What is the explanation of Quetzalcoatl?

The Book of Mormon, one of the standard books of faith of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, contains a history of ancient American nations, and sets forth in detail the personal visit and ministrations of Jesus Christ to his people in America soon after he rose from the dead. It was translated by the gift and power of God by the young prophet, Joseph Smith, from metallic plates written upon by ancient prophets and historians. What has been learned concerning Quetzalcoatl provides remarkable substantiation of the visit of Christ in America.

The Quetzal is to be seen with head pointing down to the crossbar of each cross held by the priests, and curving upward and forward above the headdress of each personage is the highly conventionalized head of a serpent. Yaxchilan, Mexico.

The graphic emblem of the Plumed Serpent is seen in this Temple of Quetzalcoatl at Teotihuacan, Mexico.

The origin of the serpent as a part of the emblem of Quetzalcoatl appears to the writer probably to be found in, or to have been suggested by, the people's knowledge of the serpent raised on a pole by Moses among the Israelites. If not this, what is its origin? Lehi and his colony when leaving Jerusalem about 600 B.C., brought with them to America the Scriptures then in the possession of the Jews. Therein they would read the Lord's words to Moses:

"Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that everyone that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live. And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived."¹⁰

Christ directly referred to this lifting up—not of a dove—but of a serpent by Moses as prefiguring something relating to himself:

"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life."¹¹

The evidence does not tolerate the idea of Quetzalcoatl having a name, the forepart of which suggests what is beautiful, and the remaining half evil, or the devil. In the Codex Vaticanus B, sheet 42 (Kingsborough, Volume 3, sheet 73), or book, that reached the Vatican Library in the years 1565-1570, Quetzalcoatl is represented destroying the devil. Dr. Eduard Seler gives this elucidation of the sheet:

"Quetzalcoatl sacrifices the God of the Underworld on the Chalchiuhtepepl Quetzalcoatl is seen performing the sacrifice to [of] this Death-god, while his associate Texcatlipoca drinks the blood gushing from the wound in the breast. Hence this means the victory over the powers of death."¹²

Also on sheets 73 and 56 of the same codex, Quetzalcoatl and Mictlantecutli, the Mexican devil, are pictured seated back to back (Plate IV, Figure 2). Dr. Seler gives this interpretation of the scene:

"Here Quetzalcoatl is obviously conceived as the creator of man, Lord of life. And in the position seated leaning back to back, expression is given to a difference of direction between these two persons, or to the antagonism that exists between them. The difference of direction between these two persons means the above and below, the antagonism life and death."¹³

Among the Egyptians the serpent was one of their most divine symbols. Decking the forehead or crown of monarchs of Egypt, statues in stone have been recovered by archæologists, reaching back long prior to, at the time of, and after the exodus of Israel. In the religion of the Egyptians the emblem of the serpent was associated in some sense with Deity, a token of divine authority, dominion and power. Something of this nature clearly was symbolically present in the brazen serpent looking towards which was to result in blessing to the people.

The Hebrews were not long out of Egypt when the emblem of the serpent with religious significance was lifted up in their midst. To confuse this emblem with what is evil would be to charge Moses, a great prophet of God, with wrongful procedure, introducing a symbol of spiritual darkness and encouraging people to believe if they with faith looked upon it they would be healed. And it is unthinkable that Christ was slipping when he pointed out the lifting up of the serpent by Moses prefigured the lifting up of himself on the cross.

According to the Book of Mormon, a knowledge of the serpent lifted up by Moses and its symbolism was known to the people of God in America. Whether the Nephites, the most highly civilized people in Book of Mormon times, used the symbol of the serpent, or of the plumed serpent, in their art and architecture, is not known. It is known that among them the serpent lifted up by Moses was in their public teaching associated symbolically with Christ as follows:

"Did Moses not bear record, that the Son of God should come? And as he lifted up the brazen serpent in the wilderness, even so shall he be lifted up who should come. And as many as should look upon that serpent should live. Even as many as should look upon the Son of God, with faith, having a contrite spirit, might live, even unto that life which is eternal."¹⁴

If the serpent was worshiped in Mexico and Central America, it would be clear that if the worshipers ever were enlightened of God and then turned to the worship of such a creature their condition would represent a gross state of darkness and apostasy. Whatever may have been the failings of the peoples of Mexico and Central America, and there were many, similarly as there were many in ancient Israel and have been among professing Christian churches, such a high authority as George Byron

Gordon in an article titled, "The Serpent Motive in the Ancient Art of Central America and Mexico," gives this enlightening information:

"The serpent in one form or another, whether as an object of worship, a sacred symbol or a decorative device, is found everywhere on the Western Hemisphere as well as in almost all other parts of the world; but in this connection the position of the animal in Mexico and Central America is absolutely unique; for nowhere else in the world, if we may judge by traditional and archæological remains, did the serpent and the set of ideas connected therewith assume such supreme importance or attain such an extraordinary development as in the region here defined. . . .

"I think there can be no doubt that in order to arrive at a comprehensive appreciation of Mexican or Maya painting and sculpture, one might say of Mexican and Maya art in the broadest sense of the term, a liberal knowledge of the symbolism in use among these peoples would be necessary. . . .

"It is difficult to find either in Mexican or Maya art a really natural representation of a serpent. . . .

"I think that it becomes clear from the materials which have been subjected to analysis that the serpent motive is the dominant one throughout the whole body of artistic products. It is the leading idea in architectural ornament, in the sculptured stelæ and altars, and in the dress and personal adornment of human beings, to say nothing of its use in the picture writings and the details of painting generally. Such a phenomenon as this naturally associates itself in the mind with the idea of serpent worship. Indeed the constant occurrence of the serpent image on the monumental remains of a people believed to have been endowed with strong religious connections, a people betraying in their reported customs a deep religious sentiment, a people with social organization and political institutions closely allied to ecclesiastical orders, as we are told was the case among the ancient Mexicans, would seem almost of itself to justify such a conclusion. Otherwise there is but little evidence to offer in support of the argument.

"There does not exist the testimony of a single eyewitness whose statements can be regarded as authoritative, to the effect that serpent worship was known in Mexico at the time of the Conquest. The soldiers who accompanied Cortez frequently mention in their letters the serpent images which were worshiped in the native temples, but the qualifications of these observers in matters of this kind were such that their testimony cannot be allowed to carry weight. Those who followed, the more intelligent and studious friars who, though often blinded by prejudice, were faithful observers in the main, either observed nothing which they interpreted as worship of the serpent or else they purposely avoided all mention of it, an incomprehensible omission entirely at variance with the practice of these early writers who were impressed with the need of justifying their destructive habits. I have not found in any of the old authors a single distinct reference to serpent worship as a part of the native religion. We have no historical evidence of a reliable nature that serpent worship in any form was practiced in Central America or Mexico at the time of the conquest or at any time prior or subsequent to that event. There is no historical key to this particular ethnological problem, and like so many other problems peculiar to the same religion we must rely almost wholly on the resources of archæology for a reliable solution.

"Whence the ancient Mexicans and Mayas derived the symbolism of the serpent we shall probably never know; like all that belonged to these two peculiar cultures, its origin remains a mystery. Concerning the fundamental principles underlying that symbolism, its meaning in the minds of the initiated, its significance to the masses of the people, and the purpose which it served in the economy of the State, are all matters of speculation still. However, we may reasonably postulate two alternative explanations of the serpent motive.

Either it indicates a belief in the divine nature of the serpent and is in itself a surviving evidence of serpent worship, or else the serpent image was employed to represent in a symbolic way some attribute of divinity or some set of abstract ideas connected with religion, popular mythology or philosophy."¹²

Brotherhood in Our Day

Men of our time, get down upon your knees,
Bend low before the God who gave you life,
And plead with him to break the chains
Which bind your souls to dust.

Kneel down in deep humility,
And pray with all awareness of your soul
That barriers within be broken down,
Barriers which hold your inner circle
Tight against the feet of other men.

Men who speak a different language;
Men whose food and dress are unlike yours;
Men with a different history;
Men whose skin is another color;
Men whom God created as all others
And from the same clay.

There must be no delay;
Kneel down today, O men of God,
Tomorrow is too late;
The world for brotherhood awaits,
It must begin within each human heart.
O God, forgive, we pray;
And hasten brotherhood in this our day.

Concerning Zion

By EDITH BARWISE

IV The Price of Spiritual Growth

The church is admonished again that all movements toward Zion and the gathering and the temporalities connected therewith are within my law, and all things should be done in order, the advice and council of the elders and the Bishop and his council sought and honored when received, as before enjoined, The work of preparation and the perfection of my saints [two things] go forward slowly, and Zion conditions are no further away nor any closer than the spiritual condition of my people justifies.—Doctrine and Covenants 140: 5.

If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me. And now for a man to take up his cross, is to deny himself all ungodliness, and every worldly lust, and keep my commandments.—Matthew 16: 25, 26.

SOME HAVE BELIEVED the church needs more revelation in order to start to establish Zion. Jesus takes note of this belief in the first quotation and chidingly reminds us that all movements towards Zion and the gathering and the temporalities connected with them are “within my law.” Since the law we already have covers these things, dare we insist that more law is needed? Would that not belie the Lord and demonstrate a wish to postpone our obedience?

But the quotation points out something we do need. It is called “the perfection of my Saints,” and we are very gently informed that our spiritual condition will have to improve before Zion conditions will be justified. This means there is a spiritual growth that is needful and possible right now. While a child is not born full grown, it must make a certain development before birth to be able to live—to be, as the doctors say, viable. A Zion condition in our present spiritual condition would not be viable. Some of the same hindrances mentioned (Doctrine and Covenants 98: 3) as existing in 1833 still exist and would strangle the kingdom child (Revelation 12: 7) at birth. If we want Zion conditions soon, we must hasten our spiritual growth.

JESUS TOLD HIS LISTENERS that to follow him required cross-bearing, explaining that this included three things: First, they must deny themselves all ungodliness. When a mother denies her child anything, she says, “No, you can’t have (or do) that.” In the same way, we must discipline our own souls, refusing all ungodliness and permitting the presence of only godly actions and thoughts.

Examining the word ungodliness, we find the core of the word is God. It has a prefix, “un” that means not. The suffix “ly” means like. Godly, then, means like God and therefore pleasing to him, while ungodly means not like or not pleasing to God. The last suffix, “ness,” means state of being. Cross-bearing, then, requires that we deny ourselves every state of mind, every activity, and everything that is not pleasing to or like God.

Jesus did this. He so fully carried out the will and purpose of God, the Father, that he could truthfully say, “I do always those things that please him.”—John 8: 29. “As the Father gave me commandment, even so I do.”—John 14: 31. “I seek not my own will, but the will of the Father who hath sent me.”—John 5: 31. Because he did this, Jesus could also say, “I and my Father are one.”—John 10:30. His every act and motive was so completely merged with the will and purpose of God, it was as if he had no separate will at all. With the glad acceptance of a dutiful son, Jesus surrendered lovingly and confidently to the will of the Father. Their wills coincided. They were one in purpose and action to such an extent that Jesus seems surprised and a bit disappointed when “Philip saith unto him, show us the Father and it sufficeth us” (John 14: 8).

Not only was Jesus one with the Father, he expected his followers to have the same unity. In one of his last prayers are the words, “Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are.”

—John 17: 11. This whole chapter is a prayer with the main topic of unity—with him, with God, and with each other. Moreover, Jesus knew the union he prayed for was possible; he himself had attained it. It is still possible, for we are included in that prayer (see verse 20). The price Jesus paid for union, and which we must pay, is doing the will of God; changing the center of our lives from self to God.

When we deny ourselves all ungodliness and “do always those things that please him,” we will find we are united. No matter from which side we climb a hill, when we reach the top, we stand together. The top of this hill is the word, always, “Always . . . please him.” Unity was one characteristic of Zion in Enoch’s day, and Jesus tells us: “Be one; and if ye are not one, ye are not mine.”—Doctrine and Covenants 38: 6.

THE SECOND PART of our cross is “every worldly lust.” Worldly means like the world, and lust means strong desire or craving. We must deny ourselves things the world craves, among which are riches, power, and pride. Saints should not use the world’s dictionary. I am confident that when Jesus said, “every worldly lust,” he meant all desires characteristic of the worldly. A worldly man delights to own a finer car or home than his neighbor. He is pleased and happy when he can create envy in his fellow man. He glories in this unrighteousness, he dwells in it, he even revels in it. A worldly man likes to loll at ease while other men toil and to eat the fruit of their labor. These and other kinds of self-gratification are included in "every worldly lust."

Our cross may seem heavy, for worldly ideas are popular, and we are pretty sure to be unpopular if we refuse to follow the crowd. Truly, Zion is a pearl of great price.

THE THIRD PART in cross-bearing, the nails that hold the cross together—is "keep my commandments." The next verse adds the clinching words: "Break not my commandments for to save your lives; for whosoever will [by this means] save his life in this world, shall lose it in the world to come."—Matthew 16: 27. To obey Christ is more important than to live; yet these commandments are not arbitrary, but according to the principles of abundant life which God sent Jesus to teach. Two and two are not four because the teacher says so. It is a principle of mathematics, and the law of the Lord is as needful as the principles of mathematics in dealing with problems of life. There will be envy and hatred, malice and strife until we recognize that the giver of life knows the best way to preserve and sanctify life, and that his commandments were given to that end.

Moreover, citizenship in the kingdom of God makes the law and commandments of our king binding on us. How is Jesus our king unless we obey him? Let us not be among those that say, "Lord, Lord," and do not, for then we have no promise. Rather let us each take up our cross and go forward until we reach the measure of perfection, as Saints, that will justify Zion conditions.

Thus we never live, but we hope to live; and always disposing ourselves to be happy, it is inevitable that we never become so.—Blaise Pascal.

Begin the New Year Right With Study

By THELONA D. STEVENS

WITH THE DAWN OF 1949 comes the usual resolutions. Many are made lightly in the spirit of fun, whereas many a devout soul honestly faces the new year with a firm, deep-rooted desire to improve his life, to conform more to the Christ pattern, to obey the divine commandments. Many individuals seem to have a sincere but vague sense of wanting "to do better," while others more logically set upon a definite course of action, naming one or more areas in which they recognize the need for improvement, and resolve to start making such improvement.

One course of action is urged by God again and again for all his people—to gain more knowledge of him, his ways, and his laws, through study. He has said, "He that hath the scriptures, let him search them Yea, a commandment I give unto you, that ye search these things diligently Therefore give heed to my words."—III Nephi 4:69; 10: 27, 30.

Those at all familiar with the Scriptures know that they contain oft-repeated admonitions to study the things of God. Luke gives an excellent reason for this. He says, "The one everlasting thing in the world is the word of God."—Luke 21: 33. This unchangeable word is the "rod of iron" by which followers of Christ learn how to conform to his way of life. In a world where there is so little of security of any kind, the way of God looms high as the one and only means whereby man can be saved, through Christ his Son.

God, in his love for his children, again pointed the only possible way for security when he spoke through the prophet at the last General Conference, wherein he stated that the time until the next General Conference "must be one of unusual preparation for my church as an organization, for my people, and especially for my priesthood if there shall be those who will be qualified to assume and to carry the responsibilities of those who fall or fail or who are released."

Therefore, as all scan the prospects of the new year, each one who is wise will consider carefully and prayerfully what it means for him to make "unusual preparation." Each, of course, will have to answer in his own heart, "What do I desire more than anything else in the world?" If you desire to follow in the footsteps of the Savior (as was promised in baptism, and in the renewal of that covenant each time there is participation in the Lord's Supper); if you desire salvation for not only yourself but also for your fellow men; if you desire to assist in the building up of God's kingdom, then you along with all others must make "unusual preparation."

A part of this preparation may well be study, for who has perfect knowledge of all of God's word? Who has learned how to make perfect application in his own life of all of these teachings? Who has perfect knowledge of all of the laws of teaching in order that he may impart the word of God to his fellow men? Who has become perfect in his understanding of the characteristics of the age group whom he hopes to teach? Who has learned all there is to know about everything? If you cannot answer in the affirmative to all of these questions, you are under obligations as a part of the church of God to study, for God has named the requirement for all—"for the church as an organization, for my people, and especially for my priesthood"

They Built It Themselves

The Story of the Midland, Michigan, Church

By JOHN W. BANKS, PASTOR

THE MIDLAND, MICHIGAN, SAINTS have the privilege of meeting regularly in a unique house of worship. The church building is located in a new and growing section of the city and faces Ashman Street, one of the city's principal streets. The grounds are beautifully landscaped and reveal the touch of skillful planning and careful tending. The plot owned by the church is approximately 100 by 300 feet in size and provides adequate automobile parking space in the rear of the building. The building itself is fifty by ninety feet and has a seating capacity of 325. Those composing the congregation are Saints of quality and devotion who are unified in their church fellowship and worship. Nonmembers are attracted to the church and attend the services regularly. Hundreds of visitors from all sections of the United States and foreign lands have signed the guest book in the foyer. When the church was constructed, approximately 275 members were its proud supporters. Now the growing congregation numbers 320. The opening ceremonies of the church were held on May 23, 1943. The theme around which the architect designed the church was that of revelation. Natural light is amply supplied by the large bay windows reaching from the floor to the ceiling and extending in length to include over fifty per cent of the walls on both sides in the main auditorium. These three floor-to-ceiling windows of clear glass which let in the utmost in sunlight combined with the garden view through the windows definitely induce the sought-for intermingling of the teaching of nature and God. On the auditorium level is the foyer, a cloakroom, pastor's study, the main sanctuary, the chancel or rostrum, and stair and hallways leading to the lower level from both the front and rear of the church. The platform or rostrum has sufficient room for a forty-voice choir and provides space for the two lecterns, the piano, an organ, and a stage for small dramatizations. The lecterns are of naturally finished light oak, as is all furniture and wood trim. Choir pews, lecterns, altar, and cross (the latter two suspended on the wall) are portable and easily moved when dramatic presentations are given. Heavy royal purple drapes are supplied on the altar walls. These beautiful drapes contrast with the natural blond oak furniture and green carpeting. The rostrum is completely covered with purple carpeting which matches the drapes. A wide, light green carpet of fine quality stretches down the long center isle from the front door entrance to the steps leading to the church chancel. The Three Standard Books of the church repose on the altar below the large wooden cross. The altar is located midway between the two lecterns and provides the center of worship. Entrances are available to the church chancel from either side, coming from outside the church or from the lower auditorium. The floor of the main auditorium, made of concrete covered with mastic tile, slopes down toward the platform or rostrum. The walls inside and out are brick, covered by draperies only in portions of the chancel.

THE CHURCH is indirectly lighted throughout with recessed spotlights in the ceiling over the altar and lecterns. The roof has three inches of blanket insulation. The building is heated by a forced-air gas-fired furnace, with galvanized iron supply ducts in the ceiling and returns under the windows. The heating plant was donated and is not adequate for the building, but money for a new plant is now being raised. The new heating system most likely will be a forced-air-over-steam type of furnace heated by gas, with air-conditioning for the summer.

The lower auditorium will comfortably seat 160 persons at tables for banquet purposes. A baptismal font, seven classrooms (provided by movable partitions), a lounge room, a kitchen, a furnace room, two storage and supply rooms and two rest rooms are below. A combined chimney and chime tower is at the back of the church. Chimes and recorded hymns are played on Saturday evenings and on Sundays from the chime tower. The church possesses a recording and speaking set which is arranged to provide recorded music inside in either auditorium and outside through the chime tower. A church sign, distinctive in its make-up and harmonizing with the general church architectural scheme, faces Ashman Street and has inscribed on it the full name of the church. The letters are cut through the plywood front allowing the light, which is in the back, to shine through each letter at night. An automatic switch turns the light on each evening at dusk and off at midnight.

The simple beauty and natural setting of the church sanctuary invites reverence, meditation, and prayer. It is not uncommon for a worshiper to occupy a pew on any Sunday and be permitted the view of nature's gift of beautiful flowers and shrubbery growing in the flower gardens surrounding the church and brought to view by the three large windows on each side. To further harmonize with the simple and beautiful interior setting of the church are built-in plant containers flanking the platform and the altar on its rear wall. Ferns are often placed on each side of the altar, and the plant containers are filled with the greenery of nature.

Added to all that has been said about this structure is the significant fact that the building is comparatively inexpensive and definitely lends to the type and nature of construction work that can easily be done by members of the congregation. Another point of interest is that the upkeep and maintenance of the building is also cut to a minimum. For instance, there is little decorating necessary as the walls inside and out are brick; the mastic tile covered floor in the main auditorium can be easily scrubbed and waxed as one would a linoleum; a dust mop will quickly dust the floor, and a vacuum sweeper soon cleans the draperies and the carpeting; the deacons are able to keep the church plant clean with little effort and without hired help. It is necessary to clean the windows only every three or four months, and this is usually done by the women's department.

ALDEN DOW OF MIDLAND, noted progressive architect of modern homes and brother of the president of Dow Chemical Company, designed the church. Mr. Dow has long advocated that any church should symbolize its religion. So, in the Midland church, Mr. Dow with the members made this possible in particularly two respects: First, in the window arrangement letting in the natural light of God and the flower and shrubbery gardens of God's sustaining. Second, spaces over the setback in the main entrance were arranged for stone carving or cement modeling which depicts the teachings and doctrine of the church. Thus far, four plaques have been completed; a view of the Auditorium building at Independence, a plaque of a baptism, one of the Kirtland Temple, and one of the church seal. Such symbols as the Graceland Tower, the laying on of hands, and others will soon be completed.

The following line is taken from the December, 1944, issue of Pencil Points, Progressive Architecture Magazine: "He [Mr. Dow] gives as one reason for the success of the church, the intense enthusiasm of the congregation [as many as thirty members at a time, all working, participating in its construction.]" Several pages were given to a detailed description with photographs of the Midland church in the above-mentioned issue.

The Midland Saints will say in chorus that it was hard work, but it was worth more than they put into it. To give an idea of how funds were raised to finance this $44,000 (1943 estimate) structure, here is a little of the story.

The drapes serving as backstop for the entire length of the rostrum were purchased by Sister Margaret Johnson from the sale of 1,200 dozen cookies which she baked. The women's department sponsored luncheons, suppers, banquets, bake sales, and rummage sales for funds. Some suppers were served to as many as a thousand people, and several thousand dollars were raised by the women. Private subscriptions by the Saints further swelled the funds. Alden Dow donated his architectural skill and other Midland philanthropists observing the hard work and ambition of the Saints added their contributions to the total. Most of the labor involved in building was done by the men of the church.

After all has been said—the Midland church building is a monument to the ambition, progressiveness and devotion of the Saints in Midland. It is a standing evidence of what a small group of industrious, consecrated, and unified members can achieve in any community to bring honor and distinction to the church. When the new church structure and site are compared with the old in Midland (a small frame building located near the tracks), it provides unmistakable evidence of what has been done by far-seeing and united members. The Midland Saints testify that something similar in transformation of both church and location can be made where there is a will and determination and where such is necessary in any of the branches throughout the church.

Alden Dow was unable to be present at the opening ceremonies of the church but sent the following telegram from Houston, Texas:

Deeply regret that I cannot be in Midland for the opening of the church. Let me say that I really believe this building has more religion in back of it, in it, and growing with it than any church I know of today. I greatly enjoyed working with you on it but more than that I have enjoyed and admired the efforts your members have contributed. Such efforts are rare. Hold to them, and they will go beyond the imagination.

This telegram reveals much. The Midland Saints have well established themselves in their community and are ever striving to live up to their reputation.

Opportunities For Priesthood Education

Opportunity No. II—The Leadership Training Series

We need to break up the vicious circle, i. e., inadequate leadership—inefficient branch—inefficient leadership. We need to stir ourselves out of the complacency with which many of us have viewed this situation. We need to begin now, where we are, in a simple, practical way to do something about this matter of leadership—we can and must map out and follow simple, practical procedures designed to point toward the discovery, enlistment, and training of teachers and leaders to meet both present and future needs.—From "That Problem of Leadership," by F. M. McDowell.

To meet in part this need, the Department of Religious Education has for many years made available to students and workers throughout the church the "Leadership Training Series."

During recent years, many hundreds of teachers and leaders, including many scores of ordained men, have pursued these studies systematically and diligently.

AVAILABLE FOR YOU NOW

These splendid courses are still available. Many new titles have been added recently. There is no one exclusive and easy way to efficiency in leadership. The development of craftsmanship in the work of the ministry is no exception. Men of the priesthood as all others must pay the price of growth.

Worship Suggestions for March

Theme for the Month:

GOSPEL PRINCIPLES

MARCH 6, 1949

"FAITH"

Prelude: "Welcome Hour of Solemn Meeting," Saints' Hymnal, No. 77.

Call to Worship:

O come, let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our maker; For he is our God; and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand. . . . But without faith it is impossible to please him; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.—Psalm 95: 6, 7; Hebrews 11: 6.

Hymn:* "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 281 (verses 1, 3).

Prayer:* (Help us to see ourselves as God sees us so that we may know how to adjust our lives and come into his presence.)

Scripture: Alma 16: 143, 149-160, 163-170.

Duet (by unseen singers): "Faith of Our Fathers, Living Still," Saints' Hymnal, No. 291 (verses 1, 3, 4).

Talk: (Five or six minutes)

Talk of the faith of the early Saints. Kirtland Temple was built through faith of the Saints. They had faith that if they kept God's word and gave everything they had, the temple would be finished. It was, and is a blessing to us today as many can testify.

If we are going to build and dwell in Zion, our faith must be strong to withstand temptations around us. What are the temptations? God says meet together often. How many attend Wednesday prayer service. "Study to show thyself approved." Do you have a period for study each day? There are other important laws that God has given us, too. If you have faith to observe them all, the kingdom for you is assured, and as others walk with you in love, Zion will become a reality.

Poem:

A PRAYER

Give me the faith that asks not "Why?"
I shall know God's plan by and by.

Give me the faith that looks at pain
And says "All will be right again."

Give me the faith to bow my head
Trustfully waiting to be led.

By BERNICE BONHAM

Give me the faith to face my life
With all its pain and wrong and strife,

Then at the time of setting sun,
God will be waiting as day is done.
—Author Unknown.

Hymn:* "Oh, For a Faith That Will Not Shrink," Saints' Hymnal, No. 240.

Benediction:* (That Christ will help our faith to grow and bear fruit for him.) Softly repeat the closing hymn again after the benediction.

MARCH 13, 1949

"REPENTANCE"

Prelude: "Jesus Is Calling," Saints' Hymnal, No. 332.

Call to Worship:

If my people, which are called by my name shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land.—II Chronicles 7: 14.

Hymn:* "Jesus Is Calling," Saints' Hymnal, No. 332 (Verses 1, 3).

Prayer:* (May we see our own need to repent and do the Master's will.)

Hymn: "Oh, For a Closer Walk With God," Saints' Hymnal, No. 313.

Scripture: Luke 3: 13, 15-18. Also

Remember the worth of souls is great in the sight of God; for, behold, the Lord your Redeemer suffered death in the flesh; wherefore he suffered the pain of all men, that all men might repent and come unto him. And he hath risen again from the dead, that he might bring all men unto him on conditions of repentance. And how great is his joy in the soul that repenteth.—Doctrine and Covenants 16: 3.

Talk: (Five or six minutes)

Basing the story on the above scripture, tell in your own words how Martin Harris (as we are told in Edward's Commentary) was a man who wanted to stand on the side line and yet have the thrill of the game.

Martin Harris repented and paid for 5,000 copies of the Book of Mormon even though his family tried to discourage him in keeping his promise. He gave his services as a proofreader of the Book of Mormon. He traveled in the interest of the Book of Mormon, paying his own expenses. He was also one of a committee of three to select the first twelve after the church was organized.

Many of us today want to stand on the side line and yet receive the blessings of the gospel, but not the work. We, too, like Martin Harris, must repent. Even though at one time he coveted his own money for his own use, he repented and paid for the Book of Mormon he had contracted to pay for. The same may apply to some of us; perhaps we need to repent and pay our tithes and offerings.

Martin Harris was, at one time, told to repent and pray vocally as well as in his heart. He must have done this, or he could not have done the work he did. Each one does not have the same things to repent of. One may need to repent and make preparation before going to a prayer meeting and then take part in the service so all may be blessed. Another may need to repent and take a church school class that needs him.

As each of us makes an individual adjustment, all will be blessed with God's Spirit.

Hymn: "Oh Thou God, Who Hearest Prayer," Saints' Hymnal, No. 323 (remain seated).

Commission:

And again, I command thee that thou shalt pray vocally as well as in thy heart; yea, before the world as well as in secret; in public as well as in private. And thou shalt declare glad tidings; yea, publish it upon the mountains, and upon every high place, and among every people that thou shalt be permitted to see. And thou shalt do it with all humility, trusting in me, reviling not against revilers. And of tenets thou shalt not talk, but thou shalt declare repentance and faith on the Savior, and remission of sins by baptism and by fires; yea, even the Holy Ghost.—Doctrine and Covenants 18: 4.

Benediction.*

"BAPTISM"

Prelude: "I Gave My Life For Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 330.

Call to Worship:

Teach me, O Lord, the way of thy statutes, and I shall keep it unto the end. Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law; yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart. Make me to go in the path of thy commandments; for therein do I delight.—Psalm 119: 33.

And he said unto them, go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned.—Mark 16: 14, 15.

Hymn:* "I Gave My Life For Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 330 (verses 1, 3, 4).

Prayer:* (Help us to accept the full responsibility of our baptism.)

www.LatterDayTruth.org

Scripture: II Nephi 13: 6-12.

Solo or Duet: "A Ruler Once Came to Jesus," Saints' Hymnal, No. 360 (verses 1, 2).

Talk:

We have been told that baptism is the door of entrance into Christ's kingdom. There is no other way of entrance. In Doctrine and Covenants 16: 6, "All men must repent and be baptized and not only men, but women; and children who have arrived to the years of accountability." The Lord doesn't want us just to add numbers to the church, but to bring forth fruit (lives) worthy to be baptized. In Doctrine and Covenants 17: 7, the Lord has given us instruction concerning the manner of baptism. Again in Doctrine and Covenants 18: 4, we are told that baptism is for the remission of our sins. It is written that the only ones who entered were those that repented and humbled themselves before the father . . . and kept his commandments.

When we went down into the waters of baptism, we promised God we would humble ourselves and be obedient. The way is straight and the gate is narrow; so only the humble and obedient may enter. If you humble yourself, you will not feel above another.

Have you been obedient in studying God's word each day in daily prayer, in speaking no evil of another? These are only a few suggestions as to how each one may be obedient in keeping the commandments of God.

Commission:

Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, unto the end of the world. Amen.—Matthew 28: 18, 19.

*Hymn: "Jesus, My Shepherd, Call With a Sweet Command," Saints' Hymnal, No. 272.

*Benediction.

MARCH 27, 1949

"LAYING ON OF HANDS"

Prelude: "Great God, as Followers of Thy Son," Saints' Hymnal, No. 64.

Call to Worship:

Give unto the Lord, O ye mighty, give unto the Lord glory and strength. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name; worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness.—Psalm 29: 1, 2.

*Hymn: "Sovereign and Transforming Grace," Saints' Hymnal, No. 76.

*Prayer: (Help us to live to receive thy Holy Spirit).

Scripture Reading: Acts 19: 1-6.

Hymn: "Spirit Divine, Attend Our Prayer," Saints' Hymnal, No. 196 (verses 1, 3, 5).

Talk: (Five to six minutes based on the following.)

One of the functions of the laying on of hands is for confirming those baptized. This is to put us in a position that we might receive the Holy Ghost.

We have the right to receive it when baptized; not all do, but when it does come, it is from God, and is a gift from him.

The Holy Ghost is the comforter which "shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance." It is to show us the way. Genesis 6: 53 says: ". . . if baptized you will receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, and whatsoever ye ask shall be given if you ask not amiss." The Spirit is to guide, lead into truth, quicken, make alive, and help us to know all things of God that are expedient to know. It is also to teach us, and make intercession for us when we pray.

The Holy Ghost cleanses as we are drawn to God, so we might fulfill his purposes in and through us.

Quartet: "Behold Thy Sons and Daughters, Lord," Saints' Hymnal, No. 366.

Commission:

Neglect not the gift that is in thee which was given thee by prophecy with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.—I Timothy 4: 14.

*Hymn: "Dismiss Us With Thy Blessing," Saints' Hymnal, No. 99 (verse 1).

*Benediction.

MT. VERNON, ILLINOIS.—The Zion's League, under the supervision of George Wolfe, sponsored a potluck supper and entertainment in September to raise money for Missions Abroad. Other fund-raising projects have been a chili supper, given by the League at children's department, which netted $42, and the sale of $100 worth of handwork by the women during Christmas. The women meet each week under the direction of Mrs. John Rockett.

Pastor W. W. Colvin presented an illustrated lecture on the birth and boyhood of Christ at the evening service on December 26. On January 2, Mr. Vernon Branch sponsored a special program and basket dinner for Seventy William Guthrie and his family; Saints throughout the district were invited to attend. Brother Guthrie, who served as district missionary for eighteen months, has been transferred to the New York and Philadelphia Districts. In the evening, five new members were baptized: James H. and Janice Drury, Mrs. Lloyd McKinney, Bonnie Simmons, and June Guthrie. Seventy Guthrie officiated. The infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Eber Jones was blessed also by Elders Ed Colvin and Robert Delaney.

Recent out-of-town speakers have been Ed Colvin and Lewis DeSelms.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.—E. A. Davis of Attleboro, Massachusetts, painted a reproduction of Sallman's "Head of Christ" for Providence Branch. It was presented by Elder E. M. Brown on Sunday, December 19, and will hang near the pulpit in the chapel against a velvet background.

On Sunday, January 2, Peter Jeffry, son of Mr. and Mrs. Norman Grange, was blessed by Elders G. F. Robley and E. M. Brown.

DINUBA, CALIFORNIA.—Evangelist William Patterson conducted a series of services from December 12 to 15, preaching five sermons during that time. He also visited members of the congregations, giving counsel and answering questions. Other recent visiting ministers were Priests Lawrence Vogel and Vernon Cline.

BLUE RAPIDS, KANSAS.—Elder J. D. Shower conducted a series of meetings recently which resulted in four baptisms. Six new members have been added to the group in the past six weeks.

By Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them

By VERDA E. BRYANT

ANN MERIDITH held seven-year-old Jimmy in her lap and put her arm about nine-year-old Sally, who sat on the hassock beside her. They were listening to the even voice of John, her husband, who was reading to them the story of the talents from the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew.

At the conclusion of the reading, the family of four knelt in reverent prayer to their Heavenly Father. As Ann helped the children prepare for bed, the words of the scripture John had read kept returning to her.

"Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord."¹ In contrast to this commendation, she remembered the condemnation in the words of the Master to the unfaithful servant: "Thou wicked and slothful servant . . . thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers . . . take therefore the talent from him, and give it to him which hath ten talents . . . and cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness."²

Ann wondered into which category she might be placed. Might she be invited to "enter thou into the joy of thy lord," or might the Master say of her, "cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness."

Having tucked the children into bed, she returned to the living room, where she picked up the scattered toys and straightened the rugs. She then seated herself on the footstool by her husband and put her hand on his arm. Seeing the perplexed look on his wife's face, John laid aside the paper he had been reading and smiled at her. Ann asked, "Why did you choose that particular scripture tonight, John?"

"I didn't choose it especially," he answered. "I just opened the Bible at random and began to read. Why?"

"It has caused me to do some thinking. Nell Johnson stopped in to see me this afternoon. She wanted me to take a church school class. I told her I had all I could do to take care of my own family, but she wasn't easily satisfied. She asked me who would teach Jimmy and Sally if everyone felt as I did. I told her a person couldn't do everything. Last month Mary Anderson asked me to do girls' work. I refused that, too. Sally likes her Blue Birds, but I said I couldn't spend time away from home on things like that."

"And I agree," John affirmed. "When mothers start doing things away from home, the children and the home have to suffer. We are getting along so well and are so happy, I wouldn't want anything to interfere."

"I've felt a little guilty all afternoon, and when you were reading that scripture, I felt as if God was condemning me. I keep remembering that Nell said they really needed help. I'm not so sure I should have refused."

"Now, Ann, you may rest assured that God knows what you are doing. He knows you are a good wife and mother, so don't worry about it." John dismissed the subject and went back to his reading.

ANN WENT OUT into the kitchen leaving him absorbed in his reading. She was troubled. She could not erase from her mind Nell's words of the afternoon, nor reconcile her response with the scripture her husband had read. Half aloud she breathed a prayer: "Oh, God, how can I know what to do? Help me to know what is right."

The events which followed were unusual—a little mysterious—a puzzle about which Ann was to wonder for days to come. There are times in life when a strange power seems to envelope a person to change his destiny. So it was with Ann.

She remembered intending to take a walk. She had a vague recollection of getting her sweater to put on against the cool air of the spring twilight. When she became aware of herself again, she seemed to be walking on velvetlike grass in a beautiful but rather peculiar grove of woods. She saw queer trees with gold, silver, and bronze fruit, and upon the trunk of each was a placard bearing a name. It occurred to her that perhaps somewhere was a tree bearing her name. She ran from tree to tree and was about to give up when, in a far corner of the grove, she came to one that was warped and stunted. The fruit was mostly dull brown and green, with but occasional glimpses of brightness to be seen. There upon its trunk she read, "Ann Meridith." With amazement and disappointment, Ann gazed at her tree. What was the meaning of this?

"The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life,"³ a voice startled her, and she whirled around to see standing at her side a kindly, bearded man dressed in a flowing white robe. Ann was frightened and was about to run, but the man raised his hand and quoted gently, "The righteous shall flourish like a palm tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon."⁴

ANN LOOKED FIRST at the man, then at the tree. "Do you mean that my life is represented by that stunted, warped, and dull little tree?"

— — — a home column feature — — —

The man in white solemnly nodded his head in affirmation. Ann stared into the tender eyes, then transferred her gaze to the tree before her. "But I do not understand. Why is my tree stunted and warped. Why is the fruit green, dull, and undeveloped, when that of the others is gold, silver, and bronze?"

"By their fruits ye shall know them," came the answer. "Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."⁵

"But I do try to do the will of my Father," Ann protested. "I love my husband and my children. I am trying to rear my children to be good citizens of the land and of the kingdom. I take good care of my home. I go to church, to prayer services, and to women's meetings. I keep a careful record of the money that passes through my hands, and pay my tithes and offerings. Is that not doing the will of my Father?"

The man in white answered not a word, but reached far under the branches, raised the leaves, and there hidden almost completely from sight were several bright golden fruit, fully developed and glistening. Recognizing these as the fruits of her obedience, Ann questioned, "Why are they hidden away?"

THE KIND ANSWER was flavored with condemnation. "A virtuous woman? . . . The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her . . . she worketh willingly with her hands . . . she stretcheth out her hand to the poor . . . she looketh well to the ways of her household . . . her children arise and call her blessed.⁶ These ought ye to have done and not to leave the other undone."⁷

"I try to do all I can for my church and my God." Then proudly Ann announced, "Why only last Sunday I sang a solo for a special service."

The man fingered a well-matured dull brown fruit. His eyes and voice were tender and full of compassion as he slowly shook his head, saying, "All their works they do for to be seen of men.⁸ Verily, I say unto you, they have their reward."⁹

Then Ann recalled that last week she had refused to sing for a group because there would be but a few present. She had felt at the time that it would hardly be worth the effort. Remembering, she blushed with shame. "Tell me what I must do to bring forth good fruit," she pleaded.

The man replied, "Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest. And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal."¹⁰

Thoughtfully Ann considered herself. "I can tell stories. My own children love to hear them." For reply the man touched a knobby green fruit, and Ann was immediately aware that this was an undeveloped talent.

"I can teach. I have learned much about the gospel, and I can continue to study so as to be more efficient." The hand touched another green fruit and raised it to her view.

Ann's mind raced on. "I have organizing ability. I can plan and put my plans into practice. I have a level head and don't become easily discouraged. I am rather skillful in making things."

As Ann recited hurriedly the things she thought she could do, and as divine fingers touched one fruit after another, she realized she had not given her fruit a chance to mature—to take upon it a gold, silver, or bronze hue.

The voice at her side encouraged, "Work, for I am with you.¹¹ As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially them who are of the household of faith."¹²

Ann seemed carried away with her thoughts. "I could teach a church school class. I could take the Blue Bird band. There are lots of things I could do. But what of my home? What of the children? Can I do more than I am already doing without neglecting them?"

"It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do his good pleasure.¹³ Let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.¹⁴ Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.¹⁵ Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you."¹⁶

THESE LAST WORDS of counsel were spoken softly and, as Ann turned to ask further questions, she saw she was standing alone. Her visitor had gone as suddenly as he had appeared. She turned and seemed to take two or three steps into an expanse of nothingness and oblivion.

When she came to herself again, she felt as though she had heard the great clock of eternity ticking off an undetermined quantity of time. She had her sweater in her hand, and she thought she must have been staring out of the window for some minutes, seeing another world.

"Oh, John!" she cried. "I see it all now. I was wrong. We were both wrong." Incoherently she told the story of her vision. "Don't you see, John? We can't go on living just for ourselves—just for our own little family! We have to develop our talents. We must use our time and our talents creatively for the glory of God!"

John, trying to piece together the bits of her story, began to see it as did his wife. "Just how are we going to start this creative use of our time and talents?"

"I know what I can do right this minute," and Ann went to the telephone and dialed a number.

LETTERS

Visited by Nephites

Twice during the last years of his life, Patriarch R. V. Hopkins urged me to write the following testimony regarding the visit to our home of two of the Nephites who were permitted to remain on the earth.

Both my husband, Elder Mark Jensen, and I told of the circumstance several times. Since his death several years ago, I have frequently been asked questions concerning this experience.

It happened about thirty years ago when we were living near what is now known as "Old Moorhead," Iowa. I dreamed that I was preparing the evening meal, while my husband sat reading, and the children were setting the table in the dining room. I was in the kitchen trying to make something of the leftovers from previous meals so as not to waste food. Suddenly, there came a knock at the kitchen door. When I opened it, I saw two of the most striking men I had ever seen.

They did not resemble each other, but both impressed me as being unusually well-developed, both physically and mentally.

When my husband came into the room, they seated themselves and seemed very much at home—just like neighbors. However, I did not realize what subjects they were discussing.

The "Martha" in me asserted itself and I at once thought we'd have guests for the meal, as it was our custom to invite those visiting at such a time to dine with us.

I felt very remorseful, realizing what an unsatisfactory meal I'd prepared to place before guests. Then, upon second thought, I remembered the abundant supply of both fresh and canned provisions with which our cellar was stocked.

But our invitation to stay and dine was declined; they said they could only stay in our home a very short while, as they had many calls to make.

After making a few inquiries as to where some of our neighbors lived (we later realized they were Saints), they departed without stating their mission.

My first impression was that they were some of the automobile salesmen who were scouring the country for prospective buyers, and we were in the market for a car; but to my disappointment, they did not inform us as to why they came.

During the morning I related my dream to the family, after which we separated for our various duties. Mark went about his farm work; the children, to school; and I, to my household tasks.

When I was alone, the dream dwelt heavily upon my consciousness. I was greatly disappointed that they did not tell us their mission to our home, for I knew it was a spiritual dream.

While washing the dishes, the thought came very forcefully to me, "You pray over almost everything, especially the things that bother you; why do you not pray for the interpretation of the dream? Pray also that it may come to your husband; thus your testimonies will be united."

I immediately stopped washing dishes, dried my hands, and went into the living room where I knelt down by the couch and poured out my petition to my Heavenly Father, that, as the messengers had come to our home and to me, the interpretation of the dream should come to my husband.

If ever I prayed in faith that a prayer would be answered, it was at that time. No doubt entered my mind; I was certain my desires would be fulfilled. I arose from my knees with a song on my lips. My heart was happy, and I seemed to be lifted above earthly things.

I went about my work the remainder of the day singing the songs of Zion.

I told no one of my prayer. Only God knew of it, and nothing more was said until the following morning, when I came downstairs where Mark was fixing fires. He asked, "Bessie, did you realize that anyone was in our room this morning?" I answered, "no," and then he told me that he was awakened by those two personages whom I had described as appearing in my dream.

He said they were walking in our room. He knew them from my description of them, and he also was given to understand that they were two of the Nephites, God's messengers who were permitted to tarry on the earth.

They carried sacks on their backs in which seemed to be provisions. My husband inquired as to the meaning of this and was informed that, as our nation at times sent provisions to needy ones in foreign lands, so provisions that they carried were emblematic of the spiritual gifts and blessings they were bringing to God's people.

They also said that they were visiting the homes of all the Saints. Some would realize their presence, while some would not; nevertheless, they were visiting them. He heard them walk through the hall, down the stairs, through the living room, and out the door.

We said nothing of the circumstance to anyone, but in about two weeks at our midweek prayer service in the church at Moorhead, a dear old sister told of her experience wherein a heavenly messenger had come into her home, putting a hand on her shoulder while she worked, and told her that the coming of the Savior was nearer at hand than most people realized. She was so thrilled that she wished to go out on the hilltop and shout repentance to the people, but she was told that it would be of no use, as they would not believe her.

In a few weeks I visited friends at Lamoni, one of whom was Sister Alice E. Cobb. During our conversation, I related the foregoing experience.

She at once said, "Bessie, I'm so pleased that you have told me of this, as it is almost identical with an experience that came to me about the same time."

So we were again made happy to realize that others besides ourselves had realized the presence of the messengers of God, who are ministering to his people today as recorded in the thirteenth chapter of Nephi.

True Experiences

I wish to relate two experiences in my life which, I believe, testify to the power of God.

When we were living on a farm in Alcon County, Michigan, Brother J. J. Bailey stayed at our home for two weeks. One day he wanted somebody to take him to Alpena, but all the Saints thought they were too busy. I thought I was, too, because it had rained and the weeds were about an inch high all through my cornfield. I felt, however, that I should take this brother to Alpena, so I did, giving no more thought to the cornfield. I don't know exactly how it happened, but God destroyed those weeds, and my cornfield was in good condition when I returned.

Three years ago I had a field of hay that was in perfect condition for storing. I hired a man to help me get it in the barn on Saturday as I didn't want any left in the field over Sunday. Unfortunately, the tongue in the wagon broke, and we could not get all of the hay in the barn. I decided, however, that I would leave the rest in the field rather than have someone criticize me, a minister, for working on Sunday. All Sunday night it rained steadily, and Monday was damp and cloudy. Early Tuesday morning I went out to see how wet the hay was. The first haycock I came to was perfectly dry, and so were all the rest. I went back to the house and told my wife that I had just witnessed a miracle—it was the power of God which saved my hay.

Converts Companion

I was born in a foreign country and, although I had never thought I would marry a nonmember, when I found someone who could speak my native language, I was greatly attracted to him. I saw in this young man something fine and good, and then I learned to love him. Our marriage has always been happy—especially so after our children were born—and my husband, a Lutheran, never protested when I went to church or when I had the children blessed.

One Sunday I asked him to come to church with me for just one service, after which I planned to go with him to a soccer game. The Saints were so friendly that he decided to attend regularly and become familiar with the teachings of our church. Then my husband gave me a very special birthday gift—he told me that he was going to be baptized. I knew he had thought it over carefully and was completely convinced, because he does not rush into anything. Now I know what true happiness is. Saturday nights, which used to be our "pleasure nights," are now reserved for study and my husband holds the office of teacher.

It took a long time, but it was certainly worth waiting for. Any part I might have played in his conversion is secondary to what God did for him. To those who have married nonmembers, I would advise standing firmly for the right. Most important, don't forget to pray.

Letter From England

We want to thank the women of Cincinnati, Ohio, for the packages they continue to send to us here in Warrington. Members of the church school were happy to receive their gifts and also express appreciation. We pray God will bless those who have contributed in this way.

Soon we hope to be working with the good people of Portland, Oregon. We trust God will be with us in this work which means so much to us. Our best wishes are for the Saints everywhere.

A Request for Letters

I wrote a short time ago asking for prayers for a young brother who had been stricken with polio and was in an iron lung. Soon afterwards, he was removed from the iron lung and appeared to be recovering. Then he contracted pneumonia and died on December 29.

Letters from the Saints to his parents would be greatly appreciated at this time. They are Mr. and Mrs. Edwin S. Bevins, 311 North Avenue, Route 2, Box 342, Mt. Clemens, Michigan.

Missionary Work in Early Days

(From a personal letter)

Loaded with copies of MacGregor's Marvellous Work and a Wonder in a salesman's grip, I would go on Sunday afternoons to place them on a Union Depot newsstand in Kansas City, collecting for copies sold. Brother W. H. Deam and I put up a sign, "Bible Mysteries Explained." Curiosity caused many a traveler to purchase a copy. I also placed copies of the book at magazine counters. Then at the Kansas City Bolt and Nut Works at Sheffield, I carried each week a large number of Ensigns. I had a rack built and put up where the men checked out. Some weeks Brother Deam passed out more than a hundred copies, and all were taken from the rack. There was a rack at Stone Church where the Saints brought their Ensigns and magazines.

Tribute to Joseph Jaques

High Priest Joseph A. Jaques, better known as "Uncle Joe," will be greatly missed by his friends and neighbors in the Kirtland District. He will be especially remembered by the young people whose ball games he supervised; it was through sports that he taught the importance of teamwork. He will be remembered, too, by all who attend the Kirtland Reunions. One of the memorials he leaves is the electrical illumination of Kirtland Temple tower, which can be seen for miles around when it is lit at night.

More Beautiful Things

By
JOHN C. THOMAN

LIFE IS A VERY COMPLEX and baffling affair," thought David as he stood gazing with contracted brows at the tropical sunset.

He turned and retraced his steps up the beach, past the portico and big English hotel, to his modest quarters in a small American rooming house in a narrow side street of this strange old city with its ancient memories and brooding mosques and citadels—the city of Calcutta. But tonight he took no notice of all its ancient squalors and splendors. He seemed to be walking in a dream, so deep was his preoccupation.

When he finally returned to his surroundings, David found himself kneeling beside one of the trunks in which he had, in the last two years, stored the very choicest of the many bizarre and beautiful things he had purchased—with good American dollars—from the native craftsmen during his sojourn in Calcutta.

These were the things he had bought and put away for himself from among the many things which had passed through his hands. In this trunk were the items he considered to be of exceptional beauty and workmanship. This collection had been his hobby and his greatest extravagance, and to it he always returned in his times of loneliness.

He wondered now, as he carefully removed one after another of this novel collection, why it was that when he was suffering from loneliness and uncertainty he turned to these for comfort. Here was a carved ebony trinket of remarkable workmanship, exceptional in design—and here, the figure of a native dancer of beaten copper. At one end of the trunk was a picture of an Indian market place, woven of colored glass. David lifted each piece carefully from its place until the trunk was empty and the floor was covered with interesting and unusual shapes giving an eerie effect in the half-light of the gather-

Here Is the Writer

John C. Thoman is well known to "Herald" readers as well as to the younger readers of "Stepping Stones" for his many illustrations. His contributions as an artist date back to 1925.

Born in Fort Worth, Texas, he moved with his parents to Chicago while in his teens. There for almost four years, the Chicago Art Institute became his whole life. Later his schooling included the Academy of Fine Arts, the American Academy, and the Fred Mizen Academy. This education was received during the depression years when studying art was a luxury, but nothing could swerve him from his purpose—to be an artist.

All artists do not live a Bohemian life, and John is one of the exceptions. He looks like any other businessman leaving for the office every morning, although his brief case is filled with water colors and illustrations. At present, he is teaching at a commercial art school in Kansas City. Most of his pupils are studying under the GI Bill, and as many another teacher today, he finds himself in the unique position of having to help solve problems which have no bearing on art.

Mr. Thoman and his family, which includes his wife, Sue; his four children: Mark Edward, twelve, Barbara Irene, ten, Leota Grace, six, and Elizabeth Anne, eighteen months, moved to Independence from Chicago in 1945.

"As you can easily see," he observed, "Mark and I are out-numbered four to two."

ing dusk. When the last was removed, he remained kneeling as he gazed around at the strange assortment. This was what he had to show for the two years of his life here—these baubles!

His eyes rested on a copper

Buddha, and an intense wave of disgust swept over him. Idols . . . all of them . . . cold, inanimate, lifeless, and unfeeling. What could they give him when his heart was torn with loneliness and longing? Nothing—nothing but the selfish pleasure of possession.

SUDDENLY he started to his feet, stood a moment in indecision, and then, with a grimace, reached for his hat and walked out the door and down the empty deserted street toward the wharves.

He stood a long time looking out over the ocean, for beyond that far expanse of cold, green water was home.

The next few days were days of feverish activity, for David had made his decision. He was going back. For the past two years, he had been a buyer of Indian curios for export and had made a place for himself here. But now the stakes he had driven in this strange country had to be pulled up in three days. There was much to do before he could be free to shake the dust of Calcutta forever from his shoes.

Finally, after much delay and anxious waiting, a cablegram came for him from his New York employers, and David knew his impulsive decision was now irrevocable. He waited more impatiently than ever. At last the sailing date arrived, and he found himself on one of the White Star Liners bound for the States—and home.

* * * *

AFTER THE FIRST HANDCLASPS and salutations were over, David's father, matter-of-fact and practical as ever, suddenly thought of his son's luggage and, with a smile, mentioned it. "We might as well take one of those trunks along in the back seat. I suppose you'll be wanting to show those things you wrote about to your mother and sister, won't you?"

New Horizons

"No," said David quickly, taking his father's arm and glancing around for the waiting car, "I'm in too big a hurry to get home. And besides, I left that whole trunk full in New York with the curator of a museum."

"A museum?" David's father looked unbelievably at him. "Do you mean you gave them to a museum?"

"I left them there indefinitely," David answered with a smile, "and I hinted that I wouldn't want them again . . . ever."

As the car clicked off the miles along the old familiar road home, David looked back across the river at the few twinkling lights of the little village. He felt peace steal into his heart, and he realized that he was happier than he had been for years. As he continued to gaze, a wave of emotion swept over him, and his eyes were suddenly wet.

"At last," he thought, "on this night, in this place, I have found a beautiful thing—a most beautiful thing. I have discovered my own people."

My Grandmother's Clock

By Marie Gosline

On the mantel of the living room in my little Cape Cod cottage by the shores of San Francisco Bay stands my grandmother's clock. It is almost one hundred years old. It is a Lillian Russell, and to me it is a beautiful addition to the room. However, today I found out that not everyone is interested in these items. All of my neighbors, many of my friends, and a few strangers from the streets, have come in to sit by the fire and see this remarkable piece. Not one asked, "How old is it?" Not one asked, "What kind is it?" Not one exclaimed, "My, how beautiful it is!" But all of them asked, "Will it work?"

How like my grandmother's clock is my religion. No one cares how old it is. No one cares what kind it is. No one cares how beautiful it is. But everyone cares and wants to know, "Will it work?"

The Trouble-Shooter

Lodge Affiliations

QUESTION: Is it a good thing to join a lodge in order to get ahead in one's trade, business, or profession?

ANSWER: BY LEONARD LEA

Some people think that membership in a lodge or club is a help, and will point to specific benefits they have received. It is true that favoritism, like nepotism, is practiced in many businesses, like other minor forms of graft and corruption. A person definitely lowers his moral tone when he does something to gain an advantage he does not deserve, to get ahead of other people who may be more worthy.

Some people condemn all lodges and clubs on the ground that they are the "secret combinations" described in the Book of Mormon. Others say that the "secret combinations" of the Book of Mormon times were political in character, very much like the corrupt political machines in large modern American cities, and it would seem that those who sell their votes for jobs under the patronage of an evil political machine are doing exactly what destroyed the Nephites.

If one wishes success in life, he needs to be competent in his work, dependable, and efficient. Such a man has the best chances of success. Along with this, he needs a pleasant personality, the ability to "sell" his services and to make people like him, including his employer and his fellow workers.

Really able workers do not find that lodge membership is essential to success. Weaker or poorer workmen may think they cannot succeed on their own merits, and that they need additional help.

If one decides to join a lodge, he should do so to enjoy the friendships he finds there, to uphold the principles of a good organization (and if it is not good, he had better get out), and to serve the ideals of the organization. If he joins to get business or promotion, he is likely to pay his money and waste his time and get nothing out of it that he wanted. In fact, the mercenary or selfish "joiner" ought to lose because his purposes are not sincere.

Some of our people join the fine civic organizations and service clubs, which do good work and promote friendship and good will. These organizations are not secret in any sense of the word, and all their meetings are open. Their purposes and works are known to the public, and they do not engage in politics of any kind.

Here is an angle that should be considered by the loyal church member. The church provides many opportunities for friendship, social life, and service. It has a great work to do, and there are tasks in it for all members who can qualify to do anything at all. The church should take up a considerable part of the leisure time of most active members. Service in the church will give splendid rewards in friendship, appreciation, personal development, and opportunity for useful work for others. Loyal members will place the church first in their list of organizations.

It is true that some lodges do become very strong in some businesses, and that favorite positions go to members. But a business like that will suffer from this kind of parasitism, and an honest workman should look for better opportunity elsewhere.

TRUST

Trees that flinch before the wind's sharp breath
 And stand in bareness
 Trust a source much greater than their own
 For leaves to come.

The flowers murmur not,
 Unquestioning that they will blossom
 In the spring;
 It is God's will that it be so.

And why
 Must mortals, of all earthly things, deny
 That this is so
 Or doubt this simple truth
 Or fear that it may change?

It is God's rule,
 And he is never-changing.
 Then let us trust in him who did create us all,
 Forever sure that we shall have our new awakening
 When he shall gently call us
 From our final sleep.

NEWS AND NOTES

CONFERENCE IN ZION

The Conference in Zion was held Monday evening, January 31, in the upper auditorium of Stone Church. President Israel A. Smith was in charge, and was assisted by Presiding Bishop G. L. DeLapp, Charles V. Graham, Supervisor in Zion, and others. Bishop DeLapp presented Bishop Harold Cackler, who has taken the place of Bishop J. S. Kelley, who has been transferred to southern California. Later in the meeting, Brother DeLapp also introduced Bishop Joseph Baldwin, who is studying here in preparation for his work in Ontario; and Bishop Leslie Kohlman, who at present is in charge of the general office.

An interesting series of reports followed, showing progress coming as a result of intensive work among our people here. A particularly encouraging feature of the work is the fact that missionaries are being trained among the young people in the Center Place, who are showing splendid results in evangelism and in the winning of converts. It was impressive to observe the fine quality of the fifteen young men who were called for ordination to various offices in the priesthood. Charles V. Graham introduced Arthur Stofft to the audience. He is engaged in the program of visiting among the congregations of this area.

THE SHUTE FOUNDATION

Recently arrived at the editorial office is a collection of published material about the Shute Foundation for Medical Research, which is at present concentrating its efforts on investigation and use of Vitamin E in the treatment of heart disease. This work is headed by two of our church men in the medical profession, Dr. Evan V. Shute of London, Ontario, and Dr. Wilfred E. Shute of Guelph, Ontario. The work they have done was described in "Coronet" for October, 1948, in an article by J. D. Ratcliff, "For Heart Disease: Vitamin E."

The foundation is to provide these great doctors with a better opportunity to pursue their work for the benefit of humanity, and to give the public an opportunity to support it. Those interested in information on this aspect of heart disease may address The Shute Foundation for Medical Research, 455 Spadina Avenue, Toronto, Canada.

These two doctors come from a fine church family and have splendid records of church work and support. Their work in the foundation is a nonprofit venture. They also operate The Shute Institute at London, Ontario, for the treatment of heart disease. The bulletin points out that in the U. S. A., 1945, $4,000,000 was spent on cancer research, for 177,000 deaths from cancer; but there were 587,000 deaths from heart disease, and only $39,000 was spent on research for it—a mere seventeen cents for each death. We are using too little ammunition on our worst enemy.

BAPTISMS for December, 1948, totaled 283, according to word from the office of the First Presidency. This is four less than the preceding December, but with that one exception, it is the best December record since 1929.

BLANCHE GREEN, wife of Elder Clair Green of Independence, died at the Independence Sanitarium on Thursday, February 3, as a result of severe injuries received in a highway accident. She was a leader of women and has been active in various lines of church work for a number of years.

Appointees' Institute

Readers will be interested in a report concerning the "Institute for New Appointees" that was conducted in Independence, January 4 to 20, under the direction of Dr. F. M. McDowell.

Eighteen men who have recently come under General Conference appointment were called by the First Presidency to participate in a course of training designed to help them in their ministry. They worked and studied together from eight to ten hours daily, meeting at the Auditorium. About thirty-five different general church workers took part in the lectures and discussions.

The subjects and hours of study are indicated briefly as follows: daily worship (10), doctrine (12), ministerial ethics (4), financial program (5), branch administration (4), worship methods and procedure (5), ordinances (3), public relations (3), evangelism and cottage meetings (11), parliamentary procedure (3), presentations and field work (16),—each two-hour session having lectures, motion pictures, slides, charts, or field trips; forums (2), voice recordings and speech instruction (7). Thirteen of the men gave assistance to the Chaplain of the Sanitarium, and on the Sundays here they filled thirty-four preaching appointments.

All comment on the "Institute for New Appointees" indicates that the men were well pleased with this work, and that it will bring good results to the church.

Lead With a Smile

Ed ("Strangler") Lewis visited Kansas City recently, devoting his time and talents to the helping of underprivileged boys of the nation, a great and worthy work for him to do, and an example of merit to other retired champions in the field of sports.

The Strangler pursued a colorful and successful career for many years as champion wrestler of the world. Those who have seen his amazing bulk of physical power even once will never forget the impression. Just as the match was to begin, after the challenger had taken a long ovation, Lewis would trot in through the arena doors, bowing and smiling back at the crowd that good-naturedly booed and hissed him. He always put on a good show, took a lot of punishment at the beginning, let the challenger pin him to the canvas (all but one shoulder, so near, yet so far from victory), and did a lot of groaning and agonizing. But in the end he usually applied the headlock like a crushing vice to his opponent, and won the match. His reward, more booing and hissing, the purse, and the championship retained.

This time the newspaper carried a different story from him. A feature article in the Sunday Kansas City Star quoted him as saying, "Get in the first smile—not the first punch." As a philosopher, Mr. Lewis can be classified in the pragmatic school. He knows his philosophy works.

Search does not reveal that the word smile was ever used in the Bible—the concordance jumps from "smell" to "smite" in one grim leap. The word smite in some form occurs more than four hundred times. Maybe that was the cause of much trouble in Israel. They didn't know how to smile; they got in with the first smite or punch.

And in modern Israel—using the term to apply to the spiritual and adopted sons and daughters—a great deal of trouble comes from those who get in with the first smite, rather than the first smile. Too much of our evangelism, probably, has consisted in the smiting of enemies; too little of it in the smile that wins friends. This is a fault we can correct; and each one of us can do something good for ourselves and for the church by striving for an improvement.

Moral Force

In a speech years ago in the House of Commons, Winston Churchill said, "Moral force is, unhappily, no substitute for armed force, but it is a very great reinforcement."

In the consideration of the very great suffering caused in the United States at the present time by the effects of beverage alcohol, it is possible we have forgotten the importance of moral force. We have learned to put our trust in laws, which are too easily broken, and too often, under unsympathetic officials, broken with impunity.

The strong countermeasures taken in years past against the spread of the liquor industry were a result of tremendous moral force and indignation. There will never be any effective new laws against liquor until the American people are thoroughly aroused and angry. And those laws can be enforced only with the backing of an earnest and determined people. Our moral strength is our greatest defense against the world forces that would destroy democracy and freedom.

Objectivity

In all our dealings with other people, it is only as we learn to be objective that we can be entirely fair to them. Naturally, we identify ourselves with the plans we make and the work we do. Any criticism of them is interpreted, not as an attempt to improve them, but as an attack on ourselves. This is a tragic mistake, hurting other people, hurting ourselves, and hindering the progress of the work. Only as we learn to include the viewpoints of others with our own, rigidly excluding all our personal feelings and prejudices, can we arrive at an understanding of truth. And the ultimate objectivity is to see things as God sees them. L. J. L.

Magnetic Recording in

THE ORIGINAL IDEA of recording sound on a thin, moving strand of steel wire by magnetizing it with a varying intensity was first advanced about 1895. Inventors toyed with the idea for many years after that, but it took the impetus of a wartime need to force development beyond the laboratory stage. As a result of the development carried on by the Armour Research Institute, the Bell Telephone Laboratories, the Brush Development Company and others, we are now able to buy a compact recorder capable of recording continuously for one hour. In spite of the increase in fidelity and portability over older types of recorders, the cost has stayed within the reach of the average person.

All of this is significant to the church only insofar as recording can be used to further its aims and objectives in Christian education. How, then, can we use this new tool to do the job more effectively? The pioneers in this field have found many new uses for recordings, and many more undoubtedly will be found. At the present stage of development, this instrument shows great promise of becoming another effective tool in Christian education. You may wonder how a recorder can help in the church, but let us examine some of the uses that have been found by those who have had experience. Some of them may possibly fill a need you have long felt.

1. Preaching Analysis. Few ministers have the opportunity to hear themselves as others hear them. Without expert, constructive criticism, it is easy to fall into poor speech habits or develop annoying mannerisms. These faults become very apparent when one hears a recording of his own voice.

2. Recording Shut-ins. Many times those in greatest need of ministry are unable to attend church because of physical infirmities. A service may be recorded by having the microphone near the pulpit and a microphone extension cord leading to a back room or other out-of-the-way place where the recorder can be operated. The whole service, or only a part of it, if that is more desirable, may then be played back in the home, in the hospital room, or in a home for the aged. It has been suggested that the communion talk may thus be taken with the emblems on communion Sunday.

3. Recording of Sermons for Publication. It is extremely difficult to find people who are able to take a sermon in shorthand because of the speed and the minister's vocabulary. Many of the fine sermons now appearing in the Herald have been obtained with the use of a wire recorder. A control unit is available for the Webster-Chicago recorder that allows complete control of the machine with two small foot pedals. With this unity any typist can transcribe the sermon, because the wire can be advanced one sentence at a time, or continuously, as desired. If a word is missed, a touch on the other pedal will run the wire back so it can be heard again. In some instances, it may be preferable to use earphones to prevent disturbing others in the room. When recording a sermon for this purpose, it is very helpful to have a brief explanatory note on the wire preceding the sermon, telling who, where, and when.

4. Recording of Patriarchal Blessings. Several wire recorders now on the market are little larger than a portable typewriter, and one, the Webster-Chicago Model 78, is exactly the same size. Even the traveling evangelist will find that the extra weight of the recorder will not be a disadvantage compared to the freedom allowed by not needing a secretary for each blessing. Letters and memos may also be dictated for later transcription with the same equipment mentioned above.

5. Recording of Addresses by outstanding church leaders or other speakers. One person can take a sermon given at a general or district conference back to his home branch for those who would like to hear it. Lectures can be recorded for future use in making notes or in forum discussions. It is also possible to record important events so that others can share in hearing all that was said. In the case of tape recording, the material may easily be edited and condensed by cutting and splicing with ordinary Scotch tape.

6. Recording of Blessings, Confirmations, and Ordinations. This gives the parents or participant an exact record of the event that will be cherished for years. It may be transcribed later if desired. The microphone need not be placed in a conspicuous location, but it is best if it can be kept within four or five feet of the speaker.

7. Recording of Funerals. Many times some members of the immediate family are unable to be present at the funeral, and they appreciate having the service recorded for them to hear.

8. Recording of the Wedding Ceremony. Some ministers make these recordings and present them to the bride and groom as a permanent record of the event. Other people do this on a commercial basis, charging for their time and the wire. A minister may also use such a recording in teaching the marriage service to the prospective bride and groom.

9. Expressional Activities for Youth. There is an almost limitless field for creative activities in the dramatization and recording of "radio plays" and other expressional

the Church

By MARVIN McDOLE

Director of Audio-Visual Aids

activities. It makes dramatic training much more rapid because the person can hear his own faults and improvements.

10. "Radio Rustling." Recording direct from the radio is sometimes known as "radio rustling," and may be used to get background music and sound effects for use with other programs. Radio talks and forums may be used as an introduction for a forum discussion on subjects of current interest. The "Town Meeting of the Air" may be so used. Material thus obtained may not be published or rebroadcast without written permission, but is otherwise usable as the recorder sees fit.

11. Telephone Recording. It is possible to record both sides of a telephone conversation by using an induction unit under the phone or by having the telephone company install a connecting device. In this way a telephone interview with a person you could not otherwise reach may be recorded for use with a certain group. The other person should always be told that the recording is being made.

12. Recording Minutes of a Business Meeting. These may be used for later transcription. The person making the recording may repeat only the necessary parts into the microphone, or the whole meeting can be recorded and the minutes made out later. This is particularly valuable if there is not a secretary available who can take shorthand.

13. Christmas Music. Many churches have tower broadcast sound systems for playing chimes and organ music. During the Christmas season, it is nice to have carols sung by the choir and played over the sound system. Needless to say, the recording should be of excellent quality for such use.

14. Preservation of Historical Events. As with several of the other uses suggested, it is possible to transcribe the wire or tape onto conventional discs if you do not desire to keep it permanently in its original form.

NO ATTEMPT has been made to differentiate between the wire recorder and the tape recorder, as such, in what they can do. A brief discussion of the relative merits of each may be helpful. For speech reproduction, they have about the same quality. However, no tape recorder has yet been developed that can be used for transcribing with a foot-control unit, so it cannot be used in that way. For the reproduction of music, however, the tape is superior. The choice depends largely on what the recorder will be used for. Wire recorders cost from $99.50 to $149.50 and weigh from fourteen to thirty pounds. Tape recorders cost from $229.50 to $395.00 and weigh from thirty-seven and one half to fifty pounds. It is my personal opinion that the wire recorder will be satisfactory for all except the very critical listener who wishes the highest quality possible in his recording. That type of person is generally willing to pay the extra cost.

The recording material, either wire or tape, has a comparatively high initial cost, but it can be used over and over again hundreds of times without losing anything in the way of quality on subsequent recordings. One recording can be played back many hundreds or even thousands of times without a perceptible loss of quality. For this reason, the cost of recording material over a period of time is very low.

IN USING THIS TYPE of equipment, one of the great dangers is that we are prone to lose sight of the objective when we become fascinated by the equipment. In other words we get "Gadgetitis." This danger is inherent in all pieces of audio-visual equipment. By their very nature, they are complicated and especially interesting to those of a mechanical turn of mind. The "gadgeteer" never tires of playing with such equipment and consequently seldom ever gets around to making effective use of it.

If we are aware of this problem, we are far less likely to lose sight of the reason for having the recorder, projector, or whatever it may be. With these objectives clearly in mind, it is possible to make a real contribution to Christian education with a magnetic recorder.

NOTE: For further information on any of the equipment mentioned, address your inquiry to Marvin McDole, Audio-Visual Aids Department, Herald House, Independence, Missouri.

The Word of Wisdom—Again

The undersigned recently received an inquiry from an elder of the Mormon Church. He stated "conflicting reports" had reached him respecting our church "attitude" toward the "Word of Wisdom" revelation (Doctrine and Covenants 86).

He added, "We make observance of the principles" laid down a "requirement for office-holding, ordination, and temple recommends," but not a cause for judicial action; "but for the above-mentioned purposes . . . we handle it as a law just as much as baptism."

Quite evidently, the Mormons have what may be called "judge-made law," for section 86 does not create any such "sanctions" for non-observance.

Since this party desired to know our position, and it had obviously been somewhat misrepresented, I wrote him, giving my analysis of the revelation. I have taken occasion to read what has been published on the subject in an earlier day by some of our predecessors. Finding I was not only not in disagreement but in fact quite in harmony with views expressed through the years, given added assurance of being right, I here pass on for Herald readers what I wrote to the inquiring Mormon elder:

No action by our General Conference has ever been taken to modify or change in any respect the plain and understandable reading of the Doctrine and Covenants (our section 86) which we must necessarily consider in connection with the historical and prefatory explanation, shown in the edition of 1835, the same being the first official publication of the revelations.

Our interpretation has uniformly been that it is not a law in the sense of its being obligatory on the part of members to observe it or condemnation resulting from failure to observe it.

It is a question for each one to resolve: he is not under divine disapproval if he violates its provisions. It is not a test of membership. It is not a criterion whether or not he is a good member or a member in good standing. Non-observance is not a ground for complaint. But the observance of its provisions entitles one to the blessings indicated.

As to "hot drinks," there has been much controversy; but as the sentence in which the words are used is entirely divorced from what precedes it, especially that portion obviously referring to alcoholic or other "strong drinks"—made "strong" because of its constituent elements, we have generally believed (without church action) that they refer to drinks thermally hot—by heat.

Tea, coffee, chocolate, and some other "drinks" are generally served and drunk before the heat applied has been dissipated or lost. Plain water can, of course, be consumed while hot, and all such heated (thermally) drinks, in our opinion, must be considered "hot drink"—at least while the heat persists.

If we had any means of knowing definitely what the term "hot drinks" meant to the Prophet, so we could hold that certain drinks were certainly included and others, therefore, were not included, we would be helped. The revelation does not, of and in itself, assist us in this respect. I suppose there were many drinks that were served and consumed while more or less heated, and if it was the heat alone that was injurious, the classification is not difficult. If "hot drinks" meant the two drinks, such as tea and coffee, and the injurious elements were not the tea or the coffee as such, but simply the element of heat, the term is quite inclusive indeed, since milk, for instance, generally accepted as a mild drink, can be heated and conceivably consumed while hot—even very hot. Or the "mild drinks," referred to in paragraph 3, made out of barley, may likewise be heated and drunk while still hot.

If it is the heat alone against which the Lord is warning us, then any sort of liquid, whether tea or coffee or any other, even if concocted or brewed by the application of heat, after losing "heat" and becoming simply warm or tepid or cool or cold could not, of course, be considered as under any ban. Not heated coffee or tea or "mild drinks" from barley at the time of taking them into one's stomach can hardly be termed "hot drinks."

Conceivably, one could drink something so filled with condiments such as tabasco or Worcestershire sauce, that it could be "hot"—very hot, but not from heat.

We, as a church, leave this question to be resolved by each member for himself. You of the Mormon Church make almost a "fetish" of the matter—pardon the expression. But my feeling is that it is undoubtedly a "lesser thing of the law." (Parenthetically, how a people could swallow the camel of polygamy, or blood atonement, and strain at the gnat of "hot drinks" is beyond my comprehension.)

By hearsay testimony years ago, we were told in a statement of a contemporary of the Prophet, published in the 1890's I believe, that Joseph said "hot drinks" included—I believe the word was "meant"—tea and coffee; but I personally cannot apply the term to any drink after it has cooled to a point (debatable, I suppose) where it can no longer be said to be "hot." And, true, what would be hot to one person might not be other than warm to another. So it goes.

In the last analysis, and I think your question had it in mind, we accept the Word of Wisdom—just as stated—"not by commandment or constraint," but as wholesome advice and counsel.

Across the Desk

We have received the following unsigned inquiry with a request that it be answered through the Herald:

Do you think it wise or proper after the emblems have been served to give what remains to small children? And will you explain why we face the altar during the blessing on the bread and wine for Communion? Some of our members dislike this idea. Do we have revelation to this effect, or is it a resolution? Will you please answer through the Herald?

The prayers of consecration (Doctrine and Covenants 17: 22, 23) indicate that the bread and wine are blessed and sanctified "to the souls of all those who partake." We do not believe that by virtue of these prayers or any other part of the communion service the emblems undergo any physical change. Nor are they made sacred, except as they are used in the service by those authorized to partake of them for sacramental purposes. We therefore see no reason in law why the bread and wine left over after the communion service should not be given to little children who may be present at the service but who are not members of the church. On the other hand we would be averse to making this an invariable custom, since customs tend to take on the force of law, and there is no law in the matter.

The commandment concerning kneeling occurs in Doctrine and Covenants 17: 22 where we are told that the elder or priest who is to administer the Communion "shall kneel with the church."

A letter from Sister Wm. I. Fligg says:

The doctor feels Brother Fligg is progressing satisfactorily, but it seems such a long time! He has been in the hospital since December 20 with weights pulling on his head, lying very quietly on his back, which is hard for him. We are hopeful of a complete recovery.

An Interesting Historical Fact

On pages one and three of May 31, 1934, issue of The Richmond Missourian was published a reprint from the Ray Chronicle of June 3, 1878, giving an account of the great cyclone which struck Richmond, Missouri, two days before. The following extracts are taken from the account of the storm as originally published:

Language is too poor to adequately describe the desolation and ruin of Richmond. Within a few moments, a third of the town was made desolate, five hundred persons made homeless with many of them left penniless. Richmond is in grief and mourning. We have buried twelve bodies of our good citizens. Others are dying!

The buildings on the public square were estimated on Monday following the cyclone as having been damaged to the amount of two thirds of their value.

A Report on European Relief

We present herewith a current report on the extent of our relief activities to the needy families of the church in Europe.

Direct from the Auditorium, gift parcels of food and clothing are being shipped to 360 German families, and, in addition, various groups and congregations throughout the church in the United States and Canada have adopted 100 additional European families to whom packages are mailed each month.

As of November 30, 1948, we have shipped 10,626 packages, in which there were packed over eighty tons of food and clothing at an expenditure approximating $58,000, and through the adoption program, we estimate that an additional 2,200 boxes have been sent containing twenty-two tons of food and clothing at an expenditure approximating $17,600, making a total of $75,600 of aid given to our needy members abroad.

Acknowledgment cards and letters from families receiving gift parcels express sincere thanks and appreciation to all for what is being done for them in an hour of great need.

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC

Although the buildings all around it were torn to atoms, it is an interesting historical fact that the room in which the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon was kept was uninjured, although the building itself was damaged, it being the residence of David Whitmer, Senior, one of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon.

A copy of this issue of The Richmond Missourian is on file at the office of The Missouriian at Richmond, Missouri.

A Letter From the Yukon

By JEAN BARNETT

The author is with her husband, Allen Barnett, who is serving in the far North. We are glad to share a major part of her letter with our readers.

R. C. A. F. Station
Whitehorse, Yukon Territory,
Canada

MY HEART IS so full this morning that I just had to talk to someone who is close to the center of the church I love so very much and long to serve, because it has done so much toward keeping me close to the footstool of my God.

I am living in a town that truly seems to represent the "Law of the North," with the same passion for gold that lured men to its endless hills in days past. The gold-rush days are over; the trail itself winds down over the hills a few yards from our door—now a thin brown trace marked occasionally by a crude cross where some wanderer laid down his load never to pick it up again in this life.

Though this path is used no more to the hills for their nuggets, it winds down into the little town about five hundred feet below us where gold still calls men into the gambling dens that are wide open. Everyone who comes here to work or serve in the Armed Forces is given a generous northern allowance, which feeds the alarming degree of degradation that abounds in such small towns.

There are approximately three thousand people here, and the conditions weigh so heavily upon my heart that I feel I cannot sit idly by and not offer some rod of iron which will at least save some of the youth.

Yesterday I took a long step into this underbrush of humanity; today I tremble a little. I asked God to go with me, and he certainly did. Such a large vision opened before my wondering eyes, that I am caused this morning to sit and ponder my great unworthiness for such a task, but I know I must not falter now, nor even look back, even though the way becomes so difficult that the natural eye cannot see ahead. I must go forward—I promised God—but I do need much wisdom and love for so great a task.

I have seriously considered writing for New Horizons, because I get much help from those articles, and I truly feel that a new horizon has opened for me at this time. If any part of this effort of an anxious heart may be useful as a challenge to our church people to make the most of whatever lot in life they may find themselves, then by all means feel at liberty to use it as you see fit.

FOR YEARS I've sung, "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord," just so far. Not until three or four years ago did I ever sing the "over mountain, or plain, or sea" part of it. I wasn't prepared to say I'd go that far.

Then two years ago, when my husband went back into the Air Force Service, the call came to leave my old home, Toronto, and the people I loved so dearly. "All right, Lord," I said, "I'll go with my good husband, but please don't send me where there is no Latter Day Saint Church." We have two fine sons, eight and twelve, and I wanted to keep them close to the church.

The call came close on the heels of this "but" submission. In a church service at a conference in London, the Lord made known to me in a sermon that, like Joshua of old in his sage advice to his people—even though I must dwell in heathen land—my slogan must be, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

I knew that day I would have to serve my Lord even though separated from my own people, the Saints. Very soon we were posted to a small town forty miles from a church, without any connections for services. I felt I must offer some service outside the four walls of my home, which at that time was two tents in the town park for lack of better accommodations. After three months of this happy outdoor life, through the grace of God, we obtained one of the loveliest little homes in that town, so I offered my services in a United Church there, upon the advice of my pastor. I was promptly given a large class of young people, with whom I worked. Amazing blessings in fellowship came as a result, along with the glorious feeling that with the divine guidance I had been enabled to enlarge a truly well-balanced curriculum into a larger vision than hitherto these fine young people had ever glimpsed.

I knew I couldn't actually contradict their teachings when I accepted this responsibility, nor could I relinquish my own convictions, so before accepting the work, I made it very plain to the minister and to all those with whom I was to work that I was a Latter Day Saint. The amazing outcome of this first experience "across the rivers from my fathers" was the fact that I encountered no contradictory doctrines, with the exception of infant baptism, which was calmly and sanely discussed without any friction. While the basic teachings were founded on Scriptures, the omissions alarmed me and made me feel very strongly that truly I could not bask in the beautiful light of our gospel without sharing some of the greater vision with these good people. Hence, many were the opportunities to bring these earnest young people to know the God whom they had thought of as being far up in the heavens, but who is actually as near today as when Christ himself walked upon the earth. There were expressions of love that nearly made my heart burst with compassion for these young people as I bade them farewell. I knew I could not stop, and that surely some day the sound of the gospel would again echo in their souls.

THEN CAME THE SECOND CALL from the Armed Forces—to the North. "Oh, Lord," I cried, "I do want to do thy will so much, but not that far, if it can be avoided; nevertheless not my will, but thine be done."

I knew He could intervene and cause those in charge to change this posting. Even though I tried to beg off such a change, the posting went through, and my husband left for a very important assignment. I'm not a very willing subject of my Lord sometimes, and often he has to take me in hand. He spoke to me right in my living room as I was writing to my husband and expressing my rebellion. The Lord told me that I should not "kick against the pricks," but should feel privileged that my husband was worthy of this responsibility which could mean so much to the future of our country and our fine sons.

I submitted. "But, Lord," I cried, "I want to do something for you up there, too."

For the nine weeks we have been up here, I have been attending a little mission in town and have repeatedly offered my services. I know those in charge are direly needing help in many fields, but while they have been very nice to me, they have so far ignored my offers. I think it is because of my religion—there has been a witness here before me. On the Sunday I arrived, I looked up the two Latter Day Saints I had heard were here. Even though it was our first meeting, it was a happy one. Truly, there are no stronger ties than those "that bind our hearts in Christian love."

I have been asked repeatedly to teach in the Anglican church, and last Sunday I went down there with grave misgivings, but found they were using United Church and Baptist Church curriculum material. On further investigation, I found that the Anglican membership seemed to be in the minority.

We have approximately one hundred air force families living in our little community, and many more Army families in this district, which is called Upper Whitehorse, because it is two miles from town and about five hundred feet above the level of Whitehorse proper. This is the most beautiful country I have ever seen, and we have the choice suite—right on the edge of the ravine. On every hand the majestic hills rear their brown and white peaks.

Very few of the children of the families here were attending the church school in town. Feeling keenly the rebuff at the mission and the indecision about serving in the Anglican church, I wept bitter tears, because I knew I must keep my covenant to serve. I was lifted up and, like Joseph Smith, received the message: "Join none of them."

"But how little is Jean Barnett, Lord," I said. "What can she do?"

Then came a Halloween party for the children of service personnel. What a gala affair—what a lot of money and effort had been put into the party! There were dozens of children. Where did they all come from? Upper Whitehorse. There in the midst of these lovely buds of promise knelt the commanding officer, clipping balloons, passing candy, and behaving in a very fatherly way.

I RESOLVED that I would speak to him some day about a church school for these children right here where

Improving the Prayer Service

By D. O. CHESWORTH

Note: This article was written some time ago, but through an accident in filing did not reach publication. At that time, there was a trend of sentiment against prayer meetings—a trend which, fortunately, has been reversed. As the article has permanent merit and contains many fine suggestions, we present it now.—Editors.

I WISH TO GO ON RECORD as one who prefers the prayer and testimony service to most of the other public services of worship. I am particularly fond of this for the midweek activity. In my early memories of church activity in our small branch at Fall River, Massachusetts, and at our reunion, the value of this service seemed to be paramount. Despite a great interest manifested in sports, particularly baseball, football, and soccer in the athletic field adjoining my home, I preferred to attend our small assembly, where we experienced the Spirit of God like a fire burning a lasting impression in our lives.

Certainly it is distressing to hear reports of the discontinuance of the midweek prayer service or of the apparent lack of interest in other localities which may eventually lead to complete abandonment. This should be alarming and yet in many instances we accept it as inevitable. We are in an "age of change," but perhaps there is some degree of truth in that age-old proverb, "the more the change, the more the same thing." We hear of streamlining the midweek service, and probably there is not any part of the curriculum which has not been placed under scrutiny. Even "preaching" in some churches seems to have been cast aside for a substitute.

Now to the prayer and testimony service. The following presentation is offered at the risk of criticism, yet it appears of sufficient value to justify attention:

1. In one congregation numbering 226 members, (fourteen were inactive, and the balance attended a service at least once every two months) our average attendance for a year and a half in hot weather and cold, rain or snow, was forty-nine.

2. The following two and a half years in a congregation of 310 (thirty were out of the city, plus a number of others who were inactive and non-attendant) our midweek average was fifty-five as compared to a previous eleven-year average of nineteen. We had between ninety and one hundred different persons attending to maintain this average.

3. The third illustration is taken from the records of the Detroit Branch. There was a slow but steady increase in prayer meeting attendance from 1939 which was the first year of midweek records. These figures are as follows: 1939, 130; 1940, 153; 1941, 166; 1942, 200; 1943, 239; and 1944, 260. Attendance at this service had been doubled, although the branch increased only twenty-six per cent in total enrollment during the same period.

FROM THE PRECEDING, you will observe that at least this service is not being outmoded in all localities. With the foregoing observations, please consider the following suggestions:

1. Our programming should be studied. If Monday is Boy Scout night, Tuesday, choir night, Friday, Zion's League night, and Sunday, preaching service, is it any wonder that we cancel or sacrifice the Wednesday night prayer meeting? So often we say our children cannot attend a Wednesday night service, nevertheless they do go to the scout meeting or to Zion's League, or to the theater. Even adults have said that, because of children in the home, they could not attend prayer meeting, but these same people have been observed by others in the theater on Friday evening. Having choir practice on Wednesday night following the testimony meeting has been satisfactory in some instances. If it were held before, it could easily violate instruction in Doctrine and Covenants, "Let the saints assemble in quietness for season of prayer."

What a wonderful blessing must have come to that ten-year-old boy one night when, being used as a servant for his Lord, he arose and spoke under the spirit of prophecy to Dr. Luff, who had not at that time been baptized. I shall long remember the testimony of another ten-year-old boy one night. He arose and, in words described by Emerson, said, "The Lord Is My Shepherd." Then he sat down. Such a vibrant testimony thrilled me as I listened. May I suggest that our program therefore include opportunities for young people to, at least occasionally, be present in this type of service.

2. Our advertising program may be deficient.

So often we hear the trite announcement that the "regular midweek service will be held on Wednesday," or we hear a plea to help, by our attendance, to keep it from being discontinued. One time, after observing that this type of plea was fruitless, we stopped Sunday announcements altogether concerning the Wednesday meeting, and the attendance remained the same. Then we mailed an invitation to each member, about fifteen or twenty a week for four weeks, and the attendance increased from the usual fourteen to twenty-two, twenty-eight, thirty-two and forty within a four-week period. There are thousands of ways to advertise the prayer service if we will use our initiative.

I shall always remember the prayers and testimonies of Brother Halliday who, for many winters, sat in his car during the prayer meeting but finally became an active midweek adherent. He had falsely believed it was some obsolete sort of a women's gathering, but what an awakening and pleasant experience finally came to him.

Maybe our failure to achieve success in attendance is due to our failure to properly present our appeal.

3. Our place of meeting may present handicaps.

Is it conducive to worship? Are we sure it will be well-ventilated? Will our meeting place be cold? Will the service start on time? Can we invite a friend to worship with us and be proud of our church or home where the service will be held? Will the walls, the ceiling, the floor, the seats, the draperies, the worship center, the entire appearance all be representative of our church or of our Latter Day Saint homes? Maybe these are not too important, but they are included in this study, nevertheless.

4. Our personnel may be inadequate or uninformed or not properly suited for this assignment. We may all concur in the statement that every ordained man is not a preacher. The same is true about ministers who preside over this important service. The procedure of "taking turns" has been, in my opinion, a curse to our development. The responsibility of delegation of assignments rests with the pastor, but upon observation, he may learn that he has three priesthood members who can carry on the midweek service while the other three may magnify their callings in other capacities.

5. The service is for everyone. How I dislike to have the presiding minister call on one, two, or three to offer prayers without giving the rest an opportunity to pray. With ten to twelve prayers preceding our testimonies, we might be very near to our Lord. A few remarks about the efficacy of prayer will often bring good results. So frequently the five or seven minutes of opening remarks expand into twenty minutes or more, and others are consequently deprived of participation. Sometimes a scripture reading will produce results instead of the usual remarks. This is for everyone—children, youth, and adults. Every testimony, no matter how humble, is important and should receive our attention, not excluding the attention of the ministers in charge. If only forty minutes or less is needed, then why not have the benediction. For fifty to fifty-five people, perhaps an hour and a half service will be required.

6. The Spirit of God is essential. Of all the factors presented for a successful and sustained prayer service, the most essential is the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit. When we are blessed in this manner, some other accepted requisites sink into oblivion.

Who can rush into the presence of God without due preparation? "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? Who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath . . . a pure heart! He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, and righteousness from the God of his salvation."

WHEN WE EXPRESS our heart of hearts, our innermost and treasured experiences or blessings, what more desirable place could be suggested than the house of prayer? I have long believed that there are two places where we may express ourselves—the testimony service and the business meeting. More emphasis on the former might release the often observed pressure on the latter.

I joyfully recall the evening when Sister Brose arose in the midweek service and related her vision to a waiting congregation of sixty people. We had been praying for our future missionary services, but at that time did not have any prospects. She told us that in her vision she had seen six sockets and saw six people place six light bulbs in them and greater light came into the room. She was given to know that six adults would join the church and they did at the conclusion of the series of meetings. We could go on relating such experiences. The testimonies of R. E. Hubricht shall not be forgotten. Thank God for such wonderful people—thousands of them—who are always at the post of duty on Wednesday night. Since their lives have been enriched by this activity, we feel assured that our Heavenly Father will bless many more through this same channel of ministry.

May his divine blessing ever attend and minister to the faithful few who persevere in carrying on such an effective and spiritually uplifting service.

Sunday Bells

The bells ring out upon the quiet Sunday scene.

They call with golden voices all to prayer,
Inviting us to share
God's love.

They ask us in—
Into the warmth and peace of little churches
Set on hills,
Or in the valleys,
Or upon a busy street.

The bells ring out to draw us in—
Into the shelter of his fold
Where we may hear again his message
Rich and deep.
With joyous notes from eager throats
They sing it out
For every heart to hear

"Come now, all ye who hear us,
come.
Be with us in this hour
And know
The Heavenly Father waits within."

History of the Lawrence, Kansas, Branch

COMPILED BY BESSIE TAYLOR, Branch Historian

THE CITY OF LAWRENCE had its beginning in 1856. As it is only about fifty miles from Zion, we may aptly assume that this territory has been, in times past, the home of various scattered members. Dr. Charles Grabske of Independence, Missouri, writes that he, with several others, attended the University of Kansas in 1913-14. This is our earliest knowledge of any church membership. Dr. Grabske says:

I do not recall that there were any services held for K. U. students by the church during 1913-14. It is interesting to note, however, that through the initiative of those Latter Day Saints then enrolled, Apostle John W. Rushton was invited by the convocation committee to speak to the university convocation. He gave an excellent address and was complimented by the chairman of the committee.

I returned to the University in 1922, leaving there in 1925 to attend the medical school at Kansas City. A number of church people were in Lawrence during this period. We had sporadic meetings at the Y. M. C. A. room, Myers Hall. Apostle F. Henry Edwards was present on one occasion and spoke to the group on church objectives and church problems. He made a rather direct appeal to those interested in using the scientific approach to and logical solution of church difficulties.

We have a written record of the organization of this group into a mission in October, 1924. The groundwork for this mission had been laid by devoted students such as Dr. Grabske and, had he remained for another term, he would have seen the emergence of the mission. Under the direction of Apostle Edwards, arrangements were made for meetings to be held each Sunday at 10:30 a. m. in the MacLaren home, with Ray Whiting acting as president of the group. According to Lillian Farr, then a music instructor at Haskell Institute, a piano was purchased for seventy-five dollars and moved to Holloway Hall at Nineteenth and Massachusetts Streets, which served as the church home more or less regularly for the next twenty years.

From 1925 to 1929, new strength came from the addition of several families who established residence in Lawrence. Most of these people found it necessary to move away later, and church services were temporarily dispersed. Only occasional meetings were held in the homes and in the Halberg store until about 1936. In the fall of 1936, the group resumed services in Holloway Hall each Sunday morning with Elder G. R. Norris in charge.

In 1942, one of the largest defense plants, the Sunflower Ordnance works, was established a few miles east of Lawrence. Many church members found employment in this plant and located here. An important addition to the mission was the Browne family—Joy and Edwin. The following letter by Joy tells of the purchasing of the present church home.

When Ed and I first moved to Lawrence, happy in his fine new position as Director of Public Relations for the University of Kansas, we felt immediately at home in the group of Saints there. For all the years that he had been going to school at the university and working at radio station WREN, he had been actively teaching and ministering among his church friends. So it was with a deep sense of responsibility that he accepted the call to be pastor of that same group he had learned to love so well.

We were deeply concerned about the lack of a suitable meeting place, since a hall above a grocery store is hardly the best church home. Often when we drove through the streets of the town we'd look around and say, "Wonder if the church could meet here," or, "Wish we had a nice church like that to service our group and the college students meeting with us." But there was one church across the street from the park, and not far from the center of town and the "hill" that seemed to say, "This is your church." It was empty, rented to the university for a nursery, but not in use as a church. From the time we discovered that building (the Unitarian Church) until the day of dedication, we felt the hand and mind of God. Every idea we had, every hunch we followed, every helpful person placed in our path, came directly from the guiding influence of God—that we know and will always testify to.

The story is simple—God didn't work with us in a spectacular way. It is amazing to look back now and see the miraculous happenings that at the time seemed so natural and commonplace.

One night we drove past the church, as was our custom before going home, and saw a light—so on an impulse we stopped, knocked, and were admitted by a young woman. She told us that the nursery was going to be discontinued, that she had been living there while she helped with the children, but that this was her last night there, and she'd be glad to show us the church. So we walked through, and what we saw in that dim light made us know for sure that it was our church. A large auditorium, pastor's study close to the rostrum, a parlor with a large fireplace, classrooms, fully equipped kitchen, good basement, and above all, an organ that worked. I know, because that first night I sat down on the bench and I played until the music filled the church. We vowed together that night, my husband and I, that we'd do everything in our power to obtain that church for our people.

The next day Ed called the leader of the board of trustees in charge of the Unitarian church building to ask if there would be the possibility of renting the church for our group. He said yes, that they had considered it and were planning to meet soon to decide about it, and he would let us know. We waited impatiently—and one Wednesday as Bishop Updike was visiting us, we drove past the church after prayer meeting to show him what we had in mind. We were astounded to find the lights on and men walking out the door. Immediately Ed stopped the car, walked over to one of the men to find out what had happened. The board member asked, "Where were you, Mr. Browne? When you didn't show up at our meeting, we rented the church to another group." Ed said that he hadn't been notified of the meeting and just happened to be driving by. The conversation went on—Ed not understanding why he wasn't called—and the Unitarians insisting he had been notified. (Later we discovered that the woman who did the calling had been ill and had taken a lot of sulphur drug just before she made the calls. The pastor of the other group was named Brown—and she must have called him twice.)

I have never cried in public before—but that night I wept before those men saying, "Can't something be done? It isn't fair!" But of course it was too late; the arrangements had been completed.

I believe it was a few days later when Ed called again about the possibility of buying the church, but he was told it was not for sale. The Unitarians were hoping to build up their group enough to support it. Ed exacted a promise, however, that we would have first chance if ever they decided to sell it—and that we would be told if any change in the situation occurred.

We often drove past the church with heavy hearts, seeing the other church sign waving in the breeze, and praying that some day we might do the right thing to help our people have the building. Those were dark days, but the prayers of our people kept going to God, and the group continued to support their pastor. I'm convinced that if the Saints had not been informed on every little development—and told of every move we were making—that the wonderful things which happened next would never have occurred. For it was through group effort and prayer, mutual love and trust, with absolutely no secrets withheld from our people, that God was able to show his will and might.

One Wednesday night, immediately after dinner, Ed started pacing the floor in our little apartment. I asked him what was wrong, and he said he didn't know. So I went on with my work while he roamed from one window to the other, and from door to door. All of a sudden he said, "I'm going for a walk, honey." And I said I thought it would be good for him. Later he told me he just had to walk, and for some reason he went past the church. He looked at it blankly for a minute—then he noticed the sign was gone! He hurried home, called the board of trustees and was told that they had asked the other group to leave because they were so noisy. Yes, they had decided to sell the church, and were planning to advertise it, but since Mr. Browne was so eager and since the misunderstanding about the rental had occurred they felt we should have first chance, and if the central committee agreed and terms could be worked out, we might be able to buy it.

One other thing influenced him in our favor. Ed had a very fine position at the university—he was close to the chancellor in his work and needed to know all of the university business in order to publicize it properly. He one day heard that the school needed another men's dorm and was thinking of buying the church to make into a dormitory. He talked with the chancellor about it—and finally worked out this arrangement: If we could buy the church, we would rent it to the university as a dormitory to help the school during the period of emergency to help us pay for it. In return, we would meet in Danforth Chapel on the campus (a beautiful memorial chapel) and have access to classrooms as we needed them.

It was this fact, coupled with the embarrassment the Unitarians felt over our not being able to rent the church, that predisposed them toward us as a group.

From now on, the story goes so fast I can just tell you snatches. We had become acquainted with Mr. Asher at a university function. He was an able lawyer and a fine person, so we called on him to tell him we wanted to buy the church—and asked for advice. We had a friendly visit, and soon afterwards the Unitarians retained him to handle the sale of the church!

If it hadn't been for his honesty and integrity and deep sense of right, we could easily have lost our opportunity when telegrams began going back and forth to the national body responsible for disposing of the church property. A worker in the telegraph office was a member of another church and soon the Unitarians had a bid higher than ours from that other church. As the negotiations began to be rumored around town, other churches began bidding. One church even sold its old building, and it was understood that they did so in hope that they could have this one.

But through the steadfastness of our lawyer, the helpful advice and backing of Bishop DeLapp, the fact that the university was behind Ed, the desire of the Unitarians to be fair, and above all, the prayers and faith of our group and their pastor, God's will was done—and the church became ours.

That was a joyful day for all of us, but most of all, a testimony to the will and guiding influence of God.

THE PERIOD from 1946 to 1948 stands out as a very important one in the history of the group. The war being over, many veterans and their wives came to Lawrence to attend the university, and membership now totals close to 100. Since purchasing the church, members of the congregation have redecorated the inside of the building and hired workers to paint the exterior.

In closing, we of the Lawrence congregation wish to express thanks to all who have helped to make the organization of this branch a reality.

Notes for Brotherhood Week

PROBLEMS arising from the relationships between majority and minority groups in any nation call for tolerance, understanding, sympathy, justice, and adjustment.

BOTH MAJORITY AND MINORITY groups have their responsibilities, and must meet them.

NOTHING IS GAINED when the minority group tries to put all responsibility for the solution of the problem, and all blame for difficulties, upon the shoulders of the majority.

MINORITIES that have accommodated themselves to the customs and ways of the majority have had little trouble, and that usually on an individual basis, while the groups have got along well. This has been true of the Swedish, Dutch, German, French, Russian, Italian, Polish, Czech, Hungarian immigrants, and many others. By the next generation, they mix with native population in most cases. Minorities that have proved obdurate and unwilling to accommodate, insisting on rights and special privileges, on preservation of language and special customs, making themselves an inconvenience, have had difficulty and probably always will have difficulty.

ALL PEOPLE, even the natives, have problems. Minorities cannot expect to get along without a few special ones.

Concerning Zion

By EDITH BARWISE

V. The Cost of Delay

He never doth vary from that which he hath said; therefore if ye do keep his commandments, he doth bless you and prosper you.—Mosiah 1: 56.

I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.—John 10: 10.

Who am I that made man, saith the Lord, that will hold him guiltless that obeys not my commandments? Who am I, saith the Lord, that have promised and have not fulfilled? I command and a man obeys not, I revoke and they receive not the blessing; then they say in their hearts, This is not the work of the Lord, for his promises are not fulfilled. But woe unto such, for their reward lurketh beneath, and not from above.—Doctrine and Covenants 58: 6.

IN THE DAYS of candlelight and fireplace-cooking, no one could know the advantages of electrical equipment, nor have any concept of their value. People blind from infancy have no knowledge of color, nor can it be explained to them. Likewise, it is nearly impossible for us to understand the benefit of Zion conditions, or realize the extent of the loss we suffer by living under the present economic setup. We can say that electric power has made life more carefree and in that sense, more abundant. We can say this because we have had and profited by this power. But since we never have had Zion, how can we know the value of the more abundant life Jesus intends for us when we keep his commandments?

From birth we have lived under the rule of the Babylonian system. We fear the unknown and think we may lose if we change economic systems; but Babylon is crumbling. The time is near when she must fall (see Revelation 18: 2-4). The spread of Communism, with its false promises of better conditions, threatens the whole social structure.

Men the world over are apprehensive and perplexed. Care, worry, and fear seem everywhere, and nations can find no sure road to peace. It seems that only the wounds of the last conflict restrain the dogs of war from renewing the battle.

As a church, we should know these conditions have been foretold, that the time would come when peace will be taken from the earth, and that calamity should come on the inhabitants of the earth. I say we should know this, because we have the commandment: "Search these commandments, for they are true and faithful, and the prophecies and promises which are in them shall all be fulfilled."—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 7. Among the things of which those words were written, we find this statement: "If ye are not equal in earthly things, ye can not be equal in obtaining heavenly things; for if you will that I give unto you a place in the celestial world, you must prepare yourselves by doing the things which I have commanded you and required of you."—Doctrine and Covenants 77: 1. This not only stresses the keeping of Jesus' commandments, which we have already found essential to citizenship in Zion, but also introduces the thought that we may forfeit a place in the celestial world should we fail to keep them. That would be a loss too great to contemplate; but not all our losses, through failure to do as the Lord requires, lie so far in the future. Whether we know it or not, I believe some of these losses are sapping our spiritual energy right now.

MY FAMILY needed the protection of storm windows, but the cost seemed too great. After eighteen years, I bought some. Now the lower fuel bills prove that the extra coal I had burned would have paid for the windows several times. My pinch-penny policy had proved extravagant, for this extra saving will soon pay for the storm windows. This is like a parable. While we delay in our unbelief (Book of Mormon, page 725: 110), while the work of preparation and "the perfection of my saints go forward slowly" (Doctrine and Covenants 140: 5), we are losing by the delay. For proof, let us examine some scripture. "For I am God, and my arm is not shortened, and I will show miracles, signs and wonders, unto all those who believe on my name, in faith, they shall cast out devils; they shall heal the sick; they shall cause the blind to receive their sight, and the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak, and the lame to walk."—Doctrine and Covenants 34: 3. Section 83: 11 repeats this list and adds: "If any man shall administer poison unto them, it shall not hurt them: and the poison of a serpent shall not have power to harm them." There is no maybe about this. We should realize these benefits; but remember, the Lord has the right to revoke when "a man"—or a church—"obeys not." Moreover, "I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say, but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise."—Doctrine and Covenants 81: 3. Also, "Let every man deal honestly and be alike among this people, and receive alike, that ye may be one, even as I have commanded you."—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 2. Even more emphatic is this, "Nevertheless, in your temporal things you shall be equal, and this not grudgingly, otherwise the abundance of the manifestations of the Spirit shall be withheld."—Doctrine and Covenants 70: 3.

Do we have this abundance today? Is it needed? Ask the elder whose wife, after hours of agony, is delivered of a dead child. Ask those mothers whose children have looked them in the face and said, "I cannot see where your church is bet-

Nurses Made to Measure!

By VIDA E. BUTTERWORTH
as told to Grace Pennell Tousley

ALTHOUGH PROFESSIONS properly reserve the right to set their own standards and define the scope of their activities, society has the last word; it can accept or reject a profession's services and lay down laws for its operations.

Nursing is aware of this situation. It leads the professions in providing its students, educators, and practitioners with such complete coverage of diagnostic aids and guidance tools as will enable them to co-operate happily with society in carrying on their professional activities. Nursing aims to furnish a pattern to go by.

The National League of Nursing Education helps today to carry on the work of improving nursing and nursing education begun in the middle of the nineteenth century by Florence Nightingale. The end is not in sight; the work of improvement based on research is continuous.

The league's activities are all of great import to the consumer of nursing care—the patient. They assure him that nursing keeps up with medicine, and that the doctor-nurse team functions with the greatest precision and understanding.

