Many of these newly acquired friends go to great length to write their appreciation for the "tender, loving care" they have received. Others tell their friends about it, while still others are kind enough to tell us how certain of our services to patients can be improved upon. Out of these written and spoken words is molded a story which challenges the heart, mind, and sinews of every nurse, engineer, food processor, and technician whose hours of tireless toil are reflected in the daily improvement of the patients.

THERE IS THE STORY of little Johnny N., a devoted Catholic lad whose mother died some time ago, leaving the children to look after the house, cook the meals, and do other chores after they arrived home from school and while Dad was still working. One evening it was Johnny's job to empty and burn the trash. A brisk breeze was blowing, but Johnny did not have a mother to caution him, and the flame caught his trousers, painfully burning one leg. Johnny's father came home from work just in time to hurry him to the Sanitarium where he received immediate emergency care by two doctors and three nurses. After Johnny's leg had been treated and his pain relieved, his father breathed a sigh of relief and said to those standing near by, "We are always grateful for the Sanitarium. We know that we will get immediate and proper care here." His words were few, but they carried a deep, heartfelt meaning—a meaning which depicts the soul of the institution and its many workers. Any cleavage between religions was forgotten. Friends had been found in another faith.

AND FROM A MOTHER: "My daughter is applying to the Independence Sanitarium School of Nursing for training rather than to a large hospital closer to our home because her father was once a patient at the Sanitarium and the care he received was excellent."

From an Independence minister recently confined at the Sanitarium: "I left your hospital with a song in my heart for the excellent care I received."

From a young woman who volunteered: "My mother was there for four weeks, and she just loves every one of those girls; they gave her such good care."

From a mother's conversation: "Oh, you're from the 'San'? That is where my daughter had her baby, and she is so grateful for the excellent care she received."

And from another patient: "May I say that never have I been treated nicer, more efficiently, nor with more consideration than I was during my recent stay. The nurses, their aids, and the various technicians I encountered not only knew their jobs but dispatched their duties with the

The Second Miracle

By Ruby Tinkham

EVERYBODY IN TOWN knew about the first miracle. The local paper ran a story and even printed pictures of Paula before and after. But hardly anyone knew about the second miracle.

Paula and Dorothy Stanley were sisters, but as different as any two people could be. Paula was small and dainty and fair. Dorothy was tall and dark and as vivid as a red poppy swaying on a slender stalk. In contrast they were each beautiful, and it would be difficult to decide which face was the most appealing. But there the resemblance ended, for Paula was crippled—paralyzed from the waist down since childhood.

Between these girls there was an affinity difficult for any casual acquaintance to understand. They would exchange glances across a crowded room, and then suddenly Dorothy was by Paula's side, wheeling her away or handing her something. Or maybe they would both start to say the same thing and then end on a burst of spontaneous laughter. They seemed to make a whole, to throw around themselves a circle of love and understanding that excluded all others.

That was until the young missionary came to town. Then something strange occurred, something that was hard to explain. For this minister was different from the others. He had a quality of deep understanding, a sensitiveness to personal need, and a great and wonderful faith that reached out and pulled others close to him. It was wonderful to see such power in one so young, as night after night he drew the two sisters with others to the meetings. Long after bedtime they lay awake and talked about him and the things he taught.

THEN IT HAPPENED. One night he talked about healing—how important it was in the ministry of Jesus and how essential it still is in effective missionary work. One could fairly feel the power, waiting to rest on those who would seek its blessing through faith.

Both girls were lost in deep thought as they went to their room, yet each knew the other was thinking the same thing. The day of miracles was not over—he had said so. Their thoughts were full of the power they had just witnessed and each knew a great and marvelous opportunity seemed to be waiting—the opportunity for Paula to walk again!

It was while Dorothy was helping Paula get ready for bed that she burst out pleadingly, "I think we should ask him to do it, Paula, I know he can heal you."

Paula smiled tenderly, "Oh, Dorothy, you're so good to me, but I don't feel that I'm worthy to ask God to heal me. I only wish I were."

Dorothy stood up determinedly. "Of course you're worthy. Who in this whole world is kinder or more thoughtful than you are? You've never done a selfish thing in your whole life. Don't you see, God wants to heal you. He sent this man here purposely for you. I know he did. You've got to ask him."

Paula burst into tears. "Oh, Dorothy, I can't ask him. Maybe he wouldn't want to do it. Maybe I'm different from the others he has healed. What if God refuses me? I couldn't stand it. I just couldn't."

Dorothy put her arms around her sister and hugged her tightly. She stroked the silky gold hair and whispered softly, "Don't worry, darling, you won't have to ask him. I will. And he won't refuse. Just think, you'll be able to walk and go wherever you please. You can swim and play golf with Dad and me, and drive the car. Remember how you have always wanted to drive? Oh, I can hardly wait. I'll ask him tomorrow."

THERE WAS A HUSH in the church the next evening when Dorothy wheeled Paula up the aisle to the young minister. As their friends gazed with awe at the radiant faces of the two girls, it was difficult for them to perceive which expected the greater blessing. And when the young minister placed his hands on Paula's head, there was no doubt in the crowded church that God was about to perform a miracle. In that period of quiet reverence while he spoke intimately to God, many tears rolled unashamedly down people's faces and went unnoticed. There was an awesome silence when he removed his hands and placed them on Paula's shoulders. Everyone waited breathlessly for his next words.

"Paula, you must rise and walk now!"

Paula quivered with the shock of his words. He was telling her to get up, to leave her wheel chair, to walk down the aisle. She couldn't do it. She looked at her sister imploringly. "Help me, Dorothy, save me from all these eyes. You know I can't walk. Please." But Dorothy was urging her, begging her with every muscle—"Try, Paula, stand up!" Now he was placing his hands under her arms, and she could feel his strength through her whole body. That stinging in her legs—it was like a thousand needles plunging madly into the bone. The beating of her heart was as if she were going to suffocate. Agonizingly she pleaded with Dorothy, and again Dorothy forced her to try. Suddenly it happened. Paula was standing up! Paula, who hadn't stood on her feet for thirteen years, was standing alone! She looked around her terrified. The minister was holding out his hand to her and smiling. He expected her to walk to him—she who hadn't taken a step since that day the automobile struck her in front of the house. She tore her eyes away from his face and looked down at her trembling legs. Poor little weak things! It was as if they knew they couldn't walk down that aisle! Yet even while she gazed at them they were moving, slowly, heavily, like stones sucked out of the mire by a taut rope. She gasped, astonished that she, Paula Stanley, was walking! She raised her eyes joyfully to meet his. Then suddenly the pain was gone and her body was light and free as if it had no substance. Somebody afar off was sobbing hysterically, yet Paula heard nothing but sweet music.

A MAN from the newspaper came and took her picture standing between Dorothy and her father. He took another in the wheel chair before they took it down to the church basement. The young missionary had disappeared.

Everything at the Stanley house revolved around teaching Paula. Even ordinary tasks like hanging up clothes, running the sweeper, or going up and down stairs became filled with new meaning. They agreed to let her set her own pace, and they were overjoyed at the speed with which she attacked new tasks. She never seemed to get tired and was begging for a chance to try out her new strength at some kind of a job. Nobody was prepared for what happened.

One day she went to the super market to do some shopping. When she came out loaded with bulging paper bags, two small boys with toy guns were playing among the parked automobiles. One of them pointed his gun at Paula and shouted, "Bang! Bang! You're dead!"

The other little boy grabbed his arm and whispered fiercely, "You can't shoot her. She won't die. She's that funny girl, you know, the one in the paper, the 'Miracle Girl'."

Then they both eyed her strangely and backed away. Paula went white and dropped her eyes. Tears stung her eyelids; she bit her lip and stumbled under the heavy load. When she came into the house she was trembling all over. Dorothy seeing her white face and blazing eyes followed her into the bedroom.

She flung her arm around Paula's shoulder and hugged her affectionately. "Look, Paula, I think I've found just what you want. Mr. Roberts phoned me today and said he could use you in the music department. He'd like to have you start right away, and he said you could set your own hours until you were used to it."

PAULA SHOOK OFF the offending arm and replied scornfully, "I don't want a job. I don't want anything. I'm never going to step outside of this house again!"

Dorothy was shocked. "But why, Paula, why?"

Paula turned on her fiercely. "You know why. Everybody's laughing at me, making fun of me, calling me names, saying I'm strange, I'm funny. I'm not like everyone else. They call me the 'Miracle Girl.'" She flung herself on the bed and burst into tears. She clenched her fists and beat the bed. "I wish I'd never been born. I hate myself. I hate everybody. I hate God. I wish he'd left me alone."

Dorothy grabbed her shoulder and flung her over angrily. "Listen to me, Paula Stanley, you ought to be ashamed to talk like that. Of course you're different. Who wouldn't be after an experience like yours? But nobody is making fun of you. People do not make fun of God. Everybody in this town is happy for you and wants to help you. Mr. Roberts wants you because you know so much about music."

Paula raised on her elbow scornfully. "Yes, then he can sneer in that drawl of his, 'Come in and buy some sheet music and see our Miracle Girl.' All he wants is some free advertising, and I won't be made a fool of, I won't!"

Dorothy lowered her voice and pleaded. "Look, Paula, you can't hide. You have to face things, and there are always those who don't understand. You need a job. You need responsibility. It would help you, and it would mean a lot to Mom and Dad. You've missed so much—you need to laugh and play and make friends with other young people. We'll help; give us a chance."

But it wasn't any use. Paula shut herself up inside a strained, scornful silence, and no one could reach her. She did not leave the house for three weeks and remained stubbornly quiet and withdrawn. They left her alone, but still their eyes followed her mutely, begging desperately to help. They had agreed not to mention the job again, and they suffered silently, waiting. Dorothy tried to comfort her mother. "Don't worry, Mom, she'll be all right. All her life we've babied her and waited on her and protected her. She's just a child and has to grow up. Give her time and let her alone."