To the young woman seeking a vocation, these activities of the league are also important. The policy back of what the league is doing to improve nursing promises her that if she chooses nursing as a life-work, she has entered an occupational field which is serving society acceptably and, therefore, in it, she will always find work to do.

How the league is furthering nursing improvement is well shown by its testing program, which is the responsibility of its Department of Measurement and Guidance. This department, with the aid of league members all over the country, constructs tests, arranges for their administration and scoring, and conducts necessary research. This testing program was begun in 1941.

The Pre-Nursing and Guidance Tests are designed to aid faculties in selecting students for admission to schools of nursing, for forecasting the prospective student's potentiality for success in the school, and for guiding the faculty in helping the student overcome indicated weaknesses in educational background and personality. The nurse educator does not use these tests in isolation, but supplements them with her observations and student records.

Achievement Tests are for use by the nursing school faculty in evaluating the outcomes of instruction. These tests cover various subjects, such as anatomy and physiology, chemistry, microbiology, fundamentals of nursing care, medical and surgical nursing, and so on throughout the entire curriculum.

Graduate Nurse Tests are used by colleges and universities in selecting students for advanced nursing education. These tests are also used by merit systems in public health agencies employing nurses.

State Board Tests are for use by state boards of nurse examiners in the licensing or registering of graduate professional nurses.

Practical Nurse Competency Tests, used by state boards of nurse examiners also, are for the licensure of practical nurses. This test is a good example of the way in which the nursing profession sees what is coming over the horizon and gets ready for it.

VIDA E. BUTTERWORTH, R. N., B.S., M.A.

Miss Butterworth, Educational Director of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing, was recently selected by the National League of Nursing Education to act as one of the reviewers of its chemistry achievement test. She has done much work in tests and measurements at Teachers College, Columbia University, and with the National League of Nursing Education.

She teaches the physical and biological sciences in the Sanitarium nursing school and also administers the prenursing and guidance tests to its students. She taught for two years in Iowa rural schools before entering the Sanitarium School of Nursing as a nursing student. After graduation, she worked as private duty nurse for two years, then as staff nurse and night supervisor at the Sanitarium for another two years.

From there she went to Graceland College, acting as college nurse. Teachers College, Columbia University, was her next stop, where she received her Bachelor of Science degree in nursing education, serving at the same time as infirmary nurse. She returned to the Sanitarium school to teach, and in 1941, received her Master's Degree in nursing education from Teachers College, Columbia University.

A Gift for Aunt Della

JIMMIE BOYD stretched his feet toward the floor, trying to touch the kitchen inoleum with his toes. He was eating his cereal with the sucking sound that Mamma didn't like, but this morning she paid no attention to him. She and Daddy were not talking at all. Jimmie felt uncomfortable in the silence. They were shutting him out, the way neighborhood children sometimes shut him out of their games. Yesterday had been a good birthday with Aunt Della, Uncle Phil, and young Sam all helping Mamma and Daddy with the refreshments. Everybody had liked Jimmie yesterday. Everybody had helped him play electric train and cars going over bridges—and Uncle Phil had pushed him twice around the block in his new red wagon.

What was the matter with Mamma and Daddy today? If they had liked him yesterday, why didn't they like him today? He fidgeted, dropped his napkin, got down and picked it up, then he climbed back on the chair again. Nobody noticed. Daddy was turning his water glass round and round in his hand.

Jimmie picked up his Raggedy Ann mug, purposely sloshing some of the milk on his bathrobe, but still neither of them looked at him. Daddy was taking his handkerchief out of his pants pocket. Then he blew his nose hard—as if he were crying. Only of course grown-ups didn't cry. Then Jimmie saw the tears. Daddy was crying.

Jimmie put his mug back on the table. What was the matter with everybody? Maybe if he turned his glass over and let the water run down into Mamma's lap, maybe if he turned over Mamma's coffee—but no, Mamma had already finished the last sip of her coffee and was standing up. Daddy got up too, without eating any of the food on his plate.

"I'll go back to Della's," he was saying to Mamma. "You'll be right over, too, won't you?"

Mamma nodded and glanced at Jimmie. "As soon as I tell him," she said.

WHEN DADDY HAD GONE, Mamma knelt down and took Jimmie in her arms. "Do you remember Nancy's little dog that got run over, Jimmie?"

"Sure." Jimmie wondered why Daddy and Mamma would cry about Nancy's dog. He had been dead a long time.

Mamma's arms hugged Jimmie tighter. "You know little Benny Jenkins, Jimmie?"

"Of course." Benny's mamma did

Mamma's and Aunt Della's washing every week.

"Well, Uncle Phil didn't get to take the washing over to Benny's mamma's until last night, because we were so busy having a good time all afternoon. Cousin Sam went with him, and on the way home—we don't know what happened—but the car turned over. Uncle Phil and Sam have—gone away." Mamma was crying with her face against his shirt. Jimmie waited for her to quit holding him so tight. She ought not to be crying about that. She didn't cry last week when Daddy went off to Sacramento. She didn't even cry last summer when he went to summer camp, and he had been gone a whole week. "Did Aunt Della go with Uncle Phil and Sam—is that why you're crying?"

"No."

"Why didn't she go? She should have gone—"

Mamma put a finger against his lips, then she stood up and began taking off her apron. "You are going to stay with Mrs. Blake like a good boy. You may play with Nancy all morning."

"I want to go with you to Aunt Della's."

"You can't go today, Jimmie," Mamma said. "Come, I'll give you clean clothes so you can dress."

He followed her into the bedroom. "Why can't I go?"

"Aunt Della is sick."

"Is she crying?"

"She can't cry, that's the trouble. She is in a sort of trance." She handed him his clothes. "Here, put them on."

THROUGH THE WINDOW, Jimmie could see Aunt Della's house with the sun shining on the green roof. If she were sick, he had to see her. She was nicer than a grandmother. His eyes moved to his kite standing in the corner by the bed where he had put it when Mamma had told him to come and eat his breakfast. Yesterday Aunt Della and Uncle Phil had helped him put his new kite together, and then they had shown him how to fly it—letting the string out, so it would go high. He thought Aunt Della was nicer than Mamma and Daddy. He thought she was nicer than God.

Mamma was looking at the clean clothes in his hand. "Put your clothes on, Jimmie. Here, let me help you."

He pulled away from her because Aunt Della always let him put his clothes on by himself. "I could help Aunt Della. She likes me ever so much."

"Of course she does, dear, but she can't laugh today. She doesn't want little boys around her today—she needs something quite different."

"What does she need?"

Mamma helped him tie his shoes, then she stood away from him, her eyes moving over him to see if he looked all right. "Go and wash your face."

"I already washed my fa—"

She gave him a look and he went to the bathroom, sloshing water angrily. He had already washed good before breakfast and combed his hair. Why didn't Aunt Della want him today? She had wanted him yesterday and every day before that. He put the plug in the wash bowl and let the water run until the bowl was full, then he picked up the bar of soap, floating it for a boat.

Mamma came into the bathroom. He thought she was going to spank him, but she picked up a comb and began combing his hair with swift motions that made him dance. Then she took him by the hand. "For goodness' sakes, get your coat and come on," she said. "I have to get over to Aunt Della's."

SHE WAS HOLDING his hand and frowning when they went up on the Blake porch. And when Mrs. Blake opened the door, she didn't kiss him or tell him when she was coming back. She only said, "Good-bye, Jimmie, I'm expecting you to be a good boy. Make him mind, Mrs. Blake, and thanks for keeping him." Then she was gone, and Jimmie stood watching her cross the street. She went up on Aunt Della's porch and disappeared into the house. Suddenly he was so lonely for Aunt Della that he didn't hear what Mrs. Blake was saying until she tugged at his hand. "Do you want to come in, Jim, and see Nancy's dolls and toys, or shall I send Nancy outside to play with you?"

"I've already seen 'em," Jimmie said. "I'll stay out here."

Mrs. Blake closed the door and he went back to his own yard, hoping Nancy wouldn't be out for a long time. Boys were more fun. . . . Ned down the street, or Pepper, who was always being sent home because he put Jimmie up to getting food for him out of the refrigerator. Nancy tried to boss him, because she was a year older than he was. When he played with her, he liked doing it in his own yard, because there she didn't dare start anything. He was boss of his own grass.

He stamped his feet on the brown grass. The California sun was warm for December, and he unbuttoned his coat at the neck.

One red rose was in bloom on a bush that grew in a sheltered spot by the porch. A butterfly with cold-looking wings lit on it, and Jimmie crept toward it soundlessly. When he was near enough, he reached out with a swift hand to catch it by the wings, but it flew away. Jimmie knelt on his knees close to the rose bush and began digging in the winter earth. He did all these things with his mind on Aunt Della. What did Mamma mean about Aunt Della's trance? He had had measles once, and chicken pox, but nobody he knew had ever had trance. He wished he knew what it was Aunt Della needed. She always knew everything little boys needed.

NANCY came down the porch steps. Her blonde pigtailed were tied with red ribbon bows, and she ran toward him, swinging the full short skirt of her navy blue coat. She thinks she's smart, Jimmie thought. That's her new school coat. She thinks she's smart because she goes to school.

"Hello," Nancy said, and squatted beside him.

"I'll bet my Aunt Della makes up better stories than your mother does," Jimmie said.

"Sure, I know that. But you can't go over there. You have to stay here."

Ants were crawling on the ground. Jimmie pinched one in half and watched part of it quiver in his hand before he buried it under a clod of dirt. He wanted to see Aunt Della so much that there was a sickness inside him. Aunt Della needed something. What if she didn't get it and died? What would he do then? He picked a handful of dried grass and sifted it through his fingers, letting it fall back to the ground. Whatever it was Aunt Della needed, he had to get it for her. "What do women want more than anything, Nancy? If you were a woman, what would you want?"

Nancy wrinkled her freckled pug nose and puckered her brow thoughtfully. "A husband, I guess. I'd like to be a wife."

"Aunt Della has a husband. She has Uncle Phil."

"She has not. Your Uncle Phil is dead."

"He is not. He's only gone away somewhere."

"That's why he's dead. Dead people go to heaven."

"I've seen airplanes go to heaven," Jimmie said.

Nancy looked doubtful. "Airplanes don't go that high."

"Sure they do. Heaven is above the clouds, and clouds move out of the way for airplanes all the time. Look, they're moving now."

The children stood up to look, and Jimmie said, "If you were a wife, what would you want most after a husband?"

Nancy's eyes were on the clouds. "A baby."

"Are you sure?"

"Sure I'm sure."

JIMMIE'S EYES moved to the pepper tree in the yard on the other side of Nancy's house where Mrs. Lucas's baby was taking its regular morning nap in the carriage with a blue blanket tucked up to its ears. He had seen nicer babies. This one must not have cost much because it didn't have hair or teeth, and it was so little that all it could do was to move its arms and kick. But maybe it would do for Aunt Della. "Come on, Nancy," he said.

"What are you going to do?"

He didn't answer. They went across the Blake lawn to the hedge that separated Nancy's house from the Lucas house. Jimmie eyed the carriage.

"You'd better not touch that baby, Jimmie Boyd!"

Jimmie stood quietly. The buggy wasn't good. It was old. He thought of his beautiful red wagon that had been a present yesterday. It would make a good bed. But could he give his new wagon away? Maybe it would be better to let Aunt Della keep the trance. Then he remembered the sick feeling of measles. His chin trembled, and he wiped tears from his eyes quickly with the back of his hand.

"You're crying," Nancy said.

She looked suspicious. "What are you going to do?"

He didn't answer. He was running toward the garage. Once, as he ran, he kicked something and stooped to pick it up. It was his onyx marble that Aunt Della had given him for a taw. She had been teaching him how to make straight shots when he lost it. It was the marble she had said all the kids in the neighborhood would be trying to trade him out of. And they had wanted it until he lost it. He put it in his pocket and opened the garage door.

THE WAGON stood in the corner of the garage beside Daddy's worktable. Jimmie went toward it, admiring its shining newness. He had polished it last night the way Daddy polished his car, and it looked even better than the car. He sat down in it, putting his forehead against the bright red handle. His hands caressed the front wheels, and the lump in his throat almost choked him. Whenever he played cars after this, or airplane, he would have to use skates or hobby horse, or an old box that wouldn't move, or just his legs running along. The neighbor kids wouldn't be saying, "Jimmie, is that your wagon? Gee, you're lucky to have such a swell wagon." It would have been fun getting apples and stuff from older boys for a chance to coast to the corner and back. But he loved Aunt Della more than he loved his red wagon.

He began to sob silently. If the baby were nicer—if it could walk—or if it had hair or teeth—"I don't want to give you away—wagon—wagon."

He heard Nancy coming and tried to wipe the signs of tears from his face, but they came too fast, and they wouldn't stop.

"You're crying," Nancy said. "I knew you were." She came and sat down in the wagon beside him.

"Mind your own business."

"You're crying because your Uncle Phil is dead."

"I am not."

"You are too. What else have you got to cry about?"

"Something."

"What?"

"I'm going to give my wagon to the Lucas baby."

Nancy almost fell out of her seat. "You don't even like the Lucas baby. I think you're crazy. He can't play with it."

"He's going to sleep in it. I'm going to give him to Aunt Della."

Nancy stood up and faced him. "Did Mrs. Lucas say you could give her baby away?"

"No, but he's going to cure Aunt Della. She's got trance. Mrs. Lucas can get her another baby."

He got out of the wagon. "We'd better take the baby to Aunt Della now before he wakes up."

They pulled the wagon out of the garage. Then they got in and coasted down the drive along the sidewalk to the Lucas yard.

They came to the baby and peeked in at him. He was sleeping on his back with the blanket wrapped snugly around him. Jimmie had never lifted a baby, and he wasn't sure how it was done. Should he lift it by its feet, its hands, or its head, or should he grab it up in the middle the way he picked up a doll?

Nancy looked toward Mrs. Lucas's house cautiously. "We'd better push him in his buggy over to Aunt Della's. If Mrs. Lucas sees us take him, she'll make us put him back."

"But we've got the wagon."

"I'll push him. You bring the wagon," Nancy said.

"Oh, all right, only I'd rather push him."

Nobody tried to stop them as they went out of the yard and across the street to Aunt Della's.

THEY HEARD VOICES in the front part of the house, so Jimmie crept up to where he could see through the front door. Mamma was there with company, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, and three women he didn't know, but Aunt Della wasn't there. He came back to Nancy and told her. "We have to be quiet or Mamma will send us home," he said. "We'd better go around to the back of the house. Aunt Della is in the bedroom."

"How do you know?"

"Mamma makes everybody stay in bed when they're sick," Jimmie said impatiently.

They crept across the middle of the lawn to avoid being seen from the front door. Then they went around to the back of the house and stopped by the porch.

Nancy said, "We'd better take the baby to your aunt, and then bring the wagon in."

"I'm going to carry him," Jimmie said.

"You can't. You're a boy, and boys don't even own dolls." She came around to the side of the carriage. "I held a baby once. You're liable to fold his head and feet together. Babies haven't got any bones."

"All the same, I'm going to carry him," Jimmie said.

"I'll tell your mother."

"Go ahead; tell her. She'll send you home. This is my house. You can't even come in unless I say you can. I'm going to carry him."

Nancy stuck her tongue out at him. "Carry him then, Smarty. But I'm going to dig him out of the buggy, because boys don't know how to lift babies. Bring your wagon over here."

"What for?"

"I'm going to stand in it to reach him."

Jimmie brought the wagon up close to the side of the buggy and Nancy climbed up, bending over the sleeping baby. Jimmie watched her enviously. Girls were better at this sort of thing than boys, because they owned dolls. His heart was beating very fast. He had never held a baby before, and he wasn't at all sure he knew how to do it. He watched Nancy's movements carefully. She pulled the blankets away and thrust her hands, one under its back and the other under its head. Then she raised it up. The baby jumped and opened its eyes, but it didn't cry.

Jimmie reached out his arms to take him.

Nancy frowned. "Hold your arms straight out. I'll put him in 'em. I told you before babies don't have bones."

Jimmie held out his arms. Then he felt the warm little body kicking in his arms. The baby began to root his mouth against Jimmie's shirt, making little grunting noises. It felt good against him.

Nancy held the screen door open, and they went into the house, creeping along the hall.

JIMMIE COULD FEEL the baby's wet diaper through its clothes against his arm, but he didn't mind. He was glad Aunt Della was going to have him. He was better than a puppy. He smelled clean, and his skin was softer than a rubber beach ball. "I guess I was crazy not to like him," he told Nancy. "But then he never knew me before."

Aunt Della's bedroom door was open. She was sitting in a chair staring straight ahead with her hands folded in her lap.

The baby began clawing with his small fists and kicking harder with his feet. His head bobbed back and forth so that Jimmie could hardly hold him, and his mouth rooted hard against him, biting his shirt with hungry lips. Jimmie's heart came up in his throat. What if he dropped him?

Nancy said, "Stop squeezing him so tight."

Jimmie ran toward Aunt Della, and when he reached her lap, he dumped the baby into it, and the room was suddenly filled with crying sounds.

Aunt Della stopped staring at the wall. She lifted the baby across her shoulder and began patting it, but she didn't smile at Jimmie or look pleased. "Isn't this the Lucas baby?"

"Yes."

"What are you and Nancy doing with it?"

Before Jimmie could answer, Mamma came running. She saw Aunt Della and stopped. Her face looked as it did the morning Daddy brought the new car home. "Della! You're all right!" Then she saw Jimmie and Nancy and the baby, and the gladness left her face. She looked scared. Jimmie wanted to tell her there was nothing much about a baby to be afraid of, but she had the kind of look that meant a whipping. "What are you children doing with Mrs. Lucas's baby?"

"We brought him for Aunt Della because you said she isn't going with Uncle Phil and Sam." Jimmie was struggling with his tears. "I'm giving her my wagon for a bed."

"That's because the buggy is old and isn't any good," Nancy said.

AUNT DELLA got up and handed Mamma the baby. She came to Jimmie and hugged him hard. The tears were running down her cheeks. "Darling—darling Jimmie—"

Jimmie caught her around the neck. He was crying, too. "Don't cry, Aunt Della—please don't cry."

Aunt Della looked at Mamma. "Did you hear him, Susan—he's giving me his wagon—his beautiful birthday wagon."

"Please don't cry," Jimmie said again.

"I'm crying because I've got you. I thought I didn't have anybody, but I've got you." She pressed her face against his cheek.

"You've got the baby, too," Nancy said.

"Oh, yes, the baby." She sat down with Jimmie on her lap. "We'll have to take him home right away. He wants his own mamma. I don't need him, Jimmie. I've got you!"

ter than the others."

We have claimed that the absence of spiritual manifestations indicates a church is dead. Would not the withholding of their abundance indicate spiritual ill health? Paul says, "The manifestations of the spirit are given to every man to profit withal."—I Corinthians 12:7. Then he goes on to say they are wisdom, knowledge, faith, gifts of healing, working of miracles, prophecy, discerning of spirits, divers kinds of tongues, and the interpretation of tongues. If we profit when they are given, what happens when they are withheld?

Do we have wisdom, knowledge, and all the other gifts in abundance? Remember, God's arm is not shortened—the abundance is still there, but we have no promise, because in our temporal things we are not equal nor are we one as God requires. Truly the children of Zion are like a certain woman who needed storm windows.

He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must invent twenty more to maintain that one.—Pope.

From an Isolated Member in New Mexico

I haven't had the privilege of attending many services since I joined the church, but I have studied the church books, and God has blessed me. I live in one of the most wicked towns in the Southwest; there are many Mexicans and Indians here. I am the only one in my family who belongs to the church, and although I have tried to teach our children the right way of life, there are evil influences outside the home that tempt them to stray. Recently a dozen or so Mexican children jumped on our children as they came from school. The Mexicans had been beating up the "Anglo's" nearly every day, and nothing seemed to stop them. However, on this particular evening, I went out and talked to them about Christ and how he preached that we should love one another. Then I asked the teacher to see if she could help, and she promised to talk to Father Leo. Things have been better since, but the men still fight each other. The street was spotted with blood on the Sunday morning following Christmas. Sometimes it is difficult to believe this is really America. I have wanted to move away, but my husband's work is here, and he does not see how he can give it up. God willing, we may be able to find a way out someday.

My only daughter was recently married by a justice of the peace to a man who does not belong to any church. Now he is out of a job, and she is staying in our home. I shall appreciate having the Saints remember them and the rest of my family in prayer that they may all experience a desire to find Christ.

A Letter From Conference Visitors

We are taking this opportunity of offering our sincere thanks for the kindness and generosity shown to us during our visit to General Conference. Naturally, we should like to write each person individually. Since that is impossible, we trust all will accept this as a personal letter of appreciation.

We were thrilled to be partakers in the spiritual feast of the whole week and have returned home with greater determination than ever to continue in preparation for the building of Zion—the reality of which, we sense, can be achieved only so far as we make it a matter of personal concern. As we traveled about, we were happy to feel the fellowship extended toward us. Nowhere did we feel that we were strangers.

Whether or not we shall be able to visit you again, we cannot say, but we do thank God for this opportunity of seeing Joseph's land—the land chosen for the gathering—and sincerely hope we shall all work for the establishment of his kingdom.

Asks for Prayers

I like the new publication, Daily Bread, with its many short readings based on the Bible. I am going to pass it on to a friend when I have finished reading it.

I do not live where I can attend services regularly, and each day I pray that I may sometime be where I can do more for the church. In the meantime, I shall keep studying. My daughter belongs to the church, but my husband and two sons do not. I ask the prayers of the Saints everywhere for them and for myself.

Helped By Prayers

I wish to express my gratitude to all who remembered me in prayer during my illness. God, in his mercy, saw fit to heal me so that I did not have to go to surgery. One week after my doctor made arrangements for my operation, I was well enough to do my housework. I received administration several times before the blessing came.

I pray that my life may be spent in service to God.

Visit the Sick

I want to encourage everyone to visit somebody in a ward in the nearest hospital each week. There are many lonely persons in every hospital; some are away from their loved ones and would be very grateful to have even a stranger visit them. It is a good way to spread the gospel message, for most patients are able to read. Find out when visiting hours are, then make some sick person happy by being a friendly visitor.

Helped by Administration

On January 11, I entered the hospital to undergo a major operation. The day following the operation, I was almost too weak to recognize anyone. I did, however, ask for administration when Elder Roy Tourville came into my room. He and Pastor J. J. Sumption administered, and I began to recover immediately. As I continue to improve physically, I want to gain spiritual strength also so that I may be of greater service to the church. I want to be able to do a better work as church school director and teacher of a junior class.

I thank all who remembered me in prayer and sent cards to me during my illness and convalescence. My prayers are for all who are in need.

Note of Appreciation

It is with deepest sincerity that we extend to our relatives and friends our appreciation for the kind expressions of remembrance they sent us during the illness and death of our mother on January 14.

A Letter of Gratitude

I wish to thank all who prayed for me, and I also want to express my appreciation for the cards and letters I received. My health is much better now. I am grateful to God for his blessings, and my aim is to live faithfully, doing what he would have me do.

Wants to Correspond With Other Isolated Members

I am an isolated Saint. I have attended other churches, but I do not feel that I have received any great benefit from doing so. Now I have decided to remain at home on Sunday and read our church literature. I would like to hear from other isolated members regarding their attendance at churches of other faiths. I send special regards to the Saints of Breckenridge, Texas.

Building Christian Personalities

By DELBERT D. SMITH

VOLUMES HAVE BEEN WRITTEN on the subject of building personality. It has been approached from many different viewpoints and dissected into very minute parts in attempts to understand the processes involved in building it. One volume which is familiar to all Christians still surpasses all others in the presentation of an ideal personality. This book is the Bible.

The Bible is outstanding because it is concerned with the ultimate in personalities. It deals with the personality of Christ and the effect of his personality upon the people who came into his sphere of influence.

When any building is begun, the first step is always to look at the blueprints to get an idea of how it should be put together. This is also necessary in attempting to build Christian personalities. Therefore, we look to Christ as our guiding plan or blueprint.

Let us then look at Christ to see what made his personality so lasting and meaningful. One important factor was the eternal nature of those guiding principles in his life. They have been attacked in every conceivable manner, yet they have survived for almost 2,000 years.

The qualities of personality which Christ possessed are found in his teachings. Some of these are "faith, virtue, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, charity, humility, and diligence." The primary thing to remember about this list is that no one of the listed traits is personality itself, it takes the total balance or integration of all to form a Christian personality.

Students in particular should remember that the knowledge gained at school or college isn't enough in itself to form an adequate personality. I do not mean to belittle the acquisition of knowledge. It is an important part of the personality, but it isn't all-important in itself.

Here Is the Writer

Delbert Smith, a native of Butler, Missouri, attended Graceland College in 1942-43, spent three years in the Navy, and returned to Graceland in 1946. During his career in the Navy, he attended the Montana School of Mines. At present, he is a senior at Iowa State College at Ames, where he is majoring in sociology. He is a priest and is serving as pastor of the Ames group. The accompanying article was originally presented as a radio address over station WOI.

IF WE SHOULD PICK OUT any one trait as the greatest of all, it would most likely be love—love both for God and for our fellow men. Christ has demonstrated through the ages what real love can do in people's lives. It can make friends out of enemies as well as eliminate from one's life such disruptive forces as hate, fear, and greed.

Another outstanding feature of Christ's personality is that he had an all-important purpose outside himself. This purpose was the revelation of God in living terms understandable to such beings as you and I. Psychologists agree that a truly stable personality must have a purpose in life outside itself. Christ's whole life was devoted to the purpose of glorifying God, his father. We can't build real personalities without a purpose around which we can integrate other traits. We must work "with an eye single to the glory of God."

In order to build anything, we must have a starting point. We have to accept ourselves as we are with an understanding of what we can and cannot do. We have our physical bodies and our present personalities with which to begin. These do not ultimately determine what the end result will be, although they influence it very strongly at times. We have some examples of people—Helen Keller, Teddy Roosevelt, Glenn Cunningham—who have risen above their handicaps.

Grace Stuart, in her book, The Achievement of Personality, states: "All personality is the result of relationship." This applies to Christ as well as to us. He had the personality that was his because of his close relationship with God. The very being of Christ reveals this relationship. If we want to build a Christian personality, we must associate ourselves with Christ and enter into a personal, living relationship with him. Such a relationship involves knowing him and having a personal contact that is meaningful to us.

The Reverend Harry Emerson Fosdick in his book, On Being a Real Person, says that the expression "Building Personality," is a misnomer. Unlike a building which eventually is completed, personality is never static but forever changing. For illustration Dr. Fosdick uses the analogy of a river. We can use an expansion of this concept to illustrate some of the points mentioned previously.

If a body of water has its destination within itself, it becomes a dead sea—that which comes into it evaporates instead of running purposefully on its course. But as a river moves forward to a larger body of water, it identifies itself with certain valleys which, in turn, guide it to its destination.

TO BUILD CHRISTIAN PERSONALITY, one must get his dynamic qualities moving in the desired direction. The best of race-drivers can't win a race without first getting the car started. God can't guide us in our development if we do not begin moving with faith.

Let us remember, then, these qualities we should integrate into our lives in the achieving of Christian personalities: faith, hope, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, charity, humility, diligence, and love, with an eye single to the glory of God. These will be the results of our relationship with Christ.

The steps we can use in furthering our development of Christian personalities are these:

1. Accept ourselves as we are. This involves the understanding of both our limitations and our capabilities.

2. Set an objective outside ourselves. This, in our case, is a personality which can reveal Christ.

3. Affiliate ourselves with something which will guide us in that direction. This is a personal relationship with Christ.

4. Start moving in the desired direction with confidence and trust.

Few men have the natural strength to honor a friend's success without envy . . . I well know that mirror of friendship, shadow of a shade.—Aeschylus.

The Trouble-Shooter

Controversial Questions

Answers by Leonard Lea

1. What is the difference between "sickness" and "afflictions"?

Sickness, primarily, is physical illness, although one can be "sick at heart," too. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick."—Proverbs 13: 12. Affliction is a broader term, meaning trouble, distress, or injury. Certain kinds of sickness can also be called afflictions.

2. Do we practice administration for both sickness and afflictions?

"Administration to the sick" is prayer for the sick (see James 5: 14) with anointing of the sick person with oil "in the name of the Lord." During a prayer of administration, the elder may also pray concerning the spiritual condition or the troubles of the sick person.

3. Is fasting abstinence from anything more than food and drink?

Abstinence from food and drink is the principal form of fasting, but it is not the only form of fasting. Webster gives one definition of fast: "To practice abstinence as a religious exercise or duty," which indicates that the principle is abstinence. Read Doctrine and Covenants 59: 3: "Let thy food be prepared with singleness of heart, that thy fasting may be perfect." Thus, a fast cannot be perfect without a spiritual condition, which is essential. This passage also indicates that some kind of food may be taken during the fast. The Doctrine and Covenants continues, "or in other words, that thy joy may be full. Verily, this is fasting and prayer; or, in other words, rejoicing and prayer." So, under proper circumstances, rejoicing may be a part of fasting.

Isaiah 58: 6, 7, indicates the social and spiritual obligations of the fast, "Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?"

4. What is the "church of the devil"?

Various opinions have been expressed on this question. We may infer the identification by reading the Book of Mormon, I Nephi 3: 220-222: "There are save two churches only . . . the church of the Lamb of God, and the other is the church of the devil; wherefore, who-so belongeth not to the church of the Lamb of God belongeth to that great church, which is the mother of abominations." We may infer, then, that no one denomination or organization can answer this description. We may be sure, at least, that it includes all those who love sinful pleasure more than they love God and righteousness, and whose lives are evil.

5. What are "the churches of man"?

Those that are organized by men without authority from God.

BOOKS

Lincoln and the Bible

By Clarence E. Macartney. Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1949. 96 pages. $1.25.

There is scarcely a living man, of any capacity for thought, whose mind has not explored the possibilities of religious faith. And there is hardly one that has not, at some time in his life, been troubled by doubts. All of us have been skeptics at some time in our careers; and all of us have thought more or less about God. A Christian is generally a person who has tried both faith and doubt, and has decided that faith is much the better of the two.

So the character and career of President Lincoln is not to be judged by any isolated statement of his, and certainly not by what others, even contemporaries and associates, have said about him. His whole life and thought must be weighed in the scale. When it is, it will be seen that Lincoln stood on the side of faith.

Tremendous interest has centered about Lincoln, and much is being written constantly about the state of his religious faith. Dr. Macartney has done a good work in bringing us the evidence from Lincoln's speeches, writings, and other sources. This little book will be a required item in all Lincoln collections.

For speakers and ministers, the book makes available some fine quotations from Lincoln that would otherwise be difficult to obtain.

How to Speak

By John Dixon. Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1949. 249 pages. $2.75. Illustrated by Julian Brazelton.

A practical and readable book of help for all who face the necessity of preparing themselves to speak in public made lively by the pointed and often humorous illustrations. It makes the art of public address seem so attractive that the reviewer feels, for a few moments at least, that he would like to try being tempted with some of it.

Written by a widely experienced public speaker, this book contains nothing impractical, nothing fanciful. All the solid, substantial qualities one would expect are here. It takes the would-be speaker and his assignment at the very beginning of his task, and carries him through, step by step, to the final round of applause. The book is distinctly up to date in including a special chapter on radio technique, by a specialist in that field.

The chapter on brevity should be helpful to ministers and appreciated by congregations. There is especially good advice on the making and use of notes.

The Big Fisherman

A novel on the life of Peter, by Lloyd C. Douglas. Houghton Mifflin, 1948. 581 pages. $3.75.

A good and interesting story is presented to the public here by the author of The Robe. It should appeal to a wide variety of readers, and particularly to those Christians who like as clean a diet for their minds as they do for their bodies.

The reader is impressed, in spite of the ancient setting, by the modern tone and quality of the book. Minor characters carry on a modern, but respectable, love story. The conversation sounds modern, and the humor and repartee are such as might have come from a good quality radio program. Even the ways of thinking are more recent than Victorian times. Perhaps that is because people have always been people.

In fact, the story is running along so nicely without Peter's presence at all, that he practically has to force his way into it on page 115, to avoid being an early forerunner of "the Forgotten Man." And what would the story have been without him? A nice book about the Romans and the Arabs and the Jews, of course. So Peter manages to squeeze in when the minor characters do not happen to need the stage. And it would have been too bad not to include Jesus, without whom none of these little folk would have had any importance whatever, and even Peter would have been as forgotten as the dust of his ancestors. So Jesus is included too. But principally the story is filled out with the conversations of the Other People.

And that, Friends, is about all there is to report about this nice story which tells you all about "The Big Fisherman."

Golden Wedding Anniversary

Elder and Mrs. William Beckett celebrated their golden wedding anniversary at the Reorganized Church in Post Oak, Missouri, on Sunday, December 12. They were married December 11, 1898, at DeLand, Illinois. Mrs. Beckett is the former Luvinne Roane of North Vernon, Indiana. The Becketts have six sons and three daughters; all are members of the Reorganized Church.

BRIEFS

OREGON DISTRICT.—Oregon District observed its forty-fifth anniversary on December 5. Since its organization in 1903 by Apostle G. T. Griffiths, it has grown to thirteen branches and twelve missions.

A conference was held from December 1 through 5 with Apostle C. George Mesley, Seventy Arthur Gibbs, Bishop M. E. Lasater, and District President J. L. Verhei in charge. All district officers were re-elected. Elder Verhei is serving his seventeenth year as president of Oregon District.

In the past year, four branches and three missions were organized, and three new church buildings purchased.

Elder Mark Yeoman was ordained an evangelist at the communion service, and twenty-seven recommendations for ordination were approved. They are as follows: to the office of elder, George Dyer, Ted Schuld, Earl Wilcox, Lowell Shultz, Roy Rasmussen, and George Speed; to the office of priest, Charles Gollihon, Oral Snivley, Stanley Holm, Raymond Linderoth, Zelca P. Coop, Thomas Coffman, Charles Bishop, Curtis Haviland, Raymond Huggit, and George Lovett; to the office of teacher, Benard Taylor, Edward Rye, Albert Gardner, and Lyle Anderson; to the office of deacon, James Dixon, Donald Comer, Vergil Snivley, Donald Shultz, Edward Webberly, Wilfred Walberg, and Fred Richard Hawes.

BLOOMSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.—On November 14, forty young people and their leader, Elwyn Vaughan, took a chartered bus to Scranton to attend the young people's institute. The Bloomsburg choir sang two musical selections while there. The church school, under the supervision of John Shaffer, is growing both in size and interest.

On Sunday evening, December 19, a play, "The Little Boy Nobody Wanted," was presented under the direction of Mrs. Harold Fritz. The choir gave a "song and story" program the following Sunday. Six young men—Eugene Kramer, Shirlee Hess, Joseph Weiss, Jr., Robert, Carl, and Gerry Hartmen—were baptized on December 12.

Thirteen young people were presented books at the end of the year for having had perfect attendance in 1948. Gloria Fritz, seventeen-year-old secretary-treasurer of the church school, received a five-dollar book for not having missed a Sunday in fifteen years.

The women, under the leadership of Mrs. Harold Fritz, meet once a week to study the Doctrine and Covenants. Lydia Pealer is the teacher.

we could gather them in. "Surely," I thought, "these same mothers who have spent so much time on a party would also give some time to dressing them for church school if there was one available."

The following day, I timidly picked up the receiver, called the commanding officer, introduced myself, and told him of my concern for these children. Then I waited breathlessly for his answer. I received an enthusiastic response far beyond my expectations. He immediately drove to my apartment, picked me up, and took me out to the chapel being built at the air base, which is also in Upper Whitehorse. He showed me every detail, offered me any amount of material I could possibly use, offered to route a bus at whatever hour we needed it, and, since we haven't any permanent padre, gave me authority to organize a church school, with all the financial means necessary. . . .

It is wonderful what the Lord can do with lowly instruments, and today I feel very small. Yesterday God gave me grace to speak words of faith and comfort to this important man, who must have been needing it, because his wife had just been taken to Edmonton for a very serious operation. Without any fear of misunderstanding, I could assure him, out of my own experiences and blessings, that there is a power beyond the finest physicians to save life. I also told him that I would pray for her. I wish to extend a request to the Saints to remember her also, because he is truly a good man.

Arthur Gibbs will be the principal speaker.

Those attending either or both Sundays are asked to bring basket lunches.

On December 28, 1892, she was married to Charles Henry Fish. Both were baptized into the Reorganized Church in September, 1896. It was in their home that the Lansing, Michigan, and Indianapolis, Indiana, groups originated. In 1925, they moved to Independence, where Sister Fish was an active worker in the women's department; she eventually became a divisional supervisor in the Stone Church area. She also served as a church school teacher in the intermediate grades.

She is survived by a daughter, Mrs. Juanita McPeeke of the home; two sons: Frederick S. of the home and Duane A. of Independence; two sisters: Mrs. Ida Scott of Grand Rapids, Michigan and Mrs. Lillian Doty of Ionia, Michigan; two brothers: Uriah and Alvin Buttermore of Harrison, Michigan; and two grandchildren. Mr. Fish died in November, 1940. Funeral services were conducted at the Roland Speaks Chapel, Elders C. Ed. Miller and Frank Mintun officiating.

KIDD.—Aditha Bell, daughter of Henry C. and Almira Howell, was born December 25, 1874, at Merritt, Michigan, and died January 27, 1949, at her home in Independence, Missouri. She was married to James Billings in 1893; four children were born to this union. On November 1, 1925, she married Hugh Kidd who survives her. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since March 14, 1886.

Besides her husband, she leaves a son, Charles Billings of Independence; three daughters: Mrs. Myra Clow and Mrs. Gladys Wells of Independence, and Mrs. Fern Boyd of Long Beach, California; six grandchildren; and five great-grandchildren. Services were held at the Roland Speaks Funeral Home, Elders A. K. Dillie and Glaude A. Smith officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

HAYTER.—Ida Alida, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Swan Benson, was born June 17, 1886, in Cherry Grove Township, Wexford County, Michigan, and died January 20, 1949, at her home in Cadillac, Michigan, as the result of a heart attack. She was married on January 19, 1910, to Ray Hayter; one child was born to this union. Mrs. Hayter was baptized on June 25, 1935, at Cadillac. She will be remembered by a host of friends for her many kind deeds.

She is survived by her husband; a son, Leonard; two sisters: Mrs. Julia Dolan and Mrs. Lavina Dill of Pontiac, Michigan; and a brother, John Benson, of Cherry Grove. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Cadillac, Elders Byron H. Doty and Milford Frey officiating. Interment was in the Maple Hill Cemetery.

CLUM.—Florence Estella, was born March 26, 1875, near Maquoketa, Iowa, and died at the family home in Independence, Missouri, on January 25, 1949. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on November 17, 1892, and was married to Mendall Clum on July 1, 1893. Two of the four children born to them preceded her in death. Moving to Independence on August 16, 1909, she became active in the women's department of Walnut Park congregation and served the church of her choice in this way until ill health overtook her. She was an invalid for seven years.

She is survived by her husband; a son, M. K. Clum of Independence; a daughter, Mrs. Julia Dickhout of Los Angeles, California; two sisters: Mrs. Vida Larkey of St. Cloud, Florida, and Mrs. Gertrude Peterson of Miami, Florida; two grandchildren; and one great-grandchild. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Glaude A. Smith and Fred O. Davies at the George Carson Chapel. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

THE MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, CHURCH

NEWS AND NOTES

Recently Memphis Saints had the thrilling experience of worshipping for the first time in their own church building.

For years, they met in the home of Brother and Sister J. A. Withee and in the office of the H. F. Vann Construction Company. Brother Withee, faithfully serving as pastor during the greater part of the history of the branch, has worked with the members in order to provide a suitable home.

At Douglas and Semmes Streets, in the eastern part of the city, the new church is located in a good residential area. It is of colonial type architecture, and a feature of the interior is the chancel plan, which permits the administration of all ordinances with furniture changes.

Donated labor, the efforts of the H. F. Vann Construction Company, and consideration by the hired workmen helped reduce costs, and the branch of forty members (fourteen families) has a very beautiful "permastone" finish building at a cost much below the average for present construction.

Under the leadership of Pastor Earl W. Grigg, the branch looks forward to continued growth and progress.

APOSTLE M. L. DRAPER

REPORT ON ZION

The following items are selected from reports submitted to the Conference in Zion, at Stone Church, Independence, on January 31.

Bishop Harold W. Cackler reported receipts for 1948 totaling $73,232.12, which was $13,446.05 more than for 1947. To balance this, operating costs have risen 24 per cent, or $10,765. This caused a deficiency in the budget of $4,992.08, which reduced the previous surplus to $7,009.87. Independence members contributed $124,116.38 in tithes and offerings during 1948. Bequests received in 1948 totaled $13,051.15.

Charles V. Graham, supervisor, reported the membership for 1947 at 8,971, for 1948 at 9,458; baptisms for 1947, 273; for 1948, 276. There are fourteen congregations now.

In missionary work, Brother Graham reports that in 1947 a full-time missionary was laboring here, and 220 persons were baptized. In 1947, there was no full-time missionary help, except for a missionary series. W. E. Wakeman was in charge of this work, and 273 persons were baptized. In 1948, a corps of forty volunteers was organized, and 276 were baptized.

For the women's work, a fine report was submitted by Mrs. Clair E. Green, who has since passed away. As supervisor of women, she directed a program of study, friendly visiting, home decoration, and improvement of the Women's Center building.

Director of Religious Education Cecil Talcott reported good progress in development of church schools, curriculum, and church school institute.

For the home arts and industries (the Campus Shop), Mrs. Henry R. Rowland made a most interesting report: garments and articles sold, 33,513; donated, 927; charged to aid, 207; given in exchange for house checks, 467. Total money received amounted to $11,454.64. Total expenditures were $6,589.63. The Campus Shop has a balance of $16,506.63.

HUBERT CASE PREACHING AGAIN

This surprising news came to us very recently. Hubert Case, veteran missionary, is once more preaching to the Saints. His voice, so well known and loved, is heard once more among them. But he is doing it without leaving his home in Independence.

It came about in this way. Sister Arleen Blakeman heard a testimony by Brother Case some months ago at Stone Church. She offered him the use of a Wilcox-Gay recording machine that uses a wax record that may be played on any phonograph. Brother Case sits in his home and records a short sermon which may be sent by mail. He has sent a group of records to his brother in Nebraska, and a number of them to isolated members in Oklahoma. While his health is not the best, he is still able to carry on this work. "I feel as if my ministry to the Indians was beginning all over again," he says.

CENTRAL TEXAS DISTRICT

Apostle W. Wallace Smith was in charge and Z. Z. Renfro assisted at this district conference, January 28 to 30, at Dallas, Texas. District President Earl Moore took a good share in the work. Credit for much of the arrangement of the program goes to Linden Wheeler, pastor at Dallas. A goodly number of the Houston members, with Pastor Roy Vandel, were present. Hearn members, with their pastor, Merle Mitchel of Bryan, were represented, as also Arthur Rock, pastor at Marlin, and Harvey Spiller, pastor at Fort Worth. Apostle Smith reports a good spirit present in the meetings, with fine reports. The theme was "Launching the Year's Work."

Sheep and People

For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls.—I Peter 2: 25.

I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep.—John 10: 11.

In Palestine the life of the people was largely pastoral, and their Scriptures have many references to it with comparisons to human life.

Those who know sheep today are not much flattered by the comparison, but recognize that in a number of respects it is just. The only brightness in a sheep is in his yellow eyes; his mind is a cloud that conceals everything. His value consists in the products of his body. Whatever he thinks is generally wrong. He is generally harmless, and creates danger only under extraordinary circumstances. His defenses are weak, and he is not well-equipped for fighting.

But the sheep has one virtue. He is a creature of peace. He survives in his peaceful way, because of large numbers. The wolves that attack members of the flock are hunted and exterminated by men. The sheep does not go to war. Men try to protect him.

Jesus was called, "The Prince of Peace," and John, upon beholding him, exclaimed, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."

There is a lovely phrase in the Doctrine and Covenants (35: 1) in which Edward Partridge is told that the Holy Ghost, even the Comforter, "shall teach you the peaceable things of the kingdom." One of the great beauties of the kingdom of God will be its peace: peace of mind and heart, peace among members, peace with God.

We should learn a lesson from the fact that the great fighting animals, the feral and predatory creatures, the fierce carnivores, the birds of prey are hunted until they near extinction. Peaceful creatures—domestic animals, deer, and others—flourish under protection. Warlike Sparta is gone, nothing but a memory of its sterile military might remaining. Athens, more largely devoted to the arts of peace than to those of war, survives in its culture and art, temples and statues, drama and literature, philosophy and science.

Peaceful peoples have a better chance to survive. Peaceful church members have a better chance to remain church members. Peaceful congregations have a better chance to work, to serve, and to grow.

A Problem Story

A church man who has given many years of volunteer service presented this problem. He is working with a new congregation that is surrounded by good homes and that presents many missionary possibilities. He said:

I wish I knew what to do about something that happens over and over again at our church. Good people come for a few Sundays and seem interested. They attend classes and church services. Then they drop out, and we never see them again.

I think I know some of the causes. A quarrel developed in one class, and we lost a number of members as well as nonmembers. Then we have some zealous persons who criticize other churches, and this causes unhappiness.

I sometimes wish we could keep on the constructive features of the gospel. I think I know what is wrong with us. I don't quite know what to do. I need help.

New members are won to the church at great cost in time and effort. Sometimes they are lost by contention, criticism, indifference, neglect, and lack of Christian love.

There is so much that is good, constructive, and noble in our faith that we can never exhaust it. How little time, really, we should have for the things that drive people away.

Listening

A friend tells this story on his parents.

Mother and Father went to church. When they returned home and were discussing their experience, Father told Mother a number of statements made by other people.

Mother was incredulous. "When did you hear all that?" she asked. "I didn't hear it."

"Darling," said Father kindly and patiently, "that's because you talk all the time. You don't listen. I learn a great deal by listening."

Mother had a share of wisdom. She did not become hurt or angry. She decided to reform and really changed her ways.

How often people among the congregation in church whisper or let something distract their attention while the preacher is making some of his most important statements. They miss the best part of the sermon.

Anybody can talk. And there are times when talk is needed. The silent mummy who contributes nothing to the conversation is soon given a poor rating as a guest. At the same time, it takes a good mind to listen and understand, and the mind will be improved by doing it.

A suggestion: Make it a little problem in arithmetic. The time your group has together is your dividend. The number of persons present is your divisor. The quotient is your share of the time to talk; the remainder of the total is your time to listen. You may have a great idea that makes it worth-while to take somebody else's time; but be sure it is an important idea. Some others may not care to claim their share of the time; just be sure they are defaulting and that you do not take it away from them.

Editorial

A FRIEND OF MINE just finished building a new house. The other day he told me, "My house is mine in a sense that I have never realized before. I know all about it. I know what type of material is in it, the amount of work required to build it, and what holds it together. I can tell you the size of every room. This is my house to a greater degree than could have been possible had I not made it myself."

God made the earth. Everything about it is known to him—the material of which it is made, the laws that control its movements, and even the distant sun which lights and warms it. This is the first affirmation found in the Bible: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." It makes no difference at the moment as to the method he used, how long it took him, how long ago the creation took place, or if it is yet complete. Suffice it to say, the earth does exist and nothing about it is unknown to him who made it.

Now, if anything I make is mine, then, by the same reasoning, anything God makes is God's. To create gives ownership. Ownership gives power to hold or to give away or to lend. But whether held or given away, or loaned, an item created is one which is subject to the will of its creator. The Psalmist states: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof."

We are all quick to recognize the truth that the creator has the right of decision over those things he has brought into being, but often we act as if we had forgotten it. Can you remember reading anywhere that God ever gave the earth away? Has he sold it? As far as I know, it still belongs to him. Bits of it have been loaned at various times to various individuals and peoples. A few years ago, it was being used by our parents. Today it is under our direction. Tomorrow it shall be placed at the disposal of our children to do with for a time as they choose. Eventually, they too shall release it to others whom God shall raise up to manage it for him. But through all these changes of management, the ownership remains with the one who created it. Our position today is one of temporary management of that which we rather glibly call our own. This position is made clearer as we read, "It is he that hath made us and not we ourselves. We are his people, and the sheep of his pasture."

THROUGH INCREASING experience with God, we have come to see him as a loving father. We have come to see ourselves as stewards—as those who tend the garden called earth. He has instructed us to possess it for him, to subdue it, and even to have dominion over it during our stay here.

In this relationship with our Heavenly Father, there are at least two important implications to which I should like to call your attention. The first of these we call agency. You see, even though the earth is the Lord's, he as much as says to us, "While you're here, you may do as you please with it. But whatever you do will bring results in harmony with the laws I have set in operation. If you step off a cliff, you will fall. But you may step off the cliff if you wish. If you injure a neighbor, he will probably resent it. But you may do him injury at your own choosing. If you fight over the resources I have placed in the earth, men will be killed, and thousands will suffer. But it's your privilege to have a war whenever you choose. If, however, you remember that all these things are mine, and you are placed here to put these things to use to achieve spiritual ends, there will be plenty for all."

God leaves the decision in our hands. If he didn't, we would not be stewards but hired servants of his.

In order to achieve the best, a man must have the right to fail. God gives us that right, in order that we may have the opportunity to reach the heights. I am a mediocre swimmer. If someone were drowning, perhaps I could save him after he became very tired. Perhaps, with the use of my fist, I could destroy his power to seize me and take me to the bottom with him. I could save him by destroying his right to make my task difficult. But Jesus is a powerful swimmer. He doesn't need to make us unconscious in order to save us. He refuses to destroy our own right to choose. He and his Father are one in their attitude that we shall always be allowed to make our own choices. Our right to act as stewards over the temporalities, making our own choices as to their use, is a symbol which makes clear our right to make our own choices in all other phases of life. With God, the individual and his freedom are important.

Hitler was doomed to fail because he violated the sanctity of the individual. The Communists' theories of government may thrive for a time, but they must eventually fall for this same reason. It is inconsistent to believe that God would give man his right to choose and then allow some other power permanently to revoke that gift. Only in our choosing not to exercise our rights as individuals do we make it possible for our freedom to be destroyed. Yes, stewardship implies agency—the right to choose one's own way. Therefore, look well to the management of the department of the total plan which falls to your charge. Look forward often to the day when you shall be commended or condemned on the basis of your own decisions.

Stewardship is God's plan of management to produce the best from our labors, for us, and the kingdom.

Stewardship

By L. Wayne Updike

Bishop of Kansas City Stake

A SECOND IMPLICATION of stewardship is accountability. Our relationship to God is, in some ways, similar to the relationship of a department head to the store manager. Every department head is given certain freedom to manage his department after the dictates of his own judgment. The general policy of the store ought to be kept in mind, but each department head has the right to choose how he shall display his wares and what items in his department shall receive emphasis and attention, and he is accountable for the results. So it is with our life under God. We have been provided with a portion of the temporal things of earth, small though that portion may be, as well as a portion of spiritual qualifications and abilities which make up character. Each of these possessions is to be managed according to our own best judgment. We have the right to choose which qualities shall be displayed and which activities shall receive emphasis. It is largely a matter of our own choice whether we succeed in developing great character or material wealth or both. The capable manager, or the good steward, is one who makes development in every phase of his responsibility.

No department head in a store expects to go year after year without making some report as to how his department is progressing. His reports on costs of operation, on sales, on net profits or losses, are given to the manager of the store at frequent intervals. A similar accountability is found in our relationship to our Heavenly Father. No wise steward expects to continue year after year making no accounting for his life. As a matter of fact, a man makes an accounting of a sort each day, for he is today the sum total of all his yesterdays. You are this moment the result of your past experience, and tomorrow you will be the total of past experience as adjusted by the experiences of today. So, in one sense, since all the pages of your past are recorded in you, your life is a continual accounting.

THERE IS ANOTHER and a more specific sense, however, in which we are accountable. Man is a creature who wants to know where he stands. God in his infinite wisdom has provided that we shall be held accountable not only for our spiritual development, but also for all those temporal things which have been placed in our charge. And these temporal things are measurable. Sometimes they are measured in terms of dollars, sometimes in pesos, sometimes in pounds sterling, but regardless of the standard of measurement, material things can be measured. Accounting for material things can be specific and definite.

The law is clear as to what God expects of people in the management of their material stewardship. The pattern for financing his church and the opportunity for man to know where he stands in the management of his stewardship are wrapped up together in the law of the tithe. It is commonly known that Abraham received his living from the gifts of God in the form of rain and sunshine which made the grass grow and his herds thrive. At the end of the year, after having received his living from the hand of God, he paid to the Lord one tenth of his increase over the previous year's flock. In allowing Abraham and others to receive first their needs and just wants—in other words, their living—before causing the flocks to pass under the rod to be counted, God was recognizing that the giving of rain and sunshine was his responsibility, and he accepted it. From those who had no increase because their crops were poor, no tithe was expected. But the lack of increase did not remove the requirement that man make an accounting. The department head is expected to report to the store manager his losses as well as his profits.

ANYTHING GOD CREATES belongs to him. The fact that he has given us the opportunity to be stewards over certain portions of his creation has made us accountable to him. In our churches in Kansas City, and in many churches of many faiths, a day is set aside annually which is called an "accounting day," or some other suitable name. On this occasion, those who have recognized their position of stewardship under God and their responsibilities of managership of some part of God's creation are given opportunity to make a specific report of the way in which this stewardship has been conducted.

Let every man justify his right of free choice by giving an account of himself.

Fight for First Amendment

The public mind has been considerably exercised by what many believe is an assault on the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Among Protestant leaders comes an organization called Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State, briefly called P.O.A.U. by those who are alphabetically minded.

Executive Director Dr. Glen L. Archer recently addressed a church school at Mount Vernon on—as reported in the current press—“the encroachments of the Roman Catholic Church State on the principles” of that Amendment (on religious freedom). The immediate fight is against federal aid for parochial schools, which was included in the Taft Bill, Senate No. 472, and house bill No. 2953, which failed to pass the Eightieth Congress, but which will be considered by the new congress.

Said Doctor Archer:

We shall fight without faltering to uphold the First Amendment of the Constitution as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and we shall peacefully abide by the decisions of our Supreme Court.

Our liberties, chief among which is religious liberty because it is the basis of all liberties, are our heritage from the Protestant and liberal-thinking founding fathers of our country. These liberties can never be secure so long as the Roman Catholic Church State seeks public support for its private schools; so long as it seeks special privileges in all or any departments of government, whether municipal, state, or federal; so long as un-American and unlawful ambassadorial representation exists with this foreign Church State; so long as local school boards are manipulated to teach any religion at public expense; so long as public treasuries are raided in countless ways for a special church or any church; so long as the war against secularism is a mere smoke screen behind which to destroy our public school system; so long as the scare of Communism is a propaganda device to unite Catholics and divide and conquer non-Catholics, and so long as it seeks to use the public press for these purposes to destroy our liberties.

We must never forget it, that the citizens of the United States are not required to choose between Communism on the one hand and ecclesiastical Facism on the other. Under our republican form of government, we still can make democracy work—a democracy with all our accustomed freedoms, political and economic; a democracy, too, where books and magazines, short of treasonable utterances against the government, are not banned; a democracy where the state is never used or sought to be used as an instrumentality to force upon the people the religious belief of a foreign church state; a democracy in which people count and are not merely counted; a democracy in which the press, radio, and movies are in truth free; a democracy free from boycotts and reprisals of a foreign church state; a democracy in which little people in little churches may make their peace with God, free from interference from either a state or a dominant church.

It is regrettable to note that all the major wars of recent times have stemmed from unhappy conditions in Roman Catholic dominated countries. While instigating and, under cover, waging cruel wars led by heads of that faith, countries have been plunged into a welter of Christian blood. This dominant church must and ultimately will bear that responsibility. In those countries Protestants, Freemasons, Jews, and others were persecuted and still are. Persecution is not a Christian virtue.

The policy of publicly praying for peace and privately planning for war is as specious as it is hypocritical and has nothing to commend itself to any people. The only possible way for Americans to live, work and play happily together is to guarantee religious liberty to all with privileges to no sect, or religious order. The organization which I represent intends to work quietly, peaceably, resolutely, perseveringly to that end.

We have given space at times to this and other matters which appear to threaten, or are felt to be an assault on fundamental American principles.

Across the Desk

From Australia comes a letter from Elder J. R. Taylor, 175 Beaumont Street, Hamilton, New South Wales, from which we quote:

We have already had some very fine ministry of Apostle Roscoe E. Davey. I believe he has a background of thirty years or more of work as a live-wire seventy. I forecast for him a fine term of ministry in this vast mission. My only regret is that there were not several good seventies along with him. This mission is starving for the ministry of good seventies, in this district especially. The Mormons are here and have made over twenty converts. They are getting plenty of press publicity. They are building their structure on our foundations and getting away with it.

My prayers and solicitous greetings are with you all during the Christmas season. May the new year be all that God would wish it to be in the growth and development of his kingdom throughout the world.

Brother Davey and family will have a fine time and a full schedule at Tiona over the Christmas season.

Marion Pease's 'Hands'

Some weeks ago, a copy of the Herald for November 27, 1948, was sent, by request of Dr. Herbert S. Salisbury, San Rafael, California, to Mrs. Hazel Schreiber, a member of The Ina Coolbrith Circle, of Oakland, California. In writing to Doctor Salisbury about his story of Ina Coolbrith in the same Herald, Mrs. Schreiber commented on the cover picture, a photograph by Elder Marion Pease of Des Moines, writing, “What a lovely picture! I read a poem not long ago which would just fit it.”

A little later Mrs. Schreiber sent to Brother Salisbury a copy of a poem written by Rosa Coates Richards of New York, which we reproduce with the same picture (reduced), and suggest a careful reading of the lines.

“HANDS”

“Knotted by time and toil, they seem to hold
All resignation, all of loss and gains—
These are the hands that are content to fold
On what the years have chosen to ordain.
Slender and fine, some hands may seem too weak
For any task, and yet their deftness stirs
Marble to life or makes a harp-string speak—
Always the shapers and interpreters.
“Small hands that gather pebbles or a flower;
The able fingers of an artisan;
Hands ever reaching for the reins of power
Have held the vital destiny of man.
Yet even more lasting witness can they bear
When lifted in an attitude of prayer.”

Great Souls and Their Faith

A tribute to Martin Harris, one of the Three Special Witnesses of the Book of Mormon

MARTIN HARRIS was born in May, 1783. In the autumn of 1827, he became acquainted with the Prophet Joseph Smith at Palmyra, New York. He soon became one of the young prophet's supporters. By request of Joseph Smith, he presented a transcript of several lines of the hieroglyphics of the Book of Mormon plates to Professor Anthon and Doctor Mitchell in New York City and asked them to translate it. Martin Harris was one of four who did some recording on the Book of Mormon manuscript when translating was being done by use of the Urim and Thummim by Joseph Smith the Prophet. Oliver Cowdery did most of the writing. Mr. Harris, Oliver Cowdery, and David Whitmer, after the translating was finished in 1829, were privileged to handle the golden plates and talk with the Angel Moroni. (Eight other chosen men also handled the plates but did not see Moroni.)

Martin Harris, in 1830, furnished $3,000 in payment for printing the first five thousand copies of the Book of Mormon. Many of that first edition are still extant. Elder Harris was one of the six members who began the organization of the church on April 6, 1830, at Fayette, New York. He and his family went with the small group of Saints from Fayette to Kirtland, Ohio, where he bought farms and became a strong supporter in building the Kirtland Temple.

My first trip to Kirtland was in April, 1887, when I spent eight days in that vicinity, often visiting the historic temple. It was my good fortune to be cared for in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Makepeace, four blocks west of the temple. They were threescore and ten years old, and had lived in Kirtland most of their lives; they had never joined any church, yet were very kind people. Mr. Makepeace was a popular politician and public speaker. The home of the late President Garfield was at Mentor, about three miles from Kirtland, and was well-known to Mr. Makepeace, also to Martin Harris. President Garfield, though not a Latter Day Saint, is on record as relating a great miracle wrought on a man by prayer and administration at Kirtland by the Prophet Joseph Smith. Nelson Makepeace was acquainted with many of the Saints before they moved to Missouri from Ohio. He spoke highly of the prophet and his family, of Hyrum and William Smith, and of Oliver Cowdery, "the eloquent man."

SOME MONTHS after the death of his wife, Martin Harris sold his real estate, making his temporary home with friends in Kirtland until his son in Utah came for him in 1870. "Uncle Martin Harris," as he was affectionately called, often made his home with the Nelson Makepeace family. When I was in the home seventeen years later, I sat in an arm chair Elder Harris often used, "said grace" at the same table, and occupied the bedroom where the aged servant of God slept, all of which gave me an opportunity to think of his noble confidence in God, the Book of Mormon, the Angel Moroni, the Prophet Joseph Smith, and the church of the Restored Gospel—an experience to be cherished.

On some evenings, Mr. and Mrs. Makepeace became personally reminiscent in speaking of their favorite Saints. Of Martin Harris, it was related that the morning just before leaving the home, he said, "Now before saying good-by for the last time in this earth life, I want to bless you by the laying on of hands and prayer, for your loving-kindness to me." Martin Harris arose, took two chairs, set them side by side, saying, "Nelson, you occupy this chair to my right, and Mary, the one to my left."

BY C. J. HUNT

This done, he put his right hand on Nelson's head, his left hand on Mary's head, fervently praying a special parting blessing upon them. As this touching incident was related, Mrs. Makepeace wiped tears from her cheeks. Mr. Makepeace also said the prayer was one of the most appealing petitions to the Lord he had ever heard, stating that for days afterwards they recognized that wonderful spirit of blessing with them. Surely Elder Harris was one of the noble Saints of his time.

After this service of prayer, Mr. Makepeace accompanied Elder Harris to the temple where the son had a carriage waiting to take them to the Willoughby, Ohio, railroad station a few miles distant. However, just before going to the train, Elder Harris told the keeper of the temple to guard the door until he came out. The aged man walked slowly to the sacred pulpit and to the place where that wonderful heavenly vision was witnessed by the Prophet Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery on Sunday afternoon, April 3, 1836. In that vision there appeared four heavenly personages; each in turn personally delivered divine instruction. The messengers were Christ, Moses, Elias, and Elijah. (The temple was dedicated one week prior to this incident.) Behind this sacred pulpit, Elder Harris bowed in solemn prayer several minutes, then arose and walked down the aisle, bidding farewell to the building where he, with others, had experienced endowments of the Holy Spirit in great measure. His son assisted him to a seat in the carriage and he began his trip to Clarkston, Utah, where his son, Martin Harris, Jr.,

Make Me Believe

PART TWO

MIKE INHALED big draughts of the wintry air and kicked the soft, shining snow with all the exuberance of a small boy. It was good to be out alone like this with the brilliant stars overhead and the sparkling whiteness underneath. He grinned at himself for feeling so eager and enthusiastic, when only two months ago he had made this same journey with dread and foreboding in his heart.

He rang Reverend Brown's doorbell softly and stood back to feast his eyes on the wonderland of small, sturdy shrubs hugging the big, old house protectingly, enhancing it lovingly with their festoons of silvery icicles and glittering snow.

The massive door swung open, and warmth and light cascaded around the small figure of the elderly man with the inevitable book clasped in his sensitive fingers.

"Mike Ferrel!" and there was surprise in his gentle voice, "Mike, I'm so glad to see you." And he drew Mike into the house with the clasp of his hand and the warmth of his smile.

Mike sank into the proffered chair gratefully and stretched his long legs toward the blazing fire. The firelight danced contentedly over his rugged features, and the minister smiled in retrospect at the picture of Mike restlessly pacing the floor like a caged animal on his visit two months ago.

"I must say, you hardly seem like the same fellow that was here once before—or am I wrong?"

"I was in pretty bad shape, wasn't I? But don't get the idea that I've solved all my problems, because I haven't. In fact, I have more questions than ever. The only thing is, I feel as if I am getting some place," Mike grinned and answered sheepishly.

He paused and continued determinedly, "I'm even learning how to pray—I think."

The older man spoke quietly, "And you discovered it was not groveling after all, didn't you?"

Mike watched the fire and answered seriously, "Yes, I did. I found out that prayer for me is talking things over with God whenever, wherever, and however I want—and I've stopped asking for things for myself."

The minister looked surprised. "Why,

Mike, you've come a long way—some people never get past the request stage—and you are right, prayer is definitely an attitude of the mind and not the body. I remember a long time ago I used to debate with myself how I would present my petition to God. I found out when I had finally decided how I wanted to say it, I was through praying. It was then I discovered that prayer was simply exchanging thoughts with God until we both came to his decision. The acceptance is our part."

MIKE STIRRED UNEASILY. "The only thing is that acceptance sometimes involves a moral interpretation on our part. For instance, suppose I know definitely that the way I spend my spare time is important to me and my family and society as a whole. Does that mean that I am to cut out all recreation just because some recreation is unwholesome or detrimental? In other words, am I to give up bowling and golf because they sell liquor at the club house and my friends drink it?"

"I don't have to tell you how important selection is. Everything good we enjoy today is the result of someone's selecting the best and discarding all the rest. You selected college instead of driving a truck. You selected marriage instead of illicit love. Recreation is merely another case of making the right selection," his friend reflected.

"Does that mean you are against recreation?"

"Indeed not. Recreation is vital. It can re-create in us a wholesome new spirit. It relaxes, releases tension, teaches co-operation and fair play. I am inclined to believe that the Master himself loved boats and fishing from the way he constantly refreshed himself by contact with water and fishermen. Let's put it this way—let's narrow it down to saying that recreation is good only when it actually accomplishes some good thing."

Mike grinned and pinched the lobe of his ear. "That certainly puts drinking and smoking and late parties in their place. Mary's going to like that."

The minister grinned in unison. "It's as I said before, Mike. You choose not to drink because you want a clear-thinking, alert brain that can make quick decisions. You choose not to smoke because, aside from the harmful effects on your body, you like the idea of attaining poise without leaning on a cigarette. You choose not to stay out late not only because it creates disunity in the home but because you want a vigorous, co-ordinated feeling of physical well-being. Am I right?"

Mike assented slowly. "That puts you on the spot, though, when some of your friends insist that just once won't hurt anybody. In fact, they ridicule and make fun of you if you don't go along with the crowd."

"Mike, what would you say about a man who willingly chose second place when he might have had first place?"

"I'd say he was a fool."

"Well, look at your best then. Take Joe Louis, Lou Boudreau, or Ben Hogan. What would you think of them if they went out on a big party the night before an important game? Do you ridicule and make fun of them because they keep in training? No, the more rigid the training, the more you are inclined to respect."

"What you say is true, but those men are intent on training for physical perfection only, and we are trying to establish a systematic, constructive training ground for moral and spiritual growth."

"Well, Mike, then I would have to point out men like Lincoln, Brooks, Luther, Milton, Gandhi, and Christ. Can you deny that each of these men attained greatness by selection and then rigid training in their own fields?"

"Would you say that fasting is an absolute necessity in spiritual growth? I mean, do you believe that mere abstinence from food will bring about a desired moral condition? Or accomplish a desired physical victory?" Mike spoke up hesitantly.

"Would you say that any man, besides Christ, has accomplished as much by any means as Gandhi achieved by fasting alone?"

Mike studied the toe of his shoe and moved his head slowly in contemplation. "I just can't see it. Somehow it all seems outmoded and obsolete. Is going without my breakfast and trying to do a full morning's work on an empty, angry stomach going to make for tranquillity and peacefulness, or is it going to create irritation and confusion?"

Reverend Brown sighed patiently. "I'm afraid you're trying to go too fast. Why don't you slow down? We grow spiritually . . . but not overnight. Human beings are a lot like trees—the bigger the tree, the slower the growth. Fasting is a stage in that growth. We come by it, not by force, but by a spontaneous urge for perfection. It's like wanting to drink out of a cup instead of sucking a bottle. It's like wanting to cross the street without holding to your mother's hand. It's like wanting to leave home and make your own living. In a way, it's a sort of independence. It isn't working a hardship by giving up something you want so much as it is exchanging something small for something greater."

Mike shook his head as if perplexed, and his friend watched him compassionately. Finally he got to his feet and stood in front of Mike, his hands spread expressively. "Look, Mike, it's as if your spiritual body stood off from your physical and said, 'Listen, you've had your way long enough. From now on I'm going to have something to say about this life of ours. My work is just as important as yours, but how can I do it when you load me down with too much rich food, stultify me with too much drink, and then toss me down exhausted after an evening spent in what you call fun? Give me a chance! Every once in a while you take me out and look at me in disgust and say to yourself, 'What a weak little fellow you are,' and then before I get a chance to answer, you push me back into the recesses of your mind and shut the door on me so I can't answer. You have grown to manhood, but you have kept me immature and illiterate. I know you deserve good food, proper rest and creative work and play, but I must have some peace and tranquillity for my growth. I must have time for study and meditation and inspiration. Please, give me a chance! How often have you stood on the fourth green and teed off with that long drive of yours and felt the thrill of perfect co-ordination culminated in physical victory? I have wings, too, but you have bound me with the chains of nervous tension, restlessness, anxiety, and fear, each link welded with sated physical desires. I beg you, give me my chance!"

He finished dramatically. "When a man can see these things for himself, he takes fasting in his stride, joyously and spontaneously, for it brings about a co-ordination of the spirit that results in moral victory."

MIKE SLID DOWN in the huge chair and studied the dancing flames, his forehead drawn into serious concentration. "I suppose that fasting would be similar to prayer, then—whenever, wherever, and however you should choose to make use of it?"

"Yes. The marvelous wisdom of God places no hard and fast rules on observance. He knew with his infinite patience and understanding that we will seek and find and adapt only where we are free. Take any great man and, in the study of his life, you will find that he became so immersed in his work he voluntarily fasted from food and pleasure without even feeling he was making any sacrifice."

The little man stopped, and humility was written plainly on his face—humility and reverence. "Mike, I am going to tell you something I have never told any man. To me, fasting is a secret I share with God alone. You know how you anticipate an invitation to dinner at a friend's house, the warmth, the good cheer, the friendliness. Well, to me, fasting is an acceptance of an invitation to sit at the Lord's table—and you will find the same warmth and good cheer and friendliness there, too. The Lord does not set a meager table. It is more than likely that, should you choose to accept his invitation, you will find yourself in the company of illustrious guests who will fill your soul with radiance and inspiration."

Mike sighed and faced his friend humbly. "You make it all sound so easy, and yet when I get back home, I find myself confused and threshing back and forth in indecision."

The minister turned his stooped shoulders to the fireplace. Against the light he looked like a gnome out of a fairy tale except for the magnificent head and the fine eyes full of kindness and sympathy. "Mike, you know enough about law to know what happens when an accused man is brought to trial—the days and weeks spent in collecting witnesses and an unprejudiced jury, the evidence that must be assembled with care and then sifted down to every last minute detail. In a way, you might say that we are on trial here in this world, and the forces of good and evil hope to possess us. We, too, must weigh every bit of evidence carefully, and we may be sure there will be many times when we will feel lost and confused and undecided. The important thing is, that without doubt we have the finest defense lawyer in the world representing us, and the Judge is famous for His unbiased decisions."

MIKE SHIFTED HIS WEIGHT and grinned up at the man standing before him. "You know, I really should pay you for all this valuable advice you have been giving me. When I think what some of these psychiatrists charge, I already owe you a small fortune."

"Mike, this is the best part of my work. This is the farthest reaching and the most satisfying—if only others could be encouraged to bring their doubts and fears out into the open. Give your money somewhere else; you have already enriched my life by your companionship."

"That's just it, where would I give it? Mary says everyone should pay tithing and keep an inventory just like a businessman. I can't see it that way. Why should I send out a check for several hundred dollars every year and not know where it's going or who's spending it? How do I know whether that man is honest or if really needy people are getting help? Besides, I don't go to church anyway," Mike blurted out.

The minister replied almost sharply, "Would you say we should burn down all the schoolhouses because you're through school, or tear up the library because you haven't read a book lately?"

"No, sir, I know churches are necessary, that they fill a need, and I am willing to do my share. But I still insist there are good people outside of churches, better in fact, than some I could name you who make a show of going every Sunday."

The older man rubbed his forehead and replied tolerantly, "Mike, I don't deny that, but isn't the same thing true in every organization? Won't you find the same unpleasant element in your bowling league, your business firm, and your club?"

Mike faced him resolutely, "Sure, I grant you that, but at least these people are not pretending to represent God. Doesn't that make a difference?"

The minister got to his feet again and paced the floor. "We are all representing God, whether we choose to or not. The fact that we refuse to look into a mirror does not change our visage one bit—I am still Montgomery Brown, and you are Mike Ferrel, and so we must stay. After all, the church is here to help each of us. If we discriminate, we are defeating our own purpose."

"I know that, sir, but aren't we missing the point? Why should I pay tithing to support a bunch of hypocrites or send some guy who has a religious complex clear across the globe to a horde of savages who would rather be left alone?"

REVEREND BROWN swung on his heel and bent over Mike impatiently. "Do you have Mr. Tuttle come every week and clean up your basement and yard because you feel superior to him, or because he has some kind of a phobia for menial tasks?"

"Good heavens, no! That old guy can outwork me any day, and do it twice as easily. He's a genius at fixing things up, and he enjoys it. He's always doing things I never have time for."

The older man resumed his pacing and continued deliberately, "There are many men just like Mr. Tuttle—men who are not too interested in how much pay they get but who work because they love what they are doing. They give of their time and talents generously for one purpose alone—to serve God by serving their fellow men. They are the small minority of people who are always doing the things other men never have time for. The services they render can never be bought and sold like merchandise across a counter, for they are always freely given away. Think of the most illuminating experiences of your life—the radiance of your wedding, the miracle of your son's birth, Donny's miraculous recovery from that serious illness two years ago, the exaltation at seeing the faces of your own boys singing in the choir at Easter, the sharing of a deep sorrow when death strikes unexpectedly. No man repays God or his servants for these things. He simply says to himself, "The cause is good, and I must give."

Mike hung his head and answered soberly, "I see what you mean." And then he shook his head despairingly. "I keep making so many mistakes, I just can't seem to get the right spirit. I guess I'm a failure."

The little man laid his hand affectionately across Mike's broad shoulders. "We dare not give up. There are so many others who are depending on us." Then he dropped his voice sadly, "How many times have I stood in the pulpit on Sunday and looked out over a sea of faces with fear and despair in my heart. I know there are many out there waiting patiently, eagerly for some word of comfort and encouragement and help, and I know deep down in my heart that I am going to fail some of those people. Will they come back? Will I have another chance? For every person I fail, am I not failing God himself?"

For the first time Mike was shocked. It had never occurred to him that this man had problems, too. He watched him pace the floor—his shoulders sagging, his hands clasped behind his frail back—and thought, "He's still trying, too. Of course, he's much further along than I am, that's why he can help me, but just the same he's still working and studying and trying. He knows the meaning of disappointment and failure, too—just as I do!"

MIKE RAISED HIS HEAD and there was new strength in his voice. "Listen, sir, we may fail, but I don't think our cause will, do you?"

The minister smiled, for it was the first time Mike had ever used the plural pronoun. Suddenly he felt good. It was a fine thing to know that somebody young and strong and eager was taking over. He added his strength to his guest's. "No, Mike, our cause will never fail!" And then the man sighed deeply and added quietly, "But my time is short, friend, and there is so much to be done."

Mike rose to his full six feet and said cheerfully, "There must be something I can do to help."

"Yes, there is much you can do, but tell me first—is it so bad? I mean, since you have tasted of the cup, is it all bitter?"

Mike grinned good-naturedly. "Some-

THE CHOICES we make contribute to our success or failures, to our happiness or misery, to our wealth of friends or to our lack of them, to our spiritual enrichment or spiritual bankruptcy. If I choose to believe, it is not because I do not value truth and facts, but rather that my observations, my findings, my experience, and the testimony of reliable witnesses in various fields of research and endeavor justify my belief. My choosing to believe reflects an attitude in which I purposefully direct both the emotional and intellectual forces of my life toward the definite end of a happier life.

My failure to prove, after diligent effort, is not evidence that proof does not exist and cannot, eventually, be found. It is this choosing to believe that drives the scientist forward in the face of seemingly insurmountable difficulties in his search for proof. When I choose to believe, it does not signify an inferior intellect that is satisfied by wishful thinking any more than the doubters' intellect reflects a strong and powerful mind, whose every denial is abundantly and overwhelmingly based upon facts.

One reason I choose to believe is because my choosing guides and stimulates my quest for truth, and with it comes an increased joy of which doubt would rob me. Let me cite an example that recently came to my attention. A young couple who had been married for eight times, when I make so many mistakes, I look at myself and think, 'Mike Ferrel, you are absolutely the meanest, stubbornest, ornriest creature alive.' And then there are other times like last Sunday when I had the kids out for a drive, and I was pointing out things to the boys, Donny leaned over from the back seat and laid his hand on my shoulder and said, 'Gee, Dad, you're swell. You know just about everything.' Then Mary squeezed my arm and said softly, 'He's right, Mike, I think you're pretty swell, too.' No, sir, I'd have to say it isn't bitter at all!"

years, but had no children, unburdened their hearts to me and evidenced such anxiety that I suggested they make the matter a subject of earnest prayer. They did, and their faith was rewarded. The lady related her experience to her sister, not a member of the church. Her sister laughingly said, "You surely don't think that happened because you prayed, do you?"

"I certainly do," said this noble little expectant mother.

Who will deny that the greater joy comes to the one who says, "I choose to believe." An interesting Bible story tells us how the children of Israel were fed in the wilderness by manna that fell like frost. The doubter would rob you of the faith that such an experience generates by telling you that there was nothing miraculous about it—that at certain seasons of the year the blossoms from certain trees are carried by the wind and deposited on the ground, and that it was this which the children of Israel gathered.

This reminds me of the story of an old colored man who was desperately in need of some bread. He prayed long and loud in his little shack, and some boys, overhearing the old man's prayer, thought they would have some fun at his expense. They bought a loaf of bread and tossed it through the window of the shack; then they called to the old Negro and asked him, "Uncle Mose, did the Lord send you some bread?"

"He sure did," was his reply.

"Uncle Mose, the Lord did not send you the bread, we did it."

"No," said Uncle Mose, "the devil may have delivered the bread, but the Lord sent it."

Many times we fail to see the hand of God in what happens because it seems to come about in a perfectly natural way.

To increase my joy and faith, "I choose to believe."

Our Handicapped Children

By EVANGELIST RAY WHITING

IT HAS BEEN almost thirty years since I first began traveling for this church. During this time, I have seen many people, stayed in many homes, and had many experiences. Most of these people and homes and experiences have been lovely, and remain as joyous spots in my memory. Some of the most delightful and happy moments were those I spent in homes with little children. To see a father and mother and children all living, loving, growing, and worshiping together is like a taste of our longed-for-Zion or a glimpse of heaven. In such homes, there is intelligent love between husband and wife, between parents and children and between the children themselves. There is order, discipline, and peace.

Children who have the opportunity to grow up in such homes have many advantages over other children. The battles of self-mastery and discipline are won in childhood. These children learn early the science of losing themselves in something bigger than they are. They also learn the art of unselfishness and respect for others and their possessions. They win some of the greatest victories of life in their early youth.

In Doctrine and Covenants 28:13, we read, "power is not given unto Satan to tempt little children, until they begin to become accountable before me . . . that great things may be required at the hand of their fathers." And in certain homes, this is true. Great things have come from the fathers, and Satan hardly has a chance with the children because the avenues of indifference, selfishness, disobedience, and disregard for others have been sealed off by a deep concern for others, and selflessness and obedience and regard for that which is not their own. There are no handles sticking out for Satan to grasp. But in some homes, this is not the case. There are many handicapped children in the church, and, as a result, they and the church suffer an untold loss.

For a parent to deliberately handicap a child by causing the loss of sight, or damaging a portion of the brain, or cutting off an arm would be unthinkable. Yet, from my experience, I would say some parents—ignorantly or otherwise—actually blind their children to some of the most beautiful things in life, by permitting their minds to be so filled with rubbish or to remain so empty of vital information and so warped by wrong attitudes that their thinking is forever crippled. Thus they are led into activities and pursuits which handicap them for the service of the kingdom more than losing an arm or a leg. My heart aches for our handicapped children. Their loss, and our loss, is great.

OUR REFORMATORIES ARE filled with youngsters who have strong bodies, good eyesight, and minds that are alert, but they became terribly handicapped in their homes through parental neglect and the lack of proper disciplines. Law enforcement officers tell us that juvenile delinquency is largely due to parental handicaps. An outstanding child specialist asserts that most child neurosis is due to an unstable home and the lack of proper parental discipline.

I have been in homes where the parents were constantly saying, "No, no" and "Don't, don't" hour after hour, day after day, week after week. These parents were always weary of saying "no" and "don't," and the children were tired of hearing it, because it didn't mean a thing. The children kept right on doing what they were doing, because "no" didn't mean "no." It was only another noise added to the general distraction. The old-fashioned

"no" that meant "no" forever has almost ceased to exist. If the present-day "no" means "no" at all, then it is only for a moment.

So many parents, it seems, make child-training a difficult task when it should be a simple and joyous experience. Experts tell us if a child in its infancy is taught that when Mother and Dad say "no" or "don't" they mean exactly what they say, the battle is largely won, and peace and order are the result. But many a child is taught by his weak-willed parents that if he cries harder or screams louder or kicks the floor longer, he can overcome their better judgment and change their "no" to a "have-your-own-way." So the child of a few years has his own way, and how handicapped he is!

CHILDREN WHO ARE TAUGHT by their parent's example to lie and to treat the truth with indifference are severely handicapped. Many times I have heard a parent say to the child, "If you do that, I'll spank you," and then watch the child proceed without hesitation to do the very thing he was told not to do and get no spanking at all. He had learned long before that the parent was lying, that he had no intention of making his word good when he said it. When a child learns that Mother and Dad lie, he is terribly handicapped.

A child at three who glares at his mother and says, "Shut your mouth," is handicapped. A child who, in a fit of anger, can yell at his father and strike him in the face and get by with it is handicapped. A child who, with his shoes on, can walk up and down the keyboard of a grand piano entirely heedless of his mother's protests is handicapped.

Does It Make Any Difference

Summary of a sermon preached at Council Bluffs, Iowa, on January 16.

I will build my church. Jesus in Matthew 16: 18.

Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it.—Ps. 127: 1.

WORSHIP OF GOD is very important to each one of us. Humanity seems to have been created with an instinct of worship. Even among uncivilized tribes, we find people manifesting a form of worship, reaching for something outside themselves—something greater than they are, something that can bless them, something they can worship. Inasmuch as God has created us with a worship instinct, I believe he is concerned about how we shall worship him. In organizing his church to be our spiritual home, he placed within it certain laws, principles, ordinances, and sacraments which he called the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is his will that we accept, obey, and live that gospel.

The growing attitude of Christian people is that we are all headed in the same direction, working toward the same goal, worshipping the same God, that it doesn't make any difference what our beliefs and practices are or what church we belong to, and that as long as we are honest and sincere, we will all be saved anyway. Do you believe that?

I was riding in a car with two young married couples recently on our way to an out-of-town funeral. In our conversation, one of the ladies said, "I happen to be a member of the Methodist Church, but it doesn't make any difference to me what church I attend or what church I am a member of. One church doesn't mean any more to me than another." That is the attitude of many people today.

Most Latter Day Saints do not feel that way about their church. Some of our members who don't understand our teachings very well may treat their membership lightly; but those who are truly converted and have caught the vision of this church, those who know about the origin of the church, its beliefs, doctrines, and practices would not think of leaving it under any circumstances. I have known many isolated Saints who have remained faithful for years even though they were deprived of the privilege of attending their own church. Because of living in a community where our church is not represented, some of them have attended and have become very active in the work of other churches but would never consider for a moment severing their membership with this church.

JESUS THOUGHT it did make a difference which church one belonged to. There were plenty of churches in his day. There were the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenes, and others. But Jesus said, "I will build my church." He didn't do that to add to the confusion already existing in the religious world. He did it because he knew that if he were to save mankind, he would have to have a definite plan of salvation incorporated in a definite church which had the organization and plan and power to bring about the regeneration of human beings.

The psalmist, David, thought it made a difference what church one belonged to. He said, "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it." Yes, there have been plenty of churches established by man that God didn't have anything to do with. A person or several persons may become dissatisfied in a certain church, withdraw their membership, and organize a church of their own. God didn't command them to do that. He had nothing to do with the organization or origin of such a church. Do you think he will recognize that church as his? Do you believe salvation may be found in such a church?

I am an ordained minister. If I were to become dissatisfied in this church and desired to organize one of my own, would I have a right to do so? I would have just as much right as any other man who has organized churches on that basis, but I don't believe God would recognize it as his true church.

Martin Luther was an ordained priest in the Catholic Church. He became dissatisfied with some of the misuses and false doctrines, and organized a church of his own. He never made the claim that he was commanded of God to do so. He was merely making a desperate effort to get back to that "strait and narrow way" outlined by Jesus. I admire him for his courage in taking the stand he did against the powerful Catholic Church of his day. He did the best he could with the light he had in that dark day in which he lived. It is only natural he would retain and carry over into his church some of the false teachings of the Catholic faith.

Each of the reformers saw something was lacking or was wrong in the church of which he was a member and made an effort in a new organization to set things right. Roger Williams, an ordained priest in the Church of England, came to this country and affiliated himself with the Presbyterian Church for a while. The more he read his Bible, the more he came to believe that infant baptism and sprinkling as a mode of baptism were wrong; so in 1639 he organized the first Baptist Church in America based on baptism by immersion. In later years, Alexander Campbell, a minister in the Baptist Church, received the light that baptism was to be performed not only by immersion but also for the remission of sins. He tried to introduce that doctrine into the Baptist Church, but when it was not acceptable, he withdrew and organized a church which later was known as the Christian Church and taught baptism by immersion for the remission of sins. I cite these examples in order that you may understand why and how we happen to have so many different churches today all claiming to be the church of Jesus Christ. No two of the churches teach exactly alike or have the same creed. In fact many of them teach quite opposite to each other and present conflicting ideas and beliefs. Does it make any difference?

THERE HAS BEEN a declining interest in church doctrine in recent years. When I first entered the ministry about twenty-eight years ago, there was a lively interest in it. It wasn't difficult at all to get into a discussion about doctrine. Not so anymore. Most people don't want to talk about doctrine, neither do they wish to hear doctrinal sermons. They say, "One church believes one thing, another church believes another thing. What difference does it make?" We think it makes a lot of difference.

Which Church You Belong To?

By

In Ephesians 4: 4-6 we read, "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; One Lord, one faith, one baptism, One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." Here we note that Paul says there is but one body, one faith, and one baptism—not many bodies or many faiths or many kinds of baptisms.

In order that you may understand the importance of doctrine in our Christian life, I wish to cite a few passages of scripture:

Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed: for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds.—II John 1: 9-11.

From this we learn that unless one abides in the doctrine of Christ, he does not have God; and certainly we can't be saved without God. Does it make any difference what we believe or what church we are members of? We are not even to receive a person into our house or bid him God speed if he is teaching contrary to the doctrine of Christ.

Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness. And their word will eat as doth a canker: of whom is Hymeneus and Philetus; who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some.—II Timothy 2: 15-18.

Paul was concerned about the truth being rightly divided, which I understand to mean rightly interpreted, rightly understood. He referred to two men who were going about preaching that the resurrection had already taken place. They had erred concerning the truth. They were not rightly dividing the word of truth. In spite of the fact that these men preaching this false doctrine would not do away with the resurrection (because that is in the hands of God) still Paul warned Timothy against these men. Paul thought that doctrine was important.

Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee.—I Timothy 4: 16.

Timothy is admonished here that if he would watch his own daily conduct and the doctrine of Christ and continue in them, he would be able to save himself and others who were converted to his preaching. The opposite to that would be that if he didn't live a good life and if he didn't continue in the doctrine of Christ, he would not be saved, neither could he be helpful in leading others on the road to salvation.

Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables.—II Timothy 4: 2-4.

This prophecy by Paul has had its fulfillment in our day. The time has already come when many will not endure sound doctrine. They don't want to hear it. They say it isn't necessary to our salvation. They have turned their ears from the truth to fables.

This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honouret me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.—Matthew 15: 8, 9.

These are the words of Jesus. He uses very strong language here speaking of a people who were worshiping him in vain. Did you ever think it was possible to worship God in vain? Well, Jesus says it is. Does it make any difference which church you belong to? Jesus said that those who taught for doctrines the commandments of men worshiped him in vain. What would be a commandment of men? Many of them have crept into present-day Christianity. Some of them are infant baptism, sprinkling as a mode of baptism, polygamy, doing away with the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost and for the healing of the sick, and changing the form of organization of the church. These are commandments of men because they have been introduced, taught, and commanded by men without God's having anything to say or do about them. It is a serious matter for one to worship God in vain or to stake his soul's salvation on man-made doctrines. Does it make any difference which church you belong to?

Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity.—Matthew 7: 21-23.

Many today believe that all they have to do to be saved is to call upon the name of the Lord. Jesus says that isn't enough. We must do the will of God. He was talking here about a religious people—a people who had called upon the name of the Lord and thought they were his servants. They had a power that accompanied them as they went about performing many wonderful works in the name of the Lord, but there was something wrong somewhere. Evidently they were not preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ in its fullness. At least Jesus said he didn't know them, and apparently they didn't know him. What a disappointment awaits such people! How true is the statement of Jesus, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." Does it make any difference which church you belong to?

A FEW THINGS about the church need to be understood. We need to know what we are talking about. If the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, we need to have the gospel in its fullness. When I speak of the gospel, I have in mind not just the atonement of Christ (as many people interpret the gospel to be) but his complete message which contains the terms with which we are to comply if we would be a partaker in his atonement and receive the salvation of our souls. The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints teaches all of that.

If the church of Christ has a purpose and mission in the world, it is reasonable to believe he has set up the organization necessary and capable of carrying out that mission. Men, in establishing churches, have changed the form of organization to suit their own whims. I knew a man in Oslo, Norway, who was a Methodist minister. Several years ago he came to

America's Most Expensive Disease

Alcoholism costs $9,000,000,000 a year.

By GRACE L. KRAHL

IF NON-CHRISTIANS who are defenders of alcohol point to Biblical characters—Noah, Lot, Ahasuerus, Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar—and their indulgence in strong drink, they should allude also to the value of abstinence in the examples of the forty years in the wilderness, David, John the Baptist, the Nazarites, and others.

Forty years of wilderness life without the use of alcohol would seem to be proof sufficient of its unimportance in daily sustenance and the social relationships of two million people (estimated probable number of the Israelites) enduring without the convivial beverage. The claim is made by some that the reason men lived to such great age in the days of the patriarchs was because no fermentation was used or known. It is now well known that the constant use of alcoholic beverages shortens life.

People want health, happiness, opportunity, homes, and successful families. Why, then, do men indulge in that which deprives them of these possessions? When beverage alcohol was not available nor known, no one suffered physically or socially for the want of it; but when this man-made product was introduced for human consumption, and its (deceptive) exhilarating effects were discovered, the pursuit of the higher and better things of life suffered a serious modification.

What are some of the reasons men drink? Those who imbibe of the flowing cup could better tell, but the obvious reasons seem to be because it is so easily accessible; it appears necessary in business salesmanship; it brings revenue to the government; it is an escape for some from worry, trouble, or anxiety; it is made appealing through high-pressure advertising; it seems smart; it appears necessary for social advantage (to go along with the crowd). What is the most serious of all is that one drink calls for another, according to those who know, and finally drink takes the man.

THE PRICE is costly for this indulgence. Consider the colossal sum of $9,640,000,000 according to figures released by the United States Department of Commerce as America's drink bill in 1947.

What this sum would have bought or built has been estimated as follows:

1,606,000 family cottages at $6,000 each; 1,928 small town schoolhouses costing $5,000; 96,400 churches at $100,000 each; 48,200 small hospitals at $200,000 each; 6,400 automobiles at $1,500 each; 385,600,000 suits of clothes or dresses at $25 each; 4,800,000 missionaries in fields all over the world at a salary of $2,000 each, and a copy of the Bible in the hands of every man, woman, and child on earth.

But the loss of these material benefits cannot compare with the injustices done to homes, wives, and children, in privations, disappointments, and blighted hopes by indulgence in alcoholic beverages.

Still I wonder if there has been one less drunkard or one more total abstainer since the above figures were given to the public. Figures and statistics are informative but spiritless. Unless the heart and will are enlisted in bettering one's life, information on the deleterious results of a given habit counts for little. But for those who seek remedial measures for the deliverance of our country from the curse of beverage alcohol, facts and figures show the enormity of the task, although they do not necessarily presage the impossibility of accomplishing it.

What, then, is our recourse to combat (in the words of Dr. D. Leigh Colvin) "this heavily capitalized, highly organized, aggressively promoted, mendaciously advertised and entrenched government traffic"? Prevention or prohibition is the answer. Moderation will not do. The drunkards of today were the moderate drinkers of yesterday.

IT IS PASSING STRANGE that we raise large sums of money for the prevention and spread of disease such as typhoid and funds for research in the cause of cancer, polio, etc., but when it comes to the prevention of the disease of alcoholism (now known to be a disease), we are told it is an invasion of human rights.

Dr. Andrew C. Ivy, vice-president of the University of Illinois, director of its professional school, and one of America's leading scientists, declares, "Alcohol is a drug, and alcoholics are sick people beyond self-help, just as other sick people are beyond self-help. There are 750,000 helpless, if not hopeless, victims of alcoholism, and there are 10,000,000 heavy drinkers in this nation. The United States spends nine billion dollars a year for that which produces the disease of alcoholism and only thirty million to prevent and treat cancer and tuberculosis."

But since the return of prohibition is problematical and is a long-view goal for the deliverance of our country from the liquor traffic, we must look to other sources of help in the interim, which are helpful and available. The home and the church are our chief adjutants. These together with education and legislation, can accomplish much. Increasingly successful local option elections are encouraging.

THE HOME can take a positive stand on the liquor question by

observing total abstinence—not like the father, advising his son to give up the wine after dinner, said, “You see those two candles in the center of the table? While you see only two you are all right, but when you begin to see four candles, it is time to stop. Do you understand?” The boy looked seriously at him and replied, “Yes, father, I understand what you say, but there is only one candle on the table now.”

The father had passed the place to stop. Embarrassing? Or were the senses too dulled for perception of the perplexed situation? Children’s confidence and acceptance of the teachings and attitudes of parents toward matters beyond their own powers of discrimination are the most impressive and lasting of any moral agency. But this does not mean the home should remain silent on the baneful effects of alcohol; example should be supplemented by suitable teaching in the light of fortifying children to resist temptations that are sure to come and to combat claims that are contrary to their training and home teaching such as “Beer is a food,” “Beer is a tonic,” “It never did anyone any harm,” “It is good in faint,” “It is a medicine,” “It aids digestion.” All of these arguments can be refuted by facts which are on record as the findings of scientific research and are available to any home, in pamphlet, leaflet, and book form. Alcohol education has breadth and depths that we cannot explore in this article, but we would recommend, Syllabus in Alcohol Education by Bertha Rachel Palmer as excellent material for the use of teachers and pupils.

We may comment later on the part of the “church” and “legislation” in the liquor problem.

Opportunity No. III — The Church School

“We believe that God’s Spirit is given with a greater power, and more lavish kindness unto that servant who is found actively engaged in the study of the word of his Master, and earnestly trying to qualify himself for his duty.”—Editorial by Joseph Smith, in the True Latter Day Saints’ Herald, September 15, 1865.

AT YOUR DOOR

As far back as you can remember, there has always been a “Sunday school.” Indeed, it is something like an old friend. One tends to take it for granted, fails to appreciate it, even neglects it.

Sunday after Sunday your church school invites you to study, to participate in group discussions, to gain experience in teaching. Indeed, here is just what you’ve wanted, just what you’ve needed, just what the church asks you to do, that is—qualify as a “workman unashamed.” And this, right at your door.

FIFTY-TWO TIMES A YEAR

Fifty-two hours of classwork each year equals four standard leadership training courses. What could it mean for you in five years, in ten years?

MANY EXCELLENT COURSES

Let’s take a look at the current church school curriculum. You will be surprised at the splendid courses of study now available. Here are just a few of them:

THE BOOK OF MORMON FOR OUR DAY, by Reed Holmes, Arthur Oakman, C. B. Hartshorn	THE CHURCH AND HOME, by R. A. Cheville, Alice Burgess, F. M. McDowell, and others
OVERVIEWS OF LATTER DAY SAINTISM, by F. H. Edwards, R. A. Cheville, M. L. Draper	BIBLE STUDIES, by Thelona Stevens
BLUEPRINTS FOR ABUNDANT LIVING, by Jerry Runkle, Olive Mortimore, E. J. Gleazer, Jr., Harry Lorance	BOOK OF MORMON STUDIES, by Thelona Stevens
FUNDAMENTALS, by F. H. Edwards	RESTORATION: A STUDY IN PROPHECY, by Elbert A. Smith
	THE BIBLE IN EVERYDAY LIVING, by R. A. Cheville

“THE KINGDOM TARRIES LONG”

Sometimes our men believe that the church school has something of value only to the women and children. Far too many attend merely to “play at school,” without advanced preparation and with little sincere desire to learn. This, while branches languish, while the sheep of the fold stray away and are lost for want of good shepherds.

On every hand we hear, “The work of the kingdom awaits a qualified priesthood.” Such qualifying does not come through wishful thinking or magic. Its price is a diligent pursuit of learning—“By study and by faith.”

The church school provides one of the very best opportunities in your branch for systematic study. Opportunity knocks now.

Unto All People

And again this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations.

MARK GIVES US the divine commission in these words: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Matthew expresses it: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations."

In 1829 this commission was given again: "They are called to go into all the world to preach my gospel unto every creature." Ours has always been a missionary church. It was founded upon the call to witness to the world.

From the recent General Conference came the call once more but with greater emphasis than ever before. In the conference report of the First Presidency, we read, "These surveys have also indicated once more that we are a missionary church. We have no alternative. We proselyte, or we die." We who were permitted to attend came away from this conference feeling deeply the spirit of the challenge of this call that comes to evangelize the world. The revelation to the conference tells us that the "hastening time" is here. Our time is short.

Local witnessing to neighbors and friends is now going forward with greater zeal than it has for years. Along with warning our neighbor, we must not forget our responsibility to the nations of the world. Four months of the eighteen-month period until the next General Conference convenes have already gone by. Our time becomes shorter in which to meet this challenge.

IT IS EASY to witness to our friends and neighbors with whom we daily come in contact. We feel that we know and understand them. It is not going to be as easy to take the gospel to other nations and races.

George C. Marshall observed that we must take the nations of the world as they are, with their human passions and prejudices and differences, and find some way to secure a peaceful world. We already have that way through the gospel message of brotherhood. Our success depends on how wisely we take this gospel of the kingdom to these people. The wisdom necessary will come only through understanding.

In Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21, we have a commandment that tells us how to acquire this understanding. We are admonished to study the doctrine of the kingdom that we may be instructed in all things pertaining to the kingdom of God that are expedient for us to understand—in other words, a perfect knowledge of the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants. In connection with what God has given, among other things, we are to acquire a knowledge of countries and of kingdoms "that ye may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again, to magnify the calling where unto I have called you, and the mission with which I have commissioned you."

Neither color nor race changes the basic needs of humanity. The whole world hungers for brotherhood. Richard Wright's Black Boy is a story of a young Negro who went about eager to find someone, black or white, brown or yellow, who would walk up to him and call him "brother." We can meet this hunger for brotherhood among other races with the spirit of brotherhood to be found only in the gospel message. To meet this need, we must learn to love all men regardless of race or color.

This could be our greatest problem and a stumbling block in this phase of our missionary effort. A few years ago in one of our services, a woman sat in front of me. She was very dark, and I thought for a time that she was of the colored race. Shortly a young Hawaiian girl who was attending Graceland College approached the woman, and I realized she was the girl's mother. One of our "good" sisters who was sitting next to the woman changed her seat at the earliest opportunity and made it plain to the woman by her actions why she was moving. The woman was so deeply hurt that my heart ached.

I have met others among our church people who would express themselves very freely against other races. Until we break this barrier down, we cannot hope to meet the challenge to evangelize the world.

MANY TIMES such prejudices have their beginning in some childhood experience we cannot even recall. I know from some impression I may have acquired as a child, I had a great and very real fear of Orientals. I would go out of my way to avoid passing them on the street. That fear continued with me through the years. From the letters I received from my son while he was stationed in Japan, I began to have a better understanding of these people. Then in one letter he told me of two young Japanese sisters who worked in military government and wanted to come to the States. They had been born here and would have no difficulty in being readmitted. He asked, "Would you receive them into our home for a visit and help them in the adjustment they would have to make?" I thought, what will I be called upon to do next? Will I have to have Japanese in my home when I have always been afraid of them? I could not refuse when he ended his letter by saying that he knew I would meet this situation the way I had every other that came my way.

My husband and I met them at the train with some very real misgivings. After they were in our home a few days, I learned to know and understand and love them. They came in December, and it seemed that I could pile all the blankets I had on their bed at night and still they were cold. They were already in bed one night when they told me that they were cold. I put another cover on the bed, and, as I did so, I gave the girl closest to me a hug as I would my own children when tucking them in for the night. I found that her yellow skin wasn't the least bit repulsive. She was as lovable as my own daughter. I had always felt that I loved all mankind, but that went only as far as my own little world—the white race. Here I was having an experience that made me realize the deepest meaning of love.

We can love other races, but to do so, we must understand them—their culture, their background, their hopes, their desires. There is much we must know about them before we can truly love them and want to take the gospel to them.

In Christ there is no East nor West,
In him no South nor North;
But one great fellowship of love
Throughout the whole wide earth.

We have a challenge to meet. This gospel of the kingdom must be preached in all the world for a witness unto all people.

Scorched Earth

Flames
Hot and searing;
Whole forests blazing in the night,
Withering with their breath.

Lick up tall timbers,
Crumble grass
Black and brown mixed,
Dry.

The earth is scorched,
But from the ashes
Springs next year's growth.

The 1949 Student Nurse Recruitment Campaign

The 1949 Student Nurse Recruitment Campaign got off to a good start on Friday, January 21, when the campaign committee met in the staff dining room of Nurses' Home at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital for luncheon and mapped a program aimed at recruiting forty nursing students for the fall class in the Sanitarium School of Nursing.

Miss Nelle Morgan, R. N., Director of Nurses at the Sanitarium and chairman of the committee, told the group that if the nation's need for nursing care is to be met, 60,000 students must be enrolled in the nation's nursing schools this year. She said that the Sanitarium can do its part by enrolling to its full capacity of forty new students annually.

The committee will work locally and through the church membership. Other members are Miss Gertrude E. Copeland, R. N., Sanitarium superintendent, and A. Neal Deaver, assistant superintendent; Miss Vida E. Butterworth, R. N., educational director of the nursing school; Mrs. G. H. Tousley, hospital librarian; Miss Lottie Coleman, R. N., Sanitarium Alumni representative; Mrs. Shankland Arnson, Women's Council, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints; Mrs. Charles E. Nickson; Mrs. N. Ray Carmichael; Elder Donald V. Lents, Sanitarium chaplain; Dr. Charles F. Grabske, medical staff member; Homer Clements, superintendent of Jackson County schools; Stanley Fike, and J. Orrin Moon.

"Your Sunday Morning Visitor"

The New Chaplain's Publication at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital

GOOD MORNING. How are you today? How can I help you this morning?" These are familiar morning greetings of Chaplain Lents as he calls on each of the one hundred thirty patients every morning at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. Chaplain Donald V. Lents is one of the very few full-time hospital chaplains in all of the hospitals in the middle west, and his greetings lend a cheering note to the early morning salutations each patient has come to expect.

On Sunday morning, January 2, 1949, the first issue of Your Sunday Morning Visitor was placed on the breakfast tray of every patient in the Sanitarium. This paper originates in the chaplain's office and brings to each patient a pastoral message from the chaplain, poems of cheer, meditation, and bits of humor . . . all intended to help each patient begin his Sunday with a worshipful thought and a happy outlook. The patient shown above reading her first copy of Your Sunday Morning Visitor is Sister Edith Lewis, wife of the late Apostle George Lewis. Sister Lewis is in the Sanitarium recovering from the injuries received at the time of their automobile accident.

The Fifth Gospel

By FLORENCE W. SIMMONS

WHAT IS BEAUTY? Does it live with us? There are some things about beauty that are easily understood. However, to arrive at the inference of beauty—what it means beyond “eye-appeal”—has been a rather erstwhile quest pursued by too few during the ages. I am not sure that it is not the sacred cup from which we drink the spiritual wine. An ancient prophet, Zechariah, draws this parallel when he states that the Shepherd would take two staves, “The one I called beauty” and that this staff was his covenant with Israel. Beauty issues on the wings of eternal principles—harmony, balance, rhythm, proportion, design, hue; wherever those principles are joyously applied, beauty results.

Our visible universe, and much of the audible, has given form to these rules for beauty. A glance, and silver gems set in the velvet of night meet our upward query as we step out of doors. From our window, we thrill to the sweep of the horizon and the grace of a white birch. In their observance of these principles for grace, the hosts about us, from grass to stars, pulsate with a testimonial of praise to the Creator of beauty from whence these laws proceed. This is more than a passing incident in the work of the great Artist. Our first historian of the Bible, Moses, attests to this faith-evoking fact in Genesis where he records that all things bear testimony of their Creator. Except where man has failed to co-operate with the use of these laws, beauty pervades the earth.

Why do we seek out the silent majesty of mountains and their mirror lakes? “Because,” we explain, “they give us a lift—we are rested by such an experience. They are beautiful!” An awareness of beauty takes us out of our old selves, our special ruts of attitude, and dresses the soul in a new suit of vision, aspiration, and joy. We are refreshed, we say, and sometimes let it go at that. We seek beauty because it satisfies a desire to be identified with that which is choice and superlative—that which we feel is the essence of our true natures.

February

February started out with the normal number of days, but Julius and Augustus Caesar confiscated a day each for July and August. In spite of its brevity, it sparkles with interest. It starts right off with Ground Hog Day. Did anyone ever see that hog?

Then it enters into Valentine Day activity, which reminds us all that it's nice to pause and remember our dear ones in a special way. Parties and get-togethers are friendlier because of the spirit of love traditional with the good Saint. There should be more Valentine Days; better yet, we should carry the spirit of St. Valentine in our hearts through the year.

February, above all, boasts the birthdays of the two great men of our nation—Lincoln and Washington. May we each pause in reflection and appreciation for the debts of gratitude we owe these fathers of our country.

By Lula Carmichael

WE TAKE the perfections in flower and shrub throughout nature so much for granted as ground covers for the earth that it would be worth-while to ask ourselves why man is and always has been surrounded by beauty. The answer is the ostensible secret of the ages; and when it is lived with, it enables the ultimate in splendor of character. We see autumn in the leaf and heaven's touch on the star. We hear the silver whisk of the wind riding low through the corn, the detached, crystal note of a bird severing the hush of night, and the brook at our feet whispering water-poetry over smoothed stones and past Trilliums at its bank. A trout gashes the stream in a liquid peal. We revel, quite unconsciously, as the willow whips, and its leaves spin in loveliness to a determined breeze. Beyond its power in childhood, do we sense all of this enough to keep pace with its high destiny in the fulfillment of our own lives? People are making virtual hegriras—taking flight to the country from urban homes to have restored to them from the peace of its beauty that which is lost where such beauty has been eliminated.

I assume you may have searched for the needle which, if it had been any closer, would have scratched your eye. When we are very close to our sewing, we sometimes fail to see our tools. Likewise, we have become so absorbed in our activities that we brush past the graces of our environment in a vast and quite intensive search for beauty. We are specializing in decorating, or in flower arrangement, perhaps drama, and when we are praised for the splendid script, we avoid mentioning the real author. We are standing too close to one phase to have a perspective of the beauty range—for personality.

Some of the oak leaves and asters we see, and even a bare limb whose grace of line lifts it out of the fleeting poverty of leaflessness, enunciate distinctly in universal language, “My beauty is from observance of the rules.” Every child hears the over-voice of beauty. Dr. Frank Crane, in one of his essays, wrote of this over-all aspect. The overtones heard from the piano are the vibrations from all of the notes in key to the one sounded. Without such a vibrato, there would be no unity and a great loss to beauty. Art teachers tell their students to make the colors vibrate—key them to each other so that the picture will have unity-plus and draw an aesthetic response from the onlooker.

We are keyed to beauty in some portion or to all of its vast range. Children, especially, are sensitized to it. They have not as yet become callous to beauty. Their surroundings are a daily discovery to them. Vivid still is my first memory of a flower. And since much of childhood was spent gathering flowers from the hills and fields about home, this first remembered venture must have been on an early morning. I came upon the flowering almonds quite unexpectedly as I turned the corner of the house, in what must have been a dazzling discovery, for there before me silvered with morning dew were those amazing, tiny balls of pink. What were these things quite out of my previous world experience? I was lifted to a nameless child-ecstasy. It was more than the fact of pink flowers that cast them in my memory forever. I was definitely hearing their over-voice; the echo of their grace was ringing in my own being as my own implanted heritage responded to the inference sounded. Like anyone respecting true beauty, I was exalted.

THE BEAUTIFUL has a cleansing effect upon us as we drink it in with its suggestions of grace. We see this adequacy in flower, the panoramic landscaping of the country. Its aesthetic standard helps to draw us up to it if we work with it for long. Flowers alone furnish examples of grace which would unite all of the earth in one whole of beauty. As we develop skills with flowers, shrubs, and trees, we find that this art takes us to a high ground free from human distempers. The common social ills, the petty and mean, are inclined to vanish under the rays of its inspiration; in such good company, we express to an increasing extent the results of their influence—the glory we find in them.

The classic in nature, that which stimulates us to complete awareness of our own golden endowment as our heritage from the Creator of beauty, is the open secret of living—secret, since it is implied, and many have not awakened to it, yet open, because it is the apparent message to us for a guide to gracious living. An analysis of the principles of art; harmony, balance, proportion, et cetera, and of the love that brought their expression so joyously to us on this tenant planet, provides the code to the art of living fully and well. Apostle Arthur Oakman tells of the man who, in a special experience, saw that design, color, music, and a child were all keyed to the same harmony in a certain ideal situation.

I have a picture bearing the title, "The Temple of Art." One sees the genius of an artist who was impelled to illustrate the highest form of beauty. He may have read: "And now are ye living temples . . ." We see a human figure with all that is worthy written into her countenance looking compassionately down from her mountain. There is indeed a fifth gospel whose sermons consist of demonstrations and whose language is not sealed to any race. It is the gospel of beauty.

When we take this inference of beauty from our gardens and transmute it into the coin of justice and fellow-compassion in our relations at home and abroad, we will find ourselves approaching the suburbs of that city toward which the ages have moved in the sacred vow made in man's morning, that, "when thy posterity shall embrace the truth, and look upward, then shall Zion look downward, and all the heavens shall shake with gladness, and the earth shall tremble with joy; and the general assembly of the church of the first-born shall come down out of heaven, and possess the earth."

We stand upon the threshold of a new era when man and the things he makes will be beautiful. Let us open our minds and hearts to beauty now.

"Today Is Cash" By Marie Gosline

SOMEONE ONCE SAID, "Yesterday is a canceled check; tomorrow is a promissory note; but today is cash. Spend it, and spend it wisely."

Too many of us put off until tomorrow those good deeds which should be done today. Too many of us wait, like the old colored woman, to the last minute before we "get right" with God. I cannot forget what she said to her mistress, who inquired about Mandy's sister who had been ill. "She died, Ma'am," said Mandy. "Yes'm. She sho' did. She died befo' she could get right. Ah sho' hopes ah doesn't go that quick. Ah's got a little house cleanin' a' mine own to do." Mandy wanted to do her sinnin' right up until the last minute.

So, with the beginning of the new year, it is wise for us to take inventories of ourselves to see where we stand. We can do nothing about the yesterdays. They are "canceled checks." It is too late to change them, so let's forget them. Let's forget the year's sorrows, its trials, its temptations. Let's forget our idle gossip, our faultfinding, our grudges.

Let us not worry too much about tomorrow, for it is just a "promissory note." Tomorrow isn't here yet, and most of our worries never happen.

But do let us concern ourselves with today, for "today is cash." Let us, just for today, not allow hate, jealousy, and selfishness to be masters of our souls. Let us, just for today, find at least some one person whose burden we may make a little lighter. If we do not have the ready money with which to lend a helping hand, let's bring a few of those smiles and cheery greetings out of the cellar—just for today.

"Today is cash!" Let's "spend it, and spend it wisely."

Fads and Fashions of 1999

I WONDER what life will be like fifty years from today. Will we walk to work—or will that be considered old-fashioned? Perhaps we'll have only a twenty-hour week. Maybe the boss will give orders on his television set. And then, too, we might not have to cook. It could be that home dispensers would give out tastier meals than even Grandma could boast.

It sounds a little foolish, doesn't it? But I was thinking of the changes that have occurred in the last half century, and even more noticeably in the last twenty-five years or so. I can still remember how thrilled I was as a child when I fastened on some heavy earphones and heard my first radio program. Only two of us could listen at the same time, because there were just two sets of earphones. Sounds strange, doesn't it? What did it matter at our first "talk-ie" that the sound and action didn't quite coincide? And who could forget the pride of the family—the Model T? It was just forty-five years ago that the lumbering Kitty Hawk climbed into the air. Now jet-propelled planes zoom along at amazing speed, and they'll up that shortly. A recent news item stated that it is reported a rocket ship is being constructed under government contract with the intent of launching an expedition to the moon within the next three years. I suppose regular interplanetary communication will be established in no time. Nor is the idea so fantastic as it sounds. In Columbus' day, the American continent was as far removed from the then known world as is the moon from us today. This is the day of scientific miracles, and discoveries are rapid and startling.

IT IS ALWAYS INTERESTING to observe how the ideas and opinions of a people are influenced by the changes in their physical life. The more their labors are eased, giving them greater freedom, the more relaxed become their social habits and customs. Some of these changes that occur in such transitional periods better society, and some eat away the strong foundations. The amazing thing is that although fifty years is such a short fragment of a span of national life, the transitions in social thought are so subtle that we don't even recognize how much we have departed from our original opinions until we look back into the archives and read the records.

Of course, some changes are obviously apparent. In 1949 the home is no longer the core of social entertainment. In fact, we are so seldom there any more that one gentleman aptly expressed it this way the other day: "My wife and I both work. Our three sons are in school.

We are so busy with civic responsibilities that we never see each other any more. Now if we could just get rid of our home, we could save a lot of unnecessary expense”—and his jest crystallized much of the current thought about homes. Men and women both share in the deterioration of modern marriages. Fifty years ago, divorce was not so frequent nor so glamorized as now.

Other earmarks of such changes are commonplace. It used to be that a woman would have been disgraced to have been seen smoking in public, and only a bar fly would have been caught in a saloon. But now, of course, the saloon has given way to the elegance of the cocktail lounge—and, unfortunately, to many the two seem totally unrelated.

It may seem inaccurate to point to a few social customs and say our way of living is different now, but all of these seemingly superficial changes are signposts of intrinsic mutations that have occurred in building our complex structure of society. Parallel with these undesirable changes, however, has come an educational and cultural enlightenment that has enriched the life of the nation. Change was an inherent principle established in the creation, and in the evolution of society, it is natural that both progress and regression shall occur.

NOR HAVE WE in the church been immune to the processes of change. Did you know that in the days of Nauvoo there were those who were much concerned because so many of the young people were engaging in “that frivolous pastime of playing the piano and other follies likely to lead youth astray”? And you know what many thought about using the “fiddle” in church! Reunion schedules of a generation ago boasted no recreation program. There was preaching all morning, a sermon in the afternoon—and then, perhaps for variety, the camp band would give a concert. This is not said in the voice of ridicule. These examples are cited only to show that in the church, we too have changed

The Earth and the Fullness Thereof

By FRANCES M. MILLS

And I, God, created man in mine own image, in the image of mine Only Begotten created I him; male and female created I them.

And I, God, blessed them, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

And I, God, said unto man, Behold, I have given you every herb, bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth; and every tree in the which shall be the fruit of a tree, yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat.

And to every beast of the earth, and shall surely continue to do so. It is well that we constantly reinterpret our message to more effectively minister to each generation.

One thought keeps recurring to me—that the points of issue that seem so vital to us now may be amusing to others in 1999. We are so close to our problems of decision now that they loom large. Fifty years from now they may seem trivial. But that does not lessen our immediate responsibilities. We need to think through our problems not only in the light of modern needs, but with an eye to the security of future generations. In 1949, we can smile at the gravity of our church fathers because we have come to no harm resulting from their decisions. We have expanded upon their foundations and have found joy in our church life. In 1999, what will they say of us?

and to every fowl of the air, and to everything that creepeth upon the earth, wherein I grant life, there shall be given every clean herb for meat; and it was so, even as I spake.

And I, God, saw everything that I had made, and behold, all things which I had made were very good.

—Genesis 1: 29-33.

A MAN gave his son a new toy. It was bright and shining. The next day the boy brought the toy, now bent and broken, to his father and said,

“Give me a new toy, Daddy. This one won’t run any more.”

God gave his children the earth to live upon. In the beginning, it was new and beautiful. A few thousand years passed—and now what? You can read the sad story of destruction in any soil and forest conservation report.

And when man goes again to his Maker, will he say, “Father, give me a new earth. This one isn’t any good any more”?

Read Road to Survival by William Vogt, and then read Malabar Farm by Louis Bromfield. The first-named book will tell you the plain truth about what is happening today, here and elsewhere. The second book shows a renaissance of conscience among landowners and tells graphically the steps that can be taken to bring again to our vanishing soil the fertility God meant it to have.

Does It Make Any Difference Which Church You Belong To?

this country to try to raise funds to build a theological school in Norway. During his travels in this country, he came in contact with the Pentecostal movement in California. While attending the meetings of that church, he claimed to have received the Holy Ghost and the gift to speak in unknown tongues. He returned to Norway and organized the first Pentecostal Church in that country at Oslo. I heard him say in one of his sermons that when he organized the church in Norway he intended to eventually have apostles in it, but when he gave the matter further study, he could not decide whether he should have twelve apostles in each local congregation or just twelve apostles at a time in the whole Pentecostal movement. He didn't know, either, just how the apostles should be chosen. Because of the many problems involved, he said he decided to leave apostles out of the structural organization of his church. He decided to leave them out! God didn't have anything to do with it. I challenge the right of any man who claims to be organizing the church of Jesus Christ to disregard the form of organization Christ used in his New Testament church and to throw out any of the offices he may choose to discard. But this is the procedure which has been followed by most church-builders. When God commanded Joseph Smith to establish this church, he instructed him to use the same form of organization used by Christ. I believe I can say without fear of successful contradiction that the Reorganized Church of Jesus-Christ of Latter Day Saints is the only church on earth today that has the same form of organization as the New Testament church. Does it make any difference which church you belong to? "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it."

THE CHURCH is an organism, not merely an organization. It has structural form, but it is more than officers, rites, and laws. It is a living form, pulsating with life-giving, spiritual forces. The church is blessed with light and truth—the gift of the Holy Spirit. God, through the Holy Spirit, moves in his church, directing it, speaking to it, blessing its members, and giving them spiritual experiences. Does that make any difference?

There are plenty of people in the Christian world who ridicule the idea of God's speaking today. They believe he did speak in Bible times but that he doesn't today. In other words, they believe in a God who has changed. Latter Day Saints don't worship such a God as that. The gifts and blessings enjoyed by the ancient children of God are still to be found among us today. The spiritual gifts of revelation, prophecy, tongues, healing, etc., are experienced by members of the church today. To have a divinely-called ministry, God must speak today. Otherwise, "man taketh this honor unto himself."

I could go on pointing out the beauties and truths of Latter Day Saintism such as a divinely-called priesthood, a unique law of tithing (the only church that teaches its members to pay a tenth of their annual increase rather than a tenth of their gross income), a program of stewardships, a Zionitic program which includes and leads to the building of the kingdom of God in order that the will of God might be done on earth as it is done in heaven, but what I have presented should be sufficient to capture your imagination and interest.

This divinely called priesthood consists of several sets of officers in the local as well as the general church, such as elders, priests, teachers, deacons, high priests, bishops, seventies, apostles, and prophets. Each of these sets of officers has its special duties to perform either in administrative, missionary, pastoral work, or ministry in the homes of the Saints. It is indeed a beautiful and practical organization set up by God himself, and if the time ever comes when every member of the priesthood will function in his office as God intended he should, the members will be ministered to in such a manner that their spiritual development will be great and rapid. It is then we may become worthy to be instruments in the hands of God in building his kingdom.

Yes, we have a religion that is worthwhile—one that challenges us, one that will bring the best out of us if we will let it. Ours is a religion that will help us to live more abundantly here as well as hereafter and to serve our fellow men in a bigger and better way, ours is a religion that will bring to us eternal life in the presence of God.

DOES IT MAKE ANY difference which church you belong to? I believe with all my heart that we have more light and truth than any other religious organization on earth. We desire to share that light and truth with just as many people as possible. Therefore we invite our neighbors, friends, and loved ones to attend our services, investigate our claims, and eventually unite with the church, not only to work out their own salvation but to assist us in the unfinished task of preaching the gospel in all the world and in building the kingdom of God.

Does it make any difference? What do you think?

Great Sails and Their Faith

provided him a welcome home four years. Martin Harris died on July 10, 1875, at the age of ninety-two. At Clarkston, hundreds of his admirers visited and shared the counsel and testimony he enjoyed relating, even to his closing days. It is reported that the "great soul" earnestly requested that when his body was prepared for burial that a Book of Mormon be clasped in his right hand and placed over his heart. This request was granted.

When little children are so poorly taught and disciplined that the neighbors dread to have the family come, even for a social call, they are terribly handicapped. All this and more I have seen in my ministry.

Children have the right to expect from parents such intelligent training and discipline as will prepare them to be honest, truthful, unselfish, considerate of others, lovers of God, seekers for righteousness, and laborers for the kingdom.

Perhaps the counsel given to the church long ago is still good advice for some today. "Now, I, the Lord, am not well pleased with the inhabitants of Zion, for there are idlers among them; and their children are also growing up in wickedness; they also seek not earnestly the riches of eternity, but their eyes are full of greediness. These things ought not to be, and must be done away from among them."

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA.—Seventy George Njeim held a series of meetings the week of October 17, concluding on October 24, which was the annual branch rally day. Mrs. Mildred Tannehill and her son, Jerry Tannehill, were baptized and confirmed on November 7. Lola Mae, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Keith Jacks, was blessed on November 14.

The branch has purchased a mimeograph machine, which was made possible largely through the efforts of the Zion's League and the women's department. The League gave a play in December, donating the receipts to this fund.

Pastor and Mrs. Myron R. Schall observed their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary on the evening of December 23 with a ceremony and reception at the church. They were attended by their son and daughter, Lawrence R. and Celia May Schall, and Miss LaVon Elam of San Jose, California. Elder Laurence MacDonald was the officiating minister.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—The St. Louis district conference was held January 15 and 16. Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Sr., spoke at 11 o'clock Sunday on the theme of the conference: "I Will Arise." An attendance of 416 were at this service. On Sunday afternoon, Pastor Frank McDonald of St. Louis addressed the conference on the same theme.

At a business meeting the night before, the district voted to support the annual Brush Creek, Illinois, reunion. A year-round camping area for the district is being sought. After the meeting, the Zion's Leagues of the district entertained with skits and refreshments.

Classes in physical hygiene were held Sunday morning between the prayer services and the preaching service. These classes were for young people twelve to eighteen years old. The girls were instructed by Florence Nowak and Lily Ng, student nurses on extension from the Independence Sanitarium. The boys' instructor was the Reverend Mr. Van Nostrand, professor of child psychology at Shurtleff College, Alton, Illinois. Adult classes on other subjects were held at the same time.

RICHLAND, WASHINGTON.—The Richland, Washington, Mission became a branch November 29 under the direction of Apostle C. G. Mesley, Seventy Arthur F. Gibbs, Seventy Phillip Moore, Bishop Monte Lasater, and Elder L. A. Whiting, pastor of the congregation. There are nineteen members of the priesthood and sixty-nine families who will become the charter members of the Richland Branch. Plans are being drawn for a church building to be built on a choice location granted by the Atomic Energy Commission.

WALTHILL, NEBRASKA.—Three babies were blessed in the Walthill Branch during December and January: Jenny Lynn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Wright of Iowa City, Iowa; Kenneth Eugene, son of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Schlotman of Walthill; Constance Jerene, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Raymond E. VAN NUYS, CALIFORNIA.—G. E. Tickemyer, president of the newly organized Los Angeles Metropolitan District, announces the organization of a new mission at Van Nuys, California. Meetings will be held temporarily in the Moose Lodge near Sepulveda and Burbank Boulevards beginning February 6. Elder Glen E. Davis will be the pastor. Thirty members living in the area have participated in preliminary meetings. Members having friends or relatives in the San Fernando Valley are requested to send their names to Pastor Glen E. Davis, 6911 Garden Grove, Reseda, California.

This is the third mission to be organized in the Los Angeles area the past year. A lot was acquired in January at Vienna Way and Walgrove in Venice, California, for the erection of a church building for the Venice Mission. Construction is planned for this year.

GUELPH, ONTARIO.—Attendance at church school during the past year averaged forty. The church has been redecorated and a modern heating system has been installed. New rugs for the aisles were purchased by the women's department. An electric organ and a communion table have been fully paid for. The women meet regularly on the first and third Thursdays of each month. They are raising money to provide a new kitchen for the church by holdings bazaars, bake and rummage sales. Recent ordinations include George Morden, priest, and Ernest Hall, deacon. A watch night service was held on New Year's Eve from 11:30 to 12 o'clock. Following this fellowship, the young people enjoyed a social at the Kennedy home, and the adults were invited to a "Scotch repast" at the John Walker home. On January 9, Brother and Sister Walker told of their trip to Palmyra, describing the homestead and surrounding scenes. Out-of-town speakers during the year have been Editor Leonard Lea, Apostles Wallace Smith and Percy Farrow.

TUCSON, ARIZONA.—A new class, the older young people's class, was organized on September 12; this makes a total of eight classes in the church school division. Mr. and Mrs. Sheffer and Heber Calvin took a missionary tour through New Mexico and Texas in December contacting the isolated families and administering to their needs. Mr. and Mrs. O. A. Curry returned from Council Bluffs, Iowa, and held cottage meetings from December 9 to 16. Open house was held in their honor on Sunday, January 16, at the Arthur Donn home.

POPLAR BLUFF, MISSOURI.—The service of December 26 centered around the blessing of two children. Edward Burl Dortch, Jr., infant son of Edward and Mary Dortch, and Clayton Wayne Hastings, son of Clayton and Peggy Hastings, were blessed by Elders C. W. Germon and W. P. Creveston. Both are the grandchildren of Priest Robert Dortch.

MCKENZIE, ALABAMA.—The semi-annual district conference was held on January 15 and 16 with many from Mississippi, Florida, and Alabama attending. The theme, "We Launch the Year's Work," was introduced at the opening fellowship service at 9 a.m., Saturday. Classes were conducted by the following: Maurine Crownover and Fairy Wise, children; Franklin Steiner and A. V. Peavy, young people; W. J. Breshears and Lula Jernigan, women; A. O. Crownover, men and youth camp workshop; W. Wallace Smith, general; Helen McCall, music; and W. J. Breshears, church school. Elder Crownover gave the Saturday evening sermon. Sunday's activities included an 8 a.m. fellowship service with Elder Breshears in charge; church school from 9:45 to 10:45, with Franklin Steiner, A. D. McCall, and Maurine Crownover as teachers; a sermon by Apostle Smith at 11; and the district business meeting at 1:30 in the afternoon.

Beautiful Englewood Church

NEWS AND NOTES

"The Englewood R. L. D. S. church on Northern Boulevard," you say to the cab driver when you want to go there, and he knows where it is.

The favorite Independence church for weddings and social affairs of the younger set, our beautiful Englewood church has brought many expressions of admiration. We are particularly proud of it and of the people who worship there.

Here is an instance where the congregation worked closely with general church officers in planning, financing, and building, and the result is something that will still be strong and beautiful a hundred years from now, under normal conditions.

For many years the congregation worshiped in the basement, enduring crowded conditions and many other difficulties, while waiting for adverse building conditions to improve, and accumulating reserves in the building fund. Then, under the guidance of general church officers and with assistance on the financial problem the Englewood Saints began building. For more than a year, they have been waiting for pews, using metal folding chairs.

A volunteer pastor, Ted Paxton Scott, is now serving the congregation with the help of a number of able men in the local priesthood. It is his first pastorate, and he is succeeding very well.

Visitors to Independence, particularly those interested in houses of worship for their own congregations, will be welcome to visit and inspect this church at any regular service.

POSTING MACHINE BUSY

Bishop Walter N. Johnson reports that the tithepayers' service department in The Auditorium is busy preparing statements of General Church contributions, so they can be mailed to individuals early in March. After the reports for December come in from Bishop's Agents throughout the church, they go through an accounting procedure, and the receipts go to the tithepayers' service department where the amounts are posted on individual ledger sheets. Every effort is made to keep the posting machine busy nine hours a day, so the statements will be on time.

ELDERS' QUORUMS

Two elders' quorums have been reorganized in Independence, Missouri. Ralph Freeman was elected, ordained, and set apart as the president of the First Quorum. His counselors, also elected, ordained, and set apart, are Ronald Sherman and Cecil Walker. Clyde Baker, president of the Second Quorum, was set in office in the same way. His counselors are Monte Parker and Paul Kelsey. An elders' priesthood institute will be held March 24 and 25 for two hours each evening.

IN COLUMBUS, OHIO

John Darling of the Department of Religious Education attended the annual meeting of the International Council of Religious Education at Columbus, Ohio, where he was privileged to attend a demonstration school of the Character Education Program projected by Ernest Ligon. Brother Darling remained in Ohio after the conference to minister in Columbus and Springfield, Ohio.

DEAN OF SCHOOL

Charles V. Graham, supervisor in Zion, is the dean of an interdenominational teachers and training school being held in Independence. It has been meeting each Monday night in the Presbyterian church, beginning January 17 and ending February 28. Director of Youth Activities Carl Mesle has been instructing a class in the school on youth work. The fellowship and good will resulting from meeting with people of other faiths has proved gratifying.

GLEAZER IN CENTER PLACE

Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Sr., has been working in the center place, becoming acquainted with the situation in the stakes. He attended the Lamoni Stake Conference, February 13, and has been in the Southeastern Illinois District, visiting branches and introducing Sylvester Coleman, new appointee to that field.

WALLACE SMITH IN INDEPENDENCE

Apostle Wallace Smith of the Southern Mission was in Independence, February 4 and 5. He was in St. Joseph, Missouri, on February 6 and left for his mission in the south on February 9.

D. T. WILLIAMS IN IOWA CITY, IOWA

Apostle D. T. Williams was in Iowa City, Iowa, over the week end of February 20 to attend to the ordination of Elder Walter Daykin to the office of evangelist, as provided for at the General Conference in October. Apostle Williams also met with the students of the University of Iowa in that city.

Our Educational Program

It would not have been hard for a visitor in Independence, on a recent Tuesday evening, to imagine that he was on the campus of a thriving small college rather than in the neighborhood of Stone Church and its associated buildings. Lights were blazing cheerfully, and crowds of people were assembling in three different parts of Stone Church, in the Women's Center, and in Bartholomew Hall. One wandering editor, looking for the meeting of the group he was to instruct, had to make a number of inquiries to find the right place.

"What's going on here?" he wanted to know, and the next day called Charles V. Graham, Supervisor in Zion. Brother Graham had the answers, which should be of considerable interest to our readers, and especially to those who like to know what is happening at headquarters.

The main event for the evening—and it is only typical of the extent to which our church buildings are used constantly—was the second six-week series of classes for the Aaronic Priesthood Training School, which was initiated under the Presiding Bishopric, and is now being carried on with the co-operation of all local church officers. The theme for the first six-week series was "Building Latter Day Saint Family Life." The theme for the present series is, "Church and Home Working Together." There are 298 men of the Aaronic priesthood in attendance at present.

A second educational effort is the Melchisedec Priesthood Institute being conducted by the two quorums of that order here. Dr. Charles F. Grabske, Church Physician, is instructing them on "Maintaining Family Health." Chaplain Don V. Lents, of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, is lecturing on "Administration to the Sick."

A third educational feature is the Pastoral Training School, conducted by the officers of Zion, Kansas City Stake, and Central Missouri Stake. Once a month, a group of seventy-five men meet at Englewood church for studies in pastoral administration.

A fourth feature is the city-wide Book of Mormon class that meets each week for instruction by Thelona Stevens. About 150 is the average attendance.

The fifth feature is classwork once a month under the Department of Women with studies in "The Family Altar," and "Building Zion Homes." Practical work is given in the preparation of materials and programs.

Such activities are encouraging to those who have realized that we must have a trained and consecrated people if we are to build our ideal of Zion, Christian community life. And the only means at our disposal for training people is an adult education program.

In Defense of Human Right

The treatment of Cardinal Mindszenty of Hungary during his recent trial, if reported correctly, is a revolting example of the violation of human rights. The secrecy of the "Iron Curtain" prevents verification, but the pattern of what the reports indicate is already familiar in earlier accounts coming out of Communist dominated countries in spite of the censorship. In numbers of these other cases, torture and drugs have been used to obtain confessions of guilt that even the most gullible would find it hard to believe genuine. Some observers think that Mindszenty was subjected to the standard Communist routine.

We should keep the main point in mind and not be diverted by extraneous factors. The treatment of Mindszenty is an outrage, not because he is a Roman Catholic, not because he is a cardinal, but because he is a human being. No person should be treated this way, regardless of his faith, position, or degree of importance. In matters of human right, the humblest are as important as the greatest.

It is just as evil that untold numbers of Russians, many of them members of the Communist Party, have been forced to go through this kind of experience. And if the Communists will do that in Russia and Hungary, they will do it in the United States if they get a chance.

The practice of torture is not confined to any one age or any one kind of people. It is likely to appear at any time and in any place where leaders, motivated by hatred, fear, and doctrinaire intolerance, acquire despotic power. Torture in its worst forms was used in Germany under Hitler. Other examples in great numbers could be cited.

In the case of Cardinal Mindszenty, the Roman Catholic Church, complaining so pitifully, is not guiltless. That church, through its subsidiary organizations and its "secular arm" tortured and burned countless "heretics" in past centuries; and, since its principles do not change, no one knows what it might do in the future if given an opportunity.

Civilized people must contend for all human rights if they are to preserve their own. As long as there is any case of torture and injustice in the world, our own freedom and security, and that of every minority, are imperiled.

As a people whose forebears suffered terribly from persecution and violence, we must do all we can to keep alive the spirit of the Bill of Rights in our American Constitution.

"Remember"

Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ; as obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance; but as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written Be ye holy; for I am holy. And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear: forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot: who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world but was manifest in these last times for you, who by him do believe in God, that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God.—I Peter 1: 13-21.

For God so loved the world, that he gave his Only Begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved. He who believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the name of the Only Begotten Son of God And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. For everyone who doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But he who loveth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest.—John 3: 16-21.

I WANT TO RECALL to your remembrance some of the things which I hope will help each of us to be better men and women and better members of this church. One hundred eighteen years ago, this church was organized. As our national flag was brought down the aisle today, I was thrilled to see it and the flag of the church beside it, and then to see the flags of the nations as they were unfurled from the balcony, and to realize that in our thinking today, more than ever before, there is a realization that we as a people have a responsibility to these flags—or at least to the people that these flags represent. "Of every nation of the world" . . . it does my heart good to think about this and to realize that I am to have some part in spreading this gospel to those nations of the world, and that all of you have an opportunity to do the same thing. We think about our flag, and we know it is a symbol of the nation and of the principles we represent: freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from want, and freedom from fear. These things were brought to the attention of many millions of people in the last several months as the Freedom Train wended its way across the continent and back and up and down, carrying for public examination the great original documents that assure the people of the United States some of these freedoms. We were glad when we had an opportunity to have some of those things called to our attention and to realize that in them there are opportunities that we have as a people. We realize that freedom of religion gives to us, as members of this church, the opportunity to worship as we see fit under God. If it were not for that today, we perhaps could not have this marvelous gathering of the Saints we have here in this center place, where we can all come together and have fellowship with each other and with God as he reveals to us his divine will and the purpose in us he would like to see fulfilled.

The document which has just come to us is an indication of God's mind and will today, and it reminds us that he speaks to his people now as well as he did in times past. It has been some two thousand years ago—and that's a long time, perhaps too long for any one person to remember—since the Bible was handed down to us to help us to recall, to help us to bring back into our memory, the things that happened so long ago.

Additional information is coming to light in Mexico and Central America today which brings again to our memory something else that we were conscious of as we read our Bible. Wouldn't it be marvelous if today there could be uncovered in these countries where the original church was founded additional writings of the Apostle Paul which would give us additional assurance that Jesus was there and walked and communed with these people at that time. I am sure we would accept it if it could be authenticated as an additional witness to us of the divinity of Christ.

Yet today, as we go down into Mexico and Central America and uncover some of the archaeological wonders of the world and make a study of them and have them brought to us by learned men of our church and of others, there comes a realization that here indeed is another witness for Christ in America. I wonder why it is that we as a people are not as diligent in witnessing for this particular record as we are in assuring people that the Christ was here and that he did walk and talk with us after he had been with those people in the early days? These things I would like to have you remember. Additional information is coming to us everyday to corroborate the story of the Book of Mormon. Today, in the courts of law, it is only necessary to produce one witness in some cases to indict a man and perhaps send him to his death for certain types of crime. One witness is sufficient to do that. And yet as we look into our Book of Mormon and the record we have in it, we find there were three witnesses to the fact that these plates were as they were

By Apostle W. Wallace Smith

and that an angel came down and talked to these people. There were eight witnesses in addition to these, making eleven in all testifying to the truthfulness of this document that we have left to us. Yet there are those who will refuse to be diligent telling the world of this record we have. I'm saying to you at this time that this indicts us as a people if we refuse to be a witness in this latter day. Regardless of our place or station in the church, this is part of our responsibility.

WE MUST REMEMBER CHRIST and his teachings. He has been called many names in the past. Some of these are Lord, Savior, King, Priest, High Priest, Mediator, the Mighty God, the Prince of Peace, the Everlasting Father. But there is another name given to him that I would like to call to your attention—that is Redeemer. He was the redeemer of all mankind; he came that we might have life and that we might have it more abundantly. He came to redeem mankind from sin.

In the time when half the world was free and the other half, slave, it was the custom, if anyone was to be redeemed from his slavery, that a friend or a relative or someone who was near or dear to him had the opportunity to ransom him from slavery by a payment of money—perhaps gold, precious stones, or something else of value. Someone was concerned about the life of that person who was under slavery. Therefore, we must think about the Christ who paid the price of our redemption with his life. Even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, the Son of God was expendable. He spent his life bringing to the people of his day an interpretation of God's word, and he left an impress upon the world of that day which has come down these many years to us. The Christ laid down his life as a ransom for many.

Christ had his temptations. He was tempted of man, and he faced those temptations even as you and I do today. He was faced with the temptation of establishing the kingdom of God ways other than that of his Heavenly Father. God had given him his agency, even as he gives us our agency. What we do with our lives is largely up to us, depending somewhat upon our environment, somewhat upon the type of home in which we spend our early childhood and youth; still we have our agency and are ready to choose.

The first temptation that came to the Christ was the temptation in the wilderness to use God's power (or the power given to him by God) for selfish purposes—to supply secondary needs. He was tempted to turn the rocks into bread that he might eat. Jesus felt this temptation to use for selfish purposes his God-given power, but he refused to yield to it.

The next temptation that came to him was the temptation to use this power presumptuously, demonstrating that he was the Son of God by a great public display or an exhibition unrelated to any human need. Here the appeal was to the sensationalism, and today we find people who are looking for just this thing. For us in the modern age, it is much the same. There are temptations to seek this kingdom of the world and to add glory by serving the devil in the hope that we can use our power to serve God.

WE WERE TOLD in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 119, that all are called according to the gifts of God unto them, and that they shall work together—the men of the ministry and the men of the affairs of the world. How many of you know someone in the affairs of the world who has put off serving his God until he could make a fortune, or some who have been engaged in an illicit sale of liquors, making money that perhaps later on he might use to serve God?

These temptations come to us. They came to the people in the early days, and we have in the Bible a record of just such a thing. A man was tempted to tear down his barns and build larger ones so he would have more room for his grain and for the harvest that should come in; and there came to him this statement: "This night is thy life required of thee." Then to what purpose was his larger granaries, his larger barns, his larger storehouses?

Each of us faces this thing today. Each of us faces the temptation to build the kingdom by some other means—to slip up the back way into the kingdom of heaven. Temptations come to good people—temptations to climb up this other way—as well as to bad people. Temptations come to build the kingdom of God by ungodly ways. Temptations come to let the moment obscure the vision of eternity. The Saints' temptation to stop righteousness, I think, is, perhaps, just as great as the temptation of self-indulgence to the drunkard, and it is one thing we must guard against in our lives today. We must seek assiduously to follow the teachings of our Christ. For all of us today, the enemy of the best is not the worst; it is the second best. If we accept anything but the best, we are sinning.

GEORGE ELIOT, an English novelist, elaborated on this principle of redemption. She told about the time when the world was half slave and half free, and there were those who, by their precious stones and their gold and silver, had the opportunity of redeeming their loved ones from bondage. She wrote a novel about a rich father and his son who were captured. As the son saw a chance to escape, the father, collaborating with him, gave to him

Changes in Editorial Staff

We are pleased to announce that beginning February 1, Elder Leonard J. Lea became associate editor of the Herald, and Elder Chris B. Hartshorn became managing editor of church publications.

Brother Lea has served since 1930 as managing editor, and we extend to him our thanks and appreciation for a very splendid service to the church during the intervening years, some of them marked by many difficulties. In addition to his services as associate editor of the Herald, Brother Lea will have editorial responsibility in connection with church books and tracts.

Brother Hartshorn came to the Herald office in 1945 and has served efficiently as editor of the church school publications. In addition to this responsibility, he will now serve as managing editor of the Herald and other publications.

The action taken is a recognition of meritorious service and an enlargement of opportunity for each of these brethren.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith

District President, Spokane District

Elder Ralph Briggs having resigned as president of the Spokane District on account of a transfer of his business affairs to Salt Lake City, we hereby appoint to succeed him Elder Carl Hammil of North Richland, Washington. This action is subject to the approval of the district conference.

We ask for Brother Hammil the earnest co-operation of the Saints in that district.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith

Across the Desk

By the First Presidency

Brother Eugene A. Theys has sent us a comprehensive report of the work of the German mission. This report indicates vigorous missionary growth in practically all the branches and missions of the field. The official computation shows 128 baptisms in 1947, 365 baptisms in 1948. Statistical records are being brought up to date after so many of them were lost or destroyed during the war, and these will probably indicate a total membership of about 1,500 in Germany.

The report is too long to quote in full, but Herald readers will be especially interested in a paragraph which tells of the conversion and baptism of Brother and Sister Georg Baier of Nürnberg, and then goes on:

Since the Baiers came into the picture, they felt that the group should have instrumental music, so they went out and bought an organ. Not having anyone to play the organ in the group, they went out and hired a man to come in and develop a choir and play the organ. In the meantime, Brother Baier and others were looking around for a good musician to convert; they felt that the man they hired wasn't interested in religion, so they started looking elsewhere. Finally they learned of a family by the name of Loose. Both husband and wife are school-teachers, and Mrs. Loose was teacher of music in a high school. They invited her to church, visited the family in the home a number of times, and now she has been baptized and has taken over the music department of the group. She is not only teaching them how to sing our hymns, but giving them a fine appreciation of music.

The following is an excerpt from a letter from George Njeim post-marked Santa Barbara, California:

We are happy to report the result of a cottage meeting, which we have been attending to during our presence with our family. This effort has been going on for about a year and three months. While home for the Christmas season, we acquainted this couple with their nearest branch, Pasadena, and they immediately made friends. On the afternoon of January 16, they were baptized.

Their names were given to us in October.

How many could be brought to the light of the Restored Gospel if every family of our priesthood could interest one other family!

President Garver

President John F. Garver sends to all his friends his appreciation for the many expressions of sympathy and support that he is receiving in every mail and from many sections of the country. He regrets his inability to make personal acknowledgment to each and confesses lack of appropriate words to express his feelings. The Saints will therefore understand if they do not receive an answer. He desires that all be rewarded for their diligence in well doing.

The latest advice from Doctor Charles F. Grabske, Church Physician, as to his condition is as follows:

February 16, 1949

TO THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
Brethren:

I regret to advise you that our brother, President John Garver, is still very uncomfortable and unimproved. At the present, he is fundamentally less well than at the time of my last communication to you.

Sincerely,
Charles F. Grabske, M. D.

We ask the Saints to continue to remember him in their prayers.

Work in Germany

Missionary Eugene Theys writes that excellent missionary work is done from the contacts made by the local priesthood of Germany who visit the relatives of Saints in the United States. He himself has not been able to get into Berlin for six months. At present it is impossible to go in and out of the city in an automobile, and plane transportation is rigidly limited by the government.

Chatham District

Chatham District reports fifty baptisms during 1948, which makes the second consecutive year that the district has done so. This is a particularly encouraging record.

According to Their Gifts

By
CARL MESLE

LIKE THE DISCIPLES OF OLD, seventeen young men have just finished taking an intensive training course at the Auditorium in Independence, preparing them for full-time ministerial work with the church. They have been called to their assignments from many walks of life.

Thirteen different occupations and professions are represented in the background of the seventeen who began their training last week under the guidance of Dr. Floyd M. McDowell, Director of Ministerial Training for the church. All of the men held church responsibilities including volunteer pastorates while supporting themselves and their families in their chosen vocations before asked by the church to accept full-time appointments.

Four of the men were residents of Independence at the time of their appointment. The remainder came to Independence for the three-week specialized course in church administration and procedures from as far away as the state of Washington and the province of Ontario.

Their academic training includes studies at nine different colleges and universities with four having attended Graceland College. Twelve saw military service in the last war. All are married, and most have small children.

One of the best known in Independence is Stephen A. Black, who lives in President Truman's old home at 909 West Waldo with his wife, the former Lea Vail, and their three children. Until his appointment at the last General Conference, Elder Black, with the assistance of Mrs. Black, conducted a dramatic arts studio and served as pastor of the Englewood congregation. He also was active in the Independence Optimist Club and other church and civic activities.

Stephen Black brings to the radio department, where he is now assigned, a broad experience in both radio and theater. For three years, he served as an announcer with radio station WHB and directed plays for the Resident Theater of Kansas City. Both he and Mrs. Black were active before the war in professional theatricals, including acting and directing with the Pasadena Play House in California and Hal Well's Experimental Theater in New York City.

LYLE W. WOODSTOCK of 1520 West Short is perhaps best known in church circles as the son of the late C. B. Woodstock of Independence, who was associated for many years with Dr. McDowell in the Department of Religious Education. Before taking a church appointment, Lyle served as a personnel counselor on employment for the United States Department of Labor in Kansas City and a six-county area. He was pastor of Second Church for several months last year. During the war, he spent two years as an armed guard officer commanding a naval crew on a transport in the Pacific. Following the Institute, he and his wife, Doris, and their two children moved to Peoria, Illinois, where he is now serving as president of the Rock Island District.

Sylvester R. Coleman, another native of Independence, was an employee of Southwestern Bell Telephone Company until last December. Sylvester's war record includes service as a radio technician with the Fourteenth Air Force in the C. B. I. Theater, where he flew the "hump" from India to China. He was, for a short time, pastor of Second Church, relieving Lyle Woodstock. He and his wife, the former LaVona Crabb of Independence, and their two children will live in Flora, Illinois, where he is to serve as pastor and as president of the Southeastern Illinois District.

John T. Puckett, until recently manager of the shoe department at J. C. Penney's in Independence, came to Independence from a similar position in Paris, Tennessee. Here he served in the church school of the Englewood congregation and also as a volunteer missionary. Last year his team of volunteers was instrumental in converting more than thirty persons to the church. A machine gunner and squad leader with an infantry division during the war, John spent eighteen months in North Africa, Italy, and Germany, and was twice wounded in action. He has been assigned to serve Independence and the surrounding stakes of the church. He will retain his residence at 1416 Hardy, where he lives with his wife and one child.

THE THIRTEEN OTHER MEN in the school show similarly interesting and varied backgrounds. Raymond Ashenhurst of Des Moines, Iowa, was a bankteller and, during the war, a naval radio technician on a destroyer tender serving in the South Pacific and Japan. He is now assigned as a missionary to Northern Ohio.

Williard C. Becker was a soil conservationist with the United States Department of Agriculture in Iowa. He previously found time to serve as a volunteer pastor in his home state of Washington. His background includes staff work as an officer in the Eighth Air Force, with which he served in Europe at the time of the invasion. He has been assigned as pastor at Stewartville, Missouri.

Clifford A. Cole, who was reared in Wyoming, is a graduate of Central Missouri State Teachers College at Warrensburg. He taught social sciences in Iowa high schools before being assigned as president of the Northwestern Iowa District for the church. As a volunteer, he was counselor to a branch pastor in Lamoni, Iowa.

Another banker is Wallace A. Jackson, who served as a bank clerk at Port Huron, Michigan, and volunteer young people's leader before accepting an assignment as missionary in Detroit, Michigan. Wallace taught military subjects at Michigan State College for the Army Air Forces during the war.

Donald L. Kyser, who will serve as president of the Rich Hill District, was formerly manager of a grocery store and a volunteer pastor in Oklahoma.

The roster also includes Myron F. LaPointe, who gave up his own real estate and insurance business in Ottumwa, Iowa, where he served as pastor, for an assignment as full-time pastor in Wichita, Kansas.

From St. Louis comes Charles D. Neff, a journalist who was engaged in sales promotion work for a large feed company and served as a volunteer young people's director there before accepting an appointment as pastor in Omaha, Nebraska. Charles served during the war as naval engineering officer on an L. S. M. with the amphibious forces in the Pacific.

THE ONE and only appointee in the group from outside of the United States is James C. Phillips, who was a retail shoe store manager in Ontario, Canada, before being assigned as president of the Eastern Michigan District. He served with the Royal Canadian Engineers in the European Theater, taking part in the invasion of France in 1944.

From Detroit, Michigan, comes E. Elwood Smith, formerly an accounts payable supervisor for a large Detroit firm. He will return to Michigan as pastor at Port Huron.

G. Wayne Smith, who has been assigned to the Northeastern Illinois and Chicago Districts as a missionary, was formerly a branch cashier for a well-known St. Louis corporation. Wayne saw service with the United States Marine Corp and spent eight months in Northern China with a marine aviation group. His volunteer church work has included leadership of young people, director of a church school, and choir work.

Another unusual background is provided by Luther Troyer, now assigned as president of the Northern Indiana District, whose preparation includes studies in social welfare at the University of Iowa and in pastoral counseling at the University of Chicago. He had established himself in the field of life insurance in Omaha, Nebraska, where he was also young people's leader in his spare time, when called to serve as an armed guard commander and communications liaison officer for the Navy.

The second schoolteacher in the group is Paul Wellington of Mapleton, Kansas, whose experience includes serving as a grade school principal, a sergeant in the air forces, and a fellowship in teaching at Kansas State Teachers College in Pittsburg. In his church work, he has served as director, treasurer, and pianist for the church school and as young people's director in two different branches. He is now assigned as pastor at Seattle, Washington.

Last, alphabetically, is William E. Williams, of Rock Island, Illinois, who spent two years in the service, including a period with the army of occupation in Germany. He was formerly a toolmaker in the Rock Island Arsenal, during which time he also served as local director of religious education. His new assignment is that of pastor in the famous Kirtland Temple near Wiloughby, Ohio.

Opportunity No. 4—Special Literature

My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge; because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me; seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God, I will also forget my children.

A Studious People

By RAYMOND TROYER

If twenty thousand people in our church would spend fifteen minutes every day in studying the word of God at a time of day when they were at their best, untold power would flow to the church.²

FROM CHILDHOOD ON, each of us is building a life, but the process is so slow we seldom recognize the growth that is taking place. Our building materials are our potential aptitudes, abilities, and personal characteristics; our building site is a continuously changing world of people and things. These are sufficiently plastic that we can profoundly alter our lives by skillful planning and building. While the science of human life-building is only in its infancy, if all that is known were applied, it is probable that more momentous changes would be wrought in human lives than have already been effected in our physical environment.

While most everything that is associated with this life is possessed by different individuals in varying amounts, there is one thing of which we all have the same—time. This can never be taken away from us, nor can it be added to by generosity. All mankind has claim to it in equal daily proportions. Getting maximum values from our time is extremely important for each of us.

In an article, "Should We Teach reports and statements of problems presented to the Conference of 1948—available to the administrative officers of the church and others concerned, in harmony with the action of the Conference that "we move forward in constantly greater unity of understanding and endeavor."

Time Conservation?" Evelyn Seedorf says:

A day well spent is comprised of one or more events each of which is so suitable to the time that no other event would have been more appropriate. Had the first event run over into one minute more, when another event was scheduled to begin, in terms of appropriateness the first one would have lost its value as surely as an expensive dress must be hung on a "reduced" rack in a department store once it has gone out-of-date. On the other hand, had the second event been initiated before the "demand" for the first had ceased, a waste just as expensive would have ensued. . . . Each event had a proper proportion of hours, minutes, and seconds applied to it to make the event satisfying.²

One of the areas of human life-building which is being studied by many educators is that of methods and techniques of study. Most of our church leaders and many others of our members are faced daily with the problem of not having time for all the things they want to do. If one will use good study methods, he will have more time, because he will learn how to avoid wasting it and how to use it to the best advantage.

IN OUR CHURCH RELATIONSHIPS, we may have spent too much of our effort in the past in trying to teach our members what they should learn and too little time in teaching them how they can learn. Some of the differences between the individual who seems bright and the one who is dull may stem from the fact that the slow learner has never gained the knack of applying his mind to study. The Scriptures are full of guides to a more abundant life if we knew the best methods of study and would apply them for only a little time each day.

The redemption of Zion depends upon insight and knowledge which shall be gained through close communion with Deity and through study. Not just a few of our members must study. There must be many if we are to make progress, and that study must be of such a nature that the individuals shall profit to a maximum. There is a large amount of evidence today indicating that study habits and skills can be improved upon through special efforts. Because of this, most schools and colleges are helping students to improve their study methods. There is a feeling that the comparatively small amount of time, expense, and effort spent in learning to study will be more than amply repaid in more productive lives.

Individuals differ widely in the kinds of study habits which are most suitable for them, hence good procedures cannot be highly standardized. There are, however, many basic elements of study which all individuals should learn. By gaining an understanding of these, our people should become more godly because through reading and studying they will achieve significant results in their lives. Through experience in a variety of study skills, one may choose those which best fit him and which are appropriate to his temperament and purpose in study.

STUDY ACTIVITIES MAY be classified in two broad categories: study habits and study skills. Study habits include having a regular time and place for study, determining in advance just what is to be done, avoiding distractions, being persistent, working independently, being punctual, using systematic review, having an attitude of weighing evidence and suspending judgment, and maintaining an attitude of constructive self-criticism. Study skills include one's reading ability, note-taking, outlining, using books in the library, problem-solving and memorizing. While it will not be possible in this article to do justice to any one of these habits or skills, an attempt will be made to indicate the possibilities from studying some of the significant ones.

Many factors condition an individual's ability to study, including past experiences, intelligence, home conditions, knowledge of library facilities, understanding of how to plan a schedule, incentive for study, influence of associates, degree of security felt, freedom from worry, and emotional adjustment of the individual. Because these factors differ in every individual, there will inevitably be differences among people in the effectiveness with which they study. A balanced life with time for play, worship, and sleep, and normally attractive meals should serve as a foundation for efficient study. When a person doesn't live right, it's hard for him to think straight.

Unless there is an intense interest in that which is to be studied, it is probably normal to have a certain amount of initial distaste for it. Enjoyment of an activity comes after having developed an interest in it. Even hard mental work can be very pleasant, once one gets into the swing of it, but there needs to be a warming up period. This for many people is comparable to physical pain. It is of little value to try to learn desirable techniques of study unless there first is this interest in study. Good results are achieved only with strong effort.

AT ONE TIME, it was thought that the way to form a habit or to acquire knowledge was to engage in so many repetitions of the desired learning. Most schoolteachers and students know now that it is useless to repeat meaningless material. The first task in learning is to find the central idea. A little time spent in wondering why something is worth learning may save wasted or half-hearted effort later.

Having discovered a purpose in our study, real learning should take place. What we want very much to know, we remember when we have studied. We may study that which seems trivial many times and forget it each time. The good student is the person who cares genuinely, deeply, and intensely about what he is studying. If something does not mean much to you, no tricks of study can keep your mind on it very effectively.

Controlled experiments suggest the desirability of study before a night's sleep. One explanation of this phenomenon is that activities engaged in after one studies have a retroactive effect and tend to block recall of what has been studied. If important or difficult materials are being studied, it would seem desirable to follow the study period with sleep. As an alternative, some experiments have produced good results by following study with light or easy reading. Other desirable periods suggested for study when one is at his best are the first hour after arising from sleep and a period at about 10 o'clock in the morning—if a normal daily routine is followed.

A common problem in studying is mind-wandering. Sometimes this is caused by lack of interest. Your mind doesn't wander if you are hungry and are headed for the restaurant. Sometimes a long period of study will cause this difficulty. Research has shown that short periods with intense concentration are more profitable than long hours in which one eventually just reads words. Spaced study fixes materials more permanently. A good schedule for study of difficult materials would seem to be as follows:

1. Read the material to get the general pattern.
2. Let it go and do something else.
3. Go back and study it carefully.
4. The next morning, read it quickly for review purposes.

Some experiments have shown that minor noises during study have caused a loss of learning up to twenty per cent or more even though the subjects had thought they weren't bothered at all. Best productive work in industry is often obtained when relaxing music is played. While a general atmosphere of absence of tension is necessary for good study, it has been found that turning on the radio may do no harm provided the program is of soft, undistracting music. An explanation for this is that the individual may be tired and overstimulated, and the music has a relaxing effect, or the minor distraction of "soft" music covers the major distraction of house or street noises.

WORK OF ANY NATURE is usually much more effective if it is systematized. The greatest single study difficulty of some people is that they have never learned to look at their whole program of activities in relation to the total time available and so have never made a schedule which includes study. Best results are almost always obtained by having a set time each day for study and studying in the same place each time. After a schedule has been determined, the individual who learns most is a good worker. He gets down to work quickly, he enjoys his work, and he persists until he has achieved his goals.

Probably the most important study skill is reading. This can be helped by the improvement of vocabulary, the increasing of reading speed, the building up of skill in getting facts from printed materials, reading to find the main idea and the supporting details, reading to see the organization of the writer, skimming to find facts and ideas, and reading to see imagery and to appreciate the emotional content of the material.

Pressed for time, successful leaders have learned to read faster and still maintain the necessary comprehension. They have learned to select the most important books, the most important parts of books, and the key words in paragraphs. They have also learned to unify ideas gained in reading and anchor them to their previous experience so that they will not slip away so easily from their memory.

Good reading is an active process which one engages in with all of his mental powers. Finding a quiet spot and an easy chair and placidly turning the pages, waiting for ideas to pop out and affect you is of no avail. Good learning, whether in reading or in listening to a sermon, involves more of a wrestle with that which is being presented.

Of the nineteen most important study ideas considered in one survey of study, note-taking headed the list. The best method recommended to improve study habits was to learn how to make good brief notes. One who takes good notes listens better to speakers and his concentration is better when he reads or listens. An average estimate made from research studies in the psychology of remembering and forgetting shows that fifty per cent of new material presented is forgotten by an individual after the first half hour; seventy per cent is forgotten in ten hours; and over eighty per cent after a month.³ Professor Paul Radosavljevich of New York University has voluminous records on this subject which bear out these figures. It is always wise to take notes on things that later may prove beneficial.

A sincere prayer for guidance in one's study will bring forces to bear on this important activity that would otherwise remain latent. God will help us when we ask him, and we can expect to gain insight from what we study that would otherwise be impossible. Many people who have made outstanding contributions to our society have found that a period of meditation, worship, or reading of the Scriptures before beginning their study has helped them immeasurably.

OF ALL EDUCATIONAL OBJECTIVES for Latter Day Saints, few are more important and none are more difficult to achieve than the development of efficient, independent, and permanent study habits and skills.

All of us have the responsibility to tell our friends and associates of the gospel. If our study habits and skills are good, we will be in a position to study the gospel in a way that it will be more meaningful to us, and we can then tell it to others with deeper conviction. The contribution we make to the church, either as a leader or as a follower, is determined largely by those study habits which have become a part of our life.

It is generally recognized that the way most people study can be improved upon by various techniques, some of which are comparatively simple and obvious and others which require persistent application. Best results can be obtained if we regard the improvement of methods of study as a continuous objective in all of our church work. Church school teachers, parents, and pastors all need to be alert for opportunities to stress good study habits.

Improvement of study habits can be made either individually or with a group. A group could well spend several sessions studying the book by Kelley and Greene, Better Reading and Study Habits (World Book Company, fifty-two cents).⁴ Either to supplement this booklet or for a shorter study, Practical Study Aids, by C. Gilbert Wrenn (Stanford University Press, Stanford, California, fifteen cents) will be found valuable. A book that will be found in most school and public libraries is College and Life, by M. E. Bennett. This has several excellent chapters devoted to the improvement of one's method of study. Most any library should have several other books on study methods which will be found useful in giving one a better understanding of this field of knowledge.

Lamoni People

By Katheryn C. Metz

LAMONI has always meant something special to members of the church and to former Graceland students. A stranger seeing our town for the first time would miss the significance it holds for many and would classify it as just another village in the middlewest—a typical small town.

But that would be wrong! Lamoni is so much more to so many people. A thousand invisible threads of interest bind Lamoni to the hearts of former residents, Graceland alumni, and church men and women everywhere.

All of this, the spirit of the town, the things that make Lamoni a "different" place in which to live, have been caught by Joseph Anthony in his latest book, Lamoni's Passing Parade, a story of the people who helped to build a community.

The book includes a chapter on Joseph Smith, as it properly should, and then page by page the author introduces many other characters. It is as though Mr. Anthony walked slowly down Main Street, visiting with various persons he met, and then used his acquaintances as characters in his book.

There is the village blacksmith, Dr. Bertha Greer, Roxana Anderson—the author's favorite schoolteacher, Fannie Jones, G. W. Blair, J. A. Gunsolley, Frederick M. Smith, Daniel F. Lambert, A. Otis White, Elmer Weddie, and many, many others.

Lamoni's Passing Parade will bring back a rush of memories to any former resident, whether he recalls the days when dust and mud reached from curb to curb on Linden Street or whether he knows it only as a paved highway.

MR. ANTHONY came to Lamoni fifty years ago as a small lad, and his book includes many amusing incidents that have occurred down through the years. Some of them took place when the author was a student at Old West Side, others happened in later years when he was a young man around the town. Still others include the fruitful years he was instructor of band and orchestra at Graceland College and in the public schools.

The book is in no way an attempt to record the history of the town; it is, however, valuable in that respect as it rescues many significant incidents from oblivion, where want of a record would have consigned them. It is the story of Lamoni . . . as Mr. Anthony remembers it. And his memory is remarkably good.

America's Prophetic Outline

IT IS STATED that the late Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, a noted infidel, said: "God didn't know about America until Columbus discovered it." If Mr. Ingersoll is rightly quoted, he was never from the truth more removed. He, however, is not the only person disposed to think that God was ignorant of pre-Columbia America and its people. There are many Christians who think either that God did not know about it, or was not particularly interested in it until after Columbus. Our object is to affirm that God was, is, and always will be interested in this land and its people for redemptive purposes. Paul informs us, "God hath made of one blood all nations to dwell on all the face of the earth." (Acts 17: 26, 27.)

Is America to be excluded?

ISAIAH IS AMERICA'S PROPHET-HISTORIAN

During his personal ministry to the inhabitants of America after his resurrection, Jesus reassured the people of the trustworthiness of the prophets, particularly Isaiah. Said he: "Yea, a commandment I give unto you, that ye search these things diligently; for great are the words of Isaiah. For surely he spake as touching all things concerning my people who are of the house of Israel; therefore it must needs be that he must speak also to the Gentiles. And all things that he spake, hath been, and shall be, even according to the words which he spake. Therefore give heed to my words."—Nephi 10: 27-30. Here the Son of God is commanding his people to search diligently, as a means of preparedness, the writings of Isaiah as the chief source of enlightenment regarding world, racial and national movements.

ANCIENT AMERICA—IT IS "WOE," NOT "HO"

The eighteenth chapter of Isaiah seems to be an outline of American history from its ancient beginnings to the end. Verse one speaks of a great "woe" upon the land "which is [present tense, or at the time of Isaiah] beyond the Rivers of Ethiopia." The Douay Version translates this verse, "Woe to the land the winged symbol," etc. This translation makes plain that it is the land and not the symbols of the people to which reference is made. Most, if not all, Bible commentators agree that the eighteenth chapter of Isaiah refers to the land of America. To what other land could it refer?

Some affirm that the "woe" mentioned in the first verse should be translated "ho." We think a close analysis of verses one and two will reveal that Isaiah was writing about the destruction of the first inhabitants called the Jaredites, which had already begun while the prophet lived; therefore, the word woe is very significant. Isaiah said these people "sendeth ambassadors by the sea." You will notice this statement is also written in the present tense and refers to political, commercial, and maritime advancement of the people in the "land the winged symbol" at the time the prophet lived. The Book of Mormon reveals that the first inhabitants of America became a multitudinous people scattered over the vast land (Ether 4: 67-78). In addition to their history, these people have left us a rich archæological legacy. The prophet also informs us of a second people called "messengers" who were to "go swiftly" to a "people scattered and peeled"—to a "people terrible from their beginning hitherto [before Isaiah's time], a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the rivers have spoiled." The Book of Ether records that the Jaredites were a great and numerous people who destroyed themselves, and when the Nephites (the "messengers" of God) reached this continent, they found a sole survivor in one Coriantumr. Never did an ancient people attain a greater civilization nor come to such a dreadful, tragic, and complete end as the Jaredites of Ancient America. It was "woe to the land the winged symbol," all right. We think the first and second verses refer to Ancient or Jaredite America, and to the expedition under divine guidance of the second people to settle America from Palestine.

MODERN AMERICA (UNITED STATES)

Verse three, no doubt, refers to modern or present-day America, and particularly to the United States. Ancient America was not known to contemporary peoples (they were "meted out" or "confined" to America), but the America of verse three was to be universally known: "All ye inhabitants of the world and dwellers on the earth, see ye when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains; and when he bloweth a trumpet, hear ye." Never in the history of nations has a government attained the world position of the United States. (We refer to a prophecy delivered by Jesus to the Nephites regarding this nation, which all Americans should read and heed. Nephi 7: 32-36.) Isaiah writes that "all the world" will look to this land for the raising of an ensign which will affect all people. One often hears "the" ensign spoken of as if there was only one ensign mentioned in the Scriptures.

There is no scriptural instance where the word ensign is qualified by the definite article "the." There are at least six different ensigns mentioned in the Bible and Doctrine and Covenants; they are as follows: CHRIST (Isaiah 11: 10); Christ's GOSPEL—"to it shall the Gentiles seek . . ." (Ibid., 11: 10); (Christ is inseparably connected with his gospel, and one cannot be raised without the other); Christ's PEOPLE (Zech. 9: 16); ZION (Section 64: 8); Peace (Ibid., 102: 11), and the ENSIGN TO THE NATIONS (Isaiah 11: 12; 18: 3; 5: 26).

Isaiah predicts the establishment on this continent of a great nation which would influence world affairs and peoples, and the eyes of the whole world were to turn toward her. One is justified in stating that the United States has attained the enviable and responsible position as leader among nations. Perhaps the "four freedoms" and the "United Nations Organization" fostered by this nation warrant belief that the "ensign" has been "raised" on the "top of the mountains." Not only is the United States at the governmental apex in world affairs, but it has and will continue to play the part of aiding in the establishment of the kingdom of God. It may also be identified in the "ensign for the nations" involving the restoration of Israel and Judah (Isaiah 11: 12).

It was Harry S. Truman who became the world leader in abetting the return of the Jews to Palestine, and this nation under his leadership was the first to recognize Jewish sovereignty. The latest gesture of this government toward the Israeli government is the issuing of a $100,000,000 loan, most of which is earmarked for the development of an irrigation system to make fertile and reclaim the disputed Negev Desert. Thus the flowery prophecy of Isaiah, ". . . and her desert like the garden of the Lord" will have literal expression. As God raised up John to be the forerunner of Jesus Christ, and the Reformation to be the forerunner of the Restoration, so he "raised up men" to establish this government as the "nations ensign" and the forerunner of the supreme government on earth. Both Isaiah and Micah in prophetic symbolism describe the earth's governments as they now exist: "And it shall come to pass that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow into it." Unquestionably this language is figurative. It is the consensus of opinion of Bible commentators that a "mountain" in Scripture symbolism means a "government or kingdom." Since the prophet uses the symbols "mountains" and "hills" to identify world governments "in the last days," he is referring to the larger (big five) and the lesser nations comprising the United Nations Organization. Never before have the nations been organized into two groups—the major governments (mountains) and the small nations (hills).

This prophecy is amazing; its fulfillment is awe inspiring. Notice, "the mountain [government] of the Lord's House" is to be "established in the top of the mountains [governments]." As the highest peak is the top of the mountain range, so the leading nation would be the "top of the mountains," and in it the great kingdom of God would be established. While he was Prime Minister of England, Winston S. Churchill said: "The United States is at the zenith of the nations." It is remarkable that Isaiah, looking through prophetic eyes, was able to see and foretell the international political development involving this nation as the center of world movement.

Incidentally, but importantly, the "blowing of the trumpet" in verse three is the tocsin of war and indicates that the "raising of an ensign" comes from the processes of war.

In verses five and six, the prophet writes: "Before the harvest [the harvest is the end of the world, says Jesus in Matthew 13: 39] when the bud is perfect and the sour grape is ripening in the flower, he shall both cut off the springs with pruning hooks, and take away and cut down the branches." This reference seems to be a prediction of a war of great magnitude and destruction occurring prior to the end of the world or harvest. Was this a prediction of the last World War involving this nation? We think so. Never before were "the springs cut off" (that is, the leaders of the people responsible for the war) as they were following the last conflict. The leaders are even at this late date being tried and executed in the European and Asiatic theaters by the jurists and executioners of this government. We are informed by the prophet that the "branches" were to be both "taken away" and "cut down." How completely was this fulfilled. Large groups were taken away from their national and racial trees, and millions were "cut down" in cold-blooded murder under the guise of warfare. This is no exaggeration; this is no fiction. At this writing, there are still people severed from their national and racial trunks—an estimated 2,000,000 in Russia—and many are seeking refuge in other countries and among other peoples. This is not fiction; it is the truth of our generation, long ago foretold by the Prophet Isaiah. In the light of these revealments, it is little wonder that the Lord told his people to "search diligently the words of Isaiah."

THE JAREDITE RECORD AND FUTURE AMERICA

Verse seven predicts the coming forth of the Jaredite record as a part of the Book of Mormon and of the closing event of human life. "In that time ["before the harvest" or the "end of the world"] shall the present [the time of Isaiah] be brought unto the Lord of Hosts [that of which the prophet is writing is sacred and will involve divine intervention] of a people scattered and peeled and from a people terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trodden under foot, whose land the rivers have spoiled." This is a reference to the Jaredites and to the time and means of the revealment of their history before the end of the world. The second verse is a statement of the affairs of the people in America at the time of Isaiah and subsequently; the seventh verse speaks of the history of this people which shall be preserved to be given through or by "the Lord of Hosts" in the last days. This history was to be "brought unto the Lord of Hosts" from a people, etc. For corroborative references read Mosiah 5: 61-64; 9: 167-169; 12: 16-23, and the Book of Ether.

The chapter is concluded, revealing the closing chapter in the history of human government: "To the place of the name of the Lord of Hosts, the Mount Zion"—the place and government of Zion. Thus is brought to a close the prophetic over-all outline of the history of America and particularly that of United States. It is not strange that this land is frequently referred to as a "promised land." We shall see that this land is the land of greatest promise.

Governor Phillip F. LaFollette of Wisconsin made the following public statement on April 28, 1939: "We believe that this hemisphere—all of it—was set aside by the Creator for the ultimate destiny of man. Here, a vast continent was kept virgin for centuries. Here it was ordained that man should work out the final act in the drama of life." More prophetic words were never uttered. Theodore Roosevelt, a former president of the United States, said, "O my fellow citizens, each of you carries on your shoulders not only the burden of doing well for the sake of your country, but the burden of doing well and seeing that this nation does well for the sake of mankind."—The New Nationalism. In the minds of many great men in all walks of life in the United States has existed the thought that this government and its people have a world obligation. Wendell Wilkie came home from a world tour convinced that "each and everyone turn to the United States with a friendliness that is often akin to genuine affection. I came home certain of one clear and significant fact: that there exists in the world today a gigantic reservoir of good will toward us, the American people."—One World.

Harry S. Truman, on the eve of his inauguration as President of the United States, is quoted as saying: "This country is going to work for the benefit of all the world and not for the selfish benefit of the United States or any other country."—Kansas City Times, January 20, 1949.

In the patriarchal blessing to Joseph, Moses said: "Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven" (Deuteronomy 33: 13-17). A similar blessing was given through Jacob: "The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills."—Genesis 49: 22-26. The Old Testament reveals a people migrating from Palestine to an overseas destination (Isaiah 16: 8; Jeremiah 48: 32; 49: 28-32).

America is not the promised land because of its fertility and resourcefulness

It's "on the Record" By Floy Lorene Bennett

What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?

I WOULD NOT ATTEMPT to explain this statement in all its fullness of meaning; nor is the interpretation usually put upon it by the minister the one with which I am concerned at this time. It occurs to me that if we wish to avoid losing the soul, we must feed it—feed it on a diet which will enlarge, stabilize, and enrich. Man, in his effort to understand more of the beauty of God's creation, has discovered aptitudes within himself and has developed these aptitudes as his God-given stewardship to such a degree that he has interpreted for us in literature, art, and music (as well as through other mediums) some of the infinite love of God so that all of us may share in beautiful experiences which we might otherwise miss.

There is rhythm in the seasons, in the ceaseless round of day and night, in the coming-in and going-out of the tide, and in the phases of the moon. There is melody in the bird song, in the babbling brook, and in the wind in the chimney. There is harmony of both color and design in flowers, sunset and sunrise, storm clouds, mountain ranges, and desert places. All of creation is a vast symphony in which the basic elements of music—rhythm, melody, and harmony—find everlasting expression. The humanizing of these elements in forms which we call good music is one of our noblest arts. The masters of musical composition have retained something of the divine in their art which sets it apart from the cheap and commonplace. Music explains and underlines or writes in italics the beauties of creation so that we may enjoy them the more.

IN PREVIOUS ARTICLES on this subject, I have said that children should have an early introduction to some of the more simple forms of music written by the master composers. I wish to reiterate the importance of this phase of music appreciation. Many modern musicians have recognized the value of early training for children and so have prepared simplified arrangements of some of the classics in music literature for this very purpose. At this time, especially, I wish to call your attention to some simple forms—just the theme in most cases—to which nursery songs, stories, and fables are sung. Children will love both the words and music and will quickly learn to sing them. As they grow older and hear these same musical themes in their original settings, it will be like meeting childhood friends, and their understanding and appreciation will be immeasurably increased because of that early acquaintance. This is one of the simple, effective, and satisfying methods of feeding the soul. It is quite possible to be "soul-hungry," for much of the abundant beauty of life which we have not been taught to recognize. "Feed my lambs" was not an empty request and may often consist of merely helping the lambs to select and choose wisely from the abundance by which they are surrounded.

A Nauvoo, Illinois Resident's Account of

Emma Hale Smith

By MRS. J. H. PAXTON

NOW THAT WE are well launched on the work of the new year, we are reminded how quickly the weeks and months go by and that it is not too soon to be planning our reunion programs.

In 1947 it was my happy privilege to attend the Nauvoo, Illinois, Reunion. It was my first visit to Nauvoo. The old, historic landmarks, the spacious, well-kept lawns and hedges, the white painted houses, and the view across the broad Mississippi River at sunset make a picture of solemnity and beauty one can never forget.

In planning the work of our women's department for the week, we thought it fitting that on Friday afternoon we have a reception and program, the central thought of which would be a memorial service to Emma Hale Smith.

Our very charming and efficient women's department leader of Nauvoo, Mrs. August Lee, and her corps of workers arranged the setting with a lovely tea table and a background of flowers. Josephine Mader, the talented Messiah soloist who was in attendance at the reunion, sang "The Lord's Prayer," and a song composed by David Smith, a son of Emma, and one composed by Frederick M. Smith, her grandson.

Mrs. Lee, who has lived in Nauvoo for many years, compiled and read the historical sketch and the first annual report of The Relief Society, the original of which she was permitted to see and handle. She also was privileged to meet and talk with some who had known Emma when she lived in Nauvoo; this makes her sketch of Emma's life unusually interesting.

As many requests have come from our women for program material, Sister Lee has generously consented to let us use this article.

EMMA HALE SMITH

Emma Hale Smith may fitly be called the Mother of the Reorganization. To encourage her devotion as the wife of Joseph Smith, she was early given this charge through inspiration:

Behold, thy sins are forgiven thee, and thou art an elect lady, whom I have called. And the office of thy calling shall be for a comfort unto thy husband, in his afflictions, with consoling words, in the spirit of meekness.

When no other scribe was available, she wrote for her husband as he translated the plates of the Book of Mormon which were taken from Cumorah the very year of their marriage. And she took no idle interest in the work of bringing forth the book. The memorable, long ride on horseback to warn her husband when the sacred treasure was threatened is but one example of the loyalty and fortitude with which she magnified her calling.

REVELATION GIVEN JULY 1830

Among other things given to her in this revelation was to make a selection of sacred hymns "as it shall be given thee, which is pleasing unto me, to be had in my church; for my soul delighteth in the song of the heart; yea, the song of the righteous is a prayer unto me. And it shall be answered with a blessing on their heads."

It is said that she was not permitted the joy of homemaking, so dear to a woman's heart, because of the persistent persecutions which followed them from the beginning of the work. She saw her twin babies die and strove to dull the pain of mother sorrow in her soul by taking the motherless twins of another family to rear as her own.

After the move to Kirtland, and after the temple had been completed, there came one of the brief seasons of peace and prosperity in Emma

THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK

Have you begun to think about planning to attend next General Conference? This suggestion comes from Sister J. C. Mottashed of Belding, Michigan: "I am now saving a dollar a week toward my trip to Conference in April, 1950. We have that sort of project here among four of us women."

Smith's life. Here they enjoyed children of their own and the fellowship of the Saints.

Then again came the storm. The little family made the long journey to Missouri, through new country in the dead of winter, locating at Far West. Scenes of terror followed. Emma was driven from her home with the four children, and Joseph was taken prisoner and carried away. Again the family was forced to journey into an unfamiliar world—this time only the mother and children.

Courageous, strong in faith, the "elect lady" faced the perils undaunted. Coming to the Mississippi, she crossed the frozen river with two younger children in her arms, the two older ones clinging to her skirts. Safety was found in Illinois, and the kindness of new-found friends assuaged the bitterness of exile.

Probably one of the most important trusts imposed in Emma Smith was the custody of the manuscript of the Inspired Version of the Bible for safe keeping soon after completion of the translation. This she carried to Illinois with her on that memorable flight from the west. True to her trust, she preserved this precious document and later relinquished it to the Reorganization, by whom it was published. Joseph joined his family, and they made their home at Nauvoo, where their hospitality at the Mansion House was noted.

The Women's Relief Society was organized at Nauvoo, Illinois, on March 17, 1842, with Emma as president. The organization is recognized as having been the first women's club organized with charitable objects in view.

On June 27, 1844, the tragic death of her husband occurred, but after the darkness came the dawn. For nineteen years Emma was permitted to see the Saints rallying again to the standard, to see her three living sons going out to carry to the world the gospel their father had loved so well.

Many times God has depended on the women of the church. Emma Smith was approached and invited to follow various leaders, but she said to herself, "I have no friend greater than God. I have no place to go but home. I will stay there and maintain the dignity and sanctity of our home." This she did and reared her children, so when God came knocking at the door of the humble house and said, "Where is Joseph, who is to be president of the church?" she answered, "Here is Joseph." And when God said, "Where is Alexander, who is to be the presiding patriarch of the church

Music Speaks a Universal Language

THERE IS NO MEDIUM of approach in our missionary effort in foreign lands quite so effectual as music. We can come to a common ground of understanding more quickly with music than through any other means. Music truly speaks a universal language.

A story in William L. Stidger's Sermon Stories of Faith and Hope bears telling here. A young army officer and a group of his men had just entered a small German village in the Ruhr. The German army had fled, leaving destruction in its wake, along with many dangerous mines and booby traps. They came to a small church and cautiously entered. The young army officer walked up to the organ. He had been church organist at home in a small Texas town. A hymnbook on the music rack was open at "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." He couldn't resist sitting down and playing that old hymn, although he hadn't touched the keys of an organ for three years. As he played, he heard footsteps. First he saw two elderly persons enter. They walked down the aisle to the front pew—evidently a man and his wife. He smiled at them and continued to play. Then came a young couple. More people came. He counted twenty persons sitting reverently listening. They had not heard a religious service for a long time. Their hearts were hungry for something beautiful—for music. The Germans and the American soldiers joined together in singing that hymn. Then the army officer thought of those strict orders against fraternization, and he was puzzled. Should he speak to them or arrest them? When he left the organ, an old German hobbled up to him, tears streaming down his cheeks. He threw his arms around the officer, saying over and over, "Mein Bruder! Mein Bruder!" "My Brother! My Brother!"

There is no nation or race of people that cannot be moved by music.

In a previous article I told about the two Japanese girls who visited in our home. They were talented. They could play the piano and guitar, and they had lovely voices. They sang duets for us in their own language. Since they were Japanese Christians, they sang a number of hymns. As they sang the hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds, our hearts in Christian love," my daughter and I joined with them. We sang in the English language while they sang in Japanese. There was such a perfect blending of our voices, that there seemed to be no difference in language. Never in any assembly of the Saints did the Spirit of God attend with greater beauty and power than it did while we sang that hymn. Truly,

In Christ there is no East nor West,
In him no South nor North,
But one great fellowship of love
Throughout the whole wide earth.

MUSIC CAN MEET a need in our first approach to the nations of the world. That need is brotherhood and fellowship.

Heretofore, our missionary efforts have been directed mostly toward the white race. I speak especially of the Japanese, because they are of a different race, and because I am particularly interested in them.

Japan is a beautiful country. The Japanese naturally love beauty, and nature worship is a part of their earliest religion.

In the letters we receive from our Japanese friends, they tell us of the beauty of the land, of the flowers about their homes, and of cherry blossom time—to them the most beautiful time of the year.

Being natural lovers of beauty, music finds a ready reception in their hearts.

The father of my two Japanese girls told in a letter of our son's teaching the family to sing our hymns. He said that they find themselves singing those hymns as they go about their home and their work. We sent one young woman a copy of our hymnal. On receiving it, she wrote to tell us how much she appreciated it. She told that she had spent the whole afternoon playing the hymns and she could hardly tear herself away from the piano. Imagine the "Old, Old Path," "Tenderly, Tenderly Lead Thou Me On," and other original Latter Day Saint hymns being sung by the Japanese before our missionaries set foot on their soil.

Each nation and race of people has its own culture, its own background, and differences of opinions, but music will ever be a meeting place of common understanding. Music seems to bridge the chasm between God and man. Though there be differences of language, opinions, and thought, the common brotherhood of man and Fatherhood of God can best be understood through the medium of music.

Certainly music speaks a universal language.

Benevolence

The man who gives encouragement
When hearts are chilled and cold,
Is truly more benevolent
Than one who gives his gold.

For words that cheer, a friendly smile,
Can help a man to find,
The things that wealth can never buy—
New faith and peace of mind.

LETTERS

The Importance of Letters of Testimony

As a child, I used to watch my father, Elder John Carlile, read the Saints' Herald. I wondered, in my childish way, what could be in this magazine that he read so carefully. When I was older and could read a little myself, I would pick up the Herald when he laid it down and leaf through it until I could find something I could read. At first, I read only the poems and short articles; then I began reading the letters of testimony. After that, I could understand why father read them with such interest. The examples of healing and the rich spiritual experiences contained in these letters have long been a source of inspiration to me. Today I still read every letter that appears in the Herald; I only wish there were more of them.

A Letter of Appreciation

I wish to thank all who gave aid and comfort to my wife, Mrs. Carrie Brown, during her recent illness. Early last July she was stricken with an acute attack of angina pectoris. After seven weeks of suffering, she came home, but was still unable to move about. Soon afterwards, we were visited by Elder and Sister Martin L. Schmid; before leaving, Brother Schmid asked permission to pray for my wife. Within an hour, she began to show a marked improvement. A few days later, Elder and Sister Jesse Hubbard called; they, too, prayed for my wife's recovery. After that, she continued to regain her health and, since returning to normalcy, has not suffered a recurrence of the illness.

May God bless all who sincerely try to do good in the church.

Suggests Bulletin Boards for Children

I have noticed that many of our churches do not have outdoor bulletin boards which give the name of the church, the minister's name and address, and the services. I have had people ask me, "Where is your church? I've never heard of it." Some denominations even advertize on highway billboards so that all who drive by will know they have churches located in certain towns and

From a Young Member

I am the only young person in Emporia, Kansas, of my age. We have no church here, so I would enjoy corresponding with other young people who are members of our church, either here in the United States or abroad. I have been a member of this church for four years.

My father and mother are members too. I am fourteen years old and in the eighth grade in junior high school.

all of the belongings so that as he escaped he could go to the ruler of the land and turn over to him all of these precious stones and the silver and gold that he might redeem his father from bondage. The son took all of the worldly belongings of his father and went his way, as many of the sons of today do. He dissipated this wealth in riotous living and forgot about his father being in bondage. As a consequence, he wasted his life; he wasted his substance; and his father continued in bondage. How different was our elder brother, Christ, who unselfishly gave his life to redeem mankind.

Today in our cities, great as they are, people might be likened to a child playing on the beach, erecting from the sands of the ocean, a tower here, a barn there, and other buildings near by, putting a fence around them and saying, "This is my world." He plays there, oblivious to the ocean and to the waves which come sweeping up as the tide comes in. But his elder brother, standing back at the cliff is watching, and as this youngster is just about to be washed into the sea by the waves which mount higher and higher, completely destroying his city of sand, the elder brother comes and grasps him by the hand, and they retreat to safety.

Our elder brother, Christ, does much that same thing for us. As we build up kingdoms and power, the wave of life sweeps over us and washes out all of these material things that we think we have built solidly. The only part we can take with us is the good we can do and send on before us to build up the kingdom of God. In Germany, there is a small chapel that has over its door the image of a little lamb carved in stone. The story of this lamb goes back to the time when the chapel was being erected. One of the builders, working high up on the steeple of the church, lost his balance and fell. A herd of sheep was grazing in the courtyard, and he fell on one of the lambs. It broke his fall sufficiently that his life was saved. When he was able to take his place again, he vowed he would inscribe in stone a permanent record of what saved his life, and so the lamb was carved and placed above the door.

Man is saved from the sin of death by Christ, the Lamb of God. We sometimes sing from our hymnals, "He to rescue me from danger, interposed his precious blood." I wonder if we are conscious of what it means in our lives today.

I have not had the opportunity to see this personally, but I have read about it, and have been told that it is true. In a cathedral in England there is in effigy the figures of a crusader and his lady, and the lady's right hand is gone. Tradition has it that this young knight, while fighting under Richard the Lion-Hearted in the struggle for the liberation of the Holy Land and in quest of the Holy Grail, was taken prisoner by Saladin, the Moslem conqueror. He went before him and appealed for his life, on the basis that he would like to return to his homeland, where he could again be with his bride. The ruler replied that he shouldn't worry too much about that, that she would soon find another. However, if the young warrior was that much concerned, Saladin would write to her and require of her a ransom for her husband, which would be her right hand. There came back to this ruler making this demand, the right hand of the lady. She was willing to give as a ransom for her husband, even her right hand. Her brave sacrifice was recorded in stone.

So the blood of Christ is proof of God's love for us, and we must remember what he has done for us. Christ has performed many services. He has reconciled man to God.

Our court records over the country show that the percentage of divorces being granted is mounting, and it gives us a great deal of concern. We are still hopeful that the church shall lag considerably behind the world in this respect, as it has done in the past. But this only reminds us that evil-doing separated man from God. If the evil-doer is able to separate man from his earthly companion, how much worse it is that he can separate man from his Heavenly Father, if he continues his evil deeds.

GOD GAVE US the way in Christ; he gave us peace on earth. Sometimes as we look around we wonder where that is, and for how long this peace was upon the earth. We have tried many of the ways of life today. I am wondering, as I consider the things which are going on in the councils of the world, in the United Nations, whether these people ever think about trying the ways of God or Christ. Europe, we are told, is sitting on a powder keg; anything could make that keg blow up and throw us into the chaos of another war. I was very much interested recently as I listened to a correspondent who had been stationed in Moscow as a representative of the United Press. He gave some of his observations of what was going on in Russia; and while he gave us a little hope that Russia is not prepared at the present to enter into full-scale war—to invade the United States or any other nation—we do not feel much assurance as we see the other things that are being done among the people of the world. Perhaps Russia is not ready at the present, but we know she is preparing, and we can find hope in the fact that our nation is making preparation to prevent war by being prepared for it. Many times "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." In relation to these events, we must consider Christ's reconciling man to God a very great mission. We wonder if the results are worth what he had to pay.

There is a story told about a man and a woman who had been married for quite some time before they were divorced. Each moved to a different town. But before they were separated, their son died and was buried in the cemetery of the town they had both left. Upon one occasion when the husband had gone to the grave to pay homage to the memory of the son, the wife came. As he heard the footsteps on the path, he looked around and discovered who was coming. His first impulse was to leave immediately and have nothing to do with her. But the second impulse, born of the tie that had bound them together, was to remain. He did, and as a consequence they were reconciled. It took nothing less than the death of their son to bring them together.

It is a terrible thing, the life we see today. It takes nothing less than the crucifixion of Christ to bring God and man together—"And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." We find that recorded in John 3: 14. As we read it, we realize that Christ's place in the scheme of things was to redeem mankind from the consequences of sin and death which he himself was not able to escape.

As Christ went to the cross to fulfill his destiny, he knew what lay ahead of him. He knew what lay ahead for mankind, and he looked out over Jerusalem and wept over the mistakes and sufferings that men would experience.

ABOUT A MONTH AGO, it was my privilege to be here at the Stone Church and participate in the communion service with many of you. Brother Don Alberts of Australia, in making the communion address that day, mentioned the fact that when he came to this country, he had the opportunity to go to Clifton's restaurant in Los Angeles. In the basement of this restaurant is a shrine, which was built by the family, where visitors might worship in silence and meditation. There is an image of the Christ as he knelt with his hands folded, looking out over the city of Jerusalem. As the lights rise, controlled by an unseen hand, the picture of the city and the Christ becomes clear. One sees in Christ's face and in the posture of his hands, how he felt, knowing the fate of the people, what they would do with their lives—their general hopelessness.

We often cry out at the low quality literature in the world today, forgetting that our literature is only a reflection of the times, only a symptom of the life we lead. We sometimes condemn the authors, but I think we do it hastily, because the author is only reflecting what is going on about him. If our literature is of a low tone, a degrading nature, it is because of the life we are living. Yet the Christ went to his death knowing these things. We have Biblical records and the account of Joseph of Arimathea telling how he claimed the body of the Savior and took it to the sepulcher and there laid it in rest that it should again be resurrected. We also have the secular legend of how Joseph of Arimathea carried the vessel—the Holy Grail—from which Christ drank the wine at the Last Supper and in which Joseph later caught the precious blood of Christ—to Gastonbury. The knights gathered around it once a year, and the king unveiled it. Then they looked upon it to receive the light reflected from it which would give them strength to go out and pursue diligently the purpose of protecting it against dull onslaughts from the unbeliever. According to legend, only the pure in heart could look upon this Holy Grail because of its brightness. Today we consider that all are entitled to look upon the light of the Christ and receive strength that they shall be able to go ahead with the task which is theirs. We think about this and realize that the Christ has not been partial; he gives to all mankind the opportunity to receive strength from him.

IT MAKES NO DIFFERENCE in what degree of sin we find ourselves, there is always a turning point. We can change from the life we have been leading, determined we shall sin no more. It is my hope and prayer that as we participate in the prayer services, in classwork, in social activities this conference week we may experience together with God somewhat the life he would have us lead. We have gathered here in this center place as his children. We have gathered, hoping we can taste some of the Zionite life that shall come to us in the eventuality his kingdom is established—and the kingdom must be established on earth today as it is in heaven.

In closing, I would like to repeat the words recorded in Isaiah: "Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Let us contemplate this in our life today, whatever our station is. Let us be diligent. Let us be consecrated. Let us never cease to realize that our Christ has redeemed us with his precious blood.

Now, what are we going to do about redeeming the world?

He describes the old board sidewalks, the town pump, his first visit to Graceland College, and his first meeting with the beloved Joseph Smith, which took place on a baseball diamond. He has much to say of the development of various musical groups in the community and presents several of his fellow musicians as well as students.

In short, Lamoni's Passing Parade is the kind of a story many communities would like to have written . . . there is no one to write it.

Many, many things can be said about Mr. Anthony, depending upon which facet of his talent is turned to the light. He is first and foremost a musician and composer, having written many Graceland songs. He is remembered by others as a teacher, an expert in woodcraft, and a printer; currently he is on the staff of the Blair Publishing Company. He has written two other books, Birds of a Feather and Matty, both published by the Herald Publishing Company and read widely by Latter Day Saint youths in the early twenties.

CHRIST and the Engineer derive from it.

Lucifer, the son of the morning, had certain great powers, and with them was given a choice as to how he would use them. He misused them, but that did not alter the power he had. At the opposite pole was Christ, to whom the Father had also given great power. He used that power to redeem men from their sins and misdeeds. The use of power is the moral pillar, not the presence of power.

Engineers who design, manufacture, and maintain the machines of today are responsible for the lives of men whom those machines serve. Failure of a machine can take a life as surely as the slip of a skilled surgeon's knife. Men who make machines can evaluate them only in terms of their benefit to human life. People are responsible to the engineer in turn to use the machine in the manner intended. Cars weren't built to kill people, but they do.

THE MACHINE AGE has done but one thing. It has served as an amplifier to point up the strengths and weaknesses of the human creators. This pointing-up has made the necessity of spreading Christianity and its doctrine of right relations ever clearer. The work of engineers and scientists has allowed men to slowly achieve greater power. This power has been converted to righteous use and perverted to unrighteousness. In the spiritual realm, even the beautiful teachings of Christ have been perverted by unscrupulous men to do their evil deeds.

I trust by now we see the engineers must be Christians, too, or their efforts lose significance, as does all other human effort without this

I WAS SEATED by my radio a few nights ago, listening to one of the weekly broadcasts. It was a debate between a team of two clergymen and two engineers. This was the accusation being hurled at the engineers: "It is your machines, production methods, and the machine age that is responsible for the ills of the world."

I am a young man trained in the field of engineering. Because of my training, I think of things in engineering terms—even my religious beliefs. I think of things in engineering terms—even my religious beliefs. Therefore, I demand that my belief be fundamental and quantitative. Here was the accusation being directed at me: I was being told that my chosen profession and my handiwork was unclean and evil. All young persons must be convinced that their chosen professions will be a credit to the civilization they live in and an aid to the people about them before they embark upon them. I was faced with the problem of admitting my error or formulating reasons why the accusation was falacious.

IN THE BEGINNING of history, there were all gradations of righteous and unrighteous men, just as there are today. This gradation was not so apparent unless the individual was given some specific power over the people about him.

Then dawned the age of tools. For example, the sharp-edged tool that may be fashioned to build homes and prepare food or to be used as a weapon of war. At this dawning, people realized there were relations which existed between them. Because of these relationships, there were accompanying new responsibilities.

Men went on to develop power-driven machinery. The responsibility of one man to another was intensified. In recent years, atomic energy has been released and utilized. Again men's responsibility, one to another, has been intensified. Material things have not suddenly taken on morality. Morality depends not on a machine form or power but on the type of utility men

The Magic of Faith

By NAOMI RUSSELL

I'M NOT SURE what faith is, but I do know that it works. I believe it is just as effective in fighting the doubts and uncertainties of this life as penicillin is in combating virus diseases. Even in physical illness, I would give it first choice over many of the wonder drugs, and certainly there is no substitute for it in treating the spiritually sick.

The miracles worked by faith are numerous and as varied as the personalities affected. There are many classic examples recorded in history, but each day sees the effect of faith in action in some life.

One of my twelve-year-old juniors discovered the potency of faith in her English class. For some reason, Barbara had forgotten to memorize the poem assigned to the sixth graders. Came Friday afternoon, and she realized what a tight spot she was in. Fortunately, the teacher began at the first of the alphabet and, since Barbara's name was near the end, she had time to do something about her predicament. She couldn't, of course, learn the poem by reading and re-reading it, so she explained to God how she yardstick of measure. Engineers are not the ruthless, calculating builders of destruction their accusers would have them be. They must be men of God whose efforts will lead to more abundant life—spiritually as well as materially.

The admonition to be left with all young people is: Choose your profession in relation to its service to people, for your happiness as well as theirs; then, having chosen, realize you will write the instructions for the use of your handiwork, be it professional advice or how to properly use a machine. These instructions often determine in what way the products of your hands will be used. You can mold a Christian destiny.

had forgotten and asked for help. To put it in her own words, "Boy, did I ever pray!" Then she listened carefully to the others as they recited, and, when her time came, she gave the entire poem without missing a word.

My eighty-three-year-old grandmother has the kind of faith that works, too. She never asks for anything she doesn't need, but when she asks, she expects results. During a recent snowstorm, Grandma began to worry as inch after inch of the white stuff piled upon her porch and walk. It was too deep to sweep off, and she didn't have a snow shovel—so she put her faith to work and sent up a petition for help. Not long after that, a boy with a shovel rang her doorbell and asked if she'd like to have him clean off her walks. Grandma was delighted and, before he left, she signed him up to cut her grass next summer.

THEN THERE'S THE CASE of Aunt Mary. She didn't realize when she married Uncle Jo that he was going to be so contrary. She spent a whole year trying to interest him in the church, but he refused to listen. He wouldn't go with her on Sundays, he wouldn't go on Wednesday nights, and he didn't tolerate Aunt Mary's missionaries around the place. Most women would have given him up as a lost cause—but not Aunt Mary. When the fine art of persuasion failed to bring the desired results, she enlisted the help of the Almighty. "Lord," she said, "every day at noon for one year, I'm going to get down on my knees and ask you to help Jo see the light." And she did just that. At the end of the year, Jo was the same bull-headed, cantankerous, unyielding agnostic he had been before Aunt Mary started praying for him. But she wasn't one to give up. "All right, Lord," she said, "I'll pray for him another year." And every day at twelve o'clock she knelt beside the bed and repeated her supplication. At the end of the second year Jo remained unchanged, so Aunt Mary reported to God, "He still won't listen, Lord; he's still ignoring your call to repent and be baptized, but let's give him one more year." Her patience, if not her faith, must have wavered as the third year drew to a close without Jo's showing the slightest sign of improvement. Then one high noon as Mary knelt in prayer, Jo stood outside the bedroom door and watched. Tossing his cap and leather-palmed gloves on the dining room table, he strode into the bedroom and in a firm voice announced, "Mary, I'm going to pray with you."

Uncle Jo was a different man after that—very different. He buried his pipe and can of Prince Albert behind the woodshed. He gave Aunt Mary the privilege of breaking the bottle of wine he had kept on the top pantry shelf. He gave up swearing, and he started going to church. Although Uncle Jo's formal education ended with the fourth grade, he resolved to learn to read. He wanted to know for himself what the church was all about—not just take the minister's or Mary's word for it. Few conversions in all of this church's history have ever been so wholehearted or complete as Jo's, and he spent many years in priesthood work before his life here came to an end. Yet, but for Aunt Mary's faith, he might well have gone to his grave a sinner.

GREAT THINGS are accomplished through faith . . . faith in

New Horizons

God, faith in mankind, faith in self. Barbara believed God would help her to remember; she believed in her classmates and listened to them, never doubting that the poem they recited was the right one; she believed in herself, saying, "I can do it"—and she did. Grandma*trusted God would hear her prayer, or she would never have taken time out of her busy day to pray; she trusted that somewhere in town was somebody who would want to clean the snow off her porch and walks; she was confident that the prayer she uttered was acceptable to God—and it was. Perhaps Aunt Mary had the greatest faith of all. She knew her Lord was interested in Jo's soul, because He is interested in the souls of all men; she saw in Jo some wonderful possibilities, and through the three years she prayed for him, she kept seeing him as the man he could be rather than the man he was; she believed that, even though it took a long time, she would be successful in her crusade for right—and she was.

As I've said before, I don't know what faith is, but I do know it works. And whatever problem comes my way, I'm going to use faith in solving it.

and under whose hands the people of the church will be blessed?" she answered, "Here is Alexander." And when God said, "Where is David, the sweet singer of Israel, who never saw his father?" she answered, "Here is David." She kept the faith and saved her sons to the church.

Surely the story of Emma Smith alone should be sufficient to convince every woman in the church that her calling is sacred, her task sublime, and her work of major importance in achieving the great goals of the Restoration Movement.

She fell asleep in her room in the southeast corner of the Nauvoo house on April 30, 1879, and when she died, a city wept as for a friend departed. She was laid to rest near the unmarked grave of her husband, among the lilac bushes of the Old Homestead on the shores of the Father of Waters.

alone, but because of the political, social, scientific, and ethical development of its people from every race, nation, and clime; and because it is the land upon which the "Camp of the Saints" (Zion) and of the City of Enoch, the New Jerusalem from heaven, will be established.

Many of the prophets of the Old and New Testaments predicted the setting up of the kingdom of God on earth, but Isaiah mentions the particular place—America! Ether, the major prophet of the first American people, said: "... after the waters had receded off the face of this land, it became a choice land above all other lands, a chosen land of the Lord . . . and that it was the place of the New Jerusalem, which should come down from heaven, and the holy sanctuary of the Lord."—Ether 6: 1-12.

These prophecies and their fulfillment are brought to attention not for complacency or self-satisfaction, but as a stirring challenge reminding us that the pattern of God is unfolding in the fabric of history, and that God and man await the unfolding pattern of the "kingdom of Zion" in the ministerial and saintly fabric of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

NEWS AND NOTES

STATISTICS.—President F. Henry Edwards reports the following information from the statistician: The total enrollment of the church as of January 1, 1949, is 138,532. The total baptisms for January, 1949, were 126. The branches showing greatest baptismal gains were Hearne, Texas (10), Bellaire, Ohio (8), Des Moines, Iowa (6), and Santa Ana, California (6).

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—Elder Casimir M. Nikel has been presenting a very popular lecture to civic groups in Cleveland, Ohio: "Whence Came the Red Man?" Men's clubs, churches, young people's societies, and business societies have been giving him numerous invitations to present this lecture, which he illustrates with colored slides. For an example of the type of publicity Brother Nikel is receiving, the house organ of the Cleveland Section of The American Welding Society gave an article with the following statements: "To those of the Christian World who believe that Asia is the cradle of civilization, this lecture poses a major question as to the possible origin of the American aborigines. Mr. Nikel's work as a clergyman has taken him far afield. He has traveled in thirty-seven of the forty-eight states, and in parts of Canada and Mexico. His experience among the Indians in the Southwest has stimulated a hobby of investigating archaeological findings which makes the lecture on 'Whence Came the Red Man' possible." M. S. Shane, the chairman of the society, in a letter of thanks to Brother Nikel said, "We shared your enthusiasm, and your colored slides had us spellbound."

IN OKLAHOMA AND KANSAS

Apostle Reed Holmes has recently visited Saints in these two states. Groups he visited include: Alva, Enid, El Reno, Oklahoma City, Seminole, Stillwater, Tulsa, and Ponca City, all of Oklahoma; and Wichita, Kansas. MORNING DEVOTIONS RECORDED

Evans Fry, radio minister, reports that morning devotions broadcast daily at 6:30 a.m., are now being recorded. Three series of six fifteen-minute services are now completed. The Approach of Easter

NEWS AND NOTES

THE PURPOSE underlying the observance of the Christian anniversaries such as Easter is our desire to make sure that we do not concentrate exclusively on a few aspects of Saintry experience, but achieve a well-rounded working faith.

Thus when we approach Christmas, we meditate on the amazing fact that the Word was made flesh and dwelt among men; as we approach Easter, we think seriously on the fact that commonplace sinning crucified our Lord, but that God raised him up "having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it"; and as we approach Pentecost, we rejoice that when the disciples were united in faith and prayer, all the powers of heaven blessed and strengthened them.

During the next few weeks, as we approach Easter, we shall do well to think again of the fact of sin and on its awful consequences both in and around us. Let nothing cause us to think lightly of sin, for it is sin which impedes the coming of the kingdom of God. But let us think of sin in the light of Easter. The triumph of Easter can be our triumph if we will.

During these weeks prior to Easter, many good men and women are making special efforts to enter into the heart of the Christian experience. It will be easier to talk to such persons about religion during these next few weeks than at any other time during the year. Let us give deep thought to the meaning of Easter and—as our hope is cleansed and renewed—let us confess our faith and invite others to share it.

NEWS FROM ENGLAND

Apostle Blair Jensen and Bishop A. T. Trapp attended the Northern District Conference in England on the week end of January 30. Elders Frank Fry and Eric Rowe are spending the next six weeks in Wales, concentrating at Llanelly and Skewen. Elders Glen Johnson and Tom Worth are working at Birmingham, England. Apostle Jensen and Seventy Johnson will spend some time in Skandinavia during the next few weeks.

Brockway, Dr. Evan Shute, Elder Harley A. Morris, A. Neal Deaver, Mrs. Dean Edwards and Twila Fitch. UTAH AND WESTERN COLORADO

Seventy Russell Ralston is now spending two full weeks with each branch under his jurisdiction for concentrated missionary work. His first two weeks were spent in Malad, Idaho. From there he goes to Provo and Ogden, Utah, and then will spend six weeks in Colorado branches. The Provo, Utah, Branch has begun a program of junior church for the junior age boys and girls. Betty Nies and Nita McBride are in charge. During the Sunday morning worship hour, the boys and girls have their own service, with flannelgraph presentations, pictorial sermons, stories of the life of Christ and of church history, and stories from the Book of Mormon.

PROGRAMS READY

Franklyn S. Weddle, radio director, announces that there are eighteen complete radio programs available now for local branch use. They are fifteen minutes in duration; recorded transcriptions of Morning Devotions which are daily presented over KMBC by Radio Minister Evan Fry. These may be obtained by addressing the Radio Department, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

GRACELAND REPRESENTED IN CALIFORNIA

President E. J. Gleazer, Jr., of Graceland College, is visiting branches in California. On February 20, he lectured at Central Church in Los Angeles, showing Kodachrome slides, picturing life on the college campus. This lecture was a part of the Religious Education Institute series being held monthly at Central.

President Gleazer's plans included an address to the Berkeley congregation February 27. At this meeting he planned to feature the premiere showing of a publicity film, "Homecoming 1948."

In San Francisco, he attended the Annual Convention of the American Association of Junior Colleges, of which Graceland is a member.

Tell the Story

The Great Commission

Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.—Matthew 28: 19, 20.

Grandma couldn't go on a mission to the islands of the sea. She couldn't even preach a sermon to the folk at home. But her soul was illuminated with the glorious light of the gospel message, and she sang hymns of joy and gratitude for the plan of salvation that had been brought to her. She could gather the children in her home to tell the story to them in terms they could understand.

Grandma adjusted her glasses and peered into a red-backed copy of Zion's Praises, focusing her aged vision on Number 6. Auntie was seated on a bench at the upright piano, ready to play. The children were in a semi-circle of chairs, with books in their unskilled little hands, and waiting expectantly. Grandma nodded to Auntie, who began to play, and soon the older voice, cracking a little, was blending with a sweet, clear young one in the words,

Come, tell the story of His love
My soul delights to hear;
It falls like music from above,
Upon my listening ear.

As best they could, with a lot of encouragement from Grandma, the children joined in, and in a few practices learned to enjoy the songs. With such songs as this, hearts were touched by impressions that would never die.

Afterward there were lessons from the quarterly, with Grandma explaining everything on the page and some that was not. And if the children didn't understand quite everything, they all had the happy feeling that God was their Father as they sang, out of the same little red book,

My Father is rich in houses and lands,
He holdeth the wealth of the world in his hands;
Of rubies and diamonds, of silver and gold,
His coffers are full, He has riches untold.
I'm a child of the King

In her own way, Grandma was obeying the Great Commission. And so can everyone to whom the light of the latter-day gospel has come.

The Kingdom at Hand

From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.—Matthew 4: 17.

One thing Jesus knew better than anyone else: the story must be told. It must be told in the synagogues and in the temple, it must be told in the market places and the streets; it must be told to multitudes on the mountainside, and by the shores of the sea; it must be told to little families and groups of friends in the homes. His three years were like a lifetime of incessant missionary activity. His time was short; he must reach as many as possible with the message before the end should come.

One Shepherd, and One Fold

And daily in the temple, and in every house, they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ.—Acts 5: 42.

When the disciples received the commandment to carry the gospel message to all the people of the world, they did not know how far the work would eventually extend. They could not look forward two millenniums of time, nor could they imagine the whole New World that lay, unknown to them, beyond the seas, where the seed of Joseph was building a civilization that would later be destroyed when faith was lost:

Jesus was the only one who knew, when he spoke the cryptic words, what they meant, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also must I bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." —John 10: 16. But the disciples began their work in the ways they knew and laid a foundation upon which future generations would build, expanding the religion of a persecuted minority in a tiny land among a subjected people into a moral and spiritual force that would rank among the greatest powers of the world.

If we today could be touched by the love of souls, and by the zeal to bring them to the salvation that under the inspiration of Christ set the ancient disciples afire, we would enjoy a new Pentecost, and "bring them in" by thousands, as they did in the days of the early church.

Tell the Story

This is the theme for emphasis in the church for the month of March. Let us examine ourselves honestly and critically. Have we been telling the gospel story as we should?