The day Mr. Roberts called Paula took the phone from her mother sullenly. "Paula, I know you're not ready to go to work yet, but I have a bunch of kids in here about your age who want to work up a band and they need a piano player. How about it? It could be lots of fun and besides they especially want you. They think you would lend them prestige and help get them engagements."

Paula quivered and tightened her lips. "No, Mr. Roberts, I don't want any part of it!" Then she slammed the phone down and walked determinedly out the front door. Her mother watched the slightly bent figure fade out of sight, and her heart ached with pity.

IT WAS DARK when Paula came home, and she faced them defiantly. "Well, I've got a job." At the look of surprise and happiness on her mother's face, she continued mercilessly. "I'm going to play the piano just as you wanted me to—at the Atom Club, from ten till two, seventy-five dollars a week."

Her mother gasped. "But, Paula, that's no place for a young girl like you. Why, they sell liquor there, and it's—why, it's indecent."

"Mother, you forget I'm not a child any longer. I'm nineteen, and the girl who sings is only twenty. Tony, who plays the drums, is twenty-one, and he has been there for three years."

Dorothy protested. "But such hours. You'll never get any rest. You could find something else."

Paula swung on her as if she had been waiting for this a long time. "I don't want anything else. I like the hours. I need a job. I need responsibility. I need other young people to laugh and play with. Remember? Well, I got it, and no one there ever heard of the 'Miracle Girl.' If the hours disturb you, I can move out."

"No." Her mother moaned.

Her dad broke in quietly. "It's all right, Paula; we'll try it for awhile and see how it works out. You are old enough to know what you want, and we will abide by your decision."

PAULA LEARNED a number of new things in the weeks that followed. Her mother never quite got used to the array of low-cut gowns that made up her daughter's new wardrobe. Paula called them sensational, not vulgar. Then there was Tony's red convertible. Paula managed it on two wheels as well as he did, but it still gave her mother a little chill whenever she looked out the window in the early morning and saw it parked there in front of the house.

Dorothy protested to her Father. "Dad, what she needs is a good hard spanking. She's just showing off, but it's hurting Mother."

He shook his head patiently. "Leave her alone, child, and pray that things turn out all right. That's the only way we can help her now. She's been hurt, and this is her way of striking back. She wants everybody to forget that she is the 'Miracle Girl.' Besides, criticizing won't help. She'll leave home, and you know what that would do to your mother." He sighed despairingly. "She needs help, but how?"

THE MORNING THAT TONY RAN INTO THE SAFETY ZONE, Dorothy stopped at the police station on her way to work so her mother would not suspect anything. Paula was sitting on a bench with her head bent, and when she raised her eyes they were enormous from crying. In the weak morning light her face looked so forlorn and dejected that Dorothy felt a rush of love and pity that carried her forward to put her arms around the lonely little figure. For a few seconds Paula leaned on her, and it was as it used to be—safe and warm and comforting. Then Paula pushed her away, saying, "I didn't want you to come down here. I told them not to call you."

Dorothy turned to the officer at the desk. "What are the charges, Captain?"

He looked up kindly. "There are no charges against your sister, Miss Stanley. The boy was drunk—ran into a safety zone and smashed his car up. He's got a few scratches and we're holding him. Lucky for him there were not many people out. It might have been a different story."

They started for the door and he interrupted them. "Look, Miss, you were lucky this time. Maybe next time it will be different. Take my advice and slow down a bit. You could have been crippled for life."

Out on the sidewalk Dorothy held Paula's arm sympathetically. She motioned for a cab and spoke comfortingly. "You go straight home and right to bed. Mom thinks you spent last night with one of the girls, and don't tell her any different. And don't worry, darling, everything will be all right."

Paula grabbed her hand pleadingly. "Oh, Dorothy, what's wrong with me? He was right. I was lucky this time. Maybe next time it will be different. What am I going to do? Please help me!"

After the cab drove away, Dorothy stood for a long time thinking. That white face and stricken eyes kept coming before her—and that pitiful voice kept repeating over and over, "What's wrong with me, Dorothy? I was lucky this time. But maybe the next time it will be different. What am I going to do? Please help me."

Dorothy never remembered how she got to the office, and her work lay unnoticed in front of her while she stared straight ahead. What had happened? Who had made the mistakes? Where had things gone wrong? Whose fault was it?

Maybe the missionary could help, maybe he would know. So she turned to her typewriter and wrote a long letter, and prayed silently that it would find him in time, that he would understand what it meant, would come, and help with the solution of their problem.

TWO WEEKS LATER when Paula came out of the drugstore, she ran into a familiar figure. She was startled and surprised, but he extended his hand and smiled warmly. "Paula Stanley, I believe, and looking very well. How are you?"

She recovered her poise and replied archly. "Shall I race you down to the corner, sir?"

He grinned good naturedly and shook his head. "That won't be necessary—I have no doubt of the outcome. I am going your way though—here, let me help you," and he took some of the parcels out of her arms. Then he walked beside her quietly, occasionally glancing at her gravely.

Paula caught the looks, and she burst out accusingly, "You know all about me, don't you? You've come here purposely to spy on me and find fault."

He refused to be angry. "Yes, I know about you. It's my job to take care of God's business, and you are one of his important investments. The fact that he healed you proves how important you are in his plans. I did come here purposely, but not to spy or find fault. I came to see where I had failed you." She looked at him in surprise as he continued seriously. "You see, I'm not sure you were healed."

She stopped and stared at him in amazement. What did he mean? Then she burst out angrily, "I'm perfectly sane, thank you, and healthy as an ox. Why don't you leave me alone? This is my life, and I am going to live it the way I please."

"If you had been really healed you would never say that. For you would know life is a stewardship given us by God, and you would be anxious to repay him for his loving-kindness. How about your parents, your friends, your church—have you repaid any of them for their kindness? Suppose they had lived their own lives when you needed them? Wrong attitudes are just as crippling as twisted legs. That's why I came back to tell you that you need help, that you still need to be healed."

"No—not again! I've been a 'Miracle Girl' once. That's enough for me."

He continued firmly, "We need people like you—young people who can be strong and unafraid and dedicated. You are too valuable to lose. I want to help you, and God wants to help you, too, if you will let us. Tell me something, and be honest with me. Are you happy? As happy as you were before?"

He thought she was going to cry, but she steadied her chin and faced him honestly. "No, I'm not, but it's different now. Before, I was sheltered and protected like a child. Now I have to stand on my own two feet and make my own decisions. It hasn't been easy but," she added defiantly, "I'm still the same girl I was before."

He studied her gravely before he answered. "Are you sure of that? Are you sure you're the same girl I administered to?"

He waited patiently while she fingered her purse nervously. Then kindly, "There are people who are blind besides those who cannot see. There are more who won't listen than there are those who cannot hear. How about the people who are desperately in need of inner healing—those who suffer from wrong attitudes, who are starved for the warmth of spiritual affection, who are locked in dungeons of their own making, blindly seeking for a doorway into the light? Don't you believe that they, too, need healing?"

She turned on him scornfully. "Now you're saying that I'm blind, that I'm too stubborn to see. I've never done anything so wrong. God knows I've tried hard to please him."

He sighed patiently. "God does know, Paula—that's why I am here. But there was a man in New Testament times who felt as you do, his name was Paul."

SHE LOOKED UP AT HIM IN SURPRISE. He wasn't laughing at her, he was serious. He was saying she had possibilities for greatness like Paul. How did he know? She lifted her eyes again with new humility. "What makes you so sure that God will bless me with this healing you feel I need?"

He lowered his voice. "Because not so long ago God gave me the same gift. I, too, felt that my life was satisfactory, that I was keeping the law, that I was doing enough. Then an old friend came along and showed me what real spirituality is. All I had was the outer form, and in his presence I felt like an impatient child. I wanted what he had and I told him so. It took six long, hard months of teaching before I gave up and accepted the idea that it was healing I needed."

He raised his head and the light struck his face, revealing a power and strength and radiance that echoed in her memory. "There is more than one kind of healing. There are those who are sick of life, who can find no purpose or meaning in it. There are others who are content with second best while they waste the talents God so generously gave them. Then there are those who self-righteously believe that they have reached the highest goal and feel no impatience to discover God's will. All these are sick—and their disaster lies in the fact that they feel no need for the healing of God's Spirit. You remember that the Psalmist said, 'renew in me a right spirit'? He might just as well have said, 'Oh, God, heal me of my wrong attitude.'"

Paula's newly found humility was followed by a surge of the old dependence. Here was someone she could trust, someone she could believe in. Somehow he knew and understood her, and she felt a warm glow envelop her whole being. She slowed down and paused reflectively. Her mother and dad would be pleased . . . and Dorothy. Somehow she felt very close to Dorothy. She raised her eyes and neither knew or cared that she was looking directly into Mr. Roberts' music store. Then suddenly one of the noisy gang inside saw Paula and pointed. She drew in her breath sharply and stared incredulously at the excited group pouring out of the store and heading straight toward her. Suddenly she knew she couldn't face them—not yet—so she turned and ran. Ran with her head down and her eyes blurred. "Oh, God, get me out of this," and then she was in the middle of the street and brakes were screaming all around her.

LATER AT THE HOSPITAL the family waited in strained silence except for the muffled sobbing her mother tried to stifle. Her father looked grim and old. Dorothy closed her eyes against the coldness of the waiting room and tried to pray. Somehow she felt it was too late. God had already made some kind of a deci-

As a Missionary Sees It

By Houston Hobart

THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST is a unified organization contributing to the needs of the entire membership. In it there can be no schism. No one part can live in opposition to, or apart from, the others and survive. For a vigorous church there must be the same absolute co-operation as there is in the supply and assimilation of nourishment in a physical body.

The church school is not a separate entity. It does not attempt to live in isolation from the other departments of the church. It is the church as it functions to bring about the purposes of the kingdom in the lives of people. Because it is so constituted, it has an opportunity of reaching into the lives of entire families as no other department of the church can. It has a very definite contribution to make in the growing experience of every member and friend of the church. Provision is made for each age group. Every Sunday morning there is a time for sharing in worship a mutual concern with others for spiritual at-one-ment. There is a time for study, for discussion, for the exchange of thoughts, and a searching for ways to implement them in the lives of people in and beyond the church. I am interested in having the church school fulfill its purpose—that is, reaching, teaching, and enlisting persons in the cause of Christ.

THERE ARE TOO MANY who feel that they are obligated to attend only one service in the house of worship on Sunday—usually the morning or evening preaching service. Most of us agree that this is not as it should be, but how are we to change it? What appeal can we make to those of the church who feel little concern for its advancement? We can't hold fishing contests on Sunday mornings such as are popular in the Northwest. Neither can we offer prizes for the biggest antelope, deer, or elk killed during the hunting season. It is probable that we would influence more men than we do now if we resorted to such tactics. Probably if we have the men, we'll have their families. Yet, as someone has said, "The thought of prizes does not keep company with the cross." Our hope is that the church school will be supported by large numbers of men, women, and children because they feel it is of great worth.

The person who refuses to limit the church attendance to one service each Sunday has a distinct advantage over those who do so. For his consistent support of the church school, he receives the benefits of guided worship and planned discussions. His understanding of common needs is deepened, and his response to those needs is quickened. To him the phrase, "Each One Bring One" is not just another slogan. He will continue to invite others to share with him and the church, because it is vital to his spiritual maturity. He can't be a modern Robinson Crusoe and secure lasting happiness.

PARENTS DENY THEMSELVES and their families a very rich and enduring fellowship when they refuse to accompany their children to church school. For some people it is usual Sunday morning routine to take the children to the church and then return home to indulge in other less important activities. The lack of discipline in their lives is certainly reflected here. One mother told me that she looks forward to Sunday morning when she can send the children to church school so she can relax. I talked with a pastor in one of my districts not long ago who said of a family, "The parents sent the boys and girls to church school until they were about four feet tall, and then the children quit coming." He had a rather strong feeling that if there had been a family experience those young people would not have been lost to the church. Over a period of time, the desire to remain home with the parents became stronger than the desire to attend church school.

We missionaries are not disposed to baptize persons who are unwilling to share in group worship. We want them to feel that the gospel is true; baptism is necessary; stewardship is desirable. This feeling, if deep-seated, will prompt activity. They will want to do something about it. Distance will be no hindrance. Any number of people drive thirty miles or more every Sunday to attend services. We cannot hope for the complete indoctrination of converts in two weeks or two months. Nevertheless, we do present the basic tenets of the gospel, and we attempt to obtain consent to them. After baptism, these beliefs can be refined gradually if the new member shares in the classwork of the church school and in other services. Assimilation of new members is slow, but it is accelerated by mutual interest in worship, study, and discussion.

A YOUNG MAN remarked not long ago that when the church can create the same interest as sporting events, people will support it and its various services. It is still my firm conviction that every one can find time to hunt, fish, play golf, or see a ball game on some day other than Sunday. To this list we can add any number of nonsporting attractions such as mending the pasture fence, cutting hay, mowing the lawn, and washing the car. Once more we confront the simple matter of priority. We ought to allocate our time to things in the order of their importance. What is temporary? What is eternal? When we follow the path of least resistance, it is very easy to substitute numerous activities for worship and study. And all the while we may tell ourselves that what we do is legitimate. Here is one thing to remember above all others: a man cannot stand on the sidelines in religion and get a thrill as he does when he is a spectator at a football game or a hockey match. The warmth in religion comes from participation, not from observation.

Last fall I conducted a series of family meetings in a home where only the father was a member of the church—and he was an inactive one. Toward the end of the series after our discussion one night, the boy asked if I would be at church next Sunday. When I told him that I would be there, he replied that he'd be there too. His parents exchanged inquiring glances. I urged them to accompany him. The following Sunday the boy and his mother did attend services. I hope they found something which will cause them to want to be there every Sunday. I'm sure it is there for all who really seek it.

Let us not underestimate the possibilities of the church school. It is still the major factor in our missionary effort, yet it by no means has exhausted its potential. What advancement it makes is strictly determined by the degree of our support and loyalty.

Deacon Brown Bears a Testimony

By John W. Blackstock

IT WAS WEDNESDAY EVENING, and the Saints had gathered for their weekly prayer meeting. The few who could always be depended upon to offer prayer had performed their duty. Most of them had prayed for and about the same things that they prayed for and about every Wednesday evening. But then they felt they had performed their duty. The good brother in charge had turned the meeting over to the people to occupy the time as seemed good to them.

Sister Smith was not at the meetinghouse this evening. She had the flu. Inasmuch as she was always first to bear her testimony, the others hardly knew how to continue the meeting. Her testimony was always the same, and the few youngsters in the branch who attended meetings could repeat it verbatim. It served one good purpose though; it gave all the other Saints the cue to say the same thing they had said each Wednesday for more years than many cared to admit. Parts of two or three beautiful hymns had been sung at the usual Wednesday evening tempo.

Brother Brown, who always sat in the front pew but seldom bore a testimony, stood up. As he stood many felt what seemed like an electric shock pass through the congregation. His face shone, and in his eyes was a light that seemed to be seeing eternal things. Struggling for composure that was shortly his, he began to speak.

"Last night," he said, "our former pastor who died recently, sat on the bed beside me and conversed at some length. If the brethren in charge have no objections, I should like to bear a testimony that may be a little lengthy."

From the brother in charge there came the friendly nod that said, "Proceed, Brother Brown." This he did.

I AM HUMBLED by this experience, but somehow I must find the strength to share it with you. As Brother Tim sat beside me, he told me of his work in the spirit world. Humble as ever and never seeking for prominence, Brother Tim explained that he had a job just suited to his talents. He, with many others, cleans and polishes the Master's throne and its supporting platform."

At this point, Brother Brown seemed to be unaware of being in the meetinghouse. Once again he was enveloped in the heavenly vision which he alone could see. He began to speak in the first person.

"Some days as the Master sits on the throne, I see His heart is heavy and his countenance sad. His eyes are seeing things far away. Sometimes he allows us to see, but most often he suffers alone. One day when he was very sad, he said, 'Look,' and I saw men who had been called to his holy priesthood dissipating their strength and influence. They were ambitious for places of leadership, never seeming to understand that if they were the men for the place, people would demand their leadership.

"Then there was the day when I was polishing the jewels at the base of the throne. The Master said, 'Look,' and as I looked in the direction he pointed, I saw women who had been Saints of devotion permitting little jealousies and bits of gossip to disrupt their spiritual growth and development. Others were serving, or thought they were serving, but only where the spotlight was shining. There was a tear on the Master's cheek that day, and I heard him murmur something about mothers in Israel.

THEN THERE WAS THE DAY when he seemed moved by righteous indignation. I looked and beheld men and women throughout the church. Some had been deceived by Satan, others had been overcome by their desire to be looked up to by the membership. These were exercising false gifts. He said with some depth of appreciation, 'This thing is being done less and less in my church.' Then with indignation, 'How long before the rest will learn that these things are to be used not as the toys of men, but for the edification of my church? How long before they will learn that the true gifts of the Spirit come not according to their desires, but according to the wisdom of my Father?'

"Many times I have seen him weep bitter tears when some of his people find pleasures in worldly things. Often I've seen him go into seclusion, so that his grief would not sadden the rest of us, when others become ensnared in sin."

The voice that somehow didn't sound like Brother Brown's continued, "The work of being the Savior of men, would be too much even for Jesus if it were not for the good people in his church. His heart knows unspeakable joy in the humble and faithful and obedient. Young men and women of righteousness and devotion bring him much happiness. Older Saints who have lived faithfully through the years are a joy to his heart. To such a life you are all called, my people."

WORDS CEASED TO FLOW through Brother Brown's lips. He seemed to hesitate and then falteringly said, "Thank you." The man in charge arose and solemnly announced the closing hymn. The benediction that night was not one of oft-repeated words. Somehow it seemed to be an expression of praise and thanks. At the conclusion there was no commotion. The Saints didn't laugh and visit as they usually did. In the spirit of true worship and communion they left the meetinghouse, each inquiring of his own heart, "Am I one who causes Him to weep?" In these hushed moments of meditation, the Father saw that the honest in heart had resolved to bring joy to the Lord Jesus Christ.

Seeds of Peace

By Carrie A. Baird

I HAVE ALWAYS LOVED the "rejoicing Scriptures," as I call them—those precious promises throughout the Scriptures which are available to all. I especially like those pertaining to the latter-day goal, Zion.

There are many of them in our Doctrine and Covenants:

Zion shall rejoice upon the hills, and flourish Lift up your hearts and be glad; your redemption draweth nigh. Fear not little flock, the kingdom is yours until I come.—34: 6.

The righteous shall be gathered out from among all nations, and shall come to Zion singing —45: 14.

Zion shall not be moved out of her place . . . —98: 4.

The hopes of my people and the goals of my church are closer to realization than many recognize.—142: 5.

There are others, of course, and with each one is given the admonition that we be actively engaged in helping to make these promises available to ourselves and others.

I have tried to be "actively engaged in good work," and as I think of it, I feel that most of my friends in the gospel have done the same. As the world situation grows more and more serious, I have been trying to take an inventory of my good intentions, and of my home and family in particular. For it seems to me that as a group we must accept equally the responsibility of obtaining these promises we love to read about. Obviously, we have not yet reached our goal. The situation is grave. As an individual in the group, then, it is my responsibility to reason with myself to discover what more I can do, or what wrongdoing I can correct to help the group as a whole.

Our nation has been asked to pray for peace. War is a gruesome word—one we are learning more about daily as thousands of our young men are being fed into its yawning maw. It is commendable that our leaders should ask us to turn to the Lord for aid. We want to pray for peace, but can we do so wholeheartedly, with a firm faith?