There are many people in the church who have been brought to a knowledge of the gospel by the efforts, the sacrifice, and the witnessing of others. But they themselves have never carried the message to anybody else.

Jesus indicated his attitude toward empty lives that produce no good harvest,

Every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.—Matthew 3: 10.

There is a need for every church member to examine his record, to see whether he will be accepted or rejected in the final hour of judgment.

Personal Responsibility

By J. L. VERHEI

But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.—Matthew 6: 33.

IN THIS PRESENTATION, I hope to stimulate in my readers a new interest in the church. I should like to awake, if I can, a sense of obligation to this church and its mission.

Let me begin by telling a story of something which happened in my study a few months ago.

A young lady came to me one evening with a young man and requested that I perform the marriage service for them on a certain date. She was a stranger to me, and, as always in such a case, I asked why she had come to me. "Well," she said, "you are the minister of the church my parents belong to, and it will make them very happy if I have you perform this service. I have been informed that you always have such a nice service."

"Thank you," I said, "but what is your religious belief?"

"I have none," she said, "I haven't been inside a church for twenty years."

Since she looked to be scarcely twenty-one, I assumed that it was shortly after her blessing that she last entered the door of the church.

"Do your parents still believe in the Church of Jesus Christ?" I asked. "I don't know," she said. "I'm sure they haven't been to a church service in twenty years; but I believe they still have faith in it and were once good members."

I don't know what prompted my next remark—it was most cruel. I asked her, "Now, honestly, why don't you just go to the court house and get a justice of the peace to marry you?"

"Why?" she said in a tone of hurt surprise, "marriage means something to me; it's not like getting a dog license."

Needless to say, her answer was sufficient rebuke, and I said to her, "I will be very happy to perform this marriage ceremony for you, but let me say this to you. During the twenty years in which neither you nor your family supported the church in any way, some people were supporting this church, not only materially but spiritually, so that it would be the church you find today in which you might be married. The time will come when you will want to have your children blessed, and baptized, and your dead buried; and because those things will have significance for you, you will turn to the church. But don't go as a beggar seeking ministerial favors—go because it is your right to go. The church is not a social comfort station."

Social Pressure in Religion

It is astonishing how many people think of the church as existing solely for the blessing of babies, baptismal and marriage ceremonies, administration to the sick, and funerals. I know there are certain ministers who do not feel like performing these sacraments for families that are not in good standing in the church. There is much to be said for that point of view. Perhaps my own conviction on the subject simply encourages the feeling that the church exists solely for the convenience of the population.

I have always maintained that the church has no right to refuse anyone who asks its services. Such refusal often drives individuals completely away, while the acceptance by the church of its responsibility might awaken a little of the consciences of those who have neglected it.

This too seldom happens, and I believe the reason is because the majority of members do not attach the full importance and gain the real significance of the sacraments of baptism, blessing, laying on of hands, healings, marriage, and the Lord's Supper, or the service of burial of the dead.

Parents who have their children blessed and then never set foot inside of the church again until their children's wedding do so out of a sense of courtesy to an older generation who "would be very unhappy if the grandchild were not blessed."

Marriages very often are arranged in the church or in the home as a concession to social custom of our time, or because of the personal pleasure and prestige to be found in the glamour of the marriage service.

I am not sure I fully understand why persons who never attend church and do not believe in immortality insist upon the burial service. There is, I think, a social pressure that drives people into having this done for their loved ones, believing that if they acted in accordance with their convictions and let the undertaker dispose of the body in the most convenient fashion possible, there would be criticism from the members of the family and the community.

Neither do I understand why persons who never attend church call upon the ministry to lay hands on the sick. If they fully realized the importance of the sacrament, they would know that they must resign themselves to the will of the Father and be willing to obligate themselves fully to his service. His instructions after healing the sick were always, "Go thy way and sin no more. Take up thy cross and follow me." Sometimes this sacrament is requested as the result of social pressure which drives people to have it done for their loved ones.

There must be something of the same social pressure which leads parents to take their children to church school but for themselves have no other relationship with the church—either this or a complete misunderstanding of the purpose of the church school.

Adult Behavior

The purpose of the church school is not primarily to teach children the names of Hebrew leaders and the books of the Old and New Testaments, or the names of the latter-day leaders and the history of the Book of Mormon. Neither is it to review latter-day revelations, or to recount some of the church history stories. The purpose of the church school is to instill in children a sense of the significance of the religious thinking of mankind and to give the child the desire to build his or her life on a spiritual foundation based upon the teaching of Jesus.

The church school cannot possibly do this if the parents undo the task by making it perfectly clear to the child that they have no interest in the things of the spirit and of Zion as embodied in the church. The child quickly "catches on" that his parents consider everything about the church to be a waste of time, a bore, or simply childish. It is no wonder, then, that many children believe they have reached adulthood when they no longer have to go to church and can themselves stay at home, sleep in, and read the Sunday paper.

The institution of the church is for those who believe that men who have faith in God can contribute something to the healthful growth of our society. Just as the early founders of our nation can point with pride to the development of the American way of life and take some of the credit for that development, knowing that by the skillful use of their talents they have increased the more abundant living of its people and thus raised our standards of living to unprecedented heights, so church men can point with some measure of pride to their contributions, to the development of our social order and the strengthening of our communities.

Our Heritage

The whole color and strength of our civilization have been determined by men and women who have gained their inspiration from the church of Jesus Christ.

This is one form of social and moral progress which has taken place since the dawn of time in the early civilizations under the direction and guidance of men and women who believed in the existence of a supreme God and, believing, did something about it.

This country is what it is because there have been men and women in it who, through the church, contributed much to the development of that which you and I enjoy today.

May I say that if you have any ideals for the betterment of mankind, you have gained them by virtue of the heritage of the past, because our churches exist in these communities. Those ideas were given to you by men and women who believed in the existence of a living and supreme God and, believing, did something about it in and through their church.

Those ideals, however, have no life of their own. They are kept alive by the teaching and in the church. If the church ceased to exist, those ideals would cease to exist within a matter of a short time, just as they did during the Dark Ages.

We are living today in a time of great moral stress and strain, and if our communities are not what we wish them to be, if our world is not what we wish it to be, it is because our church has not measured up to its responsibility. It has not measured up because it has been weakened by the failures of men and women to give more of their lives and more of their substance to the perpetuation and strengthening of the church. Whatever moral and social progress these men and women who have failed the church now enjoy, they enjoy as parasites. They are reaping what others have sown, and they give nothing for future generations to reap.

Church Parasites

I am always moved to a sense of despair when I hear some men and women criticizing Communism for its godlessness, knowing, as I do, that by their actions they constantly demonstrate, Sunday after Sunday, that they agree with the leaders of Communism that the church is a useless part of their everyday lives. Of course, they do not agree with Communists that the church is useless to other people; but they do agree that the church is useless to them.

It's fine for the church to promise "pie in the sky by and by" to the other fellow, but as for them—they don't need what the church has to give. What the church really has to give is not "pie in the sky by and by" but strength to meet here and now the temptation and the everyday problems of life,

STRONG SWIMMERS IN DISTRESS

SOME YEARS AGO at the Low Banks Reunion in Canada, I heard a brother relate an experience he had had at one of the reunions. He was a very strong swimmer. No one worried about him when he was in deep water—in fact, they looked to him for help. One day he found himself a bit too far out in Lake Erie, and when he turned about, he headed into a stiff off-shore wind that was rolling up high waves. They beat against his face and drove him back from shore. He called for help as he became exhausted. He could plainly see friends on shore, laughing and playing in the shallow water. They did not understand his cry for help. They gave him no heed. He was the strong swimmer, probably having a fine time. Not until he crawled up on the beach and lay utterly spent did they understand his need.

Something like that may happen to “strong swimmers” among our church officers and workers to whom we offer no help in the hour when they need it most. They are strong men. What can happen to them? It is theirs always to give off strength to others!

WHEN “BROTHER JOSEPH” FALTERED

Remembered is a time when I, as a young man, sat in a General Conference in the old Brick Church in Lamoni. A barrage of criticism was beating upon President Joseph Smith. It had continued through the conference year. Finally we were stunned and aghast when he arose, handed the gavel to another, vacated the chair, and said in effect that he would never go out and become a disturbing element in the church, but he could not continue under the existing conditions. With tears running down his cheeks, he walked out of the assembly.

All had looked upon “Brother Joseph” as a man of overflowing strength and unfailing courage. It had never dawned upon them that while they watched, he was nearing exhaustion and in need of help. He was a strong swimmer. He had buoyed up many a brother in trouble. He could never hand in his resignation. But now they knew that even the strongest may have periods of depression difficult to combat. Perhaps he may have been to some degree at fault himself. Who shall say? The brother may have been at fault who ventured too far from shore in Lake Erie. Nevertheless he was in danger, and no hand helped him because no one gave heed.

Trusted friends went to the side of Brother Joseph with good and sober counsel, proffered help, and brotherly love. So he came back into the assembly, took up the gavel, left his case to the judgment of the conference, and went on. That was the only time in a half century of service that he ever faltered—so far as I know. That fact made the incident the more outstanding in memory.

WHEN PRESIDENT F. M. SMITH HANDED IN HIS RESIGNATION

At the Conference of 1919, the people were bewildered and grieved when President F. M. Smith handed in his resignation. Remembering the incident involving his father, as previously related, I was not so surprised as some. I could not understand all of his motivations at the time (or now). I know one of them. Shortly before the conference, I visited him at his home, and in the evening, we went for a long walk.

I endeavored to persuade him to reconsider and not resign. He was a man of such powerful mentality and physique that I had never suspected the depth of his despondency. But I found him depressed in spirit to the point of despair. At the time, I failed to rally his spirits. Eventually the matter worked out during the conference. I learned that no man is so strong and self-reliant that he may not reach the breaking point and need help, human as well as divine.

In passing, I may remark that Brother Fred M. worked under nervous tensions that few people ever suspected. One Sunday morning he was the preacher at the Stone Church. I was in charge of the service. It was no special occasion, but while the opening song was being sung, he thrust out his big hand and said, “Elbert, feel of that.” I did as he requested, and his hand was very cold. He added, “My hands are always like that when I am to preach.”

REMEMBER ELIJAH?

These were not the first prophets to seek escape from the assigned task. Remember Elijah? Remember how he withstood all the priests of Baal? He was strong and valiant and put all enemies to flight. Surely here was one to “stand at Armageddon and battle for the Lord.” Yet, as Elder Dan Sorden pointed out in a radio sermon, that grueling experience may have overtaxed Elijah. In any event, a little later when the Lord had another task for the prophet—just a continuation of his job as a prophet—Elijah ran away into the wilderness and sat under a juniper tree and handed in his resignation to Jehovah: “He requested for himself that he might die.”—I Kings 19: 4. Elijah was alone. No friend sought him out to help him. But the Lord came to his help presently, and he went on.

JESUS IN GETHSEMANE

Jesus in Gethsemane wept and prayed for the cup to pass from him.

His friends were all asleep. He was a "strong swimmer"—no need to watch with him! Yet he lamented, "Couldst thou not watch with me one hour?"

Over the long years, I have seen more than a few strong men in need of help—even men of the Presidency, the Apostles, the Bishopric. More than one has said in a time of despair: "Here is my portfolio, I am through." But with a little help, they recovered, as did Elijah, and went forward. Yes, and along with them you may think of missionaries, departmental workers, pastors, visiting officers, "lay members" in whose faces cares and duties and problems and fault-findings have at times beaten like waves of the sea to exhaust the strongest swimmer. Perhaps even their friends did not know how badly they needed help.

Looking back, it is a joy to remember times when I have helped someone under such conditions. It is a source of sorrow to recall times when I failed those in need.

Holland Mission Commemorates a Quarter Century

In a special service held in Rotterdam, Holland, on February 13, Elder A. J. Mosterdijk led the Saints in a service commemorating the organization of the first branch of the Reorganized church in Holland on February 10, 1924. At that time Apostles Paul M. Hanson and J. F. Curtis organized the branch in a simple service in the home of John J. Graven in Schiedam, a suburb of Rotterdam.

In the commemoration service, the choir sang, "The Spirit of God Like a Fire Is Burning," in the Dutch language. Elder Mosterdijk read letters of greeting and congratulation from Elders Hanson and Curtis. Several of the "charter" members were present. Of these Brother Arie Pijl told of the organizational meeting. His daughter, Sister Cornelia Boogaard told of her experience of being baptized in the icy waters of the Meuse River that winter. Elder A. J. Mosterdijk talked of some of the work that has been done during the past twenty-five years, and Elder Marius van Oorschot told of the organization of the second branch some years later in Friesland by Apostle Rushton. Mission President Albert Scherer expressed appreciation for the sacrifices, work, and faithfulness of those who through the past quarter century were able to strengthen the church, helping increase its membership from twenty-five to 350, in spite of war, famine, and poverty. They offered a challenge for the future work of the Mission.

Today there are large branches at Rotterdam and Zwaagwesteinde in Friesland, and missions in Schiedam, Utrecht, Leeuwarden, Houtigehage and Groningen.

Books Needed by Music Department

Franklyn S. Weddle, Director of Music for the church, is eager to complete the collection of hymnbooks printed by our church, for the music department library in the Auditorium. Saints who may have copies they would be willing to sell are asked to write Brother Weddle concerning their books. These books are used for research and are wanted to be held for historical interest. The missing volumes are:

1. Selection of Sacred Hymns, by Emma Smith, second edition, Nauvoo, 1841. (The music library contains the first edition of this book, but the second edition has some additional hymns, making a total of 304. Emma Smith took most of the hymns of her book principally from the Methodist hymnal of that time.)

2. A hymnal by an unknown title, published in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1861, with 249 hymns. A later edition of this same hymnal printed in 1864, which has thirty-seven additional hymns, is already in the library.

3. Another hymnal whose name is not known, published in 1839 by Benjamin C. Elsworth, based on the Emma Smith collection, containing 114 hymns.

4. A hymnal, known familiarly as the European edition, published by the quorum of twelve in 1840.

Brother Weddle would also like to obtain a copy of the book Stories of Our Hymns, by Carlyle F. Kueffer for the music library.

Brother Weddle is doing considerable research to find the music sung at the dedication of the Kirtland Temple in 1836. All but one of the songs have been traced. The one still unaccounted for must have been a hymn of the Restoration, for its name was "Adam-ondi-Ahman." Anyone who might give help in locating or tracing this hymn is asked to write to Franklin Weddle, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Tribute to W. L. Wehrli

The St. Louis Branch sustained a severe loss on January 7, when Elder Walter L. Wehrli laid down the burdens of the flesh and passed to his well-earned reward.

He had been faithful in the discharge of his duties as a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ, and for many years had moved among the Saints of the branch and district in his ministry of love. He was as a father to the young, inexperienced men who were sent to the St. Louis Branch as pastors.

The love and esteem in which he was held was indicated by the large floral offering and the many who attended the services, as well as the testimonies of those to whom he labored. His influence will live long in the lives of the people of this branch and district, and yet unborn generations will benefit because of the godly ministry of this consecrated man who moved among the people in blessing.

I feel a distinct loss in the passing of Brother Wehrli and will miss him from his accustomed place in the house of the Lord when the Saints meet for worship.

A Sure Foundation

By G. L. DeLapp
Presiding Bishop of the Church

From a wire recording of a sermon delivered December 5, 1948, at Stone Church, Independence, Missouri.

To whom he said, This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing; yet they would not hear.

But the word of the Lord was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken.

Wherefore hear the word of the Lord, ye scornful men, that rule this people which is in Jerusalem.

Because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us; for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves;

Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation; he that believeth shall not make haste.—Isaiah 28: 12-16.

THE THEME I have chosen is the phrase, "A Sure Foundation," selected from the Scripture. Isaiah was speaking to Ephraim when this admonition was given. In the preceding passages of Scripture there is a severe criticism made of the people, of their way of life, of the fact that they were refusing to acknowledge and recognize the commands of God and to comply with them. As a consequence, the prophet felt it was his responsibility to inform them that they had received commandments, that they had been admonished in the past, and that they should so conduct themselves and change their course of life and come up to a higher plane, living more nearly in harmony with the will of God. Along with the admonition, there was also the promise given, "Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation; he that believeth shall not make haste." And in another passage: "Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet; . . ."

BUILDING STONES

What is this foundation to which Isaiah alluded? It is made up of several important elements. First, the foundation is based upon the promises of God to mankind. Most of us are inclined to read the Scripture in the light of the promises it holds for us, the hope it affords us, the better life we are to experience sometime in the future. We give too little consideration to the basis upon which we are to build if we are to receive those promises and enjoy that abundant life. However, the foundation upon which we are to build is necessarily the promises of God to mankind. These promises consist of his gospel, as the promise made to Abraham that he would be a God unto him and unto his people.

Such promises as these have substance. They are basic to the building of Zion. They are, in fact, the stones of the foundation to which Isaiah referred upon this occasion.

One of the other elements of this foundation stone is that of faith in God and in his Son, Jesus Christ. It is upon this faith that the saints down through the ages have carried forward the work of preaching the gospel and of building the kingdom.

The Scriptures point to Jesus Christ as the cornerstone of the work of God,

For the stone which the builders disallowed, is become the head of the corner.—I Peter 2: 8.

This is also the promise of the new heaven and the new earth, as related by John in the twenty-first chapter of Revelation, in which there is given the description of that great city, the New Jerusalem.

These constitute some of the foundation stones upon which we are to build, and surely, there should be no question in the mind of any Latter Day Saint as to whether we have been commanded to build; for if there is one commandment that is given to us above all else, it is the commandment to "seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness." In I Peter 2: 5, there is evidence that the members of the church also constitute some of the foundation stones which are to go in the building of Zion. "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." And in the sixth verse, "Behold, I lay in Zion a chief corner stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded."

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE BUILDERS

If we are to build Zion upon these foundation stones, first, upon our belief in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and second, through expression of our faith in him and in the promises made of God through him; then we accept the fact that we, in so believing, also constitute the stones in that foundation. We must also acknowledge the fact that there is imposed on us particular responsibilities. Further, there is evidence in latter-day revelations that we will be held accountable for the extent we participate in that building. It is in the mind of God that his kingdom shall be built here on the earth; and the promises given to men down through the ages are not made simply to afford us joy and happiness, but to spur us on, to challenge us, to enable us to see and understand the divine purpose; and in that understanding to acknowledge our individual responsibilities and to mold our lives accordingly that we may participate in the building of the kingdom.

The Scriptures say that faith in God is one of the elementary principles upon which we must build; but faith in God in and of itself is not adequate. There must be an outward expression of acts on the part of the individual if there is to be the realization of the kingdom, for we find in latter-day revelation that God judges "every man according to his works, and the deeds which he has done" (Doctrine and Covenants 18: 1). And also in the second paragrah, ". . . . Wherefore, I command you to repent, and keep the commandments which you have received by the hand of my servant, Joseph Smith, Jr., in my name; and it is by my Almighty power that you have received them"

We should study the commandments which are given to us as they are the revelations of Divinity. Sometimes Latter Day Saints are inclined to feel that the Scripture we have received, although it applies particularly to us, is not to be taken too seriously—that there isn't a great deal we need to do about it. But when we read that Scripture carefully, when we examine it critically, we find that it imposes upon us as individuals specific responsibilities, greater than we find imposed upon us in Scriptures received previously. I do not mean to minimize the laws recorded in the Bible, but the whole purpose of the Restoration Movement, the purpose of the revelation of the divine will with the restoration of the church, was to give men an understanding of the particular responsibility that they have in this age to build the kingdom of God here on the earth.

PREPARATION OF THE BUILDERS

We should examine these Scriptures seriously. We are commanded in section 85: 20:

Behold, I will hasten my work in its time; and I give unto you who are the first laborers in this last kingdom, a commandment, that you assemble yourselves together, and organize yourselves, and prepare yourselves; and sanctify yourselves.

I find a willingness on the part of many individuals to acknowledge the wisdom of the first part of this commandment—a commandment that you “assemble yourselves together, and organize yourselves,” but when it comes to the last instruction, “prepare yourselves and sanctify yourselves,” I find a different attitude expressed and a different reaction to the commandment.

There can be no real organization of the people of the church unless there is sanctification, consecration, the willingness to dedicate life, talents, and resources to the cause of building the kingdom of God. In this same section, paragraph 21, we read:

I give unto you a commandment, that you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom; teach ye diligently and my grace shall attend you, that you may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand; of things both in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and the perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that ye may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again, to magnify the calling whereunto I have called you, and the mission with which I have commissioned you.

If Latter Day Saints will comply with this instruction, there will be no question as to the ability of our members to organize and sanctify themselves, for compliance with the instructions given in this specific paragraph means there must be an application of mind, resources, and all that the individual has to the building of his own life that he might make his contribution to the building of the kingdom of God. Read it. Study it, and in studying, there will come to you a better comprehension than you have ever experienced of the great and eternal purposes of God and of the scope of this work of building the kingdom.

THE WORK OF THE AARONIC PRIESTHOOD

What does it mean to us, and how may we make the application? We have talked about organization for years, but in the last three years the Presiding Bishopric has been attempting to organize the Aaronic priesthood in the city of Zion. Why are we interested in the organization of the Aaronic priesthood? Because we believe it is absolutely essential to the building of the kingdom of God here upon the earth.

This much we have accomplished in part and something else has been accomplished in the way of organization. In the administration of the financial program of the church, we have set up reserves which we believe to be in harmony with the principle of the storehouse. We wish to point out that there can be no storehouse except the general church, as such, in the administration of its funds, complies with those principles which are fundamental and basic to the establishment of Zion. As we look toward the future, toward the organization of our people, we recognize there was an imperative command to which we must respond—that of instructing the Aaronic priesthood in the specific duties which are theirs in regard to the teaching of the Saints. So we have started with the teaching of the Aaronic priesthood, and we are making surveys and studies. We find there is a rather large percentage who fail to see any significance whatsoever in this work in which we are engaged relative to the instruction of the Aaronic priesthood. Some have said, “Well, I’m not interested in assuming the responsibilities which are mine as a member of the Aaronic priesthood.”

And what are these responsibilities which devolve upon the members of the Aaronic priesthood? Let me list a few of them for you. It is the responsibility of the ministry of this church to look after the welfare of the members; that’s basic, and the ministers of the church cannot look to the welfare of the members of the church if they are not willing to go into the homes of those members and render service. This is elemental and very fundamental. The business of organization can proceed only to the extent that individual members of the Aaronic priesthood will respond to the call we are making for them to train and qualify themselves as servants of God. Do you suppose it’s going to be possible to instruct the Saints “in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God” unless we first instruct the members of the priesthood relative to those things? Can we expect that they are going to reach the members and give the kind of instruction which brings unity in the home or instruct them, in respect to doctrine, to the gospel, to the theory of building Zion without proper training? Our progress will be definitely related to the response we get from the members of the Aaronic priesthood in learning the responsibilities of their office.

RESPONSIBILITIES FOR OUR HOMES

Some people have said that we of the Bishopric are not concerned with organization, that because we do not go out and organize some little business where someone can get a few more dollars, or more monetary returns, we are not seeing the great purposes of the church. We are saying there are certain things which are fundamental and basic in this business of organization of the members of the church to the task of building the kingdom, and there can be no successful organization in business, industry, or co-operatives, or in any of these fields which have to do with our temporal life, except there is also some growth and development made in the homes and among the members. There must be the willingness to respond. We have looked forward to the time when we could say to the members of the Aaronic priesthood, “you are an extension of the arm of the Bishopric. You are to go into the homes to see that there are none who are in need. See that none lack the basic necessities of life—food, shelter, clothing.” We are placing this responsibility upon the members of the Aaronic priesthood of this church, and if there are those in the church who are in need, let there be sent to them a member of the Aaronic priesthood to find out the source of the difficulty, and see that there may be brought to that family those things of which it stands in need. It isn’t always food, it isn’t always money, it isn’t always just a gift they require. In many instances, what they need is ministry to go along with these things of a physical character. They need to know someone is concerned about them, that someone may lift them up and give them the assurance, that someone cares about them.

There can be no real organization, no real progress, unless we respond to the challenge which we are placing before members of the Aaronic priesthood today, to qualify themselves as standing ministers in the church. We say this is elementary, fundamental, and basic. Real growth will come as we learn how to rehabilitate the members of our church who are in need of such rehabilitation, for there are some who have not learned the art of making a living. There are some who have not learned how to apply themselves to the task of producing sufficient for the needs of themselves and their families. It becomes our responsibility, in brotherly consideration and good fellowship, to lift those who are in such need. Such organization and training is essential to the Gathering about which the church has received instruction.

THE WORK OF THE GATHERING

Behold, there is none other place appointed than that which I have appointed, neither shall there be any other place appointed than that which I have appointed for the work of the gathering of my saints, until the day cometh when there is found no more room for them; and then I have other places which I will appoint unto them, and they shall be called stakes, for the curtains, or the strength of Zion.

Do we believe in the Gathering? I've been asking myself the question in recent years, and some people have thought that because we did not invite people to come to the central areas by hundreds and thousands, we lacked a little faith in the Gathering. I believe in the Gathering: I believe it is absolutely fundamental and basic to the establishment of the kingdom of God that there shall be a continuous gathering and that the process shall go on and on and on until we have gathered together those who are qualified and capable of building the kingdom of God here upon the earth. I believe it was a divine instruction given to Joseph Smith that "there is none other place than that which I have appointed." I believe Zion, the Center Place, is the place of the Gathering, but there are some other things I must believe too. I must believe that the Gathering will take place in harmony with the law, and the law suggests that every man is accountable as a steward. Doctrine and Covenants 101:2, states that, ". . . every man may give an account unto me of the stewardship which is appointed unto him, for it is expedient that I, the Lord, should make every man accountable . . ."

Do we believe that? We are to organize; we are to teach; we are to instruct. What are we to instruct? What are we expecting of members of the Aaronic priesthood? We expect them to become qualified in the field of the financial law of the church and to instruct the members of the church relative to their responsibility—not just because of the need insofar as the church is concerned, but because it is fundamental to the welfare of the individual that he comply with the financial law of the church.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF STEWARDS

There can be no real spiritual growth on the part of any individual who does not recognize his responsibility as a steward and comply with the stewardship responsibility. Let us face that as a fact. It is not just something I'm saying; it has been revealed as the will of God "that every man may give an account unto me of the stewardship which is appointed unto him; for it is expedient that I, the Lord, should make every man accountable." When we have approximately 25,000 members only in a given year, who contribute tithing or offerings to the church, out of over 130,000 members recorded on the books, is it any wonder we are not making the progress we should make relative to the organization to which reference has been made? Is it any wonder that the establishment of the kingdom progresses slowly?

A LOOK TO THE FUTURE

Let us look to the future and that which will be required of us as we become more perfectly organized:

Verily, thus saith the Lord, I require all their surplus property to put into the hands of the bishop of my church of Zion, for the building of mine house, and for the laying the foundation of Zion, and for the priesthood, and for the debts of the presidency of my church; and this shall be the beginning of the tithing for my people; and after that, those who have thus been tithed, shall pay one tenth of all their interest annually; and this shall be a standing law.

As we look to the church of the future, I think we should become conscious of the fact that we are to build on a sure and safe foundation, beyond the elementary principles of the gospel. It means more than faith in God, for there must be an expression of that faith in the discharge of stewardship responsibility. It must mean more than baptism, for baptism only gives to the individual the opportunity to associate himself in a common endeavor of community and Zion-building. This is the purpose of baptism; in addition to the personal benefits which come when our sins are forgiven, there is given to us the opportunity of entering into a new era of life experience. But this new era is one which brings to us the challenge of accountability, the responsibility of acknowledging we are stewards over all of our talents and resources. It means more than a belief in eternal judgment. These are the things which go to make up the great values we find inherent in the gospel, but if we believe them—if we believe in these principles of revelation, if we believe that back in 1828, 29, and 30, and in those other years when there is evidence that there was revealed from on high to Joseph Smith the principles upon which Zion was to be built—it means we too must recognize that God in heaven knows day by day what is going on in our own thinking. We must realize we are responsible for what we do, and that we will be held accountable both here and in the hereafter. All of these principles are woven together until they become a whole; we can't say, "Well, I believe in baptism, but I don't believe in accountability. I believe in the hope of eternal life, but I don't believe in accountability. I believe in the kingdom which is to come with the millennium, but I don't believe that I have any responsibility for the building of the kingdom here and now."

THE FULLNESS OF THE GOSPEL

If there is one thing which Latter Day Saint Scripture reveals to us, it is that there can be only a minimum enjoyment of these great blessings which the gospel holds in store for us unless we comply with the gospel in its fullness, and respond to the challenge which comes to us as builders of that kingdom here upon the earth. We shall enjoy life hereafter only as we build life here and now. These are the things which go to make up the sure foundation.

I have been interested in the last few years, as I have come in contact with men both outside and within the church who have been able to accumulate substantial portions of worldly goods, that in practically every instance these people are concerned not only about what they have accumulated, but what will happen to it in the next few years. They see the problems of world war, and the possibility of socialization of industry. They even think in terms of confiscation of property, and they are concerned. For the individual who believes in the Gospel of Jesus Christ in its fullness, there is no reason to be concerned. We have been promised a life here and a life to come, a life which can be full and abundant. If we will but comply with the laws that are given. It is a challenge which comes to us, and we look forward—those of us who have responsibility in the work of the Bishopric—to the more complete, gradual organization of our people into these fields of endeavor toward which we have looked. We are saying that if we make progress, it will be in relation to our ability to train and develop members of the priesthood to serve as standing ministers; to teach, to train, to instruct, to inspire the members of our church relative to their duties and responsibilities, and to have faith in the establishing of Zion.

Service Expectancy

Blanche Green Passes On

By APOSTLE ARTHUR OAKMAN

Funeral sermon given at Stone Church on Monday, February 7, 1949

For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.

And Jesus said unto them, He that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life.

Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? . . . Nay, in all of these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

And for those among you who are sick, the elders of the church two or more shall be called and shall pray for and lay their hands upon them in my name, and if they die, they shall die unto me, and if they live they shall live unto me, thou shalt live together in love inasmuch that thou shalt weep for the loss of them that die, and more especially for those that have not hope of a glorious resurrection, and it shall come to pass that those who died in me shall not taste of death, for it shall be sweet unto them. Wherefore, we labor that whether present or absent, we may be accepted of the Lord.

ONE COMES to an occasion of this kind with a deep sense of personal inadequacy. He searches his heart and his mind, goes back over his experience, and tries to enter with what meager faculties of sympathetic imagination he may have into the suffering of others. He tries to gain from his understanding of the Master's way of life some word of comfort, solace, and instruction, to meet the need of the hour. When he has done all this, he still feels inadequate. We sincerely trust that the Master for your sake, shall bless us in what we shall present that it may be food, and strength, and comfort. Twice now within a very short time, the hand of death has invaded the ranks of the church in most untimely fashion. Apostle Lewis was taken from us not so long ago. He lost his life in an accident, and now Sister Blanche Green has been taken.

No one could foresee, at least with human wisdom or skill, nor prevent these tragedies. Similar hazards go with all of us, even though we may be on the Lord's errand. In this day of mechanisms, we take our chances. At any time any one of us might face similar conditions, and our own families will come with grief to the altar as does this family today. Life as we know it is very uncertain. One may take every reasonable precaution, use every legitimate device for his safety, he may be overly cautious or careful, and still there would be no absolute guarantee of safety on any highway throughout our land. The kind of thing so heartbreakingly apparent here happens every day—no, every hour, upon the broad face of our land. A split second divides life and happiness from death and sorrow. It is part of the price our generation seems to have to pay for its conquest of time and substance and of distance.

BEHIND THESE TRAGEDIES, however, there lies no intent to kill or to destroy. Grief over them is not mingled with the horror of war—war which, by the way, has not taken as many lives as our highways have taken since the invention of the internal combustion engine. There is no first personal foe to blame or to hate. This kind of thing seems so impersonal, almost inevitable. The fact is that the church may logically expect, under present conditions, that its members will continue to suffer loss and sustain bereavement which brings grief proportionately with the other people in the world. I see no reason to expect anything else. Even our blessed Lord was sent into the world which was permitted to have its way with him. His people, while objects of his mercy and compassion, and recipients at times of what appears to be miraculous preservation of their bodies, must nevertheless accept the facts. Why divine power was not in evidence in this case to preserve the flesh, and why it appeared to be available in another case, is beyond our understanding. It is one of those situations where we can only pray for the peace and assurance which goes beyond understanding and rest our case with Him who does all things well.

When Sister Green met with her accident, we honored the ordinances of God. The physicians and others at the hospital did all that was humanly possible to be done—all that lay within the compass of their skill—but she did not live.

"And if they live, they live unto me; and if they die, they die unto me." We are sure that this is true—that our sister died unto her Lord; and furthermore we believe the other part of that promise was true in her case—death was sweet to her; in fact, we believe she did not taste of death. For days she dwelt in those deep regions of the unconscious about which many of us know so little, and few of us know so much less. In those deeps of human personality and consciousness, she was at peace; of that we are sure.

IT SEEMS that our church has lost half a century of devoted service in these two deaths. Certainly we had expected another twenty-five years of service from Brother Lewis, similar expectancy held good in the case of Sister Green. Had she been spared to us here, we should have received of her best. She was an ardent worker, blessed with a sweet and sunny disposition. She worked with us at reunion time, and we shared the joy that she had when she suffered the little ones to come to the Master and forbade them not. We saw how she worked with her husband when he was pastor at Slover Park. She gave him the support, love, advice, and counsel that a minister can receive only from a good wife. We observed her devotion to her children, Kenneth, Doris, and Marilyn. We know something of her work in them; they bear the results of it in their personalities. They will, we are confident, be of great service to the cause she loved so well. Her influence in them will reach down through the years and bless many, many people. Sister Green was able and—what is so very much to be desired—willing. There was never any task, but what she stood ready to help. She was humble and teachable.

When returning from the field last week and learning of the accident, I faced the possibility of her death. All of you have had, I am sure, situations of great consequence arise in your lives and have found that such situations called forth from within you some word of comfort, a passage of scripture, a verse of a hymn. It was the verse of a hymn which came to my consciousness as I thought of Sister Green. It seemed to be so characteristic of her that it stayed with me for days and is with me yet.

The inner life is a very mysterious and wonderful thing. All of us are therein connected with divine powers and influences which may evoke some such response to a given situation as this hymn did when it came to my mind in connection with Sister Green. Here it is:

Trying to walk in the steps of the Savior,
Trying to follow our Savior and King;
Shaping our lives by His blessed example,
Happy, how happy, the songs that we bring.

How beautiful to walk in the steps of the Savior,
Stepping in the light,
Stepping in the light,
How beautiful to walk in the steps of the Savior,
Led in paths of light.

Associate with that hymn the following scripture, found in the Doctrine and Covenants: "He that receiveth light and that continueth in God receiveth more light, and that light groweth brighter and brighter until the perfect day." Analyze that scripture, and you discover that it makes no provision for any sort of separation from the source of light. It's true. Paul says that "though our outward man perish, yet the inner man is renewed day by day," and the Apostle John promised to those who overcame that the Lord would give to them to eat of the fruit of the tree of life which was in the midst of the paradise of God.

Her days were not evil; her years were not marked with dreariness or the remorse of youthful indulgence. In her youth, she remembered her Creator. As another young woman wrote one hundred and fifty years ago—another young woman who died before her time—she knew

There is not room for death nor atom that his might could render void.
Thou, O God, art being and breath, and what thou art may never be destroyed.
Though earth and man were gone and suns and universes cease to be,
Thou wert left alone; every existence would exist in thee.

WE MORTALS find ourselves in a universe that at times is terrifying. Comes a drouth; trees die from the roots, day after day the sun beats down on the parched earth, and men cry for rain to avoid famine. Or comes a storm and half a continent is buried in deep snow, and cattle and human beings perish. Or comes a catastrophe like the late war. Or suddenly upon an instant, an unforeseen accident, and a mother, a wife, a friend, a diligent worker for the Master is not found any more in our midst. These forces are imponderable. At times they seem like demons. They have power over our bodies; they take life. But are they as powerful as at first they seem? Can they rob us of our hope in Christ? Can they take away from us our peace in the gospel? Can they speak so loudly in our ears that tidings of invisible things are drowned? No, there are realms of existence beyond and within the veil of the flesh, where wind and fire and earthquake can have no power. Even the storms of grief cannot quell the still small voice of the spirit.

There are other values of life beyond sight and sense, and when we see them expressed, as so well expressed they were in the life of our dear sister, our hope in them is strengthened.

IS IT STRANGE that joy can be blent with suffering? No, for lovers every parting is a sweet sorrow. Some day, please God, this conviction and assurance of immortality, of personal survival into the eternities, will be more than faith, but now and here it cannot be more.

We must live first and think afterwards. Our convictions, and our invincible surmises, are the stuff of which character is formed. All the evidence about this incident is not at hand; if it were, and even if our knowledge of the fact reached into the beyond, we should still have to grow in understanding in order that meaning might be preserved in the midst of the eternities. There is meaning, I believe, even in accident; for as the poet says, "Nothing walks with aimless feet." One day, my friends, every limb and joint shall be restored to its perfect and proper frame. We have this hope in Christ.

BUT ONE THING STANDS OUT in bold relief, made vital by this accident. Perhaps it is the moral of the story, perhaps not. At least to me it seems to have some significance. Here is a gracious lady, one of a fine family who came to us with a rich heritage, who remembered her Creator in the days of her youth, who honored her father and her mother, who had every legitimate right to live long on the earth. We had a reason to expect another twenty-five years of service from Sister Green. Those years must now be spent elsewhere. And whatever the need may be elsewhere for her service, she was surely needed here. To us, these years seem lost. But my friends, how many years of service are denied to the church from other preventable causes—indifference, slothfulness, the lack of charity, indolence, the bearing of grudges, misunderstanding, willful lack of knowledge, or the unwillingness to pay the price of understanding? The years lost to our church in service from these preventable causes are incalculable, and there need not be one of them. Is it too much to infer that this tragedy can be of vital significance to us? Can we not do better at redeeming the time because the days are evil, and perhaps fill the gaps caused by such unforeseeable and unpreventable circumstances? Every year of faithful, diligent service rendered here will hasten the day of redemption. It will bring closer the time of reunion when sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

NO ONE CAN TAKE HER PLACE, but we can all redouble our efforts to speed the time when our place and hers can again be side by side. We grieve with these good people. We love them, and were it in our power to restore to them their loved one, we would do it. Perhaps there are some here whose devotion runs to the point where, if they could, they would take her place so that she could be with her family again. That would be the quintessence of Christian charity. But no one can do that.

The issues of life and death are not in our hands; but some things are, thank God! We bear one another's burdens and fulfill the law of Christ. Down through the years, these people will find peace and comfort when the clouds have rolled away and all things are open to view. Then there will be understanding, power, glory, and peace.

May the good Spirit abide with Brother Green and his children, and with Brother and Sister Tucker, and the sisters of our beloved sister. May the grace of God be with his church, and may the lesson or the problem of this hour be so registered in our consciousness that it may spur us to greater efforts toward the redemption of Zion in our time, and that eventually the barriers which now separate us shall be removed, and our blessed Lord shall return to rule and reign in righteousness.

The Door of Grace

The door of Grace swings outward.
It has no bar nor key;
But it will never open
Unless its path is free.

Our own rebellious failure
The will of God to do,
Like stones, can partly block it;
And blessings then are few.

We call Christ, "Lord," and "Master";
Not thinking what we say.
For we are not good servants
Unless we will obey.

The Japanese Mind

THERE ARE STILL seventy nations to whom we have not taken the gospel message, and Japan is one of those nations.

To us living in this country, it will be difficult to understand the Japanese. Those who have visited Japan are puzzled by the Japanese, their country and their way of life. Into the very fabric of their lives is woven something deep and mysterious that we may find difficult to comprehend.

While we are trying to understand them, they are trying also to understand us. As a result, there is a mixture of emotions in these people that is hard to penetrate. Mary, one of the Japanese girls who visited in our home, asked, "Why was Japan so backward in grasping these wonderful opportunities of civilization?"

The Japanese will have to grasp in a short time these things of our modern civilization that came to us through years of gradual growth. We take our advantages and our wonderful way of life very much for granted. Mary and Susie are thrilled with this new way of life that we as a nation have to offer them and their people.

One writer in the Far East Stars and Stripes Weekly Review says, "It seems impossible to connect those soldiers with whom we fought with these Japanese we now see daily." I recall seeing in the newsreels during the war, the faces of the Japanese as they fought viciously. They made a horrifying impression upon me, and I am sure they must have affected others similarly. It would seem impossible to love anyone so vicious-looking. Our son sent a picture home of a young Japanese boy. I could not help contrasting the picture of this boy with the faces in the newsreels—it was so different. His countenance was calm and serene. On the back of the snapshot, Dayle had made this notation: "a Japanese Christian."

If we would stop to consider what a change Christianity makes in these people, we must certainly be fired with missionary zeal to take this gospel message to them with its wonderful possibilities and promises.

MANY YEARS AGO Lafcadio Hearn chose to live in Japan and make a study of the Japanese. He became famous as a writer about the Japanese people, their country and their customs. I will quote a few of his observations:

But the underlying strangeness of this world—the psychological strangeness—is much more startling than the visible and superficial.

As the outward strangeness of Japan proves to be full of beauty, so the inward strangeness appears to have its charm—an ethical charm reflected in the common life of the people. And the simplicity which delights you is no simplicity of barbarism.

The Japanese is not complete in himself, that is, not as the American is complete, for behind the Japanese is his family for generations. He is not an entity in himself, but a part of the whole, contributing to it, but by no means an individual personification.

I have before me an issue of Far East Stars and Stripes Weekly Review. In it is an article, "Japanese War Letters." The article contains excerpts from the diaries and letters of two Japanese students who served in the Japanese Armed Forces, one in the Army and one in the Navy. From these excerpts we can better understand what passed through the minds of those young Japanese boys as they faced the battle front. Most of them were extremely honest but misled. We understand how Germany was overruled by Hitler and his henchmen. The same was true in Japan. The militarists took over, and young boys—mere children—were schooled in their miserable teachings. This did not spring up overnight. This had been going on for years before the war actually started.

From these excerpts we can see that, despite the training received, down deep within them was something good which could not be warped by militaristic training. There was a youthful idealism and a sense of equality of mankind such as our boys experienced.

From one diary:

With each day, death seems more likely. Even now a moral sense is troubling me. I remember past deeds with shame—thinking of all I can never do. I want to be mild in the most severe fight, honest with the most evil, and quiet in the course of the battle.

The following was taken from the diary of a twenty-four-year-old law student. He accidentally left his diary behind on his last mission, from which he did not return.

I think I still have the best part of my student days, my innocent ambition. That, I believe, cannot be changed in essence despite the fact that this thin veil of military discipline—the indoctrinated soldier's spirit for over a year, may have covered it. Does this show that my mind has changed, that it is a development? Or should I be walking the soldier's exclusive road without my present knowledge? . . . I cannot possibly talk like most of my officers. They engage in patriotic conversation constantly. Every word is filled with it. I don't want to use my mind for this, rather for quiet reflection. . . . Again in port. I have been recently more nervous. The past acts of which I'm not too proud make me sleepless at night.

These boys did not want to do the horrifying things they were called upon to do; they had a better side. Christianity brings out these finer ideals.

WE RECEIVE LETTERS quite frequently from several Japanese young people. They learn to write English quite readily. Their letters are a mixture of our expressions and idioms and their hard-to-express thoughts. In all of their letters, we can see the effect of their beauty-loving natures.

Here are a few lines from their letters: "The new green of the trees is wonderful, and sometimes it has superior beauty to the cherry blossoms in full bloom." "A firefly is flying like a small comet in my garden." "A real camellia is smiling on my desk. The sky is very fine after a long, long rain."

Perhaps if we learn to appreciate the beauty of their land and their surroundings, we can use such an experience as a common ground of understanding in our first approach with the gospel message.

The Japanese have a habit that could be irritating if we did not understand them—that is their constant giggling. I don't know why they do it. I have often wondered if they giggle among themselves, or if it is caused by self-consciousness when they are in company with strangers. It seemed to grow less as Mary and Susie came to know us better.

They smile almost continually. I know little Susie was very homesick, yet she smiled sweetly during the time she was with us.

I have a clipping that says, "Japs smile when they're happy—or blue." It is said that the Japanese smile as readily at a funeral as at a joke. It has also been said that they are a people of smiles and optimism.

From understanding, we can go on to love. And through loving and understanding these people, our missionary efforts can be fruitful.

They Like Daily Bread

AS SOON AS OUR DEVOTIONAL MAGAZINE was presented to the church, favorable comments began to pour in. They are still coming. There is more than a literary satisfaction in these commendations. It is regarded by church officials as indicating a spiritual trend. What one likes and does is a measure of the person.

Doubtless some will subscribe to the magazine simply to see what all the shouting is about. Some may even read it through in much the same fashion as they scan Reader's Digest. This will do them no harm, but it misses the spirit of devotion for which Daily Bread was designed. It can help the Latter Day Saint homes to set up worthy devotional habits. And one good habit is worth a hundred rules of conduct.

This editor has always maintained a family altar as did his father before him. Yes, he has had to hurry at times to make business schedules, but always an effort was made to take God with him in the day's work. Having anticipated the devotionals for months before their publications, there was much satisfaction when New Year's Day came, and the first devotional service was used. It has taken from six to nine minutes for the complete devotional each morning. This is twice the time used at our devotions heretofore, but surely no one would say that was too much time spent in seeking divine help for one day's work.

From the many letters received, we are taking the liberty of quoting a few paragraphs. We shall be glad to hear from others whose devotional needs are or are not being met. And to our increasing list of contributors who are making the magazine possible, we say, "Thanks, and keep on with the good work."—Editor.

We are enthused about Daily Bread. It is getting across a program of family worship, and we are already seeing some good results from it.

Will you please send us, as soon as possible, ten additional February copies and increase our March issue to 110 copies.

I want to tell you how much we are enjoying the publication, Daily Bread. We use it every night, and the children use the "Prayer Seeds" as a thought for their prayers. I think it is excellent. The children always like the stories and incidents from life. The features that are beyond their comprehension, I try to explain in language they will understand. I have been urging the Saints here to order it and use it. It unifies the worship service, and I hope we can always have it.

Some emphasis on worship ideas for children might make it more valuable for family devotionals.

I wish to express my appreciation for the magazine, Daily Bread. I am living alone, and I am also isolated from the church. Daily Bread is good spiritual food, and I would not want to be without it. I keep it handy so that when I sit down to rest, I can read it. Its inspiring messages rest both body and soul.

LULU SHANE.

Harrisville, Ohio

Last October, we were happy to learn that the church planned to publish helps for daily devotionals in the home, and we looked forward to receiving our first copy of Daily Bread. We wish to thank the First Presidency and all who have assisted in preparation of this publication.

For the most part, we have used Daily Bread for home worship. We have a thirteen-year-old boy who takes his turn in preparing and bringing to the family the daily message. The articles have been a little too difficult for him to read, and quite often he runs into words he has never heard or seen before. I am writing to suggest that the articles be written in language that children, as well as adults, can understand and enjoy. We believe each member of the family should participate and have the responsibility of presenting the lesson. If it is possible to include articles that can be easily read by children (at least those in upper grade school), Daily Bread, I believe, would be of even greater value.

Daily Bread is helping me in my everlasting search for what I need more of. I think it is wonderful.

A READER.

The reason for this letter is to congratulate you on the very high quality of the subject material used in Daily Bread. Long may it continue.

JOHN AND NANCY WALKER.

The advertising about the new publication, Daily Bread, drew my attention, and I sent in my subscription. I certainly feel that it should be found on every Latter Day Saint's reading table—and not only found there, but read daily, for it keeps our minds on the church at all times.

I am a telephone operator, and I find that I am much happier when I read a page from Daily Bread each day. It gives food for thought and certainly draws my mind closer to the goal toward which we are all supposed to work. I wish it were possible to thank the many writers whose splendid articles fill the pages of Daily Bread. I do feel each has been inspired, and I have often felt the burning of the spirit in my bosom, when I have knelt in prayer, after reading the daily devotional.

Follow the reading of the Daily Bread for one month, and you, too, will be a booster for this splendid publication.

The Choice Seer

By RAY WHITING

THERE SEEMS TO BE a number of people who have become confused over statements found in the Book of Mormon relative to the Lamanites. Because of this confusion, some are looking for a prophet to be raised up from the Indians who is to lead this church to victory. As a further result of this misunderstanding, they do not recognize what has already been done and fail to appreciate the work of a great man who has already been raised up among us.

This confusion begins with the statement of Lehi to his son, Joseph, which is found to consume the entire second chapter of the second Book of Nephi. From verse five, through verse forty-three, Lehi is telling his son Joseph about the promises made to Joseph of Egypt. Keep this clearly in mind: the promises of a "choice seer" to be raised up was made to Joseph of Egypt and was to come from his loins, not from the loins of Joseph of Lehi. I quote the words of Lehi: "I am a descendent of Joseph, who was carried captive into Egypt. And great were the covenants of the Lord, which he made unto Joseph . . . For Joseph truly said, Thus saith the Lord unto me: A choice seer will I raise up out of the fruit of thy loins." From the seed of Joseph of Egypt was the "seer" to come.

Reading farther, we find that this "choice seer" would have "power to bring forth my word unto the seed of thy loins," also, "he shall do a work for the fruit of thy loins, his brethren, which shall be of great worth unto them, even to the bringing of them to the knowledge of the covenants which I have made with thy fathers." And to make it still more clear who this "seer" would be, verse twenty-nine says, "And his name shall be called after me [Joseph]: and it shall be after the name of his father." How much plainer need it be made?

JOSEPH SMITH and the Book of Mormon most certainly fulfilled this prophecy. Joseph Smith's father was named Joseph, like the Joseph of Egypt, and he brought forth "my word [Book of Mormon] unto the seed of thy loins" which gave the Indians "the knowledge of their fathers in the latter days . . ." Joseph Smith was "esteemed highly" among the Indians, and he did "a work for the fruit of thy loins, his brethren, which shall be of great worth unto them."

Furthermore, Joseph Smith is more clearly indicated in verses thirty-six and thirty-seven, where it is prophesied, "and I will make for him a spokesman . . . I will give unto him, that he shall write the writings of the fruit of thy loins, unto the fruit of thy loins, and the spokesman of thy loins shall declare it." Now turn to Doctrine and Covenants 97: 3. Here the Lord says to Sidney Rigdon, "Yea, verily, I will ordain you unto this calling, even to be a spokesman unto my servant Joseph: and . . . I will give unto thee power to be mighty in expounding all scriptures, that thou mayest be a spokesman unto him." Here we have it plainly who the "seer" is and who the "spokesman" is. Why be confused?

Verse forty-six sometimes trips people up because it says that one shall be raised up "among" them, referring to the Lamanites. But notice, it says among them not of them. Joseph Smith was among them, and he did "much good, both in word and in deed, being an instrument in the hands of God, with exceeding faith."

Next let us turn to III Nephi 10: 1-3. Here the Lord says he will establish his church among the Gentiles, and the Gentiles "shall assist my people, the remnant of Jacob, and also as many of the house of Israel as shall come, that they may build a city, which shall be called the New Jerusalem, and then shall they assist my people that may be gathered in." The Lamanites are a downtrodden people. They need help. They must have assistance. Therefore, to fulfill his promises to them, God caused his church to be established by the Gentiles, through the seed of Ephraim, not of Manasseh, in order to "assist" the Lamanites.

THE PRINCIPLE AGENT in building the New Jerusalem is to be Ephraim who is to "assist" the helpless and handicapped Indians. Ephraim, of the seed of Joseph of Egypt, is to be in charge in the latter day, not Manasseh of the seed of Joseph of Lehi. In Doctrine and Covenants 108: 6 we find, "And they shall bring forth their rich treasures unto the children of Ephraim my servants . . . And then shall they fall down and be crowned with glory, even in Zion, by the hands of the servants of the Lord, even the children of Ephraim."

Ephraim is to be in charge, and Joseph Smith is of Ephraim. He was named after his father and also had the name of Joseph of Egypt. To him was given a "spokesman." Through him came the word written by the fathers of the Nephites, and by him came the church of God to "assist" the Indians. All this is of "great worth" to the Indians. May the time soon come when this church can "assist" these people more than it has in the past.

Theme for the Month: CHRIST LIVES

SUNDAY, APRIL 3

JESUS, THE MAN

Prelude: "O Master Workman of the Race," Saints' Hymnal, No. 152.

Call to Worship:

For God so loved the world, that he gave his Only Begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish; but have everlasting life.—John 3: 16.

Prayer: This should be one of thankfulness for the great gift of his Son, Jesus, the man who came to teach us the way to live.

Scripture Reading:

And he served under his father, and he spake not as other men, neither could he be taught; for he needed not that any man should teach him.—Matthew 3: 25.

And after many years, the hour of his ministry drew nigh.—Matthew 3: 26.

Theme Appreciation:

It is stimulating to think of Jesus, the man, as he went about his work in the carpenter shop. It was the natural and traditional thing for boys of that day to assume the trade of their fathers. In this capacity, he learned many lessons which enriched his future ministry. Can you not look back into his experiences as a carpenter as you read of his pointing out the necessity of securing a good foundation before beginning to build? Where did he get his ideas for the story of the man who was so concerned about building bigger barns that he forgot to live? Picture his working with a group and noticing a man who could not see clearly trying to remove a splinter from the eye of a fellow workman. Later, he used this observation, as he did many others, to drive home a fundamental truth. F. Henry Edwards, in Life and Ministry of Jesus, says:

As the village carpenter, Jesus was familiar with every home in Nazareth. In the shed or sitting by the roadside under the palms, he and his brothers fashioned plows or yokes for the oxen or mended the pack-saddles or chests of the journeymen passing through. At other times, they were called in to repair or rebuild the barns and sheds of the neighborhood, or to build the outside stairs which made an extra room of the flat roof of a house. As Jesus worked, he talked with those who stood by, sharing their friendly comment and at the same time probing to see what manner of men they were and what motives moved them. He must have made many friends during these years He was a stimulating person to know, with his direct but picturesque speech, his keen imagination, his quick humor, his earnestness and ready sympathy, his careful workmanship, and the many other elements of that friendly charm which later drew so many to him. . . . There was other happiness in his work for Jesus. He was more than a mere workman. He was a craftsman. Such a man as he was must have found real satisfaction in making the simple implements of the day as well as they could be made. Pride of workmanship is an important part of the lives of real men. Nothing ministers quite so completely to the self-respect of those who love their work as the joy of definite and beautiful accomplishment; the yoke smoothly shaped to the shoulder, the chest squarely and strongly built, the door well hung in its frame, the foundation securely set for the house of a friend; all these belonged to Jesus in a sense in which they could never belong to anyone else but their maker. It is not difficult to imagine his running his hand with lingering affection along the well-rounded plow handle before passing it on to the waiting farmer.

There was no idle time in the carpenter's shop. People had little time or spare equipment, and when anything broke, it had to be mended well and quickly. So the years brought their steady discipline, their mounting skill, the habit of careful planning, and that well-rounded wholeness of life which comes from meeting the task of each day intelligently and without undue haste and worry. For the Master-Carpenter, peace was not just stagnation, it was the pleasant hum of activity which comes when men work together in skillful good will and toward a common end.

Jesus, the man, grew as we may grow. He matured in wisdom and understanding through thirty years of normal life and work. Daily he measured his strength against the disintegration and collapse which come from the wear and tear of life. He led the way, making the plans and determining the course of action for those less able than he, but he also shared his work with his friends according to their strength and skill so that they might grow through sharing. Knowing life, he knew also that the finest product of any task well done is a man well built.

JESUS, THE MAN

They say that he was kind, and mild, and good,
And oh, I wish I only understood
How some can paint him as a pale, weak man
Who looks as if he doesn't know "he can."

For if he healed the blind, the deaf, and lame,
And good and sinful at his bidding came,
He must have been so straight, and tall, and tanned,
With great, hard muscles in his arms and hands.

His face could not have been a thin, white one;
But bronzed by hours of toil in the sun,
And in him, oh, what strength; What mighty power!
That men left all to follow hour by hour.

Perhaps someday there'll be someone who'll paint
Him as he is; not as a haloed saint,
The Christ of light, and love, and joyful song,
The Christ who lives and struggles with the through.

HE DIED FOR US

Prelude: "'Tis Midnight, and on Olive's Brow," Saints' Hymnal, No. 163.

Call to Worship:

JESUS PRAYS

The wind has ceased; the stars are dimmed;
The sounds of night are still,
'Tis midnight in the garden on the brow of Olive's hill,
'Father, take away this cup, but thine and not my will."

Jesus prays.

E'en on the cross of Calvary, his love no ending knew,
He writhed in anguish, scorned by friends whom
He had thought were true;
'Father, forgive thy children here,
They know not what they do,"
Jesus prays.

I see him left alone to die, by friends like you and me,
Who cause anew his agony on Calvary's cruel tree;
When by our deeds we take him there,
For us, on bended knee,
Jesus prays.

—Phillip Moore.

Prayer: Asking for a clearer understanding of the message of the cross.

Opening Hymn: "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross," Saints' Hymnal, No. 162.

Scripture Reading:

Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene.—John 19: 25.

When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son!
—John 19: 26.

Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home.—John 19: 27.

After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst.—John 19: 28.
Now there was a vessel full of vinegar, mingled with gall, and they filled a sponge with it, and put upon hyssop, and put to his mouth.—John 19: 29.

When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished; and he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.—John 19: 30.

Theme Appreciation:

There seems to be such a short period between the time when we see Jesus, the man, actively engaged in the business of living and when we witness the drama of the cross. And yet, we are made to realize that everything in scripture prior to this great event points to its taking place. Jesus tried in countless ways to prepare his loved ones, but they continued to ask why and when and whither. Consider Thomas, he says, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?" Jesus' answer, "I am the way, the truth, and the life," only brought forth a puzzled frown upon the face of Philip, another one of his twelve. In John 14, we find many warning signals—yet they understood not.

The message of the cross has meaning only for those who have come to realize that Christ could effectively appeal to us from no other position. Millions have been born again because Jesus chose the way of the cross. If only we as Latter Day Saints might stand still for a moment and contemplate what Calvary means in terms of divine love for us. If only we might be ready to say, "Jesus went forth to die for us." God grant that we may ask for strength and divine grace sufficient to walk with Jesus as courageous soldiers of the cross.

Medley of Hymns:

Softly played with violin accompaniment, if possible. (Nos. 202, 213, 212, 218, 260, Saints' Hymnal.)

THE SAVIOR HATH RISEN

Setting: Suitable resurrection picture with flower arrangement. (Easter lilies secured through previous sacrifice effort by the members, including the children, and later taken to a shut-in or sick friend by the children themselves, helps to give meaning to the occasion.)

Prelude: Medley of Resurrection Hymns.

Call to Worship:

John 20: 1-18.

Opening Hymn: "Sing with all the sons of glory, Sing the resurrection song!" Saints' Hymnal, No. 166.

Prayer: This should be one of rejoicing, gratitude, and consecration.

Suggestions for the Message:

No other event in the life of Jesus, with the exception of his birth, has inspired us as has the message of the resurrection. There's a ring of triumph and joy in just singing the Easter hymns that gives us new hope and courage. We find people attending church on Easter Sunday who do not come at any other time.

Are they moved to affirm their faith in God and in his living, triumphant Son? Or is Jesus still hanging on the cross for them, while they come to church on Easter merely as a habit which has to do with clothes and spring and bunnies? If the Christ is really resurrected for us as individuals, we will pledge allegiance to his cause, promising to worship him wholeheartedly and dedicating and consecrating all we are and can become by his grace in service to him and the cause of Zion. Let us accept the challenge which comes with the Resurrection message and give our all. Then and only then have we

Preparing the Child for Baptism

A YEAR AGO THE church was presented with a prebaptismal manual. It was well received, judging from comments and the amount of sales. It was planned for class use. In many church schools, a selected group is given a six-weeks course in anticipation of having the boys and girls who wish baptism ready for that ordinance on Children's Day, the second Sunday in June (June 12 this year). Some have considered it better to start early and use eight weeks.

The success of this course with children is based on three things: the child must be serious in his desire to unite with Jesus' church; the parents need to conceive of the child's preparation as a parental responsibility (Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4); and a wise and devoted teacher, preferably the pastor or assistant pastor, should conduct the class. Any one of these elements lacking can mean serious loss to the child's spiritual birth and consequent life.

Many of our readers will find help and inspiration in the testimony of Sister Dorothy Carter. It will have especial appeal to parents in isolated areas who face the preparation problem alone. While Mrs. Carter lives within a block of the Stone Church, yet because she was so concerned about the importance of the step her son was to take, she did not leave it all to others.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY

The prebaptismal manual, This Is Jesus' Church, was the answer to my problem. Ronnie was old enough for baptism, but I felt that he did not know enough about the doctrines of the church. At church school, he was meeting with a group of children who were preparing for baptism by having a short period after class for instruction. This, to me, did not seem adequate.

After obtaining a copy of This Is Jesus' Church, Ronnie and I settled down to a few weeks of close study together. We found the book enjoyable reading. I work in the daytime, but during the evenings, we went over the material in the manual. I read most of the lessons to Ronnie, but he read some of them by himself, doing the tests afterwards. In this fashion, we covered about two lessons a week.

I was delighted with the many phases of our beliefs which were taken up in the manual. Ronnie was vitally interested in everything. When we reached the lesson giving an overview of The Three Books, Ronnie felt a desire to read something in each of them and did so. When we came to the part about junior stewardship, he planned with me how he would take all the money out of his bank and apportion a tenth for tithing. I found that through his studies he was growing increasingly desirous to become a member of God's family through baptism into the church.

Finally we completed our work together, and the date was set for baptism. It was a beautiful experience for Ronnie. A few Sundays later, as we were preparing to attend church for Ronnie to take his first Communion, I found myself wondering if he really knew the responsibility involved in this ceremony. All doubts were dispelled when he came to me, asking, "Mother, do you think I am worthy to partake of the Communion today?"

I truly feel that the prebaptismal manual, This Is Jesus' Church, has been a great help in preparing my son for membership.

The Twig Is Bent

By MRS. S. A. BURGESS

A QUOTATION which appeared in the Washington Unitarian some time ago by Frank W. Boreham reads:

A century ago, men were following with abated breath the march of Napoleon, and waiting with feverish impatience for the latest news of the wars. And all the while in their own homes, babies were being born . . . Why, in one year, lying midway between Trafalgar and Waterloo, there stole into the world a host of heroes! During the one year 1809, William Gladstone was born at Liverpool, Alfred Tennyson was born at Somersby, and Oliver Wendell Holmes made his first appearance in Massachusetts. On the very selfsame day of that year, Charles Darwin made his debut at Shrewsbury, and Abraham Lincoln drew his first breath in Old Kentucky. Music was enriched by the advent of Frederic Chopin at Warsaw, and of Felix Mendelssohn at Hamburg. Within the same year, too, Samuel Morley was born at Homerton, Edward Fitzgerald at Woodbridge, Elizabeth Barrett at Durham, and Frances Kemble in London. But nobody thought of babies. Everybody was thinking of battles. Yet, viewing that age in the truer perspective which the distance of a hundred years enables us to command, we may well ask ourselves which of the battles of 1809 mattered more than the babies of 1809 . . . When a wrong wants righting, or a work wants doing, or a truth wants preaching, or a continent wants opening, God sends a baby into the world to do it. That is why, long, long ago, a babe was born at Bethlehem.

There are important subjects we might discuss, all very vital to us as a body of representative church women in this fast-moving latter-day world. We are confronted with inflation, impending depression, housing and labor problems, social and industrial revolution, the threat of another world war, the stimulus of atomic fissure and all its awe-inspiring implications and potentialities. In this age of great fears, great hopes, great challenges, all these issues are of tremendous significance and importance to us in our Zionnic endeavor.

But still, as in all ages past, whether we be mothers, grandmothers, or "maiden aunts," the most important subject and responsibility for any group of women is THE CHILD IN OUR MIDST.

Important New Research in Child Training

Last fall I came back to the field of child psychology and training, with a fresh impetus, eager to find out what had been happening in the past two decades. I was very happy to discover that a great deal of work had been done and great progress had been made, that the psychologist and the pediatrician had got together and, instead of two hostile camps (as thirty years ago), they have been working together on exhaustive long period observations. Doctors Geselle and Aldrich, two outstanding examples, have spent over twenty years in research with large corps of trained workers—Dr. Geselle in his glass-dome laboratory from which the workers are able to observe the behavior of children in a room below. And there is Dr. Benjamin Spock, whose Common Sense Book of Baby Care was winner of the twentieth annual Parents' Magazine Award. It is in pocketbook form and is given by one of the finest pediatricians of Kansas City to all his expectant mothers.

I found, as I delved in this great mass of data and even took a course on the side, a very fascinating saga revealing for the first time as scientific fact a clearer story of the development of the minds and bodies of our children. The importance of this body of knowledge is not that in any child training book we find our exact problem and a foolproof recipe for meeting it, but we can learn the approximate mental and physiological limits of each stage of childhood and babyhood and then can understand our children better.

Such knowledge and understanding of normal child life will help us to avoid one of the cardinal and deadly sins of parenthood of which many conscientious parents are guilty—the sin of asking too much of our child in immaturity, of judging his behavior by adult standards and demanding achievements, judgment, and patterns of conduct entirely impossible to his stage of development.

Free Agency for the Little Baby

"As the twig is bent, so is the tree inclined" is the fuller quotation from which our subject is taken. We have all seen a twig or sapling that has been bent to one side or bowed to the ground by pressure of wind, sun, or shade, grow into a tree that is disfigured and gnarled, while its unhampered neighbors grow free and straight towards God's heaven, graciously fulfilling their full mission in a beautiful world.

If there is any one doctrine that the newer science of child psychology preaches and headlines, it is the good old gospel doctrine of free agency for children. Children should be guided, directed, and loved, but not forced. A baby is no longer to be forced into a cast-iron schedule of certain times, quantities, and kinds of food, but should be fed according to his needs, as indicated by his behavior. According to Dr. Aldrich, there are five-hour babies, four-hour babies, three-hour babies and even two and one and one-half hour babies. Dr. Frankle, a child psychologist who taught last year at Kansas University, says, "If we listen to this little person, he can tell us what he needs. And we can bring him up so that he is aware of the needs of his body." Thus we avoid dangers of artificial attitudes towards eating as we allow him to eat pleasurably rather than scientifically just for health.

Today the little newborn babies are no longer packaged away in sterile crib not to be touched or handled except for necessary care. It is recognized today that the smallest infant is full of tensions—some of them, of course, much more than others. All little babies need holding, cuddling, rocking, and patting to help them adjust to the hard, new, outside world. This is Grandmother's golden opportunity—she was right all the time! You can't spoil a little baby!

The Toddler Stage

The first three years of a child's life have become one of the most important periods, not only for laying sound physical and health bases, but also for laying the foundation of a sound, wholesome personality and character. Here the twig is bent, and if we are not careful and understanding, it will be broken or misshapen.

Between seven and fifteen months—as the child learns to get around—the tendency to go is very strong, and there is no way to stop it except by drastic, restrictive measures which will make him unhappy and prevent his growing up as he should. He needs more space and very careful supervision. He needs to be let go a little. Sometimes it is hard for a mother to give up the elation of the utter dependence of her baby, but this is only the first of a long series of "letting go," and it is most necessary to the child's physical, mental, and spiritual growth.

In this "toddler" stage, the baby who has always been so cute and clever becomes almost a menace. He doesn't realize why, and if he is "slapped down" too often or restricted too closely, he develops a negativism which may persist. He needs physically and spiritually to be very close to mother; he can't be left all day in a nursery or playroom. Mother should make up her mind to put the beautiful, fragile, or dangerous things out of his reach, until he is old enough to appreciate them without destructive handling. His home environment should be constructive, warm, and as safely free as possible.

Study your child to find out how much restriction he can take, and start with only the most important and dangerous prohibitions—fire, extreme heights, electricity hazards, et cetera. If during this “nuisance” age, the toddler has developed negative attitudes, play with him more, bring him gifts, enrich his life, make him feel fully a member of the family group.

Beware of expecting unselfishness or social consciousness at this early age. Remember that very little children do not play together; they play parallel to each other. Give your three-year-olds a chance to watch other children and enjoy each other’s antics, but don’t expect generosity, sharing of toys, or give-and-take until later. What a mother does during the child’s second and third year has much to do with whether he becomes a happy, assured, poised, successful person, or a negative, antagonistic, nervous individual, unsure of himself and insecure in the world.

And here in this early age lie the opportunities for the beginning of the child’s religion. Truly “of such is the kingdom of heaven.” The child mind turns as naturally to God as a sapling shoots heavenward. His first need is a religious atmosphere, a godly home where parents speak often with the Lord. Before he can really understand about God, he can develop a feeling of reverence and dependence on a higher power and should sense the nearness of a divine, unseen member of the household, whose love and care is constantly present. His first baby prayers are directed to a heavenly parent whose nature and personality mirror the unfailing kindness, understanding, and love of his earthly parents. As soon as the child can talk, he can learn to pray—to say, “Thank you, God,” for a flower or bird or a beautiful day or many small delights and comforts.

As he grows in understanding, he learns to seek God in trouble, pain, or illness, and to say, “Help me, Jesus,” when his tasks seem too hard. Soon he prays understandingly, “Help me to be good.” Here in these early years—the first three or four—lies the golden opportunity to give a child attitudes of reverence and worship, to develop habits of prayer, and to plant within his soul the seed of a living faith which will develop into a whole spiritual life with truly spiritual experiences of his own as he grows older and learns to know God for himself.

The importance of the bedtime hour cannot be exaggerated. This is the best time to tell your child a story, sing with him a song, and pray with him. One parent must keep free for this important parental privilege which cannot be delegated to someone else and which never should be hurried or slighted.

The Forgotten Age

The age from five to ten is often called the forgotten age—so little has been written compared to earlier childhood and adolescence. But here is the important time for rote memory—the time to establish definite accurate skills and rote knowledges. With the child’s increasing interest in the outside world, he finds the beginnings of his literary, musical, and artistic tastes. At this age, he learns easily beautiful poems and scripture which form a rich background for his growing thought and life.

He needs increasing responsibilities. He is sensitive to social and parental approval and can be led through almost any accepted routine. But he needs also definite free times to play at home and freedom to dawdle a little and browse. Adult standards of responsibility should not be expected of him. He needs the background of scrupulous moral integrity in the home, for it is now he forms habits of honesty and truthfulness.

Ellenwood formulates three freedoms for the child in the home: (1) freedom of speech (“Shut up,” he says, is the lowest form of parental injunction); (2) freedom of action (respect his privacy); and (3) freedom of individuality. But he urges that no member of the family should have freedom from responsibility for household tasks, and this is the age when the child may be trained in household skills and habits of co-operation in the household tasks.

Religiously, this is our time to acquaint children with their rich, spiritual heritage. Read with them, tell them, and make available for them the stories of the great religious heroes of the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Church History. There are missionary experiences of our own time to inspire them, and for some, the opportunity to hear the elders tell of God’s blessings on their efforts and the achievements in kingdom-building that result.

Now is the time to establish and perpetuate the habit of going to church regularly. Don’t let your child drop out of church school because his teacher isn’t so good, or because you don’t like the new pastor, or for some other minor reason. Make church a vital and necessary part of his life, as it is of yours, and make him feel he is an important member of the church.

It is interesting to note that child psychologists are establishing seven or eight years of age as the time when children are beginning to generalize, to grasp relativity, and to form judgment. It is thrilling to me to see science supporting the truth in the word of God given to this church over one hundred years ago which named eight years as the age of accountability and moral responsibility.

We could spend a long time discussing the importance at this age of answering a child’s questions, especially concerning God, the church, life, birth, and death. We could discuss how to help with school adjustments, how to “let your child go,” the problem of sex education, the importance of boys and girls clubs, and religious training. All these subjects would make good program material for women’s study groups.

Authority in the Home

The motto, “Train, Lest Ye Be Trained,” is painted on the wall above the desk of a famous pediatrician.

We must have authority in the home. The small child needs the security of feeling that his parents will see the right thing is done when he is confused by inner conflicts. But it takes more than a little switching and should be more understanding than the old heavy hand of “spare the rod and spoil the child” and the implicit, unthinking obedience school of thought.

The Lord does not demand of us a puppetlike, unreasoning obedience—that was Lucifer’s plan to MAKE men be good. God leads us gently and wisely and directs us with his Spirit to higher planes of development. Our parental authority like his should be based on understanding, love, and consideration. Ours should be a gently leading hand, not brute force.

For thirty years, I have contended that any parental authority or childish behavior that had to be secured by use of superior force was not worth the price paid in sweat and tears and broken spirits. I have even been considered a little “cracked” on this subject by many of my good friends among the mothers in Israel. It gives me great satisfaction, therefore, to find that all of the half dozen or so 1948 books I read last summer on child training deplore the use of corporal punishment in any form at any age. It is the quick, easy way and sometimes gives the parent satisfaction, but it is not the thoughtful, intelligent solution to problems of discipline.

Here are a few constructive suggestions for maintaining authority in the home:

Avoid too many hard and fast rules.

Avoid harshness and unreasonable demands, that is, demands unreasonable in

The Education of a Mother

By DORIS ESTRADA

EARLY LAST YEAR, I had the wonderful and enlightening experience of becoming the mother of a baby girl, and since then a reciprocal process of education has been going on between us. Before her birth, I had a somewhat nebulous idea of a baby who would be my personal property—a thoroughly alive and wonderful one, nevertheless, a sort of little possession who would readily fit into my pattern of things. It would eat when I brought its food, play quietly on the bed, and let me give it my time and full attention when the housework was done. Instead, I soon found that I had a distinct little individual with a will of her own, one who would neither be anyone's "tiny property" nor fit into a mold. With my early discovery of this came the realization that not only would this little person learn from me, but that I, also, would learn many things from her. Of course, her father's part in her growing up is of such importance that it cannot be overestimated, but since this is entitled "The Education of a Mother," I will discuss that alone.

My new understanding is directly dependent on the knowledge of what my child will learn from me and in our home. It is here she will build the foundation for all her future life. Here her dreams will take shape and her ideals develop. Here she will learn life and love and form her loyalties to either good or bad things. Here she will experience her first and most elementary kinds of companionship and form her basic patterns of behavior. Here she will learn either to pray, to love God, and to be aware of him in all things, or to be indifferent to his existence. Here, through the guidance of her parents, she will build the foundation of a beautiful life or lay the groundwork of an ignoble one. Here she spends the major part of each day with me alone, and what she will be greatly depends upon what I am. Julia C. A. Dorr so aptly expressed the mother's responsibility when she said, "No mother who stands upon low ground herself can hope to place her children upon a loftier

DORIS ESTRADA, formerly Doris Perkins, is a native of Fanshawe, Oklahoma. She was graduated from Graceland College in 1944 and the College of the Pacific in 1946. A drama major, she was a member of the Kappa Pi Alpha (senior women's honor society), Theta Alpha Phi (national honorary drama fraternity), and Alpha Epsilon Omicron (honorary radio fraternity). In October, 1946, she was married to Frank Estrada at Stockton, California, where they are making their home. Daughter Denise—who inspired the accompanying story—joined them in January, 1948.

Doris is serving Stockton Branch as director of drama and president of the young women's group.

plane. They may reach it, but it will not be through her." Truly one of the most important elements in teaching is the influence of personality. The most successful teaching consists of living a good life instead of merely talking about it. Children are quick to sense insincerity. Bickering parents can destroy any feeling of respect a child might have for what they try to teach in more peaceful moments. Parents who are careful to cultivate a feeling of harmony in the home create respect in the eyes of their children and establish that vital feeling of sincerity which even the most turbulent crisis cannot shake.

UNDoubtedly MY CHILD will learn much from me, but I am not a catalytic agent bringing about a sort of educative reaction between her and knowledge while remaining unchanged myself in the process. Daily and almost hourly I learn something new from her. There are some things about which I can say, "I learned this today," or "I discovered something today that I'd never thought of before." Many are intangible but definite processes taking place over a long period of time. In this latter group could be included self-discipline. Patience, for instance, is one of the most essential traits in taking care of a baby. Many times I have to curb my natural impatience in view of the effect it will have upon her. She eats very slowly, leisurely looking around the room between each bite, but if I become flustered and try to rush her, she only eats more slowly, often refusing to take food at all. Since she can't talk and let me know when something is wrong with her, I must try to be especially patient when she cries. Often a cry mistaken for temper is discovered to be indicative of discomfort or actual pain. During the day, the baby's disposition usually mirrors mine. If I am excited or angry, she becomes unsettled and cross. I must even maintain vigilance over my thoughts. When I think of something unpleasant, it often translates itself into some overt act or unpleasantness in my manner which she is quick to sense. She is happiest when I am relaxed and happy. I sometimes think that mothers eventually learn serenity out of sheer necessity. I have heard many fine sermons about setting a good example for others, but the one which has had the most effect on me is this living one—the knowledge that a little child is constantly watching everything I do.

MY CHILD is leading me to a deeper understanding of the things of life. She is teaching me tolerance with her smile as big for the black-skinned folk as for the white. Children know no racial hatreds until taught them by older people. Under her unintentional guidance, I am experiencing a new and rewarding kind of enjoyment as apart from the common conception of “fun.” It is exciting to watch her steady development in mind and body, her evident pleasure in acquiring a new physical skill. Such things as her squeal of joy in being able to stand on her own feet for the first time and her eagerness to share her accomplishment in learning to manipulate her walker caused no mild stir of excitement in our house. There is even a suppressed kind of anticipation in waiting for the first tooth to appear.

It is easy to be taught by children because they can teach us good without having it hampered by questioning of their own character. They can give us some of the searchings and joys of life and glimpses into the spirit and heart of God. They can show us the living, vital revelation of God in all things. Perhaps the reason for this was best expressed by Wordsworth when he said:

Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God who is our home.
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!

Little incidents often happen which cause me to reflect momentarily on their application to some of the more comprehensive aspects of life. These I like to embellish into sort of child-inspired, homespun parables.

In the spring, I took the baby to the window to let her look across to where the trees were green and waving, and red roses were climbing a trellis. However, I had fallen down on my housekeeping duties, and there were tiny specks on the window. In typical baby fashion, she became so occupied with trying to touch the specks that she couldn't see the beauty of the springtime outside. Many of us, especially during youth, set up some person in the church as our ideal and then are greatly disillusioned if that person does wrong. For a time, we lose our way with doubts and questionings. We become so intent with the “specks on the window” that we can't see the view beyond—the beauty and purpose of the church as a whole.

Sometimes when I am preparing the little one's food, she suddenly becomes so hungry she can hardly wait to eat. I try to sooth her frets with cajoling and caresses, but to no avail. She doesn't want my love or sympathy until after she has had her food. The same could be applied to the hungry people overseas. They undoubtedly appreciate our words of good will and brotherhood, but believe in our sincerity only if we first help to feed them.

ONE DAY when we were visiting friends in the country, I noticed that the baby was staring in rapt wonder up over the roof. When I looked to see what was holding her gaze, I saw a truly beautiful picture. It was framed on the bottom by the rooftop, on the sides by green trees gently rustling, and at the top by soft, white clouds resting on a blue, summer sky. The object of her interest and the center of the picture was a windmill silently turning with the breeze. Had I seen such a painting in an art gallery, I probably would have praised it and felt my trip there worth-while. However, in all the years I had known these people, I had never even noticed that they had a windmill. How much beauty we miss if we never take the time to look around us and and up over the rooftops.

If I were putting a title above each of these little paragraphs, this one could be called, “Things Are Most Interesting When in Use.” Many times an object will attract little or no attention from the baby until I pick it up and use it. Then its fascination value begins to soar. An egg beater becomes the most interesting thing of the day when it is beating eggs. A pencil draws wide eyes and bated breath when it is rapidly writing. I can have any number of pencils lying around me, but the one which I am using is the one the baby wants to grab. So it is with religion. A religion which is never used attracts no interest from anyone; one used part of the time may cause a little favorable attention; but it is the one used all of the time which is the most inspiring thing in the world.

Through the years, my little daughter will undoubtedly learn much from me, but I am certain I will also learn much from her.

YEARNING

In the cool silence of the night
She comes to me,
Touching my eyelids with mother fingers,
Smoothing my covers with mother gentleness.
Soft hair kisses my cheek
As she moves with quicksilver beauty.

Almost I would cross the willow greyness
And slip with her into the stillness of beyond.
Life is so thin a sliver of knowing.

caught the significance of Easter and have the faith to say, "He is risen indeed."

Closing Hymn: "I Know That My Redeemer Lives," Saints' Hymnal, No. 169.

Closing Thought:

A LIVING FAITH

A living faith I seek to know,
O God, a faith to help me grow;
A hope that earthly foes can't dim,
As I shall seek to learn of him,
Who died, yet lives and loves us so.

Lord, may that love help me say, "No!"
And daily keep my feet from woe;
Grant hope, oft sung in sacred hymn,
A living faith.

O Lord, I pray that as I go
Along life's highway here below,
I'll strive to keep my lamp in trim,
Undimmed by every passing whim.
O Lord, with hope my soul's aglow,
A living faith.

JESUS, THE CHRIST

Prelude: "Fairest Lord Jesus, Ruler of All Nature," Saints' Hymnal, No. 23.

Call to Worship:

A little while, and ye shall not see me; and again, a little while, and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father. Then said some of his disciples among themselves, What is this that he saith unto us, A little while, and ye shall not see me; and again, a little while, and ye shall see me; and, Because I go to the Father?

Opening Hymn: "Praise Him, Praise Him," Saints' Hymnal, No. 10.

Prayer: Asking that we might recognize the true nature of the messiahship of Christ which places emphasis upon the fact that he made us and loves us.

Hymn: "My Jesus, I Love Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 12.

Suggestions for Theme Appreciation: (Taken from Life and Ministry of Jesus.)

It is not possible for us to appreciate Jesus, the Christ, until we grow more fully into his likeness by sharing the burden of sin in the world. A knowledge of Jesus, the Christ, comes by way of sacrifice and self-discipline. Without him we are lost, so we must know him. Only those with a deep sense of their own need ever come to Christ. In John 6: 16-21, we read that after the feeding of the 5,000, the disciples put out on the lake, but it was so rough that night came on and found them toiling in the dark and getting nowhere. The wind and the waves were against them, and all their experience and effort were leading but to futility. Then Jesus came. At first they cried out against him, not recognizing him, but then "they willingly received him in the ship . . . and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went." They were lost until they let Jesus into their lives, but when they let him in, the storm without quieted, and bewilderment within gave way to peace and understanding.

Many of us are like these disciples were before they welcomed Jesus into the boat. We do not sense our need of Jesus in moments of frivolity, but only when touched with the pain of clear thought and deep self-realization. In our search for him, we must begin with a willingness to abandon our sins. Secondly, we must face life with moral earnestness, and lastly we must become aware that Jesus, by his Spirit, is a living and available presence.

Nearer is he than breathing,
Nearer than hands and feet.

Coming to know Jesus, the Christ, is a great emotional experience. It grows and glows in the heart and is the very soul of the man who responds to it. The secret of relationship to Christ is the secret of love. When our hearts turn toward Jesus in love, we begin to know him, and the more we know him, the more we love him. It was in full consciousness of this that Paul wrote to the Ephesian saints:

Scripture Reading:

For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, that he would grant you, according to the riches of this glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fullness of God. Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the church by Jesus Christ, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen. —Ephesians 3: 14-21.

Hymn: "More Love to Thee, O Christ!" Saints' Hymnal, No. 284.

which, if not overcome, will bring decay to our present social order. This will come like overripe fruit on a tree ready for Communism or any other "ism" to pluck.

If you really believe man is something more than an animal, if you really believe he has an inherent worth within himself that we call a soul with a personality, if you believe men and women ought to respect other men and women because there is something essentially sacred in human personality—if you believe these things and then do nothing to support the church which keeps such ideals alive, again let me say, you are a parasite upon the body of the church, sucking out the moral life juices without giving anything in return.

Jesus gave his doctrine to the church which has kept it alive through the centuries. It is keeping it alive today, and it will keep it alive tomorrow only because there have been and will continue to be men and women endowed by the Holy Ghost which causes them to understand and support the church. These men and women who have supported the church have recognized something else. They recognize that the church has something to give them as human beings which no other institution can give them—a sense of their own worth.

the light of your child's peculiar mental-ity and disposition.

Take time to find out why your child wants to do the other thing.

Study your child and determine his behavior pattern. If he is adventurous, you need to keep a few steps ahead and to provide suitable, constructive, safe adventure to keep him happy. If he is a quiet child, stimulate him to more activity. Beware of the quiet child who is never any trouble, sits in a corner and reads and never bothers anybody. The little hellion who is always trying everything is much safer. Know when to insist on obedience and when to look the other way.

We need to strike a happy medium between the over-dominant parent and the over-submissive one. As Dr. Bauer in his book, Stop Annoying Your Children, says, "It takes a combination of forethought, unselfishness, and mutual considerateness to secure to all members of a family group not equal treatment, but treatment that is fair and equitable in all circumstances." "To each according to his needs," "from each according to his capacity," applies to the Zionite family group. Don't treat them all alike.

Never make invidious comparisons with other children such as, "Why can't you be clean like Mary, or neat and mannerly like Harry?" "Why can't you get as good grades as your brother?"

Here are five basic rules for punishments:

1. Punishments must fit the crime and be prompt, realizing the child's offense is usually not a crime. For the most part, he means to do the proper thing, but can't foresee the result of his acts.

2. A punishment must be within the child's understanding, proportionate to his development and conduct stage.

3. Punishment must be administered in love and understanding and not before others. Beware of taking out on your child your own fatigue, frustration, or irritation.

4. Punishment must be consistent. Don't praise or laugh at the child for certain behavior one day and punish the next for the same behavior.

5. Remember mental cruelty (often practiced in the modern schoolroom) can be as bad or worse than severe corporal punishment.

Be Not Afraid

Dr. Bauer admonishes the modern parent not to be afraid of all this child guidance. For, he says, "Before the days of scientific child study and guidance, the parents who got along well with their offspring were those who were relatively easy going, sympathetic, and willing to take time with their children, eager to understand them and ready to play with them and give them a great deal of time and affection."

In other words, we must be willing to go the second mile with our children, not just do the easy, snap-judgment, careless thing, but take care to do always the careful, understanding, painstakingly thought-out, kindly thing.

Psychiatrists can never help the individual make up for deficiencies caused by unwise and uninterested parents. Father may be tired after a hard day at the office and mother busy with her committees, and both may honestly think they are making the world a better place to live in. But no matter how good the field

Notice to Louisiana Saints

The members at Baton Rouge are attempting to establish a mission there. Elder Charles Martin, formerly of Kansas City, Missouri, is conducting a church school and Bible class; work may be, the game can't be won unless the home base is covered by both parents.

There are many eminent threats to world peace, but none should monopolize our best thinking to the exclusion of family problems. If we fail to preserve a rich form of family life, we will soon become an isolationist nation. This is the responsibility of grandmothers and others as well as parents.

Dr. Bauer writes, "There are still some disagreements among psychologists. But the greatest of them, as they delve deeper into the mysteries of human personality, are urgently aware of the need for a religiously inclined life in every individual, not only for the soul's health but for maturity and integration of personality, without which we cannot reach heights of usefulness and happiness of which we are capable and without which we have no realization of life."

however, only a few members have been contacted so far. Those who are interested in attending these meetings are urged to contact Elder Martin, 2625 Madison Street, or Mrs. M. O. Dickerson, 1704 North Street (telephone 2-3556).

RESTHAVEN

By Bishop L. W. Kohlman

NEWS AND NOTES

A church institution, located on a beautifully wooded, seven-acre tract of land on the west side of Independence. In 1944, the church purchased the two large attractive homes and the land with oblation funds to provide a home for elderly ladies. Resthaven is licensed by the Missouri Board of Health, and has the highest rating of any like establishment in this vicinity. Miss Helen Weeks is superintendent, and Mrs. Jessie Boswell is matron. Miss Weeks is a registered nurse, a graduate of the Independence Sanitarium, class of 1923, which was the first graduating class under Miss Copeland. At the present time, Resthaven has twenty-one guests, which is almost the full capacity. All of their physical and minimum medical needs are provided. The ladies help care for their own rooms, and those who are able also enjoy helping with the work of the Campus Shop.

The spiritual needs of Resthaven are filled by regular services and ministry. Services are conducted each Sunday morning, and a prayer service is held each Thursday evening. Elders also visit each Tuesday and Thursday afternoon. Excellent special entertainment is provided at Christmas by Blue Birds, Orioles, choral groups, and other organizations.

The church is not yet able to meet the needs of all of the members who have applied for admission, and the waiting list of those desiring admission is long. However, every member of the church can be proud of the service being rendered by Resthaven.

PRESIDENT SMITH IN MICHIGAN

President Israel A. Smith addressed the Saints at the new Royal Oak church in Detroit, Michigan. Ground was broken for this church on October 3, 1948, and the dedication service was February 27. President Smith addressed this group at the afternoon service. He spoke to the people of the Central Branch in the morning and at night addressed the congregation at Flint, Michigan.

DeLAPP AT GRACELAND

Bishop G. L. DeLapp was at Graceland College in Lamoni, Iowa, for five days of Religious Emphasis Week beginning February 25. He attended the college production presented by the Graceland Players and on February 27 addressed the college student body at 10:30. During the time he was there, he interviewed students, talked to two classes of religion, and held several meetings. The theme emphasis for the week was Stewardship. The students presented Bishop DeLapp a scrapbook of pictures taken of him throughout the week as he moved around the campus.

BISHOP JOHNSON IN KIRTLAND

Bishop Walter N. Johnson spent Friday, February 26, at Kirtland, Ohio, with Bishop J. F. Wildermuth of Cleveland who is acting also as president of the district. Bishop Johnson also visited Akron, Ohio, that week end for the district financial day and preached at Kirtland where he was visiting in connection with the church's property interests there. He visited the new basement church at Barberton, Ohio, which he reports to be a "very nice meeting place."

ACTIVE YOUNG ADULTS

Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Sr., spent Sunday, February 27, in Odessa, Missouri, where he attended a rally of the young adult movement of the Central Missouri Stake. This enthusiastic group filled the church. Apostle Gleazer told that it was easy to discern that this group is eager to advance the work of the stake and the church, and he wants to recommend work of a similar nature in the rest of his territory.

D. T. WILLIAMS IN TOUR

Apostle D. T. Williams returned to Independence, March 1, from a tour and survey of the Northwest Iowa District. He also visited Iowa City, Rock Island, Aurora, Plano, Hammond, and Chicago.

PRIESTHOOD INSTITUTES IN FAR WEST

Far West Stake has been conducting regional institutes in priesthood education, using the new text, "Building Latter Day Saint Family Life." The first series of classes was held in Cameron, Missouri, February 21-25, where the instructors were Elder R. M. Russell, pastor at St. Joseph, Missouri, and Bishop Earl T. Higdon, with classes combined on the evening of February 25 under F. M. McDowell, supervisor of priesthood education. The series, under the same instructors, was repeated February 28 to March 4 at St. Joseph, Missouri. In each case there was a Melchisedec priesthood class and one for the Aaronic priesthood. All the priesthood of the stake and their wives were planning to climax the two series by meeting at a banquet on Saturday evening, March 5. The stake conference was planned for March 5 and 6. On Sunday of the conference, a recognition service was scheduled for all members of the priesthood completing the course.

Sons of God

Words of Life

As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name.—John 1: 12.

BELIEF is at the center of these “words of life”—this great promise of the gospel. It is hard for men to believe. A natural skepticism, a distrust of life, seizes them whenever they try it. How many men, standing on the verge of success, have faltered and failed because they could not fully believe in themselves or their ideas? And how many other people, standing at the door, looking in upon the whole plan of salvation and eternal life, have failed to enter in because they lacked faith in God and his promises? In the search for truth, it is so easy to stop with doubt, not inquiring where the way might lead further, not daring the risk of going on.

In God's Image

The idea of people created in the image of God goes back to the earliest times in our religious history. Yet so many find it difficult to understand what God meant when he said, “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness.”¹ It is even more difficult for people to understand the “great and precious promises” by which we “might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.”² It is so much easier to turn the attention to some lesser, inferior things as Doubting Thomas did, and to say, “Except I shall see . . . I will not believe.”³ It is much harder, it takes a greater mind, to exclaim as Peter did, “Thou hast the words of eternal life.”⁴

It is not easy to comprehend and believe the “words of life,” but thousands of people have testified that it is worth all the effort we can put into it.

Power to Become

One church man said that the most significant and important part of this promise is contained in the phrase, “power to become.” God has given man a capacity, an ability to change, that he has placed in no other creature. If we could only convince people of the greatness and importance of that “power to become,” almost anything could be accomplished. People say something like this, “You can't change human nature,” when history is full of examples that prove the contrary. The hope that Christ brought to the human race is contingent upon this power to change, to become something better than we are.

Of course it is true that it was impossible to give men this power to become, without also permitting the alternative that they could betray and destroy themselves, which many do. It is a part of the free agency which is back of the promise. We can go up or down the ladder. We can be the “sons of God” or the sons of perdition.

Sons of God

Our failure in comprehension also touches this phrase, “the sons of God.” Yet the Scriptures give us the explanation. We turn to the great prayer of Jesus, his final appeal to his Heavenly Father before the betrayal by Judas, as recorded by John,

That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.

And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one:

I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one . . .⁵

Here is a Scripture that clears up two points which have caused difficulty and misunderstanding. Christ himself draws the parallel between the unity that existed between him and God, and the unity to exist between him and his followers. It is a unity of spirit and purpose in which perfect harmony is achieved, without the merging of personalities or the loss of individual identity. It explains Christ as the Son of God, and it explains our place as brothers of Christ and also as potential sons of God. As sons by adoption, we may have our rights, as he has his special rights by birth.

The Heritage of Children

We know what blessings a child has in being born or adopted into a good Christian home. He is assured of food, clothing, shelter, love, and protection. If he is sick, all the resources of that home, and all the help it can command in society, are brought to bear to restore him to health. He is permitted to grow, to play, and to be happy, with no thought that he must work or do anything for his own support, much less to support the home. His moral and spiritual training are provided, his mind and spirit are nurtured in the right ways of life here, and of eternity beyond. It is a wonderful thing for a child to come into such a home.

And it is much more wonderful for us, as children of the world, to be adopted into the family of God, to receive his love and care, his protection and his spirit. We belong to his home, we are his children thereafter. Nothing can happen to us that is not of interest to him.

How great and how precious the promises of God are, we can only realize as we study his Word and live close to him in prayer. Willing and obedient children learn the richness of the Father's love.

The Teachings of Jesus

IN MOST INSTANCES, when we consider Jesus and his attitude toward anything in particular, we tend to transport him out of his environment and background and think of him as if he were alive here and now with the settings, experiences, and scientific knowledge that has been our heritage. We are apt to pick the things he said out of their context and translate them subtly into the things we think he should have said.

In thinking about Jesus and the things he had to say about wealth and the financial law, we need to think of them not as isolated statements, streaming out of the blue as brilliant bursts of inspiration, but as reflections of divine wisdom being applied to problems of humanity.

First of all, we need to remember that the words of Jesus were spoken by a Jew; for whatever else Jesus was, he was by birth and heritage a Jew. Joseph and Mary were strict Jews who observed the feasts and ceremonies of the Jewish faith. We are certainly justified in believing that they taught Jesus to do likewise. We know they sent him to the parochial school of the day, and that he became well-versed in the Jewish law, for we find him at the age of twelve in the temple, astounding the priests with his knowledge.

We know he was deeply steeped in the hopes and ideals of Jewish national life, for one of the potent temptations he experienced was to be offered the throne of David and the rule not only of Palestine but of the whole world, thus fulfilling the dream of independence the promised Messiah was expected to bring.

Secondly, we need to remember that the words of Jesus were spoken by a poor man. Although his lineage was that of David, his family was neither wealthy nor prominent. There was no room for the suffering Mary at the inn in Bethlehem because the space was already taken by others of superior distinction. Wealth would have opened many doors in Bethlehem that night, but Joseph had little wealth to offer. We will remember in this connection, too, that a provident God brought to the manger cradle Wise Men from the East with gifts of great value, thus providing the means of the Holy Family's escape into Egypt. A further testimony of the poverty of the family of Joseph is seen in the offering presented on the fortieth day of his life. Two doves were the poor man's gift. The people among whom Jesus grew up were not wealthy. At the wedding feast, the scene of his first miracle, the party ran out of wine—an event that would not have been tolerated could it have been helped.

The third fact we need to remember, as we study Jesus' teachings concerning wealth, is the fact of the poverty of the country. Palestine was in a state of perpetual poverty. Overrun by the Romans, it suffered all the ills of war's aftermath that we know today. The Romans conquered in order to spoil the country and collect revenue. Their system for collecting taxes was one that placed a premium on corruption. They had established the arch-fiend

Herod as ruler of Palestine. Herod was a descendent of Esau and completely devoid of sympathy for the people. His first official act was to execute forty-five Pharisees for no reason at all. Next he exterminated all the descendants of Mattathias I, who, with his five sons, had rebelled against the Syrians and gained temporary freedom for Judea. And when he learned that his own wife and her two sons were members of this noble family, he had them destroyed with the rest. Against this background, his destruction of all the newborn boys in Bethlehem would be expected.

THIS MAN WAS THE GOVERNOR Rome had placed over Palestine, and his administration bore out the saying that when the wicked rule, the people mourn. In order to impress his Roman superiors, Herod heaped taxes on the people to finance an elaborate building program. Not since the days of Solomon had Israel had a king who spent so much in building. From secular history, we learn that following Herod's death, a group of influential Jews laid a complaint before the Roman emperor to the effect that "Herod had treated them scandalously, had filled the nation full of poverty," that they had borne more calamities from Herod in a few years than their fathers had during all the interval of time which had passed since they had returned from Babylon.

There were taxes on produce of the land, one tenth for grain and one fifth for wine and fruit. There was a tax of one denarius on every person, except for aged people over sixty-five and girls and boys of twelve and fourteen respectively. An income tax of one per cent was charged. In addition, taxes were levied on trades such as that of hosier, weaver, furrier, and goldsmith and on movable property such as horses, oxen, ships, and slaves. Duties paid on imported goods varied from 2½ to 12 per cent. City homes were taxed. Tolls were paid for the use of roads and bridges. Taxes were paid for goods bought at public sales. Besides this, every city had its local taxes which supported roads, elementary schools, public baths, city walls, and gates, and the maintenance of local administration. It is estimated that at a time when the laborer earned sixteen cents a day, Herod was collecting three million dollars a year from Palestine.

WE HAVE SAID THAT JESUS was versed in the law of the Jews. It follows that he was familiar with the Jewish laws concerning property. He knew that since the days when prophets and kings had toiled, the Jewish religion had sanctified labor as something that was noble and worth-while. And they looked forward to the ideal condition when every man would sit under his own vine and fig tree. He knew that at a time when every Oriental nation had slaves and treated them abominably, the Jewish concept of slavery was one of mildness; for it taught that a slave was a man of worth and that he shared the Sabbath with the rest of the household (Deuteronomy 5: 14). The abuse of slaves was not to be tolerated (Exodus 21: 26). He was not to be reviled or degraded. No Hebrew could be enslaved for his entire life unless he requested himself to be. He was to be freed on the seventh year, and on the day he received his freedom, he was to be provided for liberally so he could make a new start in life.

THE POOR WERE AMPLY PROVIDED for in the ancient Jewish law.

Gleanings were to be left in the fields, the olive groves, and the vineyard so the poor could share in the harvest.

"Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of troubles. The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth; and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies," sang the Psalmist of Israel.

The Prophet Isaiah, speaking for God, says:

Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not? wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge? Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure, and exact all your labors. Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness; ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high. Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?—Isaiah 58: 3-7.

BUT CHARITY IN THE ANCIENT JEWISH LAW was to be a last resort. The real goal was to make everyone self-supporting. The harvest crews were to leave the gleanings in the field so the poor could go there and gather it—they were not to bring it in and then distribute it to the poor so they might have it without effort. The people were encouraged to provide noninterest-bearing loans for the poor. To charge interest was to take advantage of a man's adversity, and Ezekiel classified it with idolatry, robbery, murder, bloodshed, and anarchy (Ezekiel 22: 25), and declared it was one of the causes of Jerusalem's downfall (Ezekiel 18: 12, 13). Wealth consisted primarily of land, and every fiftieth year there was to be a redistribution of this so that old families who had lost their land could return to their inheritances.

This, in brief, was the financial law Jesus knew as a child, the law out of which grew his own concepts of wealth and property.

That Jesus felt a deep sense of mission to the poor is indicated in the text he chose for his first sermon in Nazareth.

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and the recovering of sight to the blind; to set at liberty them that are bruised; to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

That he understood their poverty is indicated in his parable of the woman who lost a drachma (about sixteen cents) and upon recovering it, called in all her friends to celebrate with her.

That he sympathized with their need is indicated in his identification of the righteous with those who ministered to the hungry, thirsty, sick, and unfortunate. "For," he said, "when the Son of Man shall come in his glory . . ." (Matthew 25: 32) the basis of selection will be the degree man has ministered to those in need.

IF WE ARE TO TAKE the words of Jesus by themselves, the common assumption that he frowned upon the accumulation of wealth is not well supported.

In Luke 18: 18, a certain ruler

Work to Be Done on the Auditorium

At the last General Conference, a resolution was passed, which is quoted below:

October 6, 1948

To the General Conference:

At a meeting of the Board of Appropriations held Saturday, October 2, at 10 a.m., the following resolution was adopted:

It was moved that we request the General Conference to remove the restrictions on expenditure of the moneys reserved for Auditorium use, permitting the funds to be used for completion of the Auditorium, but not necessarily for the specific items designated.

The previous appropriations referred to authorized work as follows: Covering the dome with copper, completing the walls with finish stone (Bedford Limestone), supporting the dome, and roofing the flat deck of the whole building.

Architectural studies are in process which suggest that greater utility may be achieved by some changes in planning in the house of the funds appropriated.

Respectfully submitted,
THE BOARD OF APPROPRIATIONS,
By Israel A. Smith, Chairman

Further architectural studies made since Conference indicate the necessity of roofing the flat deck of the Auditorium in order to preserve the building. To do this, it was advisable to tie this work in with that of completing the walls supporting the dome with finish stone (Bedford Limestone). After careful consideration and study, the First Presidency and the Presiding Bishopric have approved proceeding with this work, and it will be started as soon as weather conditions permit.

A contract has been entered into with the Weeks Construction Company, which company built the building to its present state of completion. Architectural services in connection with this new construction work have been given by Henry C. Smith, Church Architect and designer of the building, and Bloom-

President John F. Garver Dies

It is our sad duty to notify the Church of the death of President John F. Garver. He passed away early the morning of March 3 at his home, 307 West Kansas Street, Independence, Missouri.

The death of Brother Garver removes from our ranks one of the ablest ministers of the church. He was loved and respected by the Saints throughout the world, to many of whom he was personally known and by all of whom his death will be greatly mourned. His connection with the church dates from September 26, 1897. He had served under appointment since January 1, 1907.

The funeral was held at the Stone Church, Independence, at 10:00 a.m., Saturday, March 5, 1949. Interment was at Lamoni, Iowa.

Time does not permit any further statement now, but biographical notes and other information will be published in the next issue of the "Herald."

We have expressed to Sister Garver and her daughters the sympathy of the Church and have assured them of a continuing interest in the prayers of the Saints.

garten and Frohwerk, architects from Kansas City, Missouri. The total amount of the contract for this work is $169,609.00, subject to changes which may reduce this figure somewhat, depending upon the final decisions relative to certain phases of the work.

The cornice of the dome is being so constructed as to make provision for installation of copper roofing or other metal roofing at a later date. It is the opinion of competent roofers that we have several years of good wear yet in the roof on the dome.

Other studies are being made of work which may be done within the building to improve the acoustics; also studies concerning the floor of the main Auditorium and the Foyer, but decisions on this work will not be made until more detailed information is available.

We are confident that our church members will be very much interested in knowing that after several years of delay, progress is now being made toward completion of the building.

Respectfully submitted,
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

Supervisor of Priesthood Education

Dr. F. M. McDowell was placed at the head of a new department of the church at the recent General Conference in October. He is the director of priesthood education in the church. In this capacity, his work extends into two areas. The first is the preparation of literature for publication for priesthood study. Readers of the Herald have noticed lists of materials which the priesthood is encouraged to study or at least become well acquainted with. New material is constantly being prepared, and good secular material for use in counseling is being organized by Doctor McDowell.

The second field of his work is the promotion of local priesthood institutes and schools throughout the church. In both of these areas, he works directly under the First Presidency. In Aaronic work, he also works in co-operation with the Presiding Bishopric.

One Quiet Hour

By RUBY TINKHAM

CATHERINE surveyed the kitchen sink with its pile of dirty dishes and then the living room with its usual morning disorder. Her husband's evening papers and a pair of old house slippers were by the big chair. Ken's basketball suit was wadded up in a corner of the davenport, and the twins cutout dolls were strewn over the floor. She heaved a sigh, and resentment flamed high. She could close her eyes and see the rest of the house equally well: three bedrooms with scattered clothes and unmade beds, a bathroom that looked as if someone had been making mud pies, and two porches clogged with galoshes, roller skates, and tricycles.

She shut her eyes tightly and whispered fiercely, "Oh, God, if only I could have one quiet, peaceful hour out of every day—maybe then I could learn to pray, meditate, and get somewhere."