WE ARE LIVING on a farm at the present time, so I am more than ever conscious of the laws of planting and harvesting. Suppose I should sow an equal number of cockleburrs, bindweed, and sunflowers with corn in a field from which I hoped to harvest only corn. Then as I saw the weeds beginning to choke out the corn crop, suppose I should begin to pray earnestly for a bountiful harvest of grain. Would the weeds die out or turn to corn in answer to my plea?

I know it is good, and profitable as well, to pray over the seed we plant. Some wonderful blessings have been experienced in just that way. But as we did so, we secured good seed, free from weeds, treated for disease, and tested for germination. We tried to prepare the soil properly, to cultivate the tender plants and root out any weeds that might come up in the soil. The harvest, as we had prayed, was bountiful, and we felt our prayers had been answered and our efforts rewarded. We had obtained the promise through obedience, and so have a testimony of the faithfulness of that promise.

Have we, as a nation, or even as a church group always sown the seeds of peace? Or have we sown the seeds of greed, hatred, and strife along with our good seed? Isaiah prophesied to his people, saying, "Cry aloud; spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet and show my people their transgressions . . . they seek me daily as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of God . . ." Then he appealed to them to return to God in obedience so that He would be able to answer their cries.

We need to examine ourselves to see "whether we be in the faith"—to see whether or not we are doing all we can toward this Zion which has been promised.

IN OUR SCRIPTURE we are told "Zion's conditions are no further away nor any closer than the spiritual condition of my people justifies; but my word shall not fail, neither will my promises, for the foundation of the Lord standeth sure."—Doctrine and Covenants 140:5.

We need to prepare ourselves spiritually to receive these sure promises, sow the seeds of peace in our own homes so they will bear fruit in expressions of loving concern and sacrificial service for others. It seems to me that if all these things had been done in my family to the greatest degree, we would all be in a better position to help others attain their goals. And if such were the case in all the church homes, surely Zion would "reign upon the hills and flourish" to greater and greater degrees as we grow in understanding, wisdom, and obedience.

We need Zion now. Our young people are being called away from good homes daily into conditions they have never faced before. They have not been permitted, for the most part, to associate with youth of like religious faith, and often not able to choose clean, wholesome companions of other Christian beliefs. The service into which they are called, and have no choice but to go, is different.

For instance, one young man I know was called, along with ninety-nine more from his area. Out of this group of one hundred young men, twenty of them had criminal records. Of those twenty, several were able to answer ninety-six of the one hundred questions on their intelligence questionnaire, so they had not committed crimes because of a low mentality rating. He did not observe one young man in the group who did not smoke, and he heard more vulgar talk and obscene language than he had ever been forced to listen to in his life.

How strong must he be to withstand such associations?

I'M SURE that God can and will protect such young men if all of us are willing to do our part through prayer and our concern for them. He stopped the mouths of lions when Daniel was thrown into their den, and there are many more testimonies of his goodness and protecting love. But as we read of a Zion which all nations shall fear to go up against because she "is terrible in the strength of the Lord," we are filled with a great longing; an overwhelming desire to do something more toward realizing this goal than we have ever done before.

Then as we try to analyze the things we must do, we find the finger of God pointing directly at us, at our homes, at our personal attitudes, our devotion to his purposes. The world crowds so it seems to hem us in, or to hurry us so that we don't live as closely to that good spirit as we would desire, and we are therefore unable to express those attributes in our lives that would bring Zion closer to reality.

We must awake and arise to the challenge of Zion. It is possible to obtain, for as Nephi says, "I know that the Lord giveth no commandment unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them."

Do we believe that? If so, let us arise and sow the seeds of peace in our lives and in our homes. Let us sow and tend them jealously that when we pray for peace we may look forward with expectancy to a bountiful harvest.

Several months after I had joined the group, I was asked to have the women's department meeting at my home. Although I was in the midst of house-cleaning, I offered to be the hostess, thinking that the floors would all be sanded and everything in place by the appointed time. When the day came I baked five pies and began polishing the furniture that was covered with sanding dust. I was eager to make the meeting a success; I wanted a neat house and appealing refreshments. But I had not made much preparation for the devotional I was to present. As I dusted a table the thought came to me that if I put as much time, thought, and energy into God's work as I did into my housework, I would surely be serving him much better. Then I looked at the blossoming pear tree outside my window and was reminded that people, like trees, can reflect the goodness and glory of God.

After that I did not worry so much about the physical aspects of the meeting, and I was indeed blessed and guided in presenting the service of devotion. That night I wasn't even tired. I know God was with me, because I could not have managed so well alone.

Requests, Prayers for Son

The day before Christmas our son accidentally shot himself through his right shoulder. The bullet severed the main artery, paralyzing his arm. The doctors thought he would have to have his arm amputated, but we called the elders to come and administer to him, and circulation was again restored. The doctors were surprised and said that only God could have done this for him. His arm is still paralyzed, however, and I hope that those who read this letter will pray that he may regain the use of his arm, if it is God's will.

My desire is to be able to live a life of service for Christ and help others to understand this wonderful gospel.

From a Letter to Mark Siegfried

At the beginning of the year I was again elected pastor, church school director, and treasurer of the local church at Tarona. This is too much, and I am unloading onto some others much of the work. I also serve as mission statistician. My wife is women's leader and director of dramatics. Sister Butterworth is again director of music.

Since you left we have had three rather serious epidemics. In September and October we had a very serious flu epidemic, and many people died from lung complications. After that followed meningitis and more flu. Then in late December and early January the measles came. Let me tell you that the measles just about took the country. Measles is very serious with the natives. It is about over now with just a few lingering cases. Brother Butterworth's boy had it and he lost so much weight he looks pitiful. Their baby has not had it. Our baby just got over a very light case, but our boy has not had it yet. Everyone else seems to have had it. I saw close to 200 cases this month and administered to 140 persons. That ought to be some sort of record. Incidentally, meningitis is starting again. There are three people in the hospital, one of them a member of our church.

Comforted by a Song

About a year ago I lost both my wife and my mother. Since then it has seemed at times as if I could not bear my burdens any longer. The other day, when I was feeling especially sad, I fell asleep and heard some of the sweetest singing imaginable. This was a great comfort to me. Still I am lonely and would appreciate having the Saints remember me in their prayers. I would also enjoy receiving letters from other members as I am isolated.

Note of Thanks

I wish to thank whoever is sending me the Herald and the Cultivator; I enjoy reading them every week. I am grateful, too, for the kindness of the brothers and sisters here in Hamilton; their visits and prayers mean much to me. I have been in the sanitarium since January 18, and I am feeling better now. I shall still appreciate the prayers of the Saints.

Work, Watch, and Pray

To obtain the greatest glory, we must be valiant in testimony. Standing up in prayer service and relating spiritual experiences is not enough. The Savior never wrote one word of history with pen—he wrote it by his example and finally with his blood. His testimony still stands as an example for us to follow. He doesn't ask us to do the impossible; he doesn't ask us to do anything he didn't do himself.

A Letter to President Smith

Tonight while looking through some of the 1950 Heralds I found an article that set me thinking; it was "Why Isn't Zion Redeemed?" by Dorothy Eastwood.

In studying through the section on the characteristics a Saint should have, I find myself falling pretty far short. Being reminded may help me—I will try. When I look back over my past, I find I have not measured up much of the time, but the last few years as I have gathered with the Saints, I have been inspired to live better.

Our little group here is holding meetings at the home of Brother George Steinbrink, 910 North Chicago, Albany. There are only a few families of us, but if such groups throughout the world had the enthusiasm we have, the redemption of Zion would be closer. I have traveled quite a bit, and I usually find small branches are the strongest in heart and the Holy Spirit seems to be ever so much more welcome. Perhaps the noise and confusion of large cities makes it hard for bigger groups to concentrate.

Brother Thompson, the leader at Sweet Home, is helping us to get going properly. There is a will to be independent, however, and I have heard several say, "We don't want to depend too much on outside help. We have to get busy ourselves and work." We have two good-sized cities here to work in, and very few days pass that I don't talk to someone who is looking for the blessings we have. Often I meet a person who brings up the subject of the Bible, and oh, it gives life a beautiful meaning.

As soon as we can get out of debt I want to get a complete set of our church pamphlets so that no matter what subject comes up I can inform people. I have been told by our priesthood men out here I should have some folders on the financial law of our church because they would interest business men and women.

Would you send me a price list of the pamphlets or folders, a Book of Mormon, and a Call at Evening. There is a large Mormon church here in Corvallis, and I have quite a time explaining the difference in our churches to some people. Perhaps some of the folders on the differences between our churches would help.

I do hope and pray that the Saints will work harder that we might gather soon.

From an Indian Member

I want to thank whoever is responsible for sending me the Saints' Herald. I have read every issue, and I do feel I have gained strength and faith from it.

I am happy that I have found this church, and I praise God for the many blessings he bestows upon my family and home life daily. My husband and three daughters were baptized recently by Brother William T. Guthrie. It was from him we learned the story of the church. He has proved to be a real friend to the "American Indian."

I hope and pray that in time to come, more of my people will come to know and accept the gospel and the truths found in the Book of Mormon, for herein is the history and background of the Indian people.

My husband and I read with great interest in the issue of February 26 "The Melting Pot," by Wayne E. Simmons. I might just add the Indian has long been the downtrodden race, like that of the Negro. And many yet today still think that the only good Indian is the dead one. I believe the only salvation and hope for my people is through the church and by doing God's will.

I have had a wonderful experience through prayer since coming into the church. I have a son in service, and when war broke out in Korea he was one of the first to go over into Korea from Japan. I did not hear from him for four months. No one will ever know the despair and heartache I went through, knowing he was in the thick of battle. I never ceased to pray for him in spite of all the horrible reports that came over the radio, and as time went on the fear I had for him left me. One day my sister said to me, "How can you be so calm and unconcerned about him; he may even be dead for all we know." My answer was, "I have great faith in prayer, and I feel we will hear from him soon." The next day we received a telegram saying he was back in the States and on his way to a hospital. Five days later another message came telling us that he was at Valley Forge Army Hospital not far from Philadelphia.

We left right away to see him and found him suffering from shell shock and battle fatigue. What a happy meeting for us all, and I did thank God for answering my prayers. Prayers are answered when they are uttered in good faith and come from the heart. I would not know where to turn if I did not have the Heavenly Father to pray to in time of need.

We sincerely appreciate the friendship of Brother Guthrie. He made a trip out to the hospital to see my son whom he had never met and had a nice visit with him. To date he is still confined to the hospital and gradually recovering.

I would like to hear from other church members and will do my very best to answer them.

God's Business

One of our missionaries used to preach that God's work is a business. Some years ago one church member told me that when he gave money to the church, he gave it in a way that no one knew how much he gave, as it was none of anyone's business. I told him that some day he might come to Independence to call on the bishop for some reason, and the bishop would say, "We don't know you here."

Are we stewards of God and partners with God in his kingdom-building, or just church members? On that judgment day, the books of the bishop will be opened, and we will be judged according to how good a steward we have been. The local church books will not be there, so we may not be known.

For several years I quit filing my inventory and attended church when I felt so inclined. I was still a member, as my name was on the church books, but I did not experience the same sense of "belonging" as I did before. Our church teaches that God owns all, but he wants us to be stewards for him and partners with him in the business of kingdom-building; we should pay 10 per cent of our increase as stewards for that business. In this day of terror and fear, many of us would like to know how we stand before God. Do we go to church with fear and leave with hope, or do we go with hope and leave with fear because we are neither stewards nor partners with God?

To obey his laws we must keep an account of our stewardship by filing an inventory and paying our tithing; then we will have our names on the books out of which we will be judged on that day. After obeying these laws we will, from week to week, see if we are good stewards. If we are not satisfied, we will try to do better. We can then feel a sense of security that we never felt before, for we are in business with God. We then realize that our name is on that book and will do all we can to be worthy of the verdict, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." Our inventory may be our bread ticket some day on this earth.

A Time Can Be Found

By Marguerite C. Constance

WE SAT LOOKING AT EACH OTHER in consternation, my husband and I. Simultaneously we realized that as a family unit we had lost touch with God, and we were troubled. The now familiar evening hubbub had subsided. The supper dishes were done; our older daughter had left in an excited rush on her date; and her sister had been whisked off to drama class play practice. Another night and our firm resolution to do something about the disrupted family altar had again been destroyed.

"Something has to be done," my husband declared. "The modern pace of living is actually defeating the prayer goals of our family."

"But how?" I wailed. "How does a family with high school students, active in school, branch, and social life, solve the problem of a family altar? It used to be so easy."

But we were going to be stubborn about this basic necessity of Latter Day Saint home life. We agreed something had to be done, so the following twenty-four hours we prayed, thought, planned, and finally pooled our ideas.

First, we talked with our daughters, and they readily agreed they wanted to do something about continuing our companionship with God as a family unit. They admitted unreservedly that they felt a decided omission when they climbed into bed without the familiar few minutes of family communion with their Heavenly Father.

Habit is a strict disciplinarian, but we decided that it was not so much the "when" of worshiping, but the "how" and the actually "doing" that counted. So we deliberately discarded the familiar and comfortable idea of meeting together just prior to bedtime and considered the period when the family most likely would be together. We had already tried the prebreakfast arrangement, but the morning confusion was too much for the quiet peace we felt necessary as a fitting background for our meeting together with God.

We discovered we really had no choice in the time. It was amazing that four people should find so much difficulty in discovering even one quiet hour when all could be together! But we found it. We were almost always together at the dinner hour, and so that first evening we advised the girls at the beginning of the evening meal that we would have family worship immediately following the dessert. We had expected to have to make some explanations, but there were none to make. Without question, our daughters accepted the announcement as naturally and readily as if they had thought the matter through themselves. And perhaps they had.

Quietly, and without any preliminaries, my husband picked up the Scriptures following the dessert and read the short call to worship. I continued with the meditation from Daily Bread, and after a few minutes of quiet discussion of the thought, we knelt by our dining room chairs and prayed. What a calm and satisfying feeling came over us!

The usual evening hubbub became a quiet, efficient accomplishment of tasks. In less time than usual the girls were finished with their evening chores. After they had left on their individual activities, my husband and I relaxed in the living room.

Still sweet in my mind was the quiet kiss of "good-by" the girls had placed upon my cheek, but more precious than that token of affection was the gentle squeeze of understanding and companionship that each girl gave me in her own pleasant way before she left.

My husband and I looked at each other unashamed of the dampness of our eyes. The problem had been solved. Our family had not lost touch with God, and we saw our daughters leave, knowing his arms were freshly about them in protection. We realized, too, that the memory of those sweet moments with him would go with the young of his sheepfold to gently guide and counsel them in their youthful problems.

Worship Helps

While we have no set rule for our worship period, the following points are almost a necessity for the service which follows the evening meal:

1. The table is attractively and pleasantly appointed.
2. The dinner conversation is quiet, interesting, and friendly.
3. Regardless of how short or how long the worship period, whatever is planned is arranged to create an unhurried, leisurely, rich communion with God. (This is impossible if the period has been so planned that its length runs into an appointment hour for any member of the family. For this reason it is sometimes necessary to substitute a shorter worship plan for a longer when an unexpected evening obligation occurs for any one member of the family. This is pleasanter and much more effective than hurrying through a longer service.)
4. The various members of the family assume responsibility from time to time for the planning and arranging of the family "dinner altar." Sometimes this can be done more effectively on a weekly basis than on a daily basis.

5. Regardless of which family member plans the program, other members of the family are called upon to participate in the worship service—read the Scripture, tell or read the story, discuss the item of spiritual interest, and offer the evening prayer. The one planning the program takes full responsibility for the allocating of individual activity, and the rest of the family, of course, co-operate.

6. The most popular program suggestions are obtained from the current issue of Daily Bread; however, individual ideas are often substituted which better meet the family need at that particular time.

7. Perhaps because it seems "out of place" at the dinner table, we very rarely use the music suggestions. Occasionally we have a medley of hymns or quiet classic music on the record player as a part of the program.

A Program Based Upon "Daily Bread"

1. The dessert has been finished, and a gradual quiet reigns over the family.

2. Our older daughter, who has planned the worship hour, turns toward me, and I pick up the Bible from a little table at my side and read the Scripture, Philipians 4: 7-9 and Isaiah 40: 26.

3. My husband then quietly tells the story, "The Highest Window," by Berde Rooney.

4. At the close of the story, our older daughter recalls that she too has found it hard to pray because of confusing thoughts such as the girl in the story had. A family discussion follows with the older daughter acting as director of the discussion.

5. In a few minutes at a signal from her sister, our younger girl reads the words of the hymn meditation, "Draw Thou My Soul, O Christ." Following this, we kneel at our chairs while our older daughter offers the evening prayer.

A Candlelight Service

(Especially effective in the winter when it is dark early.)

1. The table is set attractively with the best silver and china—the family, of course, is neat and clean.

2. Candles are arranged on the table, and the family eats by candlelight (a lamp may be left burning in the background for additional light, particularly if reading is necessary in the program).

3. Immediately following the dessert, a medley of hymns is played on the record player, followed by one of the many Scriptures on light.

4. A story emphasizing the Scriptural importance of letting one's own light shine is told. It is more effective if told than read at this type of service. (Stepping Stones, Daily Bread, Christ and the Fine Arts—almost any church literature is good source material for this part of the service.)

5. Family conversation at this time seems out of order in the quiet hush of the candles, so one verse of the hymn, "Let the Lower Lights Be Burning," is sung, followed by the family kneeling in prayer.

NOTE: Occasionally instead of a story, a full chapter of Scripture is read (the Book of Mormon is very good source material for this type of service; Church History anecdotes are fine, too, in place of the usual story).

When a short service is essential because of early engagements, sometimes one verse of a hymn can be sung or played on the record player, followed by the family prayer. A short Scripture verse can be read instead of having the music, but we have found that it seems necessary to have something leading into the prayer, regardless of how short the time. It is difficult to move directly from the meal into spiritual communion with God through prayer without a prelude of some sort.

Belief in God Is Still a Must

By Charles Kornman

I WISH THAT YOUR GOD was my God!" With this rather startling statement, the visiting minister of another denomination began speaking to a group of Latter Day Saints as they gathered for a luncheon meeting. The minister went ahead to explain that when he met with our people he felt a spirit of nearness he did not experience in other groups. He was not voicing a desire to unite in membership but was simply expressing a desire to have his own people experience the thing that he felt when he worshiped with us.

A few years after the experience just referred to, I received an answer in response to a question that I had asked a good friend of mine. The question was this: "How do you feel about our church?" And the answer: "I have a certain feeling of security that I've never had before. I really feel as though I've found God—that he is someone to talk to and not just about. It's a wonderful feeling!"

Experience born of faith! "Believe that God is" and you'll come to know that he is. On just such a basis as this we look into the past for evidences of a God at work that we might look with anticipation into the future and prepare ourselves to meet him. There is such a thing as a belief that is founded on nothing—but the life that is lived in response to such a pattern will result in a life that is "tossed to and fro," and it is just such a life that can be "carried about by every wind of doctrine." But those who have a belief founded upon evidence (just as experience is born of faith, so faith is born of experience) the apostle says will "grow in grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." People in whom such growth is taking place are building upon the rock on which the Master said he would build his church and "on other foundation can no man lay [build] than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

GOD IS IN HISTORY just like a man is in his actions," and he who has eyes to see can see him. Such description fits the prophet who, sitting down one day, wrote, "In the beginning—God." There is no other explanation of existence to which the mind and the heart can give unqualified approval. And certainly none other can receive the stamp of approval with such certainty as that given by the unrighteous doughboys who asked for protection as they prepared for Omaha and Anzio beach—or by the prayer of the young mother who sits by the bedside of her year-old baby who has a temperature of 103 degrees—or the humorous appeal (reflected in so many of us) of Dagwood's "give me strength." In the beginning was God.