THE PRAYER was hardly finished before she was mentally figuring what task should come first. She would do up the dishes, then wash Ken's suit for the game tonight; and then it happened—the fear came back again to haunt her. Big, lovable, awkward Ken—could he be involved with that bunch of hoodlums that had broken into the filling station and stolen cigarettes and candy? No, of course not, Ken would never steal—besides he had spending money. If anything, Kirt was too generous with the kids.

She sloshed the water into the sink and stopped, holding the box of soap chips in mid-air. But suppose—just suppose he had been along that night and hadn't meant to do anything wrong. Les Woods was a natural born leader and the idol of every other boy in school—and wasn't he bragging they couldn't do anything with him?

Catherine gave herself a mental push, "You really do need some help, sister, you're starting to imagine things." What was it Kirt always said? "Cathy, you can borrow more trouble needlessly than any thirteen people I know." She finished the dishes determinedly and tidied the living room with the basketball suit under one arm. Ken was doing fine on the team this year. Last year he had lacked confidence; but this year, with three players graduating, the coach had given Ken some real help and attention.

She marched to the basement and resolutely turned her eyes away from Ken's collection of flies, fishing rods, and guns. She stretched the suit out lovingly, and the tears were close. "Please, God, you know Ken isn't a bad boy. He just couldn't do anything like that." Maybe she should have let him stay out on the farm with his grandfather this year. Then he could have fished and hunted and worked a little. Grandpa was pretty lonely, and Ken was his favorite; but Catherine couldn't bear the thought of parting with Ken when he had only these next two years in school. Then it would be either college or the Navy. She pushed the thought away wearily and mounted the stairs heavily—each step pulling against her leaden legs like a dead weight on the end of a string.

SHE LOOKED at the clock and mentally counted the time until the twins came home for lunch. She would clean the bathroom, then put on the soup, and make some sandwiches. She wasn't hungry, but the twins always ate as if they were refugees from a concentration camp. Maybe, if she hurried, she could squeeze in that quiet hour right after lunch. She needed it badly—her hands were shaking!

She left the bathroom and started to set the table. She dished up fruit and made sandwiches automatically—lettuce in Dona's but none for Doris. Funny how different kids were. The twins were so noisy and talky and out with everything—but not Ken. He was the quiet type, and everything went deep with him. She paused with the butter knife in her hand, wasn't Ken just a little quieter recently than he had been? He hadn't offered to help with the dishes lately or asked for any chocolate fudge. Maybe something was wrong. She laid her shaking hands flat against the table top, closed her eyes and bit down hard on her trembling lips. "No, God, please don't let anything go wrong for Ken."

The front door slammed and pandemonium reigned in the house. Two voices rang out with split-second timing, "Mother, is lunch ready?"

Lunch was always one of those noisy affairs in which the twins did all the chattering, and Catherine did all the listening. Then the house was quiet again, and Catherine faced the task of washing dishes, this time with a kind of forced resignation instead of resentment. She would make a Jello salad for supper, call the grocer, and then she would take that one quiet hour for herself. Her whole body strained toward it now, not in joyous anticipation but with passionate renunciation like Gethsemane.

She spread up the beds and picked up scattered clothes with rapid, dexterous movements that bespoke much practice.

"Now," her soul cried, "now, is the time you have waited for!"

THEN SHE SUDDENLY REMEMBERED, Dona had to have the blue skirt pressed for the program tomorrow, and there were two buttons off her white blouse. "No," her soul cried despairingly, "you can't do this to me; I must have release now!"

But all the while she was opening the drawer, picking up the sewing box, and holding the blouse close to her eyes so she could see through the mist. "Why do I keep punishing myself? Why do I keep torturing myself? Am I afraid to ask God for help? Haven't I any faith?"

She jabbed her finger and wiped it carefully on her apron. If the blouse wasn't ready, then Dona would want to wear Doris', and Doris would raise a fuss, and there would be a quarrel, and Catherine couldn't stand that—not now.

She laid the finished blouse on the bed and went to connect the iron. She knew that any kind of meditation would be impossible unless each task was completed and her house was in order. No wonder the Master needed rest and quiet with all those people constantly crowding him and selfishly demanding the help he gave so generously and spontaneously. Were prayer and meditation his secret sources of strength and power?

Catherine turned the iron up on the board and went to the bedroom resolutely. Shall I pray standing like Jeremiah or sitting like David or lying prone like Christ? The bed looked so inviting that she eased her tired body down gratefully and sighed with relief. No, she mustn't close her eyes, she might fall asleep like on last Monday after she had finished that big washing.

WHAT SHALL I SAY? How shall I say it? Is God really listening? Does he really care? I suppose I should thank him first of all for our blessings. Then I really should ask him to bless our home. But then why should he? Did I insist that Grandpa come and stay with us this winter instead of out there alone on the farm? No, he would have had to sleep with Ken, and he takes his teeth out when he eats, and he makes funny noises. Maybe if he had been here, Ken would have stayed home more and not been out with that gang nearly every night. Why should God bless my home when I have refused hospitality to others?

I know, I will ask him to bless the children and protect them, keep them well and strong—but no, that is really my job. It's up to me to see that they get good food and plenty of rest—and keep the right kind of company.

Suddenly she was ashamed. She had been just about to ask God to take over the responsibility of Ken's behavior. Why should she suddenly want God to take a hand—was it because she had failed? Would she be so eager to turn Ken's life over to Him under any other circumstances?

Cathy rubbed her forehead with the back of her hand and confusion held her body taut. Should I ask him to bless me? He must know I need help. But then, what have I done with his blessings? Did I think of him when I turned down that church school teaching job because the twins are past the primary grade? Didn't I more or less make fun of Kirt when he started that home study course? Haven't I insisted that school activities ought to come first in Ken's life?

Cathy rolled over and laid her face against the spread. Hot tears rolled unnoticed against its softness while she clenched and unclenched her hands. "Oh, God, I can't pray for myself, but please do something for Ken. Please, God, help him!"

TWO PAIRS of feet echoed on the front porch and the door fairly burst open with, "We're home, Mom. Can we have an apple?"

Catherine pulled herself up slowly and smoothed out the spread. The refrigerator was already being explored when she reached the kitchen. Apples and cookies were disappearing into bottomless pockets, and voices outside proclaimed that tonight there were guests waiting impatiently on the back porch with roller skates. She picked up a pan and started to peel potatoes.

Supper time was always the best part of the day. Kirt was home tired and hungry, and nothing ever diminished the twins' appetite. No one seemed to notice that Ken and Cathy were unusually quiet. Catherine watched Ken picking at his food, and she couldn't restrain herself, "Ken, you're not eating anything."

Ken tried to grin, and her heart ached for him as he replied, "You know we're not supposed to eat before a game, Mom."

Later, while she was doing dishes, Ken came up from the basement with his suit rolled up snugly under his arm. He came over to the sink and stood there shyly as if he wanted to tell her something. Her heart cried out desperately, "Tell me, Ken, tell me now!"

"You're coming to the game tonight, aren't you, Mom?"

Cathy tried to smile and answer gaily, "You bet we're coming. We wouldn't think of missing this game with Shannon."

Ken rolled his suit over and over in his big hands and Cathy clenched hers under the soapy mound in the sink. Now he was going to say something. She could feel it, and her heart pounded as she waited in agonizing silence.

"Mom, you know I've been awful worried lately. I thought sure I flunked that Latin test last week and wouldn't get to play tonight. But I asked Miss Atkins today, and she said I was doing just fine. Gee, Mom, I sure was scared."

He grinned. Cathy wanted to hug him tight, but she knew how he hated demonstrations, so she smiled and answered, "I'm glad, Ken. I know how much this game means."

HE STARTED FOR THE DOOR, and Cathy wanted to hold him back. Now, she thought, I've got to ask him. I've got to find out. I can't go on like this any longer. Her voice sounded shaky and a trifle shrill as she fought for control, "Ken, did they ever find out who robbed that filling station two weeks ago?"

He stopped with his hand on the doorknob, and there was surprise on his face, "Gee, Mom, didn't I ever tell you about that? They picked up some vagrant a week ago. I thought I told you."

She faced him trembling. "But Ken, what about Les Woods? I thought—"

He made a face and shook his head disgustedly, "Oh, that guy, he's crazy enough to say anything! You know him, Mom, always clowning." He opened the door and then stood there a second before he said shyly, "I'll probably get to play the whole game tonight, Mom. I hope I don't make too many fouls."

Cathy lifted her head and said proudly, "You'll do just fine, Ken. I know you will, and we'll be rooting for you."

He grinned and took the back steps in one enormous leap. Cathy turned back to the sink, and her heart was leaping too. "Thank you, God, thank you, thank you, thank you!"

THE PAPERS rustled in the living room, and Kirt came into the kitchen and picked up the dish towel silently and started to dry the dishes. They worked there side by side neither breaking the silence until he spoke kindly, "You see, Cathy, I told you there was nothing to worry about."

Tears sprang to her eyes, but she raised her head anyway, "Oh, Kirt, I'm so glad—so glad!"

He patted her shoulder affectionately, "Cathy, you work too hard and worry too much. You know what you ought to do? You ought to take an hour every day just for yourself—to rest and be quiet!"

Progress

Regrets, the heart must spurn.
Today, to do our best—
From yesterday, to learn.
To make each moment count.

The People From the North Country

By HUBERT CASE

IN THE BEGINNING of my work as a missionary in 1894, I said to President Joseph Smith, who had just performed our marriage ceremony, blessed us, and set us apart for that far-off mission to the South Seas, "Brother Joseph, tell me what to preach, for I have not as yet preached a dozen sermons." His answer was, "Preach the Three Books as you find them." That I have done ever since. I believe them with all the promises found therein.

Among the promises, I find many plainly written concerning the people in the North Country. Some of these date back to the days of the Prophet Jeremiah, who wrote:

And I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all countries whither I have driven them. Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, The Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I have driven them.—Jeremiah 23: 3, 7, 8.

This is strongly supported by the well-known passage in Doctrine and Covenants 108: 6:

And they who are in the north countries shall come in remembrance before the Lord, and their prophets shall hear his voice, and shall no longer stay themselves, and they shall smite the rocks, and the ice shall flow down at their presence. And an highway shall be cast up in the midst of the great deep. Their enemies shall become a prey unto them, and in the barren deserts there shall come forth pools of living water; and the parched ground shall no longer be a thirsty land. And they shall bring forth their rich treasures unto the children of Ephraim my servants. . . . And then shall they fall down and be crowned with glory, even in Zion, by the hands of the servants of the Lord, even the children of Ephraim; and they shall be filled with songs of everlasting joy.

God caused Nephi to write:

For behold, I shall speak unto the Jews, and they shall write it: And I shall also speak unto the Nephites, and they shall write it; and I shall also speak unto the other tribes of the house of Israel, which I have led away, and they shall write it. . . . And it shall come to pass that the Jews shall have the words of the Nephites, and the Nephites shall have the words of the Jews: and the Nephites and the Jews shall have the words of the lost tribes of Israel; and the lost tribes of Israel shall have the words of the Nephites and the Jews.—II Nephi 12: 67-72.

WE HAVE THE WRITINGS of the Jews, the Bible (the stick of Judah), and the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants (of the two branches of the seed or stick of Joseph), referred to in Ezekiel 37: 15, 22, but where are the writings of the people in the North Country? That is answered in the above quotation, wherein they are to come to Zion and lay down their rich treasures at the feet of Ephraim. What could any righteous people value more than the word of God as given to them? These would be their richest treasures.

Joseph Smith, the Prophet, wrote to Mr. N. E. Seaton, editor of a paper published at Rochester, New York, in 1833, saying:

And now I am prepared to say by the authority of Jesus Christ, that not many years shall pass away before . . . pestilence, hail, famine, and earthquakes will sweep the wicked of this generation from off the face of the land, to open and prepare the way for the return of the lost tribes of Israel from the north country.—Church History, Volume 1, page 261.

I read with great interest a recent article in the Saints' Herald and agree with the references to Scriptures, and other authorities regarding the ten tribes, but it does not go far enough—not as far as did Joseph the Martyr, and his son, Joseph. I heard the late Brother Joseph tell of three people who visited him one night after he had retired. He sat up in bed, much surprised at their appearance in his room, and asked them what was wanted. They said nothing, but stood and looked at him, then disappeared. He said he understood they were people from the North Country, who had come to see the Prophet in Zion.

I WISH NOW TO RELATE my vision of the people in the North Country. Some two years ago I walked (in vision) among a people whom I had never before seen. Five of us, who were from our country, walked among this unknown people. They were intelligent, interesting-looking people, very kindly in manner. We walked for some distance on a highway running through the midst of their land. Suddenly a small girl ran in front of me and tried to converse with me. I could not understand what she said, and the endeavor to do so awakened me from the dream or vision. I prayed the Lord to permit us to walk again among them, if they were indeed the people of the North Country. Very soon we were again walking among them, my wife by my side, and the same three men behind us. We walked to their headquarters and saw their prophet and leading men. They were fine-looking people, and the Lord said to me, "These people are of one heart and one mind, and they are preparing to come to Zion as the prophets have said." I saw that they were preparing to migrate. They seemed to be making inventories and had many goods packed and ready.

I was thrilled at the appearance of such noble-looking, godly men, and the spirit of that event. I thrilled, also, to have a real knowledge that the people from the North Country will come. The few who believe it is true, and those who live to see it—in and out of the church—will be astonished. God has made all these promises and will fulfill them to the letter.

We Went Through Hell

BY MRS. GEORGE BAIER

IN THE EARLY HOURS of August 23, 1943, when my husband and I emerged from the ruins of our Berlin dwelling, shaken but unhurt, we thanked God that our little daughter had been spared that ordeal. For two weeks prior to this event, which was to be the beginning of a long series of direct contact with the fury of war for us, because of the increasing danger, we had sent our child away to relatives in a small Bavarian town. Then it had seemed a terrible hardship to us both to part with our child, especially as we did not know if and when we would see her again. But on that morning—and on many more occasions after it—we realized that it had been God's wise guidance which made us send her away. And when I heard the pitiful crying of other children during those horrible hours, I thanked God from the bottom of my heart that our child was living in comparative safety. I shall never be able to erase that one night from my own memory—the inferno of crashing bombs, the unceasing firing of the anti-aircraft guns, and the thunder of collapsing walls over our heads. Then came the alarm of the air-raid warden. Fire! How we got out of the air-raid cellar, almost stunned by the sight awaiting us—one soaring sea of flames all around—I cannot describe.

This was the first experience. There were many more to come.

We found a home with some friends. Good fellowship was the one redeeming feature in those days. On January 31, 1944, we were again made homeless. Words are too poor to describe the ghastliness of those nights. In the spring of that year my husband's firm, whose premises also had been wrecked, had to be moved outside Berlin to insure the continuation of its work. Accommodations were found in Klösterle in the Sudetenland (former German-populated part of Czechoslovakia).

With a heavy heart, we left Berlin. We felt like traitors, leaving our friends at such a time amidst ever-increasing danger. By then daylight bombing had started in addition to the almost nightly large-scale bombings, and Berlin could boast only a few districts which had remained reasonably intact. So we left—tired, longing for rest and quietude, and wanting to have our child back again.

It was like heaven in the Sudetenland. We lived in one of the most beautiful spots I have ever seen in my life—the Eger Valley. Klösterle, a small town, lies embedded between two mountain ranges, the Erzgebirg and Duppauer Ranges. There are lovely orchards, wide, waving cornfields, the flowing river, a picturesque fourteenth century castle—and all framed by glorious hills. We had a little wooden house built, and furnished it with much care. We were happy. Every morning when I opened the shutters of our tiny house, the beauty of the countryside, the heavenly peace of it all struck me anew, and one could not help but praise God for so much beauty, so much peace in the midst of the turmoil. The inhabitants, too, were the kind one loves—friendly, diligent, honest, unpretentious, kind-hearted.

Thus we lived through the summer and autumn. On November 13 my husband was called and had to leave at once. As the weeks went by, the wintry face of our little town began to change. Covered wagons passed through, drawn by shaggy, little horses, with drivers clad in strange-looking clothes. First there were isolated wagons, then more and more came, until it was a never-ending stream. The look of the caravan changed, too; it was a wild jumble of carriages, two-wheeled carts, covered wagons—anything on wheels. They came from the southeast—refugees fleeing before the Russians. By the spring of 1945, that too changed. The stream started to move in two directions. The narrow streets of the town were blocked by it, and the heavy drone of engines never ceased, day or night. Military units, guns camouflaged with twigs and leaves, refugees—haggard, drawn-looking, weary to death. As accompaniment there was the sound of booming guns from the front line. War had come to the Sudetenland, too.

That was when air attacks started. So far we had only seen the bombing units fly across on their way to their destinations: Dresden, Leipzig, and the big industrial towns. Now the highway, congested by the traffic, was the aim of smaller bombing units and low-flying fighters. Our tiny wooden house afforded no protection. The nearest air-raid shelter was in the valley, ten minutes distant. Those were agonizing moments when my little girl and I waited, arms locked round each other, while the planes swooped down. We could hear the impact of the bullets all around us. We had to look once, while a peasant working in the field outside our house was riddled with bullets. Then there was the night of the big attack on Komotau, a town not far away, when fire literally fell from the skies. It was the most magnificent, gruesome sight I have ever seen.

All news from my husband which I had been receiving regularly stopped. All I knew was that he last was stationed in Berlin, and Berlin had been surrounded by the Russians.

Klösterle was flooded with German soldiers—soldiers of every description—all with their equipment. They went westward, toward Karlsbad, the once world-famous spa. There the American forces were advancing, while the Russians were closing in from the east and north. Klösterle was waiting breathlessly. Who would get here first?

Then came the first American army trucks, and in their wake, the stream of German soldiers flowing back. The American forces had refused to take them prisoners. They had to return to the Russians. You cannot picture it, unless you have seen it—an army in retreat, defeated.

We were waiting, hoping, and praying that the American forces would come. We hoped in vain. In the meantime, prisons and concentration camps had been opened everywhere and their inmates liberated indiscriminately. There were rapings, houses set on fire, and pillaging. The Americans had stopped in the West at Karlsbad, the Russians, in the East at Komotau, and we, between the two forces, were “no man’s land.” The following fortnight made us pray that, as the Americans had not come, at least the Russian soldiers might come, and from them we could expect some discipline. They did not come. Then one morning, the news came that the Czechs had arrived. Now, we thought, law and order would return. It did not. Posters appeared ordering all citizens to take wireless sets, sewing machines, electrical equipment, cameras—in short, all valuables—to the town hall. Penalty for not complying with those orders was death. That was the first poster. Many more followed. Homes were being searched “for weapons”—a pretext for ransacking.

Arrests followed. One hundred respectable, law-abiding citizens were put on a lorry and driven off. A few days later, a red poster appeared, announcing the names of ten of them having been shot publicly in Kaaden, our district town, “to state an example.”

It was a crime to look respectable.

The wives of doctors, lawyers, etc., were taken from their homes to clean the latrines of the new “masters,” to sweep up horse-droppings from the road, to do any degrading work imaginable. All the time they were working, there was a uniformed Czech guard standing by, armed with a horsewhip which he applied frequently.

We were hungry, although most of us had lost our appetites. Our ration cards were marked “German,” printed on paper which had the watermark, “German,” all over. Our rations consisted of two pounds of bread per week and two ounces of margarine. That was all. In order to get the bread, we had to queue up for hours. At the same time, uniformed Czechs held orgies. Young girls were rounded up, taken to the parties, and forced to eat until they were sick. Peasants had to deliver their live stock to appointed places, without any payment whatever, so that the “masters” were never short of supplies. Wine and spirits ran in rivers. The results were as expected. It was not safe for any girl or woman to pass the market square, where the Czechs had their headquarters.

The order was issued that every German (the whole population) had to wear a white band around his arm. Whoever was found without it could be sure to be beaten up, if nothing worse. I never saw one of the Czechs walking about without a revolver, a truncheon, or a whip in his hands—and it was not there just as an ornament. More than once a bullet whizzed by while we were walking along the street. It was forbidden to lock the doors. “Search parties” went around day and night, and they never went away empty-handed. There was never a moment when one could relax or be at peace, and all the time the death bell was ringing. Suicides increased from day to day. A peasant from the east, passing through on his way to hoped-for safety, shot his family of five and then himself. A woman, whose husband had been one of the men shot at Kaaden, took cyanide. A mother and her two small children saw her husband beaten up by the Czechs and die of the injuries. Endless other human beings, tortured and despairing, preferred death to the hell they had to live in.

It was the same, day in and day out. There were variations, admittedly, and we had to marvel at the ingenuity of the Czechs in finding new ways and new methods.

Then came the morning when armed Czechs went into every house, and drove people, even the sick, up to the market square. We went, not knowing what it was all about, because we had no other choice. We were kept standing there for almost four hours, the sun beating down mercilessly; the suspense did not improve matters. There were old, feeble people, pregnant women, small children. At last an officer, well-fed and smartly dressed, stepped on the market square. He made a speech. He said the whole of the German people were the vilest things on earth and ought to be wiped out ruthlessly. When he had finished, two men were led out of the town hall by a firing squad. The onlookers caught their breath audibly—they knew the two men, peasants from the next village. The men were placed in position and stood there, fists clenched. I shall never forget it, and I shall never forget how the firing squad twice failed to hit, before the men fell at last and hit the ground. My little girl also was a compulsory witness of this. These men were accused of hiding a revolver underneath the straw in their barn. To understand the absurdity of that accusation fully, one has to remember that for weeks on end, there had been troops going through Klösterle in two directions, and soldiers sleeping in every barn.

On the next day at noon, four more men were shot in the same manner, without a trial, without a chance to defend themselves. In the afternoon, all the remaining men of Klösterle, who had been of some social standing, were taken to the town hall. They had to undress and stand with their arms outstretched, facing the wall. A number of Czechs, armed with truncheons, bunches of wire, whips, and pieces of rubber-piping, beat them, until the blood was streaming off their backs. Then the procedure was repeated on the soles of their feet. It seemed as if the scum of the Czechoslovakian nation had been concentrated in Klösterle.

The next unforgettable event came two days afterwards. This time it affected me and my daughter personally. One of the posters we had learned to hate and to fear so much appeared. It was the order for all Germans, who had come to the Sudetenland in the course of the last few years, to report within twenty-four hours at some barracks just outside Klösterle. Luggage taken must not exceed fifty pounds. The dwellings must be left undisturbed. My little girl was ill at that time. The excitement, lack of food, and nervous strain had been too much for her. There was an epidemic of dysentery, and she caught it. Now we would have to leave our little home and go to live in a camp under Czech rule. I could not do it. I prayed God to show me a way out.

We had been living in England until the war, and were asked to leave when war broke out, because my husband and I were Germans. Our little girl was born in London. She possessed dual nationality, but I had no proof of it. All of our papers had been burned, and among them was her birth certificate. All I had was my old passport issued in London.

I went to the town hall with a trembling heart reporting to the Czech "burgomaster." I demanded to get a pass for my little girl, who was British born, entitling her and me to go to Karlsbad, where I would see the British liaison officer on her behalf. He would not hear of it at first, but I insisted. At last I held the pass in my hands.

I will not describe those last hours in our little home, where we had been so happy. It had not by any means been easy to lose our previous homes, but this seemed harder still. I packed a small suitcase with a few of the most essential things, put our "rations" in (that did not take much doing) and said good-by to our friends. Then we set off.

We got to Karlsbad in pouring rain, my child almost too weak to walk. Dysentery is not a nice illness. The first disappointment awaited us there. The American forces had evacuated the town and handed it over to the Russians. The administration was in Czech hands, and my permit ended at Karlsbad. Somehow, after applying to many authorities and walking from one administrative office to another, after innumerable setbacks, we got to Ellbogen, a small American post. We both wept when we saw the first American soldier, but still our troubles were not over. We had to walk on to the next town and apply to the local CIC for a permit to cross the Czech border. By the time we got there, the administration had been handed over to the Czechs and the border closed. I will not go into details. We spent a week in Falkenau with the aim of getting the necessary permit. The town was crowded to the breaking point. Thousands of refugees like ourselves, waited to get permission to cross the frontier into Bavaria. And still we lived on the loaf of bread and the scrap of margarine I had taken.

After a week and more visits to the CIC and the Czech town hall than I would care to count, I finally got a special permit to leave the country, "on account of the British nationality of the minor daughter." I have kept this permit as a memento. If ever I get dissatisfied with life in general, I will take it out and look at it. Having the permit, the question of transport arose. Trains were running, but "German swine can walk" was the opinion of the Czech officials. The child had become so weak, I could not dare to set out on a tramp of some hundred miles. Our ultimate goal was Nürnberg, birthplace of my husband and myself.

I learned about a coal mine near the town, where daily army trucks and all kinds of private vehicles called from every part of the country to get coal. I also heard that sometimes, if one were lucky, one could get a lift. We waited there a day and a half. The weather had turned wet again, so the two officials, kind men, asked us into their office. In return for their kindness, I acted as interpreter when American soldiers came. I begged every single one of them to help us along on our journey, but they either had to go the other way, or they did not want to take the risk of transporting us across the frontier, as it was against Army regulations to take civilians in an army vehicle. We had almost given up hope, when, on the second day, a little fellow stepped into the office, announcing himself to be in charge of seven trucks, taking coal to Wunsiedel—a little town just across the Bavarian frontier. I summoned my courage

Using Time Wisely

By MARY MARGARET CURRY

IN THE OPENING PHRASES of the Bible, we find a definite challenge to so order our individual lives that we may enjoy the beautiful life to which the Prophet Isaiah referred when he spoke these comforting words: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee." If we are to enjoy the fullest blessings of this life, we must realize that "in the beginning, God," is emphasized throughout the entire Scriptures as the prime requisite for everyone to observe and follow.

Today we are facing one of the most critical periods in all history. That sense of security, which is the dream and rightful possession of every person, seems to be strangely elusive as we note the conflicting forces which are converging upon all the world, threatening to destroy the very stability which is so vital to our peace of mind as we go about this daily business of living.

WE ALL FEEL THE NEED of a spiritual strength within our lives. How important it is then that we nurture and build up this strength which needs constant attention and sustenance just as much as our physical strength demands that we live by all the accepted rules of good health.

An individual who attains valuable experience and efficiency in daily work, which he may spend six days a week in acquiring, should not expect to gain a rich spiritual life by spending inadequate time in preparation or spasmodic application to duty in the building of the kingdom.

One of the greatest contributing factors to the retarding of spiritual growth is the fact that too many individuals think upon spiritual values within their lives only during the time they spend within the church walls, and do not continue to study and pray during the remainder of their daily lives. Apparently, it is easy to casually disregard prayer and spiritual endeavor when we become busily engaged in securing a material living.

A strong motivating force of this condition is the stepped-up progress for material gain, power, and individual recognition advanced by business and industry in this great rush for higher production to meet the demands of the people.

Mounting prices cause a need for larger family incomes. Leaders of industry meet a portion of this need by offering more pay. In some cases good, honest, working people are compelled to labor long hours in order to maintain a high record for achievement. Too often such individuals, who ordinarily are regular attendants at church services, are called upon to work on the Sabbath or through evening hours when regular church services are scheduled.

March

AND HERE IS MARCH, the blustery, unpredictable month. The high winds, the rain and snow, with fair days here and there—and then more high winds, make one wonder if the heavens are doing their spring house cleaning.

The saying, "If spring comes in like a lion, it goes out like a lamb," is so like the housewife who starts her house cleaning too energetically and, by the time she is finished, like March—is tired and lamblike.

St. Patrick embellishes the month. Shakespeare gives an eerie feeling when he refers to the "Ides of March." Poets have not gone into ecstasies over the month, but in spite of its faults, March ushers in the most beautiful day of the year, the first day of spring.

There is no way of predicting this first day. It is not a date on the calendar, it is not obedient to a presidential proclamation. It is a state, a condition, a "feel in the air." Usually it comes late in the afternoon and simultaneously all the doors in the neighborhood burst open, and out come fathers, mothers, and children armed with rakes, hoes, garden seeds, bird houses, and good intentions.

For the moment, the urge to dig supercedes all other urges. Then one by one the fathers congregate, dusk descends, mothers take the little ones in to bed and rest. As darkness deepens, the low hum of voices indicate that the "men with the hoes" are settling the problems of the world.

When this happens, you'll know spring is not just around the corner, it is here!! And it came in this erratic month of March.

—LULA CARMICHAEL.

IS IT GOD'S WILL that his people shall be placed in positions where, in order to obtain a standard livelihood for their families, they must put all their time and energies into securing an income. In Luke 12: 34 we read, "Therefore seek ye first to bring forth the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you." God's promises and admonitions are just as true today as in the early church. If we have a stronger faith in God's ability to provide the necessities in life we will budget our time according to his plan of placing first things first.

It is generally accepted among those of us who desire to become good citizens in our communities that we affiliate with progressive clubs, civic organizations, etc., as an essential part of a well-rounded life. There is much to be commended in these organizations and one could easily say, "The more I associate with my fellow club members, the better able I will be to influence for good the lives of those with whom I come in contact. In time, I may bring them to an acceptance and understanding of a fuller Christian life." True, this could be a successful undertaking, and a great amount of good work has been accomplished through such organizations. But too often a person becomes so drawn into the activities of organized groups that a large portion of his time is spent on them and less time is devoted to the church and home. Here, too, as conscientious workers for God, we must learn to budget our time so that the greater portion is devoted to his work.

TOO MANY OF US in this generation are not familiar with family worship. Perhaps if we became more diligent in the united family worship, we would find the solution to many of the perplexing problems we meet from day to day. If each member of the family would take time in the early morning hours, before separating for the day's activities, to bow in prayer and ask for God's guidance throughout that day, they could expect to be better able to cope with difficult situations arising during the day. Then, in the evening how blessed they would be if they joined in thanking God for his help and asked for peaceful rest through the night.

What right have we to expect help if we rush through our morning preparations without a civil greeting to other members of our family because our minds are so preoccupied in reaching our place of employment or school on time? What real peace of mind can we attain by working all day, filling the evening hours with entertainment, and returning home exhausted.

Many times the Apostle Paul instructed his listeners to seek wisdom, patience, and understanding; to love God and their fellow men, and through divine worship they might gain strength and blessings for their efforts. He very definitely stated that "to be spiritually minded is life and peace." He offered many instructions for his people to follow in order that they might attain these heights. Though written many centuries ago, his admonitions are just as applicable to modern living.

Family worship will create and maintain within each member of the family who participates an earnest desire to put God first, to study his word, to seek wisdom, and to devote more time to the work of his kingdom.

If we cultivate a spiritual mind, we will soon find that God supplies the strength for us to use our time and talents first for him, second for our fellow men, and third for ourselves. We will experience a serenity of mind that will minimize to a great extent those annoying little problems which confront us each day.

As we consistently work for God's kingdom, we will find opening for us that avenue which leads to full enjoyment of the beautiful way of life God has provided for his people.

What the Japanese Believe

By
MRS. S. C. BETHEL

THE JAPANESE are a mysterious, secretive, and uncommunicative people. They are so different from any other people that it is difficult to understand them. To do so, we must know something about their religion and nationalism in Japan.

Heretofore we have taken the gospel message to Christian countries. Before we can make an intelligent approach to missionary work with the Japanese, it will be necessary for us to know something about what they believe.

From a Japanese scrapbook, we read that they worship some eight million gods. These are mainly the gods of nature and racial ancestors that appear in the myths connected with the founding of the empire and in folklore.

For hundreds of years, the world believed that Shinto was the religion of Japan; even Webster says that it is. But Shinto is not a religion: it is a cult.

There are three distinct periods of Shinto. The first period extends from no one knows when to A. D. 550, or, as some authorities claim, to A. D. 660. It was during this period that much of the mythology present in Shinto in our day had its beginning. The high light of this period was the development of the myth of the sun goddess, Amaterasu.

According to the myth, the sun goddess had commissioned her grandson, Ninigi, great-grandfather of the first emperor, to go down to the Great Eight Islands, now known as Japan, to establish a new kingdom. Ninigi was told that the land to which he was going should forever be ruled hereditarily by descendants of the sun goddess.

The second period of Shinto began with the introduction of Buddhism into Japan from China about the middle of the sixth century and continued until about the year 1700. It was during this second period that the name "Shinto" first came to be used. Shinto was in no condition to resist Buddhism, and so Buddhism invaded Japan from all four sides. At the close of this period of 1150 years, Buddhism had taken over in everything except the court and that is well to remember, for at the head of the court was the emperor. Throughout this entire second period, Shinto put up only one fight and that was to preserve this belief that the emperor descended from the sun goddess and nothing was to interfere with this belief.

The third period of Shinto began about the year 1700. We are most concerned with this period as it marked the beginning of a new era in Japan.

FROM THE NINTH OR TENTH CENTURY until the middle of the nineteenth century, a feudal society existed in Japan. The warrior class of this period, or samurai as they were called, held an important place in society and were hired by the lords to furnish protection and keep order. It was at this time also that the concept of the divinity of the emperor was re-emphasized and later, when this warrior class gained control, they used this emperor-worship theory to hold supreme power over the masses.

The year 1868 came to be known as the "restoration." From this time on, the new imperial government centered around the person of the emperor in theory. Actually, rule or leadership was taken over by a group of young samurai or warriors.

These young leaders soon realized it was impossible to shut the doors of Japan to foreign trade and influence, and they quickly began to develop a modern army and navy similar to those of the western powers. The masses were forced to yield to this new ruling power. Disloyalty was punishable by death. Their success was tremendous. The masses, accustomed to severe feudal rule, expected to be led.

On August 12, 1890, "Order Number Twelve" was published and circulated throughout all Japan. This document forbade the teaching of religion of any sort in the public and private schools. Instead of religious instruction, emperor worship with national divinity and loyalty was to be taught under rigid supervision. As a result of this order, the Japanese renounced freedom of faith, freedom of will, and the right to decide who was and who was not to exercise the power of government. It was not a matter of choice; it was a command.

Under this "Order Number Twelve," every morning at the beginning of classes, all children were compelled to make obeisance in the direction of the Imperial Palace at Tokyo, reverencing the emperor. Children were marched in large bodies from their schools to the Shinto shrines for rituals of ancestor and emperor worship. Even the prayers were regulated by the government and constantly repeated the theme of the divine emperor and the reverence due him. Workers in the factories were given daily lectures on their duties to the emperor and were compelled to bow in the direction of the Imperial Palace.

IN TIME this situation changed. These changes became apparent in the intellectual field first. Through Japanese students of western civilization, the general public became more and more aware of national and world affairs. The introduction of Christianity also had some influence. A second group not in harmony with the militarist leaders was composed of businessmen. They were more interested in building big business and great export-import trade with foreign powers. These two groups, especially the latter, gradually took over the government. This was made possible by the death of the emperor in 1912. He left the throne to his mentally deficient son who ruled in name only until 1926. He then had to relinquish even his ceremonial functions to his son, who became the Prince Regent in 1928.

From 1920-1930, Japan was on the way to becoming a democracy. In spite of this trend, however, those in power chose to keep alive the theory of emperor worship and continued to require its being taught in the schools as a means of controlling the masses. They vigorously and ruthlessly suppressed all radical thinkers who challenged the validity of the emperor concept. This proved to be the factor that caused the downfall of the businessmen and their attempts at democracy and allowed the militarists to gain full control in 1932.

EMPEROR HIROHITO might be classed as a moderate, and he might even be a liberal at heart. Being so sheltered from the world, his views cannot be described with any degree of certainty.

He grew up at the time of the First World War when democratic trends were strongest. He traveled in Europe in 1921 and was always surrounded by liberals or at least moderate men at that time. However, the views of the emperor meant nothing in practical politics. What counted was not what the emperor's views were, but what the people were led to believe his views were.

The militarists claimed they represented the true imperial will and that the army was the personal army of the emperor. Acts of aggression abroad, acts of civil disobedience at home, political murders, and open mutiny were all justified as being in accord with the true will of the emperor, whose views were misrepresented by corrupt politicians around the throne.

This militaristic suppression continued during the 1930's and even up to the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941, during which time the militarists really had a strangle hold on Japanese government.

Prior to Pearl Harbor, we were not interested in Japan. When Japan moved into Korea, Formosa, Manchuria, and China, we did not realize she had launched upon her mission to control the world—a mission bred into her people from birth through the teachings of Shinto. They believed it was their greatest task to unify the world under the power of the emperor.

The attack upon Pearl Harbor was not the work of religious crusaders. It was the work of the nationalist teaching, Shintoism.

Nationalist Shinto can be compared only to Naziism and Fascism. Shintoism went far beyond anything Naziism or Fascism ever dreamed of. It had greater power over the people to make them fanatics.

Not all Japanese were gullible to that extent. Many realized their situation, but they were powerless to do anything about it.

In a personal letter, Nobuko Fukada told us that at one time she believed all she was taught in school, but her mother told her many times that it was wrong, that the Americans were good people, and that they would win the war. Nobuko sees now that her mother was right; and now that she has embraced Christianity, she is trying to do all she can to help make democracy work in Japan.

WHERE DOES BUDDHISM come in? It is hard to see how a Japanese could be a Shintoist and a Buddhist at the same time.

At the time of the official separation of Shintoism and Buddhism in 1868, the masses were not disturbed. They remained Shintoist on festal occasions and Buddhist in the more serious affairs of life. The name "Shinto" did not come into general use prior to this time, and it is believed that the term was coined by the Buddhists to distinguish one group from the other.

At birth, a child was presented at a Shinto shrine. At that time, its life was dedicated to the service of the emperor. Politically, the Japanese was Shintoist. For his religion, he clung to Buddhism unless converted to Christianity.

In every home, there was at least one and often two altars. The first—a very simple altar—was to the Shinto sun goddess. The other, more elaborate, was a Buddhist altar. On a shelf were the ashes of dead ancestors. Every morning the Japanese stood before the shelf to perform a ritual of ancestor worship.

It is too fantastic to conceive of eight million Shinto gods. Every good Shintoist laid claim to at least one god of his own, either "made" or inherited. He looked upon this god as his personal protector. The establishment of the emperor as god was the result of this wholesale creating of gods.

AUGUST 14, 1945, was the beginning of a new age for Japan. Profound changes have taken place and continue to. The Japanese people are looking to democracy as a new way of life. Learning for the first time the true facts of recent events in Japan and the Far East, the average Japanese realizes he was the dupe of his own army and political leaders. In his New Year's Day (1946) message to the people, Emperor Hirohito declared that his divinity was a conception based merely on legends and myths.

On December 15, 1945, SCAP (Supreme Command for Allied Powers) ordered the government to end all support to Shinto shrines, to forbid teaching of Shintoism in the schools, and to end requirements that all Japanese must adhere to this belief. This order put all religions on an equal footing in Japan so that the people can worship as they choose.

I HAVE SAID LITTLE about Buddhism. The Japanese people cling to the Buddhist myths that have been a part of their very existence. But when they are helped to see the light of the gospel message, they greatly rejoice.

When our son taught the mother of Nobuko Fukada the gospel and showed her how to read the Bible and understand it, she considered this knowledge greater than anything in her life. She sent gifts to me that had been heirlooms in her family for 500 years or more. She said she had always considered them of far greater value than anything else she possessed. She sent them to me as souvenirs, because she counted the knowledge of the gospel of much greater value. In the box was a slip of paper on which was written, "With Christian Love."

What the outcome of American occupation in Japan will be is uncertain. Other factors will enter in to be sure, but Christianity will aid in making Japan a democratic nation.

We have a grave responsibility as a nation toward the Japanese, one calling for wisdom and understanding. We have a grave responsibility as a divinely commissioned church. Now is the time to utilize this opportunity and "strike while the iron is hot." The Japanese mind is now open to intelligent teaching.

HERALD HOUSE

Independence, Missouri

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—The city-wide Zion's League on Saturday, January 22, spent a Winter Holiday at Gardner Lake near Excelsior Springs, church-owned grounds. The winter conditions were excellent for skating and sledding. After five tons of snow had been shoveled to the side, the ice skating was the big feature for the 146 registered Leaguers. The event was under the sponsorship of the city-wide recreation commission, Clarence Connelly, chairman. The campfire in the evening was under the leadership of Kay Jagger.

ROCK ISLAND, ILLINOIS.—Thelona Stevens of the Department of Religious Education reports a class in this branch, "Book of Mormon Studies." The instructor tells of sixteen being enrolled, but there are twenty-five in attendance on the average. Some members have been in classes under the same instructor for fifteen years, but they testify of revitalized interest. "I feel so full of knowledge," one class member said. They are mostly young married people who can pass on their knowledge to their children.

OREGON DISTRICT.—Three new groups have been organized in the Oregon District in recent weeks by District President J. L. Verhei. Anyone knowing church members living in these locations is asked to write to the pastor of the respective group. They are: Ridgefield, Washington, Milton Becker, pastor, 808 CC Street, Woodland, Washington; North-Portland, Oregon, Faloma District, Harold I. Carpenter, pastor, 2912 T Street, Vancouver, Washington; Roseburg, Oregon, John D. Rodley, pastor, 1145 Ballf Street, Roseburg, Oregon.

PASADENA, CALIFORNIA.—On January 16 at the 11 o'clock service, Sharon Louise, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gibbs, was blessed by Elders Louis Ostertag, Paul Moore, and Harry Waylett. Judith and Shirley Ann, daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Dale Uehlin, were blessed by Elders Harry Waylett and Paul Moore. In the afternoon, Gearhard C. and Madge M. McKee were baptized at the Central Los Angeles church by Seventy George Njeim. The confirmation was held the following Sunday morning at the church in Pasadena, Elders Lacey and Harry Waylett officiating.

Letter of Gratitude From Denmark

During the years following the war, the Saints of Europe have received a number of valuable packages. Some were sent by the general church, others by groups or individuals. We wonder if we can ever express enough thanks for them.

I have thanked God on my knees many times, and I pray every morning for the Saints who have remembered us. God put the love and brotherhood into the Americans' hearts, and they were willing to sacrifice for the benefit of their sisters and brothers. We have been made happy by the things we receive. An elderly man in Germany once wrote that he could not have survived without the American relief packages. In Denmark, we did not suffer so much, but the groceries we received were wonderful. I now wear overalls of good quality to work, and I have fine American shoes.

But we have more than food and clothes to be thankful for; we have received the love of Christ, too, and that is the best part. Each package is a testimony which speaks in a loud voice.

We believe the good Lord will fill the hearts of those who have helped us with joy. May his love remain with us in Europe when the packages are not needed any more.

The Worths Arrive Home

Leaving Independence on November 12 and taking an itinerant preaching schedule en route to New York, we duly arrived there on November 22.

Our original sailing date was November 24, but because of a maritime strike and fog, our departure was delayed until Wednesday, December 8, when the "S. S. Queen Elizabeth" sailed at 12:15 a. m.

The first two days at sea were pleasant sailing, but from then on the voyage was rough. After stopping at Cherbourg, we docked at Southampton on Monday evening, December 13. Disembarkation took place next morning, and by early afternoon, together with friends and relatives who had come to welcome us, we were safely home in London. It was a most happy reunion after an absence of almost three years.

We shall always fondly cherish the remembrance of our stay in the United States. It was a splendid experience, the illumination of which we shall ever carry with us.

We take this occasion to convey our grateful thanks and sincere appreciation to all who helped to make our visit so pleasant and enjoyable. The hospitality of the Saints left nothing to be desired, nor shall we ever forget the many homes which afforded us peace and comfort and rest.

That we were permitted to visit so many congregations of the church was also a fine privilege, and the devotion of the Saints was an inspiration to us.

Repeatedly, while we were in the States, church members told us of their relatives in both Europe and the British Isles. If any would now like to send us names and addresses of relatives on this side of the ocean, especially in the British Isles, together with as much helpful information about them as possible, we should deem it a pleasure to contact them at our earliest opportunity. Our thought in this is particularly with a view to church interest and membership.

A word from anyone any time will be appreciated. We are to be reached at 60, Ollier Avenue, Longsight, Manchester 12, England.

Tom and Betty Worth.

From Mother of Navy Man

My son was baptized at the Stone Church in Independence last December. He has been in the Navy two years, and will serve two more. At present, he is stationed on an aircraft-carrier in the Pacific and has no association with others of his faith. He will appreciate hearing from members, especially those in San Diego and San Francisco whom he might contact when in port. He will welcome letters from the Saints in Kansas City and Independence also.

Moves to Church Community

After the death of my husband and only child, I moved from Roseland, Louisiana, to Escatawpa, Mississippi, so that I could be with others of my faith. At first I thought it would be difficult to leave my home and friends and relatives to live 200 miles away among strangers. However, when I arrived in Escatawpa, the Saints took me into their homes until I could find a place to buy, and I did not feel lonely at all.

I would advise those who are isolated to move, if at all possible, to a place where they can enjoy church privileges and the association of Saints. I have not regretted the move I made and have been richly blessed since coming here in 1944.

I ask the blessing of our Heavenly Father on all the Saints.

Laura Himmler.

Helped by Prayers

We should like to express our appreciation to the Saints who prayed for our infant son, Paul Jonathan, and to the elders who administered to him prior to his operation. His recovery has been remarkable. Born August 15, he was blessed on February 5 by Elders Arthur Slater and Harry Simons.

Gratitude

I feel very humble toward God and all the Saints, and I thank the church for sending the Herald to me. I appreciate the love and kindness of all concerned in all that has been done for me since I was crippled in October, 1946. Trusting ever, and trying to the best of my limited capacities, with God's help, through his Son, I hope to be triumphant in all things, and to walk with him here and in the hereafter. May God be with you all.

Letters for Isolated Saints

I think it would be a good idea for all isolated and shut-in members to write each other. Anyone wishing to exchange letters with other Saints could send his or her name to the Herald. It would be good to share experiences. I have written to some who have requested letters, and I have enjoyed hearing from them. If any wish to write to me, I shall be glad to answer as many as I can.

Notes of Thanks

I wish to acknowledge my deep appreciation of the many flowers, letters, and cards I received during my seven weeks in the hospital while I was recovering from a fractured neck. The prayers and best wishes of my friends were a great source of strength and encouragement. I should like to write each one who remembered me, but since that is impossible, I take this means to express my thanks.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

LAWRENCE, KANSAS.—F. M. McDowell, supervisor of priesthood training was in this branch on February 20. He talked to a young people's class in the morning, preached at the morning worship, and addressed the priesthood in the afternoon. This church's principle members are students and their wives from the University of Kansas. Evidences of splendid co-operation are apparent between the university students, the pastor, and the townspeople. Pastor G. R. Norris said concerning the young people, "I just let them do all they will do in the interest of the church." The church, close to the campus, is the community center.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.—Missionary James Daugherty baptized ten people as a result of recent work in Detroit. The Royal Oak church was dedicated on Sunday, February 27. President Israel A. Smith was the special guest. A series of missionary meetings began that day for the congregation. Brother Daugherty, one of the seven presidents of seventy, who will conduct the series, had an outstanding record in 1948. He baptized ninety new members, and acted as the Wisconsin District president.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.—Franklyn S. Weddle directed the Independence Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon, February 27, in Memorial Hall in a concert. John Ehrlich of the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra was the cello soloist. The orchestra played "Symphony in G minor" by Mozart; "Concerto in D Major" for the cello and orchestra by Haydn, and "Waltz" from "Eugen Oniegin" by Tchaikowsky.

PASADENA, CALIFORNIA.—Reece Walker and Dale Uehlin were baptized on Sunday morning, December 19, at Ontario, California, by Seventy George Njeim. The confirmation service was held on Sunday morning, January 2, at the church in Pasadena, Seventy Njeim and Elder Blaine Bender officiating.

PORT HURON, MICHIGAN.—Apostle Arthur Oakman reports that Elder Warren Chelline has finished a successful series of missionary meetings at Port Huron, Michigan. Two new members came into the church as a result of his work.

The Friend

By LOUISE CRUTCHER LEIBBRAND

FOUR-YEAR-OLD JOHNNY DEAVER was home again. He had been missing for five days, but now he was upstairs sleeping in his own little bed. Two alert state patrolmen had found him wandering alone along the edge of the woods. He was very calm and collected when they ran to where he stood.

"Gee," he said soberly, his big brown eyes searching their faces, "what took you so long to find me?"

One of the troopers, a big, husky fellow with three children of his own, picked up Johnny in his strong arms and carried him to the patrol car. Johnny looked up at him and grinned. Then he laid his tousled curly head against the broad, blue-uniformed chest, sighed, and fell asleep.

The household was very quiet. Johnny's mother looked in every few minutes to see if he was still sleeping. People darted in and out frequently to see how Johnny was.

"Now, Mrs. Deaver," said a persistent reporter. "If we could only get some pictures of your son. How about a picture of him sleeping? Do you realize how many mothers' hearts that would set at ease? What did he say? Did he give any details as to where he spent the past few days?"

"He was asleep when they brought him into the house. He is still asleep. Please don't ask to bother him. You knew, of course, about his uncle and aunt. She was my sister, Grace."

A sob tore from the lips of Mrs. Deaver. She buried her face in her hands and began to cry softly. The reporter looked at her sympathetically, not knowing what to do or say. He put his notebook under his arm, stuck his pencil through his hatband, picked up his hat and his camera, and quietly left the room.

IT WAS ON HIS FOURTH BIRTHDAY that Johnny was going to the park with his aunt and uncle, a childless couple. At the railroad

Here Is the Writer

Louise was born near Medoc, Missouri, and in January, 1943, was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church. She was active in the children's division and taught a church school class before leaving her home congregation. As her farewell gift, she painted (in oil) a picture of Christ by the sea; this painting hangs on the wall of the Medoc church. In 1947, she joined a group of Graceland students who went to Oregon during the summer vacation to work in a cannery. There she met and married Burton Leibbrand, a foreman in the Athena, Oregon, cannery. The Leibbrands and their son, Stevie, live in Milton, Oregon.

crossing next to the park, they had been hit by a southbound train. The aunt and uncle had been killed instantly, but Johnny had mysteriously disappeared. No trace of him had been found until the two troopers discovered him walking near the highway. He had shown not the faintest particle of surprise. He just looked at them as if in silent reprimand and remarked that they had been an awfully long time finding him.

The events of the week had been almost too much for Mrs. Deaver. The troopers had called her husband, telling him of the safety of his son. He hadn't arrived from work, so she was alone. She dimly remembered hearing the reporter go. She continued her sobbing until she heard Johnny call.

"Now, where did you go to? Where are you?"

She rushed to his bedside and knelt by the bed.

"Hello, Mommy. Where did the man go to? Why are you crying?" He anxiously searched her tear-stained face with his big eyes.

"Never mind, son, I'm all right. What man do you mean, Johnny? The one who brought you here? Did he have on a blue coat?" Mrs. Deaver wiped her eyes and looked at him questioningly.

"No, Mommy. He had on a white outfit. And he helped me all the time. He helped me to find stuff to eat, and when I got sleepy, he stayed up and watched me while I slept. Then today he told me to go out to the road and pretty soon some people would come along and find me. He said they would have on blue coats and for me not to be afraid of them. Why didn't the policemen bring him, too, Mommy?"

MRS. DEAVER and her husband discussed the situation that night after Johnny had gone to bed. During the day Johnny had sat up in a chair and talked to the reporters and well-wishing neighbors. All through his accounts of the past five days, he kept speaking of the man in white.

"What happened to you after the—after—er—" started a reporter.

"After the wreck, dear, what did you do?" finished Mrs. Deaver gently.

"The train runned over us. Boom! And I shut my eyes. When I opened 'em again, Auntie Grace and Uncle John wouldn't talk to me. They just laid there and didn't move. I got so scared, I started to run. Pretty soon two women picked me up in their car, but they wouldn't take me home. They drove and drove. And they smoked cigarettes in long things and laughed like this." He imitated a shrill laugh and grimaced in distaste. "I didn't like 'em, so once when they stopped to get something to eat, I slipped away and hid until they left. That night, when it was dark, I got afraid again, but the man came along and walked with me. If someone came along that we didn't like, we would hide until they went on. If we liked 'em, we would ride a while with 'em."

It was all very confusing to Johnny. He was the topic of discussion in the town. Old ladies gave him cookies and gum and wanted to hold him on their laps. He would courteously thank them and then go on his way. After such unexpected behavior from one so young, the dowagers would cluck sympathetically, sigh, and rush home to their telephones.

JOHNNY BEGAN to grow thin and pale. He didn't talk about his friend any more during the day, because people were beginning to act queerly when he mentioned the man in white. At night his mother would hear him talking in his sleep, but when she got up to go to his bedside, he suddenly became quiet. He would make no sound at all while she was there, but the minute she was gone, he started talking again.

Mr. and Mrs. Deaver offered a reward for any information regarding the whereabouts of "A Man in White." Nothing was ever heard. Nearly a month had passed since the accident, and repeated trips to the doctors seemed to have no effect upon their son's health. His parents were advised to get Johnny away from the neighborhood for a while. He was curiously excited, not at the thought of a vacation, but rather at the thought that he would get to meet some new people and see some new faces. They went to a little place in the country. The neighborhood was bare of anything but a few widely scattered farm houses, a store, and a little white church. Its cheerfully ringing bell could be heard on Sunday and on each Wednesday night.

MR. AND MRS. DEEVER decided to attend the Wednesday evening prayer service. They entered the church early, as they had no chores to do at home. As they entered, the sun was just going down. A bright ray of light from the setting sun shone into the small, half-filled church. No conversation was audible. Everyone was thinking his own thoughts.

Suddenly Johnny exclaimed, "There he is! In that room!" He pointed a trembling finger toward the front of the room. The worshippers lifted their eyes to the front.

"Where, Johnny?" In her anxiety, his mother clutched his arm. "Where?"

"There, Mommy! At the other end of the room!" He raised his arms and ran to the front of the church. "Oh, Mommy!" He exclaimed rapturously. "He's the one that helped me when I was lost. Why did he leave me?"

The sun sank almost out of sight. A thin shaft of light that was left, illuminated the face of the boy and the friend he had found again. As Johnny gazed at him, a smile seemed to form on the face of the man in white. Or perhaps it was just the shadows stealing across the room as the sun disappeared from view. The people smiled knowingly at each other as they knelt to pray. Mr. and Mrs. Deaver paused, wordlessly, for a moment, then silently joined the rest in prayer.

Johnny continued to stand, smiling, his arms outstretched toward the life-sized picture of Christ.

Great Oaks

By Donna Jane Unger

THE SEED WAS PLANTED in the rich soil of the hearts and minds of men. For some time, growing seemed impossible, for the forces of evil were strong, and hate, rather than love, prevailed. At last, a little sprout broke through the earth, and the hopes and dreams of all eternity were realized.

Those years of growing were not easy. There were many trials. Everything, it seemed, tried to destroy what little life the tree had. Through the years it stood weathering all that befell it—war, strife, famine, ridicule, and hate. Now its roots are strong and deeply secure in peace, prosperity, and freedom. The tree of democracy lives.

The tree of democracy has not always been as we know it today. All the things we have were planted long ago for the making of a better world. Nations built up armies to destroy the tree, and men laid down their lives that it might grow. Today, we have a responsibility to spread its roots to all mankind. It's a good tree—strong in its purpose, right in its principles.

Democracy is not a government. It's a way of life; it's what we do; it's what we think and feel. It's our belief, our customs, and our habits. It's everything that goes to make a nation like America "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

We are the fruit of the tree. We can be good or bad, strong or weak. The initiative to choose is part of the democratic heritage. Let's be good fruit of a great tree.

The Teachings of Jesus Concerning Wealth

came to Jesus and asked him what he should do that he might inherit eternal life. Jesus called his attention to the moral law of Judaism, and when he was reassured of the man's observance of these things, He said to him: "Yet thou lackest one thing; sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasures in heaven, and come, follow me. And when he heard this, he was very sorrowful; for he was very rich. And when Jesus saw he was very sorrowful, he said, How hardly shall they who have riches enter the kingdom of God!" Now if we stopped there, we might well believe that Jesus opposed the possession of riches as a principle. But his attitude toward riches is clarified by his closing words of this incident when he emphasized "It is impossible for them who trust in riches to enter the kingdom of God; but he who forsaketh the things which are of this world, it is possible with God, that he should enter in."

A further testimony that Jesus did not advocate poverty is indicated in the account of Matthew, who records the same incident and states that when his disciples had heard the foregoing word of Jesus, "they were exceedingly amazed, saying, who then can be saved?" I think I need hardly point out that had Jesus regularly emphasized poverty, the disciples would not have been amazed at his doctrine on this occasion.

The life practices of Jesus support my thesis that Jesus did not despise the rich.

Jesus feasted frequently with the wealthy, so much so that he was accused of being a winebibber and a glutton (Matthew 11: 19; Luke 7: 34).

At Bethany a woman spent 300 denarii for one ointment, and when Judas would have rebuked the woman, Jesus defended her (John 12: 4).

Zaccheus, you remember, was a rich man, but one who shared with the poor, and of him Jesus said: "This day is salvation come to this house."

Perhaps the clearest indication of Jesus' attitude toward the accumulation of wealth is the parable of the talents. Here, you will remember, the steward who accumulated the other ten talents received the commendation, whereas he who was satisfied to remain poor was rebuked and cast out as unprofitable.

No, as in the incident of the rich young man, the attitude an individual had toward wealth was the issue that won commendation or condemnation from Jesus.

WITH THOSE WHO ASSUMED the stewardship of full-time ministry, however, the picture is different. There is no question but what Jesus demanded poverty of those who elected to share full-time ministerial responsibility. These, he insisted, must be free to devote their entire attention to the ministry. And he demanded that they give up all.

A great deal of emphasis has been laid upon the parable of the talents as foundation for the church's doctrine of stewardship. The emphasis is well-placed, but we must remember that the doctrine of stewardship is not unique to the ministry of Jesus.

The Psalmist, many years before, had declared, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein."—Psalm 24: 1. At another time, he quotes God as saying:

I will take no bullock out of thy home, nor he goats out of thy folds; For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. I know all the fowls of the mountains; and the wild beasts of the field are mine. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee; for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof.—Psalm 50: 9-12.

Again the Lord told Job on one occasion that "Whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine." But the antiquity of the belief in absolute ownership resting with the Almighty is even greater, for Moses declared, "Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the Lord's thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is."—Deuteronomy 10: 14.

What God expected man to do with the earth which God let him have for a season is clearly indicated in the entire history of the Hebrew nation. The prime burden of nearly every prophet is that only as long as man deals righteously with man and remembers his obligation to God can he remain in his stewardship. The experience of history is equally clear on this point. Rome achieved world domination only to lose it when her treatment of the poor destroyed their sense of responsibility and loyalty to the state. A few hundred years later, the guillotine was the answer of France's downtrodden to the oppression of the rich. The Russian worker found a similar ghastly solution.

The earth is the Lord's, and man can share it only as he remembers his stewardship responsibilities to God and to his fellow men.

It ought not to weaken one's faith in Jesus to realize that his teachings were based on the ancient teaching of Judaism. The uniqueness of Jesus is that he revealed in life and teachings a new light on Deity and also focused this new light on the indisputable truths discovered in ages past.

We Went Through Hell

and asked him if he would take us. We found that his name was Lamb; he had married an English girl during his time of duty in England and intended to return to that country after the war. He was willing to take the risk! I have often prayed that he might be rewarded for what he did that day! He stood by when we crossed the frontier, watching the Czech guards carefully, while they were rummaging among our pitiful possessions. And then we were across the frontier! We were in Bavaria! I could have wept for joy.

From Wunsiedel, we continued the journey in stages, by goods-train, by ox cart, on foot, by trucks, in private car—whatever came our way and was willing to take us. The nearer we came to Nürnberg, the more my anxiety increased. What would we find when we got there? No news had come from any of our relatives for more than four months. Nürnberg had been bombed heavily, and there had been a battle raging in and around it when the American forces took it. At last, we arrived. We had to walk right through the town and see all the wreckage. But when at last we turned the familiar corner, we saw the house still standing, though damaged. My mother-in-law answered our ring!

We had been on the road for three weeks, sleeping in barns, in the open, in bug-ridden beds, or not at all. Few can imagine how it felt to us to lie down that night in a clean bed, to have a roof over our head, to be among people we knew and loved.

The second night I had an extremely vivid dream in which I saw my husband. He came walking up the stairs, thin, emaciated, in a tattered uniform. I was telling my little girl about the dream the next morning when there was a knock at the door. I opened it and there stood my husband—just as I had seen him in my dream. As if by miracle, he had got out of encircled Berlin and had been taken prisoner by American forces. His release from the camp had coincided exactly with my own arrival at Nürnberg.

And here my story ends. It may not, in parts, make very nice reading, but it is true. It is just my own experience, not at all extraordinary in the turmoil of war and its aftermath. I do not feel bitter about it any more, though I do not like to think back of those days. Neither do I want to be pitied, for I know

CAIRNS.—James, son of John and Amelia Chapman Cairns, was born in Methelhill Fifeshire, Scotland, on November 17, 1874, and died November 25, 1948, at his home in Kansas City, Missouri. He came to America with his parents in 1879 and located near Scranton, Kansas, where he lived until he was twenty-one. He attended medical college in Kansas City, but because of ill health practiced for only seven years. In 1921, he entered law school, and was a practicing lawyer until the time of his death. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since July 4, 1888.

He is survived by a daughter, Marjorie Martz of San Diego, California; three sisters: Mrs. J. F. Wolfe of Kansas City, Missouri; Mrs. H. J. O'Brien of McHenry, Illinois; and Mrs. William Telford of Springfield, Illinois; and two brothers: John Cairns of Kansas City, Missouri, and Thomas D. Cairns of Independence, Missouri. Funeral services were held at the D. W. Newcomer Chapel in Kansas City, Elder Herbert C. Lively officiating.

BAKER.—Ann Julia Robin, was born at Burnt Island, Newfoundland, in 1878, and died on January 5, 1949, at Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. Green on July 22, 1924; to this union one son and two daughters were born. While in Kansas City Stake, Sister Green began her work with young people, conducting the first girls' camp in that area. She was a leader in the O. B. K. League in Kansas City, and upon moving to Independence, became supervisor of the church school. She was then placed in charge of the church school at Slover Park. She helped to organize the vacation church school in Independence, pioneered in the field of Blue Bird organization, wrote a Blue Bird manual, and was serving as city-wide women's leader at the time of her death.

She is survived by her husband, Clair; one son, Kenneth Tucker Green; two daughters: Doris Mae and Marilyn Marie, all of the home in Independence; her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Tucker of Kansas City, Kansas; and two sisters: Mrs. Marie Johnson and Mrs. Lela Eskridge of Independence. WHITNEY.—Ena Payne, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Payne, was born at Attleborough, England, on September 25, 1912, and died at a De Kalb, Illinois, hospital on January 25, 1949. She was united in marriage to Edwin T. Whitney of De Kalb on October 4, 1944, when Mr. Whitney was on military duty in England. Mrs. Whitney came to the United States on June 26, 1946, to make her home with her husband at De Kalb.

She is survived by her husband; her father; and two brothers: Robert and James Payne of England. She was preceded in death by a daughter, Susanna Pamela Whitney. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Lloyd L. Hadley and Roy F. Healy at the Ronan Chapel in De Kalb.

* NOTES FROM THE YUKON

In our February 12 issue, we had a beautiful letter written by a member who is spending the winter with her husband and family in the far north. Jean (Mrs. Allen) Barnett, at the R.C.A.F. Station, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, Canada, writes a note on January 25, concerning her experience with the Sunday school:

"I just had to write to you about some of the great things the Lord has done in this place, so am sending you the latest copy of 'The Whitehorse Star,' our 'giant' weekly, with its important news item. (Fifty children met under a splendid staff of workers and teachers.) I knew it would make you as happy as it did me to write it up and get it before the eyes of the Doubting Thomas public in this place. . . . Well, we did nine better last Sunday again, and this Sunday we are going to do better still. All the cold toes in eastern goloshes at twenty below when I made the calls were well warmed when I stood before those wonderful children and told them that 'Jesus lives.' What a wonderful experience. . . . I feel unworthy to have so much joy all at once. There were children who had never been in a church of any kind for four years, and others, many of them, had never attended."

This brave little woman met some opposition, but is winning her way against it, "which proves that when God really wants something done, nothing can stand in the way of it."

* WHAT DOES LIQUOR COST?

If you look at the prices on the liquor bottles, remember this: "The price of the bottle is only the down payment. Other installments come later."

Out in Pueblo, Colorado, the parents of a little boy bought a bottle of whisky and took it home. Drinking part of it, they left home. The two-year-old boy remained home alone, unprotected. While the parents were gone, the boy drank the rest of the half pint of whisky. When the parents returned, he was in convulsions. After a while he died. The second installment on the cost of that whisky was the baby's life. Who can tell what the other costs will be?

Down in Florida, the handsome son of a New York banking family, an heir to millions of dollars, went on a tour of night clubs and drinking spots with a divorced waitress. The car crashed, and later he was found dead of a bullet wound in his head. . . . When he started out on that evening's entertainment, he had probably counted on spending only a hundred dollars or so. But that was only the down payment. He didn't know that the second installment would be his life.

The down payment on a bottle of liquor is a voluntary matter. You can avoid it if you wish. But the other installments are assessed. You have signed up, just as if you had made a contract. You will pay. You must pay. You cannot avoid paying. In the end, Death collects the final installment on the cost of liquor. It is always Death at the end.

Sometimes that bottle of liquor eventually costs a man his job; sometimes many jobs. Sometimes it costs him his home. Sometimes it costs friendships. And at the last, after liquor has taken everything else away from him, liquor just steps up and takes the man himself.

When you think of the cost of liquor, think of the total cost. Think of all the installments that come after, payable on demand, in addition to the down payment.

NEWS AND NOTES

SILENT TRIBUTE

When a good man passes to his reward, there isn't much his friends can do to show their love and respect, except to participate, most of them in a silent way, in the service in which honor is paid to him. Working associates who have known a man through the years appreciate an opportunity to do something. Thus it was at the funeral of President J. F. Garver. And it is thought that the many readers who themselves would have desired to participate may be glad to know who stood for them in this tribute.

The active pallbearers at Independence were: Apostles E. J. Gleazer, Sr., D. T. Williams, M. A. McConley, M. L. Draper, and Reed M. Holmes, and Bishop H. L. Livingston. Honorary pallbearers at Independence were: members of the Standing High Council: Howard P. Andersen, J. A. Becker, Harry G. Barto, D. O. Cato, Dr. Charles F. Grabske, James F. Keir, Leonard J. Lea, C. L. Olson, A. B. Phillips, A. B. Taylor; former associates in the First Presidency: L. F. P. Curry and F. M. McDowell; a long-time friend and associate, O. W. Newton; Board of Publication, John W. Luff; Hospital Administration, A. Neal Deaver; President of High Priests' Quorum, Ward A. Hougas; Assistant to Presidency in Zion, Charles V. Graham; Pastor of Stone Church, Independence, Glaude A. Smith.

Pall bearers at Lamoni were: Gene Closson and Roscoe Faunce of the faculty of Graceland College; Verne Deskin, banker; L. G. Holloway, retired missionary; Lewis Landsberg, Bishop of Lamoni Stake; and David Gamet, merchant.

Not all members of the Quorum of Twelve could be present to participate because of time, distance, and unavoidable duty: Apostle D. Blair Jensen is in charge of the European Mission; Apostle R. E. Davey is in charge of the Australasian Mission; Apostle C. G. Mesley is in his field in the Northwest; Apostle Charles R. Hield is in California; Apostle Arthur A. Oakman is engaged in a series of services in Detroit; Apostle W. Wallace Smith is in Oregon; and Apostle Percy E. Farrow is in Ontario, Canada.

STEWARTSVILLE, MISSOURI.—The front page of the "Missouri Ruralist," January 22, carries a full page picture of the Orris B. Salisbury family, of near Stewartsville, district two Balanced Farming contest winners. The Balanced Farming contest is sponsored by two agricultural groups, co-operating with the Missouri Agricultural Extension service. The winners are being honored for outstanding progress made in carrying out their Balanced Farming plans. The Salisburys are one of fifteen district winners. Pictured in the publication are Mr. and Mrs. Salisbury, their daughter, Maxine, a home economics major, and a son, Robert, World War II veteran, who is responsible for the dairy program which is making progress on their 120-acre farm. The picture was taken while Brother Salisbury was figuring up fertilizer application for the last year. It totaled about 130 tons.

GENERAL CHURCH CONTRIBUTOR'S STATEMENTS

The tithepayers' department in the Auditorium has finished the mailing of the 20,000 statements of General Church contributions to the members in the United States, Canada, and Hawaii. Some extra help has been given to the tithepayers' service department to speed up the mailing.

WE HAVE ALREADY REPORTED the death of President John F. Garver, which occurred about 6 a. m., Thursday, March 3, 1949. It was press time for the Herald of March 12, and time was short, but we found space for a statement limited to essential data.

It has been a matter of gratification to us to be associated with Brother Garver in the work of the First Presidency. Although his tenure of office was brief, he abundantly justified his calling and made a valuable contribution in a difficult period of transition. He was wise in counsel, just in judgments, and kind in his personal and official relations. His long years of service in Lamoni Stake and in the Quorum of Twelve had given him wide personal and official contacts throughout the church, and he was familiar with the history of the major problems confronting us.

During his illness, while we had retained some hope that he would return to his labors, we began to sense our dependence on him in a way that was not possible when we were in daily contact. Now that he has passed from us, we shall continue to serve to the best of our ability, but we shall miss him very greatly and know that on numerous occasions we shall be asking ourselves, "What would John do now?"

We express to the church our confidence that our Heavenly Father, by whose grace Brother Garver was able and ready to serve, will call others to the service so that the work shall be forward.

Tributes to President Garver

Independence

The passing of President J. F. Garver reminds us again, if we should need any reminding, that we stand in the anteroom, with our feet upon the threshold, of eternity. And now that we miss him we know, if we did not know before, that a great and good man was in our midst.

The love and esteem in which Brother Garver was held by the people of the church was manifested in the streams of people who came to see him as he lay in state before the pulpit of the Stone Church, Independence, between the hours of nine and ten on Saturday morning, March 5, as many others had gone to pay their final tribute previously at the funeral home. Titles aside, he was always "Brother Garver" to the people, when he was president of Lamoni Stake, during his twenty-seven years in the Quorum of Twelve, and for nearly three years in the First Presidency. As people filed past the bier, a guard was maintained by the honorary pall bearers.

At ten a. m. President F. Henry Edwards and Apostle Paul M. Hanson led the processional up the west aisle of the church, the congregation standing as members of the family entered.

At the pulpit, President Israel A. Smith stood to give an impressive reading of the Scriptures of consolation from the eighth chapter of the Letter to the Romans (verses 14, 28, 31, 32, 35, 37-39).

Apostle Paul M. Hanson, President of the Quorum of Twelve, offered a solemn invocation, expressing thanks to God for the life and works of President Garver, and petitioning divine grace and comfort for the bereaved.

A quartet composed of Evan Fry, Herbert Lively, Mrs. Jeanette Nichols, and Mrs. S. S. Arnson, accompanied by Mrs. Clayton Wolfe, Stone Church organist, sang Hymn

124, "The Lord Is My Shepherd."

President F. Henry Edwards read the obituary and tribute, acknowledging the many contributions and services that Brother Garver has given to the church. The quartet rendered "Sunset and Evening Star,"—the words of Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar,"—very beautifully.

Presiding Bishop G. L. DeLapp delivered the sermon, enriching it with a fine selection from Brother Garver's own writing in the Herald, and paying earnest tribute to Brother Garver from his own experience. Many have called it "The finest sermon I have ever heard."

Josephine Mader, noted Messiah Choir soloist, canceled other engagements to pay her tribute in song to Brother Garver, singing, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth."

The benediction was by President Smith.

Lamoni

Immediately after the services at Stone Church, the funeral cortege departed for Lamoni, Iowa. There, at 4 p. m., a memorial service was held in the Coliseum. Presiding at this service were President Israel A. Smith, President F. Henry Edwards, and Bishop G. L. DeLapp. The processional was led by Apostle D. T. Williams, Bishop H. L. Livingston, Dr. F. M. McDowell, and Robert S. Farnham.

President Smith read the Twenty-third Psalm. There was a solo by Wanda Derry, and invocation by Bishop Livingston.

The obituary was read by Brother Farnham. Then President Smith presented three men who paid tributes to Brother Garver: Dr. McDowell, representing Graceland College; Apostle Williams, representing the stake and the Quorum of Twelve; and President Edwards, representing the church. Following a song by a quartet consisting of Paul Deaver, Delmar Good, Henry Anderson, and William Graves, the body was taken to the cemetery, attended by large numbers of friends and spectators.

At the grave, President Edwards took charge, reading from Revelation 7: 9-17, and concluding with prayer.

There are no "last tributes" to President J. F. Garver. He will live on in the memories of countless people who have been called into church service by his voice, who have been strengthened and helped by his counsel and ministry, and who have been inspired by his example. And in that eternal life to which his soul has now turned, our faith tells us that he will take up his new work for the Heavenly Father's kingdom.

Memories

Thousands of church people could contribute memories of Brother Garver. So many have rested under the sound of his voice in admonition and counsel.

How well we remember him on Communion Sundays in the old Brick Church at Lamoni, presiding over the services, cautioning the elderly who sometimes forgot wisdom in testimony. He was calm, strong, and determined in the intensity of conference debate; powerful and earnest in his sermons; kindly and quiet in counsel to those in trouble; sympathetic and understanding when sorrow came.

The Lamoni period had a great significance for the church, not likely to be paralleled in another place and time. Brother Garver belonged to Lamoni, was of the essence of it, sharing its integrity, its devotion, its clarity of purpose and vision. He clung to it as long as he could before duties at Independence finally took him away. He cared for the young, looking to the future with them, trying to help them to prepare for problems to come. Among earthly associates, no finer name is known than that of Brother Garver. L. J. L.

John Franklin Garver

Biography and Tribute by President F. Henry Edwards

JOHN FRANKLIN GARVER, son of J Albert and Lillian McGaw Garver, was born January 28, 1878, at Bristol, Indiana. He was the oldest of seven children, four of whom are still living. They are Norman Garver, Miller, Missouri; Mrs. Henry Jacobitz, Nelson, Nebraska; Mrs. Jane Yohey, Lyle, Washington; and Mrs. Fred Hodges, Clay Centre, Nebraska. He passed away on Thursday morning, March 3, 1949, at Independence, Missouri.

Brother Garver came into contact with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints while employed by a family of church members. After receiving convincing evidence of the Work, he was baptized at Bartlett, Iowa, on September 26, 1897. He immediately became active in Sunday school and other church affairs and was ordained to the office of priest on November 10, 1901.

Recognizing that he needed further education if he was to make his best contribution as a minister, Brother Garver moved to Lamoni in September, 1902, and entered Graceland College. He worked in town in order to meet expenses. In this way, he became connected with the Lamoni Chronicle and later became its editor.

Brother Garver was married to Miss Mynn Hayer at Lamoni on August 11, 1907. The home which was established at this time was maintained until less than a year ago, when Brother and Sister Garver moved to Independence. At Lamoni, three daughters were born and grew to womanhood: Verna Winifred (Mrs. Raymond H. Smith of Cedar Falls, Iowa), Lois Irene (Mrs. Fred Morain of Jefferson, Iowa), and Bertha Lillian (Mrs. Walter N. Johnson of Independence, Missouri).

There, also, a baby son was born and is buried. The three daughters are the mothers of nine children in whom Brother Garver found great joy.

Brother Garver was ordained to the eldership in 1906 and, just prior to his marriage, was selected and set apart as counselor to Elder John Smith, President of Lamoni Stake. He accepted General Conference appointment on January 1, 1908, and served in the stake until 1922—first as a member of the stake presidency and after 1916 as stake president.

In February, 1922, Brother Garver became a member of the Standing High Council of the church and continued to serve in this important post until March, 1924, when he resigned in order to give full attention to other duties.

From his work in Lamoni Stake, he was called into the Quorum of Twelve and ordained October 13, 1922. His work as an apostle took him into all of the domestic fields; but his chief contribution was made in the Middle Western and North Atlantic states. He was both an able field administrator and an astute and far-sighted counselor. During some of the most difficult years in the recent history of the church, he rendered a wise, vigorous, kind, and persistent ministry, the value of which cannot be easily overestimated.

Because of the contribution which Graceland College had made to his own development, and because of his realization of what it could be in the life of the church and its young people, Brother Garver was always a strong supporter of Graceland. In April, 1910, he was elected to the Board of Trustees. He was secretary of the board from 1912 to 1932, and since that time has served as its chairman. A Graceland biographer says, fittingly, "Few, if any, of Graceland's alumni have so richly repaid the institution for its contribution to their lives."

Brother Garver has also made a distinguished contribution as a religious editor and writer. He served as assistant editor of the Saint's Herald from 1913 till 1916, as editor of Zion's Ensign from January 5, 1922, till September 29, 1932, and as one of the editors of the Herald from April 10, 1946, until the time of his death. The list of his articles in the cumulative index forms a substantial body of work. In general, his writing took a practical turn and was related to the current interests and needs of the church.

Brother Garver was ordained counselor to President Israel A. Smith and a member of the First Presidency on April 10, 1946. In the arduous work of this office, he gave himself without reservation, displaying ripe wisdom, deep concern for his fellow-ministers, and unswerving honesty of purpose. His recent work in Australia, undertaken at great cost to himself and proving most valuable to the church, was typical of his ability and devotion.

In the passing of President John F. Garver, the Church Militant has lost one of her truly great men. We gladly pay him the tribute of our abiding affection and respect.

It is useless for us to mourn that our brother is gone: let us rather thank God for his wonderful character, and for the rich heritage he has left to us: a life of righteousness and courage, and of loving kindly power that was given to others. Let us remember the sick that his prayers have helped to heal, the weak and frail ones who have received strength and resolution from his words of counsel; the times he kept us from going wrong. Remember him as a servant of God.

Funeral Sermon of John F. Garver

By Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp

But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die; And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but grain, it may be of wheat, or some other;

But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body. All flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

Also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial, and bodies telesial; but the glory of the celestial, one; and the terrestrial, another; and the telesial, another.

There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory.

So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.

And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit.

Howbeit, that which is natural first, and not that which is spiritual; but afterwards, that which is spiritual;

The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven.

As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.

And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

Behold, I show you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the sound of the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory.

O Death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?

The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law.

But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.—I Corinthians 15: 35-58.

WE COME TO HONOR one who has served his fellow men faithfully and well and to extend to those who are bereaved our deep and sincere sympathy in the loss of a faithful and loving husband, a father, and brother. In our coming together, we seek again to search out those gems of sacred literature which throw light upon this event which, in due time, is the experience of all who dwell in human flesh. Our search is rewarded in the substance of evidence emanating from the divine source which clearly indicates that death is a part of the divine plan; it is a portal through which each one of us must pass to envision new horizons and to move toward those horizons in which there is to be found that glory of which Jesus spoke:

And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one; I in them and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one.—John 17: 22, 23.

or as expressed by one of the late poets:

Life is eternal; and love is immortal; and death is only a horizon; and a horizon is nothing save the limit of our sight.

It is with a sense of deep humility that I approach the responsibility of this hour, for there is to be found in the publications of the church the written testimony of our brother as to his faith in God and belief in eternal life. Further, there is evidence in his writings of a well-rounded philosophy relative to the meaning and the significance of this experience through which he has passed and which far surpasses my understanding. His testimony and interpretation of the Scriptures brought comfort and hope to thousands of people he reached through his ministry. So I come, not to add to that which he has left by way of testimony, but rather to let his testimony speak again as though he were here to express to us his joy in the Resurrection and in life eternal.

Nevertheless, because of the privilege of personal association with him and of fellowship in his ministry, there are those qualities of his life which I have come to value. These mean much to me and are shared and appreciated by those who knew him personally. This task is made difficult for me, because, as a young man, I sought his counsel at a time when my life was pointed in a certain direction. It was at a young people's convention held at Lamoni in 1924. I had taken a group of young men from Minneapolis to attend the convention, and out of that convention, there arose a problem relative to my own future and work in the church; so I sought out Brother Garver. I don't remember much about the classwork, or the services, or the other events of that young people's convention, but I do remember the talk I had with Brother Garver. I went to him much as a son would go to a father, and this was the first of many similar, happy experiences. Upon those occasions in our early association, there was given to me that help needed from time to time. That association grew until it became more like brother to brother, with mutual interest in the church and its work, with an understanding of the problems confronting each other in our particular field of ministry and in our different responsibilities. Finally in the councils of the church, we found ourselves working as general officers, shoulder to shoulder although sometimes with differences of opinion, but for the most part seeing eye-to-eye relative to those policies which were of vital concern to the church.

IN ALL THE YEARS of such association, there developed within me a deep respect and a sincere affection for our brother who has given unreservedly of time and of talents far beyond that which is normally required of any man. As a minister, he has made an outstanding contribution to the young people of our church, stimulating them to greater endeavor, to the development of their talents, always pointing them toward higher goals of achievement. He made a major contribution to Graceland College and to the other institutions of the church. To his fellow ministers who have been associated with him in his fields of labor, I have known him to give counsel and support which have stabilized and improved their ministry beyond that which they would have been capable in and of their own strength. In the councils of the church, he always stood as an influence and power in maintaining a sound and progressive policy. Many of us depended upon him to give guidance and bearing in the direction of our course.

It has been my privilege to be associated with him when he was deeply moved by God's Holy Spirit and brought comfort, encouragement, and sometimes admonition needed by those who were within the range of his voice. I have visited with him in the homes of our members. I have been his companion during reunions, and it was ever my experience in all respects to see him accept his call to the ministry as a divine and sacred responsibility. I have been with him on the playground, and in all the activities to which he gave his attention, there was infectious, inspiring enthusiasm.

He was gifted with a sense of humor which carried him through many trying situations, and he had a deep and abiding faith that made possible a splendid ministry to thousands with whom he came in personal contact.

As he approached the closing days of his life, there is no question in my mind but that he drew upon those same resources which had carried him through the trying experiences of the past, and his life's philosophy stood him in good stead to face the new experience about which he had preached.

I SHOULD LIKE TO DRAW from some of his own writings the expressions of his belief which will bring to us assurance that he faced the future in confidence. There are many, but I can touch upon only a few of them. As a background to this, may we, in our minds travel with him as he visited in past years among our congregations. In the Saints' Herald of December 1, 1926, he wrote of his experiences during twenty-five years as a minister. (He had been an apostle some four years at that time.) He speaks to us:

Twenty-five years a minister. A quarter of a century. How time flies! Yet what changes these twenty-five years have wrought!

It must have been a magnificent faith that justified, at Bartlett, Iowa, in old Fremont District, twenty-five years ago, the ordination of that plow boy to the office of priest. And could they but speak who urged it, Uncle Henry Kemp, particularly, who ordained me—could they speak today, some of whose lips have long since been silent in death, would it might be to say that faith in all its searchings for the future had been justified. . . .

They have been strenuous years, full of hard work. Sometimes to the point of utter exhaustion. Full of denial; the most severe being the denial to the family. Full of suffering, with those who suffered, and because of those who did not understand. And sometimes full of disheartenment, when it seemed the work in hand would not move along. Yes, they have been strenuous years.

They have, however, been glorious years. Not always have they been happy. No man of vision and whose work and that of his fellows lags, can always be happy. No man who is a pastor can be happy when certain of his flock suffer from the effects of sin; and fifteen years I have served in a pastoral capacity. . . . No man who is an apostle and goes forth to view the misery and injustice in this world can all the while be happy. And four years I have been an apostle. . . .

I write in appreciation of those who have believed in me. Of those who have helped me. Of those who have borne with my infirmities. Of those whose trust has ever and always been a spur that I make good.

I write in appreciation of a wife and friend and companion all in one, whose innate goodness has sustained me through all the labors of my ministry, and whose saintly sacrifice has made it possible.

I write in appreciation of my three beautiful daughters, who have never asked daddy to stay, but who have always been willing he should be on his way, and anxious he should make good.

I write in appreciation of the little boy who came to us, only to go away again. For whose sake and sacred memory I must be all I might have been for his sake had he stayed on with us; and who has perhaps influenced my life far more as it has been than could have been had he stayed.

I write in appreciation of my Heavenly Father, whose mercy sought me out of the world, whose love has held me to his bosom, whose power has made possible my development, and whose Spirit has inspired me to go on and on in both preparation and service.

Another experience he related was while he was in attendance at a reunion at Sykeston, North Dakota:

I had gone out from the April council with a hopeful message (1924). It was under this spirit I came to Sykeston, North Dakota, my first stop. The weather was cloudy and cold. The camp was small, not above seven or eight living tents, only three families residing in the village, as I recall, little interest on the part of nonmembers, and of course I had to preach the first night, only about three hours after reaching the place. I went apart for a talk with the Master. I asked for nothing for myself, but how I did feel for the isolated Saints there assembled. My prayer for their sakes was answered.

BROTHER GARVER is representative of a great generation which carried the church forward from its somewhat precarious position after the Reorganization to a point that assured it of continuity, of carrying forward the gospel of the Restoration. He reached back into the old generation for the fundamentals and truths which had been revealed and were deeply ingrained in this Restoration Movement, and passed them on to an oncoming generation. His mind was always at work, and it is interesting to note something of his thoughts, as he recorded them, regarding his visit in an area marked by the sacrifice of the early Saints of the Reorganization:

The next evening, Wednesday, found me with Brother E. J. Lenox, president of Southern Wisconsin District, at Beloit, Wisconsin, scene of that memorable first conference of the faithful few in 1852. The Saints were not expecting us at their prayer meeting. The night was unseasonably cold and the numbers few. We spoke to those assembled, however, feeling their need was as if there were a thousand others present. May this, the place of stirring scenes of the early fifties, gain in numbers, in grace, and in power to serve. And we believe it will.

With memory of and appreciation for the work and sacrifice of the early Saints of the Reorganization, I wended my way on northward, speaking for the Saints at Madison on Thursday evening. And Friday night found me with the Saints of Northern Wisconsin District near Black River Falls, near where the timbers were taken from the virgin forests of Wisconsin, floated down Black River, and finally down the mighty Mississippi to Nauvoo, to take their places in the temple.

The High Cost of Low Thinking

BY BISHOP C. A. SKINNER

"For as he thinketh in his heart so is he."—Proverbs 23: 7.

A certain man had two sons: and the younger of them said to his father; Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. And not many days after the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance in riotous living. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in the land; and he began to be in want. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants.—Luke 15: 11-19.

IF WE HAD THE FULL STORY, no doubt it would tell how the father tried to reason with his son, how he tried to persuade him to stay on the farm, how he pictured the future possibilities and the pleasure of a good home. But some boys cannot be reasoned with, they want what they want when they want it. This young man wanted a taste of the pleasures of the world. He not only got a taste, but he got his belly full of the husks of sin and degradation, and the dregs in the bottom of the cup he drank were bitter. What a price he paid—the high cost of low thinking!

He journeyed into a far country where he got into bad company, he associated with lewd and vulgar men and women, "he wasted his substance in riotous living." While his money lasted, he no doubt thought he was having a grand time, but the good time lasted only as long as he had money. When "he came to himself," he had learned a lesson in the high cost of wrong thinking. This young man, steeped in sin, had overlooked true values, ignored moral and spiritual strength, and had come to the level of the swine.

This is not an isolated case; it always happens when one is willing to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage. Like all who go out in sin, he weakened his physical powers, corrupted his mind, lowered his morals, and all but lost his soul. The one thing which saved him was that "he came to himself," and he did something about it.

For a time, he sacrificed the best things of life—a splendid home, a kind father, a loving mother. He paid an awful price and received, as a result of that experience, humiliation, pain, suffering, servitude, and a swine pen. He learned through bitter experience that home, love, contentment, and real happiness cannot be found in riotous living, neither can it be bought, rather it must be merited.

THE COST OF LOW THINKING is always high. It does not need to be paid in advance; it can be bought on the installment plan, but it must be paid for, and there must always be added a high rate of interest.

While one of our missionaries was conducting services in a certain city, he inquired about a young man he once knew and was advised that he got into trouble and was serving time in the penitentiary. Our brother called on the prisoner and asked: "How came you here?" It was another case of a prodigal son. It was another case of wrong thinking. The young man, who had held a position in a bank, could not on his income keep up socially with the crowd with whom he liked to associate. So he took money from the bank by making false entries. Soon his sin was discovered, and he was paying a high price for wrong thinking. The pen in which he found himself was not so easily abandoned as the swine pen in which the original prodigal found himself. This young man simply repented, climbed over the fence, and walked home. But the pen in which the bank employee was incarcerated was surrounded by high walls and strong iron gates; on top of those walls were guards armed with machine guns. No doubt this man would gladly have gone back to his employer and worked as a janitor in the bank, but he must satisfy the law; he must learn something of the cost of low thinking.

In a town in which I once lived was a promising young business man. He was successful, had a good wife and a fine home. But, like the prodigal son, he wanted adventure; he wanted to taste the sin of the world, he wanted the experience of riotous living. One night he informed his wife that his business would take him out of town for the night. He and his office girl drove to a distant place and registered as man and wife at a tourist camp. The next day, the owner of the camp found the man dead, the result of fumes from a gas heater; the girl was unconscious. One life was tragically ended, the other ruined. They paid the high cost of low thinking.

Peter, in a moment of weakness, denied his Lord and Master; but when he came to himself and realized his mistake, he repented with regret and sorrow, and in his grief, "he went out and wept bitterly." This was the price he paid for wrong thinking. It is not altogether clear what happened to Judas; he may have been disgruntled, envious, or jealous. It is evident that he did some low thinking, for he bargained with the high priests to betray Jesus for thirty pieces of silver. When he came to himself and realized the seriousness of his awful act, he went back and wanted to break his contract with the priests who only mocked him saying, "What is that to us?" Filled with remorse and grief, he threw the money at their feet and went out and hanged himself. The high cost of low thinking.

CONQUERORS HAVE PAID the high cost of low thinking, too. Napoleon, the Kaiser, Hitler, Mussolini—all thought they had conquered the world, but where are they today? There is no possible way of measuring the enormous human sacrifice occasioned as a result of their wrong thinking. Not only did they bring banishment and eventually destruction to themselves, but their evil thinking and actions caused misery and suffering to untold millions.

After World War I, a noted minister said (and it could be repeated with more emphasis today): "The degradation of war, loathsome as it was, was not the worst part of it. All the mangling of the battlefields, the terror and vermin of the trenches, the drawn-out agony of the hospitals, and the heartaches of the bereft were not so hideous as the spiritual monstrosities that gloomed behind them." The waste of war is too gigantic to be measured or even estimated; and the waste did not cease with the signing of the armistice of November 11, 1918, neither did it cease on VJ-Day. Its policies still persist, perpetuated by the evil spirit of war.

Probably the greatest mistake ever made, the highest cost for wrong thinking, was in the Garden of Eden when our foreparents listened to the cunning of Satan rather than the advice of God, and thus brought physical death upon all mankind.

Such experiences do not come at bargain prices, the cost is always high. If one does not pay for it immediately, he pays for it later. The wages of sin have to be paid. Whether or not the wages are demanded, they will be paid. Like Judas, one may try to refuse payment and cast it away, but the wages of sin must be paid. Wages are not always paid in money; compensation may come by way of physical suffering, mental anguish, remorse, a prison term, the supreme penalty of death, or condemnation of the soul.

REWARD FOR RIGHT THINKING

JUST AS WRONG THINKING brings its penalties, so does right thinking have its reward.

Toward the close of his life, the Apostle Paul, reviewing his work and ministry, was able to say: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." He had made a wonderful record and he was able to name the reward for the work done—the result of right thinking: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."

The greatest reward, the greatest blessing that has come to the human race as a result of right thinking, is the life of Jesus Christ. Before the earth was created, God foresaw that men would fall, and Christ volunteered to come to earth and redeem them. All through his ministry, he thought right and backed up his right thinking with actions. He so loved the world that he willingly gave his life that whosoever believed on his name might be saved.

Now back to the parable. The prodigal son had changed his thinking; he was thinking right when he said, "I will arise and go to my father." But when he was yet a great way off, the father saw him and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said to him, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." But the father said to his servants, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his finger, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat and be merry: for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost and is found." This was reward for right thinking.

And so it is with our Heavenly Father. Though we may make mistakes, though we may sin, if we, like the prodigal son, will "come to ourselves" and "arise and go to our Father" repentant, he will be willing and glad to meet us more than half way.

The cost of low thinking is high, but the reward for right thinking is sure.

Mates for Marriage

By EVELYN DUVALL

FOREWORD: Mrs. Evelyn Milles Duvall spent two days at Graceland College in December, 1948. It was one of the high spots of the college year. Her visit represents one phase of a program of educating our youth for family relationships. The lecture was transcribed by Glen Cargyle. The general presentation was followed by a question and answer period. Her experiences, her wide acquaintance with the field, and her wholesome outlook enabled her to bring a helpful service to our students.

ROY CHEVILLE.

WHEN YOU MARRY TODAY, you expect a great deal of marriage and of each other. Glancing at the long history of mankind, we see how succeeding generations have expected a great deal more of marriage than did the people who preceded. Our expectations of marriage are greatest of all. Our pioneer fathers and mothers who came across the plains had the type of marriage and family life that was very realistically rooted in the development and manipulation of things which were necessary for existence in the pioneer world. When a man married, he had to be very sure that the girl he selected would be someone who could manufacture the goods that would be necessary for his home. He might have been very much interested in a girl's smile or the way her hair curled off her forehead, but when he got married, he made pretty sure she was the kind of woman who could keep house, get three meals a day on time, and feed the youngsters. These were concrete expectations.

This was caught up in the popular folk songs of grandfather's day. One of the popular ditties that grandfather sang with grandmother was the one, "Can She Bake a Cherry Pie, Billy Boy, Billy Boy," the mating call of that day. We hear something different today. The mating call of 1948 is a song that my daughters have taught me with a great deal of feeling. It goes something like this, "You'd Be So Nice to Come Home To."

MARRIAGE FOR COMPANIONSHIP

When you women marry today, you want something more than a good provider. Society has moved to that place where the woman no longer is completely dependent upon the husband for provision. Nor is he completely dependent upon her as the homemaker, since much of the baking, washing, and cleaning have moved out of the home. Increasingly when we marry, we marry for companionship; we marry for that togetherness that lifts all of life to a more creative level. This expects a great deal more of marriage. It requires understanding. We must marry persons we understand, persons who can give us the companionship we expect.

ABOVE GUESSWORK

There has been in the last ten or twenty years an increasing amount of social science research. We don't know all the answers. But we've had enough research so we are beginning to get an inkling as to the kind of people who mesh best; the kinds of combinations and the sorts of persons who are the best marriage risks. Now, I can't give you a blueprint, but out of these studies, I can give you some generalizations and some ideas of where to look and what to look for (if you are not already too involved). These will form a basis for a selection of a mate for this kind of companionship marriage that moderns are expecting.

LOOK FOR A HAPPY PERSON

In the first place, modern research has indicated that you should select someone who has got along all right so far. We know that the old romantic illusion of getting married and living happily ever after is only partly true. We have begun to recognize that the people who live happily ever after are very usually the people who have lived happily before. They are the individuals who have built their personalities so that they are able to live life with more satisfaction and fulfillment than distress and disillusion. They're the people who have developed a habit of happiness, who have learned how to put in practice practical mental hygiene, skills, understanding, and insight that make life increasingly worth-while, interesting, and fulfilling. When you marry, find a person who is happy. One of our studies has indicated very clearly that there is a direct relationship between the tendency of persons to be neurotic and to be unsuccessful in marriage. Let us define a neurotic as that person who is chronically grouchy, touchy, easily hurt, one who goes around with a chip on his shoulder—the kind of individual you have to handle with kid gloves, who isn't looking for happiness and satisfaction, who is inclined to be abused. As a generalization, we can say get a person who is wholesome and fairly well put together. The person who is usually unhappy is probably a poor marriage bet for anyone and should be encouraged to get his or her house in order before attempting marriage.

HAVE A WHOLESOME ACCEPTANCE OF SEX

Recent research also tells us that the people who make the best of marriage are those people who have a wholesome acceptance of sex. This is much more than a conversance with "the facts of life." There seems to be a definite relationship in a girl's acceptance of her role as a woman and happiness in married life. She should be glad she's a woman. On the other hand, she should be awfully glad there are men around. That discovery can come rather young and last a long while and grow richer with years. This wholesome acceptance that there are two sex roles gives us the very basis for the kind of companionship and the kind of relationship that go to make a successful marriage.

CAN YOU GET ALONG WITH OTHERS?

One of the essential personality requirements has to do with your ability to get along with people generally. The people who make the best adjustment in marriage are the people who make the best adjustment outside of marriage. There doesn't seem to be anything magic in marriage, completely removed from this world. So it is not surprising to find that the boys and girls who seem to have got along well with their brothers and sisters on the whole, who have got along well with their friends and have made friends—a great many friends—while they have been growing up are the young men and women who marry and make the best go of it. The poor mixer finds marriage adjustment difficult.

Social scientists in a women's college in the south have begun a most interesting piece of research. They have formed the hypothesis that the people who make good adjustments in marriage have made good adjustments before hand. The students in this women's college are given roommates adjustment tests. Every girl is tested and gets a score on how well she is adjusting to her roommate. In ten years, a follow-up marriage adjustment test will be given to as many of these girls as can be located. The hypothesis is, if you can get along well with your roommate in sharing the closet, the bath, the privacy of the room and all the rest that goes with it, you have a great deal of what it takes to make many of the adjustments in marriage.

IT TAKES A LOVABLE PERSON

For a good marriage, select someone who is really lovable, whom you can like as well as love. Look for someone who can give as well as receive affection. The so-called "frigid" wives and indifferent men in marriage don't come into being at the moment of marriage. These attitudes of living to love and to be loved are built into us a long ways back. Interestingly enough, any one of us can improve our ability to communicate—to get through to others—to feel togetherness. Such persons will be "so nice to come home to."

IT TAKES TIME TO GET ACQUAINTED

We need to ask how you and the prospective mate are going to know you are ready for marriage. We have begun to recognize in recent years that this matter of readiness is a very important thing. Sometimes an otherwise well-matched couple may rush the gun to the place where they spoil their chances for a good marriage.

Some of our recent studies in the University of Chicago have indicated that there is a direct relationship between the length of time of acquaintance before marriage and the duration of that marriage. The shorter the period of acquaintance, the shorter the courtship, and the sooner the engagement, the sooner the marriage goes on the rock. The longer the period of acquaintance, the longer the courtship, and the longer the engagement, the better the couple know each other, the more permanent is the marriage. Grandma had a slogan for it. She said you've got to "summer and winter." You've got to see the other one "around the seasons." You need to see each other in all sorts of different settings, not just dressed up for a date. We're beginning to recognize that persons who select their mates well, select the individual they know well.

You probably know that during the war and shortly after, we had many of those hasty marriages, fur-lough week-end affairs, many times after being hastily thrown together. They were based on the very shortest kind of acquaintanceship. Those marriages went on the rocks in alarming numbers. There was no real basis for marriage. We are beginning to recognize that one of the important principles to keep in mind in making a selection is the selection of a person you know well.

THE IN-LAWS ARE WORTH KNOWING

It's a pretty good idea to get acquainted with "the folks." Now, in-laws aren't the boogy-boo the modern columnists make them. You and I will be in-laws sooner or later. In-laws aren't something to be dreaded and avoided. They're worth knowing, not only in their own right, but because they represent the folks—the family of this person you're marrying.

SHARING

Recent University of Chicago studies point in every case to this: Your marriage will last, and you will be successful in it to the extent to which you share a great deal of life together. The more of life you can share, the more similar your backgrounds, the more alike you are, the better your chance is to build a deep and fulfilling and permanent marriage. Let's remember that sharing can be learned.

WE CHOOSE OTHERS LIKE US

Those persons who come from the same kind of background, those who have come from the same kind of homes, who come from the same kind of social economic level are best suited for each other. That's quite counter to the popular saying that opposites attract. As a matter of fact, they don't. Tall girls appear to like tall boys, fat ones to like fat ones, and so on. Studies indicate the need of realizing that we get along best when we choose persons who are very much like ourselves. Persons who come from the same general background—and more important still, are going the same way—are the kind of well-teamed mates who can expect to stay hitched. Mixed marriages do not always endure. Studies have shown that the marriages which last are those in which the partners are of the same national origin, and who come from the same social, economic, and religious background. This involves the way a match looks in the eyes of others. If there is so much difference between a boy and girl that their friends notice the difference and are concerned, the couple better beware.

MARRIAGE A BRIDGE OF COMMUNICATION

I liken marriage to the building of a bridge of communication. If the couple has the same background—that bridge is a fairly short one. If it is separated by vast chasms of difference, it requires more skill and adaptability to make a successful marriage. We differ as to the span of bridge we can build. Some can join more diversity than others. Each of us will do well to ask ourselves how long a bridge of communication we can build and how much the partner can construct. It takes building on the part of both to connect a marriage. Ask yourself how much difference you can live with.

WE NEED UNDERSTANDING AND INSIGHT

When you marry, you bring in your good points and bad ones, your successes and failures. You are still "you," and a ceremony makes no rapid change. We are made wary of the one million divorces last year and the two million since 1940. Alert young persons are seeking to protect themselves against the risk of divorce through gaining insight and understanding about family relationship, and they are seeking companionship that will bring enduring happiness.

Nation-wide Coverage of "The Messiah"

Appreciative messages represent listeners from coast to coast.

THE BEAUTIFUL RENDITION of Handel's The Messiah by the Independence Messiah Chorus under the direction of Franklyn S. Weddle on December 19, 1948, brought a great volume of appreciative telegrams and letters that have been only recently surveyed in the offices of the Music Department of the church.

Many different parts of the country are represented in these expressions of appreciation, from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts.

There would be too many, particularly from the central parts of the country, for complete publication. Space will permit only a few messages, representative of different sections and groups.

KANSAS CITY NEIGHBORS

Sam Gillham, whose splendid bass voice assisted in former renditions, writes:

I want to extend to you and all the others who participated in The Messiah my sincere congratulations for a fine performance. As it came over my radio, the balance between orchestra and chorus, and orchestra and soloists, was almost perfect. The diction of the chorus was such that I believe anyone whether familiar with the work or not could have understood.

Bonnie Van Deursen:

The broadcast was simply beautiful—your chorus outdid themselves, and one could feel your excellent conducting and splendid synchronizing of chorus, soloists, and orchestra. It was truly a very spiritual and artistic performance.

CHICAGO

Drexel V. Mollison:

Messiah performance very fine. Am sure it had large audiences in Chicago area. All participants should be justly proud of the performance.

Mrs. H. C. Burgess, former Messiah soloist:

The Messiah was wonderful. We stayed up and listened to the whole thing.

TORONTO, CANADA

Harold Neal:

The broadcast came over very fine and clear. The parts were quite distinct and again your orchestra-chorus balance was very fine.

MINNESOTA

Ella Sundstrom Pendleton, Minneapolis:

I wish to tell you how very much I enjoyed your rendition of The Messiah. I am a graduate of Bethany College at Lindsborg, Kansas, and sang The Messiah there for four years, so know it so well I can appreciate a lovely rendition, as you gave it tonight. The soloists were exceptionally fine.

J. A. Carl Heaviland, St. Paul:

Reception was as nearly flawless as one could ask. Our enjoyment of this outstanding rendition and broadcast is something to carry within us for some time to come.

NEW YORK

Hubbell Robinson, Jr., CBS, Vice-President, New York City:

Congratulations on The Messiah. It was the kind of outstanding job we have come to expect from you and your people at KMBC.

Wallace Gray, Rochester:

I listened right through to the finish and felt greatly rewarded. You had splendid soloists—they sang with both intelligence and warmth.

LOUISIANA

Mr. and Mrs. James Stobaugh, Viola, and Alice June Lewis:

From New Orleans we heard and enjoyed last night's Messiah broadcast. It was wonderful.

TEXAS

Lillian Phelps, San Antonio:

Eternally grateful for your superb rendition and broadcast. We have not words to express the beauty and excellence, the perfection of it.

MARYLAND

Mrs. J. Nelson Gates, Baltimore:

Thrilled by this program which was broadcast by our local station for the first time this year. Such music carries one right to the very gates of heaven.

WASHINGTON

Lora Miller Clocksin, Yakima:

Your lovely music has been appreciated away out here. Reception has been perfect. I am a church organist and cellist, so I enjoy both the choral and orchestral music to the full.

Mrs. Carl F. Crum, Seattle:

We heard only a partial re-broadcast, but production was marvelous. Well trained, and for the first time, the words of the chorus were understandable.

PENNSYLVANIA

Mrs. Margaret O. Raisbeck, Pittsburgh:

We were thrilled with the excellent rendition. The radio reception was perfect.

IOWA

Mabel Hyde, Lamoni:

I listened through to the last note. Quality, balance, tempo, seemed perfection. I can't remember when music has given me such pleasure.

COLORADO

Hugh B. Terry, Manager KLZ, Denver:

KLZ carried in full the KMBC origination of The Messiah. A fine broadcast. Keep up the good work.

Appreciating Musical Talents

By ZYGMUND RONDONANSKI

TALENT IS BORN within the person. It is God-given and cannot be bought for any price. However, we know that everyone can improve upon a talent and gain others. Persons who are blessed with gifts of music should, by all means, be given every opportunity to develop them.

Much thought and careful consideration should be taken in choosing the right instructor. Adequate preparation and correct information at the very beginning are most important. We are always finding that damage is done to individuals who are unaware of the value of this care. Students, through no fault of their own, do not realize that it is essential to secure a foundation and a framework which will stand the test of a career. Being a skilled musician or composer who orchestrates and is acquainted with all instruments does not necessarily mean one is an accomplished musician on all instruments. The fact remains that a person who can perform and demonstrate the correct position of the hands, the art of phrasing, and the technical points of advice, is the one from whom we should acquire our knowledge.