In such a day as we're living in, countless numbers of young people wait for their letters of "greetings." This is what the Scriptures refer to as a day in which there will be no peace on the earth. In such a day we need the faith that prompted the prophet to write, "In the beginning God." We need the same quality of faith that prompted another prophet to write, "Thou madest him [man] to have dominion over the works of thy hands." We need the same high caliber belief that "God is" which prompted the prophet of still another generation to tell of a vision in which he "saw a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." And then there is that young man who bore this testimony, last of all: "He lives, for we saw him." This generation of young people will pass into oblivion unless that kind of faith is manifest in their lives.

WE CAN SEE GOD in the beauty of a sunset. I lay one time just outside of Pisa in Italy and watched the sun go down. It was an awe-inspiring sight. The rugged rockiness of Corsica added to the beauty of the scene. We can hear God in the majestic movement of the master composers—Beethoven's symphony as it swells to a final grand outburst and the chorus gives expression of gratitude and praise to the Creator, God. But nowhere else can we see God at work with such power and such authority as when he walks down the corridors of time—down the mountains of the past and up the valleys of history.

Who hath been able to stand in the way of my accomplishment or hath put fetters upon my hands? Are not cities and nations and villages but as pebbles in my hands? For, behold, on yesterday their magnitude was thine amazement, and tomorrow thou shalt ask "Where are they?" and shalt declare, "Surely the Lord's hand is in this thing."

Remember, therefore, that I change not, neither in my power nor my purpose, and what I have designed I will execute, and naught shall stay my hand, and my heritage shall not fail.—Apostle Luff in prophecy, March, 1906.

Such a God in all his eternal splendor was what Moses had in mind when he wrote, "In the beginning God." No attempt is made to prove his existence—the ancient ministers seldom attempted that. They were content to seek for understanding and to put the truth that came to them to work in their lives. Proof of the existence of God was left to minds with a philosophic bent. To some there are things that do not lend themselves to logical proof—the affection of a mother, the love of a sweetheart, the beauty of a sunset, the existence of God. It was something of this sort that the Master must have had in his thinking when he spoke to Oliver Cowdery:

If you desire a further witness, cast your mind upon the night that you cried unto me in your heart, that you might know concerning the truth of these things; did I not speak peace to your mind concerning the matter? What greater witness can you have than from God? And now, behold, you have received a witness, for if I have told you things which no man knoweth, have you not received a witness?

IN THE DAYS that lie ahead of us—days that apparently are going to be of a "dark and cloudy" nature—the knowledge that God is will be the only basis on which we'll dare to build. This need is just as real and just as vital in the days of our prosperity, but seems to be emphasized in the days when adversity

By Billie Young

THERE WEREN'T MANY PEOPLE out to church. Only the center section was what one could really call filled, while the front and sides of the room contained only a scattering of worshipers.

In a way you couldn't blame folks, thought the head deacon, folding programs at a desk at the back of the church. A spring day like this was made for golf, and with so many people working a six-day week—well, they had to take their recreation when they could find it. If he hadn't agreed to take over the ushering for Brother Isaac today, he knew where he'd be—out on the links.

The outer door opened and he got to his feet. "Good morning, Mrs. Raisbeck." He handed her a program and waited for her to glance over the backs of the congregation. After four years of ushering, he had learned the habits of most of the members. Mrs. Raisbeck, he knew, liked to stop inside the door and survey the audience before deciding where she wanted to sit. While they were watching, the minister and his associates took their places.

"Isn't that a new man on the platform with the preacher?" asked Mrs. Raisbeck, plucking at his sleeve.

"No, he's just a local fellow—a carpenter," the deacon replied in a stage whisper, wishing she would sit down. "He's been away for a while. Guess he's going to read the Scripture."

"Humph. I don't see why the minister doesn't try getting a new man in to assist him."

The deacon nodded and started down the aisle. From the corner of his eye, he could see Mrs. Raisbeck following him, while on the platform the strange young man rose with the Bible in his hands.

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me," he said, "because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and the recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised."

The usher reached the pew and stood aside for Mrs. Raisbeck to enter. By the time he had started back up the aisle, the young man had closed the book and sat down. The deacon was almost at his station by the door when he heard the voice again, only this time the young man was speaking from his chair.

"This day," he said, "is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears."

For a moment everything was silent, and the eyes of all the people in the church were fastened on the man. Then the choir leader stepped forward and announced a hymn, and with a deep sigh the organ began to play.

The usher reached the door and took a last look at the spring weather outside. Then, easing himself into a chair, he pulled a stack of papers toward him and continued folding programs.

The Second Miracle

sion, and they would have to see it through. The young missionary sat calmly and made no comment.

Footsteps—the doctor stopped in the doorway and smiled. He crossed the room and met Paula's mother who had risen anxiously to meet him. He spoke cheerfully, "You have a very lucky daughter, Mrs. Stanley. She is going to get well, and she wants to see you all as soon as possible."

They started for the door, but stopped as the doctor said, "Of course we don't know about her legs yet. There's a chance that she may not be able to walk again, but I feel certain with her spunk that she'll pull through, all right. It will be several days before we can tell."

Mrs. Stanley groaned and sagged against Dorothy. Mr. Stanley looked across at Dorothy, and their eyes filled with anguished understanding. Then he patted her shoulder tenderly and whispered, "Remember, Mother, we prayed, 'Thy will be done.'"

PAULA was propped up in bed, and the bandages around her head and arm made her look small and childish, but there was a new firmness in the set of her chin. Mrs. Stanley rushed to the bed and hugged her chokingly, "My baby, my baby, oh, my poor baby."

Paula hugged her tightly and whispered, "It's ok, Mom, I'm all right. Everything will be fine, you wait and see." Then she looked around the room and said, "I'm lucky to have such a swell family. But there is something special I want to tell you. First, I want to thank you for being so good to me, for putting up with me in spite of the way I've acted. Then I want to tell you something else. It really doesn't matter about my legs. If God doesn't want to give me another chance, I'm going on anyway, only not the same as before. I want to do something with my life—repay you all for being so good to me, repay Him for giving me a chance, and show him how sorry I am for making such a fool of myself. This time I want to be really healed—inside. We can manage the other."

So there in that quiet little hospital room, the young missionary laid his hands on Paula Stanley's head and asked God to heal her.

Later when she was well and working in Mr. Roberts' music store, everyone said, "My, isn't that Stanley girl lucky?"

You see, hardly anyone knew about the second miracle.

comfort and welfare of the patient uppermost in their minds. I can give only praise for your institution, your entire staff, and everyone connected with your organization. . . . May you always maintain your present high ideals and service to those in sickness."

THE MOTHER AND FATHER of fourteen children called by the office this last week to express their thanks for the treatment and care given their youngest boy, Jimmie. "We are so grateful to get to take him home a well boy and at this early date."

And then there is little Stella, the five-year-old colored girl who forgot to look first before she dashed across the street in front of a car. After she was given emergency treatment and her broken leg was in a cast, her father had the choice of taking her to the colored hospital or leaving her at the "San." After thinking about it for a few moments, he said, "Suh, if it is all the same to yo all we would like to leave Stella in your hospital. We know she will get good treatment here."

Such statements of confidence and appreciation seldom increase the bank account during these times when the expense of keeping patients is increasing every day, but they do add considerably to the stimulation needed to give uplift to tired hands and weary minds.

dogs our footsteps. It's too late to learn to swim when the boat tips over. It's too late to learn to tackle when the runner has passed you. It's too late to make amends with a friend after he's dead. Men with prophetic vision in our day keep warning us that now is the time to have faith in God and in his plan. Now is the time to keep all of the commandments that will result in Zion. Today can be the birthday of that experience from which comes the kind of faith that will enable us to say, "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do." Today is the day to "contend for the faith once delivered to the saints."

The people in the car traveling through the mountains had no thought nor intent of precipitating tragedy, but the careless match tossed out of the open window set in motion a chain of events that resulted in 10,000 acres of forest being devastated by fire. Weeks later, walking through that burnt-over area, one could see a columbine here and there raising its head. Of such a courage and of such a faith as this can come the kingdom of God—the kind of faith that in the face of seemingly impossible obstacles still trusts in the God who created the world and all things therein—a trust that results in the desire and attempt to be that for which it was created. Just such a faith as this is required of young people whose allegiance is to the Restored Church of Jesus Christ. "The foundation of God standeth sure." With a faith born of experience with God, resulting in lives lived on the basis and pattern of his righteous principles people can become the sons and daughters of the God of heaven.

Belief in God is still a must.

* LEGENDS OF CHARLES

When Barbara came to town she brought a lot of things with her: a winning smile, a lovely southern accent, a way of understanding everything and everybody sympathetically, and . . . legends of Charles, her small brother. A picture of him arrived the other day, freckles across his nose, rebellious hair brushed back, a big grin showing a row of teeth with a whistling gap in them—an American boy cover picture for almost any magazine.

Well, says Barbara, when Charles was four . . . and we're off on one of the many legends. When Charles was four, Mother told him about Santa Claus. Then she told him about Jesus. Charles kept getting them all mixed up. He was awfully puzzled. Talking about it one day he said, "I'd like to get Santa Claus a birthday present, and I hope Jesus will bring me a bicycle for Christmas. And if that isn't right, they'll know what to do about it!"

So we have both Barbara and Charles now, Charles being an invisible small spirit that tags around after Barbara. We never see him, but we hear about him and his interesting words and ways all the time. While his real self is at home in Mobile, we welcome the presence of his second, or astral presence, here in Independence.