On the other hand, if one does not have the natural talent or ability, it may be better to find the field for which he is best suited rather than to inflict compulsory practice, which means suffering for the pupil, the instructor, and the parents. Only those to whom music is inseparably a part of existence will rise to the top of this art if given the opportunity.

The late Percy Goetschius, my teacher, on one occasion told me he wanted his son to be a musician. However, the inexorable musical training proved unnecessary, for the boy became an excellent medical doctor. In this instance, and in many others, the theory of "like father, like son" does not always hold true. We should never in any case try to change or feel discouraged if we find training does not bring about the desired achievements.

THERE IS CULTURAL VALUE, of course, in everybody's learning something about music. Music, like religion, is a personal matter and touches us through our emotions. If music were understood better, it would have a happier and deeper meaning to us and would help make life more worth-while. For a really broad appreciation of any art, one must know something of how it is created, of the elements which enter into it, and of the design or working plan of the composer.

If we learn to appreciate good music, it will be an awakening influence through a life filled with rich experiences. Love and reverence will steadily increase, and the art of music will become a spiritual reality. If music becomes a culture common to the community, it will add sympathetic fellowship and communion of those in the community.

"Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual song, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." — Colossians 3: 16.

Of the abilities, powers, and gifts bestowed upon man, practically all of the deepest feelings of his soul have been expressed in music and poetry. This is the reason we should listen to good music, for we know that musical sounds, not necessarily melodies, can produce joy and enthusiasm or soothe and comfort people. It is a scientific fact that music acts as a refreshing stimulant and does affect our very existence. Through bright, cheerful music, we seem to regain strength; while through sad, plaintive music we tend to feel weak, futile, and alone.

THE COMPOSERS who give us good music do not actually know where it comes from. A theme suddenly comes to them, but they have no control over the trend of it. We know this to be a fact, because the great composer, Beethoven, carried a notebook in which to record his themes.

We cannot comprehend or realize the wonderful privilege we have when we listen to music that is inspired. These masterpieces, the difficult as well as the simple ones to which we listen with such pleasure, took years of study, practice, and patience to develop.

The composer and the artist have knowledge and ability which come from experience, but each has his problems to face, although some accomplishments take longer than others. Brahms worked on his first symphony over a period of ten years. In contrast, Franz Schubert and Hugo Wolf, working for only a few weeks at a time, wrote an average of a song a day.

A respect for the beauty and dignity of music must be cultivated if we would realize higher intellectual, moral, and spiritual standards.

There are many ways in which to develop appreciation for music: by attending concerts, by listening to recordings and worth-while radio programs, and by reading good books and magazines on the subject.

Let us continually strive to help our children realize how important good music is in the development of personality. Make it possible for them to know the true, good, and beautiful. Help them to think thoughts that the greatest minds have expressed in exquisite melodies. In this way, we will be preparing the future generation for a richer, finer, tomorrow.

CAPPING

ON SUNDAY EVENING, February 20, twenty-two young women were presented their nurse's caps at a ceremony held at the Walnut Park Church in Independence.

These young women have come from nine states and Hawaii to receive their professional education in the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing. The receiving of their caps designates their acceptance into the profession and their dedication to the service of their fellow men.

These students have completed twenty-four weeks of theory and clinical practice in nursing. The majority of these weeks has been spent in study and preparation for assuming responsibility in the care of the sick and injured.

Their experiences for the next thirty months will be many and varied. The life of a student nurse is dramatically told in the accompanying article by a senior student, Miss EnOi Foo, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Prescott A. Foo of Honolulu, Hawaii.

We congratulate these twenty-two young women who received their caps and hope that they, like Miss Foo, find personal satisfaction in the nursing profession.

NELLE MORGAN, R. N.,
Director of Nurses.

To the San

You're a refuge planned by God on high
To be a friend to the passers-by;
From north to south, from east to west
Your walls give promise of peace and rest.

You're a light on a hill that shall penetrate

And call your students from every state
To live in fellowship and understand
Mortals and God walking hand in hand.
Each year's sunrise over your dewy lawn Finds new students here and the old ones gone

While the spirit of the "San" goes on and on.

I AM A STUDENT NURSE

I COULD NOT BE ANYTHING ELSE

By EnOi Foo

I WAS
a bewildered "probie," shunted from class to class —anatomy, chemistry, pathology, nursing arts, dietetics, medical and surgical diseases, sociology, ethics —classes that shattered my previous concept of the human body, classes that left me confused and vainly determined to make C2SO out of 2 H2O, classes that opened my eyes once blinded by superstition and "old wives tales."

Then I was a scared, unsure freshman, proud of my new white uniform, hose, and shoes, but so very shaky giving my first bath (do I wash the feet or face first?). I remember dismissing my first patient with a strained, reassuring smile (now, have I checked everything?); preparing my first hypo (let's see, mix two tablets in sixteen minums, throw away four minums, give fourteen minums—hm-mm-m, there's something wrong here!); dishing up my first medication ("three capsules T. I. D."—Does that mean one capsule each time, or three capsules at once?).

AT THE CAPPING SERVICE
I walked with shining eyes and a singing heart to get my cap. My lighted candle flickered, then blazed out, "give yourself to service, to service, to serv . . ." and I returned to the hospital and my patients, willing, but not yet fully able, to give.

I BECAME
a second-year student—a junior—with a little strut that quickly turned to attention and respect when a nurse corrected my procedures and showed me I still had much to learn. I also became an avid reader of dermatology and gynecology; a reluctant figure in the fifteen more courses the school of nursing flung at me; a familiar figure at the class gatherings which ranged from Christmas dinners to a plain "I've-got-some-crackers-you-bring-the-jam—and-CLOSE-the-door!" gossip sessions that lasted until nearly time to don the white uniform for another day's work.

I began to feel burdened with responsibility as I went on relief and night duty—responsibility that brought gastric upsets and sleepless nights until I was convinced that I wasn't doing the wrong thing ALL of the time.

I WENT on affiliations to the State Sanitarium in St. Louis, wide-eyed and vulnerable, commiserating with the naked souls that were paraded before me—people broken in mind. I went to more classes with the burning thought, "How can I help them? I've got to help them. What if it were I who had retreated into the world of fantasy? What if it were I who looked with suspicion and disbelief at all people around me? What if it were I who slipped back month after month into a mental deterioration from which finally I would be nothing but an animal in human form to be looked at curiously. What if it were I?—Who would help me?"—and I read case histories and condensed psychiatric articles and took notes on the latest brain operations.

At Robert Koch Hospital, I was handed a gown, a mask, a book on the isolation technique of tuberculous patients, and a class schedule. I watched people with no hope of living more than a few months hold each new day as a precious thing, and I became more conscious of the dawn's significance. I saw men with years in the sanatorium behind them and years in the sanatorium ahead go cheerfully among the more fortunate patients, giving them an incentive to become well, and I thanked God for my healthy lungs. I saw a little girl, her tiny footsteps not yet marking time, lie emaciated and weak, coughing up her life's own blood, laughing because a twisting, twirling gray-green leaf seemed to pause for breath at her window before resuming its gay plunge to the ground. I looked out over the broad, green acres to the river, and my heart wept for the beauties I would see for many years.

Then I was at Childrens' Mercy Hospital in Kansas City where my feet lingered outside the classroom door as my mind toyed with thoughts of "swift annihilation" and "mercy killings." Pitiful little bodies were brought in the clinic door, labeled with strange and rare diseases of the too poor. Those that were not too late left the front entrance as much improved in mind, spirit, and body as the good food, the doctor's unending treatments, and the help of the fatigued nurses could make them.

I HAVE chafed at the rules of late leaves, dorm hours, and signing in and out of the Nurses' Home. I have been irritated at the doings of supervisors and older students. I have worked long hours overtime, groped blindly toward understanding, only to be met by a wall of apathy. I have been turned away with a curt answer by patients, more well than they thought, when I tried to assist them.

BUT a little boy once raised tearful eyes and lisped, "I'm glad you're my nurse. My side doesn't hurt so much when you are here." A forgotten woman died with a smile because I was there, and she knew she was not alone. A baby, broken arm and all, took its first step toward my outstretched arms and squealed with delight. A new operative patient turned ether-dimmed eyes and pleaded, "Stay with me." A daughter said, "Thanks. Mother looks so comfortable since you have cleaned her up."

I have thrilled to the wonder of birth—I say humanity's beginning—and the thin, high wail that came from the first expansion of lungs. Who knows what great thing that voice will bring the world? A child, legs encased in braces after months of immobilization in a cast and weeks of tortuous hot packs shouted, "Look! I can walk!" I saw a raw, gaping wound, angry edges jagged and torn, exposing a puddle of death-dealing pus become a neat threaded scar because a surgeon's deft fingers and scientists' exhaustive research into sulfas and penicillin combined to make a modern miracle—a vindication that "man is a little lower than the angels."

I AM A SENIOR with graduation ahead to strengthen my steps and the state board test to try my soul; with charge duty to come and the responsibility of a floor of lives to rest on my decisions; with months of hard, soul-satisfying work and many moments of discouragement; with tears and laughter and friends to help me on; with a certain knowledge that if I do my best, all else will follow.

I am a student nurse I could not be anything else.

Independence, Missouri

Only a few days before I had been at Independence, Missouri, present headquarters and central gathering place of the church, teeming with the things of the present hour. From there I had gone to Lamoni, for many years prior to removal to Independence, the headquarters and home of the church. Thence to Plano, before that the church headquarters. Thence to Beloit, spoken of now and then as the cradle of the Reorganization. And now to the source of supplies for beautiful Nauvoo Temple.

One can never measure the distance traveled by our brother in his work as a minister of the gospel. The distance which undoubtedly seemed so long as he traveled in the trip to Australia and back about a year ago would undoubtedly be relatively insignificant in comparison with the thousands of miles he has traveled in his ministry to the Saints of this country.

AS A PREFACE to that which he enunciated as great principles, it is interesting to note something of his background as expressed in his own words:

The great gospel found me as a lad without people of strength in the world, without friends, without hope, without vision, without desire to live—dead, as it were, among living men; and by its power, it transformed and carried me over from the crumbling foundation of disobedience and planted my feet on the eternal Rock of Christ's divine truth. It brought me a mighty people; it brought me friends; it brought me hope; it brought me work; it brought me vision and enlargement of soul so that with that good man of olden time I can say, "I am no more the manner of man I once was. The things I once loved, I now hate, and the things I once hated, I now love." And by this testimony am I made sure that in a measure I have passed from death into life because I do love my brethren whether or not they love me. The gospel is proved true in me.

He pays tribute to one to whom he refers to as "a grand old man":

There once came a grand old man into my life . . . Henry Kemp, to whose persuasion I yielded and was baptized. This was many years ago. When that good man confirmed me, he spoke to me in the voice of my Father, and said to me, "Brother John, if you will believe and move forward in endeavor, the time will come when you shall stand in the ministry of Christ. Unto this end I now dedicate thee and set thee apart." I believe these to be the words of God. It did not seem possible—a lone country lad without learning, without people in the church, without opportunity, without hope—yet I believe that to be the Voice of God.

I said in my heart, "I do not see how such privilege can be mine, but I will make the endeavor and trust God to bring it about." I went to work with all my power to bring it to pass. I chopped wood. I worked with a shovel on the railroad track. I farmed. I clerked in a store. I did all manner of work to gather $600 with which to go to Graceland College. The five long years I worked to gather that money, everyone was with the prayer and the hope and the expectation that God would bring to pass his promise.

Out of this background of growth and development, of the desire to achieve that he might develop as a minister of Jesus Christ, he was able to build for himself a philosophy of life on sound principles. May I now quote from his own writings:

We speak first of the principle of faith, the principle to become first operative in the candidate for divine fellowship. By the principle of faith we work in every field. Faith is a universal, basic principle without which no thing can by man be done.

Science is based on faith. . . . Government is based on faith. Confidence in the general principles of government, confidence in the particular government in which men have their part, confidence is the cement and the only cement which draws men together and holds them together in human government. . . .

Marriage and the home are based on faith. Mutual confidence and the trust growing out of it, unto a great labor of love, confidence, is the great dynamic that holds the home together as the unit of society. Marriage, happy marriage, and the home are based on faith.

Faith, as I have said, is a universal, basic law, operative in every field of human endeavor . . . and by faith do we move forward . . .

We speak, too, of the resurrection of the dead. We are wont to call it a coming to life again after we have died. But, my dear friends, it is not so. The resurrection of the dead is but a continuation of life in the broader sense. It, too, is a principle of life everywhere operative in this experience.

We see the power of the resurrection made manifest in every season, on every morning of every day. The lilies of the field each autumn lay down their bodies to rest in the nurturing bosom of Mother Earth, the while Nature draws over them a beautiful and warm blanket of white. They lie down at the autumn time to rest in the earth in the confidence that by the power of the resurrection of Almighty God they shall live above the earth again in the spring.

The resurrection is like that. A principle everywhere else made manifest, God by the power of the spirit encased in this frail capsule of clay, as he brings forth the lily in the spring, shall bring forth my form some day.

Last is the principle of eternal judgment. Nothing more nor less than the operation of the great law of compensation. Everywhere else operative in all our experiences of every day, God in his wisdom has appropriated it as one of the cardinal principles of the doctrine of Christ. Eternal Judgment, the principle of the reaping after the sowing; the measure of the fruits of our labors. And as sure as eternity, the measure in time as well as in eternity of the fruits of life's work and achievements.

These, my dear friends of most holy covenant, are the principles which we must rediscover for ourselves. And let me say unhesitatingly that no principle of the doctrine of Christ can save me in any measure, only in the measure in which I for myself discover it anew and apply and live it in my life. . . .

ONE MIGHT SAY that these were from the days when he was younger and ask if, in the more recent years of his life, he faced the future with the same degree of faith and serenity. As late as 1942, he wrote an article entitled, "A Few Cogitations by an Old Codger," from which the following excerpt is taken:

There is no death. What a profound and moving truth is this concept of the mind of understanding and the heart of appreciation. To the uninitiated it is but the shadowy projection of the fear of man's inadequacy of life. These meditations come to the Old Codger as, with his good wife by his side, he travels the fertile fields of Iowa in this golden month of October, 1942, en route from daughter to daughter on one of those occasional visits to maintain contact with those who have walked along with them in life and to establish contacts with those who have more recently come among them for benefit of the joys of life.

These summarize the beliefs on which he built a wonderful life—a life that has been a living testimony of his faith and belief in the Restoration Movement. There was a time following some of the rough experiences that somehow characterized our movement, when he gave the following testimony as he moved about among the branches of the church:

Yes, indeed, God is in his heaven and in his church, and in each of us who strives on for the mastery. And he will be in us to the end. It is only needed that we strive on, that we move in and occupy. And as God lives, Zion shall be, and the world warned.

What better record could we have than the one he has made for himself? It will stand the test of any scrutiny. It stands also as a challenge to those of us who would seek to build a better world. His faith in God did not waver during his last days. He said to me in one of my brief visits with him, "I hesitate to ask God for favors for myself—he has been good to me."

We come then, not only as those who mourn the departure of one we loved, but to express our gratitude to God that he lived in our midst and gave to each of us, to family, to church, and to our world, the benefit of his ministry and the experiences arising out of his contact with God. In this hour, we pay tribute to one of God's great men.

Middle Age Importance

By Bessie Taylor

IF I WERE ASKED to determine the prime importance of any particular age, it would be middle age, for we in this category are standing on top of the Mountain of Life. Yes, literally and figuratively, we are at the top. From this elevation, we have a double view—we can see the past with greater intelligence and the future with greater vision. To us is given much of the power to control government, industry, and general welfare. Our very importance is due to our position, while the importance of young people is not in what they are now producing but in their preparation for potential responsibility.

All age groups have their leaders who are taking the initiative in guiding, directing, and influencing those about them. They are doing work no other age could do because of the very nature of it. The greatest appeals are always by those from our own age group. This is why parents are not able to be a greater influence to their children. Everyone enjoys his own age best. On the ascending side of the slope, we see youth struggling up hill like a mighty army. On the descending side, we see a smaller army retreating, slowly dismounting to the ultimate threshold. These who are retreating have gradually handed over their guide lines of power as the descent became more rugged and their physical powers more limited.

Along every step of the way of life, there is need for good will and ministry to those who are closest to us—and by closest we mean those of our own age, for they are the ones who can best understand our ideas, appreciate our humor, and denote our abilities.

We who are at the top—the middle aged—have the task of not only mind each other's welfare but controlling the beacons, providing economic support, making the laws, being on the "look out" for approaching storms and enemies, communicating with foreign powers, promoting and developing education—in short, stabilizing the home and providing for the safety and general welfare of the whole "Mountain."

TO THIS ELECTED TASK, we must be very skillful and leave no pitfalls that will increase the burdens of on-coming generations. We must leave a clean house. We, who are members of the church, must be especially diligent in propagating the gospel so that it will function in every life. From this apex, we must be willing and eager to train the approaching hosts who will take our seats tomorrow and throw out to them the lines of control just as quickly as they can reach them. And again, it is our duty to ease the burdens of the retiring veterans, to respect their contributions, to profit by their experience, and to provide for their decline. This radial system gives every age its day. We have a chance to taste and sample every phase of life, but, like a parade, we must keep moving up the hill, on the hill, and over!

Oh, that the young could seriously see their opportunities for advancement and the need for concentrated effort in order to be capable of making the world safer and better and that they would dedicate their lives to God and become kingdom-builders. And oh, that the old would strive to keep their balance and realize God is at the threshold waiting. To outlive one's day and generation is no gain if one's moral defenses are broken down. As long as life lasts, it is possible for us to be useful. Time is valuable only as we use it profitably. Death is but God's device to get us back home. The river at the foot of our mountain is a purifier and an orientation. We, the middle aged, should know how acute our responsibility is. Not only must we keep and make the world safe for democracy, but we must also build in our own character the qualities that will enable us to exit gracefully. We are not too old to learn, even academically. As we prepare to descend, let us be sure our brakes are in good condition so that we do not descend too rapidly. And let us waste no time in looking back. Pillars of salt are not uncommon on the leeward side of life. Living should be full and meaningful—"good to the last drop."

Life is a great adventure, a privilege, a wonderful experience. I would not have missed it in spite of all its woes. It is folly for one age group ever to be jealous of another. There is no merit in mere age; under some circumstances, there is demerit. Each generation has its joys and peculiar values. We must never wish to go back, nor wish to die before our allotted time. We should be calm, enjoy the whole show, and be ready for the next installment in the world to come. Christ meant it when he said, "I come that ye might have life and have it more abundantly."

A Word to Youth

You will be the strength of God's church tomorrow

If God is your strength today.

If He is not your strength today,

You will be His weakness tomorrow.

Garden Time

A NEIGHBOR used to say that our use, even though we preserved and rigid observance of February fifteenth for early garden planting is as binding with us as the laws among the Medes and Persians. However, the weather decides whether we start that soon. If snow and ice still cover the ground, then planting is impossible.

All we try to grow one month before the planting date for central Missouri is something that will withstand frost: lettuce, spinach, radishes, and peas. We take the chance of losing even these. Usually enough grow to make the early effort worthwhile. More are planted later when other things are put in.

We find the earliest possible planting of everything to be the best procedure. The problems of intense summer heat have to be taken into consideration. The sooner a garden is grown here, the greater the yield. It is not injured by the hot sun. Then, too, fresh garden vegetables are such a treat that we want them just as soon and as long as possible.

Our garden is not large. It is just an open space which might be called the back yard. There really is not much ground left for planting after we deduct the area for several fruit trees, a walnut tree, two evergreens, a number of pussy willows, an althea hedge, a rose garden, strawberry bed, asparagus bed, a row of raspberries, and a cement walk one yard wide through the middle. The ground near the trees is too shady; the roots take moisture and food from the soil. The garden soil is very fertile and dark-colored. We use barnyard manure and other organic matter for fertilizer.

The output from our little garden, the rapid growth, the size, and high quality of the vegetables have amazed more than one observer. We have always had more than we could canned for winter. If for no other reason, a garden is worth making just for the pleasure of supplying relatives and friends with fresh fruits and vegetables. Some of these even live on large farms but have no gardens. They call us "city farmers"; we call them "farmer city folks."

IN RECENT YEARS, we have reached the age when there must be less work. Fortunately, we found someone who is a good gardener but has no land. He was ever willing to do our garden for half of all that is grown. This might be a suggestion for others who have an open space—find a gardener and have a garden instead of weeds.

Since the gardener gets half of the vegetables, it will seem more amazing than ever, no doubt, that our supply and enough for others come from just half the yield! Good soil, good seed, and proper care are the secrets. Of course, spring rains and sunshine are the most important. Without these, nothing would grow.

If you like asparagus, it is one of the easiest things to grow. Once a bed is started, it will come up early every spring. All you have to do is keep the weeds out and loosen the soil with a hoe after hard rains. After you have freshly cut asparagus, you will never again want that sold in the market. Food properties, vitamins, and flavor are lost if not used at once. We even have the water getting hot while it is being cut—just a few minutes delay in starting to boil will make a difference in the flavor. To keep the asparagus from becoming lonely, we have some rhubarb growing close by. Not much care, and oh, so good!

While a garden is supplying such fresh and tender things to eat—helping keep the family well and strong—think what else it is doing.

It is reducing the cost of living. This is vital in times of such high prices. We sometimes wonder how people can make ends meet when they have to buy everything they eat.

STATE AGRICULTURAL SCHOOLS, farm bureaus, and county extension agents are equipped with all kinds of printed matter for your aid in making a garden. These bulletins are free for the asking. For instance, in Victory Gardens, from the University of Missouri College of Agriculture are complete directions for preparing soil, planting, cultivating, insect control, et cetera. It contains a good chart which gives the date for planting each vegetable, names of seed varieties, distance between rows, inches between plants in row, depth to plant, and days from planting to eating stage. (The dates given are the average planting dates for central Missouri. In south Missouri, the planting dates should be from two to three weeks earlier; in north Missouri a week to ten days later.)

Other available bulletins from the College of Agriculture, at Columbia, Missouri, are:

E440—The Family Vegetable Supply.

E480—Storing the Family Food Supply.

C226—Controlling Garden Insects.

E435—Growing Fruit for Family Use.

A CONTRIBUTOR.

BRIEFS

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI. — Carl Mesle, Director of Youth Activities of the church in Independence, Missouri, reports several new features at the Tuesday night activity and play night held weekly by the city-wide Zion's League in the social room of the Auditorium. Dr. T. B. Homan, consulting psychologist, gives advice and aid to young people who want help with personal problems. John Thoman, local artist who teaches in Kansas City, and does considerable professional work is teaching a class in art for those who would like to learn but who have neither the time nor money to attend art school. Both of these church members are offering their time to the young people without charge.

Other activities offered for young people at the Auditorium on Tuesday night include floor and deck games, boxing instruction, with Tom Deal as teacher, and some aid in vocational guidance, given by W. A. Berg, director of guidance for the Independence schools. Mr. Berg has met with the young people there on one occasion, making appointments for private help and testing. Another recent event in correlation with the activity program was an illustrated lecture on recreational leadership. John Lee of Lee Sporting Goods in Independence, Missouri, gave instruction in how to play various deck and floor sports to the recreation chairmen and leaders for the Independence Zion's Leagues.

Miss Marian Davis also presents a class in physical conditioning for young women on Tuesday nights at the activity period. These periods are free to holders of the city-wide activity cards. Guests may come with any League member for a small charge.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—Morning services at St. Louis, February 13, were devoted to baptisms and confirmations of eight new church members from outlying branches in the St. Louis District. Those from Alton, Illinois, were, June Rae Johnson, David Kincade, Mary Lou Kincade; from Maryland Heights were Donna Faye Green, Betty Jane Kalb, Marjorie Ruth Lange, Alice May Soutiea, Doris Elaine Turnbull.

PORT HURON, MICHIGAN.—According to a feature story in the Port Huron Times Herald, January 29, the Reorganized Latter Day Saint church in that city was organized in 1899 with nineteen members. The present church building was dedicated on January 18, 1914. The membership now exceeds 800 persons.

SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI. — District President John Blackmore was the guest of the Springfield Branch February 6. Brother Blackmore spoke to the priesthood at the 3:00 p.m. meeting in the main auditorium of the church. His theme for the afternoon was "How Late Are We?" All priesthood men and those interested in priesthood work were invited. The women's department served a light supper. President Blackmore spoke at the evening service also.

OMAHA, NEBRASKA. — Dale Paternao was ordained to the office of priest by Elders Earl Oehring and R. W. Scott on February 6. He began his priestly duties almost immediately when he was the evening speaker at the evening worship service conducted by the young people of the branch.

LAMONI, IOWA.—In a business meeting held February 9, Bishop Lewis Landsberg showed that Lamoni Branch has on hand $71,729.13 for the new church. Not counted in this amount is a sum of $30,000 to come from the General Church. The plans for this church have been approved and the building will be of contemporary design. Three names were approved for ordination: Dennis Midgorden to the office of priest, and Kenneth Walden and Milo Farnham to the office of deacon.

ENID, OKLAHOMA.—The Saints of Enid, Oklahoma, have built a baptismal font and invite any of the Saints who do not have access to a font to make use of it. The address is 902 East Cherokee, phone 4795.

ST. LOUIS DISTRICT.—December 12 was observed as "Day of Decision." District President C. L. Archibald requested all pastors in the district's ten branches and missions to have those considering joining the church to make their decision by December 12. Thirteen requested baptism. Nine of the baptisms and all but two confirmations took place in St. Louis Branch on Sunday morning, December 12. Arrangements were made for those who were unable to come at that time to come later. The new members are Ruth Hunter and Kenneth Purgahn of St. Charles; Jean and Helen Mark of Brentwood; Doris Turnbull, Donna Fay Green, Alice Sontiea and Betty Kalb of Maryland Heights; Betty Jane Hicks, Myrna Ann Holden and Daryl Butcher of Sawyerville; and Edna Rohrman and George Anderson Hopkins of St. Louis.

WEST VIRGINIA DISTRICT.—District President Robert E. Rodgers of Wellsburg, assisted by Samuel Zonker and Wayne Wilson, presided at the organization of a mission in Beckley, West Virginia, where Leonard Pack was ordained to the Aaronic priesthood and chosen as pastor of the group. An active church school has been in progress in Beckley, meeting regularly in the homes of the members of that area. Elder Wayne Wilson has worked with the people there since 1933.

The West Virginia District joined with Youngstown and Pittsburgh Districts in a tri-district priesthood and women's institute at Wellsburg, January 28, 29, and 30, under the leadership of Apostle Percy E. Farrow and Seventy Merle Guthrie. The theme of the institute was "We Prepare." Nell Swanson of Columbus, Ohio, was the visiting leader of the women's groups. Cleona Guthrie spoke to the women in one assembly. The Wellsburg and Wheeling Saints provided meals and lodging for the visitors.

CHATHAM, ONTARIO. — Elder Jack Pray of Chatham, Ontario, reports that the Saints of that district have just finished a ten weeks' course, "The Branch of Today and Tomorrow." The eleven branches were grouped into three sections for the study. Starting the first week in February they started a district-wide study of the Church School Goals and Standards.

BUTLER, MISSOURI. — Mrs. Thelma Stevens from the Department of Religious Education was in this city, February 10, where she discussed study and story culture with the women's department in the afternoon. This was in the home of Mrs. Ocie Burg. In the evening, she addressed the church school and Zion's League leaders on the subject of worship and study, at the Methodist church. After the evening service, she was the guest of the Zion's League at the home of Delpha Marstellar.

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA. — Missionary George A. Njeim recently held a two weeks' series of services in the church. Two baptisms were performed at the end of the series. Elder Njeim and Elder Roy Curtis visited members during the two weeks.

Sunday, February 13, the young people of Santa Paula Mission met with the young people of Santa Barbara and set up a Zion's League under the direction of Hugh Kensler of Santa Paula and W. H. Pollard of Santa Barbara. The group plans for the coming month led off with a trip to the district conference to be held at San Bernardino, February 26 and 27.

LETTERS

Services Held in Gering, Nebraska

Two members of the Reorganized Church began holding church school services in their homes here about a year ago. They wrote to scattered Saints in the vicinity and contacted other interested persons and have built up the attendance to an average of thirty. Seventy J. Charles May visited the group in December and encouraged the workers to continue their efforts. It is hoped a public meeting place will soon be available to hold services in. Any Saints in this area who are not now attending, or members passing through, are invited to join in the meetings which are held at the F. C. Foster home, 1100 L Street.

Letter of Testimony

I am thankful I have found the true church and trust I will always be faithful to my covenant. I have attended other churches and enjoyed some of the Spirit of God, but I know the Spirit and blessings received by members of the Reorganized Church are much greater.

Please pray that, if it is God's will, I may be healed of my afflictions.

From an Isoated Member in North Carolina

I am very thankful that I was reared in a Latter Day Saint home and was permitted to become a member of this church. I have been married one year, and although my husband is a nonmember he is a good man and is interested in the church. We are paying our tithing, and he is reading the Book of Mormon. Since he is in the Marine Corps and there is no church near here, we are unable to attend services. If there are Saints in this area, we should like to contact them.

Remember us in your prayers.

Errata

On page seven, column one, of the February 19 issue, in C. J. Hunt's article, "Great Souls and Their Faith," the sentence, "Elder Harris was one of the six members who began the organization of the church on April 6, 1830, at Fayette, New York," should be omitted. David Whitmer, not Martin Harris, helped in the organization.

The more important anything is, the greater is our difficulty in saying anything important about it.

Planning the Zion Home

IT HAS BEEN DONE THIS WAY

District officers, pastors, and members of the priesthood who care enough to pay the price have conducted priesthood classes in one or more of the following ways:

During the regular church school hour. This is one of the very best opportunities but it is often neglected or indifferently used. Three or four credit courses could be completed in a year.

Sunday evening classes. One branch devotes two periods of classwork each Sunday evening before the preaching service and keeps this up month after month.

Wednesday evening classes. A large city branch has successfully conducted priesthood classes from 7 to 8 each Wednesday evening just before the prayer service. The classes were successful, and the prayer service improved in quality.

A two-weeks institute. Some branches have devoted five evenings a week for two weeks to priesthood classes. The Sunday services of the week end between the two sessions of the institute were carefully related to the classwork.

Week-end institutes. Some of the stakes and districts have learned the value of an intensive period of classwork beginning on Friday night and closing on Sunday afternoon. Sometimes it has been possible to complete eight consecutive hours of classwork at such an institute.

A school for priesthood. During the current year, the Aaronic priesthood of Independence will complete three units of classwork. Each unit is six weeks in length, providing for six two-hour sessions of classwork in all—enough to complete a unit of training.

Branches join in classwork. One district was divided into two regions, each containing several branches. Over a period of several weeks, a district leader conducted classes in one region on Tuesday evening and in the other region on Thursday evening. He kept this up until each class had completed a unit of training. This has been repeated year after year.

Classwork at reunions. Most of our better reunions now provide systematic classwork including classwork for priesthood. Some ambitious groups have been able to complete or nearly complete a unit of training in such classes. Many feel that the reunion is one of our best opportunities for the training of priesthood.

Accentuate the Positive

By CLAIR E. WELDON

A FEW YEARS ago, there appeared a novelty song featuring a colored minister who exhorted his congregation in these words:

You got to accentuate the POSITIVE,
Eliminate the NEGATIVE;
Latch on to the affirmative,
Don't mess with Mr. In-Between!

You got to spread joy up to the maximum,
Bring gloom down to the minimum,
Have faith, else Pandemonium
Liable to walk upon de scene!

Unlike some others, this popular hit packed a message with a punch—one which has real meaning for us today.

As human beings, we do not approach anything blankly open minded. Each new experience takes on significance only as it is "run through the grid" of our former experiences, now patterned as ideas and attitudes. As we go on, these patterned preconceptions merge into an integrated superattitude, an overview, a pivotal point from which we may view the whole business of living. The song suggests that these basic approaches to life fall into two broad categories: the negative and the positive.

THE negative approach is prevalent in our world. It finds expression in all sorts of ways and degrees. Most of us know people who are "grippers"—who complain continuously about the food, the restrictions of the authorities, the landlady, the neighbor's chickens, or the way Brother Jones conducts prayer meeting. We may know others who are sarcastic and critical, who deride such things as love, tenderness, and sympathy.

On higher levels, the negative approach becomes a way of thinking which views the whole of life as gloomy, unpromising, full of turmoil. It sees no purpose, warmth, or hope in life and feels that only fear, oppression, and death are the lot of men. In such a spirit, H. G. Wells penned these woeful words:

The end of everything is close at hand and cannot be evaded. Our universe is not merely bankrupt, it is going clear out of existence . . . it is the end!

Here Is the Writer

Clair Weldon, whose home is in Warrensburg, Missouri, is twenty years old and a junior at the University of Iowa, where he is majoring in social science education. He was graduated from Grace-land College in 1948, and holds the office of priest. One of his primary interests is "teaching ministry."

This spirit of pessimism is in all quarters, high and low. Its insidious virus invades all aspects of life with its doubt, unbelief, and sense of hopeless futility. You may find it in the newspaper, in the corner drugstore, or in the university classroom. Above all else, it tends to deny the existence of God and says there is no divine personality guiding the universe or our lives. This is its most damnable aspect, for the person who holds this "belief without belief" has isolated himself from the only real source of life, goodness, and purpose. His eyes are not focused to see the light, therefore he loudly proclaims the darkness. Such is the negative approach. Our song says very clearly: Eliminate the negative!

THE POSITIVE APPROACH views life as beautiful, worth-while, and purposeful. This is not ostrichlike optimism; rather it is a sense of rightness and well-being that comes from an awareness of the "real reality." These words from a doughnut-shop placard fit in well:

As you go through life, my brother, whatever be your goal,
Keep your eye upon the Donut, and not upon the hole!

The positive approach suggests that the things which count in life are those that are real and strengthening.

The life message of Jesus Christ is the most positive thing that ever happened. This was his keynote: "I am come that ye might have life and have it more abundantly!" He brought vivid assurance of God's guiding love and plan for the salvation of mankind. As followers of the Christ and members of his church on earth in these latter days, we have the responsibility of "accentuating the positive." Of all people, we have reason to be the most hopeful. We have the accounts of men who walked and talked with God, of men who testify of purpose and truth and beauty. We have the words of God to men in our Scripture. We have the opportunity to receive for ourselves the witness and the power of God's Spirit. Along with all men everywhere, we have the invitation to outreach ourselves and, by the power of God, to become his sons and daughters, to receive salvation and eternal life. Certainly we have cause to "accentuate the positive, eliminate the negative!"

Yet where we are is some distance from where we ought to be! Intentionally or by default, we often emphasize the negative in our daily lives. As a result, we find ourselves in situations where "Pan-de-mon-ium done walked upon de scene!" The need is evident for a witnessing people—a people who will show by their personal and group living that they have seen a great light.

AS WE GO ABOUT the business of building a positive outlook, these needs seem imperative:

New Horizons

The Art of Meditation

By JESSIE HEIDE

RECENTLY, our local pastor mailed me a letter inviting me to a special fellowship service on Sunday morning. He thoughtfully included a list of Scripture readings upon which I might meditate in preparation for the service. When Sunday came, I was snowbound and couldn't go. So I ate no breakfast but hunted up the Scriptures and read them.

When I had finished, I tried to imagine the meeting. Suddenly, I realized that if I had attended the meeting, I would not have taken time to read these choice bits of God's word. Hence, I would not have been in any spiritual or mental condition to worship with others in a fellowship meeting. I probably would have been a "wet blanket" to someone who had gone there really seeking.

I went back over them and read them all again. These are the ones in the list: Deuteronomy 4: 29; I Chronicles 28: 9; Isaiah 65: 1; Doctrine and Covenants 67:3; 76:8; 83: 4; 85: 18; 90: 1; 98: 5; 85: 36-38; and 119: 9; I Nephi 1: 4-13; Ether 1: 21 and 1: 68-81.

If you read them, you will observe that they all refer to controlling the mind to achieve the personal righteousness necessary to receive the blessings which God is so anxious to bestow upon us.

CULTIVATING THE MIND is difficult to do; and the more intelligence one uses, the easier it is to achieve "singleness of mind," Stake President Farnham urged in his letter. There are so many interesting and exciting things going on in the world today that it is easier to get sidetracked on some other topic—perhaps a good topic, but not the best one for the present purpose—than it is to carry through with the original intention.

The reading of Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36, "Prepare every needful thing, and establish a house . . . a house of God," and verse 37 (speaking of our going to the house of God), "Therefore cease from all your light speeches, from all laughter," especially appealed to me that morning.

Have you ever gone to church with a "singleness of mind," searching for spiritual food, only to have your serenity shattered by the people near you visiting about the weather, radio news reports, or other mundane experiences? I have. Have you ever rudely done so to others? I have.

I have had such offenses inflicted upon me as I sat in my seat, enjoying the organ music and waiting for what most people consider the opening of the meeting. For me, the meeting starts when the organ does. But worst of all is to have someone bluster into my contented tranquillity, after I have been on the spiritual heights, by condemning in negative criticism the very musical selection or spoken word that had lifted me up. I believe such intrusions are the most painful hurt one of God's creatures can inflict upon another. And I may have offended others by doing the same things unknowingly. (Certainly they never would tell me of it, because that is something we all flinch from.)

Nor should we be harsh on those who commit these blunders. They may be only "whistling in the dark"—secretly hoping someone will take a sincere interest in them and help them find and enjoy security in the spiritual life they realize they are missing.

Several years ago I heard Elder Dan Sorden say that he thought people reached God more frequently through the emotions than through the intellect. I have come to agree with him.

WHEN WILL WE ever learn that there are as many ways to reach God as there are types of personalities? When will we ever become tolerant enough to allow everyone to express himself in his own way? And, best of all, couldn't we all learn to help each other to attain our spiritual goals?

As the pastor suggested, I hope I can make a "daily checkup in personal meditation." What have I done today which I should not? What have I neglected? Tomorrow I'll do differently!

(1) A positive approach to the development of our youth. We tend too often to parade our negative objections to their activities. Let us rather offer them a challenge that will call forth their best in activities of real consequence!

(2) Growth in our relationships one with another—in our branch, school, work, and home life. We have been warned of "backbiting and contention." Let us take a positive approach to each other, seeing not only the faults and weaknesses, but also the good, the sincere, the lovable. Let's realize that people can grow and achieve.

(3) A positive approach to God and his Spirit. This is the crux of the whole matter! Life can have real significance for us only as we attune our whole beings to God's Spirit. This will involve repentance, or a basic re-orientation of our goals, our values, our energies, our all. It will involve humility and unselfishness.

The positive approach is demanding. It is the "narrow way" of earnest endeavor and deep responsibility, but it is the path that leads to a life which is more abundant and freedom and happiness which are eternal.

—Let's accentuate the positive!

On June 1, 1924, she was married to Daniel Lewis, who preceded her in death on March 25, 1942. She will be remembered throughout the United States and in other countries where the gospel has been preached, for her ministry of music.

She is survived by three stepdaughters: Mrs. Delpha Snyder of Wiggins, Colorado; Mrs. Bertha Herron of Grain Valley, Missouri; and Mrs. Jayne Corum of Vallejo, California; four step-grandchildren; and one step-great-grandchild. The funeral service was held at Stone Church, President Israel Smith officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

ZEIDLER.—Mary K., was born October 7, 1859, at Rockwell, Iowa, and died October 13, 1948, at Cameron, Missouri. She was married to John Charles Zeidler in May, 1881, at Rockwell, where they resided until 1885. From there they moved to Mallard, Iowa, then to Lamoni, and finally to Cameron. She and her husband joined the Reorganized Church in 1900, and missionaries were frequent guests in their home. All six of their children are members of the church also. They are Mrs. Laura James of Turtle Lake, North Dakota; Mrs. Vina Johnson of Pomona, Kansas; Mrs. Lillian Jordison, Mrs. Vernetta Drown, and Walton Zeidler of Cameron, and Charles Zeidler of Oakland, California; seventeen grandchildren; twenty-four great-grandchildren; and two great-great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Cameron, Elder Orman Salisbury officiating. Interment was beside her husband in Rush Lake Cemetery. Mr. Zeidler died on March 8, 1919.

SMALL.—Adda Florence, was born March 1, 1874, at Macedonia, Iowa, and died at her home in Henderson, Iowa, on January 15, 1949, following a stroke. She had been a faithful member of the Reorganized Church since her youth. Even during years of isolation, she continued to study the gospel.

She is survived by her husband, Will Small, of Henderson, Iowa; and two children by a former marriage: Earl Moore of Seward, Alaska, and Hazel Drake of Denver, Colorado. Funeral services were held in the Christian Church in Henderson, the Reverend William Lee officiating. Burial was in the Farm Creek Cemetery near Henderson.

McKENNA.—Matilda Gertrude, daughter of the late Thomas H. and Sarah Crowe Clarke, was born June 1, 1887, at Providence, Rhode Island, and died at her home in East Providence on January 29, 1949. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on June 11, 1902; she served as supervisor of the primary department of the church school in Providence Branch and was active in women's work. She was married to Clarence Browning Streeter on April 28, 1914; Mr. Streeter preceded her in death in February, 1938. She was then married to Arthur E. McKenna on May 9, 1942, who survives her.

Besides her husband, she leaves her mother, Sarah Clarke of Providence; a brother, Frederick B. Clarke of Cranston, Rhode Island; and three sisters: Mrs. Gladys Paine of Worcester, Massachusetts; Mrs. Hazel Cole of Detroit, Michigan; and Mrs. Myrtle Lavan of Providence. Funeral services were held at the Carpenter-Jenks Chapel, Elder Herman A. Chelline officiating. Burial was in the Pocasset Cemetery at Cranston.

* THE COURTESY OF A GENTLEMAN

It happened on a bus. The red-headed young man wore a Navy peajacket and a clean pair of overalls; the hard experiences of the war had written their record on his clean, strong face. Beside him, a lovely girl, apparently his bride, full of adoration. For himself, he looked a little stern.

A Negro woman got on, rather plump, and could find only one seat, cramped and uncomfortable, near by. The young man stood up, and with as much respect and courtesy as he could have given anyone, offered her his seat. And she accepted as graciously as any woman could have done. She sat down by his wife, who seemed to think it all right.

There was an example of race relations surpassing in value all the editorials and articles that could be written, stronger than sermons and orations. Multiplied all over America, it could wipe out nearly all race troubles in a single year.

Regardless of color, we all have the needs and the rights of human beings. We need the same public transportation, the telephones, the conveniences. We all get hungry, we have to buy clothing, we need medical aid. Wouldn't it be a better world if the great majorities would learn to be kind and respectful to the minorities, who cannot help themselves?

* LETTERS

The Editor's mail bag, too, is "like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind." It contains good articles and poor ones, poems and "pomes," and letters . . . Ah, the letters! Here is one containing an unreasonable gripe, and there is one giving a splendid thought or testimony. One calls for prayer in desperate, tragic need, and another records a happiness that is just this side of heaven. A pompous, ominous manifesto sticks out like a plaster cast on a broken leg; it is from a modern pharisee who thinks that he and his family are the only faithful members left in the church, and who would like to eliminate your ideas with a guillotine, God pity him! And then a beautiful letter from a friendly, intelligent member who never writes often enough.

There are thousands of people of ability, charm, and intelligence in the church. Generally, they are so busy they find no time to write, for the local branch needs them badly and works them hard. But whenever they do write, it is a happy day in the editor's office. I have been cheered up for weeks by one good letter. If such people would write more often, we would have a letter department in the "Herald" not surpassed in any other publication in the country. . . . Brother—Sister—how long is it since we have had a testimony or a good experience from You?

* QUIPS

"I don't like pestimonies," said the tired little boy, sitting beside his mother in prayer meeting, impatient with a long-winded speaker.

"Too many excessories," said Alta, emptying her purse on her desk.

The new pastor went to the little restaurant near his office for lunch. Forgetting the Word of Wisdom, he ordered coffee. The waitress set a Postum can beside his cup and saucer.

Surprised, he asked, "Why did you do that?" "The other man always asked me to do it," she replied. "I thought you might want it, too."

How's YOUR Missionary Effort?

Are you winning members? Telling the Story to your friends . . . non-member relatives . . . people you meet? That's what personal evangelism calls for!

One good way to tell prospective members about our church in a pleasant manner is to hand them copies of our new tract, "Hear Our Story" from the missionary kit shown above. In this tract, your friends will read the story of our church and find brief facts about our church in simple, easy-to-read language.

"Your Missionary Kit" includes five copies of the pocket-sized "Hear Our Story" tract plus the large "This Is Our Church" tract for church members. "This Is Our Church" has just been revised with latest pictures of church officials.

Let these tracts help you in your personal missionary effort . . . order today from Herald House!

To Protect Readers Against H. R. 2945

NEWS AND NOTES

Immediate action by readers of religious journals will be necessary to protect them against a sharp increase in postage rates proposed in a bill coming up before the U. S. House of Representatives in H.R. 2945. All readers interested in this situation should write to their Congressmen to ask for the modification of this bill, to preserve the preferential status of religious periodicals. A brief explanation of the facts follows:

At the present time, second-class mail (including periodicals) such as The Saints' Herald, Daily Bread, church school quarterlies and papers, has a flat postage rate of 1½ cents per pound regardless of distance. The proposed H.R. 2945, by setting new rates and establishing a zone system, would increase mailing costs 300 per cent in the first year, and 500 per cent in the second year. This would make necessary an advance in the cost of subscription.

The book rate has already been increased by 60 per cent on January 1 of this year. A further increase of another 25 per cent is proposed in H.R. 2945. Again, the increase would have to be passed on to the customer.

Herald House is a member of an association of church-owned publishing houses of the Publishers' Section of the International Council of Religious Education, which is opposing the heavy increases proposed for religious publication in H.R. 2945.

This association is proposing to the Honorable Tom Murray, Chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, in the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., that "the committee consider establishing a separate and preferential rate schedule for the shipment of books by nonprofit religious organizations," and that "the present system of preferential rates for second-class mail be continued as a matter of public policy by the Congress and that no change be made in the 1½ cents per pound flat rate now applicable to periodicals issued by religious and fraternal nonprofit organizations."

This bill seeks to put the Postal Department on a paying basis and is a commendable idea. However, it will work a great hardship on those living abroad or even in distant states, and will, we fear, make the cost of religious material seem prohibitive for many of our subscribers. We hesitate to suggest that you express your feelings to your representatives in Congress, however, that is a time-honored custom with American people. To be effectual, however, immediate action is needed.

SERIES IN PROVIDENCE

Apostle Maurice L. Draper presented a series of meetings in a three-week campaign in the Providence, Rhode Island, congregation. He reports that it was successful from every point of view. A baptismal service for the closing day was announced two weeks before the series began, and he went on the presumption that there would be those who would ask for baptism. Four adults were baptized, and several decisions were made by people who will be baptized in a later service planned by District President Almer W. Sheehy and Pastor George F. Robley. The series was climaxed by all-day services, February 20, when great spiritual power was evidenced.

FROM THE BRECKENRIDGES

In a letter to the First Presidency on February 27 from Allen Breckenridge, he tells that he and his family were at Fiji Mocombo (Meeting Place) Nadi International Airport. They had been there for three days waiting for the Tropas Airlines. They were to leave February 28 at 1:00 a.m. and would have breakfast in Samoa, and arrive in Paratonga in the afternoon. After spending the night there, they would leave for Tahiti in the morning. The family, including the baby, were doing well.

INVITATION KITS

The Department of Religious Education has prepared invitation kits for the use of pastors, to be given to prospective members. Letters were sent to the pastors, encouraging them to order these kits for use in their branches. Orders coming in so far are asking for such numbers as fifty and 100. Special emphasis is being encouraged in preparation for Children's Day this year by the Department of Religious Education. Branches are encouraged to use the new manual, "This Is Jesus' Church." Letters to pastors are urging them to use Children's Day as a Decision Day for nonmembers, and to use every agency of evangelism available.

FROM EUGENE THEYS

The following is an excerpt from a letter received from Eugene Theys by Bishop DeLapp. It is most encouraging to note the response being given by our church members in Holland in compliance with the financial law.

"I had the pleasure to be called upon to conduct the first series of missionary meetings at Rotterdam this last week. I used for my theme the 'Kingdom of God.' At the close of this series, I made an appointment with all the men of the priesthood here except for two families, who have already filed their inventories, and this week Brother Compier and I will go out to help all our men file their inventories. This will make the men here at Rotterdam 100% on keeping the law. We were also able to secure about six other appointments with members of the branch besides those of priesthood families. I find these people over here in both missions willing to keep the laws of God, if they are instructed. Brother Compier and I will be busy every evening this week and next, going into the homes of the Dutch Saints and helping them file their inventories."

PRESIDENT SMITH TO LAWMAKERS' MEETING

President Israel A. Smith attended the annual meeting of the Pioneer Lawmakers Association of Iowa on Tuesday, March 15, in the Historical Building in Des Moines. He was president of the organization, 1943 to 1947.

Hear Ye Him

While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them: and behold a voice out of the cloud, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him.

—Matthew 17: 5.

FACED BY ALL THE MYSTERIES of the unknown universe around us, and perplexed by the uncertainties of an unfathomable future, we find our own wisdom, our own experience, and our own thoughts inadequate for our needs. We seek help to make use of the opportunities of the life that has been given to us and to avoid the dangers with which we find ourselves surrounded. There is something in our souls that reaches outward and upward to make contact with the great Cause and Origin of all things. Our ears strain to hear some phrase from the eternal lips. We are like the Psalmist who made his plea:

Hear me when I call, O God of my righteousness . . . have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer.—Psalm 4: 1.

God in his love and mercy has not left those who seek him without an answer:

Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.—Isaiah 65: 24.

The Messenger

Not everyone can hear the voice of God. Not everyone can bear the power of his presence. Among all the Children of Israel, only Moses could climb the sacred slopes of Sinai, only he could endure the light of the burning bush. Moses could deal with two mediums of communication: he could hear the voice of God, and he could speak the language of the people. And in all ages, the prophets have served as intermediaries between God and men.

So, in the meridian of time, God presented the great intermediary, his Son Jesus Christ, in the words, "This is my beloved Son . . . hear ye him."

This was the message to Peter, James, and John on the Mount of Transfiguration. It was a message they were to carry to the world. It is a message to us today. It is a message we must carry to the world in our time.

The Message

And while we listen to the voice of Christ, what is the message we hear him bear?

Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.—Matthew 4: 17.

This is the message. God's kingdom is near us. It awaits us. It is not far away. Whatever distance stands between us and it is a result of our imperfect preparation, development, and consecration. "The kingdom of heaven" is an inclusive term that signifies all of God's good will toward us, and our obedience to him, with the blessing that will inevitably come from such a relationship.

So, when Christ speaks to us—and we listen to his voice—he is calling us to the richest and most beautiful fulfillment of life possible on this earth: the kingdom of God. This is his message.

The Voice of the Shepherd

My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand.—John 10: 27, 28.

And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers.—Verse 4.

Writers who have traveled the caravan trails which cross the Gobi Desert of Asia relate that the natives are very much afraid of the "demon voices" that are heard calling people away from the known trails. "Do not listen to them, for those who follow them are lost and perish of hunger and thirst. They never come back."

The Plenipotentiary

All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.—Matthew 28: 18.

In transacting diplomatic business between great governments, it is sometimes necessary to send a "minister plenipotentiary"—one who has "full power to act." The government sending him must have complete and perfect confidence in his judgment, his character, and his loyalty.

God had complete confidence in his Son, Jesus Christ. He could trust Jesus to act according to the principles and standards of truth and right in any situation or circumstances. Jesus was well qualified for the responsibility he had accepted. He has the authority and the capacity to speak for God. We can accept him with confidence and trust.

Listening to Christ

"Hear ye him" is a personal matter as well as an appeal to the whole wide world. It is easy for us to think of the message thus broadcast as something that concerns millions of other people, but not ourselves personally.

There are times, once or oftener in our lives, when Christ personally stands at the door of the heart, knocking and asking to come in. The lock is on the inside of that door, and only the individual who dwells within that citadel can open the door and let him in. The choice is ours.

People open the doors of their minds and hearts to many other things, persons, and influences, some of them evil and destructive to body and soul.

But the soul that responds to the invitation of Christ and opens the door to let him in will find him a great guest who brings in riches of peace and understanding, happiness, spiritual grace, and eternal life with him. Have you opened the door? Have you heard Christ's voice?

THE ZION'S LEAGUE throughout the church is co-operating in the current emphasis on evangelism. Thus, their project for February, March, and April has the theme, "I Witness for Christ," and members of the League have been encouraged to share constructively and wholeheartedly in branch effort toward evangelism during this period.

In an endeavor to bring interested young people into the church, Apostle Reed M. Holmes and the League Staff have prepared an attractive "invitation kit." This kit includes the card of invitation, a card requesting instruction with a view to baptism, and a copy of the new tract, "Hear Our Story." All of these are enclosed in a white envelope after the fashion of wedding and similar announcements.

The invitation card looks like this:

"Your fellowship with us is very much appreciated. We are enjoying our work and worship with you and want you to share a fuller companionship in the way of Christ.

"You are sincerely invited to follow him by entering into the communion of his church through baptism.

"Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints

"RSVP card enclosed"

The request for baptism looks like this:

"TO MY PASTOR:

"I am interested in a more complete fellowship in the Church of Jesus Christ. I should like to request baptism

"I should like to talk with you about Christ and his church

Although these invitations have been prepared as part of the Zion's League project, they might be used to good advantage with adults or children. Kits may be secured from the Department of Religious Education at 10 cents each. We feel sure that their use at any time during this period of missionary emphasis will bring blessing to those who pass them out and also to those who respond to the invitations.

Brother J. N. Muir, Port Huron, Michigan, in sending us data for January, adds: "We are increasing our district quota $500 over 1948. I am sure we will make it, and we are off to a good start."

Your Redemption Draweth Nigh

By Apostle E. J. Gleazer

A sermon preached October 3, 1948, at General Conference

GOD IS NOT BOUND unless we do what he has commanded or what he has to say. I am bound when you do what I say, otherwise there is no promise. In the fifty-eighth section of the Doctrine and Covenants, paragraph one, we have that truth emphasized:

Hearken, O ye elders of my church, and give ear to my word, and learn of me what I will concerning you and also concerning the land unto which I have sent you. For verily I say unto you, blessed is he that keepeth my commandments whether in life or in death, and he that is faithful in tribulation the reward of the same is greater in the kingdom of heaven.

I want to associate with that the sixth paragraph of the same section:

... men should be anxiously engaged in a good cause, and do many things of their own free will, and bring to pass much righteousness; for the power is in them, wherein they are agents unto themselves. And inasmuch as men do good, they shall in no wise lose their reward. But he that doeth not anything, until he is commanded, and receiveth a commandment with doubtful heart, and keepeth it with slothfulness, the same is damned. Who am I that made man, saith the Lord, that will hold him guiltless that obeys not my commandments? Who am I saith the Lord who have promised and hath not fulfilled? I command and a man obeys not, I revoke and they receive not the blessing; then they say in their hearts, This is not the work of the Lord for his promises are not fulfilled, but woe unto such for the reward lurketh beneath and not from above.

We have heard references made in the past to the plain and precious truths of the gospel with the simplicity of a language which God uses in addressing his people, and I'm wondering if you're not impressed with the content of that I have just read. Is it not true that many of us have reasoned just as it has been prophesied here we should? I could testify to you that I have heard members of this church take the very position that's referred to in this section.

THE CHURCH HAS NOT CHANGED

They have said, "This is not the work of the Lord, for his promises are not fulfilled." Haven't you heard someone say, "The church is not as it used to be"? Haven't you heard others ask, "Where is the power that formerly was associated with this work?" Haven't you heard still others express doubt as to whether or not the Lord is still with this organization? Haven't some even intimated that the church has been rejected?

Now these people are not looking in the right direction. They are not looking upon themselves. They are not attempting to seek the real cause. God has not changed. He has not withdrawn his power from the church as an organization. At no time does God withdraw his power, but certain individuals have withdrawn from him. When we withdraw from God, we are in a darkened condition, and we have every reason to believe, in such a condition, that the power of God has been taken from this church.

But I call upon many of you who are here this morning to bear witness that when we draw near to God, the same power that characterized his work in other dispensations, and in other days of this church, is still in the church. Even this year during the reunion season, not only in the territory where we've had responsibility but elsewhere in this church, the power of God has been made manifest in an outstanding degree.

We have witnessed that same power manifest in our own church in these various conferences that have been held here. Time and time again when the wisdom of men in the leading councils of your church have come to naught, when we knew not where to look so far as human intelligence is concerned, God has broken through, opened up the way, and made provision for this church to go forward.

Speaking in this section of the Doctrine and Covenants, the Lord mentions something of the conditions we must observe if he is to be bound. Even God is limited. Almighty is his name, Eternal is his name, but so long as he respects the agency of man, he is limited. He is limited because of our failure to comply with his law and walk in harmony with his commandments. "Who am I that made man, saith the Lord, that will hold him guiltless that obeys not my commandments. Who am I, saith the Lord, that have promised and have not fulfilled?" The disobedience of man has often made it appear that God had lied. People have said, "Where are the promises?" and it has been impossible for God to fulfill those promises or to bring to pass their realization because of the disobedience of those who profess to be his children, and who are supposed to represent his body upon the earth. That's true not only in our day and generation, it's been true in past dispensations also.

THE WORK OF THE LORD

"Who am I saith the Lord who have promised and have not fulfilled? I command and a man obeys not, I revoke and they receive not the blessing, and they say in their hearts, this is not the work of the Lord." I trust this is not true of us who are attending this conference. I'm taking for granted that you have made an effort to come here, and you made that effort because you believe in God, because you've had experience with him, because you have confidence that this church is moving forward and that the Spirit of God shall continue to manifest itself until his promises shall be fulfilled in us.

Redemption means more than preservation in this life. Sometimes we have limited redemption to that which transpires during these "three-score and ten." This age of seventy is supposed to be the average age of man, and some of us have been guilty of believing that God has failed merely because we have failed to bring to pass the establishment of his kingdom upon the earth. I know some who walk with us no more because they anticipated a number of years ago that by this time we would have a gathering of God's people and we'd be operating upon a stewardship basis—collectively, I mean, for there are those who are now individual stewards and have been throughout the years.

Now, I believe with many of you that all this could have taken place. There isn't any question about it. The Lord himself told us many years ago that Zion could have been redeemed even then if those who called themselves after his name had been obedient to his commandments. Some may differ with me—that's not unusual—but in my judgment, we have not yet established a community where we are in a position to reveal the social righteousness of Saints. The mere fact that we haven't yet succeeded does not for a moment suggest to me that God has withdrawn himself from this church. I believe we're still in the process.

Some of us, like ancient Israel, may be tired by journeying in the wilderness. For we, too, have wandered more than forty years, and while we today are possibly in the land of promise, we have not yet witnessed the fulfillment of the promises of God either pertaining to this land or the people who dwell here. I'm referring to Jackson County and the regions round about. However, certain portions of God's will have been fulfilled. There was a time when the members of this church were driven from this land. And we can say that today we live here without hindrance which proves we are making some growth. One hundred years ago your life would have been at stake if you were found in Jackson County. Today, the promise of God has been fulfilled, for literally thousands of his people today reside in Jackson County and are respected by the people with whom they neighbor.

GOD FORESAW OUR DAY

Since this promise has been fulfilled, it suggests that God's being able to foresee this particular portion of the promise coming to pass, the entire prophecy concerning the establishment of his kingdom in Jackson County will yet be realized. I may be contradicted, but I'm taking a position that the only thing which stands in our way of fulfilling every promise God has given concerning the Gathering and the establishment of Zion, is the membership of this church. There may be "Red Seas" to cross, there may be modern Egyptians and others who would not welcome our way of life, but the Scripture substantiates my saying that when God's people comply with his commandments, there is no power on this earth that can stay them in the accomplishment of this divine commandment.

I believe our people are making headway—I'm speaking of the church collectively. I believe more members have an intelligent comprehension of what the Gathering and establishment of Zion mean today than in days past. Some of us admit we didn't know too much, but there was a period when we thought we were well-informed. In those days, we wondered why the kingdom hadn't been established, not realizing what was required to bring this kingdom forth. I certainly haven't given up hope, and I don't intend to give up the hope of establishing a literal Zion. I believe there are sufficient members in our church today that, if they were brought together in harmony with the law, Zion could be tomorrow. This requires an organization of our people, however, and one that's in harmony with the word of God.

There must needs be an organization of this people other than the organization of the church itself. I believe we're going to be compelled to do that, as a result of the conditions which are now on the earth and the conditions which are close at hand. But, if it should be my lot never to witness the actual establishment of such communities, I can bear my testimony that this gospel had not failed, for redemption is not revealed solely in what happens to us here.

Most of us know we didn't originate here. Our spirits were with God before we were born here. We dwell here for a period, but we do not terminate our existence here. If this were not so, what about the noble men and noble women of other dispensations of time—some who knew nothing but persecution and affliction? In the Hebrew letter of the Inspired Version, you have the definite promise of God that these people shall in no wise lose their reward. Any compliance that any of us makes with the Word of God is going to bring results not only here but hereafter.

REDEMPTION AND ECONOMICS

I'm suggesting that redemption must not be restricted to any social or economic program. I'm taking the position that a social and economic program which reveals the

All Are Called - - By F. HENRY EDWARDS

Radio Sermon, March 6, 1949

AN AMAZING NUMBER of truly great men have derived their strength from a sense of destiny, a conviction that they were uniquely matched against the demands and opportunities of their day and generation. Of this line of men of destiny were the Old Testament prophets—men with a message given of God. Of this line, also, were Joan of Arc, Columbus, Cromwell, and Lincoln—each with a task given of God. Leading them all is Jesus, our Lord, who testified before Pilate:

To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth.—John 18: 37.

The word of God justifies this sense of destiny felt by great men, but extends it to include all men.

As an example, listen to the Apostle Paul:

I . . . beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called . . . To every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ.—Ephesians 4: 1, 7.

We are laborers together with God.—I Corinthians 3: 9.

Listen, also, to the words of a modern prophet:

All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8.

THE REORGANIZED CHURCH of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints believes that this last quotation, taken from one of the messages of Joseph Smith, embodies a word of authentic inspiration for every man who truly desires to meet the reasonable obligations of daily life. To every such man, we say with the Apostle James, "Every good gift . . . is from above" (James 1:17) and with Joseph Smith, "You are called according to the gifts of God to you."

In sharp contrast with this divine word stands the deeply rooted heresy that God is interested only in the souls of men. But just because this is heresy, we cannot be too frequently reminded that it is his very concern for our souls which causes the Heavenly Father to be interested also in our work, our health, and our education—in all that we think, say, do, and are.

He is concerned, for example, that we shall be good workmen. There are many passages of Scripture which indicate this, but I will call attention to just one taken from the Book of Exodus:

Jehovah hath called by name Bezaleel, the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah; and he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, . . . to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in cutting of stones for settings, and in carving of wood . . . And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he and Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. Them hath he filled with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of workmanship, of the engraver . . . and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, in scarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver.—Exodus 35: 30-35.

FINE SKILLS like these distinguish their possessers from the rank and file of mankind and entail significant responsibilities for service. But men are also called according to their commonplace gifts—gifts which are shared by almost everyone. It is not given to every man to be a hero or a genius or even a skillful artisan, but it does lie within the power of even the least favored of us to be honest, clean, loyal, gentle, and just. No matter how small any man's particular endowment, it is sufficient to give him opportunities for showing generosity, brotherly kindness, and good humor. Even one who has the least of gifts can cultivate within himself—by the grace of God—a special store of that quiet nobility which forgives injuries, understands other men's failures, and accepts seemingly small opportunities for service with sweetness of spirit; and he can learn to look on his fellows without envy, malice, or resentment.

These possibilities which are given freely to all of us constitute our calling. To magnify them, we require no special assignments beyond the commonplace opportunities of daily life. Our ordinary gifts thus beckon us to extraordinary performance. Again, there are many Scriptures which illustrate this. Please note there is no indication that John the Baptist suggested people should leave their regular occupations in order to serve in the kingdom. The concern of this great forerunner of Jesus was, rather, that the men of his time should approach the tasks to which they were already committed in a new spirit, with a new understanding, and with a sense of having been called thereto. Luke tells us that the multitude asked John:

What then must we do? And he answered and said unto them, He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath not; and he that hath food, let him do likewise. Then there came also publicans to be baptized, and they said unto him, Teacher, what must we do? And he said unto them, Extort no more than that which is appointed you. And soldiers also asked him, saying, And we, what must we do? And he said unto them, Extort from no man by violence, neither accuse any one wrongfully.—Luke 3: 7-14.

SO FAR WE have talked only of the gifts of God to distinguished men and to commonplace men alike. But not all the gifts of God are granted to us as individuals, either great or small. Some significant gifts are available to us as citizens of this nation. Nevertheless, even though we share these gifts in common, they do entail individual responsibilities, for the fulfillment of our national destiny depends on our participation as individuals in the total life of our country. We are, therefore, under moral obligation to exercise our franchise, to protect the rights of assembly and of free speech and of equality before the law, and to share the privilege of citizenship with our fellow citizens without regard to race, creed, or color. It was with something like this in mind that Edmund Burke said to an earlier generation of Americans:

It is our business carefully to cultivate in our minds, to rear to the most perfect vigor and maturity, every sort of generous and honest feeling that belongs to our nature. To bring the dispositions that are lovely in private life into the service and conduct of the commonwealth; so to be patriots as not to forget that we are gentlemen. . . . To be fully persuaded that all virtue which is impracticable is spurious; and rather to run the risk of falling into faults in a course which leads us to act with effect and energy, than to loiter out our days without blame and without use. Public life is a situation of power and energy. He trespasses against his duty who sleeps on his watch, as well as he that goes over to the enemy.

"All are called according to the gifts of God unto them." And we are called "to the intent that all may labor together." Every ship that sails the Atlantic gets its chart from Columbus. Every plane that soars through the skies borrows its design from the Wright brothers. Every lover of great literature or of great music or of great painting is indebted to such men as Shakespeare and Beethoven and Michaelangelo. In like fashion, every man who operates a lathe or uses a plane or paints a house or plants a garden steps into line behind those men of destiny who were the fathers of our modern civilization and whose influence is reaching beyond our day to the better days that are to come. But with these men of genius have been associated millions of others of lesser stature but also men of destiny—men whose works have made a vital contribution to the life we now live. Seeing that we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us recognize with gratitude that our gifts do constitute our calling, and let us work together, under God, for the accomplishment of the work entrusted to all.

Let me do my work from day to day,
In field or forest, at the desk or loom,
In roaring market place or tranquil room;
Let me but find it in my heart to say,

When vagrant wishes beckon me astray,
"This is my work; my blessing not my doom;
Of all who live, I am the one by whom
This work can best be done in the right
way":

Then shall I see it not too great, nor small,
To suit my spirit and to prove my powers;
Then shall I cheerful greet the laboring hours,
And cheerful turn, when the long shadows fall
At eventide, to play and love and rest,
Because I know for me my work is best.

—Henry Van Dyke.

Israel Is a Nation Again

By ELBERT A. SMITH

AFTER MORE than two millenniums of time, Israel again is a nation with a government of its own and recognized by the dominant powers of the world. Against seemingly insurmountable obstacles, including the hostility of the Arabs, the changeable and vacillating policies of the United States, Britain, and the United Nations, Israel has won back territory in Palestine, the land of its progenitors, and has established a government.

There is interest and perhaps significance in the name selected for the new nation. We have long talked and sung about the "return of the Jews:" "The Jews rebuild Jerusalem, as prophets said they would." And we might have expected that the returned people would have chosen the name of Judah.

When the Hebrews came into the Holy Land, they came as twelve tribes, the "children of Israel." When they broke up into two hostile camps, the Jews established "The House of Judah" in the South, and the other tribes established the "House of Israel" in the North. In common parlance, now all Hebrews are Jews. The Jews are credited with the success gained in establishing a government in Palestine. Yet they choose the old and comprehensive name of Israel, or "Israeli," which would include under their banner descendants of any or all of the original twelve tribes. Probably, considering the mixed lineage of the tribes as of today (mentioned in the Herald for January 22, page 9), many individual representatives of other tribes already have part in this movement and others may come.

The choice of a name for the new state may be more or less significant. It is something to think about. For while we have talked about the return of the Jews (Judah) to the promised land, the prophets of old talked of the return of both Judah and Israel, as, for example, this from Jeremiah: "For, lo, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, saith the Lord; and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it." —30: 3.

Israeli may yet play an important role in world politics and history.

William Marks

Member of the Presidency

1863 - 1872

INTRODUCTION

We get occasional inquiries about the lives of those who piloted the Reorganization through its early years. Recently we received a letter from a woman who said she was related to William Marks and desired information respecting his life.

This letter has suggested the advisability of publishing biographical sketches of such leaders, and we here present the first of a series.

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

A MEMBER of the First Presidency, counselor to Joseph Smith from 1863 to the date of his death in 1872, William Marks was born on November 15, 1792, at Rutland, Vermont.

Of his life before 1837, when he was a member of the high council at Kirtland, Ohio, we have little information. From 1839 to 1844, he was at Nauvoo, where he held the office of president of the Nauvoo Stake of Zion. A portion of this time he was an alderman, also chief justice of the municipal court of that city.

After the disruption, he refused allegiance to the Quorum of Twelve and affiliated, in turn, with some of the factions, but never forsook the gospel.

We give our readers a reprint of a biographical sketch of Elder Marks which was published in the Journal of History, Volume I, pages 24 to 29, prepared by Church Historian Heman C. Smith:

Because Elder William Marks had been connected with several factions of the church since the death of Joseph Smith in 1844, much adverse criticism has been urged against him and the work he did in connection with the Reorganized Church. It is said that he was fickle and unstable, and that he is not entitled to serious consideration. During the lifetime of Joseph Smith, he was steadfast and immovable, and he manifested the same stability in later life, after his connection with the Reorganized Church. It is true that for several years he frequently changed his allegiance to organizations, though always firm in his faith in the gospel and the angel message. Whatever of weakness he may have manifested, as indicated by these changes, we are not disposed to cover up or deny. At the death of the Prophet, he favored the claims of Sidney Rigdon; later he gave credence to the claims of those of the Quorum of Twelve who were in harmony with Brigham Young; then we find him with J. J. Strang at Voree, Wisconsin; and subsequently with Charles B. Thompson. These things, upon their face, indicate inconstancy.

We have been under the disadvantage of not having Elder Marks' defense and have had only circumstances from which to form a verdict. Recently, through the kindness of Sister Byron Adams of Logan, Iowa, there has come into our hands a series of letters written by Elder Marks during a part of these years of uncertainty, which throw some light upon his movements, from which we here present extracts, believing that all interested will cheerfully admit that to hear from Elder Marks directly is the best evidence possible to obtain.

These letters are written from Shabbona Grove, Illinois, to James M. Adams, a part of the time of Wisconsin, and later of Western Iowa. They commence after his separation from Strang and at the beginning of his connection with Thompson, but throw light upon his movements and the causes that impelled them from 1844 until he broke with Thompson.

Under date of April 23, 1852, he wrote of attending a solemn assembly called by Charles B. Thompson at St. Louis, Missouri, April 15, of that year. He says:

I arrived there on that day with but little understanding of the work and about as much faith, for I have been so often disappointed that I had become fearful and unbelieving, and with a determination to be very inquisitive, for I have learned from experience that it is a very easy thing to be deceived.

It appears from this letter that he became sufficiently satisfied at this solemn assembly to accept an appointment, said to have been previously given by revelation, associating him with Harvey Childs and Richard Stevens to locate a place of gathering. The result of this appointment was the location of Preparation, in Monona County, Iowa, the location being made in 1852 by himself and Mr. Childs; Mr. Stevens at the time being sick and not able to accompany them. He returned home with the expectation of selling his possessions and removing to the new place of gathering, which seems to have been designated to begin at Kaneshville (Council Bluffs) on the south and to extend for a hundred miles north.

It appears he was not successful in making arrangements to move as soon as he expected, but in the spring of 1854 he went to the new location to attend a solemn assembly, at which time he seems to have witnessed things he did not approve. On September 3, 1854, he wrote:

I just received a paper from Brother Thompson and a small note sent in an envelope stating that many had turned away, but urging me to make all possible speed to get there for there was still a chance for those who were willing to make the sacrifice of all they possess of this world's goods. I discovered when I was there last spring that there were a great many who were quite dissatisfied, principally with the time tithing. I was there some ten or twelve days. I came to the conclusion that there was the greatest oppression that I ever saw imposed upon a community, but I had heard nothing from there since and don't know what has been the cause of their leaving. I suppose by your not settling at Preparation that you discovered something you were not satisfied with. On the receipt of this, I wish you would write me and give me your views of all the proceedings as you understand them.

I had always felt an assurance that the work was of God. I went there last spring with the view of making preparation to move there, but when I left there, I thought I would wait a short time and see what would be the result of things, for I was satisfied that many would leave. In your letter, I wish you would mention the names of some who have left. I have heard that Brother Savage and Brother Messenger [left] and many others also.

On June 11, 1855, he wrote:

It seems from the tenor of your letter that there have been two spirits manifest, the one asking if you would deny Christ if you could be healed, I should think was to tempt you or try your faith; the other has led you to preach some very interesting discourses such as the first principles of the gospel, and the law of adoption, and that the Lord had not rejected this nation. That I never did believe, although Brigham Young proclaimed it to be so. The church departing from the foundation, that I think could clearly be shown, but the funeral sermon of the church was a thing quite foreign from my thoughts. If this is from the right spirit, it is of incalculable meaning. It seems to have put an end to so much false pretension, and false prophets, and foolery that has been going on for the last ten or twelve years. Oh, how it would rejoice my heart to see the true light break forth again, that we might know for a surety, for I have long been wandering in darkness, and following false prophets until I have become tired and weary.

I came to the conclusion in the fore part of last winter to reject all organizations and to teach the first principles of the gospel—baptism for the remission of sins and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Spirit. I find recently there are quite a few in this region of country that have come to the same conclusion. John E. Page is one and some eight or ten at Aurora. They want me to baptize them. I want your advice on the subject. Brother Adams, we are living in a day when the Devil has great power, and it appears from what we see and hear and read that he will, if possible, deceive the whole world. Therefore it is highly necessary that we are watchful and prayerful that we may not be deceived. Try the spirits faithfully by the written word. I well remember what Oliver Cowdery told me here when on his way to Council Bluffs. He said the work was of God and the end would be accomplished, "let men do or act as they pleased!"

Under date of July 26, 1855, he wrote:

My mind has never been at rest since the breaking up of the church (or the death of Brother Joseph). I have always had fears that all was not right, but I am satisfied now that all of the false prophets have arisen that can with any degree of plausibility, and if there can be any system adopted that will be calculated to mitigate the condition of the faithful Saints that are scattered about on the face of the land, it would rejoice my heart. I would state my views, and then I should like to get the views of my brethren on the subject, asking our Heavenly Father to direct us and claim the promise, "If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God." I had it in contemplation when I wrote you the last letter to look out a good location somewhere in the West and enter a large tract of land, if it was thought advisable by my friends and brethren, and invite all of the honest in heart and as many as were disposed to gather around where we could enjoy some society, for it is like living alone in the world as many of us do. I have mentioned my views to several of the brethren since I wrote you; they seemed very much pleased with my views and hoped that I would do it by all means, for they would gladly fall in with the idea.

And now, Brother Adams, I want your advice on the best course to pursue, asking our Heavenly Father to direct you in this matter; and I want your answer on this subject as soon as possible. For if I should conclude to make a location this fall, it would be necessary to make a move before a great while; and your opinion about where to make the location, if it should meet your views. I am somewhat advanced in age, near sixty-four years, but my health was never better than at present, although I can't endure so much hardship. My strength has been greatly increased since I have come to the present conclusion. While under the influence of Baneemyism, I lost all of my strength and former vigor. I never went on a mission without returning home, sick and finally reduced so low as to despair of ever being able to do anything more.

Under date of March 16, 1856, he wrote:

Through faith and prayer and the gift of the Holy Spirit, I believe I have partially come to understanding. I consulted with some of the brethren here, stating my views in part, and we agreed to call a conference to be held on the tenth day of April, which comes on Thursday, to meet at 2 o'clock p.m., and organize on that day and continue till Saturday evening, preaching on Sunday We had but about a month's notice before our conference, and so we have had to notify mostly by letter. I should have written you before, but there was not time for you to attend if you should have been disposed.

Our object is to meet and discuss the subject and try to get a starting point, and not complete an organization then, but try to come into union, and to concentrate on faith and strength, and travel this summer and give a general notice, and call a conference in the fall, disseminating our views and preaching. My views are to organize according to the Book of Mormon. These are the views of some of the brethren, but I have seen only a few to converse with. It has been manifested to me in a few days past to organize as the Nephites did, with a high priest to preside over the whole church, with elders, priests, and teachers, the high priest to be elected by the voice of the people. This requires a man of God and of great faith. This I should wish to defer until we could get more general expression of the brethren. . . . The Book of Mormon is of great worth to us in our day. I read it with more interest than I ever did before.

This temporary and partial organization was effected, including such men as William Marks, John E. Page, John Landers, William W. Blair, John Gaylord, Russell Huntly, and other historic characters, the majority of whom subsequently became associated with the Reorganized Church.

Elder Marks was received into the Reorganized Church, June 11, 1859.

The language of the foregoing letters, written as private letters to a friend, without thought of publicity, discloses the inward thought of the man, and reveals the motives that prompted him through the dark and cloudy day, and is a better index to his character for integrity, stability, honesty, faithfulness, and devotion than any comments we could make, and we submit it for candid consideration.

While considering the many trying ordeals through which he passed and the narrow escapes he made, both to his spiritual and physical life as recorded in these letters, we wish to call the attention of the reader to the prediction made of him in 1838 by Joseph Smith the Seer. Compare the prediction with subsequent events and their effects and judge of the character of the Seer and the man of whom he wrote.

In a letter written from Far West, Missouri, March 29, 1838, Joseph Smith, writing to the authorities of the church at Kirtland, Ohio, said:

I would say to Brother Marks, that I saw in a vision while on the road, that whereas he was closely pursued by an innumerable concourse of enemies, and as they pressed upon him, as if they were about to devour him, and had seemingly obtained some degree of advantage over him, but about this time a chariot of fire came, and near the place, even the angel of the Lord put forth his hand unto Brother Marks, and said unto him, "Thou art my son, come here," and immediately he was caught up in the chariot, and rode away triumphantly out of their midst. And again the Lord said, "I will raise thee up for a blessing unto many people." Now the particulars of this whole matter cannot be written at this time, but the vision was evidently given to me that I might know that the hand of the Lord would be on his behalf.—Church History, Volume 2, page 147.

When William Marks died on May 22, 1872, President Joseph Smith paid this editorial tribute to him:

With feelings of no ordinary moment called forth by an event of more than common interest to the church, we chronicle the departure of William Marks, Senior, from this earthly life.

Brother Marks was one of the noblest of men. He has lived a life of most singular usefulness to his fellow men. Kind and upright in thought, it was known of him that his acts were founded in his consciousness of right; and what was wrong to him, he would not do.

Brother Marks united with the church at an early day and was with the Saints through all their troubles, up to the terrifying times of eighteen hundred and forty-four and five, and then, because he would not keep still while crime and iniquity overran the rights and liberties of the people of the church, he was made an offender and left the city of Nauvoo. He was identified with some of the movements towards reorganization of the scattered ones of the fold, but in each instance, when he became aware that there were principles of evil and wrong obtaining in church government, and among the originators, he announced his disapproval and withdrew from their association.

As the President of the Stake at Nauvoo, Brother Marks was one of the most faithful and steadfast men the church had. He was an example of clear-headed wisdom, a man who ruled his own spirit, and consequently one who controlled others. He was a wise counselor and a wise administrator; and became one of the most valued and trusted friends of the Martyr Joseph. His integrity was incorruptible.

He cast his lot and his influence with the Reorganization in 1859, and remained a steadfast promoter of the truth, ever ready to reprove what he saw that he believed to be wrong, and fearing no man, loving neither place nor power, his personal influence was always a force for the cause of God on the earth.

At the proper time, Brother Marks became the Counselor to the President of the Reorganized Church, which position he held at the time of his departure, which occurred on the twenty-second day of May, 1872, at 11:45 a.m.

In a good old age, respected and loved, he has laid down the weapons of his earthly warfare without regret, to take up the unbroken threads of his spiritual existence in the rest of the paradise of God, there to await the assembling of the redeemed and the sanctified, when "He shall gather in one all things in Christ."

He was patient and long suffering during his decay, and seemed to be full of confidence that a blessed future awaited him. His death was as the death of the righteous.

PAUPERS IN HEAVEN

By Dora Richardson

WE ARE ALL WORKING, planning, struggling, and making sacrifices, in one way or another, for the physical necessities and comforts in this life for both ourselves and our loved ones.

John Brown's work requires that he be on the job on time six days a week. In selecting the location of his home, he must take into consideration if it is within walking distance or close to a bus or streetcar line. If Mr. Brown owns a car, he may select a homesite farther away. Also the location of a school must be taken into consideration for the sake of the children.

Of course, there are a lot of times when the weather is extremely hot or cold, and John doesn't exactly want to go to work. It would be very comfortable lying in bed or sitting by the fire. Perhaps it is raining or icy under foot, and it would be a swell time to read a book, clean up the basement, or spend the day in his workshop. But does John stay home for any of those things? No!

The house would look better if he could buy some new furniture. Mary and the children need new clothes. The children are asking for bicycles and many other things that a full pay check will help to buy; so nothing keeps him from his work short of serious illness or death in the family. The things he wants to do at home will keep for some long evening or perhaps a holiday when the shop is closed. Therefore, the Brown family is comfortably housed, well clothed and fed, and a portion of the pay each month is laid aside for higher education for the children later on. They would not be considered paupers in this world's goods.

But the time is coming when John, Mary, and their children will have to leave the physical body and all the things they have accumulated in this life to live in a spiritual realm. Nothing can be taken with them except those things which are of a spiritual nature. All must stand before a great judge to be judged according to their works while in the flesh. Their works for the Master, the one who created them, endowed them with intelligence and gave each one certain talents. The great judge has a church on the earth, and there is much work to be done in connection with this church. The gospel as taught by it is the power of God unto salvation for the soul—the only part of man which returns to its Creator.

Did John and Mary consider this church when establishing their home? Is it within walking distance or does the carfare required for them and the children to attend the services seem more than they can afford? Or is it too far to drive the car and be regular in attendance? Were they prone to make excuses that the weather was too hot, too cold, or too damp? They did not allow these things to stand in the way when caring for the needs of the physical body.

Were they willing to accept assignments in God's church and perform their duties to the best of their abilities? Did they teach their children the gospel or take chances on their learning it from someone else later on in life? Did they think they would just automatically accept it because this was the church to which Dad and Mother belonged? Will they realize too late that their interests in life were far removed from the church?

Every day is a day of choosing for each individual. If we choose the things of this life only, when we die, we shall stand as spiritual paupers before the Great Judge and shall merit no reward. We have robbed not only God of the contribution that we were capable of making to his work, but also ourselves and our loved ones of many wonderful blessings in this life and in the world to come. We are indeed spiritual paupers.

Strengthening Family Values--By the Garden

By FLORENCE W. SIMMONS

ARE YOU A PENSIVE SPECTATOR in the happy trend toward more outdoor living because your garden lacks privacy and shade? In this age of scant home living, many cast a wistful glance over the shoulder to yesterday's hills-of-home and relive for a treasured and sometimes enigmatic moment the warmth and stability, the rich meaning of family life then. Out of this nostalgia has arisen the determination to rise to the truly royal standard of vital home values, which strong and purposeful parents bequeathed through example, and put more of this vitality and purposeful beauty into our own family living. An outgrowth of this dissatisfaction and the urge to correct, in part, our haste and loss and lack of home-planning are the outdoor rooms and increasing family living on the home grounds.

If you, too, would like your garden to possess more meaning in the life of your family, landscape for nooks, or outdoor rooms, with one long vista for your better dreams to take wing in. The day of pretense is rapidly running out . . . then the rather erstwhile green setting for the house provides for more than a margin between properties and a thin mark of respectability. Your garden will be more than a source for cutflowers and a fleeting morning refresher.

The nook furnishes a room for rest, reading, dining, and a place to entertain guests in home privacy with the additional blessings a garden provides—fresh, fragrant air, the ministry of flowers, trees, bird song, and a limitless ceiling of clouds which furnishes peaceful, bright pastures where you may think and do so splendidly. Catch up on thinking out better, more purposeful family life.

Then, if neighbors in your part of the country frown at hedges, your personal living outdoors can continue without being a tense parade before all who look investigatively toward a beautiful garden and cannot help noting the domestic activity in it.

Whether your nook is formal with evergreens on a four-square plan or informal with plantings made in seemingly casual drifts, it should be a living room with walls of trees decorated with shrubs and a galaxy of flowers creative of an atmosphere of shelter and nature's own peace.

WE WILL PLAN a nook suited in size to the average backyard which allows space for play activity and a drying area. If you have a back terrace, plan this nook at the opposite side for balance and at the rear corner of the yard. Our nook is of semi-formal design, a triangle thirty-four by forty-five by thirty feet. The three points of the triangle are emphasized by trees; together with evergreens, they form the structural part of the nook. They are to the nook what timbers and walls are to the house. The three deciduous trees are 1. Paul's Scarlet English Hawthorne, 2. Mountain ash—sorbus, 3. Laburnum—Vossi golden chain. No adequate description of their decorative merits would segregate one of these trees for first approval. The hawthorne, wide spread with close-lacing branches, which can be trimmed to umbrella shape for shade, is robed in scarlet rosettes during its blooming period in spring. Large, red berries, (apple genera) appear later and may be used for jelly. The ash, with its frothy panicles of spring bloom, really "arrives" in autumn when it is vivid with large clusters of orange berries. Though smallest of the trees, the vossi easily holds its emphasis during late spring when its flowers of golden-yellow are a cascade of wisteria-like bloom.

IT IS RATHER AMAZING that with these trees and many other flowering kinds in the price range of the many things we acquire on whimsy or for almost passing consideration, there should be such a leveling off of beauty on home grounds. Most trees are a life investment and become increasingly useful as the years pass so that the small purchase price never covers their actual value. Between these trees and the evergreens to follow, the remaining plantings will fill in—grouped for unity and yet adequately spaced for mature growth.

However, to keep the groomed, clean, new look in landscaping, shrubs and trees should be kept trimmed to avoid a scraggly, overgrown appearance and to encourage dense growth. Leave such trees as oaks and sycamore to spread out at will since they know how to do it with grace and character rather than appearing undisciplined as do some trees whose beauty does not lie in the shape of their branches. Between the hawthorne and the ash, we will make a structural accent by centering the evergreen (upright) Chinese yew with the cotoneaster shrub, divaricata, on either side. Rich in green, lacquered-appearing leaves, the cotoneaster is brilliant in autumn with red berries which last well into the winter and are very effective for arrangements. To the opposite side of the ash at the nook side front, we will accent with one juniper—Nevin's Blue, with the hardy spirea—Blue Mist, and the

Gastronomic Reminiscences

By JOHN W. RUSHTON

A YORKSHIRE GROCERYMAN of limited education was selected to be chairman of a village meeting at which the chief attraction was a well-known raconteur. This word was not part of the Yorkshireman's vocabulary. However, with native ingenuity, he negotiated the difficulty; when he introduced the speaker of the evening, he said: "We are now to be favoured by Mr. So-and-so, who is a famous 'rake on tour'."

My father was one of these, but would not have recognized himself by that title; though he was an excellent storyteller. One story that I have not forgotten he told doubtless with a view to warning and advice when I announced my intention to marry.

A young man, the only son of the family, who had been rather spoiled, got married to the girl of his choice. She found married felicity marred somewhat because her spouse did not keep in mind the admonition "to leave his father and mother and cleave unto his wife." Too often he would contrast his wife's way of doing things with his mother's. This got to be very irksome to the young lady, as can well be imagined. One Sunday morning after breakfast, the young man dressed himself in his Sunday clothes. Feeling pleased with the situation in general, himself in particular, he strolled into the scullery, or little kitchen, where his wife was mixing the batter for the customary Yorkshire pudding, which was the accompaniment to the weekly Sunday dinner. The beef was sizzling in the oven, the vegetables were boiling, and everything was apparently going along satisfactorily. Superciliously, our hero inquired what his wife was doing so energetically. Meekly she told him she was making a pudding. Then came the regulation criticism:

"Well, I never saw my mother make a pudding like that."

The exasperated young woman lifted up the basin of golden batter and crowned her critic a la Clifton Webb in the picture, "The Baby Sitter," and asked, "Did thi mother iver mak a pudding like that!"

YOU MAY BE SURE that whatever indiscretion I have been guilty of in my matrimonial career, I have kept out of the kitchen during the preparation of this favorite food of mine.

This succulent dish is definitely English, and one for which there is no substitute. I have been introduced, however, to some nondescript ersatz concoctions with the label but not the substance of Yorkshire pudding—brazen imitations of the genuine article, and a grievous imposition on the appetite of the connoisseur. With becoming humility, I have requested the Queen of the Kitchen for the recipe and the directions for the production of this delectable savory.

While not an epicure—preferring plain, wholesome food—I know of no menu so satisfying as roast beef, such vegetables as Brussel sprouts or cauliflower, Yorkshire pudding with a generous supply of rich brown gravy, and a dessert of deep dish apple pie or red currants. What could be finer?

THIS BRINGS TO MIND the plainest meal I have enjoyed. In the early days of my ministry in Scotland, on one occasion in company with the late Thomas Taylor who was visiting us at the time, we set out to search for a man who lived on the outskirts of Edinburgh and was reported to be a member of the church. After reaching the city by train, we walked several miles from the end of a street car track out to Preston Pans. We had not eaten since leaving our home in Hamilton early that morning, and as it grew to be late afternoon, we began to feel very hungry. In the distance, we spied a shop and hoped to be able to buy food. On reaching the place, we were told they did not serve refreshments, but they had bread and cheese and Spanish onions. We purchased a loaf of bread, some cheese and onions. Walking down the country road we sat by the roadside and sans knife and fork, sans plates and serviettes, we ate heartily of this plain fare. It was one of the best meals I have had, the memory of which lingers to this day.

Toward evening we found our friends. Mr. Adam Dudgeon was not a member of the church, but proved to be a real friend. He entertained us with wholesome Scottish scones and rich butter, jam, cakes, and tea. Then after a pleasant and instructive conversation, he kindly gave us shelter for the night. He belonged to that company of whom the Master said, "They shall enter the kingdom prepared for such."

WELL, here is the recipe for Yorkshire Pudding:

2 cups of sifted flour
1½ cups of sweet milk
2 eggs
1 teaspoonful of salt

Break the eggs into the flour and beat well, gradually adding the milk. Beat thoroughly until quite smooth and the mixture has the consistency of thick cream.

Pour the whole into a pan with hot beef drippings or Crisco and put into an oven heated to 400°. Cook for forty-five minutes. Do not use baking powder.

This will serve six persons. Cut into squares and serve with thick beef gravy.

Your Redemption Draweth Nigh

righteousness of God is a by-product of our religion, for when men and women harmonize their way of life with the Divine, then as night follows day equality of opportunity and real brotherhood must of necessity follow. It couldn't be otherwise. Redemption means more to me than preservation in this life alone.

I'm sure that some of you are expecting another depression. Others are anticipating another war. I don't want to make you feel uncomfortable, but if you believe the Word of God, how can you hold otherwise? What promise do you have in the Sacred Record that we have fought our last war? Latter-day revelation says just the contrary—that peace has been taken from the earth, and there will be no peace until Jesus Christ returns. I'm not finding fault with the efforts of other good men and women. Some of them put us to shame by their devotion in their attempt to do something for their fellow men. I'm not finding fault with the United Nations. I'm not finding fault with any effort that is being made today to preserve the peace. But I cannot believe that peace will be realized until nations learn to walk in the path of righteousness and seek the welfare of every other nation. We haven't reached that stage yet.

WILL A DEPRESSION HELP?

Regarding another depression, men of authority indicate we're headed in that direction. But again, we have prophecy—we have latter-day prophecy that gives us to understand the time will come among the wicked when every man will take up his sword against his neighbor. That's not the Russians in a sense in which you have interpreted neighbors. That's not the Japanese; we are trying to cultivate them as our neighbors right now. The time will come "among the wicked, that every man that will not take up his sword against his neighbor, must needs flee unto Zion for safety."—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 13. If this doesn't suggest industrial warfare, I don't know the answer.

Now these days are before us, but in spite of this, God has said, "Your redemption draweth nigh." A depression should not hold up redemption. In fact, I believe it's going to take another depression to help speed our redemption. Apostle Oakman has informed us that during the time of the blitz in England, or the battle of Britain, more people attended church than before or since. Now, that is true not only of the Britishers—I know something of how we behave in America! I've been through a few crises in this country. I know what happened in California during the earthquake: more people prayed in Long Beach that night over the earthquake than have prayed before or since. But, of course, the Lord can't keep shaking the earth in order to keep people praying. We're just human enough—even the best of us are—that we have to see the necessity for our redemption before we do very much about it. Sometimes we have to see that the arm of flesh has failed before we're willing to trust the divine arm.

A depression or another world war cannot rob any of us of our redemption. It does not depend upon these catastrophies that sweep the earth. Sometimes we think we have to go out of business when the world gets upset. I'm still repenting—and I hope some others are repenting—of our releasing those missionaries at a time when we should have sent out more missionaries and trusted in the power of God. We're paying the price today in our lack of man power. They were men of maturity and wisdom. You can't give a man maturity, wisdom, or experience by putting your hands upon his head. It takes years to do that, and the need of such men is felt in the appointee ranks today. I'm grateful for the young men with whom I associated last night. I'm grateful for the promise the future holds, but we're still paying the price for past mistakes.

President Edwards called my attention to the fact that a number of years ago, while the church was threatened with bankruptcy so far as material substance is concerned, it's more terrible to have a bankruptcy of leadership. He was a true prophet when he said that.

KEEP THE COVENANTS

The council of God is given to us in this thirty-fourth section, and I'm going to conclude with it. It mentions the conditions that govern our redemption. No man can keep this from us. We can keep it from ourselves, but no one else can rob us of it. Please notice these conditions as I read them: "Keep all the commandments and covenants." Is it necessary for me to say this to a congregation of Latter Day Saints? I remember when I was a Methodist—and I was a pretty good Methodist—the argument that the Latter Day Saints used in those days was, "Brother Gleazer, you've done well as far as you've gone, but you've got to go further. We're not asking you to leave any truth behind; we're asking you to take it with you and accept additional truth." I wonder to what extent we Latter Day Saints are setting an example for other people who are not of our faith. To what extent are we keeping all the commandments of God? There is no promise unless we keep all the commandments by which we are bound. If we do that, here's the promise: "I will cause the heavens to shake for your good."

NEED OF THE MIRACULOUS

I will agree with some of you that we need more of an outward manifestation of the powers of God. Regardless of what others may think, regardless of how modern we may become, the Scriptures testify that whenever God wanted to attract the people in the days that were past, miraculous means were required. Sometimes I think we're going to require another occasion where a man will go upon a mountain at the command of God, even like Elijah, and there give a demonstration that the people shall cry out again, "The Lord, he is God! The Lord, he is God!" The one mountain that would accomplish that is this mountain of right living, where our people could be established in a righteous community where people will be compelled to look and say, "The Lord, he is God," by virtue of that which transpired in such a community. Men must be turned aside by the miraculous, and there's still a place in this church—at least I believe there's still a place in this church for the miraculous.

"I will cause the heavens to shake for your good." Now that's not to entertain us but for our good. "Satan shall tremble, and Zion shall rejoice upon the hills, and flourish and Israel shall be saved in my own due time. And by the keys which I have given shall they be led and no more be confounded at all. Lift up your hearts and be glad" (Doctrine and Covenants 34: 6). Can you do that today? Can you lift up your hearts and be glad? Not because of the suffering of your fellow citizens, or because of the suffering in the midst of the nations, but I think we can lift up our hearts and be glad that in these last days God hasn't forsaken his people—that he's still attempting to gather together those who will hearken to his council, and walk in his way. I can lift up my heart and rejoice because of the evidence we have had in our ministry and in the ministry of others and in the lives of good men and good women that God is at work today.

"Lift up your hearts and be glad, your redemption draweth nigh. Fear not, little flock, for the kingdom is yours until I come." I'm sure that before this conference draws to a close you'll have additional evidence that God is still concerned in the welfare of his people. This is the church which he established and brought forth in the latter days. This is the hope of the world; and the same God who revealed himself to the young prophet is capable of revealing himself to men and women today. As soon as we have a disposition within our souls to work with him, then every power we lack shall be made available. We have no exclusive claim on God. We have no claim on the powers of heaven unless we're fully committed to bring to pass his righteous purposes on the earth. Knowing as I do that there are many in this organization and others who have not yet heard the voice of God in this restored evangel and knowing that these honest people will accept the truth, I'm committed to the truthfulness of the statement I've used for our text. Your redemption draweth nigh!

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI. — Bishop Harold W. Cackler reports that the second six-weeks' series of the Independence Aaronic Priesthood School ended March 1. The twelve-hour unit of study just completed was on "The Church and the Home Working Together." The school has been organized and is carried on through quorum organization and the leadership of the various quorum presidents continues to be a large factor in the success of this educational program. Instructors for the course just completed were Dan Sorden, C. B. Hartshorn, F. M. McDowell, Victor Talcott, and Charles Graham. F. M. McDowell, Supervisor of Priesthood Education, served as teaching director of the school.

Including the dates February 10 and March 15, a Pre-ordination Training Class composed of seventeen men from several of the congregations of Independence is meeting for twenty-four sessions. Each meeting is an hour and a half long. The classes meet every night except Saturday and Sunday during the period. An examination, attempting to obtain the candidate's own testimony, is given at the conclusion and the climax of the event is a Communion service for the men and their wives. The course is an indoctrination course in such matters as basic beliefs of the church, the financial law, misdemeanors, court procedure, missionary work, ministry to the sick, marriage and the home, and techniques of visiting and directing sacraments, ordinances, and services.

All the women of Independence, including the church women of the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church, joined Friday, March 4, in a service at the Stone Church. The day is known throughout the nation as the World Day of Prayer. This is the first time the Latter Day Saint women have acted as hostesses in this inter-denominational event.

During the week of March 6 to 11, a Church School Workers Institute will be held for the city-wide teachers and leaders. Cecil C. Talcott, city-wide church school supervisor, announced that on Sunday evening, March 6, there would be an address by Supervisor Charles V. Graham, "Are We Prepared to Serve?" On the evenings of Monday through Friday, there will be individual class instruction in all departments of the church school from kindergarten through adult. Two adult classes will be presented: "What are the Objectives for Adult Education in Zion?" and a special class for pastors, church school directors, and supervisors. On Friday, March 11, a dedication service will be held in the main auditorium of the Stone Church.

Charles V. Graham, pastoral supervisor in Independence, announces that Mrs. Katherine Wilson of the College Street area has been appointed to and has accepted the position of city-wide women's leader to fill out the year left vacant by the recent death of Blanche Green.

Once each month a Pastoral Training School is held at Englewood Church for all pastors, assistant pastors, and those interested in pastoral work from Independence, Central Missouri Stake, and Kansas City Stake. On March 8, Bishop Henry L. Livingston instructed the gathering upon the subject of general church finances and the role of the pastor in this work. He gave instruction to the group in fund-raising. The average attendance at these classes is 100-175 men, some of whom drive over fifty miles to come.

A large map of the city of Independence lies on the desk of Supervisor Charles V. Graham. The map, which will hang on his wall when finished measures four feet six inches by six feet six inches. The pastoral supervisor of the City of Zion is renumbering the districts of the fourteen congregations in the center place. The area of each congregation is broken in smaller districts which have the pastoral leadership of local elders. Stone Church, though its territory is small in area, has about twenty-two districts. Other smaller congregations, though drawing members from a large geographic area, some of them figuring in square miles, may have as few as two districts. The city of Zion supervision extends to the Little Blue River on the east, to old Highway 40 on the south, to the Kansas City city limits on the west, and to the Missouri River on the north.

Thirteen one-act plays were given in the Stone Church Little Theater on four nights, February 28, March 1, 3, and 4, by the Independence Zion's Leagues. It was the eighteenth annual Drama Festival. The thirteen casts included ninety young people who demonstrated their dramatic abilities through the medium of Bible, Folk, and Modern plays. The judges were Dr. T. B. Homan, Miss Evelyn Burgess, and Miss Corrine Martin. Five "A" ratings were awarded: Englewood, Enoch Hill, Slover Park, Stone Church Senior League, and Walnut Park. "B" ratings were earned by three contestants: Liberty Street, South Chrysler, and Stone Church Teen-age Leagues. "C" ratings were awarded to Eden Heights, Guggell Park, Second Church, Spring Branch, and Sugar Creek. Ratings were given on the basis of the average of points awarded by the three judges. Those with ninety to 100 received an "A"; eighty to ninety, "B"; seventy to eighty, "C" ratings.

COLUMBUS, OHIO.—At the Southern Ohio District youth conference held February 12 and 13, John Darling of the Department of Religions Education reports that the young people did an interesting piece of work. At the 10 o'clock hour Sunday morning, the young people formed into four commissions. Each commission took some part in planning the 11 o'clock worship hour, even to the training and rehearsing of a choir by one group. At 11 o'clock, aside from the sermon preached by Russell Rockwell, the entire service was planned and presented by the young people.

ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI.—Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Sr., and Dr. F. M. McDowell were in St. Joseph on March 5 and 6 to attend the banquet culminating the Far West Stake Priesthood Institutes on Saturday and the Far West Stake conference on Sunday. There were 145 priesthood men and their wives at the banquet which was held at the Y. M. C. A. building. Two priesthood institutes had been held, one in Cameron and one in St. Joseph under the leadership of Melvin Russell and Bishop Earl T. Higdon. Dr. McDowell addressed the gathering at the banquet on the subject, "The Ministry of the Shepherd," and Apostle Gleazer gave the address, "The Minister's Wife."

On Sunday morning in the First Church at St. Joseph, Dr. McDowell preached in the main auditorium, "What This Church Has to Offer." About fifty people had to be turned away from the service for lack of room. At 11 a.m., Apostle Gleazer gave the communion address and ordained Arnold Adams to the office of high priest. Brother Adams is the pastor of Guilford, Missouri, Branch. At the conference business session in the afternoon the church was filled to capacity with several standing. Approximately twelve men were approved for ordination, all of whom are successful professional and businessmen. At this service, Apostle Gleazer and Stake President Emery Jennings set apart Arnold Adams as a member of the stake high council. Apostle Gleazer reports that he was impressed with the spirit of unity which prevails in the stake and also was impressed with the bishop's report and the number of those filing inventories and paying tithing.

MIDLAND, MICHIGAN.—Midland was host to a Priesthood Institute, February 11, 12, and 13. An average of sixty men from the Central and South Central Michigan Districts were in attendance at the three-day meeting. President F. Henry Edwards, Bishop H. L. Livingston, and Apostle Arthur A. Oakman constituted the teaching and preaching ministry. A banquet on February 11 featuring as speakers the three representatives of the three leading quorums of the church opened the institute. The Midland women, under the direction of Marian Asch and Margaret Kaweck, served the banquet dinner. The theme, "The Christian Ministry," was developed throughout all sessions. Classes were held on Saturday afternoon and evening followed by a prayer service in charge of Apostle Oakman and a sermon delivered by President Edwards on Sunday morning. A discussion and dedication period on Sunday afternoon concluded a well-attended and most helpful Priesthood Institute.

The sacrament of blessing babies was observed at the Sunday morning worship service on February 20 when thirteen babies were blessed. Pastor John W. Banks and Elders Chester R. Bartlett, Lewis Grice, Grant Yarrington, and Manual Ward officiated in the sacrament. The babies were Timothy Dale Parkinson, Joan May Blasdell, David John Long, Richard Armond March, Kathleen Ann Bonham, Cheryl Lynn Asch, Rebecca Lynn Sweetman, Hugh Wayne Lewis, Janet Sue Bonter, Bruce James Postma, Lawrence Mikal McMillan, Linda Kay Pearson, and Bruce Quinlin Pinney. The junior choir, under the direction of Dorothy Burke, sang the anthem, and Onalee Nevill and Karen Burke sang a duet. The pianist was Elsie Yarrington and Claude Ludy offered the invocation and benediction.

LAMONI, IOWA, BLOOMINGTON CONGREGATION.—Lynn Weldon, the eighteen-year-old son of Roy Weldon, well-known student of Book of Mormon archaeology, is following in the footsteps of his father. As a member of the Home Missions Club of Graceland College, he presented four slide-illustrated lectures in the Bloomington Congregation on the evenings of February 6, 7, 8, and 9. The attendance averaged between sixty and eighty, on the closing night, completely filling the small rural church. The Kodachrome picture slides were from the Weldon Kodachrome Library, and the Kodachrome script slides were the work of Stele Bryant. The lectures were derived from the series of articles printed in the Herald, in 1948, written by Roy Weldon, "Other Sheep I Have." The four lecture titles were

"Christ in Ancient America," "A Sacred Book," "Joseph's Land—The Flock That Was Led to America," and "The Book of Mormon Proves Joseph Smith a Prophet."

Members of the Home Missions Club attended the meetings to preside and provide special musical selections.

OMAHA, NEBRASKA. — Pastor Charles Neff writes encouraging reports of growth in the branch. The Wednesday evening prayer services have been built from an average attendance of seven or fifteen members to an average of thirty-five or forty. Contributing causes of this increase are the use of worship centers, an a cappella mixed quartet singing about fifteen minutes before the service begins while the people gather, and to a thoroughly prepared theme. The Zion's League has grown from practically nothing to an active group of twenty-five or thirty. They have an early morning prayer service the last Sunday of the month in a member's home. After the 7:30 meeting, the host serves breakfast. The young people are regularly supporting the Wednesday night prayer services.

GRACELAND COLLEGE. — Jack Ross, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Henry Inouye, of Independence, Missouri, have been elected to membership on the Student Publications Board replacing two sophomore members whose terms expired at the semester. A recommendation has been made that the board be expanded to include the station manager and business manager of the Graceland Campus Station KGRA and the name changed to Student Communications Board.

A month-long series of church services dedicated to the church and the arts began the evening of March 2 with the fellowship service. The theme was, "I've Seen the Artistry of God," and was conducted by Roy Cheville. "The Beauty of Holiness" was the topic of the general service on Sunday morning, March 6. The speaker was again Dr. Cheville.

The Graceland Yellow Jackets fell to a Mason City team in the quarter-finals of the Iowa State Junior College Basketball tournament after beating the Burlington Blackhaws. The Mason City-Graceland score was 70-58.

STONE CHURCH. — February 13 was Boy Scout Sunday, and the speaker at the Stone Church morning services was Sidney North, national secretary of Alpha Phi Omega, Scouting fraternity for college and university men. Mr. North is associated with the Delano School for Crippled Children in Kansas City, Missouri. Boy Scouts and cubs were in uniform attending the services.

Evangelist John R. Grice spoke to the Fellowship Class Friday, February 11, and to the Stone Church congregation Sunday evening, February 13. He is in Independence while his wife, Verna, is receiving medical treatment. Brother Grice is working in the Ontario, Northern Michigan, Ohio, West Virginia, and Pittsburgh Districts.

The Senior League brought interest in Church Zion's League brought interest in the Stone Church building project to the fore on Friday night, February 25, by holding a chili supper and taking a free-will offering instead of charging a set fee. Four hundred dollars was added to the fund which will go to the building of an educational building for all manner of classes and recreational activities.

PLEASANT VALLEY BRANCH, OHIO.—Elder T. R. Beatty of Limrick, Ohio, presented a series of missionary sermons from February 19 to 27. There were six baptisms as a result. Attendance averaged 150 to 200 each night. Church school attendance has almost doubled.

OCEAN SPRINGS, MISSISSIPPI.—The Book of Mormon class meets on Tuesday nights at different homes. This is supposed to be the adult class, but the large attendance has attracted the Zion's Leaguers and it is being turned into a Branch Study Night. Group singing and light refreshments follow the study period.

LAMONI STAKE STATISTICS.—At the beginning of the year 1948, there were 2,393 members in Lamoni Stake. During the year there were ninety-three gains by baptism and sixty-six transfers in. There were thirty-one deaths and 126 transfers out, making the total enrollment at the end of the year 2,394. In 1948, approximately 60 per cent of the Stake ministry filed tithing statements.

MIAMI, FLORIDA.—Evangelist and Mrs. E. R. Carter of Lansing, Michigan, were in the Miami Branch during the first two weeks of January. He gave a number of patriarchal blessings and delivered several sermons. His assistance in the communion service and prayer services was also appreciated by the congregation.

EVANGELIST CONDUCTS SERVICES.—Evangelist Ray Whiting began a series of services at the Pontiac Mission in Illinois on Sunday, March 6, in their new church home near Forrest, Illinois. Before that time he conducted services at the Plano Branch, Mission Branch, and Aurora Branch.

EDITOR'S NOTE: The following letters were written for a young people's contest sponsored by the Arkansas-Louisiana District. The first, by Miss Innette Fuller, was selected as the best by District President T. B. Sharp and his counselors. The other three were also submitted for publication.

What Reunion Meant to Me

To me, the Arkansas-Louisiana Reunion meant "new birth." For the first time in my life, I saw how much even I was needed in God's work here on earth. As an isolated member, I experienced my first opportunity to make friends with people of my own faith. With them, I received the desire to spend the remainder of my life in service to God. As I listened to this wonderful gospel being preached with power, I received a better understanding than I had ever had before. When I returned home, I had but one desire—to live for God and his church so that others might find the way of the true gospel through me.

My heart goes out with love and gratitude to the people in this district who are my brothers and sisters. It is my sincere hope that all who attended the reunion received the spiritual blessing which I did. Gatherings like this bind God's people together and give them faith to carry his message to the four corners of the earth.

INNETTE FULLER.

405 West Eighth Avenue
Crossett, Arkansas

This was the first reunion I ever attended. I didn't belong to the church, and I had never attended many services. At reunion, I discovered that Latter Day Saints were the nicest people I had ever met. The way they took part in everything and were so cheerful made me happy. I enjoyed the sermons and prayer meetings every morning, and the young people's class was wonderful. This reunion drew me close to the church, and it taught me to call on God whenever I needed help. Many times at night after I had gone to bed, I would lie thinking for a while and then get on my knees beside my bed and call on God.

I didn't just forget about reunion after I got home. A series of meetings was held two weeks later at our church, and at the close of these meetings, I was baptized. It was a happy day for me, especially when my father decided to be baptized, too.

You can see how much the reunion meant to me.

JACKYE POLLARD.

Avery, Texas

I left reunion with new hope and a heart filled with the Spirit of God. I think all who attended must have gone home looking forward to a new and richer life. The inspiration I received at the early morning prayer services will always remain with me. The classes conducted by Dr. Roy Cheville meant much to me. I still find myself humming such songs as, "If You Have Any Good Peanuts" and "As a Band of Brothers Joined." I enjoyed the fellowship of other young people, and I was proud to see that they were wanting to live so that Zion could be established. Everyone seemed to want to carry out the theme of the reunion, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God."

My prayer is that I shall again be able to attend the reunion next year.

EMA FRANCES SANDERS.

Bonnerdale Route
Hot Springs, Arkansas

It's very hard to put in words what reunion did for me. Those five days were the most wonderful I have ever experienced. I felt that I wanted to do more toward redeeming Zion, and I was ashamed of the little I had done in the past. I also had the opportunity of watching my husband receive new light on the gospel. He was not a member of the church when we married. I saw him listening to the sermons and class discussions and gaining a fuller understanding of the work.

I counted it a privilege to meet such leaders as Dr. Cheville and Patriarch J. F. Curtis. The patriarchal blessing I received has been very helpful to me. The thing which meant most, however, was knowing how it would be to live on this earth as true brothers and sisters. I didn't know it was possible for people to get along so harmoniously. Reunion made me want to live so that I would be worthy to "gather to Zion" and be with the Saints. I want to do my share in helping to establish the kingdom so that men may dwell in peace and equality.

From an Isolated Member

I am isolated for the first time in twenty-five years. Without the Herald, I would be lost. As I read the article by V. D. Ruch in the February 12 issue, I was reminded of the time when my family moved from Richmond, Missouri, to Marceline, where there was no church. My mother wrote to headquarters and asked that a missionary be sent to Marceline to conduct services. She received word that Brother Ruch would be with us for two weeks before he sailed for Norway. I was delegated to meet him at the station, but since I had never seen him, I was afraid I wouldn't recognize him. I kept praying, "Help me to know him," over and over again. It seemed there was no end to the travelers who got off at our depot that day, but when he appeared, I recognized him immediately and walked up to shake hands with him. "If we so live, our light will shine."

I hope to live so that my light will shine in this community and help to bring the people here to accept the gospel message. Several I have talked to have never heard of our church. If there are Saints living near or passing through Cape Girardeau, we invite them to visit us. We shall appreciate being remembered in prayer.

Notes of Thanks

(From a letter to the editor.)

Thank you for your letter, the kind words and good wishes on my eightieth birthday. I thank the good Father, for he has been kind to me and given me a strong, healthy body, a good wife, lots of friends, and the gospel. We will be married fifty-seven years this September 13. I pray that God will spare me still to take care of my companion the rest of the journey and permit me to help a little.

Letter From Roy Weldon

Francis Anderson, assistant pastor at Holden, Missouri, and I are en route on an extensive trip into ten or more Latin American republics. Our purpose is to visit, study, and photograph in color film slides numerous Book of Mormon archaeological sites hitherto never visited by any of our people. Our most important work will be in Peru, Bolivia, Ecuador, and Colombia.

In addition, we are seeking to make a survey and gather information regarding leading South American Indian tribes which may be useful at some future time when the church gets ready to open up missionary work in Latin America.

In view of the vastness of both of these fields and the limited time and money at our disposal, it is highly essential that we make wise choices in the sites and tribes to visit. To this end, we are very much in need of divine guidance and blessing. There are many people in the church interested in these two fields who would, I am sure, be glad to remember us in their daily devotions if they knew of our need. We will appreciate anything that can be done for us along this line.

Strengthening Family Values

hardy pink flowering daphne—somer-set, at one side. At the other side of the juniper, we will plant the mugho pine.

At the opposite side of the entrance before the vossi, we will shorten the enclosure line, using another of the same variety of juniper, decorated on alternate sides with the very dwarfed red-leaved maple—acer palmatum, and an Oregon holly grape—mabonia aquifolium. All who have the holly grape will tell you that it is evergreen the entire year except for an interval at the close of winter when there is a switch over to a new costuming of leaves that presents it in varying stages of the old and the new for about three weeks. During the summer, it is very interesting with clusters of dark frosty-blue berries. And, of course, its glossy leaves at Christmas time make it of gift decor value.

For further structure, where it is especially useful, we will plant a group of three junipers: one glauca (silver), and two chiensis (silver-green) which are much shorter growing, all at the back of the nook between the vossi and the hawthorne trees.

SINCE OUR WALK is Zionward, and Zion is the beautiful, perfected, our cultivation of the beauty-stride in life will mean more garden time in the daily or weekly schedule to integrate these shrubs and trees by exterior decorating. To achieve it, we will mass spring bulbs and iris, perennials and annuals arranged as to ultimate height, color and blooming periods. Thus our outdoor living has a landscaped basis for all of that for which we have been working, with beauty as our hostess. It isn't difficult, is it? While we are doing this work, let us remember the larger work for which this was only the incentive—a stronger, better quality family life!

Picked From the Periodicals

By Aarona Booker Kohlman

Articles from February magazines which we consider of particular interest to women of the church are listed below. If you do not have all these magazines in your home, perhaps you can trade with friends.

"Should Your Wife Be Fired?" American Magazine, will start you thinking about ways to save time in household tasks, leaving more time for other pursuits.

"Why Don't You Extend the Life of Good Fabrics?" Family Circle Magazine, gives you ideas that will save money and enable you to utilize outmoded clothing.

"Character Begins at Home," Parents Magazine, is excellent for all parents whose children are yet in the formative years. This could be used as the basis for a group discussion.

"New Ways in Baby Care," Parents Magazine, will be of special interest to anyone who has, or expects to have, the care of a baby. It will also be gratifying to older women, who will wonder, perhaps, why the word new is used!

"Are You Minding Your Husband's Business?" McCall's Magazine, is sound reading for all wives and wives-to-be. Wives of priesthood members may make their own application of the principles.

"Good Meals and Thrifty," Good Housekeeping Magazine, is addressed particularly to working married couples, or pairs of career women. The recipes could be increased for larger families.

"Releasing the Romance of Marriage," Woman's Home Companion, is good reading for all wives. (Incidentally, the "Companion Marriage Clinic" is a monthly feature worth watching for.)

"Something Nice From Charley"

By Marie Gosline

MANY TIMES we are forced to associate with those of whom we do not approve. Because of circumstances over which we have no control, we cannot always choose each one of our friends. But we can remember to be a "child of the King" ourselves and not judge too harshly the other fellow. We must remember he has not had the same training we have had. He may not have had the opportunity of learning of a better life. Above all, he, perhaps, does not believe in the same God we do; consequently, his whole viewpoint of life is different from ours.

The other night we were in a suite in one of the larger hotels of San Francisco.

All the guests as well as the hosts were business associates of my husband's. While waiting until time to go downstairs to dinner, I thought to myself, "Why do I always have to be with this sort? I don't drink, and I don't smoke. If I never saw any of these again, I'd be just as happy." How foolish I was! Somewhere I had heard something about God's looking on the heart, but I had completely forgotten it. Just as I was thinking, "I don't know why we always have to go to these affairs," the thought came to me, "Put in a 'plug' for your German girl."

For sometime I have been corresponding with a member of our church in Germany. This girl and her father have a doll factory in Augsburg. She needs material for her dolls, which I sent her along with some food. Casually I remarked that if anyone wanted to donate a can of vegetables or some old clothing, I was ready to accept all donations. With that, the money started rolling in!

In a very few minutes, my evening bag was full of paper bills, and here was someone else at my elbow. It was Charley—the worst "sinner" of them all and the one I would certainly not have picked to be stranded with on a desert island. When no one was looking, he slipped a ten dollar bill in my hand and said, "Marie, this is for your little German girl. Send her something real nice from Charley."

That night when I went to bed and started to say my prayers, the only prayer I could think of was, "Thanks and forgive me. Give me an understanding heart, O Lord."

Distinctive Beliefs of the Restoration

By CARL MESLE

AUTHOR'S NOTE: In preparing materials for the use in the Zion's Leagues of Independence to carry out the current church-wide missionary project, I became convinced of two things: first, that our young people are not as well informed on the basic beliefs of the church as we assume, and second, that they are more interested in exploring the doctrine of the restoration than we may guess. I therefore began compiling a list of our distinctive beliefs together with a collection of tracts and other references in which young people might readily find introductory material. About this time, I was asked to prepare a series of short radio talks. In one of these, I resolved to try summarizing our distinctive beliefs very much as I had presented them to some of our young people's groups. The result follows. It is necessarily short and incomplete but does represent an outline of our message in everyday language.

ONE BEAUTIFUL SUNDAY MORNING before the last war, I was greeted by a woman as I walked to church in one of our large eastern cities. She was attracted by the Bible in my hand, because she too was carrying one. I soon learned she was waiting for a bus to take her to her own church services. Seeking to be friendly with another church-goer, she detained me for a moment with comments about her church. As her bus approached, she asked, "And which church do you attend?" I told her that I was going to the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Her reaction was startling. She threw up her hands as if in horror and said, "Heaven forbid. They don't even believe in Jesus Christ." Before I could assure her that we do, the bus had whisked her away.

WHEN A CHURCH, which, in the short span of a century has contributed so much to the religious thought and conviction generally accepted today can be so badly misrepresented by well-meaning persons, it would seem to be worth taking time to restate our particular basic beliefs in the hope that people generally will come to understand that the doctrine and practices of this church are not a conglomeration of mysterious nonsense but are logical and complete in the message and inspiration which they offer to those interested in a fuller and richer way of life.

Such an assignment properly belongs to an experienced theologian, but having recently had the privilege of discussing our basic doctrine with a number of young people's groups, I am encouraged to try to outline in terms which young people prefer some of our fundamental doctrines in the hope that, stripped of much of their theological verbiage, they may stand as clear cut.

Of course we believe in Jesus Christ and in his teachings—probably to a far greater extent than the average professed Christian. We hold many beliefs in common with other Christian denominations. We accept the Bible, and, in most respects, do so more literally than other churches. We anticipated by a century the general agreement that the Bible contains errors in translation and have our own Inspired Version to refer to when meanings in the King James version are clouded. We share in many of the common beliefs regarding salvation, life after death, the Godhead, and in such Christian ordinances as baptism, Communion, and marriage. But we have our distinctive beliefs too.

"Heaven forbid," she said, "they don't even believe in Jesus Christ!"

WE DO BELIEVE IN GOD, but we believe in a God who, being unchangeable, is just as willing to speak to man today as he was in ages past. We do not accept the theory that God spoke to only one age, put it in a book, closed the book, and forever closed the door to any opportunity for man to receive divine direction applicable to his problems in modern days. To an increasing degree, individuals and churches are accepting the thought advanced by Joseph Smith a century ago that whenever man places himself in harmony with God's will, he can be divinely guided, even to the point of being directly spoken to. We believe that God can and does speak to whomever he will, but we go further and maintain that God has established a means of revealing his will to the body of the church, and that he has established an office through which he speaks. We recognize the president of the church as the prophet through whom God reveals himself. We believe in the open canon of Scripture and have the Doctrine and Covenants in which is recorded his word as revealed to men today.

We are not the only church that holds to the doctrine of divine guidance, but we do have in our organic set-up a provision which acts as a check for any prophet who might attempt to represent his own mind as being the will of God. As early as 1830, we were admonished that all things were to be done by common consent. Whenever a revelation is given to the church through the prophet, in a very democratic procedure the church members and their representatives in General Conference vote either to accept or to reject the revelation as a part of the law of the church. The guiding rule which is followed is rather simple—that is to judge the new revelation in the light of its consistency with the fundamental doctrines of the church as previously revealed in Scripture. This unusual form of church government we call a theocratic democracy.

IT IS OUR BELIEF that the authority given to the early church to represent God on earth was lost in the apostasy of the Dark Ages and that, in the restoration of his church in the latter days, it has been returned to earth. The agents of that authority are the restored Aaronic and Melchisedec priesthood, functioning in the same kind of organization that Christ established in the early church—that is, apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers, elders, seventies, and all other officers provided for in the Scriptures. We accept and teach the first principles of the gospel as outlined in the sixth chapter of Hebrews—faith in God and Christ, repentance, baptism for the remission of sins, the laying on of hands for the spiritual baptism which Christ promised, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment.

The Book of Mark tells us that the spiritual gifts will follow those who believe. Paul has listed the spiritual gifts in this order: wisdom, knowledge, faith and discernment; then other gifts which modern man is apt to look at with skepticism—healings, miracles, tongues, the interpretation of tongues, and prophecy. When a young missionary in the South Sea Islands, struggling to deliver his sermon in a new and still strange language, finds himself suddenly speaking the native tongue with an ease and a power equal to the rush of thoughts which beat upon his mind, can we say that the gift of tongues is lost? There is abundant proof that these gifts are in evidence today wherever faith is exercised. Again, we do not limit God as to where these gifts may be demonstrated, but we do testify that they have been demonstrated in us, and that we have every reason to believe they will continue to be exercised by the ministry of our church.

THE BOOK OF MORMON, conflicting reports of which have brought confusion to the minds of many people, we hold to be an added testimony of the divinity of Christ and of his existence and work here on earth, particularly in the new world. Our belief in it detracts nothing from our acceptance of the Biblical history and teachings of God's relation to man in the old world, rather it confirms the testimony of the Bible. All three of our standard books—the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants—to our way of interpretation, condemn polygamy which has never been accepted by our church. Under our governmental setup, the conference assembly would reject any document advocating polygamy as inconsistent with the over-all plan of Divinity as revealed in the Scriptures.

In harmony with the provision of laws for our spiritual development, we accept the "Word of Wisdom" given in 1833 as a guide to sound, physical health. The value of the simple warnings which it contained have since been borne out by medical science. Such cautions as the avoidance of tobacco, intoxicants, and adulterated foods along with the finer points of retiring early, avoiding the habitual use of milder stimulants, and temperance in eating certain foods are among the ABC's of good health practices today, even though they are ignored by many.

WE BELIEVE men will be punished or rewarded for their own acts rather than for something Adam did, and that through the sacrifice and resurrection of Christ, men were set free to earn eternal salvation by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel. We believe in a life after death which gives every opportunity to men who have erred to redeem themselves. But we are more concerned with what a man does in this life and in the contribution he makes to society here on earth than we are simply in what might happen to him in the hereafter.

We hold that every man, born to earth, is a steward, responsible to God for the use of both the material and spiritual gifts which may be placed in his care. We believe that we are accountable here for the profitable use of our time and energies and for the wise use of our abilities and talents as well as our financial means. This we call the law of stewardship.

Where many churches now accept the principle of stewardship in general terms, our doctrine offers a social program to implement individual stewardships into a godly society—Zion—wherein man shall practice his religion to the point that the common scourges which now haunt him on every side will be largely eliminated, and he will be free to earn and enjoy the fruits of a godly life here on earth. It is an idealistic goal. No one of us would claim that it will be easy to attain, but as we view the progress of mankind in education, medicine, sociology, economics, government, and other fields of human endeavor—in many of which our own members are taking leading parts—we believe we see God's hand moving through human instruments to bring about his eternal purposes.

He then went into business for himself which was known as the Watkins Music Company. In 1913, he purchased the Watkins Hotel building, continuing his music store and also operating a drug store. * HELP, PLEASE!

Every morning, just before my favorite news broadcast, there is a radio cowboy who has a terrible homesickness to get back to another state. Every morning his terrific nostalgia nearly reduces him to tears, and me, too. Every morning he wants to go home, and I wish he would go. But he never does. They just keep him here, singing for peanuts and bubble gum, and won't let him go home. I don't know why. I'm sure the hogs and the hosses and the chickens need him more than we do. Why doesn't somebody start a collection so he can go home?

And whatever became of the radio announcer of commercials who could say "sodium-acetyl-salicylate" faster and smoother than you can say "cupcakes"?

The saddest voice in the world is that of a K. C. livestock market reporter, who is plunged deep in sorrow every morning as he announces receipt of this quantity of "sheeb," that many "hoggs," and such a number of "caddle" at the stockyards. As he contemplates the macabre march of the little "dogies" toward the slaughterhouse, he seems to feel the pangs of grief for the loss of each personal friend. Talent scouts should contact him for top comedy programs, just for contrast and relief from the parade of haw-haw boys.

* ANCIENT AND MODERN

The modern "Circuit Court" had an ancient precedent in the career of the Prophet Samuel who "went from year to year in circuit to Bethel, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh, and judged Israel in all those places" (1 Samuel 7: 16).

* QUOTE

"When we take stock of human nature, we almost wish that Noah had missed the boat."—Edward R. Murrow, radio commentator, in a broadcast statement on the cruelty and ruin of war in Europe.

* CHURCHES AND CONGREGATIONS

Sister E. M. Neff, Route 3, Mammoth Springs, Arkansas, secretary of our church at Thayer, Missouri, sends a picture of the pretty stone church at that place, which was built under the leadership of Brother Will Hayden. Older leaders have died and families have moved away, although there are good opportunities there, and the country is beautiful with a mild climate.

"Our trouble is, we want a congregation," writes Sister Neff. "Wish you could drive down to see us. I know you have all you can do, but so do I, and most every other real Latter Day Saint. . . . No elder here, and just see how many there are in your town. Come and see for yourself. . . . To see our church idle hurts me."

People are always moving, and often they lose much by it. An uncle used to say, "Three moves are as bad as a fire," and he ought to know because he moved so often. Property is left behind, knowledge of the situation and place is made useless, and valued credit ratings, taking years to establish, are abandoned. Gypsies rarely have anything. "A rolling stone gathers no moss." In some places we have people who need a church. Here we have a church that needs people. It would be fine if they could get together.

Edmund C. Briggs

EDMUND C. BRIGGS was distinguished for three great services in the work of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. These services immortalize his name in our history. His brother, Jason W. Briggs, had joined the church in 1841 and later brought Edmund his first knowledge of the gospel. Edmund was baptized in July, 1852, and was ordained an elder the same day. As a pioneer missionary, he traveled steadily through Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin, visiting scattered members of the early church and preaching whenever he could. Later missionary work took him farther west.

His first great service to the Reorganization was to accompany Samuel H. Gurley in December, 1856, bearing the letter of invitation from the Reorganized Church at Zarahemla, Wisconsin, to "Young Joseph" Smith at Nauvoo, Illinois, calling him to carry on the work of his martyred father and accept leadership of the church. In his zeal, Briggs spoke too authoritatively and almost lost the cause, but a reconciliation was effected. After Gurley departed, Briggs remained in Nauvoo, maintained friendly relations with "Young Joseph" and worked for him for a time. Joseph did not accept the call till 1860.

His second great service was to serve as an apostle from October, 1860, until April, 1902, when he was ordained a patriarch. He was one of the strong men of the church.

His third great service was, as the first representative of the Reorganization, to carry its message to the state of Utah. Arriving in Salt Lake City in August, 1863, he immediately interviewed Brigham Young and opened his campaign against that man's heresies. There he bravely met all kinds of opposition, threats, and mobbing, and persevered until he gathered a congregation of thirty-nine members. He passed away July 4, 1913, after an illness.

Introducing . . .

ARTHUR A. OAKMAN (page 5), was born in Ponder's End, England, 1905, and baptized 1915 by Bishop R. May. He came to Graceland, 1928, and immediately won acclaim as a baritone soloist. Just before sailing for America, he was ordained a priest. Two years later, he became an elder. In 1934 he was ordained a seventy; a high priest in 1936, and an apostle in 1938. In June, 1938, he returned to the British Isles, and for six and a half years was in charge of the European Mission. With his wife, Elva, and son, Channing, he lives in Independence. His present apostolic field includes Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Northern Indiana District.

GERALDINE WYATT (page 11), author of the historical novel Buffalo Gold, and the religious novel, Dawn of Peace, was born in Hope, Kansas, in 1907. She has contributed many articles to the Saints' Herald. Her husband, Roy A. Wyatt, is an attorney employed by a railroad in Kansas City. They have one daughter, Alberta, eighteen, and live in Independence, Missouri.

FRANKLYN S. WEDDLE (page 12), Director of Music and Radio, was born in Bantry, North Dakota, in 1905. He received the Special Gold Seal Award for Outstanding Contribution in Music upon his graduation from Graceland in 1928. He received his Bachelor of Music degree from University of Iowa, and Master of Music degree from University of Michigan. Postgraduate work was done at Northwestern and Berkshire Music Center. From 1930 to 1943, he taught music in the schools of Flint, Michigan. Since then he has been Director of Music for the General Church. He is Director of Music for the Community Music Association and conductor of the Independence Symphony Orchestra. The 1948 General Conference added the Radio Department to his responsibilities. He is a high priest and gives unstintedly of his time and talent to the church and the community. With his wife, Doris, son, Claire, and daughter, Eleanor, he makes his home in Independence.

C. ED. MILLER (page 13) established and had charge of the Graphic Arts Bureau for over thirty years, popularizing visual aids in church work. He was born in Marietta, Ohio, 1867. Bishop Kelley needed someone to take charge of the Ensign in 1901. He found "C. Ed." in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in charge of a printing shop and brought him to Independence. From this experience, he went into missionary and pastoral work. During his ministry, he has held pastorates in Canada, Hawaii, the United States, and Australia. He was a member of the Standing High Council for fourteen years. He lives in Independence with his wife, Anna, and daughter, Mrs. Vera Wendelburg.

NEWS AND NOTES

BUILDING PROGRAMS

Apostle Percy E. Farrow reports that considerable building is being done by the congregations of his area. The Port Elgin reunion grounds, church-owned, is having three new buildings added to its facilities this summer, in time for the reunion of the Owen Sound and Toronto Districts. There will be a worship auditorium, a nursery and kindergarten building, and a snack bar. The grounds already boasts an excellent dining hall and auditorium.

Erie Beach Branch has moved the church building, purchased two years ago, to their new reunion grounds. The church has been newly decorated.

The church at Oak Harbor, Ohio, has been remodeled under the direction of Elvin C. Wadsworth, president of the Northwest Ohio District. The Saints at Barberton, Ohio, have just recently moved into their new basement church. Plans have been approved and work is beginning in the remodeling of the Lancaster, Ohio, church. A new church is planned for Jackson, Ohio. The plans have been tentatively approved. The Saints at Stokes Bay, Ontario, have been in their new church about a year. Lots have been purchased at McDermott, Ohio, for a church building. Plans for the edifice are being drawn.

Sanitary facilities at Kirtland are being remodeled and will be completed before the reunion. The old sanitary system was condemned and the shortage of materials in the past few years made it impossible to remodel, thus necessitating that the Kirtland reunion be canceled last year. Apostle Farrow reports that the Kirtland reunion definitely will be held this year.

BAPTISMS

Seventy Merle Guthrie, acting as assistant to P. E. Farrow in Youngstown, Pittsburgh, and West Virginia Districts, baptized eight people in January at Bellaire, Ohio. Two were baptized in February at New Castle, Ohio.

Jack Pray baptized five people in Chatham, Ontario, on March 6.

GLEAZER IN SPRING RIVER DISTRICT

Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Sr., met with the reunion committee on the week end of March 20 and visited the branches of Joplin, Missouri; Miami, Oklahoma; and Springfield, Missouri. The reunion grounds near Joplin, known as the Ozark Reunion, is in the process of completing building facilities. Brother Gleazer reports that John Blackmore, president of Spring River District and Joplin Branch, is very well received in his new territory.

WORK IN EUROPE

Apostle D. Blair Jensen reports that Elders Frank Fry and Eric Rowe have done excellent work in Wales and have already received eight decisions for baptism with prospects for a few others to come. They are having difficulty in securing the use of a font for the baptismal service, but are not far from the sea so are not too greatly worried.

Brother Jensen also reports that Elder Alfred Urban, recently appointed missionary in Germany, has baptized eleven in various points in his field. He is making contact with some of the Saints who had hitherto been away from the church because of war conditions.

The Birthday of the Church

April 6, 1830

Having opened the meeting by solemn prayer to our heavenly Father we proceeded (according to previous commandment) to call on our brethren to know whether they accepted us as their teachers in the things of the kingdom of God, and whether they were satisfied that we should proceed and be organized as a church according to said commandment which we had received. To these they consented by a unanimous vote.—Church History, Volume I, page 76.

The first official act of the newly organized church was the ordination of two elders to serve as officers. Joseph Smith ordained Oliver Cowdery, who in turn ordained Joseph. The group of six men partook of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Each member was then blessed by the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, and to confirm him a member of the church. "The Holy Ghost was poured out upon us to a very great degree."

The church began its ministry in the latter days with the observation of the ordinances that were practiced in the early Christian church under the apostles. The founders of the church assumed that the religious observances described in the New Testament were performed according to law, and not according to momentary caprice or special dispensation. In everything, they sought for evidences of law and order in the gospel, desiring to be obedient to that law to honor the will of God. Our church people still turn to the law for authority, guidance, and protecting power.

Our 119th Birthday

On its 119th birthday, the church that bears the message of the Restored Gospel stands among many Christian organizations, some younger, some older. The Restoration is relatively new; but the gospel message, the authority, the mission, are very old. Since the oldest of the Christian churches changed the ordinances, abandoned the historic mission of the apostolic church, and suffered corruption at the hands of men, it also lost the character and the authority of the movement Christ began. As God had intervened miraculously to found the church in the meridian of time, so he moved again to restore it in the latter days.

Concerning Birthdays

Birthdays are occasions for remembering things that have been important to us, which we may have neglected with the passing of time. They return us to our beginnings to see if we are still on the course we first followed.

A birthday tells us, too, that another year of opportunity has gone, and there is one year less in which to achieve our purposes. A birthday is a warning that we do not have eternity in which to accomplish our tasks—that our time is limited. A birthday is an amber light on the highway to warn us there is a red stop light to come.

A birthday is a new beginning. We look to the future. We repent of old mistakes; we write off old failures and determine to do better. Then we go ahead again.

Celebrating This Birthday

How should the birthday of the church be celebrated? Many ways are possible. Most obvious would be a special service in which the story of the founding of the church is told, the reasons for it, and the circumstances attending it. We have many young people who do not know that story very well, and some older people who need to be reminded.

Going a little farther, we might have a party, a banquet, and a birthday cake. And then, of course, a gift. Your church, as the local portion of the total organization, may have a number of needs: new shrubs and landscaping, resodding for the lawn; a neat bulletin board or name plate; a new pulpit, organ, or choir robes. Any fine improvement could come as a birthday gift. We could find happiness in a good birthday celebration for the church. If you are planning something new for your church, this occasion would be a fine opportunity for presenting it with due happiness and celebration.

Checkup

Something that does not necessarily go with a birthday, but must certainly go with the advancing years, is the checkup on the condition of the person or the institution. A man goes to his doctor to have his heart, his metabolism, and any other factors in his health tested. He wants to survive, and his doctor will tell him how he must be careful. Even the youngest and most vigorous people should visit the doctor, who sometimes finds surprising weaknesses that must receive attention and care.

How about the church? What is its condition today? Are the people reaching the standards set for them?

Consider the local congregation. Perhaps there are some misunderstandings and difficulties among the people that cut down attendance, restrict co-operation, leave other members cold and discouraged, and make it all but impossible to win new members. Probably, if your branch is normal, there are people who have been baptized but are not now attending the church and need reconversion. Much has been said in recent times about conversions, and that is good. But we need to give attention to reconversions, too.

The restoration of the gospel was divinely instituted for a great purpose—the building of the kingdom of God. That is our mission. Today it would be good for us to consider how far we are devoting our energies to that purpose.

Editorial

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

We feel sure that readers of the Herald will enjoy the following paragraphs taken from a report recently received from Elder E. A. Theys, who is laboring in Germany and Holland:

It seems that almost wherever we set our foot down, our work finds a new place. I have always wanted to share in such an experience as the early church went through from 1830 to 1844, and little did I realize I would find my desires coming true. Of course, we are kept very busy, but I love it that way. It seems like only yesterday that we got off the boat in England, and I don't even dare think of returning home at present. We just have too much to do to think about home.

Last week I held several meetings at the church here in Rotterdam. I used for my theme, "The Kingdom of God." When I had finished Sunday evening, I made appointments with all the priesthood members of Rotterdam, except three, to help them and their families file their inventories. By the time we finish these appointments, we will have helped at least fifteen to file their inventories. Brother Jensen has asked that I help in some of the missionary work here during the time it is impossible to travel in Germany. I have had the pleasure of developing several new contacts, and by the time Brother Scherer returns from Amsterdam, he will have several more to give his time and ministry to. I believe Holland has many fine prospects to follow up, and they should increase this mission many times more in the next few years.

We appreciate the fine ministry Brother Jensen is giving us, and we look forward to many pleasant associations.

The following from Patriarch William Patterson, dated February 24, 1949:

Dear Brother Israel:

While "browsing" through a file of old letters, I came upon one dated at Independence, Missouri, July 12, 1927, that I thought might be of interest.

Elder William Patterson Onset, Massachusetts

Dear Brother:

Your letter from the camp at Onset has been received, and I have read your letter with a great deal of interest. I thank you very much for the suggestions and criticisms made.

I have realized, of course, that our church is rapidly becoming more and more international in its character, and I shall try to remember this as occasion demands in my public utterances as a public official.

I have already taken action in regard to the flag matter, and have on hand both the Union Jack and the Canadian ensign. I should like, also, to get the Australian flags.

With kindest regards, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

At the previous conference, I approached the President with regard to the world character of our message and church and expressed surprise that the Stars and Stripes was the only flag on display at the conferences. In those days of stress, he abruptly asked: "What's on your mind?" Learning the nature of my inquiry, he very solicitously answered, "I am very busy now, and when you return to your field, I wish you would write me on the matter."

This I did, suggesting to him that the Stars and Stripes be the largest ensign in the most conspicuous place, because of the headquarters of the church, and that flags of uniform size representing the nations of the world be given preference of place according to church achievement in that country. At the next conference, the flags were presented in a fine ceremony, and at each succeeding conference are ceremonially unfurled. Perhaps I should explain the reason for his statement, "And I shall try to remember this as occasion demands in my public utterances as a public official." In my letter, I pointed out that the Saints in Australia during World War I looked to him as the prophet and president of the church for direction; and when they read in The Saints' Herald that he—prior to the entrance of the United States into the war—advocated neutrality; but afterwards (when the States had entered the war) said at the Lowbanks, Canada, Reunion, "I see no reason why a young man should not enlist, but I see many reasons why he should," the Australian people were confused. In Australia, we saw him only as the "prophet, seer, and revelator" and not as a private citizen of the United States of America. It should be helpful to members in other lands if they knew when he was speaking ex cathedra or as a private citizen.

Let not things, because they are common, enjoy for that the less share of our consideration.—Pliny the Elder.

OFFICIAL

Statements of General Church Contributions for 1948 have been mailed to all individual contributors in United States, Canada, and Hawaii for whom we have complete addresses. Approximately 20,400 statements have been mailed. About 600 statements are being held because of incomplete addresses.

Statements of contributions by branches will be mailed about April 1 to all pastors for whom we have complete addresses. Solicitors are instructed to write receipts for all General Church offerings received through branch collections or from organizations within the branch. These statements mailed to pastors will include oblation, College Day, Christmas, and other General Church offerings which have been contributed from branch organizations or on a branch collection basis. Individually receipted contributions for tithes or offerings of members within the branch are not included on these statements to branch pastors.

Members receiving these statements are reminded that contributions listed thereon are tithes and General Church offerings for which individual receipts have been written by our authorized representatives. It should be understood that offerings to branch budgets, branch or district building funds, and other offerings of a local nature are not included. Statements cover the calendar year of 1948 only.

We are very desirous that every error in names, addresses, and amounts should be called to our attention. In many instances, branch solicitors will be happy to answer questions which may be raised, but all statements containing errors should be returned to our office for correction. Simply return the statement to the office of the Presiding Bishopric and write on the statement a complete explanation of the error which should be corrected.

Anyone paying tithing during 1948 who has not received a statement at this time should write us immediately, giving all particulars possible and furnishing the complete mailing address.

Attention is called to the enclosure sent with each statement, "1948 Contributors' Report." We believe the message contained therein merits careful consideration.

Our grateful appreciation is expressed to the many devoted and generous contributors who financed the good achievements of the year 1948.

Creation and Destiny

By Apostle Arthur A. Oakman

A sermon delivered at The Campus, Independence, Missouri, on Sunday evening, June 27, 1948. From a recording by Gordon Resch.

JESUS STANDS TO JUDGE THE WORLD. History centers in him. When history is shown to be an operation which has at its heart the production and the sustaining of his life, war will be no more. The truth about history is an absolute necessity for the production and the prelude to peace. One man has said, "The way to world peace is through the abolition of history." If men knew the truth, they would be free from the destructive contamination of the fables which are implanted in their hearts, which take their deepest and most precious instincts—their love of home, of country, and of posterity—and marshal and direct them toward ends which cannot, in the nature of things, endure.

If once we can come to an understanding of the truth about history and see that it points toward Jesus as the one ideal person, and that men and nations that give their lives to his ideals receive immortality in direct relationship to the manner in which they obey his law, we can teach our children the truth. If we can produce a race of men who know the truth about themselves—what they are made for, what their purpose in life is—we shall have men who, in conflicts to come, will use the weapons fashioned in heaven for the overthrow of every evil philosophy and power in the world. The Constitution of the United States and the ideals of liberty, freedom, and equality enshrined in it, which have been safeguarded marvelously by the decisions of the Supreme Court were an absolute necessity as a setting in which Zion should be established.

If the ideals of liberty, equality, and fraternity, which are based upon the agency of man should disappear from the governmental institutions of this country, there will be no hope for the kingdom of God. Some people would tell us that Zion will be built on a heap of ruins, that the Government and the Constitution and the economy of the nation are going clear out of existence; and that when we have nothing left, other people who have nothing are coming to us, and out of nothing, we are going to build the kingdom. That is absolutely untrue. It is my firm belief that, in spite of the corruption in politics, there are men throughout our nation who are being used by Almighty God to maintain our great ideals, and those men are under the inspiration of heaven though they are perhaps unknown to us. We have a tendency to overlook the fact that there are in our midst men who would give their lives for the maintenance of peace and the ideals for which this country stands. If we ever come under the domination of foreign influences which would destroy the agency of man, the kingdom of God ideal will suffer a setback for just as long as those ideals are not cherished in the hearts of people.

BEHIND HISTORY, lies creation; and behind creation, lies destiny; and behind destiny, lies the personality of God.

Some months ago Dr. Charles F.

Grabske, our church physician, was teaching a class in the basement of the Stone Church. He had come to address the Fellowship Class; after talking along the general lines of health and pointing out some simple measures for the maintenance of health, he left the time open for questions. Someone said something like this: "Dr. Grabske: You have come to know that, through the course of nature, there exists law. There is no accident about good health. Every ill or disease has a cause and runs its course according to law. Could you tell us if, in your judgment, there is a good intention behind the operation of law in the physical body?"

And it wasn't so much what the good doctor said that counted, as what he did. He came from behind the table and stood in front of it, temporarily speaking not as a teacher or a doctor but as a minister. He began to bear a testimony as to the hopes and the ideals he has for the fraternity and the building of social institutions in which disease shall be a sin; and how he had hoped and longed all during his professional life for the time to come when the term Zion would be given a real meaning. As he talked, our hearts were thrilled, and our minds enlightened; we saw clearly that through the processes of the body, through the operation of law, there dwelled something more than law—more than mere process—something which moved in the midst of things to preserve what we know as love and good intention.

This is our thesis, then, that all the processes of inanimate nature, and all the movements of all things show the existence of God who has good intention. As a matter of fact, it has been the Christian view that no amount of sin on the part of man can ever alter God's good intention. He wills to do good to us, in spite of what we may do to him. The body that persistently disobeys the law will, in the course of time, be taken out and destroyed. That which obeys the law shall be permitted to exist and glorify the lawgiver. It is a marvelous thing to note that down through the course of time there have been people who have seen this clearly.

Let me read you a poem which beautifully illustrates this point.

Emily Bronte, the daughter of a Yorkshire clergyman, was afflicted with a disease for which there was no cure. She died when she was in her early thirties; but through the frail flesh, and shining out through the sunken eyes, there was an indomitable spirit. Somehow she had come in touch with the nature of things, and just a little while before she died, she wrote this poem entitled, "Last Lines":

No coward's soul is mine,
No trembler in the world's storm-troubled sphere.

I see heaven's glory shine,
And faith shines equal, arming me from fear.

Oh God, within my breast,
Almighty! ever-present Deity!
Life—that in me has rest,
As I—undying life—have power in Thee!

Vain are the thousand creeds
That move men's hearts: unutterably vain;
Worthless as withered weeds,
Or idlest froth amid the boundless main.

To waken doubt in one,
Holding so fast by Thine infinity;
So surely anchored on
The steadfast rock of immortality.

With wide-embracing love,
Thy spirit animates eternal years,
Pervades and broods above,
Changes, sustains, dissolves, creates, and rears.

Though earth and man were gone,
And suns and universes ceased to be,
And Thou wert left alone,
Every existence would exist in Thee.

There is not room for Death,
Nor atom that his might could render void:
Thou—THOU art Being and Breath,
And what THOU art may never be destroy'd.

What a beautiful expression of the unutterable and unshakable conviction that in God we live and move and have our being! Truly there is shown in the life of this young woman, who was unknown to us and our philosophy, the assurance that behind all things there dwells a loving Father, that no part of his creation goes beyond his control, that every atom in every place in every time has within it the seeds of immortality and cannot be destroyed. This is the hope of the church. This is the philosophy of the Restoration Movement. And by the grace of God, this is the conviction that has come to us to the resurrection of our Lord.

BETWEEN GOD AND HIS CREATION there stands the destiny he has devised for us, the ideal he had in his soul before the worlds were, and the ideal which governed his almighty hand in the way we were put together. Destiny is not something we wait for. Destiny is something that is written in the way we are made, and if it isn't in us, it will never be before us. If the Zion for which we long does not first dwell in the inner man, there will never be any changing of the outward environment.

John Rushton has said, "Social reformation through individual regeneration." This ideal, this destiny, which is a living thing, is not like a picture on a wall at which we look; it is not like some ideal or story to which creation moves. It is something in us and through us. It was; it is, it is to come; and it is within us to the extent we are obedient to the mandates of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

This destiny was devised for us, and it was devised so we cannot live ultimately if we disregard it. The men and women who take no thought for the kingdom of God have no thought. Those who live consistently for the things of this world, when this world passes away, pass away with it. This destiny which is part of the divine movement in and through the world stands within us, and because it is within us, it helps our vision and sustains us in the hour of trial until the time comes when it shall be manifest all around us.

This destiny respects the agency of man. It is, therefore, in the nature of a contract or agreement—something which is covenanted, something which God agrees to do with us, and something which we agree to do for him. It respects our agency to the uttermost. He will not compel us. He will never force the door of our understanding. He will never do for us what we can do for ourselves.

Christ respected the agency of man so much that he gave his life rather than force or compel man to be obedient to his gospel. That was the battle which was fought in the wilderness. "Make these stones bread," said the tempter. Yes, a perfectly natural temptation. Our Lord—hungry, legitimately in need of bread to sustain the physical—was invited by the tempter to use his miraculous power to satisfy a temporal need.

He was coaxed to use the powers given him to build the kingdom of God to sustain that physical man which could not inherit the kingdom, and he refused to do it.

Then, when he was taken by the Spirit and placed upon the pinnacle of the temple and shown the kingdoms of this world, the thought came to him, If you use your miraculous power to force men to serve you, you can work some miracles and sit in Caesar's seat; the legions of Rome you can put to flight; all you have to do is to call upon the elements to obey you, and you can overbrow Caesar. If Christ had used his power in that way, men would have served him through fear; they would have given allegiance with their bodies, but their minds would have remained unconverted.

You cannot force a man to think as you want him to think. You cannot force him to be righteous, for every time you attempt to, you render the action which is done under that kind of compulsion without any moral value, and you undo the man. So Jesus set himself the more difficult task of winning men's love, knowing he could display before them the unutterable love of his Father, and that somehow of their own free will they would yield themselves obedient to his gospel.

AND SO, respecting our agency, not condoning our sin, Christ stands before us and shows us in his own body what sin is always doing to us. He gave us a revelation of what the consequences would be if we failed to yield obedience to his gospel. In him, who knew no sin, is the perfect revelation of the consequences of sin, what it really is, how it destroys the sons of God, how it puts them to open shame, and denies them of the hope that they may ever reach their best possibilities.

So vital in the process of creation is the agency of man that God will not deal with us on any other basis than that of mutual agreement. He says to me and to you: "I will make you in the image of my Son if you will be obedient. If you will not be obedient, I cannot help you. If you will not endure the degree of intelligence I have made possible—if you desire only a lesser degree of intelligence—I will give the very best I have to enable you to achieve what you desire; but you receive the little you desire because you would not accept the much you might have received."

The agency of man, I repeat, is vital in the dealings God has with us. The covenants of God comprehend immortality. We're not made to be butchers, and bakers, and candlestick makers. We're not made alone for this world. We have interests in eternity. What we do now does something to us, throughout the countless ages of eternity, and therefore, we have some right to an investment in the invisible spiritual world.

TONIGHT IS THE 104th anniversary of the martyrdom of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. They in the language of the covenant, sealed their testimony with their own blood. On the way to Carthage, Joseph, knowing he would not come back, quoted to the men who were with him—John Taylor, Willard Richards, and Hyrum Smith, I believe—a portion of the sixth chapter of the Book of Revelation:

I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God. And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell upon the earth? And white robes were given unto them; and it was said unto them that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.—Inspired Version, 9-11.

And, of course, the implication was plain that in the eternities the souls of the slain under the altar, the spirits of those who had gone on restless and waiting for their inheritance, crying a while, "How long, O Lord, how long?" were permitted a glimpse of the things which were upon the earth. Joseph and Hyrum who were facing their great summons, who had hazarded their lives, also were permitted a glimpse into that invisible world and saw in their own martyrdom a partial fulfillment of the words of comfort given to those who had gone before. I have no doubt that Joseph felt he was one of those alluded to in the Scripture which says that their fellow servants should be slain as they were slain.

THE TIME crowds upon us, and through the flesh we look to the outer world, but, by the eye of intelligence, we glimpse the inner spiritual world. And these covenants we have been talking about are those agreements which comprehend both the agency of man and his immortality.

Recall the Scripture in the early chapters of the Book of Genesis in which our Heavenly Father was administering comfort to Enoch and his people, when Enoch was concerned about the culmination of the great destiny he had been preaching of and for which he had prepared his people; and then God instructed him about the course of time. He spoke about our time when righteousness and truth should "sweep the earth as with a flood," to gather out his elect from the four quarters of the earth "unto a place," he said, "which I shall prepare"—not prepared by man, or man's devices or schemes, but by God, a place we believe has been designated as in and around here, the Center Place.

I shall prepare a holy city that my people may gird up their loins and be looking forth for the time of my coming; and it shall be called Zion, a New Jerusalem. And the Lord said to Enoch, Then shalt thou and all thy city meet them there, and we will receive them into our necks, and we will kiss each other. And fall upon their necks and they shall fall upon our necks, and we will kiss each other. And there shall be mine abode, and it shall be Zion, which shall come forth out of all the creations which I have made; and for the space of a thousand years shall the earth rest.—Genesis 7: 70-72, Inspired Version.

There it is, the vision of Enoch, revealed to us in these latter days to give understanding of some of the agreements or covenants God has made for our welfare. This destiny has regard not only to our spiritual life, our immortality, and our agency; but also to our economic and social need.

IF I WERE TO ASK you what the distinctive covenant made with the church in the latter days is, what the sworn statement of our Heavenly Father concerning his gifts to us is, I wonder what your answer would be. What would you say if I asked you to give a description of the everlasting covenant? What one thing has our Heavenly Father said shall be distinctively the heritage of this people? I wonder whether this generation sees it as clearly as a former generation did, the leaders of which lost their lives on this day a hundred and four years ago? It is plainly outlined in the revelation that this destiny has a relationship to our economic needs. The language could have been uttered yesterday, and it can be uttered tomorrow with just as much emphasis and meaning as it was uttered in January, 1831.

"I show you a mystery, a thing which is had in secret chambers to bring to pass your destruction." Who knows what goes on in secret chambers today, seeking the destruction of every agency and every organization for the good of man? Who would dare to predict what decisions may be made even this night, which might have consequences for us here twenty years from now?

I show unto you a mystery, a thing which is had in secret chambers, to bring to pass even your destruction, in process of time, and ye knew it not, but now I tell it unto you, and ye are blessed, not because of your iniquity, neither your hearts of unbelief, for verily some of you are guilty before me; but I will be merciful unto your weakness. Therefore, be ye strong from henceforth; fear not for the kingdom is yours.—Doctrine and Covenants 38: 4.

Notice that—not may be or will be sometime in the future—the kingdom is yours.

And for your salvation I give unto you a commandment, for I have heard your prayers, and the poor have complained before me, and the rich have I made; and all flesh is mine, and I am no respecter of persons. And I have made the earth rich, and, behold, it is my footstool; wherefore, again I will stand upon it.—Ibid.

Notice, the earth belongs to God. It is the basis of all wealth. No earth no wealth!

This last war was basically a struggle as to whether the world would be ruled from Berlin and Tokyo, or whether it would be ruled from Washington and London, and whether or not the riches of the earth and the markets of the world would be dominated by the one or the other. At root, this war grew out of inequality and iniquity. At root this war was a struggle between the "haves" and "have nots." At root, this war was engendered because men did not recognize that the earth belonged to God. This business of putting a fence around a piece of property and saying, "This is mine and nothing shall ever make me yield my right to the production and what comes of this earth," is utterly unchristian. "The earth have I made, and it is rich, and it is my footstool, wherefore again I will stand upon it."

Did you ever read Revelation 14: 6, "another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel?" Certainly. We have published it abroad. We talk about "the angel message." But what did the angel say? It wasn't so much the fact that an angel came—that doesn't count. If an angel appeared to me, I would want to know what he had to say for himself. ". . . Saying with a loud voice, fear God and give glory to him." There's the foundation of the kingdom of God—the recognition of divine ownership. God made the world. It is his.

Beethoven wrote a piece of music, Opus 127. A publisher bought it and gave it the title "Moonlight Sonata." Beethoven wrote quartettes for various princes, but they don't belong to the princes he wrote them for. They don't belong to the publisher he sold them to. They belong to Beethoven because he is in them. He is in every line and cadence, every key relationship. They are stamped with his personality, and whoever touches them has a glimpse of part of the personality of the composer.

The same thing is true of the earth. No amount of argument, no amount of law or jurisprudence can ever alter the fact that the earth belongs to God. "Fear God, and give glory to him who made."

The scripture we have been reading places on a spiritual foundation the promise, the covenant, to these people, which I am about to read to you, and which I am sure the church generally does not understand, because it doesn't know about it. I'm not talking about individuals. I'm talking about the church as a whole.

I have made the earth rich, and behold, it is my footstool: wherefore again I will stand upon it; and I hold forth and deign to give unto you greater riches, even a land of promise; a land flowing with milk and honey, upon which there shall be no curse when the Lord cometh; and I will give it unto you for the land of your inheritance, if you seek it with all your hearts: and this shall be my covenant with you.—Doctrine and Covenants 38: 4.

That was given in January, 1831.

Ye shall have it for the land of your inheritance, for the inheritance of your children, forever, while the earth shall stand and ye shall possess it again in eternity, no more to pass away.—Ibid.

God starts from the ground up. This destiny has regard for our economic life. The covenant which God seeks to make with us is this: that the earth shall be used for the promulgation and continuance of fraternity; if we use the things of this earth and world in the manner designed of God, it is plain we shall be the richest of all people—rich in the true sense of the term. I am conscious of the fact that there have been many, many efforts in the past, to come to an understanding of some of these things; but we have never yet, as a people—at least in our day—come to understand the meaning of that covenant. Why? Perhaps we've had too much with which to do. Perhaps, had we been poorer, we could have been richer. Perhaps, had we not had so much, we would have been farther along the road in spiritual things.

IN CHRIST, the messenger of the covenant, is preserved even our physical manhood. How important it is that we see clearly the implications of the resurrection of Jesus. The most distinctive thing the earth does is to produce and maintain a human body—marvelously put together, intricately woven, piece in piece; every cell and nerve obeys some almighty law and is sustained by the spirit and the element which moves through all things. The most distinctive thing the earth does is to produce our bodies.

I heard Dr. Platz about three years ago, at a reunion in Lamoni, give a most marvelous testimony. With visible emotion, he stood and said: "Brethren and sisters, I am reminded this morning that the sun is the light of day. The earth on which we stand, the grass that grows, the seats we sit on, the canvas which covers us, the poles which hold the tent up, the cloth which is fashioned for the clothes I wear, and even my flesh itself, is sustained by the operation of the visible universe and held in relationship by the sun that rules the day. Our visible sun is the Lord of all things seen; and just as the sun is the light of day, so Christ is the light of my soul."

It is good to hear a scientist say that. For there is abroad today a very hopeless view of the universe. Here is what H. G. Wells said:

Our universe is not merely bankrupt . . . It is not simply liquidated, it is going clean out of existence, leaving not a rack behind. The attempt to trace any pattern of any sort is absolutely futile. A series of events has forced upon the intelligent observer the realization that the human story has already come to an end, and that man as he has been pleased to call himself, is in his present form, played out. The stars in their courses have turned against him, and he has to give place to some other animal better adapted to face the fate that closes in more swiftly upon him.

What a hopeless view! It was brought about by the explosions at Nagasaki and Bikini, when atomic power was yielded into the hands of man. When H. G. Wells realized we really had the power to blow the universe and ourselves to pieces, he died in despair. But how different, as we view the body of our Lord, Jesus Christ, in history and in the story of Book of Mormon times; there is tangible proof that what the physical universe produces is capable of being immortalized, and that the elements of the human body, if they are wrought upon by the Spirit of God, are capable of being transformed and absorbed into the very presence of God; they are capable of being transformed and absorbed into the very presence of God; they are capable, if you please, of being celestialized.

Jesus came here after his ascension on the Asiatic continent and invited the people—2,000 of them—to come forth and feel the prints in his hands and feet. I suspect he knew that had he not added to their sense of sight and sound and touch, someone might have started the rumor that his appearance was simply a vision and could be explained away on a psychological basis. He was anxious to give his people the assurance that their bodies were part of an eternal destiny; and if you look at the body of Jesus, you can see the destiny of the physical universe. It is made for the production of the sons of God. So even our physical man is provided for. Our individual and social life, our spiritual life, with its agency and hope of immortality, are provided for in the great destiny which God had designed for the children of man.

OUR WORDS are so inadequate—are they not?—whether spoken or written. We must rely upon some additional sense, if the inner meaning of the word is to come to us. That inner sense known to us as the Spirit of God has long ministered to us understanding in proportion as we have sought it. The Inspired Version of the Bible was one of the three major trusts which devolved upon Emma Smith when her husband was taken by death. In it we have an attempt on the part of the Heavenly Father, through the spirit of revelation, to give us additional information about the destiny of mankind. And in the story early in Genesis, we have this beautiful statement of the everlasting covenant:

I will set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud, and I will remember my covenant which I have made between me and you, for every living creature of all flesh. And the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh. And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant which I made unto thy Father, Enoch; that when men should keep all my commandments, Zion should come again on the earth, the city of Enoch, which I have caught up unto myself. And this is mine everlasting covenant, that when thy posterity shall embrace the truth, and look upward, then shall Zion look downward, and all the heavens shall shake with gladness and the earth shall tremble with joy; and the general assembly of the church of the first-born shall come down out of heaven, and possess the earth, and shall have place until the end come. And this is mine everlasting covenant which I made with thy father, Enoch.

This was the city which was sought by Melchizedek. It was under this covenant and this covenant alone that Melchizedek was ordained. There is no Melchizedek priesthood anywhere apart from the administration of this covenant. We are informed in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis that Melchizedek "was ordained a high priest after the order of the covenant which God made with Enoch, it being after the order of the Son of God." (Verses 27, 28.)

And now, Melchizedek was a priest after this order; therefore he obtained peace in Salem, and was called the Prince of Peace. And his people wrought righteousness and obtained heaven, and sought for the city of Enoch, which God had before taken, separating it from the earth, having reserved it unto the latter days, or the end of the world; and hath said, and sworn with an oath, that the heavens and the earth should come together, and the sons of God should be tried so as by fire.—Genesis 14: 33-35.

APOSTLE PAUL M. HANSON

General Conference Missionary Service

Organized and executed under direction of the Quorum of Twelve, Arthur A. Oakman presiding.

WE ARE VERY GLAD to greet you here this evening to participate with the Quorums of Twelve and Seventy, High Priests and Bishops in this missionary endeavor. May the good spirit abide with us during this service as we shall wait together here and meditate upon the task which has been entrusted to our care.

Many years ago the Apostle John said, "I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him . . . and worship him that made heaven and earth and the sea and the fountains of waters."

The appointees will sing a very old, well-known hymn for us, and we request you to join in the chorus:

Hymn: No. 413, "When Earth in Bondage Long Had Lain."

Prayer: By Apostle Paul M. Hanson, President of the Quorum.

Hymn: No. 315, "Our Father Which in Heaven Doth Dwell"—sung by appointees.

Scripture: Doctrine and Covenants 1: 1, 4, 8.

Hymn: No. 308, "I Have Found the Glorious Gospel."

Reading: by Stephen Black. (This is an account of the Restoration—of the Restoration of the Aaronic priesthood by Oliver Cowdery.)

The Lord who is rich in mercy and ever willing to answer the consistent prayers of the humble, condescended to manifest to us his will. On a sudden, as from the midst of eternity, the voice of the Redeemer spake peace to us. While the veil was parted and the angel of God came down, clothed with glory, and delivered the anxiously looked for message and the keys of the gospel of repentance, what joy, what wonder, what amazement. While the world was racked and distracted, millions were groping as the blind for the wall and while all men were resting upon uncertainty, our eyes beheld and our ears heard as in the blaze of day, yes more, above the glitter of the May sunbeam which shed its brilliancy over the face of nature, the voice, though mild, pierced to the very center of his words, "I am thy fellow servant," dispelled every fear. We listened, we gazed, we admired. 'Twas the voice of the angel from glory, 'twas a message from the most high, and as we heard we rejoiced while his love enkindled upon our souls and we were wrapped in the vision of the Almighty. Where was there room for doubt? Nowhere. Uncertainty had fled, doubt had sunk, no more to rise, while fiction and deception had fled forever.

But dear brethren, think!—further think, for a moment what joy filled our hearts and with what surprise we must have bowed, for who would not have bowed the knee for such a blessing when we received under his hand the Holy Priesthood as he said, "Upon you, my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer this priesthood and this authority which shall remain upon earth that the sons of Levi might yet offer an offering unto the Lord in righteousness."

I shall not attempt to paint to you the feeling of this heart nor the majestic beauty and glory which surrounded us on this occasion, but you will believe me when I say that earth nor men with the eloquence of time cannot begin to clothe language in as interesting and sublime a manner as this holy personage. No, nor has this earth power to give the joy bestowed, the peace, or comprehend the wisdom which was contained in each sentence as it was delivered by the power of the Holy Spirit. Man may deceive his fellowman; deception may follow deception, and the children of the wicked one may have the power to seduce the foolish and untaught till naught but fiction feeds the many and the fruit of falsehood carries in its current the giddy to the grave, but one touch with the finger of his love—yes, one ray of glory from the upper world, or one word from the mouth of the Savior from the bosom of eternity, strikes it all into insignificance and blots it forever from the mind. The assurance that we were in the presence of an angel, the certainty that we had heard the voice of Jesus and the truth unsullied as it flooded from a true personage dictated by the will of God is, to me, past description, and I shall ever look upon this expression of the Savior's goodness with wonder and thanksgiving while I am permitted to tarry and in those missions where perfection dwells and sin never comes, I hope to adore in that day which shall never cease.

Hymn: No. 414, "The Spirit of God Like a Fire Is Burning"—sung by appointees with congregation joining in on chorus.

Affirmations of Belief:

E. Y. Hunker: I believe in God, the Father almighty, creator, ruler, and central fact of the universe.

Hymn: No. 386, "Shout the Tidings of Salvation."

E. J. Gleazer, Sr.: Soon after the resurrection of our Lord and Master, Jesus Christ, certain of his disciples inquired, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom unto Israel?" You may recall that among other things he said to them on that occasion, "Ye shall be my witnesses." Now that was a very significant statement. These disciples had no longer any reason to doubt the power of their Lord and Master. He had risen triumphantly from the dead. He was alive. He worked with them. No power on this earth could touch him after his resurrection. He had gone all the way. He had permitted sin to go as far as sin could possibly go. So, having absolute confidence that he was able to bring to pass anything upon the face of the earth, these disciples said to him, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom?"

They were concerned regarding the time and the fact that he was to do it, so I think his answer was indeed significant, "Ye shall be my witnesses." There is a definite relationship between the establishment of the kingdom in which we have professed our belief and in witnessing. This kingdom cannot be realized without a witnessing people. All the power that is resident in our blessed Lord cannot be fully exercised unless we, utilizing our agency, permit him to use us as his witnesses, for it is through those of us who profess that he is our Savior—those of us who become new creatures in Christ Jesus—that the kingdom shall be realized or made manifest. Before any of us can be effectual in our witnessing, we must experience.

I have thrilled many, many times as I have read the testimony of Peter, regarding the things he had seen and heard when he was with his Master on the holy mount. He spoke with authority. He had experiences with God. Hence, for us to be effectual in our witnessing, we, too, must have our experience with God. We also must be in possession of his Spirit. Time and time again we have such testimony as "the Spirit beareth witness." Though we should speak with the tongues of men and of angels and do not receive of that Spirit to bear witness, our testimony would not suffice. We must have the witness of the Spirit if we are to testify effectually regarding Christ and his purposes pertaining to mankind. Then there is another witness, and Jesus set this example himself. In his very person, he was all he professed. He was all he preached. "I am the way, the truth and the life." No man could deny the authority of that life, and as we become more and more like our Lord, we, too, shall be such witnesses that no one can reject our testimony, for the power of his gospel shall be made manifest in what we have become.

We have attended a very wonderful conference where the Spirit of God has been made manifest in many of our activities. If this has been your first opportunity to visit as it were on the mountaintop—with him, no doubt it would suffice as far as convincing you of the power of the gospel of Jesus. But many of us have walked with him for a number of years, maybe not as closely as we should, but we have had testimonies as we have journeyed by the way. Even this week I have shared in conversation with many brothers and sisters of former years and of former places, some of these remarkable experiences, in which God selected the humble and those who were limited in this life, and through them manifested such power that even those not of our faith were led to acknowledge there was a power in this gospel. Many of us have witnessed every miracle recorded in the word of God. We are living testimonies of the divinity of the Restoration Movement. We are not dependent upon the testimony of Joseph Smith or Oliver Cowdery, marvelous as these testimonies are, for we have had experiences with the same God. I know something of your experience, and you know something of mine; therefore, we are in a position to bear witness of him.

My brother and my sister, can we leave this conference without resolving in our hearts that we shall go forth to bring the light of this truth to the good people in our communities who have not as yet shared in this light? I cannot take time now to speak of the world's need or the need of your neighbor, your friend, or your associates in business.

You can give them the greatest gift that is possible for one man to share with another. I know you require the power of God to make this gift worth-while, but that power is yourself. Our Heavenly Father has promised over and over again he will share this power with you and bear witness with you that your testimony is divine. I believe there are at least 5,000 people here, maybe more. Suppose each would succeed in winning one soul to the gospel of Jesus Christ in the next twelve months—what a marvelous conversion that would be! But we can do even more than that. The hour is now when this church must move forward as a witnessing institution for Him. The world is without hope, and despite all the efforts being put forth, there is no power on this earth which can be substituted for that made possible through the church of the living God.

We stand, therefore, in positions of trust and responsibility. How are we going to discharge this trust and prove ourselves worthy of the trust imposed in us? As I listened to my brother read the account of the restoration of the Aaronic priesthood to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, my mind went back to another scene where six men—most of them young men—sat in Father Whitmer's house, following the direction of God Almighty to bring to pass the organization of his church. I compared those six men with the multitude occupying this Auditorium. I compared their resources with our resources and couldn't help saying to myself, "My God, my God, what could we accomplish if we moved forward in harmony with the divine command, with our numbers, with our resources, with what we possess today?" To the extent we move forward, we save our own souls. We'll bring to pass a power in this church that will banish all darkness and confusion. To the extent that you engage with Jesus Christ in this mission, light will surround your pathway and the power of God's Spirit shall be revealed in your endeavor. We want to help you to do that. We feel you cannot do less. You have a solemn responsibility. Your attendance at this conference places upon you an obligation such as you have never had before, for you have seen the hand of God made manifest, even since you have arrived to attend this gathering.

Environment and Faith

By GERALDINE WYATT

The value of combining the physical and spiritual forces for the healing of the sick has long been known and put into effect. Our church Sanitarium is peculiar only in the extent of the spiritual law involved, and, too, that it is an institution established by divine revelation: "Where they may be removed from the influences and environments unfavorable to the exercise of proper faith unto the healing of the sick." So we have an institution wherein the ordinances of the church are the accepted procedure, rather than the exception.

OF COURSE, the purpose of a hospital is for the physical care and the institution of those laws which will bring healing or comfort to the ill. In these days of highly technical treatment and specialized medicine—which incidentally is each year lengthening our life expectancy—the home can no longer compete with the care of a good hospital. When realizing that at the Sanitarium it takes, on the average, the steady employment of two and one fourth persons to care for each patient, one may understand the type of service extended.

The high standard maintained by our hospital is a tribute to the professional staff, and especially to the church physician, upon whom weighs the responsibility of keeping abreast of new medical discoveries and new treatments. The scripture, "That which is governed by law, is also preserved by law," also applies to the human body. Certainly a knowledge of the laws regulating the physical body and its functions—and when nature goes awry, the searching out and acquiring of a knowledge of the laws which will rehabilitate the diseased parts—makes a doctor a necessity. The more expert his knowledge the more skilled his treatment and the nearer he approaches the comprehending and fulfilling of the laws of God.

Along with the skill and a devotion to professional duty is also added the factor of working toward a divine plan in our church hospital. It always enlarges the goal. The resultant achievement is much higher than if mere personal or even professional standards were met. Hence, the fellowship is more Zion-ic. The personnel work in self-forgetfulness.

DURING MY RECENT STAY THERE, nurses not assigned to care for me would come in and offer suggestions for making me more comfortable. And as Christmas drew near, they would sympathize:

"It's too bad you have to spend Christmas here."

"Oh, do you get the day off?" I would ask.

"No," nearly all would invariably answer as if surprised. "But that's different." The last would be added uncertainly, as the speaker vaguely realized her devotion to duty had obscured her own desires.

Together with the skilled medical head of the Sanitarium works the chaplain. He says he tries to make one call per day on each patient. Before going to the operating room, the patient is always visited by the chaplain. I know I enjoyed his cheery "hello" more often. He begins his day at the awe-inspiring time of five-thirty. One doesn't wonder at the necessity for the early hour when realizing he also serves as counselor to the personnel.

It is a splendid achievement when, along with the fine medical service given, the laws of our church can be fulfilled in regard to membership.

OVER A YEAR AGO, we had the fine experience of enjoying a night campfire program in Mesa Verde National Park. After a lecture on the ruins, a ranger piled more wood on the fire, and dancing slowly into the flickering light moved several Navaho Indian men chanting their tribe's ancient ritual for the healing of the sick. We were at the edge of a cliff. Below us the ancient cliff dwellings were crumbling in their huge rock recesses.

One lost all sense of the present, watching these native-costumed Indians enacting in this natural setting a ritual so old they no longer knew the meaning of the words they sang. One could almost see the primitive, destitute hogans of these Indians, their medicine men plying their meager, poor knowledge, while in the fire-flickering darkness, the slow dance of the Navahos progressed in step to their wailing chant.

I spent the Christmas holidays in our church Sanitarium. There, too, the physical and spiritual forces were combined for the healing of the sick, but the marked skill of the doctors and staff was combined with a higher spiritual law. As the poor health of the Navaho tribe members reflects the worthlessness of their medicine men and their ancient rites, so do the results obtained at the Sanitarium attest to the medical skill and religious ordinances used there.

Suggestions for Learning New Hymns

By FRANKLYN S. WEDDLE

Director of Music and Radio

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING is in history, theory, and fact the center of church music. Second perhaps only to the Bible, the hymn-book is the most important sacred book in the hands of both the pastor and the layman. One may dare to say that most members of most congregations have in their hands and use each week their hymnals more than they do their Bibles or other church books. Since the hymnal is the people's manual of musical worship, and since about 80 per cent of all worship is in some way connected with music, it is most important that in both verse and music it be of such quality as to command respect and to stimulate noble emotion, spacious thoughts, and desires.

The haphazard, perfunctory, or lazy choice of hymns is an offense against the rights of the congregation, and harping on a few favorites tends to produce spiritual anaemia—or even nausea. Any congregation willing to have better congregational singing of the hymns can develop a musical service that is richly devotional and musically satisfying. The greater the repertory of hymns a congregation knows, the more worship possibilities it will have. There is something in human nature which seems to resist the learning of anything new; and yet after it is learned, almost everyone takes pride in it. Congregations resist and grumble about learning new hymns, but once a new hymn is learned and used for a time, it is referred to as one of the "good old hymns."

There has been much discussion about the right way to learn new hymns and about the way to teach a congregation new hymns. There is probably no one final solution.

One thing seems certain however, new hymns are not learned by talking about them, they are learned by hearing them and singing them. The tune must be made familiar to the congregation. It must be heard over and over again before it is taught to the congregation as a hymn.

A FEW SUGGESTIONS for hymn-learning procedure might be timely at this point. First of all, a program for learning new hymns should be planned well ahead. The planning should be done by music minister and pastor jointly. A hymn consists of two parts, the verse and the tune.

The tune can be used by the organist as a prelude, an offertory, meditation, or as a postlude for several services in advance of the time it is introduced as a new hymn to be learned. In this way, the congregation hears it over and over again until it becomes quite familiar. Later it might be used in place of an anthem sung by the choir, or as a solo or mixed quartet number for a service. Every opportunity should be given the congregation to become familiar with the tune before it is taught as a hymn.

The verse can be used by the pastor as a call to worship, if it will lend itself to such use or in place of a scripture reading or as a poem in connection with a sermon, or as the text for a sermon. In some cases, the verse may be used as a responsive reading by pastor and congregation. Here again the object is to familiarize the congregation with the verse and thought content.

If the learning process is preceded by motivation, learning takes place more quickly and easily. The preceding suggestions tend to create motivation, the will to learn, and at the same time to subtly impregnate the congregation with the content and tune of the new hymn.

With all of this preliminary hearing of verse and tune, the congregation is now ready to learn to sing it. When the people of the congregation first try it, they suddenly discover that they practically know it already and obtain a thrill at the ease with which they grasp it. At this point, the story of how the hymn came to be written, something about the poet and the composer might be related to help stimulate interest and increase appreciation.

THE QUESTION of a good time to teach new hymns is often difficult to decide. If a song service is announced for the time preceding a regular service, it is often poorly attended, especially if the congregation is told it is to learn a new hymn. Taking a few minutes of the beginning or end of a regular service for the purpose of learning a new hymn has been found to be most satisfactory. The art of congregational worship is one activity which seems to be woefully neglected by most pastors. Members are expected to come to church and instinctively know how to sing effectively, how to read responsively, how to recite the Lord's Prayer well together, to know when to stand and when to sit, and all of the other mechanics of worship without any word or help from those in charge of the service. If short periods could be given for congregational training in these mechanics of worship, how much more devotional and impressive our worship could be. Yes, and how much more acceptable to our Heavenly Father it might be.

What Is the Matter With Our Easter Programs?

By C. ED. MILLER

WHILE IN THE AKRON, OHIO, public library thirty-six years ago, I read, several weeks before Easter, the following editorial in the Biblical World, which is published for ministers:

Easter brings a challenge to every thoughtful man. If Jesus be not raised from the dead, he is still with the dead. The crucial question is this: Does anybody really know whether Jesus is still living, still man's companion, still our Redeemer? Easter challenges us to say whether he is, not what he was. At Easter, we face the dark tower and demand a triumphant champion, not a fellow victim.

Did Jesus conquer death or did death conquer Jesus? Does he still exist, still himself, or did he go back into some impersonal whole? An answer to such questions is either a gospel or a summons to another forlorn hope.

Alas! the editor does not answer affirmatively this question of tremendous importance to the whole Christian world. It can be answered in an affirmative manner if God should reveal that his Son was raised from the dead and is with him. Additional evidence may be in existence, supplementing the Biblical evidence. Apparently the editor had no knowledge of such.

At one time the name of Henry Drummond, F.R.S.E., F.G.S., was a household word, especially in England. On pages 18 and 19 of the preface of Natural Law in the Spiritual World, he says:

But however nobly it has held its ground, theology must feel today that the modern world calls for a further proof. Theology is searching on every hand for another echo of the Voice of which Revelation also is the echo, that out of the mouths of two witnesses its truths should be established A second court of appeal has become an imperative necessity.

Christ himself knew a time would come when it would be necessary to provide additional evidence to substantiate the Biblical account of his resurrection. "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold . . . they shall hear my voice."—John 10:16. Momentous promise! Christ's sheep at Jerusalem heard his voice, and we have the New Testament account. Now, if we had the account of his other sheep, we would have another witness of his resurrection. It would be a Gospel as the editor quoted would call it.

DOES ANYBODY really know whether Jesus is still living? Our church says it knows he is. It has the evidence. The Christian churches are in the anomalous position of not being able to accept this additional evidence, which has been before the world for 120 years. If this splendid evidence was to be accepted by the Christian world, it would upset their systems. Christ came to turn the world upside down, so it would be right side up.

In 1820, a fourteen-year-old boy claimed he had a vision and saw two glorious personages. One, pointing to the other, said: "This is my beloved Son, hear him." The boy was given instruction which resulted in the re-establishment of the church of Christ after the organic structure Christ instituted. That boy was Joseph Smith. We accept the Doctrine and Covenants, a book of about 300 pages, as containing revelations from Jesus Christ to his church. These revelations were carefully examined by the various quorums of the church before they were accepted as being of God. While Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were under a degree of inspiration, correcting parts of the New Testament, a vision was opened to them. Joseph describes it thus: "And, now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him, that he lives; for we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the Only Begotten of the Father."—Doctrine and Covenants 76:3.

The editor wanted to know if anybody really knew whether Christ was living now. We believe he is, because we hear from him! Joseph clasped hands over the ages with Job, and said, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

WHEN JESUS CHRIST SAID to his sheep in Palestine that other sheep would hear his voice, he had in mind Jews who left Jerusalem 600 years B. C. and entered America. To claim that Christ came to these continents after his resurrection would seem to be impossible of proof. The Book of Mormon is a history of these ancient people and gives a description of Christ's ministry among them. If this claim can be substantiated, the Book of Mormon, next to the Bible, is the most valuable book in the world. It is the "Second Court of Appeal" which Professor Drummond said was an "absolute necessity."

Apostle Paul M. Hanson has published a book entitled Jesus Christ Among the Ancient Americans. It contains 220 pages of evidence from archaeology, paintings, legends, and traditions that such a being as Christ visited the ancient people of America, established Christianity among them, and, before leaving, promised to return.

During the last General Conference, Apostle W. Wallace Smith preached a splendid sermon on the subject, "Remember." During the sermon he said:

Wouldn't it be marvelous if today there could be uncovered in these countries where the original church was founded writings of the Apostle Paul which would give us additional assurance that Jesus was there and walked and communed with these people at that time? I am sure we would accept it if it could be authenticated as an additional witness to us of the divinity of Christ.

Yet today, as we go down into Mexico and Central America and uncover some of the archæological wonders of the world and make a study of them and have them brought to us by learned men of our church and of others, there comes a realization that here indeed is another witness for Christ in America. I wonder why it is that we as a people are not as diligent in witnessing for this particular record as we are in assuring people that the Christ was here and that he did walk and talk with us after he had been with those people in the early days? These things I would like to have you remember. Additional information is coming to us every day to corroborate the story of the Book of Mormon. Today, in the courts of law, it is only necessary to produce one witness in some cases to indict a man and perhaps send him to his death for certain types of crime. One witness is sufficient to do that. And yet as we look into our Book of Mormon and the record we have in it, we find there were three witnesses to the fact that these plates were as they were and that an angel came down and talked to these people. There were eight witnesses in addition to these, making eleven in all testifying to the truthfulness of this document that we have left to us. Yet there are those who will refuse to be diligent telling the world of this record we have. I'm saying to you at this time that this indicts us as a people if we refuse to be a witness in this latter day. Regardless of our place or station in the church, this is part of our responsibility.

WHAT IS THE MATTER with our Easter programs? I quote Brother Wallace again, "I am saying to you at this time that this indicts us as a people if we refuse to be a witness in this latter day."

We have all the evidence the so-called Christian world possesses, but, in addition, we have the witness of the men who helped to establish the church, and we have the "Second Court of Appeal." I will be dogmatic and say it is our business, especially at the Easter services, to feature our exclusive talking points referred to. We follow the lead of the world and have about the same Easter program as is given in any church. Let the talented folk in our branches give a real Latter Day Saint Easter program. It may be too late this year, but REMEMBER!

Worship Suggestions for May

Theme for the Month: OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS

MAY 1, 1949

Theme: SERVING THROUGH LOVE.

Prelude: "My Jesus, I Love Thee," Saints'
Hymnal, No. 12.

Call to Worship:

A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you; that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.—John 13: 34, 35.

Suggested Hymn: "Love Divine, All Love Excelling," Saints' Hymnal, No. 131.

Inspirational Talk:

Love is the basic fundamental upon which the entire world is built. Because of his great love for his creations, God gave his only begotten Son that we might live a more abundant life—one in which we have the gospel plan and every potentiality for the upbuilding of Zion's lives and homes. "The Lord said unto Enoch, Behold, these thy brethren, they are the workmanship of mine own hands, and I gave unto them their intelligence in the day that I created them. And in the garden of Eden gave I unto man his agency; and unto thy brethren have I said, and also gave commandment, that they should love one another; and that they should choose me their Father." What great love was manifested through the life of Christ! Although he was tempted in all ways, he held firm to the realization which came to him early in life when he said to his mother, Mary, "Know ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

The great gift of love has filled the bosoms of human beings since the beginning of time and has echoed and re-echoed through the years. During the reformation period, men, women, and children gave their lives for Christianity. When the gospel was restored in the latter days, men were again called upon to give their lives for the preservation of the Lord's work. This was indeed the essence of love—and the need for love remains today. It is our responsibility to bring peace to the world through the manifestation of brotherly love and through the redemption of Zion in our individual lives as well as through the gospel plan. We must, through love, "be a light unto all who sit in darkness, unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

Hymn: "Father, When in Love to Thee," Saints' Hymnal, No. 151.

Suggested Scripture Readings:

If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full. This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.—John 15: 10-13.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment. And the second is like this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these.—Mark 12: 35, 36.

Let brotherly love continue. Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.—Hebrews 13: 1, 2.

Call to Worship:

And now a commandment I give unto you, if you will be delivered: you shall set in order your own house, for there are many things that are not right in your house.—Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6.

Suggested Hymn: "I Would Be True," Saints'
Hymnal, No. 294.

Article in Tribute to Emma Hale Smith, first mother of the church. (This is an adaptation of an article written by Elbert A. Smith, first published in the Saints' Herald, January 20, 1926.)

THE POWER OF THE GOOD HOME

I have but to go back into the history of the church to remind you of the power of the good home. My father, David H. Smith, was born five months after his father, Joseph, had gone to a martyr's grave. His father had been slain by a mob at Carthage and carried home and laid at the feet of his wife. She would have been more than human if she had not said, "My unborn son, who will never see his father's face, shall never know the sacrifice that goes with his religion. I will take him and my other sons and lose myself in the obscurity of the world where the cross of Christ shall never claim another martyr from my family."

She did leave Nauvoo for a few months, but then she said to herself, "I have nothing left but my home, and no friend greater than God." So she went back to Nauvoo. She was told that her house would be burned over her head, but she went back into that home and gathered her children about her. I can imagine that when she lighted her lamp at night the rays shone out over the dark waters of the Mississippi and rose up into heaven like a widow's prayer: "Almighty God, make my house thy house; make my sons thy sons." And thus her sons, under her maternal care, grew strong in body and in spirit.

And when the church was ready, Emma presented her three sons: Joseph, the president and prophet of the church; Alexander, the patriarch and father of the church; David, the sweet singer of Israel.

The home had kept the faith. You may give to that home due credit. It helped save the church to you. Before I was born and before my father was born, a woman saved me to the church. No—she saved the church to me. The church might not have missed me; but she saved the church to me as she saved it to you.

I have in mind the thought that Zion shall be a collection of homes. And instead of three men only coming forth from one home, there will be a hundred thousand consecrated young men and women come forth from Zion's homes. When at night the lights in the homes that cluster about Zion's hills shall shine forth like the stars of heaven, righteousness shall look up from the earth and righteousness shall come down from heaven. Then shall be fulfilled the Master's word, "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid."

Hymn: "Behold the Savior at Your Door," Saints' Hymnal, No. 328.

By FRANCIS HARTMAN

Suggested Scripture Readings:

Whosoever cometh to me, and heareth my sayings and doeth them, I will show you to whom he is like. He is like a man who built a house, and digged deep and laid the foundation on a rock, and when the flood arose, the stream beat vehemently upon that house, and could not shake it; for it was founded upon a rock.—Luke 7: 47, 48.

Into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace to this house. And if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it; if not, it shall turn to you again.—Luke 10: 5, 6.

MAY 15, 1949

Theme: SERVING THROUGH KINDNESS

Prelude: "Something for Jesus," Saints' Hymnal, No. 302.

Call to Worship:

That best portion of a good man's life—
His little, nameless, unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love.
—William Wordsworth.

Duet: "Is Thy Cruse of Comfort Failing?"
Saints' Hymnal, No. 345.

Meditation in Verse:

(Clarity and measured speech will greatly enhance the effectiveness and beauty of this message.)

SEEDS OF KINDNESS

If you have a friend worth loving,
Love him. Yes, and let him know
That you love him, ere life's evening
Tinge his brow with sunset glow.
Why should good words ne'er be said
Of a friend—till he is dead?

If you hear a song that thrills you,
Sung by any child of song,
Praise it. Do not let the singer
Wait deserved praises long.
Why should one who thrills your heart
Lack the joy you may impart?

If you hear a prayer that moves you
By its humble, pleading tone,
Join it. Do not let the seeker
Bow before his God alone.
Why should not your brother share
The strength of "two or three" in prayer?

If you see the hot tears falling
From a brother's weeping eyes,
Share them. And by kindly sharing
Own your kinship in the skies.
Why should anyone be glad
When another's heart is sad?

If a silvery laugh goes rippling
Through the sunshine on his face,
Share it. 'Tis the wise man's saying—
For both grief and joy a place.
There's health and goodness in the mirth
In which an honest laugh has birth.

If your work is made more easy
By a friendly, helping hand,
Say so. Speak out brave and truly
Ere the darkness veil the land.
Should a fellow worker near
Falter for a word of cheer?

Scatter thus your seeds of kindness
All enriching as you go—
Leave them. Trust the Harvest-giver;
He will make each seed to grow.
So until the happy end,
Your life shall never lack a friend.
—Author Unknown.

Duet: "O Brother Man," Saints' Hymnal,
No. 339.

Suggested Scripture Readings:

For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer.—Isaiah 54: 7, 8.

... Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity. For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.—II Peter 1: 5-9.

Theme: SERVING THROUGH HUMILITY

Prelude: "How Gentle God's Command,"
Saints' Hymnal, No. 248.

Call to Worship:

Behold I speak unto you, and also to all those who have desires to bring forth and establish this work; and no one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care.—Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.

Hymn: "Savior, Like a Shepherd Lead Us,"
Saints' Hymnal, No. 263.

Suggested Meditation:

A GOOD CREED

If any little word of ours
Can make one life the brighter;
If any little song of ours
Can make one heart the lighter;
God help us speak that little word,
And take our bit of singing
And drop it in some lonely vale
To set the echoes ringing.

If any little love of ours
Can make one life the sweeter;
If any little care of ours
Can make one step the feeter;
If any little help may ease
The burden of another;
God give us love and care and strength
To help along each other.

If any little thought of ours
Can make one life the stronger;
If any cheery smile of ours
Can make its brightness longer;
Then let us speak that thought today,
With tender eyes aglowing,
So God may grant some weary one
Shall reap from our glad sowing.

Inspirational Talk:

Humility—that one great virtue which the world stamps out of the hearts of men so easily—is a necessity in the fundamental potentialities of the kingdom-builder. This talk should be based upon the words of Christ to his disciples, "He who is least among you all, the same shall be great," and, "Whosoever shall humble himself like one of these children, and receiveth me, ye shall receive my name. And whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me only, but him that sent me, even the Father." In the gospel plan of the Lord, there is room for the great and the small, there is need for work to be done in the ministry, in the women's department, in Zion's League, in the children's departments, in the use of music and other talents, in the keeping of the church home in beautiful condition, in arranging flowers for services. There is no task so small that it is not recorded as service; and to work in diligence and humility brings its own reward.

Hymn: "He Leadeth Me; Oh, Blessed Thought!" Saints' Hymnal, No. 264.

Suggested Scripture Readings:

The fear of the Lord is the instruction of wisdom; and before honor is humility.—Proverbs 15: 33.

By humility and the fear of the Lord are riches, and honor, and life.—Proverbs 22: 4.

All of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.—I Peter 5: 5.

MAY 29, 1949

Theme: SERVING THROUGH CHARITY

Prelude: "Blest Be the Tie That Binds,"
Saints' Hymnal, No. 343.

Call to Worship:

Clothe yourselves with the bonds of charity, as with a mantle, which is the bond of perfectness and peace; pray always, that you may not faint until I come; behold, and lo, I will come quickly, and receive you unto myself.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 38.

Hymn: "You May Sing of the Beauty,"
Saints' Hymnal, No. 109.

A Sermon in Scripture:

Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity it profiteth me nothing.

Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.

Doth not behave itself unseemly seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;

Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;

Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

Charity never faileth; but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, they shall vanish away.

For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

For now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.—I Corinthians, chapter 13.

Hymn: "Take Time to Be Holy," Saints' Hymnal, No. 322.

Suggested Meditations:

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to perfection.—Abraham Lincoln.

We rise by raising others—and he who stoops above the fallen, stands erect.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Suggested Scripture Readings:

Put on . . . as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness.—Colossians 3: 12-14.

Now the end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned.—I Timothy 1: 5.

Above all things have fervent charity among yourselves; for charity preventeth a multitude of sins.—I Peter 4: 8.

What Does April 6 Mean to You?

By Mrs. V. D. Ruch

OUR LIVES are full of days, each one far more precious than we realize. However, in our calendar of days, there are certain ones that stand out. They are the red letter days we hold in reverence and celebrate. Some of these days take us back to past joys and achievements; others remind us of great men that have lived and died and left with us the heritage of service they have rendered; still others speak to us of freedom and the birth of a nation. But the days that count most are the ones that reach into the innermost recesses of our lives and hallow them with the presence of Divinity. These are the days that not only bring back the rich experiences of yesteryear, but serve us in this present age and stretch forth into the future, linking us with eternity. These are the days that are important, not just in the lives of a few or even a nation. They reach out and touch the souls of all men everywhere. Such days are Christmas and Easter and—may I also say—April 6.

What of that day? What does it mean to you—to me, to our nation, to the world, to the ongoing movement of time and eternity? Is it a red-letter day on your calendar? Is it cherished in your heart? Does it link you with eternity?

Once upon a time, long ages ago, a lone man beheld a bush burning in the midst of a desert. The bush was not consumed, and he turned aside to see this great sight. The voice of the Lord spoke to him from that bush. The place whereupon he stood was holy ground, and the glory of the Lord shone round about. Many years afterward, there were shepherds in a field tending their flocks by night. The glory of the Lord shone round about them too. Their souls were filled with tidings of great joy and the song of angels. Then there was the time when Christ took three men with him up into a high mountain to pray. The glory of the Lord was also there, and Christ was transfigured before their very eyes. And the voice of God spoke to them.

A little more than a century ago, a young man went into a grove to pray. The glory of the Lord shone round about him, too, as he knelt there. Again the heavens opened, and the voice of God spoke to him. A few years later, this same young man met with five other men in a room to organize a church. God was there that day, too, and the glory of the Lord moved those men in the thing they did there.

Were these experiences we have just related mere days in the lives of Moses, the shepherds, of Christ and the disciples, and of Joseph Smith and his associates? Many men have seen burning bushes, and many shepherds have watched their flocks by night. Christ, no

"April Showers Bring May Flowers" is the theme song of a month of promise. The fresh green of the trees and the grass, tiny shoots bursting into bloom almost before they have pierced the earth, row upon row of new gardens, fields everywhere alive with the activity of spring planting and cultivation—all these things attest to the hope of better things to come.

April is blessed this year with the day of celebrating the promise of all promises, Easter. With most of the world denying the existence of God, it is good to know that long before sunrise, throngs will be gathering throughout all Christendom to manifest their belief and joy in the truth that he is indeed risen, and because he is, we, too, may reap the eternal harvest through the planting and cultivation of our garden of life.

—Lula Carmichael.

doubt, often took his disciples up into a mountain to pray. Many a lad has sought the solitude of the forest for his prayers, and countless men have organized their churches. Why, then, do the memories of these days linger with us and continue to bring rich experiences into our lives so many years afterwards? Just this—the glory of the Lord was there, and his voice was heard speaking to them with a divine command and commission. And they were true to that commission and went forth in the name of the Lord to do his bidding. The heavens opened, and men hastened to obey.

WHAT OF APRIL 6, 1830? That was not just another day, nor did those men meet to organize just another church. Already there were many churches. What those men did that day was to bring out of the darkness the church of Jesus Christ and restore it to earth again in these latter days—"the only true and living church upon the face of the earth today." It was a church organized with a divine command and pattern, for a divine purpose, and with a divine commission. God was again speaking from on high, and men turned aside to hear his voice and to hearken to his words. The gifts and blessings of the gospel in its fullness were again brought to earth. The pattern of a social order—new, yet old—and a living message of salvation to declare to the ends of the world was given to the Saints of the Lord.

What does April 6 mean? It means the Restoration, authority, the old Jerusalem gospel, divine revelation. It means Zion—the hope of the world. But it also brings to us the rich heritage of the early Saints who, with their very life's blood, saved the church to you and to me and to all men everywhere.

Last summer I made my first visit to Nauvoo, and there a great revelation awaited me. As we drove through that quaint, beautiful country and were entering the city of Nauvoo, peace settled like a mantle over my soul. The hills seemed to draw sheltering arms about me, and I felt safe from all harm and anything that might molest. This was quite puzzling to me. I couldn't understand how such a peaceful experience could come to me in a region which had been the scene of so much violence, heartache, and bloodshed. This wonderful influence remained with me through the days, and I pondered over it in meditation and prayer. Finally the answer came in a glorious burst of light. This peace and protection were a part of the heritage handed down to us by the Saints of the early days. Love had overcome hate; martyrdom had surmounted prejudice and bloodshed; the light of the gospel in the lives of those people had driven away darkness. Their suffering, sacrifice, and fidelity had hallowed the land. "Thus they did leave a blessing upon the land in their prayers." What a heritage!

When I reviewed the history of those first days and thought of the great work of Joseph Smith in the organization and founding of the church, I sang from the bottom of my heart, "We Thank Thee, O God, for a Prophet." Truly he was prophet, seer, and revelator. He had been obedient to the command of the Lord, even to death. With his own life's blood, he gave the church to us.

IT WAS MY PRIVILEGE to be domiciled in the Mansion House. As I went through those hallowed rooms, I seemed to sense something of the spirit of that home when Joseph and Emma lived there. Through all those dark and troublesome days, that home had remained true. Emma had indeed filled the office of her calling by being a comfort to her husband—the Lord's servant—in his afflictions and trials. "The heart of her husband could safely trust in her." Many times he was torn from her side by ruthless enemies, but her love and loyalty followed him still. She carried on the work while he was gone. The sheltering warmth of a peaceful home and the arms of a loving wife always met him on his return. She was ever "his faithful, loving Emma"—wife, companion, helper, and friend.

As I looked over the wide expanse of the waters of the Mississippi there in Nauvoo, I was reminded of the time when Emma, fleeing from Far West and vengeful enemies, crossed that frozen river with two children in her arms and two clinging to her skirts. Around her waist she carried the hidden manuscript of the Inspired Version of the Holy Scriptures. I sensed more than ever before the stanch courageous spirit of the woman whom God had called an elect lady. She didn't know where her husband was, but she was carrying on in his place, taking her children with her to a place of safety to which he could return when his enemies set him free, and all the time preserving the manuscript at the peril of her life. What confidence God must have had in her, and how she measured up to that confidence!

When her husband was slain by an angry mob and carried home to her and laid at her feet, she still remained true. We could not have censured her too much had she fled from it all, determined that this work would never claim another martyr from her family. She had lost the dearest thing she had on earth—but God was dearer! Her home was her important duty, and her children her stewardship. The ongoing movement of that organization which had taken place on April the sixth was in her hands. Brave woman that she was, with all the power of her being, she arose to the occasion and did much to save the church to you and to me.

In the quietude of her home, she raised her sons to service in the church. They were not hers—they were the Lord's. And when God called for them, she had them ready. Without her contribution, there probably wouldn't have been any prophet for the Reorganization, and the Lord would have had to look elsewhere for a father to the church and a sweet singer of Israel. Under her gentle hands, neighbor and stranger alike received ministry. She compiled a hymnbook. She organized and led the first "Women's Relief Society." She helped rally the Saints again to the standard when they had almost lost hope. Truly her ministry was great. Can we presume to say that her calling to Christian Womanhood and Elect Ladyship was any less sacred than that of her husband as prophet, seer, and revelator? Wife, mother, handmaiden of the Lord, elect lady, good neighbor and friend, servant of the church and community—what a heritage she passed on, and what a challenge!

AS I SAT THERE in prayer service that morning contemplating these things, a truly great spirit of consecration swelled within my breast. I, too, wanted to pass on a heritage to future generations. I desired to be pure, true, and brave. I wanted, with all my heart, to fulfill my calling as wife, mother, friend, and neighbor. I determined to help keep this cause moving by giving my best. I wanted to help save this great church to those yet unborn. And there I pledged my consecration.

What does April 6 mean to you and me? It means we can be servants and handmaidens of the Lord. It means we all have a heritage to pass on. It means we have trusts to keep and homes to save and children to bless for the Lord. It means we must be filled with the joy of our salvation and guard well the great heritage that has been passed on to us. It means we must fulfill the privilege of our stewardship by serving and serving and serving. It means loving the Lord with all our heart, mind, and strength and our neighbor as ourselves. It means gratitude, holiness, consecration, obedience, sacrifice, and suffering. But it also means joy, abundant living, and life everlasting to us and all mankind. It means "the glory of the Lord shining round about us." It means the ground whereon we stand is holy. The voice of the Lord speaks from on high. Will you heed his call?

If your reading time is limited, do look first for these articles and features from March magazines.

"You Can Take It With You," Woman's Home Companion, contains a few suggestions useful to any woman who attends covered-dish luncheons or suppers.

"It Hurts to Grow Up," Woman's Home Companion, is good reading for parents of "twelve-to-twenty" children. You'll recognize your own child, no doubt.

"Death Be Not Proud," a book by John Gunther, may be found in condensed form in the February Ladies' Home Journal and in the March Reader's Digest. It is not-entertainment, but is an inspiring account of courage and faith.

"The World I Want for Children," Parents' Magazine, discusses ways of insuring the future of our children and tomorrow's children. It was written by a mother and member of Congress, Helen Graham Douglas.

"Till Children Do Us Part," Parents' Magazine, (also condensed in Reader's Digest) will help parents to maintain a healthy attitude about marriage and the family.

BRIEFS

ORLANDO, FLORIDA.—On February 6, Patriarch E. R. Carter completed a series of four sermons to this congregation and their friends. In the week preceeding this date, six members received patriarchal blessings, and a number of isolated Saints were visited. The gift of prophecy was heard by some of the Saints for the first time, at the midweek prayer service.

BAY MINETTE BRANCH, ALABAMA.—On February 6, the Zion's League participated in the installation service of the new officers: Pat Baggette, president, vice-president, and study chairman; Betty Joyce Newton, worship chairman; Charles Weatherford, service chairman, secretary and treasurer; Mrs. Mitchell White, recreation chairman; Carolyn White, pianist. The League was in charge of the evening service at the church, Sunday, February 13. It was a candlelight service under the leadership of Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Clark. The theme was "The Three Standard Books of the Church." Approximately twelve League members participated in the program.

RICHLAND, WASHINGTON. — Apostle C. George Mesley, assisted by Bishop Monte Lasater, and Seventies Arthur Gibbs and Phillip Moore organized the Richland Branch on November 29. There are approximately seventy families in attendance at the new branch, with nineteen members of the priesthood. Richland has been a mission since March, 1945. The Saints hold services in rooms of one of the public schools of the city. A surplus building has been purchased, a location is procured and the Saints of Richland Branch hope to build a church home in 1949.

Seventy Arthur Gibbs held a two-week series of illustrated lectures in Richland in November and December, and one week in North Richland. Three men were ordained to the Aaronic priesthood on December 12, 1948. They are W. Marvin Cox, deacon; Angus C. Doer, teacher; Harold C. Hight, priest.

DOW CITY, IOWA.—Two families became united in the church on December 12, when Fauchon Quick and Don Armstrong were baptized. Several babies have been blessed during the recent months: Jerry Duayne, son of Mr. and Mrs. Max Lambert, Gary William, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Staller, Leslee June, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Don Armstrong, Patricia Jean, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Porter Lowry, and Roberta Jean, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Baxter. Pastor Elvin Baughman and his associates are conducting regular cottage meetings during week nights. Increased attendance at services is evidenced as a result.

DELTA, COLORADO.—After a series of services in this branch, Seventy Russell Ralston reports a total of six requests for baptism. The average attendance at his services was fifty-five to sixty, of which there was an average of twenty-two nonmembers.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.—The official opening of the new church in Louisville was held March 27 with President Israel A. Smith as the principle speaker. Apostle W. W. Smith, minister in charge of this field, was also present. A cantata, "Behold, It Is Written," by Louise Hills Lewis, was presented by the choir on Saturday evening. President Smith was the scheduled speaker at 10:00 o'clock Sunday morning for the dedication service. The church is located at 4800 South Third at Kenwood way.

PORTLAND, OREGON.—Apostle C. G. Mesley and Missionary Arthur F. Gibbs finished a School of Evangelism in this branch early in March. District President J. L. Verhei reports that this week of meetings were the best attended that the branch has ever had. On the first Sunday, there were 327, and on the second Sunday, there were 517. The average night attendance was 178. Loren and Wana McDole and Bishop M. E. Lasater from Seattle helped with the school, as did Patriarch Mark Yeoman and the district officers. The attendance was from the city of Portland and the Oregon District.

Nine men were ordained in the district. To the office of elder: Robert Bailey, Sherwood; Earl Wilcox, La Grande. To the office of priest: Robert Nelson, Portland; Robert Henderson, Bend; John Rodley, Roseburg; Hale Whiting, Longview; John McKee and Joseph Schofield, Baker. To the office of teacher: Donald Sawyer, Portland.

HONOLULU, HAWAII.—According to the report of Missionary Howard Miller, Hilo Branch presented J. M. Kemp, baritone soloist in a concert at Hilo High School, with his wife, Helen, accompanying him at the piano. There was an audience of 400 persons. The Hilo Tribune Herald carried a very favorable article of appreciation. Brother Kemp also broadcasts in a regular radio program. He is giving the church good advertisement.

The subscriptions to Daily Bread in Honolulu and vicinity have reached 120. This worship magazine is filling a need in the homes, and good comments are heard concerning it.

A priesthood visiting program is being carried out in two congregations of Honolulu—Kalihi on the first and third Tuesdays of the month and Makiki on the second and fourth Tuesdays. On these nights all members of the priesthood meet at the church at 6:30 p.m. They then divide two by two. They are assigned homes and given pertinent information concerning the ones they are to visit. They are suggested objectives for the visit, such as to talk about Daily Bread and family worship, or similar pointed aids. If there are any sick, two elders are assigned. The group has prayer together, and then they go out. An individual priesthood member does not go out with the same worker each time, and thus by working with different ones, an understanding and unity is being built among the group. The majority of the priesthood have joined in the program, and among those who have, spiritual growth is apparent.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—Missionary G. Wayne Smith baptized one family of three during a recent series in the Ashburn Mission and left a growing interest in the work of the church among the members.

MISSOURI VALLEY, IOWA.—Further news concerning the recent flood in which several Reorganized Latter Day Saint families lost their belongings, is reported by Apostle D. T. Williams. Three church families in this town lost about all their possessions when the levee of the Boyer River broke, driving about 1,500 people from their homes. Nine other Latter Day Saint families were among those driven from their homes and suffering damage to their property. The church was flooded to within one foot of the basement ceiling, damaging the furnishings, including the church school and kitchen equipment. The furnace was filled with mud and debris.

PASADENA, CALIFORNIA.—Kathleen Esther Murphy, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Murphy of Portland, Oregon, was blessed at the Pasadena Branch on February 27. Elders Joseph F. Ruchaber and Warren K. McElwain officiated. Mrs. Murphy is the former Uarda Eyer of the Pasadena Mission.

Mr. James Shafer and Mrs. Virginia M. Shafer of this branch were baptized by Elder Warren K. McElwain, pastor of the Pasadena Branch, at Central, Los Angeles. Confirmation was on Sunday morning, March 6, with Elders McElwain and Harry Waylett officiating.

Those selected to report the news of the branches are urged to write the editor for our "Helps for Reporters."

Creation and Destiny

This is the same covenant which was in the ordination of Abraham.

Jesus said, "Thy kingdom come." It was already in existence. He said that the kingdom of heaven is like a grain of mustard seed . . . which grew into a tree so that the fowls of the heaven came and lodged in the branches thereof. That is a covenant God has made with us in these the latter days. The covenants of God reach back to the beginning of time, and they stretch forward into eternity. The people who pay attention to them, who know about them, who live for them, are blessed by their provision. Think of it! "When thy posterity shall embrace the truth and look upward, then shall Zion look downward." This group of people is the most significant group of people on the earth today. And yet how far short we come with our trivialities. Our gaze isn't upward—it is outward. We're too busy looking at things around us to seek for the things that are above us. We have ambitions, but no aspirations. We come time and again to the veil which separates us from God, but we don't recognize it is a veil, and because we don't, we never put forth our hands to part it. I'm sure, under the evident blessing of our Father, and the blessing of this covenant, that we can go forth with new hope. What God purposes, he will do. We're not called to do his work. We're called to assist him in doing his work. And under his leadership, by the power of his spirit, I'm sure that we shall be able to do it if we will.

But when these laws and their resultant blessings are tendered toward nonmembers, too, it is a much finer accomplishment.

If, with our knowledge of the church standards, we are impressed, we can know nonmembers—75 to 80 per cent of those hospitalized—are also influenced by the service they receive and the atmosphere prevailing there. One such patient made this remark to a church member last summer: "These are fine people out here. When I get out, I intend to learn more about them." Such interested persons—possible converts—are contacted by capable ministers after their release. And, as would be expected, the church gains some new members.

Those Saints who are so situated they can be hospitalized at the Sanitarium when necessary are certainly privileged, for its peaceful influence and high medical standards are incentives toward well-being.

Suggestions for Learning New Hymns

Such periods of worship training could eliminate the necessity of the pastor or man in charge of motioning or telling the congregation to rise for certain hymns if the congregation knew that when the man in charge of the service arose during the playing of the hymn by the organ, that it was a signal for the congregation to rise also. Such responsibility for attention by the congregation would also create within it a quickening interest in the progress and success of the service and make the members more active participants. Much congregational apathy is due to the fact that the people have no active part in many services; they are told when to stand, when to sit, and when to do everything else so that they don't have to use their own minds or pay any particular attention to the progress of the service. Training periods for congregational activity in worship are essential to better participation in singing, responsive reading, appreciation of the organ music, and even interest in the spoken word.