* BELATED HONEYMOON

Brother and Sister A. J. Cornish of Senlac, Saskatchewan, have been on tour for some time, visiting important places noted in church history: Nauvoo, Plano, and Independence.

Brother Cornish explains the trip as a "honeymoon." He said, "When we were married I was too busy to go on a trip, and I didn't have the money. Time went by, and now, after forty years of married life, we are having our honeymoon." They were married December 27, 1909. Their children are grown, and are being visited on this trip. They are well and happy and enjoying their journey very much.

* FLUFFS

Not all the "fluffs" happen on the radio. Often they creep into casual conversation, and even into testimonies at church. Here are a couple of good ones recently reported. One member spoke quite earnestly of "the torch barriers of the gospel." Another "wrote a subscription on the Cross." . . . While these things bring a smile, we appreciate the sincerity of those who make them. Smile charitably, too, my brother and my sister, for the day may come when you and I also will make some good ones.

* HOW GOD HELPS

The Air Force gets into the philosophy of the children very early these days. Down at Naval Base, South Carolina, six-year-old Mark Ragel was trying to express to his mother, Viola, what God is like. He came up with this: "God is like a co-pilot. He helps you through the tough spots. When you think you can't land, and you can't fly, he says you can fly, and you fly!" Have any of the learned and profound people you know said anything better than that?

Lloyd L. Bland

Those stacks of loose-leaf record books look like formidable work to most of us, but to Church Auditor Bland, they are the answers to all the questions of accounting needed by the church. It they worry him, his face does not show it. Only a man who knows his job and has the self-confidence of thorough training wears such a smile.

Lloyd grew up in Kansas City, was baptized at "Old Central church" (Ninth and Lydia) in 1918, was graduated from Central High in 1927, and then went to work. His first job was with the Commerce Trust Company. He started as office boy and after four years became "savings teller." During this time he lost his allergy to mathematics which developed during his high school days, enrolled in a night course at the American Institute of Banking, and then took a course in accounting at Junior College. He next worked for the Loomis Potts Advertising Agency for nearly five years, earning funds to attend Southern Methodist University. He served two years apprenticeship with a firm of public accountants. After further studies at Kansas City University and Rockhurst College, he received his degree as Certified Public Accountant.

In 1933 Brother Bland married Dorothy Helen Carmichael at the Quindaro church of Kansas City, Kansas. They have two children: Dorothy June, 13, and David C., 9. His hobbies are stamp, coin, and mineral collecting. His favorite sports are fishing and golf. He is a Key member of the Lions' Club, also a member of the Independence Gem and Mineral Society, the Downtown Kansas City Toastmasters Club, the K. C. Chapter Missouri C. P. A. Society, and the American Institute of Accountants.

Sanitarium Day - Sunday, April 22

"Jesus went forth, and saw a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, and he healed their sick."—Matthew, 14: 14.

ON SUNDAY, April 22, at most of our churches the congregations will be invited to make contributions for the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing. Students are enrolled from all over the church to take their nursing education at the school, and these contributions are of direct benefit to the many young women who come from the different areas of the church.

After the new Sanitarium building was erected and put into operation, the old Sanitarium building was converted to use for the School of Nursing, some sections for use as classrooms and laboratories, and some for dormitories for the student nurses.

A building that has served so long naturally needs reconditioning, repairs, and remodeling for the new uses. Last year's Sanitarium Day contributions made possible the reconditioning of one of the floors of the building.

This year, we are informed by officials of the Sanitarium, it is hoped that funds will be received to do some very necessary work on the second floor. The walls will be renewed with a fine washable Fabron finish, and the ceilings will be soundproofed with an attractive insulating material. It is hoped also to add two new microscopes for the laboratories and classroom instruction. Chemical laboratory equipment and anatomical charts are also planned.

All these and other things will result in more effective study and instruction for the school, and better living conditions for the student nurses.

On our own visits to the Sanitarium, we have been very pleased with the fine work that has been done as a result of the contributions of the church in former years. We are sure that every visitor who could have the opportunity to see the building would be equally pleased with the results. Such a visit would also help church people to understand why the contributions are needed.

IT DOES NOT PAY to be indifferent about hospitals because you are strong and healthy today. Disease and accident strike with dreadful swiftness. When you need a hospital, your need is very great. Many people are alive today who would be dead if there had been no hospitals.

It sometimes costs large sums of money to save a life, but when the life of a loved one is at stake, no price is too high. What will a man pay for the life of his child or his wife?

We can pay the price by supporting our hospitals now so they can be ready when emergencies come. After pneumonia strikes or an accident happens it is too late to build a hospital.

JESUS HAD a heart of love for people. Read again the Scripture above. When he saw the multitude, he "was moved with compassion toward them." "He healed their sick." Jesus cared.

Millions have died in many parts of the world of war, famine, and plague. Nobody cared. Even today people starve and die beside the roads and in the gutters, and others pass by without seeming to notice. We shouldn't be smug—there is indifference, cruelty, and selfishness in our country too.

Jesus was different. He cared. He had compassion. He healed their sick. . . . That's what hospitals do. That's what the Sanitarium does.

PEOPLE who are sick and hurt cannot help themselves. They need the love and help of their fellow human beings. When they are well, they, too, turn and help others. It is the way we survive. A hospital is a place of help—the Sanitarium is a place of "refuge" as the Doctrine and Covenants says.

There in the Sanitarium is a light at every nurses' station that never goes out. Someone is always on duty. Unceasing vigilance and care are there. While some patients sleep and others lie awake in pain, someone is ready to answer their calls for help. The entrance doors are always ready to swing open to admit those who need.

Let us help keep those lights always burning. Let us help to keep those doors always ready to open.

MANY OTHERS have helped and are helping: the Patroness Society, the Mothers' Club, the Nurse Aids, the Gray Ladies, the Orioles, the Girl Scouts, and individuals.

Sunday, April 22, will bring you an opportunity to help. If you could visit the Sanitarium and see what is being done there, you would wish to help. You would ask for the opportunity. But out where you are, you will only hear or read about it.

Paul Harvey's "Heavenly Stranger"

At several points I have come in contact with a pre-Christmas broadcast by Paul Harvey of the American Broadcasting Company which had to do with the matter of a personage appearing before a group of highly-placed delegates of the United Nations in a certain "Room Twelve." It is represented that this personage entered into the discussion of matters pertinent to the problems before the statesmen of the world and that in the process of his contribution he quoted many Scriptures.

As I have met up with this matter among our people, I have found a disposition in some to believe that this was a factual statement throughout. As for myself, I doubted that Mr. Harvey's contribution was anything other than a fictional arrangement which would interest his pre-Christmas audience. However, let us say that the broadcast was of excellent quality and the many passages of Scripture used by the "Heavenly Stranger" were well-placed, and the whole matter makes very worth-while reading or listening as the case may be.

It seems to me, in light of a letter I have just received from Mr. Robert B. Wesley, representing Mr. Paul Harvey, that Mr. Harvey's position should be made clear to some of our members who may be holding wrong views concerning the document. Mr. Wesley's letter is as follows:

Mr. D. T. Williams
The Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints

Independence, Missouri

Dear Sir:

Mr. Paul Harvey received your letter and sincerely intended to answer it personally, but with the increasing pressure of recent weeks has found it difficult to do so. He has therefore referred it to this office for reply, and has instructed us to inform you that your interest in writing is deeply appreciated.

His broadcast of December 24 was his own dramatic interpretation of what might have happened had Christ actually appeared in the Council of the United Nations. As a Christmas story, with all good intentions, it had no basis in fact.

It may be of interest to you to know that great numbers of letters from people of your faith have been received from all over the country. The intense interest is apparently based upon the wanderings of the Nephite Brethren and their possible appearance at any time and any place. For this reason, requests for the Christmas broadcast have far exceeded requests for any other broadcast.

With all good wishes, I am

Cordially yours,

(Signed) Robert B. Wesley

D. T. Williams.

Church-wide Institute for Women

A church-wide institute for women will be held Monday, October 8, to Friday noon, October 12, 1951, at the Stone Church, Independence, Missouri, under the direction of Sister Pauline J. Arnsion and her associates of the Council of Women.

This institute will be one of the major inter-Conference activities sponsored by the General Church.

Emphases will be on special phases of women's work—demonstrations, practical helps, challenge, and comfort for those who attend. Tentative plans call for daily classes, addresses by the priesthood, historical trips, and fellowship.

We were richly blessed in the Kirtland Conference of High Priests last October, and again in the Book of Mormon Institute in January. We sincerely trust that the ladies of the church will be similarly blessed in this important gathering, and we ask that the prayers of the church shall be directed to this end.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

Change in Presidency of Youngstown District

Due to illness, Elder W. G. McCune is unable to continue actively serving as president of the Youngstown District. We are therefore requesting Elder George Franklin, 1713 South Heights Acres, Youngstown, Ohio, to serve as acting district president until some other arrangements are made by the district.

The First Presidency.

Vibrations

The best of ideas have been pushed along a taut, slender rope. The sheer force of our efforts to maintain them on this rope has often thrown them off balance, to one side or the other, and we were unconscious of their slipping until the rope sprang back from the loss of its weight and slapped us on our clutching fingers.

"They are too dogmatic," we exclaim dogmatically.

"They are too intolerant," we cry intolerantly.

"We must be intellectual," we shout emotionally.

And the rope vibrates under our hand.

The Nature of Man

According to the Book of Mormon

A lecture given at the Book of Mormon Institute, January 9, 1951

By E. Y. Hunker

Wickedness Versus God

It is the nature of man, individually and collectively, to forget God and become swallowed up in the morass of wickedness. This was revealed to Nephi,

And it came to pass that I looked and beheld the whore of all the earth, and she sat upon many waters; and she had dominion over all the earth, among all nations, kindreds, tongues and people. And it came to pass that I beheld the church of the Lamb of God, and its numbers were few, because of the wickedness and abominations of the whore who sat upon many waters; . . . and their dominions upon the face of the earth were small.—I Nephi 3: 224-228. (I Nephi 3: 217-237, pages 40, 41; also II Nephi 12: 40.)