That church whose congregation has discovered its powers of song, and likewise the inspiration and uplift that come through religious self-expression in worship, hymns, and music, will find that a newer and finer atmosphere has been created for the advancement of all the interests of the church.

The Unseen Power — By Robert Heald

NO ONE HAS ever seen the power of God, but we all know it does exist. Neither can we see the power which drives the piston of an engine up and down, but we know that power is there because we see the engine turn; and the car, in which the engine is mounted, moves. We can feel the movement, but we can't see what actually causes it.

Everything has a creator. God created man, and man, in turn, created the automobile. The creator has a plan which makes his creation work, but it doesn't always respond. It takes water, oil, gas, tires, electricity, and many other things to make an automobile function properly, and these essentials must be in first-class working condition, or the power needed to make it go just isn't there. It takes every item in its place, working properly and at the right time.

God created man. God has a plan. We are his working parts—his spark plugs, pistons, gears, and wheels. Each and every one of us has a part to play if we are to make God's plan work. We must work together as a unit, just as the parts in the automobile. If a spark plug is missing, some power is lost. Therefore, the automobile moves haltingly forward. The plan of the Creator is not completed. After all the work that goes into the making of an automobile, how do you suppose the creator of it feels when something is missing or not working properly? How do we feel after working on a car for hours or days when it still will not go and give the power needed to make it move forward? God's plan is for us to work with one another—to co-operate—to thrive as a unit.

We can see the results of the power of God just as we can see the results of the power in an automobile, if we work together properly and in the right place. Our part here on earth is to build the kingdom of God—to strive for that power we cannot actually see, yet we can feel it and see the results of Robert Heald, recently called to the office of priest, has been a member of the church only two years. He was active in young people's work before joining and was responsible for organizing the Junior Zion's League in Tucson Branch. His present occupation is assistant service manager of the Rollings Motor Company in Tucson. He and his wife, the former Margaret Hartman, have two sons: Bobby, six, and Barty, three.

it. If we want to build a church, each of us must do his share. If we want a prayer service to be a success, each one must participate in it. There can be no missing parts. The power of God will come to us so that we can feel it and see the results of it if each one desires it.

We are all children of God. We must not let our Creator down. We must let him show what great power he has. We must all pray for his power and his Spirit to make the wheels of progress turn onward and forward. Co-operation in prayer or service or whatever you do will help you accomplish the task, but remember—it takes every part. To bring about the desires of your prayer, you must have faith.

We are told in Mark, "Therefore, I say unto you: whatsoever things ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive, and ye shall have whatsoever ye ask." Have you ever thought about an unanswered prayer or desire in this manner?—"I have done everything I can think of to be worthy of the desire, but I did not get an answer." A lot depends on the desire. Is it acceptable to God or not? Is it foolish or just? If it is foolish, you deserve no answer. If it is just and all parts are in proper order, it will be answered. It is up to us as links in God's plan to make it go.

No one person or part can bring about the power of God to such an extent that it will move forward and attract more persons, thereby adding more power. As soon as each one of us is doing his part, the power of God will come to us in immeasurable quantity. We will grow quickly, and Zion will become a reality.

It is our desire to live peacefully with each other, rather than existing always with the fear of impending war. The sooner we can attain this state of living, the better we'll be able to carry out God's plan for us. If we delay, we shall move forward slowly as an automobile with a clogged gas line.

We cannot see the power of God, but we can feel it and see the effects of it in operation. It is much like the wind that moves unseen among the trees, and the atom—invisible to the naked eye—that surpasses all other known forms of energy. We know these things exist, because we can see their results. So it is with our religion. So it is with the power of God.

Watch Your Elbows! — By Marie Gosline

THERE WAS ONCE A BOY—just a simple, lonely, country lad—who wrote many songs about the Lord he loved. These songs are the Psalms, and there is one which is particularly beautiful to me. In this one hundred seventh Psalm, the same verse appears four times. It is seen first in the eighth verse, then in the fifteenth, again in the twenty-first, and finally in the thirty-first verse. “Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!”

I wonder if you have ever lived in a Centerville, or if you have ever known a Jones family? All went well in Centerville until the Jones family arrived. The little branch functioned as one large family, each doing his part to make the organization “work.” Everyone was contented and busy until Satan arrived. But he did arrive—and guess where! Right on the elbows of the Jones family. You see, the Joneses had feelings, and these feelings were not hidden away and forgotten about; they were always out in plain sight—especially on Sundays. Few people go around hurting other’s feelings willfully. If only the Jones family had been busy “praising the Lord for his goodness”—what a difference it would have made in Centerville!

Now if you have ever lived in a Centerville, you know what one large family can add to a tiny, struggling branch. When the Joneses came, they had all the “breaks.” They had a clean slate. They moved into Centerville without a past. All was before them, and what a glorious future theirs could have been! In it, they could have lived, labored, and rejoiced in this tiny but ever so important field for Christ called Centerville. But not the Joneses! You see, they had feelings, and they were so busy wondering on whose elbow Satan would rest himself next that they completely forgot to “praise the Lord for his goodness.”

Now as soon as Satan found a nice, soft resting place on the elbows of the Jones family, these “feelings” became contagious. Peace and harmony were on their way out, and Satan was on the way in. For sure, he was on the royal road to success in Centerville, and before long the whole branch was in turmoil. Sister So-and-So wouldn’t speak to Brother This-and-That. Just as soon as the pastor made a point in his sermon on a certain Sunday morning, Sister Black whispered to Brother White—who was a little hard of hearing —“His wife told him to say that.” There wasn’t anyone to play the piano, there were no altos in the choir because—of all things—the pianist and the altos had had their feelings hurt!

So, by this little story, you see what havoc can be wrought by just a few who forget to “praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men.” If only all of us could remember to “praise the Lord for his goodness,” Satan would not find so welcome a spot on our elbows, and there need not be any Centerville, and certainly there need not be any Jones family.

WILL YOU? — By SADI MOON

PEARL HAS A BIG HOUSE and nothing to take up her time, so when the pastor asked her to take a circle of Oriole girls, she said, “Yes, I’ll try,” which is really the most important characteristic of a top-notch Oriole leader.

Pearl’s home is a block from the junior high school, which shows that the Lord is looking after those girls. It wasn’t long before the Orioles, all eighteen of them, began bringing their lunches to Pearl’s house at noon and spending those happy hours in her bright sunroom, catching up on badge requirements, discussing service projects, planning circle meetings, and just talking. Pearl welcomes them daily. Those young girls enjoy a seven-day-a-week Oriole program, church-centered.

The Oriole and Boy Scout programs are sponsored by our church for the junior high boys and girls. Consecrated leaders is the first need of this age group. The happiest combinations arise when a group of girls or boys, needing leadership and companionship, are gathered under the wing of a person like Pearl. Perhaps not all can turn over their homes and most of their time as Pearl does, but they can love these young people and their Heavenly Father enough to see that by keeping their allegiances church-centered now, no extra efforts will be necessary in ten or twenty years to get them “out to church.” Such leaders are hastening the day of Zion’s fulfillment.

The Oriole and the Boy Scout, under a leader who is consecrated to Christ, live our church beliefs in their daily lives. They learn that religion is life, that God is their great companion, and that the church is his instrument for perfecting his children on earth. Who will volunteer to guide young citizens in the work of the kingdom? Will you?

The Need for Ministry

I want to express my appreciation for the help I have received from reading the Herald. I want to say, too, that a visit from a member of the priesthood means much to an isolated Saint. Those who are ministers should consider their calling a great opportunity to serve God. Elder Harry Sheffer has brought many blessings to the Saints in New Mexico. His visits each year is the only chance we have to hear the gospel. Through his ministry, my husband and older daughter have been baptized and my two younger children blessed. We would be happy to have somebody here who could meet with the Saints and help to organize the work. Will one who is qualified answer our need?

From an Isolated Saint

Being isolated, I find I can't do without the Herald. There are many excellent articles and testimonies in it. It strengthens me to read the Three Standard Books, also; through the spirit, I have been able to understand many things in them.

God has blessed and healed me numerous times. Several years ago I had a dislocated knee. After receiving administration, I felt the bone pop back into place and have not felt any discomfort in it since. Other members of my family have been miraculously healed also.

It is a wonderful privilege to belong to this church. I hope I shall be able to help in accomplishing the purpose of God for it. I ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints.

Concerning Kneeling

I read the Herald and try to apply the advice in it. I am glad there are those in the church who have the courage to write such articles as those which have recently appeared concerning the conducting of church services. As I study the Doctrine and Covenants, I find the command is definitely given for the church to kneel as the prayer of blessing is offered for the emblems. Of course, no one would expect the maimed or crippled to torture themselves by kneeling; the Heavenly Father is loving and merciful. He does, however, expect obedience from his Saints who are able to kneel.

I share my Herald with others trusting that they may be benefited also. God has been good to me all my days; this I acknowledge with gratitude.

Receives a Blessing

I enjoy reading and hearing the testimonies of others. I, too, have received a blessing since my affiliation with this church. Although for many years I was in ill health, since my baptism and the birth of my first child, I have been healed of my affliction. Perhaps the reason I hadn't received this blessing before is that I might not have used it wisely. As time goes by, I'm learning to help with God's work and to instruct my family. I feel that we are "growing up" in this work, and we are happy to be able to help.

May God bless all who seek to do his will.

"The Voice of Warning"

In my neighborhood lived a good, honest, hard-working woman. She and her husband reared a family of seven children, all honorable and respected. They didn't attend church often, although some of the young people did go to Religio occasionally with their Latter Day Saint friends. One day, the fifteen-year-old son was stricken with a heart ailment and, after several months of suffering, passed away. The mother's sorrow was very great, and she seemed only to want to be alone. There was a driveway between her home and that of a Latter Day Saint family. When the Saints decided to move to another town, they discarded some of their articles and burned them in the driveway. When evening came, the grief-stricken mother walked along the driveway and noticed a scorched book near the edge of the embers. When she saw the words, "The Voice of Warning," she picked the book up and took it into the house to read. While reading it, the spirit of resignation came to her troubled heart and mind, and a power began to burn within her soul. She started to attend church after that, and at the close of a series conducted by Elder Richard Baldwin, she asked for baptism. She was a faithful member and many times bore the testimony that she knew the gospel was true.

God moves in mysterious ways his wonders to perform.

God Speaks

I believe Latter Day Saints have a concept of God no other Christians have. We believe he is a living, personal Father—one who is able to reveal his will to man. If we ever reach the condition in which we deny divine revelation, we will no longer be a "different" people. Where there is life, there is nourishment, and a living church requires attention. If we intend to establish Zion, we have a lot of "growing up" to do, and our only source of nourishment for this type of growth is divine revelation. Our need for spiritual guidance is greater today than it has ever been.

To say that God no longer speaks is to say he is a changeable God. Would a father who really loves his child give him counsel when he is very young and then refuse to pay any attention to him later on? So it is with the church. God spoke to the prophets of old, but the prophecies of their time are not adequate for today's needs.

We must never deny the existence of this power. If we do, we shall be a lost people, groping in darkness.

Wants to Correspond With Members

I am nineteen years old, married, and will soon become a mother. Although there is no church in this town, I know I am not alone in my faith so long as there is another Latter Day Saint somewhere in the world. I should like to hear from other members, young or old. I know their letters will help me, and perhaps I can help them, too.

 MORNING MAIL

You struggle to get your desk cleared, and you almost succeed, when the next mail comes in, and a new deluge descends upon it. Papers that you can't find time to read; ads for things you can't buy; requests for money you can't give; questions you can't answer; inquiries about literary treasures, received long ago, that you can't find; bulky printed information about hopeless projects and lost causes you can't do anything about. Editors are a frustrated lot—so many things they can't do. All these to dispose of before you get down to the real work on your publication, for which you are paid. So many papers calling for decisions, information, or help. You try pushing the stuff over Here, but that doesn't help; you try piling it over There, which is no better. One morning you find your desk buried under the avalanche of mail, and for several weeks you don't see it. Then in desperation you excavate, glad to find that it has been there all the time.

 THE FRIENDLY NOTE

When I went to the store the other day, my grocer had a minute to chat. "I like to buy here," I told him. "But I really come in for something you don't have on your shelves." That one puzzled him. "I come in for friendship, too, along with my groceries. When I was young, I enjoyed going to the big city and shopping in the large department stores where I didn't know a soul. But now I like to shop with friendly people, and it is fun to have the manager call me by my first name." Why do people come back again and again? They can buy goods anywhere. They come for the intangibles: for clear light and clean walls, for a pleasant odor of good things, and above all for the pleasant faces and voices of friendly people Incidentally, that affects church attendance, too. What is the atmosphere like at your church?

 QUIPS

A smart wife sends her husband to the grocery occasionally to do the shopping, just so he will have a real look at the high cost of living. . . . Moreover, if he overspends the budget, he doesn't fuss. . . . And furthermore, he pays for it out of his pocket, instead of out of her budget. . . . A wise wife, if she can make it work!

Tip to husbands: Wash the dishes for your wife tonight. Let her dry and put them away, so they can be found for the next meal. She won't say much, but the compliments you give yourself for this great generous act will make you feel wonderful!

There is nothing in the world more fun than the feeling you have when you discover that the government took too big a bite out of your pocketbook for weekly income tax deductions, and has to send some of it back. And that naive idea they have that you might want to leave it there so it will be ready for next year! "Send it back, Uncle—I worked for it—you didn't!"

How's YOUR Missionary Effort?

Are you winning members? Telling the Story to your friends . . . non-member relatives . . . people you meet? That's what personal evangelism calls for!

One good way to tell prospective members about our church in a pleasant manner is to hand them copies of our new tract, "Hear Our Story" from the missionary kit shown above. In this tract, your friends will read the story of our church and find brief facts about our church in simple, easy-to-read language.

"Your Missionary Kit" includes five copies of the pocket-sized "Hear Our Story" tract plus the large "This Is Our Church" tract for church members. "This Is Our Church" has just been revised with latest pictures of church officials.

NEWS AND NOTES

FRANKLYN WEDDLE TO DIRECT "MESSIAH"

Two performances of Handel's "Messiah" will be presented by the Los Angeles Metropolitan District Choir under the direction of Franklyn Weddle, General Church Director of Music.

The first performance will be presented at the Long Beach church on Palm Sunday evening, April 10, at 7:30 o'clock. The second performance will be at the Central Los Angeles church on Easter Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock.

This presentation of the "Messiah" is one of several activities planned for the current year by the officers and members of the newly organized Los Angeles Metropolitan District.

A very successful interbranch play contest was held during the month of February, and Zion's League entries from the eleven branches and missions of the district will compete in a Restoration Festival Oratorical contest on Sunday, March 27. The winners will be featured speakers at the Restoration Festival banquet, April 6.

There are approximately 3,000 members in the district, and three new congregations have been organized at Van Nuys, Southgate, and South Los Angeles during the past thirteen months.

CHURCH DESTROYED

Lester Dyke, pastor of Canton, Oklahoma, Branch, wired Bishop G. L. DeLapp Wednesday morning, March 30, to report that the Canton Reorganized Latter Day Saint church was completely destroyed in a tornado that struck the town during the night. Three Oklahoma towns were hit by the storm.

FARROW AND BALDWIN ON TRIP

Apostle Percy E. Farrow and Bishop Joseph E. Baldwin made an extensive trip of the four districts, Chatham, London, Owen Sound, and Toronto. On February 12 and 13 they were at a young people's institute in the newly rededicated London, Ontario, church. Missionary Louis Zonker and his new wife, Betty, made their first appearance in Ontario, where he will be missionary. They and Brother Baldwin are excellently received in their new territory. Other appointees present at the institute were Jack Pray, president of Chatham District, and Carl Muir, president of London District. The institute was of the combined London and Chatham Districts.

On the week end of February 19, 20, Brothers Baldwin and Farrow attended a week end workers' institute at Owen Sound. They ended their trip by attending the youth talent institute in Toronto on March 4, 5, and 6. The theme was "Stewardship of Our Talents." Franklyn S. Weddle, church director of music, was present at the institute. Brothers Baldwin and Weddle taught classes and delivered the sermons.

PRIESTHOOD INSTITUTES

After returning from a short visit with his family in Portland, Oregon, Apostle W. Wallace Smith resumed his work in Southeastern United States with a schedule of three priesthood institutes: Mobile, Alabama, on April 1-3; Brewton, Alabama, on April 8-10; and Bandera, Texas, combining the Central and Southwest Texas Districts, on April 15-17.

Dr. F. M. McDowell, supervisor of priesthood education of the General Church, was present at all three of these institutes to direct instruction.

STANDING BEFORE PILATE, Jesus declared, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I might bear witness of the truth."

Our brethren of the Twelve and Seventy are called to be "special witnesses of the name of Christ in all the world." How fitting it is, then, that they should be directly charged that their mission is "to persuade men to obey the truth."

All of us spend a major part of our time in practicing the arts of persuasion. Many earn their living by persuading others to give, others to buy and to sell, to study, to work, and to vote. But no one ever exercised a nobler calling than persuading men to obey the truth.

Nevertheless, none of us need envy the Twelve or the Seventy, for we are all called to share in this ministry of persuasion. The only limits set are these which center in our devotion, our zeal, our time, our strength, our understanding, and our skill.

Obviously, we share their ministry when we provide the financial means which enables these brethren to respond to the call of the church, which is the call of Christ. We also share when we remember the missionaries in our prayers, write them letters of encouragement, bring our friends to hear them preach, and add our own testimony. We share best of all when we do all these things. Each contribution we make strengthening, illuminating, and blessing all the others.

"Wherefore now let every man learn his duty in the field of persuasion and act in the office in which he is appointed, in all diligence."

Introducing . . .

LOYD R. ADAMS (page 5) was born March 6, 1919, at Magnolia, Iowa. He was graduated from Magnolia High School in 1936, and from Graceland in 1938. The next year he was ordained an elder and elected pastor of the McKenzie, Alabama, Branch. He was the shepherd of this flock until he was sent out as a missionary appointee in 1944. Since that time he has served as pastor at Cameron, Missouri, and as missionary in Central Missouri Stake, and in Ohio. He has also done some missionary work in Southeastern and Central Illinois Districts, and in Sault Ste. Marie District and Ontario. He was ordained to the quorum of seventy, October 10, 1948. This is his first Herald contribution.

His marriage to Lula Odom occurred on December 4, 1938. They have three children: Charlene Raye, 9; Judy Margret, 7; Loyd Ray, 2. The Adams home is now in Columbus, Ohio.

JOHN W. RUSHTON (page 7) received his early training as an "apothecary" in Leeds, England. His ability to delight his audiences with long and unusual words doubtless stems from his training in the use of the Latin root words used in the drug business. He was born at Leeds, Yorkshire, England, on February 12, 1874. His first ordination occurred in 1893 to the office of priest. Two years later he became an elder, and was ordained a seventy in 1901.

Brother Rushton's longest and most distinguished service to the church began on April 20, 1902, when he was ordained to the office of apostle. He gave thirty-eight years of arduous work in this quorum and was relieved by action of the conference of 1947. He now labors as "Minister at Large."

Beatrice M. Budd became his wife in 1901. They now live at Laguna Beach, California. Brother Rushton has contributed much and well to the Herald columns over the years.

HUBERT CASE (page 11). One of the longest and most distinguished records as a seventy was earned by Elder Case who served the church continuously between the years 1897 and 1944. He was born in Mondamin, Iowa, on June 5, 1870. He was married to Alice Montague, daughter of a missionary, on September 30, 1894. About three weeks later, they sailed on the "Evanelia" for his mission to the South Sea Islands. They have three daughters: Cicely (Mrs. Arthur B.) Church, Dorothy Maloney, and Ardyce (Mrs. G. Leslie) DeLapp.

Brother Case's first ordination was to the office of priest on June 3, 1893. He became an elder on March 4, 1894, and a seventy on December 19, 1897. His superannuation in April, 1944, did not stop his activities. He is busy administering to the sick, preaching, writing, and even making recordings of his sermons to send to the Indians among whom he is held in high regard because of many years of missionary labors among them.

The Triumph of Christ

And they brought the colt to Jesus, and cast their garments on him; and he sat upon him.

And many spread their garments in the way: and others cut down branches off the trees, and strewed them in the way.

And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord:

Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest.

And Jesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple.

—Mark 11: 7-11.

Palm Sunday

In the great drama of the life of Christ, the alternation of defeats and victories creates a tremendous impact upon one who is reading the story or witnessing the play. The fact that we have been over the story many times makes little difference. When we read of how Jesus was lifted up in the Transfiguration, our hopes soar with him, and we feel he can never die. When we see him, in imagination, nailed to the Cross, it seems that he and his cause are forever lost. But the Resurrection and the open tomb negate that.

What a pity it is that the temporary defeat of Christ is represented so widely in the symbol of the cross; that we do not have some equally vivid and dramatic symbol of his glorious triumph in the Resurrection.

On this Palm Sunday, we have an opportunity to turn our attention from the sharp defeats that Christ suffered to his victories. Here is a triumph of popular recognition and affection. Here the disciples had an opportunity to express in an open and spontaneous way the tremendous hold Jesus had won in their lives. Here he demonstrated his power to fulfill his prediction, "I will draw all men unto me."

Jesus entered the city of Jerusalem as a king. In his honor, the disciples scattered branches of trees in his path and even cast their garments down before him. He rode into Jerusalem on a mount that was willingly given to his service; and the beast, too, was draped with the garments of friends. Whatever they had was gladly given to Jesus in this hour of his earthly glory. His journey ended at the proper place for such a spiritual pilgrimage—at the temple.

What It Means Today

The past is meaningless to us unless it points to the future, and the celebration of historical events is futile unless we can learn something from them that will help us in the onward progress of that mission which it is our destiny to promote—the creation in a world of ignorance and selfishness of a Christian civilization, the kingdom of God.

Palm Sunday reminds us that the work of Christ is not without its recognition. It is true that a blind world worships success of any kind and despises failure, regardless of the idealism or the merit of the thing that failed.

Before Jesus went through the bitter days and hours of the betrayal, the trials, the scourging, and the agony of the cross, it was appropriate that he should have been recognized and received as a king. Thus it was no mere teacher, no solitary prophet who was tried and nailed to the cross. It was a king—the King of Glory. And it was the acclamation of Palm Sunday that signified the royal character of the Lamb that was led to the slaughter who rose in triumph again.

The Third Strike

A friend lent me a recently published little book, a brilliantly written document, filled with sympathy, suffering, and horror. The story begins with the author when he was twenty-seven, a victim of drink, and sick with despair. It ends some time later on the water, with small circling waves rippling outward, and a few bubbles breaking at the spot where he plunged in, ending his misery, on this earth at least. I read The Third Strike by Jerry Gray in a couple of hours; and as much as I had been impressed before the reading by what the liquor traffic is doing in America, I am horrified now. The book reduces the statistics on alcoholism to human terms, and shows what it means in personal tragedy. Wherever there is a man or a woman in our country, wavering on the edge of the fatal habit, this book might be a means of salvation. It would be worth your dollar to save a friend.

Negro Statesman

An important name in recent news stories has been that of Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, who was assistant to the late Count Bernadotte who was killed while conducting negotiations between the warring Jews and Arabs in Palestine. After Bernadotte's death, Dr. Bunche was persuaded to continue this difficult and important work on a temporary basis. With great patience, he brought the parties together and obtained agreements where others had failed. Although the recent overthrow of the Arab government will complicate matters, Dr. Bunche has done a fine work and has won world-wide recognition for his services. An American Negro, trained at Harvard, he was a professor at Howard University and an authority on African anthropology. He was brought into the Federal service during the war under O.W.I.

Radio Department

The General Church Radio Department has ready for distribution a double set of fifteen-minute devotional transcriptions for use by local branches which have opportunity for radio station outlet for such programs. These transcriptions are of fourteen and one-half minutes duration with background music at the beginning and end, over which a local announcer can announce the sponsoring church, its pastor, location, etc. These transcriptions are not for home use. They can be used only by radio stations. It is hoped by the department that wide use will be made of this type of service and, as soon as the demand becomes apparent, additions will be made to this library. These transcriptions contain a six-minute devotional talk by Elder Evan Fry, Radio Minister for the Church, with Scripture reading and general announcements by Elder Stephen Black, and organ music by Bethel Knoche.

In order to make these transcriptions available, it will be necessary for us to charge $2 per record which amounts to $1.00 per broadcast as each side contains a complete fifteen-minute transcription. Express charges to and from Independence, Missouri, will be added. The Radio Department will also furnish scripts for the opening and closing announcements if the user will supply the name and call number of the station, the name of the local pastor, address of the local church, and other pertinent information. The department will also furnish a transcript of each message which can be mimeographed and mailed out to listeners requesting them.

For further information, please address your inquiry to the Radio Department, Attention, Director of Radio, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

European Relief

Effective March 31, 1949, all gift parcel shipments to families living in the British and American Zones of Germany are being discontinued.

Apostle Blair Jensen and Seventy Eugene Theys have notified us that after the above date it will no longer be necessary to ship regular monthly gift parcels of food and clothing into these zones of Germany.

All sponsors of families living in these zones of Germany are requested to cease shipment of gift parcels accordingly.

To all who have shared in this program of relief, we want to express our heartfelt thanks for your co-operation and assistance. That which has been given in time, money, and material has meant much to the success of our relief program in helping these families to rehabilitate themselves and meet a dire need in their lives.

Apostle Hanson to South America

President Hanson of the Quorum of Twelve is leaving for Peru and Bolivia in search of additional material for his archaeological studies. Under date of March 24, Brother Hanson writes:

Dear President Smith:

With my passport and other needed papers now in hand, the way appears clear for me to leave for South America, March 31. The plane of the Braniff International Airways is scheduled to take off from Kansas City, Missouri, at 2:40 a. m., and arrive in Lima, Peru, 7:55 the next morning; calling en route at Dallas, Houston, Havana, Balboa, and Guayaquil in Ecuador.

I appreciate the clearance given by the First Presidency to me to make this trip. It is the culmination of many years of thought and hope that some day I might visit the impressive ruins of ancient civilization in Peru and Bolivia, among which are the pre-Inca ruins of Pachacamac and Chau Chau in the coastal area of Peru, and Tiahuanaco and Sacsahuaman in the mountains.

Autumn is now beginning down there as spring is beginning here.

My interest in the remains of ancient nations has led me to the ruins of Thebes and Karuak in Egypt, the Roman ruins at Baalbek in Syria, to the Acropolis in Athens, and to many museums, including the leading ones in Cairo, Paris, London, Berlin, and New York. Now the privilege is mine of soon starting on this trip—a fitting complement to my two visits among pre-Columbian ruins in Mexico, and my visit to the ruins of Quirigua in Guatemala, and of Copan in Honduras.

My interest in the trip is inseparably bound up with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and its Society for Archaeological Research.

PAUL M. HANSON.

Our prayers go with Apostle Hanson that he will have safe journeys and that the exploration will be of great profit to the cause of the Restoration.

John Conway III

Apostle Maurice Draper writes from Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, that John Conway is a patient in the Jewish Hospital there. His illness has been tentatively diagnosed as virus pneumonia, but it is completely atypical, and the physicians are not at all certain about his condition. He is receiving the finest care possible, but he is still in need of the prayers of the Saints.

Apostle Draper pays this tribute to him: "His absence from the branch is felt keenly. His ministry in Philadelphia has already endeared him to the people here."

Brother Gomer T. Griffiths was taken to the Huron Road Hospital in East Cleveland the first of March. He was in a critical condition for over a week and is still ill. He needs the prayers of the Saints for he has suffered much and is very feeble.

Among the many tributes recently paid to the late President John F. Garver, we have the following from

Greatness Through Service

A STUDY OF THE BIBLE reveals many features of Hebrew thinking which were developed over a period of generations and shifting fortunes as a nation. Among the most significant of these is an attitude expressed by Moses as he reviewed the history of his people and wrote, "Now in those days there were giants on the earth."—Genesis 8: 6. In many ways, the current thinking of our own nation and church membership is closely akin to such an attitude.

Study, if you will, the conditions of the Hebrew people at the time of Christ, and discover the havoc wrought by such thinking.

Try to imagine a Hebrew father of that period picking up his three- or four-year-old son and carrying him to the bedroom to put him to sleep for the night. Hear the child say, as boys are still saying, "Daddy, tell me a story." What do you suppose goes through the father's mind?

He probably sees the condition of his nation—the taxes, the disgrace, the Roman occupation, the loss of sovereignty and the shrinking of borders. Then, with a sigh, he thinks of a better day and says, "Yes, son, I'll tell you a story. Once upon a time there was a man by the name of Abraham. To him God spoke and gave as an inheritance forever all the land of Canaan." Then he tells of the birth of Abraham's son Isaac, of his growth, and later of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice him at God's command. He tells the story which has been told so many times before, and as his son slips away to dreamland he ends by saying . . . "Abraham, now there was a man for you . . . yes, in those days there were giants on the earth."

There were other stories also of Isaac and of Jacob and of Joseph—yes, certainly of Joseph who rose to power and honor among the Egyptians and whose vision and vigilance saved the Hebrew nation from starvation. Then, too, there were stories of the giant, Moses, who led the people to freedom once again. But most of all there was David—David the shepherd lad who slew Goliath; David the poet and musician who gained favor with the king; David, who was the Lord's anointed and under whose magnetic leadership and military power the borders of Israel were extended more and more. During his rule, the nation rose to its peak as an influence on the commerce and culture of the world. It was during the reign of David that Israel became a mighty nation in wealth, power, and prestige. "The kingdom of David" was a high point in Hebrew history. Truly, "There were giants on the earth in those days."

STORIES OF THE PAST, however, were not the only subjects which occupied the thinking of the Hebrews at the time of Christ. There was another story which kindled the fire in their veins even more. It had been developed especially since the time of Isaiah and had now become the choice legend of the nation. "Some day," they told their children, "some day Messiah will come. He shall restore unto us the kingdom of David." In fact, he was to be a descendant of this famous ruler—a sort of crown prince who would almost singlehandedly return Israel to its place of power and prominence among the nations.

The better days of the past and the glorious days of the future blinded them for the moment to the hardships of their present and made them forget the seemingly impossible task of throwing off the shackles of their bondage. They were content to dream . . . and wait.

The tragedy of such thinking is revealed in the fact that now, during 1949, Hebrews in New York and

By Loyd R. Adams

Jerusalem and London and Kansas City are still putting their children to bed with stories of the giants of past days and of a Messiah who is yet to come. The years have dragged out into generations, and the generations into centuries, but the realities of existing conditions are always erased by the work of their giants.

THIS PROCESS OF APATHY is not a copyright of the Jews. No, many nations have felt the sleepiness of this drug. China was great in the Orient under Genghis Khan a thousand years after Jesus was born in Bethlehem. Under the despotic rule of this great dictator, the Orient became the center of culture, wealth, and power. This dynasty was carried on for almost a century by Kublai Khan, a grandson of the great warrior. With his death, however, China's influence began to wane, and it was easier to tell of past feats of glory than to meet with courage and vision the demands of the hour. So the legend sprang up among the Chinese that some day Genghis Khan would come back, and then they would take their rightful place at the head of the nations of the world. Perhaps they still tell that story in China . . . I don't know—but the temptation to wait for a better day has been ever with them.

Italy remembers the glorious days of the Roman Empire, and in the hearts of her countrymen burns the desire for such influence once again. It was this honor which Benito Mussolini hoped to restore.

Greece, overrun by invaders and stricken with starvation and poverty, dreams of the days of her giants, when she was the seat of culture and learning, and when all nations bowed to her power.

It was interesting to note the reaction of Britain to the marriage of Elizabeth and the birth of her son. You could almost read in their celebrations the memories of a better day when it could be said with pride that the sun never set on the British Empire—when England ruled as undisputed “Queen of the Seas,” when the title of “British subject” was a synonym of all that was rich and powerful and influential. Forgotten were the hardships of war and reconstruction; in their minds and hearts burned the dream that maybe Elizabeth, as queen, will usher in another glorious day for their nation—a day such as was theirs under Victoria. At least, they hope, the tiny prince, when he becomes king, will have that magic touch and be their giant.

America has suffered the same malady, although it now enjoys its heyday. This last summer it was amusing to listen to the speeches from Philadelphia as the two major political parties met there and to hear such a statement as this: “What the Republican Party needs is another Abraham Lincoln.” For a few blissful weeks following, the Republicans thought they had found one, but their dreams were rudely shattered on November 3. Now they are busy looking for another giant.

We heard a few weeks later: “What the Democratic Party needs is another Andrew Jackson, or Woodrow Wilson, or Franklin Roosevelt.” How happy they were when Harry Truman developed to be so much bigger than they had dared to hope, and they hailed him as their giant.

THE HISTORY OF MANKIND is an oft-repeated story. Nations have fought their way to power, rested smugly on top for a while, and then gone down to be replaced by another. Many have refused to believe the wisdom of Jesus when he said, “He who would be great among you, must be the servant of all.” They have trusted in their giants of wealth and arms and industry and cleverness, and they have perished, looking for an easy way to remain great.

We Americans, as well as the rest of the world, have fed on such a diet for so long that we have become a world of bargain seekers, desiring something for nothing. I can remember when I was just a small lad, my Dad pointed to the rainbow which decorated with glory the evening sky and said, “Son, if you run and dig in the place where the rainbow meets the earth, you will find a pot of gold.” My boyish heart beat faster at the thought, but I soon discovered there was no pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow. My Dad taught me that lesson even better by the pride he took in doing his job well and the diligence with which he went about his labor.

Everywhere today there is the appeal of easy riches. Fabulous prizes attract millions to listen to certain radio programs. In every city we see new automobiles advertised to be given away to some lucky person. Multiplied thousands of dollars exchange hands in the effort to acquire a car by such methods. The amount of money spent in gambling on races in United States runs into billions of dollars. In Cleveland, Ohio, I saw about 10,000 women lose all sense of courtesy or decorum as they tried to become “Queen for a Day.” One lady became so enraged over the fact that she was not chosen as a candidate from among those 10,000 that she took a knife from her purse and stabbed the director of the program in the leg. It was a typical example of modern desire to get something for nothing.

The old-fashioned slot machine with its jack pot full of nickels used to fascinate me. I can remember when I was only tall enough to look that jack pot straight in the eye that I would eagerly stand on my tiptoes to drop in my nickel and pull the handle, then wait with heart-pounding anticipation for the riches to drop into my hands. I finally learned—as we all must learn—that riches do not come that way; that the only riches or power or greatness which endures is what comes from service and is not measured in terms of money or land or control of other people.

I have gone to great length to draw this picture of attitudes developed over the centuries. It is important that we see its sequence, for many of our church members are afflicted with its germ.

MARCH AND APRIL of this year have been designated as months of intensive missionary activity in the church throughout the world. Members of the Quorum of Twelve have committed themselves to supply needed appointee personnel as far as possible to aid the local branches in this effort. Many of our branches are dying and in desperate need of new enthusiasm and new members. In many of these branches, large and small alike, there is the hope that during these two months the general church will send them some giant who will convert a multitude of people and a transfusion of power to solve their problems.

During my five years of missionary work, I have labored in many areas that are rich in Latter Day Saint history—Kirtland, Nauvoo, Far West, Lamoni, and Zion itself. In all of these places, I have been told over and over of the “good old days” and of the giants that made them so—stories that were old to me before I was ten years of age. My mother had related them to me since my earliest recollection. I later read them by choice in our church publications and was thrilled. Yes, I had learned that “there were giants in the earth in those days.” I have heard again and again this question in the congregations and homes of Saints, “When will our missionaries preach with

The Power of His Resurrection

By JOHN W. RUSHTON

For his sake I have suffered the loss of all things, and count them as refuse, in order that I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having a righteousness of mine own, based on law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God that depends on faith; that I may know him and the power of his resurrection, and may share his sufferings, becoming like him in his death, that if possible I may attain to the resurrection from the dead.—Philippians 3: 8-11, Revised Standard Edition.

AROUND THE WORLD, Easter Day is celebrated, and wherever the Christian church has been established, ecstasy and thanksgiving characterize the worship of the day. The historical details of this supreme festival of the church can be briefly summarized.

Following a short public ministry which is generally believed to have been of three years' duration, and some scholars say was not more than one year—the growing hostility to Jesus of Nazareth reached its climax in the betrayal to his enemies by one of his followers. He was insulted and abused in humiliating ways and finally was ignominiously put to death as a criminal on Golgotha's hill. This tragic event stamped out the light of hope and scattered his followers in despair, and their dream of the coming kingdom lay in ruins. Forgotten were the gracious words, the healing benediction, the tender ministry, and the public acclaim of the other day when the Son of David entered the city, a potential king, to leave it execrated and regarded as a criminal. Now, he was dead; the dream faded, and they were forsaken. The "Light of the World" born in Bethlehem was eclipsed by the gloom of Calvary.

Jews and Romans thought the threat to their respective interests, religion and state, had been successfully liquidated. Friday and Saturday, the mutilated body of the Christ lay in the sepulcher of Joseph of Arimathea. The threat to Jewish priesthood and the Roman magistrate was dead and done with. His movement and ambitions were smashed, his followers paralyzed and shamed.

But, as the light of the new day, Sunday, broke over the world, some women who had prepared spices and ointments for the body went to the tomb and were surprised that the stone guarding the sepulcher had been moved. On entering, they found the body missing. They saw two men (angels) sitting where the body had lain and the discarded cements rolled up in a place by themselves. The men asked the weeping women, "Why do you seek the living among the dead?" and reminded them of the Master's saying, "The Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men and be crucified and on the third day rise." Then they remembered these words and went and told this story to the eleven and all the rest, to whom it seemed like an "idle tale" and "they did not believe." So records St. Luke. However, these followers had experiences themselves which convinced them that Jesus Christ was indeed raised from the dead. St. Paul testifies that he himself had delivered to the Corinthians as of first importance that Christ died for our sins, that he was buried, and that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the Scriptures. Further, he states that the risen Christ appeared unto Cephas and the Twelve, to James, to more than five hundred of the brethren at one time, "and last of all, he appeared also to me."

One thing is sure—this band of disappointed and broken people was transformed into a band of heroic crusaders who challenged the world of Rome and Greece and won it for this Man, who, in the language of Jean Paul Richter, "lifted empires from their hinges, turned into new channels all the tides of history and today controls the ages."

The Resurrection with the Incarnation and the Atonement constitutes the foundation upon which the Christian faith is established. The manger of Bethlehem, the cross of Calvary, and the one grave are the symbols of the "power of the Spirit" which, through Christ, came into human experience, reconciled man to God, and finally triumphed over all material opposition and from henceforth is the divinely accepted norm or standard by which all men shall be evaluated and judged.

II

WHAT DOES THIS EVENT MEAN, which has gripped the imagination of the passing generations?

"If a man die, shall he live again?" asked Job, which question has echoed down the centuries since.

Jesus answered, "I am the resurrection and the life; he who believes in me, though he die, yet shall he live." St. Paul's conclusion is, "For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive."

These questions still challenge us. There are different answers, none of which solve this last of life's mysteries. We still must live and die by faith based upon nature, history, and experience supplemented by inspiration and revelation through prophets, apostles, and supremely through Jesus Christ. We are surrounded by mystery. The simple pebble at our feet up to the celestial galaxies stimulate us in our search for reality. Life in its cycles of birth and death present their volumes for exploration. We still dream of the undiscovered bourn, and, with Tennyson, we can say:

So runs my dream, but what am I?
A child crying in the night,
A child crying for the light,
And with no language but a cry.

The unknown is so immense, that what little we do know seems trivial and uncertain; but, through imagination and faith, that little is big with promise.

Keeping in mind the admonition of our Lord, "Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven," and the advice of Huxley to sit down before a fact with the humility of a child, we shall not be too dogmatic in our assertions.

Despite our limitations, however, there are intimations and analogies which Nature affords and leads us to a knowledge of the Truth we cannot ignore.

One of the most emphatic lessons she teaches is that "Life is ever Lord of Death." The seasons in their recurring cycles reveal that "If winter comes, spring is not far away." Love, life, and beauty revive; old forms pass away, new forms come into being, and life's symphonies continually appeal in new combinations. Dr. W. R. Inge reminds us that Nature does not remain static, nor is there endless repetition. This would spoil everything, and such a world would be irrational. While the doom of death hangs over all, "the one way in which the values of life can escape the doom of the existences to which they are linked is by constant transmutation into values of higher quality." We are indeed familiar with this truth in the unending story of evolution, in the passage from the simple to the complex.

Our Lord's attitude toward Death is clearly shown in his teachings. Following his announcement to Andrew and Philip, "The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified," he goes on to explain how this glorification or "bloom of ripeness" is attained: "Truly, I say to you, unless a grain of wheat falls into the ground and dies, it remains alone; but if it dies, it bears much fruit. He who loves his life loses it, and he who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life." So Death becomes the gateway to a new life, and to hold on to the life of this world of necessity the "eternal life" could not be enjoyed. Death belongs to God's scheme of things; and so the true child of God can join with St. Paul in saying, "To die is gain." We are disrobed of the fleshly house which, while adapted to the material world, has its limitations and hinders full communion of spirit with Spirit, which is man's destiny. As Jesus said to the disciples, incapable as they were of understanding the spiritual values he sought to unfold, "the flesh profiteth nothing; the words I speak unto you, they are spirit and life."

III

BUT SOMEONE WILL ASK, 'How are the dead raised, and with what kind of body do they come?' You foolish man! What you sow does not come to life unless it dies. And what you sow is not the body which is to be, but a bare kernel, perhaps of wheat or some other grain."

Often questions similar to these have been asked, and many whose lives are conditioned in flesh and have no other medium of contact but the five senses have demeaned the spiritual ideal which is of the essence of our Christian faith. St. Augustine said, "Thou hast made me for thyself"; St. Paul said, "While we are at home in the body we are away from the Lord, . . . and we would rather be away from the body and at home with the Lord." And to the Philippians, he writes: "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. . . . Yet which I shall choose I cannot tell. I am hard pressed between the two. My desire is to depart and be with Christ for that is far better. But to remain in the flesh is more necessary on your account." In this, as in other matters, St. Paul is near to St. John in his theology:

To St. John, eternal life is something of which we can already experience a foretaste in this world; it is a life to which death is not an interruption but rather the removal of restrictions and impediments; it is a life of which the important characteristic is, not the place where it is lived, but the quality of the life itself.—The Resurrection of the Dead, by H. B. Streeter, page 149.

Admittedly, there are Scriptures which apparently favor the idea of the resurrection of the body. The oldest reference in the Bible is in Job 19: 26: "For though my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Many do not notice that the marginal reference shows that the translation of the original should be: "After I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God." A study of the Scriptures shows that the ideas of immortality and resurrection were a slow development and a blending of thoughts from other peoples with whom the Hebrews had been either voluntarily or involuntarily associated. For history shows that many peoples believed life continued after death and in various ways expressed that belief. Even in the New Testament, a close student may see the changes in opinions and ideas as a truer concept of the Master's meaning and purpose dawned upon their consciousness. We must not overlook the fact that even in revelation much depends upon the medium or instrument through which the inspiration comes. Dr. Wm. R. Inge makes an interesting observation on this point:

Even when we are dealing with a divine revelation in its simplest and purest form, like unworn and untarnished coins fresh from the mint, we have to remember that it takes two to tell the truth—one to speak and one to hear. None can receive a revelation which is unrelated to his education, his habits of thought and his experience of life.—Christian Ethics, page 28.

This same principle is recognized in modern educational technique as expressed by Sir Richard Livingstone, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford:

If our education is to be really fruitful, we must recognize a principle which has been almost wholly ignored in education—the cross-fertilization of theory and experience. There is or should be a continual interaction between the two.—Education, page 17.

IN THE WRITINGS of St. Paul, there is a blending of the contemporary Hebrew and Greek thought influenced by the teachings of Christ, which came to him through the testimony of others and the operation of the Holy Spirit. Consequently, all the references to the Resurrection cannot have the same meaning and value and must be interpreted in the light of the essential meaning of the Christian message and God's purpose as revealed therein. That Christ looked upon the life of the resurrected state as being above the earthly experience and of a spiritual quality on a level with that "of the angels in heaven" is clear and unequivocal (see Matthew 22: 30). Always the emphasis was put by him on the spiritual and not the material aspect of life. From the beginning, he taught, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Touching the Resurrection of our Lord, the body apparently was raised, yet it is equally clear there was a difference. The recognition of him by his intimate friends was not physical and not until some spiritual quality or distinctive flash of his personality had revealed him; or, to use the scriptural words, "Their eyes were open." With Mary in the garden, it was the accent and inflection of his voice as he called her name as no one else ever called it.

While "the bulk of the material in the first three Gospels has a high degree of historical matter," says the late Dr. H. B. Streeter, an acute Bible scholar, "it cannot be assumed that every detail in this story is reliable." One of several reasons for this doubt among others is:

In spite of the clear teaching of our Lord and St. Paul, the early church continued to be largely dominated by the pre-Christian idea of a flesh and blood resurrection; and there are clear indications that the influence of this preconceived idea has modified the tradition of what actually happened in this case.

It obviously would not be sound exposition to build upon traditions when such are opposed to the teachings of Christ himself and his greatest follower. Especially when there is reason to believe they have been influenced by a priori conceptions of a generation which, in this as in other things, only partially understood the teachings of Christ or St. Paul. We accept the basic fact of Christ's resurrection of which the Christian church and its prevailing Power is the abiding witness without necessarily being committed to the details of what people think they saw and their attempts to explain so great a mystery. Then as now, it is "personality" which is the permanent element and not the bodily medium through which it is expressed. This, as we know, is in a state of constant change. Personality, science admits, may exist discarnate; though so far as experience goes, we only know of personality through the medium of a physical body. Science recognizes the tendency of the mind towards independence and autonomy and suggests the possibility of its becoming entirely liberated from the body and living disembodied and free.—See The Mind and Brain, by Dr. James A. Hadfield, in the series on "Immortality," page 21.

Personality having its source and center in the mind and its functions, the resurrection of the body of flesh and blood is not necessary for identification of the person. The mind functions in terms of emotion, reason, and will, which are not material qualities, and they are registered in what we call character. This, in turn, is the basis of destiny.

The concluding thought of Dr. Hadfield in this connection is of peculiar interest:

We have looked upon the emancipation of the soul from the body as a process of evolution. This emancipation we may therefore assume to be the purpose of our existence upon this earth. Before our birth we were undifferentiated "soul"; we were parts of the "cosmic mind," we were drawn as water drawn in a pitcher from the "mind pool." Our destiny is to grow personalities out of the raw material with which we began life. In every stage of evolution it is only the few who progress, the many remain unevolved. So it may be in the passage from the physical to the spiritual.—Ibid., page 72.

This seems to accord with the philosophy of the Apostle Paul and is in agreement with the teachings of Jesus Christ. And, to those familiar with Doctrine and Covenants 85, the same is suggested. The supremacy of the human soul and its possibilities of development until it reaches unity with God is the most conspicuous mark of the moral level of any community; it is the reason of the revolt against the ideologies of Hitler and Stalin. Jesus made it clear God is not only Creator and Artist, but "our Father," to whom the individual is dear and becomes dearer as he fulfills the purpose of his creation.

As each one is of more value than "sparrows" or "sheep," death cannot be the end. In the language of Christ, death is the gateway to life and the prelude to a new life. As he said to Andrew and Philip, "The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified. Truly, truly I say unto you, unless a grain of wheat falls into the earth and dies, it remains alone; but if it dies, it bears much fruit. He who loves his life loses it, and he who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life."—St. John 12: 23-25. In this sense, death becomes the great liberator, freeing the spirit from the body of flesh that it may be clothed with the "house eternal and heavenly" (II Corinthians 5: 1, 2).

IV

WE MUST NOW DISCUSS the question, "What is this power of the Resurrection to which St. Paul aspires?" In other words, what is the active property? What is it that generates the ability to qualify one for this great consummation?

We take as a fixed principle that values are indestructible:

Whatever has value in the sight of God is safe forevermore, time and change cannot touch it. This has the support of the science of psychology as stated by the Danish authority, Dr. Hoffding, who sums up the essence of religion as "the belief in the conservation of value." That is, the conviction that good in the moral sphere, like energy in the physical realm, can never be destroyed, but only transformed, so that what appears to be lost inevitably returns in another form.—Concerning Prayer, by Dr. B. H. Streeter, page 6.

What are these indestructible values God conserves? They are not material qualities, for values are moral and spiritual. Things in and of themselves are neither good nor bad but have value according to the use they are put to. We must approve the conclusion then, "Religion is concerned not only with existence but with values." Such values are bound up with the life and character of God and therefore are intended by him to be the aim of his children. Always we must remember, "God is Spirit," always truth, always beauty, always goodness, always love. In all his activities, he is revealed in the cardinal virtues: prudence, temperance, justice, fortitude, faith, hope and love. Because he is God, he is always good. As St. John has written, "God is love and they who dwell in God dwell in love." In the Pauline analysis of love, the following list of enduring values are the components: joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, fidelity, gentleness, and self-control. These are pivotal—the hinges on which the gates of heaven swing. The apostle says, "Against such there is no law." Again, the Master makes it clear that "of such is the kingdom of heaven."

The exulting witness of St. Paul is that these qualities are invincible—"We know that in everything God works for good with those who love him." He challenges universal experience with, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" and answers: "Neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor anything else in all creation will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord."—Romans 8: 28-39. Here are the values which are indestructible! The very essence of Divine Being; if they could be destroyed, then God himself would cease to be.

THE POWER OF CHRIST'S RESURRECTION, therefore, is the Spirit of God. God raised him from the dead. The grave could not hold him, for he belonged to God.

Hence, all the emphasis of the gospel message is on the identification of man with God through His Spirit. Christianity is the religion of spirit; to quote Rudolph Eucken: "The union of the Divine and human nature is the fundamental truth of religion, and its deepest mystery consists in the fact that the Divine enters into the compass of the human without impairing its divinity," and, "Man becomes immediately conscious of the Infinite and the Eternal, of that within him which transcends the world. The true demonstration of religion is one of Spirit and of Power."—Religion and Life, pages 7-9.

This same thought is succinctly stated by Athanasius, "He became human that we might become divine."

The Eternal Life is independent of time or place and can be entered into here and now. As Jesus said, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." This means correspondence with God, similarly as in natural life, for life is correspondence between man and his environment. Practically, this implies that the practice of the Christian life means learning to love what he loves, to know what he knows, and to will what he wills. These functions are the components of personality, so as we discipline ourselves in this practice of God and his way of life, we are developing those values which are beyond the vicissitudes incident to this life's uncertainties. Thus we qualify for the "power of his resurrection." To attain this, all else must be regarded as "refuse" and surrendered, for life here takes the matter needed for its expression and its correspondence with the environment for which it is adapted and organizes it into such form and forms as it requires. The Power of his resurrection is God, who, in his very nature, could not exert his power to perpetuate that which is in antagonism to himself. "To be out of harmony with the nature of things means to be out of harmony with God." All that is inimical to him will be destroyed, and finally death itself will be destroyed. So, the Resurrection will be God fulfilling himself; St. Paul—who strains language to the utmost when he writes to the Ephesians, describes it in these words:

Remembering you in my prayers . . . that you may know what is the hope to which he has called you, what are the riches of his glorious inheritance in the saints, and what is the immeasurable greatness of his power in us who believe, according to the working of his great might which he accomplished in Christ when he raised him from the dead and made him sit at his right hand in heavenly places, far above all rule and authority and power and dominion, and above every name that is named, not only in this age but also in that which is to come; and he has put all things under his feet and has made him the head over all things for the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all in all.—Ephesians 1: 15-23.

"Only as included in the thought of God has anything a place in reality; only in fulfilling that thought is the purpose of creation achieved," and "Through age-long effort and self-oblation, God, the Holy Spirit, is making the Body of Christ and creating a universe that shall fully embody the Thought of God."—Bishop Masterton in The Christianity of Tomorrow, pages 50, 51.

TO POSSESS THIS POWER of Christ's resurrection, the Christian must live a life of constant discipline which seeks to unify man with God until complete reconciliation is effected. With St. Paul we may say, "I live, yet not I, but Christ who liveth in me" (Galatians 2: 20). This thought of the apostle runs through the Christian message like the blood stream through the human body—"Christ in you, the hope of glory." The hope of complete and ripened character is because Christ dwells in us. Once again we note the intimacy between Paul and John in their understanding of Christian truth. Let us think of the implications of the following statements of St. John:

He who believes in the Son of God has the testimony in himself. . . . And the testimony is that God gave us eternal life and this life is in his Son. He who has the Son has life; he who has not the Son has not life.—I John 5: 10-12.

In the Acts of the Apostles there is an account of Paul's address to the Athenians, in which the main theme is the Resurrection of Jesus Christ; and he concludes with the following: "He [God] has fixed on a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he has appointed, and of this he has given assurance to all men by raising him from the dead."—Acts 17: 31. By this exercise of his power to perpetuate Christ, God is committed to the life of Christ and all it means. Here the Darwinian law of "the survival of the fittest" suggests that He is the norm or standard of the kind of personality God has exerted his power to survive, because in his judgment, he is best fitted or qualified to survive in the environment in which "he is all in all."

Dr. J. S. Whale, in Christian Doctrine, page 73, writes:

The Gospels cannot explain the resurrection. It is the resurrection which alone explains the Gospels. Here is the mightiest of the mighty acts of God, foreign to the common experience of man, incredible to all his science, astounding to believer and unbeliever alike. But here, and here only, is an activity of God, wrought out in this world of pain, sin, and death, which is the key pattern for the world's true life. Here is the sure promise that life according to this pattern is eternal. This and this alone is the key to the Christian doctrine of history.

Truly, "Because he lives, we shall live also"—if and to the extent we are like him. "We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see [discern] him as he is."—I John 3: 2. Then follows this responsibility, which cannot be shirked if we would enjoy the privilege: "And every one who thus hopes in him purifies himself even as he is pure" (verse 3). In the light of these considerations, there is a depth of meaning in St. Paul's classification under the two federal heads of the race: "As in Adam all die; in Christ all shall be made alive." All who align themselves with the Adamic standards of life are doomed to death. All who identify themselves with Christ and his cause are promised life.

AS LIFE ON THE EARTH is differentiated and organizes the body of matter through which it expresses itself—fishes, birds, animals, and man; so, says the apostle, in the resurrected life there will be differentiation, not determined by the life force of nature but by the spirit. "Bodies celestial and bodies terrestrial" are symbols of the varying degree of glory as represented by the categories of brilliance in the sun, moon, and stars. "And as one star differeth from another star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead." It is evident there will be a body in the resurrected state, but not of flesh and blood, "for flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (I Corinthians 15: 50). Again, "For if you live after the flesh, ye shall die, but if by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live."—Romans 8: 13.

Says the apostle, the fleshly body that is perishable, weak, and dishonorable, is of the earth, adapted to his environment of time and sense. But the resurrected body will be spiritual—"as we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly."—I Corinthians 15: 50. "For we know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens . . . and he who prepared us for this very thing is God, who has given us the Spirit as a guarantee."—II Corinthians 5: 1-5.

If man is potentially the noblest of all the Creator's works of art, he is also the most unfinished; if he is the child of God, he is only in the nursery stage. A God that was contented to leave it so would be morally of lower status than ourselves.—Dr. B. H. Streeter.

Thus man moves on to his destined end as stated by St. Paul:

And we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory into another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit.—II Corinthians 3: 18.

We cannot overlook the definition of evolution simplified by LeConte in this connection, "continuous, progressive change according to well-defined laws, determined by the resident forces within."

If that resident force or power within us is the Spirit of God, and we subscribe faithfully to the truth revealed in Christ Jesus, then that cause operative in him will produce the same result in us. "If the Spirit of him, who raised Jesus from the dead dwells within you, then he who raised Christ from the dead will also make your mortal bodies live by his indwelling Spirit in your lives."—Romans 8: 11.

We conclude with the words of the poet, John Milton: The supreme end of life is "to know God aright, and out of that knowledge to love him, to imitate him, to be like him as we may the nar-est, by possessing our souls of true virtue."

What I am here will condition what God will be able to do with and for me in the resurrected state.

the pen of Apostle D. Blair Jensen, writing in the British Mission Courier.

In the passing of President John F. Garver on the morning of March 3, the church has lost another from those rapidly diminishing ranks of active ministers whose priestly responsibilities were assumed under the leadership of "the late Joseph."

Brother Garver was not cradled in the Restoration Movement. In his early manhood, he was led to its light and became a convert to its truths. Straightway he took himself into those educational pursuits and endeavors which would best sharpen and quicken the goodly talents with which he had been endowed. He was always the aggressive champion of intelligent forces of education. He maintained an active interest in the youth of the church. He was the sympathetic friend and the kindly neighbor of the aged. He was the comforting and the ministering priest to the sick and the infirm. In his home community, he was a chief, a respected citizen, and a most gracious friend. In his home, he was the considerate and lovable companion and kindly father.

Our brother's span of life attained the allotted three score years and ten. His full-time service to the church was given generously and wisely, for many years in the Presidency of Lamoni Stake, followed by almost a quarter of a century in the Quorum of Twelve, and, for the past three years, as Counselor to President Israel A. Smith. He was in truth an able and aggressive "defender of the faith."

Church-wide we mourn the departure of Brother John. In our prayers and with our faith, we seek to sustain Sister Garver and the three daughters who survive him. We are indeed grateful to our Heavenly Father for the many full and rich years he gave in diligent and devoted service to the Cause. And, while we do mourn his passing and shall miss him very much, we are thankful that his time of departure was not extended to further pain and suffering.

To know Brother Garver personally was to love him and respect him. Those of us who were favored to know him best will miss him most. We salute him as a stalwart of the faith, a godly servant, and friend. We bid him au revoir.

The Great Springtime of the Restoration

Sermon delivered at Englewood Church, April 18, 1948

By HUBERT CASE

I SHOULD LIKE TO CALL your attention to some of the wonderful events that took place in our early history. The prophets looked forward to this time; many of them spoke concerning latter-day Restoration. Paul calls it the "dispensation of the fullness of time." Jesus called it the eleventh hour and said that we would have to work until the cry came: "Behold the bridegroom cometh."

John Wesley, in one of his famous sermons, said in his day: "The primitive gospel is yet to shine forth in its effulgence and power to regenerate the world before the coming of Jesus." Zechariah (14:7) said, "Behold it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light."

I had an infidel friend—a neighbor—many years ago, who said, "Mr. Case, I just cannot believe in the resurrection of the dead." I said, "Captain, didn't you ever stop to think about how all nature—all the vegetable world—dies away in the fall and then in the spring-time new life comes forth?" "Well, sir," he said, "that does look quite reasonable."

A short time after that, his daughter told me the captain would never say one word against the resurrection. He said, "I had a dream last night in which I saw the coming of the Savior and saw the dead come out of their graves." His daughter said he wanted to make arrangements for me to preach his funeral sermon.

I want to call attention now to something that is familiar to everybody. Just look outdoors or go for a drive into the country and admire the beauty of spring-time. You can see new life and new beauty which present a challenge to humanity to recognize that an all-wise Creator is bringing these things to pass. We need to take into account these prophecies and the wonderful things recorded in the Bible. Jesus said there would be a long night of darkness, then there would be the Restoration. He also has spoken of it through the prophets. One of the themes that has thrilled millions since the time of the Restoration is the marvelous statement in the fourteenth chapter of Revelation:

And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water.

I HAVE BEEN PREACHING a long time, and I have never seen a congregation yet—even if it were composed of nonmembers—that did not marvel at such prophecies as that. The religious world can read over those prophecies and pay no attention to them. Most of the reformers were conscious of them, however. I take off my hat to the reformers, because they paved the way for the Restoration.

After the coming of the angel, don't think the world didn't hear of the story! That first vision of Joseph Smith in 1820 was made famous when he saw the Father and the Son above him in the heavens and heard the Father say, "This is my beloved Son. Hear him." Joseph wanted to know which church he should join, and Jesus told him not to unite with any of them. The time had arrived for the great movement that was to come among men on this earth, signifying the Restoration of the gospel. Then the coming forth of the Book of Mormon three years before the church was organized was such a marvelous thing, it paved the way for the spiritual vision of living the gospel—the great springtime of all the spiritual forces God had set in his gospel to come forth in the Restoration of that great movement. Old and young everywhere were interested. Congregations were brought into the church.

If I could I would like to paint a picture of Oliver Cowdery, after he went through those experiences from the time of the translation of the Book of Mormon until the angel ordained him and Joseph Smith. That was on May 15, 1829, almost a full year before the church was organized, and what an education it was! What a school of spiritual power he passed through with the latter-day seer, although he was just a young man. See what those two men experienced before the organization of the church with just six members on April 6, 1830! After the Melchisedec priesthood was restored, see the power of the Spirit of God that was manifest in their ministry and the congregations they brought into the church!

One year from that time Oliver Cowdery baptized my grandparents among others who were thrilled with the spirit. Parley P. Pratt, author of The Voice of Warning—one of the great missionary books of this church—wrote almost every word of that book by the inspiration of God. He traveled with Oliver Cowdery and Ziba Peterson. They made their first trip to where Kirtland, Ohio, now is. In that vicinity, they baptized a thousand people. Imagine a power so great moving those men and enlisting soldiers in the army of the Lord! It almost staggers reason to think of the power given through the young prophet and his associates which caused all the spiritual forces spoken of in the New Testament Scriptures to spring up, as nature is today, with life everywhere. There is nothing more thrilling than to realize that the church is moving into a great new day. We can make the Zion of God such a challenge to the world that men everywhere will come and enlist in the service of God without any reservations whatever. That is what it will take to build Zion.

TALK ABOUT EDUCATION in those days! The young seer of God had some great men with whom he organized the movement and started the School of the Prophets. It lasted for three years, and this church has never had a school equal to it. The School of the Prophets fired men's souls with the power of God, and they went forth as a living light among the people. They did not convert just a few; they converted men everywhere. Surely they had opposition—plenty of it!

Let me tell a story that transpired in one of the college towns where J. F. Curtis and I were speaking on the street. We were holding a reunion, but we were not having large crowds, so we decided to do some street preaching. Brother Curtis had just finished speaking when a well-dressed young man stepped up in the crowd and said, "Tell us about old Joe Smith stealing sheep." I said, "Brother Curtis, let me tell that."

I got on the box we had, and said, "Folks, that is a funny story. That is the time some of our men met the minister of the Christian Church for the first time and converted a thousand people. Most of them were of the congregation which was started by Alexander Campbell. They were his sheep, and our men converted or 'stole' them from his flock. That is all there is to it, yet people actually believe he stole sheep. Men have circulated the story, and many have believed it. I have met it everywhere." By then, the young man was going down the street. He did not stay to hear any more.

At that time the gospel sprang forth as a great springtime of spiritual light as nature springs forth in new beauty, and men's souls were converted. You may ask, "Brother Case, why did not the movement go on at that pace? Do you suppose the Devil was asleep?" The Devil will rage wherever God's work is established, just as in the days of Jesus and his disciples. The Devil met Jesus face to face, talked with him, and tried to tempt him, "If thou be the Son of God, command these stones to be made bread." Jesus said, "It is written that man shall not live by bread alone but by every word that proceedeth forth from the mouth of God."

WE SHOULD READ some of the marvelous events that followed the experience of Christ and lead to his death. There was a terrible power of the evil one turned loose then and in 1844. Look what took place in Independence. My grandparents were a part of that contingent. My grandfather's best friend was left by the mob as dead on the town square. His head was beaten so that it was covered with scars.

Why did the Lord permit such things as that? Let us read and see. "Behold, I say unto you, there were jarrings and contentions and strifes."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 3. Do we have any of those things today with us—lustful and covetous desires? By these things "they polluted their inheritance."

Those men in the first colony were men of God. They were noble men, but most of them had only been baptized. They had some good leaders—strong men—but they were human just as we are human; and you can set it down in your notebook that Jesus dealt with this same humanity in his day—with men like the betraying Judas. We wonder why any man would do such a thing. The Devil took possession of Judas, and he lost his reason. That is what a lot of people have done. You can see men now who don't live the gospel, and people who don't pay attention to the beautiful things in the gospel. Some of the great men have been called to service and many have fallen. Don't think that Satan did not begin to mobilize his forces when the young seer organized his forces in this cause.

We are told that we shall seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion. This is the great objective of the church. Let us ask ourselves the question, "Why don't we take the selfish and devilish traits out of our very nature that this gospel may go on, so that spiritual power may spring forth everywhere?"

It is because we are only about half-converted. There are lots of the beautiful things of the gospel we are not converted to. Jesus said to Peter, "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." He was not converted entirely, and neither are we.

Joseph Smith asked God to let no obstruction hinder the spiritual forces of the church. That was a wonderful statement because it pointed out some of the things we can put into our lives.

Revelation 18: 1-4 tells us the church went into the wilderness and that a long period of time would pass over the world before the church would be called forth. We are told we must come out of Babylon, because it will fall. He commands that we come out so as not to partake of its plagues, because it is going to be destroyed. Make up your mind right now. If we cling to Babylon, we will fall with it. Let us turn to spiritual things which build life and vitality in the church so that God Almighty can manifest himself and the people can function under his power.

I WANT TO TALK about the dawning of a new day in this church, and I thank God for the men at its head. I believe we have a man today in the presidency of this church who is a great seer. He will become even greater if we will uphold him, and the Lord will manifest his power through him. One of the beautiful things he has said is, "I can work with any or all the men without friction." I believe he can, but we must uphold him and our other leaders. We must pray for them. When we go back over that wonderful period of spiritual light and power which ushered in the Restoration of the gospel, we can see that a force must have been manifest and brought into the church, for about 250,000 people were baptized in the short space of fourteen years.

We turn to Kirtland. The first time I ever spoke at Kirtland Temple, the power of the Spirit of God filled and thrilled me. I stood at the sacred altar behind the first pulpit. It was at the second pulpit that Oliver and Joseph saw Jesus in vision. Angels were seen also. Men went forth from that Temple endowed with the Spirit of God. We have never seen such men in the history of the church go forth under the endowment of God's power. Look at those who went to England. Seven men went to the British Isles and brought in 30,000 people. No wonder people in the British Isles said, "We have never seen such profound scriptorians. Nothing can stand before that power." Certainly it cannot. If we will get down into the depths of humility and live this gospel and enter into a new day, we, too, will go forward.

Brother Holmes and I were in Kansas City recently to administer to a lady who had been to Mayo's clinic. The doctors told her nothing could save her life. We told her that the power of God is beginning to increase in the church. I said, "Sister, I have seen more incurables healed in the last year than in any year of my life." When we come to talk about the forces of God in this new day, they are abundant for us if we will take hold of them. There was a power in the 1830's, and there is no reason why this work should not go forward with the same power today. I believe it will, but we of the priesthood cannot function properly unless the membership prays for us. Then the endowment of God's power will come upon his servants, and it will triumph over everything. Zion shall be redeemed. That is exactly what God says—that his people shall be gathered.

Here is a beautiful tribute he paid those men of the early church:

Let your hearts be comforted concerning Zion, for all flesh is in my hands. Be still, and know that I am God. Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritances; they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion. And all these things, that the prophets might be fulfilled.

I want you to remember this one central thought—that the Restoration was just as wonderful in the spiritual world as springtime in the physical creation. You can look out over the face of nature today and see new life springing forth everywhere. God ordained the laws that govern nature, he also ordained those which govern spiritual life. Through their power, Zion can become a reality.

"Zion the beautiful beckons us on." Our lives should vibrate the story of Jesus and his love. Love gives the tone and quality we must have to build Zion. To avoid such troubles as we have had over nothing, charity answers the call; it means kindness and peace on earth and brings men toward God, enabling them to avoid unpleasant things. As Paul expresses it, "Whatsoever things are lovely and of good report, think on these things."

Funeral Address for Louise Hills Lewis

November 22, 1948

By Israel A. Smith

THIS IS A TIME of sadness, one of many we experience from time to time, when death takes a loved one from our midst. We show by our presence, our affection and fraternal regard for her whose remains lie before us. The body is but a mortal tenement. The body is not the being; it is only a residence—a residence not built of enduring marble nor founded on everlasting granite, but a small "booth," as it were, a temporary habitation pitched here during a limited stay, blown about and buffeted by storm, and in the end destined to be leveled to the earth.

Sister Louise Hills Lewis has reached the end of her earth life and has now entered into a new and, we are sure, a wonderful phase of her existence. She rests from her labors, but her soul is eternal.

One's life speaks more eloquently what he is than anything mere oratory can offer. In contemplating the death of Sister Louise, I am reminded of a passage in the Scriptures in which is recorded a simple reference to the death of King David: "For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell asleep and was laid unto his fathers."

SURELY ONE CAN SAY in truth that Sister Lewis, having served well her own generation, by the will and grace of God, has now fallen asleep and rests, like David, with her loved ones who have gone on before. For she was a righteous person whose delight was in the gospel of Christ and in the church of her allegiance. She served her Lord according to her best leadings.

Our sister was born into a goodly—a Christian family. I well recall her father, Louis E. Hills—one of our stalwart defenders of the faith, a man of much native ability, a missionary from 1908 to 1917. He had earlier been a railroad man, and during the years his daily life was spent along the rails of a modern railroad, his mind and his thoughts were oft engaged with the things of the kingdom. Especially was he interested in that marvelous work, the Book of Mormon, and in the archaeological evidences of the truthfulness of that record. His death in 1925, while he had lived almost to the span allotted to men, was untimely, as he was struck down and killed in an accident at a spot almost within the shadow of this edifice.

Her mother was a devoted, long-time member of the church. She was the daughter of an early church leader, Samuel Powers, one of the men who ordained my father president and leader of the church. She long survived the passing of her husband, and maintained her interest in all the affairs of life. Through the years of her widowhood, she was the constant companion of her daughter. She died on June 14, 1944. This God-fearing woman was not long survived by the daughter, who devotedly cared for her in her long sickness.

Louise's first husband was a consecrated member of the Restored church and was at one time a missionary for the church. His death was sudden and unexpected, and for a time our sister was a widow.

She then became the wife of Daniel Lewis, thus identifying herself by marriage with another family with a rich and sacred church background. Daniel was the son of William Lewis, beloved patriarch and the father of numerous sons and daughters, all of whom have been faithful members. By this alliance, Louise became the stepmother to a number of children. This is always a difficult role for one to occupy, but she was equal to the demands made upon her, and she soon secured a place in the affections and love of these children, as attested through the years by all who have known them, and by the presence here today of all of them, though coming from great distances.

AS A BOY, I early became acquainted with Daniel Lewis, as for a time in the early days of Lamoni he was superintendent of a factory there. There I learned to love Dan Lewis. Soon, thereafter, he engaged in railroading and for many years was a locomotive engineer on the Burlington Railroad in Missouri and Wyoming, and later, on the Florida East Coast Lines in southern Florida.

But desiring to have a place in Zion, some fifteen years or more ago, he and Louise changed their business connections and moved to Independence. Here he established a new business and through his initiative and industry, aided by Louise, he was quite successful.

This establishment of a home in Independence enabled both of them to take part in the affairs of the church and in other activities.

Dan, as we affectionately called him, went to his reward a few years ago, and now Louise, after a busy life of home and church activities through the years, having found a secure place in the hearts of her family, her associates, the Saints at the Center Place and many other places, has joined the sainted circle of husband, father, and mother on the other side of the vale. As one of her dearest friends said to me only the other day, "Louise will always be remembered by her charming personality and her never-failing good cheer."

Sister Lewis was stricken while on a visit to her daughter, Mrs. Jayne Corum at Vallejo, California. She received every possible attention, but failed to rally.

WE MAY GET A GLIMPSE of Sister Lewis' work from a letter she wrote to her daughter in February, 1945, from which I quote portions:

I received a blessing when seventeen years of age and was told I was given the "gift of music" and would do a musical work as I advanced in years. I wrote some music soon after my marriage (about nineteen years old) to Dr. Farr. He was one of the Seventy, and we traveled for many years in missionary and tent work. But I didn't do much music writing until after I married Daniel Lewis.

I wrote "Slumber Song" in 1934, and had it published in 1936. "Behold! It Is Written" came out that same year.

I am supervisor of visiting for Zion (eleven churches), and also women's group leader for group eight. I also attend prayer meeting and choir practice (Wednesday and Thursday night) and sing in the choir. On top of that, Brother Frederick M. Smith has asked me to write some music for him, so I work on that between times, then sandwich in playing for funerals, etc. I am busy, but I feel pretty good.

Auntie and I went to Music Club last night. Miss Eberhart (cousin of Mignon Eberhart, the authoress) from the Conservatory of Music in Kansas City, gave the lecture on "Grand Opera," and then Garland Tickemyer, Virgil Woodside, Mrs. Josephine Mader, Mrs. George Miller, Lilly Belle Allen, George Miller, Mrs. Pauline Turner, the Victory Singers, and the Wayside Chapel Quartet gave excerpts of "Faust." It was grand! I wanted to shout, "Bravo!"

Sister Lewis, always an active member of the Independence Music Club, served on various committees and boards and, for a time, served as president of that fine organization.

While I have known something of her musical activities and ability which found an outlet in a number of musical productions, I have been profoundly impressed by the scope and range and the themes of some of the things she produced.

At the time she wrote to her daughter, Jayne, from which letter I have quoted, she listed her various works. Among these I note the following:

A cantata, "Behold, It Is Written," which was sung by various choral organizations in Australia, Hawaii, Canada, and many places all over the United States. Of this she wrote:

At times I was so filled with the spirit of inspiration that the music came faster than I could write it down; and many times I was in tears when writing this. I told no one except my mother at that time. But later I had letters from people in the east and the west saying that when the singers started rehearsals on this cantata, they "were in tears" they were so filled with the spirit. So that was proof to me that the same spirit I had felt in writing was felt by those who sang it.

I MYSELF HEARD a confirmation of this statement by one of Louise's best friends, my own companion, Sister Smith, who said she always had the same experience every time she sang it.

A second cantata, "Other Sheep I Have," was based on the Book of Mormon. Her mother, a great Book of Mormon student, supplied the text. Louise was told by many of our missionaries that she had given them a superior synopsis of that book. This has also been rendered in many places in our country and in some foreign lands. Parts have also been broadcast over Radio Station KMBC and the Canadian Broadcasting systems.

A song, "Our Prayer," was inspired by hearing church hymns being sung in one home, while from others she heard popular music. The closing lines are:

From every home in Zion, Lord,
May hymns of praise arise;
And goodness emanate from them
As incense to the skies.

Sister Lewis added these words in her statement, "This is my ideal of Zion."

"Steps That Lead to God," the words of which were written by Sister Ruth Haden of St. Joseph, Missouri, was rendered by a chorus at the General Conference of the church in 1940.

Many other songs followed, all of them used in our churches and over the airways:

"Beneath the Cross of Christ," a hymn-anthem.

"Like the Brook to the Valley," words by her neighbor and friend, Presiding Evangelist Elbert A. Smith.

"The Years," words written also by Brother Smith.

A collection of songs entitled "Come to Zion Singing," one of them written by her aunt, Ella Brooks Harris.

"Easter," which came to her at an Easter service.

"Jesus, Thy Love Is Dear to Me," words written by Doctor Fred B. Farr, her first husband.

"Slumber Song," which came to her after an afternoon siesta.

A second (revised) edition of "Songs of Consolation," to include her father's favorite funeral text, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

Hymn 416, "We Limit Not the Truth of God," in the Saints' Hymnal, words written by G. Rawson.

In addition to these—and I have not mentioned all of them—is a collection of songs just off the press.

All these works reflected her great faith and confidence in the divinity of the Restored Gospel and in the promise of salvation.

Our singers today will sing her "End of Day," which was used at the funeral of her mother, from which I quote the closing lines:

Oh what joy to meet our loved ones there,
In that heavenly home so bright and fair;
And our joys and hopes and work to share
In peace—at end of day.

Was this not a personal prophecy of what she has now experienced!

Her anthem, "Thanksgiving," will be rendered by the Stone Church Choir on next Thursday at a special Thanksgiving service.

I have, in simple terms, told something of her life. No words add anything to the glory of a righteous soul. The simplicity of true narration of the life of a good man or good woman sustains them beyond words of mine or of any other.

GOD IT IS who makes us. Everything good—everything in our natures that is good—comes from his powerful hand. He sends all generous sentiments and good thoughts; but while the most errant may be so endowed, there are special gifts reserved for his servants, his covenant children, those who have a place in his family as adopted sons and daughters, joint heirs with Christ.

Among these that mark the followers of our Lord is piety. Until this gift from heaven is received, all others but add to the ruin and failure of these whom they might otherwise adorn—all an illusion without faith and piety. Indeed piety marks the whole worth of man.

When God formed the heart of man, he planted goodness therein as the proper characteristic of the divine nature, since only God is all good, and goodness is the greatest means of attracting the affections of others.

These qualities of heart and mind were endowed upon our sister in a great measure. They have been seen and voiced by her friends and associates. It was as if she had prayed, as did Solomon, for a heart of understanding, for, as the Psalmist said, "Out of the heart come the issues of life." Louise Lewis cherished the things of the heart, and while all else decays, sentiment lives.

Once, a noted divine in addressing a great man whose death and passing were imminent, said, "I can see in you nothing which death can efface." I am wondering if we cannot with propriety and truthfulness say of our sister who has gone from us, "We remember nothing in you which death can destroy. You will, in the entirety of your goodness, be preserved." Yes, the qualifications of mind and heart are enduring and will not in departing hence be lost to us.

PERHAPS THE DEATH of a Christian should never be noted without special reference to the Resurrection, that principle of the gospel of Christ that has comforted the Saints of all times, and to which Paul made such eloquent reference in his letter to the Corinthians. It is unnecessary to remind you that Sister Lewis believed in the promise of the Savior as devoutly as did Paul and those very disciples who had witnessed the resurrection of Jesus.

I do feel led to call your attention to what was said by the Prophet Alma as found in the Book of Mormon:

Now there must needs be a space betwixt the time of death and the time of the resurrection.

And now I would inquire what becometh of the souls of men, from the time of death, to the time appointed for the resurrection! . . .

Behold, [and here are the words used by Sister Lewis in her Songs of Consolation to which I made reference] it has been made known unto me, by an angel, that the spirits of all men, as soon as they are departed from this mortal body; yea, the spirits of all men, whether they be good or evil, are taken home to that God who gave them life.

And then shall it come to pass that the spirits of those who are righteous, are received into a state of happiness, which is called paradise; a state of rest; a state of peace, where they shall rest from all their troubles, and from all care and sorrow.

Here is one of the grandest promises of the Restored Gospel, found in that record we have chosen to believe contains the fullness of the gospel, and which we truly believe.

Our sister evidenced her supreme faith in that promise, because she used it exactly as we find it in the record when she arranged her own music.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN wrote an immortal song called "The Lost Chord." No doubt many of you can in imagination hear it now. The sentiments of this song are so engaging, I feel I must give you part of it. When seated one day at the organ, the player struck a wonderful chord which he said was "like the sound of a great Amen."

It flooded crimson twilight, like the close of an angel's psalm, and it lay on my fevered spirit, with a touch of infinite calm. It quieted pain and sorrow, like life overcoming strife. It seemed the harmonious echo from our discordant life. It linked all perplexed meanings into one perfect peace, and trembled away in the silence, as if it were loth to cease.

And then the player says he had sought in vain to find again that marvelous chord, "that one lost chord divine, which came from the soul of the organ, and entered into mine." And he mused:

It may be that Death's bright angel will speak in that chord again,
It may be that only in heaven I shall hear that great Amen.

Many bright and shining souls have gone into that heavenly realm, but I doubt if any of them will have a greater appreciation of that divine chord, should it be struck again in heaven, than will Louise Hills Lewis.

SUCH A PERSON must surely live on. Her passing is but the liberation of her earth-bound powers. It is not frustration or collapse, but victory!

I know not how far her influence has gone, or how long she will be remembered, for it is human to forget, though her memory will be extended far because of her ministry of music; but this I know:

she was a righteous woman and her works, her character, and the influence she set in motion will still be when the stars have fallen.

REST TO HER ASHES.

PEACE, ETERNAL PEACE TO HER SOUL!

Greatness Through Service

power as they did in former days?" I freely admit I could only with a bit of embarrassment review my own anemic presentation and testimony and answer, "I don't know." But in my mind would burn the realization that greater power would come in direct ratio with greater effort, devotion, and willingness to serve.

WITH THESE STORIES of our giants, there is another classic legend which has come down to our generation. I often heard my mother speak of it along with the other dreams she had for the kingdom. "Loyd," she would say, "some day the endowment will come." I can remember my mind running off into all sorts of places as I viewed the magical power which would be manifested through the endowment. I will remember a district conference theme of quite a number of years past which was emblazoned across the front of the church in cardboard letters covered with silver paint—"THE ENDOWMENT."

Not for one moment would I try to dim the dream of a greater power than we now experience working among our people and through our priesthood, but I pray earnestly that God's Spirit will open the eyes of us all to the realities of our condition and stir us from our inertia.

"The Endowment" in some places is a phrase that is uttered in almost reverence, and in these same places our people go merrily on their way, waiting for the time when God will move in a miraculous manner and do their work for them. Their inventories are not filed, their tithes are not paid, their priesthood calling in many instances has not been magnified, there is neither a prospect list nor any definite missionary plans, there is no sustained home-visiting or service preparation . . . but they rest securely in the conviction that some day the endowment will come. They are quite sure there is no reason to work until their giant arrives. I am reminded that when Goliath fell, the Philistine armies turned and fled. It will ever be so for those whose faith is dependent upon some source of power other than that which comes from humble, unselfish, unreserved service to Christ through his church to our fellow men.

The recent debt which held us in bondage for several years was not lifted by a few giants paying hundreds of thousands of dollars to the church but by the consistent obedience and sacrifice by members whose conversion was to service and obedience instead of being served. Thank God those numbered into the thousands. I saw a lovely and efficient new church building put up by the Saints of my home branch in McKenzie, Alabama. It was made possible not because one or two gave thousands, but because about one hundred gave in terms of ten and twenty and fifty dollars and did it consistently. That same story is repeated in many branches.

LET US NOT DECEIVE OURSELVES. The missionary effort of March and April—the missionary effort of 1949, of the twentieth century, and of all time to come—will be successful not because a few giants labor for us, but because in every branch dozens of consecrated elders and priests and teachers and deacons, along with many unordained men, women, and children, dedicate themselves to service. The good servant obeys the commandments of his Master.

With such dedication, let us labor diligently and patiently, then in years to come, our children will look back on the day in which we live and say, "Now in those days there were giants in the earth."

The Sacred Week — By ELVA OAKMAN

ALL NIGHT people had sat huddled together in the dense darkness of their homes, some praying, some cursing, some just sitting in fear. A few who were more courageous, or perhaps more foolhardy, had stood outside and listened to the loud humming of five hundred enemy planes overhead and the noise of the guns and exploding bombs—some far, some near.

They had marveled at the weird beauty of the sky crisscrossed with streamers of light, brilliantly illuminated here and there with slowly sinking flares. All of this was set off against a background of the reddish-orange glow that meant hundreds of burning homes and . . . death.

It was morning now; the enemy had gone. Conditions were so dreadful in the next town, seven miles away, no one was permitted to enter or leave it until the dead should be buried. Tales of horror spread from door to door. People were too weary and yet too alive to rest now that it was possible—or was it possible? Momentarily they expected the sirens to shriek their warning of danger.

All over the city was intense silence. Not even a delivery wagon passed the doorway. The very earth seemed dead, and the air motionless.

WHAT DAY was this? Was it the Sabbath when traffic was very light? One's brain worked slowly. No, yesterday was Thursday. This would be Friday. Why to be sure! It was Good Friday—the day set apart to commemorate the death of the Master. This was England—every business house would be closed; during the morning, even the trams would not run. But really, had this day ever more fittingly been observed? Death was everywhere about us.

All of that day we thought of the Master—thought of that time so long ago when he was hung upon a cross of wood and left to die. The very earth had cried out in pain; there had been earthquake and darkness.

This day must have been a bit like that one; but where was the Master? Not now upon a cross of wood. No! But could it be that he was dead in the homes of his people? Had many of them invited him into their homes even for this sacred week? In memory, I could hear the words I had so often heard in the past: "The children will hear about him at Sunday school. Besides, nobody likes to hear about the crucifixion of Christ—certainly not the children. This must be a time of gaiety. We will have Easter eggs and bunnies and surely a new dress or suit." And even at church there had been Easter eggs and bunnies. No, they hadn't bothered to think much about Him on Easter and certainly not on Good Friday or on the other days of that week.

Amid the desolation of a world wracked in pain, we seemed to hear the faint call of the Master: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

ESUS HAD BEEN LIFTED UP from the earth, but how could we make this such a living reality in our homes that all who entered there would be drawn toward him? After all, that is our calling as mothers.

If you began reading one of the Gospels aloud to your family at Christmas time, you would probably just be ready to read the ending of the story now. The week will seem much more real if, at the beginning of each day, you picture the happenings of that day so long ago. It isn't all a happy story, but it is the most dramatic one that was ever lived or written, and it ends in a paeon of joy. And if you are wise, you will continue the reading when the week has ended, for the later appearance of Christ to the disciples is a delightful conclusion. Luke and John record them.

OUR READINGS will be something like this, although on some days we will chose one and not read them all aloud:

Palm Sunday: Matthew 21: 1-15.

(All of the Gospels tell the story.)

Monday: The cursing of the fig tree, Matthew 21: 16-20; Mark 11:14-16, 21, 22. It is an acted story, for that is what happens to us when we do not bear fruit.

The casting out of the money-changers, Mark 11: 17-20.

Tuesday: He went to the temple to worship. That is where the Sadducees and Pharisees and members of the Sanhedrin found him and sought to get evidence against him. These are the stories he told in answer to their questions:

Tribute to Caesar, Luke 20: 20-26.

The two sons, Matthew 21: 21-33.

The vineyard story, Matthew 21: 35-43.

Wednesday: Jesus was again in the temple:

When he saw a certain widow, Luke 21: 1-6.

Then he dined with his friends, Mark 14: 4-9.

Thursday: The Last Supper, John 13. The Last Prayer, John 17 (for adults). In the Garden, Mark 14: 36-51. Peter's story, Mark 14: 59-82.

Good Friday: All of the Gospel writers record this.

Saturday: Of this day, little is recorded, so why not use the words of a lovely poem?—Perhaps, "There Is a Green Hill Far

a home column feature

Away," by Cecil F. Alexander.

Easter Sunday: You must chose from the four Gospels, for all of them tell the story.

Today people shrink from the sorrow of the crucifixion story. The world says, "Let us be gay; there is enough of sorrow." But if we would rejoice in the Resurrection, we must first have suffered in the Crucifixion. We are told that if the crucifixion story is told to children, it will fill them with horror, and they will hate the Scriptures. Still, we are not silent about the heroic deeds of those we love, despite the fact that those deeds are closely allied with death. Why should we remain silent about the most wonderful deed that was ever done? It opens the doors of eternal life to each of us who care to enter.

THE CHILD WAS three. Since birth he had been told stories of Jesus, and he loved them. The very words of the Scripture read aloud would entice him from active play, and he would stand entranced until they ended.

Just before the sacred week began, his mother acquired a set of pictures, one for each day of the week. Each morning she gave him the picture, and, while he looked at it, she read him the story. At the close, he would nod and point out the things he had noticed there.

Then came Good Friday. The child had never heard the words or seen a picture of the Crucifixion, although it had been mentioned indirectly. With a prayer in her heart, the mother handed him the picture. It was one of Anna Ruth Wood's paintings. Then she began to read the story as recorded by Matthew (27: 29-37, 55, 58).

The reading ended, and there was silence. The child had put the picture down early in the story and sat just looking at his mother. His eyes were full of tears. She would have drawn him into her lap and said, "Let me tell you the happy ending to the story," but, before she could speak, he said wistfully, "Read it again, please, Mother." He put his free hand engagingly on hers, "Please, Mother dear." The tears were gone now, and so she read it again.

This time the tears coursed down his cheeks, but he begged to hear it just once more. "No, dear," she said gently, "it makes you too sad." But he shook his head as he urged, "Please, Mother, just once more. It is a happy sad." Who can say that the Spirit of Him who had given his life that such as this should be saved from death had not touched the little one?

Thereafter through the years he loved the story and often asked for it, and later read it himself from the Scriptures.

HOW WONDERFUL it would be if every home could have at least some of the pictures which bring understanding to the events of this week. A picture could be hung in a prominent place in the home so that all who entered would be of one mind for that day. Quite large pictures can be obtained from the Pilgrim Press for a nominal cost (Pilgrim Press, 19 South La Salle Street, Chicago 3, Illinois). A single frame could be used for each in turn. It would offer a lovely setting for the worship service with which to begin the day. It would furnish a lovely theme for the bedtime story of the evening. And, when the child is tucked into bed, if the picture were placed near by with a wee light beside it—just enough to give it life—who can say that the angels of heaven would not be sent to quicken the mind of the child into an understanding of the Master's life and way.

At Christmas time, did you have the scene pictured with figurines? Why not use those same small characters to illustrate the happenings of the sacred week? Each day the children, with your help, could change the setting and find joy in doing it.

People of some other faiths change their manner of eating during Passion Week. They go without some of the dainties they have come to love. Would it not bring joy to the heart of the Master if we, too, sacrificed some of the things we cherish, go without a meal or two, or give up our desserts that our minds might be more clear to hear his voice?

Too often Easter is a time when new garments are in evidence. It is a nice thought that as Christ came forth in newness of life, so we also come forth in new clothing; yet, often children and young people who come from homes where Christ is most needed stay away from church at Easter because they do not have lovely clothes as do their friends. I wonder if Christ would not smile upon us if, perchance, we sacrificed the price of that new garment that others of his children who were needy might be clothed. That would be representative of the spirit of the sacred week. Children eagerly partake of the spirit of sacrifice and joy in the making of such offerings. If this is truly to be a "day of sacrifice," is this not a good time to begin?

YES, EASTER DAY is the time when we begin a new life with the Master. Let us make it a different day, and one in which we could expect to have our risen Lord with us every minute.

What a fine thing it is to live where there is an early morning sunrise service in which the Resurrection is depicted! The children and youth will be eager to go and share the joy of it with you.

Then, when church school and church are over, let the meal be a simple one, prepared in singleness of heart and eaten in that spirit. The table decorations might illustrate the Easter story. The conversation may be directed about the thought: "If Jesus came to my house, what would I do today?" In the afternoon, go for a hike and look especially for all of the new life that has come out

Our Emotional Savior

Some Palm Sunday Thoughts

By DAN B. SORDEN

And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it; saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! But now they are hid from thine eyes.—Luke 19: 40, 41.

SO FREQUENTLY we think of Palm Sunday as a day of gladness and great joy. It is called the day of the triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem. Today Christians usually make it a day of rejoicing. But for the Master, it was a sorrowful day. It was not a day of gladness but one of sadness.

Yet it is the commencement of our Savior's coronation. He had spent the day before in Bethany at the home of Lazarus whom he had raised from the dead. The popularity of Jesus had spread throughout all Judea, and the people who were gathering in Jerusalem for the Passover were hoping he would come to the city so they might see him. Then suddenly the word was noised about that Jesus was on his way to the city. That was the prelude of his passion and the commencement of his coronation. He was approaching the cruel end of his earthly career. Conscious of the fact that he came into the world to die for the people, Jesus surrendered himself into their hands. The enthusiasm of the multitude was at its height, and out of love and adoration for him, they broke off palm branches, strewed them in the way, and spread their garments before him.

This was the greatest demonstration ever given to Jesus. Some have estimated that perhaps there were two million people in and around Jerusalem. And here indeed was the fulfillment of the prophecy in the Book of Zechariah which says: "Shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; behold, thy King cometh unto thee; he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." The multitudes shouted themselves hoarse: "Hosannah to the Son of David! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"

Yet in many ways, Palm Sunday was one of the saddest days in the life of Jesus. As the Savior came within sight of the city, shining in all its glory below him, beautifully situated, glorious with its sacred memories of the past, a strange depression came over him. He broke down at the sight of the city and wept over it. The sorrowing Savior gave way to the surging emotion within him and found relief in tears.

WHY DID HE WEEP? It was not for himself, even though it was just before his hour of anguish and only a few days before the time of his death. He shed no tears for himself. Most of us would have shown admiration for Jerusalem the golden. The Psalmist said: "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell them to the generations following." Yet Jesus wept over the city. It was very uncommon for him to weep. In fact, we have only one other instance of his weeping, and that was at the grave of Lazarus.

Why did he weep? It was because of Jerusalem's corruption. He was not thinking of the massive buildings, glittering temple, or the picturesque gardens. He could not see the beauty of the city because of its corruption, its sin, its blindness. That is why Jesus wept. What are beautiful buildings, palaces, and temples if they are rotten with sin, shame, and degradation? How could he feel otherwise when he knew that the hearts of the people would soon permit him to be dragged out and hung on a cruel cross to die for this unrepentant people? What else could he do?

He was made to cry out: "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace! But now are they hid from thine eyes." The teeming thousands did not seem to care or even to be aware that the walls of their beautiful city would soon be torn down, and they or their children taken captive by Rome. But Jesus knew all this, and so he wept. He wept only because he loved. It was love that brought this weeping Savior into the world to die upon the cross. We should thank God for this weeping Savior.

The world has need of weepers today. When Christians no longer weep over the sins of humanity, it will be a bad day for them. We need more than mere weepers, however; we need men and women whose weeping goes deeper than tears. We need people who will weep and work.

John Knox wept over his fair and beautiful Scotland, corrupted with sin, yet he prayed while he wept: "Lord, give me Scotland or I die," and he meant the conversion of Scotland.

Then we remember the brave missionary, Doctor Duff, who fainted in the midst of a speech while pleading for men to go to India to do church work. Recovering a little, he said: "I was speaking of India, was I not? Take me back that I may finish my speech." They did so and, with a surge of emotion sweeping over him, he exclaimed: "Although I have spent twenty-five years in India and lost my constitution, if Scotland has no more men to give to the Lord Jesus, I will be off to the banks of the Ganges tomorrow."

Such men wept and prayed and lived and labored and died for the salvation of their fellow men. We need more weepers who will work as well as weep. Jeremiah cried out: "Oh, that my head were waters and that mine eyes were a fountain of tears, that I might weep for the slain of the daughters of my people."

Yes, we need more emotion, more devotion, more zeal, more earnestness, more passion for the cause of Christ and his Zion. We need more of the concern of our Savior when he looked down upon Jerusalem and exclaimed: "O, Jerusalem! Jerusalem! . . . how often would I have gathered your children together, even as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."

Jesus wept over Jerusalem. He died for her people and for us.

Graceland Faculty Changes

THE APPOINTMENT of two persons to the faculty and staff of Graceland College and other personnel changes were announced by President E. J. Gleazer, Jr., following approval of the Board of Trustees. Malcolm Ritchie, a graduate of Graceland with the class of 1947, will become Dean of Students and Director of Student Activities on August 1. Leonard Delano, a member of the class of 1938, will become Director of Food Service in the fall.

While a student at Graceland, Mr. Ritchie was editor of the Tower and was instrumental in the formation of the Student Publications Board which governs the operation of student publications. He was a member of the Student Council, the Camp and Kit Club, Oratorio Society, and the Skylarks—an organization for students interested in flying. He came to Graceland after having served in the air force as a captain. A former resident of Texas, he is now studying at the University of California, where he received his Bachelor of Arts Degree with a major in psychology in 1948. He will complete his Masters Degree in sociology in August of this year. In addition to his duties as Dean of Students and Director of Student Activities, he will have teaching responsibility in psychology and sociology at Graceland. As dean, he will be responsible for directing the residence program, counseling in student welfare, and will direct student life and activities in general. He is twenty-eight years old. His wife, the former Roberta Ann Gos-sadge, is a graduate of Graceland, class of 1946.

LEONARD DELANO was president of his graduating class at Graceland, a member of College Players, the Oratorio Society, the Religion Club, and the Chemistry Club. He holds a B.S. Degree from Iowa State College with a major in industrial economics. He received the Master of Business Administration Degree in 1947 from the University of Chicago, specializing in restaurant administration. Since that time, he has been working in the field of dining room management. His most recent position has been as manager of an industrial cafeteria for the Harding-Williams Company in Chicago.

During the war, he was officer in charge of bakeries at various posts and held other responsible positions including that of commandant of a quartermaster garrison force and supply depot in the South Pacific. He is thirty years old and single.

DR. ROY CHEVILLE will become Dean of Faculty and Instruction under a new plan announced by Gleazer. This appointment comes near the end of his twenty-fifth year of teaching at Graceland College. He first came to Graceland in 1919 as a member of the class in religious education. He has also attended five other colleges and universities, including the University of Chicago from which he holds the degrees of Ph.B., A.M., B. D., and Ph. D.

At present Dr. Cheville is Director of Religious Life, Chairman of the Social Science Division, counselor to married students, and teacher of sociology and religion at Graceland. He will continue to teach courses in religion and sociology in addition to his other duties.

Mr. and Mrs. William Gould were granted a year's leave of absence by the board, beginning with the end of the present school year. Mr. Gould will be working on his Ed.D. Degree in the field of Communications at Columbia University, beginning with the summer session. Mrs. Gould will continue her work in secretarial science.

The resignations of Miss Donna Holmes, college nurse; Miss Doris Conklin, Activities Director; and Jack Downey, Chief Accountant, were also announced.

Miss Holmes, college nurse since 1947, will attend school at the University of Kansas City this summer and will begin work in the fall at the Independence Sanitarium. She plans to continue her schooling part-time toward a degree in public health nursing.

Miss Conklin, a member of the staff since her graduation in 1946, plans to continue her schooling at the University of Michigan.

Downey, who has been a member of the business office staff since 1946, will continue work begun last summer at the University of California in Los Angeles toward his Bachelor of Science Degree in accounting. He plans to make his residence on the West Coast.

The Sacred Week

to testify of the Master. When he was on earth, they spoke to him of his Father, God.

Are there any sick people or shut-ins to whom you can minister in song or story? Go there!

And then, during your hour of rest, read all of the Easter stories as recorded by the gospel writers. Notice what different things each remembered and wrote down. They all told the truth, and their stories fit in together like the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle—if you have eyes to see.

Can you not sing the Easter songs and, if you have a phonograph, play the Messiah? Tell of the haste and yet the precision of Handel's writing, of how when the Hallelujah Chorus was sung, the king and all of the people stood together in reverence, for they had seen beyond the man and beyond the music to Jesus, their Redeemer.

Truly this can be a sacred week and end with a blessing under the hands of the Master if we will but open our door and bid him enter.

No! He is not dead in the homes of his people when we go forth in this spirit. He is our risen Lord, and to him we will all be drawn.

friends gathered around an outdoor fireplace for a wiener roast or seated under the stars in a semi-circle singing old, familiar songs.

Why not begin now making plans? Blueprints aren't necessary from an unused plot of ground to a recreation center can be made in a short while. Suggestions and help from those with practical experience on the construction end are always in order. With the other volunteers co-operating, the rest is easy. And if you do get some blisters on your hands, you'll be congratulating yourself all summer for it.

It's up to the individual ingenuity of each church to make and carry out its plans for summer recreation and fellowship, but the realization of the importance of such an undertaking is the force behind the actuality—it's what you might call the "go power." Recreation and fellowship together are dynamically important factors in living life to its fullest. Webster defines recreation as refreshment of strength and spirit after toil, and fellowship as friendliness and comradeship with others. This mental and physical stimulation helps to maintain the balance of life. Whether we are consciously aware of it or not, each normal individual is constantly seeking this balance. When his needs are unfulfilled, he cannot become the kind of person his potentialities say is possible, and the loss to himself and society is great. On the other hand, unless it is offered in the proper atmosphere, the result is often even more detrimental.

GOING, GOING, GONE! That's winter in the background and spring in the foreground. And in the spring, a young man's fancy, a young girl's fancy—in fact, everyone's fancy—turns to thoughts of the out-of-doors—to long, balmy evenings and summer vacations away from school or work. Of course, there's the garden to hoe and grass to cut, but there's fun, too—the kind that relaxes and builds healthy bodies and healthy minds.

What about volleyball, tennis, baseball, picnics, and campfire services? Now, with the first breath of spring in the air, our enthusiasm should be boundless. We should be able to visualize a group of our

—the essential requirements are visionary ability, vigor, and vitality. The first of this combination, visionary ability, is the over-all, integrating force. It enables us to discern in advance what is needed, how it should be accomplished, and what the result will be. The second and third, vigor and vitality, support the first by carrying the vision to its completion. Take a good look at your church yard. Wouldn't that spot at the side make an ideal tennis or volleyball court? With the money from a chili supper and the work of willing hands, the miraculous change

THE IMPORTANCE of such a project assumes still greater proportions when one stops to consider the number of young people who are soon to set aside their books for three months and are, even now,

Easter Has Meaning for Me

By Geneva Crutcher

WHEN I WAS A CHILD, my concept of Easter Day was a holiday that was a lot of fun. We always had eggs for each meal that day and an Easter egg hunt with colored eggs we helped to color. Usually my cousins came to our home for Easter, and we all looked forward to having a good time together. Sometimes our parents took the older boys and girls into town for the sunrise services, but that didn't mean anything to the rest of us.

When I was about eleven, my brother, my sisters, and I began attending Sunday school with some of our friends. There we learned that Easter was the day on which Christ arose from the dead. The teacher impressed us with the declaration that Christ was still alive, but that didn't mean anything to me either. I can never remember having doubted the existence of Christ.

We didn't talk of him at home, but I had heard of him and the story of his life at school. The pure whiteness and the simplicity of the cross appealed to me, and I wanted a cross necklace to wear to signify that I believed in Christ.

For the past five years, the season of Easter has been preceded by the death of someone whom I loved very much—my grandfather, my grandmother, a neighbor boy killed in service, my pastor's wife, and my best girl friend. I don't know what I would have done without the hope and the feeling of the deep love of Christ that accompanies the Easter season. This season of the year has come to be the period of closest contact with Christ for me because it is the time I needed him most. The knowledge that Christ died that we might live after death together with him erased much of the sadness of the loss of those I loved and helped to ease the longing for them as I trusted them to his care.

I understand now more what this

Christ has done, not only for me but for all the world. The story of Christ is a beautiful one. If it were not true, it would still appeal to me as a story, but it is true. I know it is true and that Christ still lives today. Easter is the emphasis time for our faith in his existence. That knowledge gives me the feeling that life is worth living, and that I am here for a reason.

Each time I read from the Bible the account of the Crucifixion and the period just before it, I resolve to try to make myself more worthy of the love and sacrifice of this Christ who gave his all that we might be permitted to live again after death.

Christ's love for all mankind, his tolerance of those who did not understand; his patience with Thomas who did not believe; his forgiveness of Peter, the thief on the cross, and those who crucified him; his thoughtfulness in seeing that his mother was cared for; and his own personal dignity throughout his whole life on earth—especially during his crucifixion—have made me love him very much and desire to become what he wants me to be.

The peace and joy and hope he left with his disciples is ours, and the commission to feed his sheep and to follow him is ours today just as much as it was Peter's then. Somehow, Easter is doing everything Christ has said for us to do; it is the carrying on of the noble work that he began and entrusted to us to finish; it is living in a manner preparatory to some day being with him in the places he went to prepare for us; it is peace and joy and hope of life with him whose resurrection we commemorate on the Easter Day. In short, the essence of Easter is living the fullest life possible with this risen Christ occupying his rightful place in it.

Ingratitude

For you I did these things
Hung bleeding, pain-wracked, on a wooden cross.
Stood quiet in the scorn
Of men.
Heard hypocrites revile my name.

I watched your brother sell his very soul
For thirty shining, silver coins,
Which turned all dark and bitter
In his hand.
The crowd's roar swells so loud
Can you not hear me past its fearsome din?
Will you not listen? Nay,
You turn away.

I am pressed down with grief
For you, my lambs, my straying flock;
No bitterness is in me only love
And weeping.
For you I gave myself
Can I have made this greatest sacrifice
In vain?

LOUISE WRIGLEY.

eagerly looking forward to this freedom and playtime. What is going to be provided? We can't afford to take the chance of having today's youth guided into the wrong channels or stumble into them through misunderstanding or lack of comprehension of the true values in life. They must have instilled in them a faith that will stand up against all odds; they must have ideals for continued striving and growing. Where will they find these? Not in the corner drugstore, the local pool hall, or the nearest roadhouse. Not in these places where they are taught it's smart to be rough. They learn about honesty and purity and the Golden Rule through activities where standards of fair play and good sportsmanship are set, and where there is pride in accomplishments achieved honorably.

There could be no better reason—no more urgent reason for the expenditure of our efforts in planning and building for wholesome recreation and fellowship. We will be laying another cornerstone for the new kind of world that is the dream and hope of the oppressed and which must become a reality through the labor of free men and women.

In spite of the tragedy, the institute was well attended by representatives from each district. F. M. McDowell, director of priesthood education, was present to teach some of the six classes. He presided at the prayer service and delivered two addresses on Sunday. An eagerness to secure materials for individual and class study was displayed.

KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.—Stake conference was held on March 13. Bishop Wayne Updike gave the first sermon of the morning, and Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Sr., presented the second sermon. There was a good attendance at the conference.

PERSIA, IOWA.—Harold I. Velt, after cottage meetings and services for two weeks, baptized four persons and was given four other names for baptism. A fine spirit accompanied the confirmations.