The account in the Book of Ether of the dispersion from Babel of the human family that had grown since the time of the Flood tells that the people had disobeyed God and followed their own will. It also tells of the first ancient American colony and its growth into a multitudinous people and a mighty civilization. Then natural man, yielding to the baser urges of his nature, plunged this people into total destruction and oblivion (pages 751-759).

The records from the Flood to the present reveal that continually it has been man's nature to forget God. Even the chosen people of Israel forsook the way of God again and again. In II Nephi 11: 15, page 140, we read: "And as one generation hath been destroyed among the Jews, because of iniquity, even so have they been destroyed from generation to generation, according to their iniquities." (Also Jacob 2: 5, 6, 14-16, pages 169, 170.)

When Lehi, under constraint of the Spirit of God, preached repentance to the Jews of Jerusalem, it is recorded:

Wherefore, men are free according to the flesh; and all things are given them which are expedient unto man. And they are free to choose liberty and eternal life, through the great mediation of all men, or to choose captivity and death, according to the captivity and power of the devil.—II Nephi 1: 119, 120. (Also verses 116-118.)

Adam and Eve exercised their agency in disobedience to the counsel of the Lord, which was the cause of their fall; which was the cause of all mankind becoming carnal, sensual, devilish, knowing evil from good, subjecting themselves to the devil.—Mosiah 8: 74, 75, page 254.

Now we see that Adam did fall by partaking of the forbidden fruit, according to the word of God; and thus we see, that by his fall, all mankind became a lost and a fallen people.—Alma 9: 38, page 346.

These statements sustain the biblical teaching (clarified in the Inspired Version) that men, unregenerated by the gospel of Christ, incline to gravitate downward:

Because . . . Adam fell, we are; and by his fall came death, and we are made partakers of misery and woe. Behold, Satan hath come among the children of men, and tempted them to worship him; and men have become carnal, sensual, and devilish, and are shut out from the presence of God.—Genesis 6: 49, 50. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.—Romans 8: 7. Therefore as they had been carnal, sensual, and devilish, by nature, this probationary state became a state for them to prepare; it became a preparatory state.—Alma 19: 91, page 453. Because of the fall, our natures have become evil continually.—Ether 1: 63.

THE BOOK OF MORMON narratives of separate migrations to the Western Hemisphere, of colonizations there, the subsequent growth and development of civilizations in ancient America have certain parallel similarities. In each case a small and seemingly insignificant minority group was instructed of the Lord to withdraw and depart from the mass of their fellow humans who had become rebellious against Deity, self-willed, degenerate, and hardhearted.

Evil in the Nature of Man

Book of Mormon history and teachings are not complimentary to nor supportive of the popular notion that natural man is, in and of himself, good. King Benjamin declared: "For the natural man is an enemy to God, and has been, from the fall of Adam, and will be, for ever and ever."—Mosiah 1: 119, page 218.

Our introduction to the nature of man, as presented in Book of Mormon history, is that human beings created with potentialities and capacities of becoming the sons and daughters of God more often chose the lower courses of life and became perverse and wicked.

Man was innocent when first created (II Nephi 1: 113). He was endowed with agency, free moral will, and the power to choose between good and evil. "Wherefore, the Lord God gave unto man, that he should act for himself."—II Nephi 1: 99, page 84.

And it came to pass that the Jews did mock him because of the things which he testified of them; for he truly testified of their wickedness and their abominations; . . . of the coming of a Messiah, and also the redemption of the world. And when the Jews heard these things, they were angry with him; yea, even as with the prophets of old, whom they had cast out, and stoned, and slain.—I Nephi 1: 19-21, pages 3, 4.

Even within the small group that departed from Jerusalem and migrated to America there was continued evidence of this perverseness. "For behold they did murmur in many things against their father."—I Nephi 1: 38, page 5. This tendency was persisted in so that in the "promised land" defection followed defection until ultimately apostasy and wars of annihilation wiped out peoples and enshrouded their history in abysmal darkness and obscurity. (See Jacob 1 and 2, pages 168-173; 3: 22, page 177; 3: 77-92, pages 181-183; Enos 1: 30-32, page 195; Jarom 1: 6, page 197; Mosiah 6: 44-54, page 238; 7: 1-5, page 239; Helaman 3, pages 566-579; II Nephi 1: 9-11, page 601; Moroni 9: 3-5, 19, pages 772, 773; 9: 24, 25, page 774.)

Dominant Inclinations

These items disclose something of the nature of man—man apart from God and Christ, the man of the fallen race. In zoology, Mendel's law of transmitted physical traits has revealed that there are dominant and recessive characteristics. In a somewhat parallel sense, there are in the soul of the natural man dominant and recessive mental and spiritual traits and tendencies. He has recessive potentialities as a child of God, and also pronounced dominant inclinations to gravitate downward spiritually. According to the Book of Mormon, the following named traits are among the dominant inclinations of the natural man:

1. Stiffneckedness, rebelliousness against God and his truth. (I Nephi 1: 38-41, page 5; II Nephi 9; Helaman 5: 109-138, pages 597-599.)

4. Deceitfulness, dishonesty, cunningness. (Mosiah 6: 8, 9, 13, page 235; 6: 54, page 238.)

6. Pride, egoism, inordinate personal and group ambitions, and desire for recognition and popularity at any price:

And it came to pass that I saw and bear record, that the great and spacious building was the pride of the world, and it fell; and the fall thereof was exceeding great.—I Nephi 3: 93, 94, page 30.

And because some of you have obtained more abundantly than that of your brethren, ye are lifted up in the pride of your hearts, and wear stiff necks, and high heads, because of the costliness of your apparel, and persecute your brethren, because ye suppose that ye are better than they.—Jacob 2: 16, page 170.

7. Indolence, idolatry, priestcraft:

It shall come to pass in that day, that the churches which are built up, and not unto the Lord, when the one shall say unto the other, Behold, I, I am the Lord's; and the other shall say, I, I am the Lord's; and thus shall every one say, that hath built up churches and not unto the Lord; and they shall contend one with another; and their priests shall contend one with another; and they shall teach with their learning, and deny the Holy Ghost, which giveth utterance. . . . Yea, and there shall be many which shall say, . . . Eat, drink, and be merry; nevertheless, fear God, he will justify in committing a little sin; Yea, lie a little, take the advantage of one because of his words, dig a pit for thy neighbor; there is no harm in this . . . Yea, and there shall be many which shall teach after this manner false, and vain, and foolish doctrines, and shall be puffed up in their hearts, and shall seek deep to hide their counsels from the Lord; and their works shall be in the dark; and the blood of the saints shall cry from the ground against them. Yea, they have all gone out of the way; they have become corrupted . . . they have all gone astray, save it be a few, who are the humble followers of Christ.—II Nephi 12: 3-30 ff.

(Also II Nephi 6: 71, page 110.)

Now, they were a lazy, and an idolatrous people; therefore, they were desirous to bring us into bondage; that they might glut themselves with the labors of our hands.—Mosiah 6: 15, page 235.

8. Spiritual blindness and deafness, hard-heartedness, negligence, forgetfulness.

And now I say unto you, that it was expedient that there should be a law given to the children of Israel, yea, even a very strict law: for they were a stiffnecked people: quick to do iniquity, and slow to remember the Lord their God.—Mosiah 8: 6, page 249.

Yea, all are hardened; yea, all are fallen, and are lost, and must perish except it be through the atonement which it is expedient should be made.—Alma 16: 209, page 428.

9. Error, perversion, disobedience, rejection.

And now, if I do err, even did they err of old.—I Nephi 5: 230, page 64.

(See II Nephi 1: 22, 23, page 79.)

Woe be unto you for perverting the ways of the Lord.—Mosiah 7: 82.

(Also Mosiah 7: pages 245-247.)

10. Lust, immorality, fornication, adultery, polygamy.

And now it came to pass that the people of Nephi under the reign of the second king, began to grow hard in their hearts, and indulge themselves somewhat in wicked practices, such as like unto David of old, desiring many wives and concubines.—Jacob 1: 15, page 168.

12. Selfishness, self-will, self-glory, self-worship, self-justification. (II Nephi 12: 6-40, pages 153-156; Alma 16: 90-101, pages 417-419; II Nephi 8: 22-27, page 117; Mosiah 8: 86, page 254; Alma 27: 52, page 530.)

Selfishness

We ought not to pass quickly by, without further comment, this propensity to selfishness in the natural man. It is inevitably fused with pride and egoism. It constitutes one of the biggest and most grievous stumbling blocks to man's divine unfoldment. The ends to which we will go to win our way, to satisfy our pride and ego, to gain recognition, to justify our desires and acts, are the major and dominant impulse and trait in our nature. Lying, hypocrisy, deceit, jealousy, strife, anger, dissension, hate, murder, crime, and sin of every description and category are directly linked with selfishness.

Man's greatest achievement is his conquest over the baser self within him. It is impossible for him to accomplish this without Christ and the principles and ordinances by which man can become a newborn creature. In fact, it is apparent that even with the grace of God, man still encounters tremendous difficulties in achieving self-conquest and the development of genuine humility and Christlike motivation in love.

No teaching about the nature of man stands out in bolder clearness in the Book of Mormon than his inclination to allow pride and self-will either to lead him astray or to impede his discovery of and coming to God through repentance and self-surrender. For the nature of fallen, sinful man is to be proud, sensitive, self-seeking, vindictive, vicious, and to feel superior to others. At times he tends to assert his equality with or superiority to Deity. It may be that the "man of sin" (II Thessalonians 2: 4) of whom Paul wrote, "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God," well refers to the proud, self-assertive spirit of man occupying in his physical body, which is intended to be the temple of God.

The teachings of the Book of Mormon are that man must sense his nothingness in the sight of God, that man is entirely indebted to Christ for the hopes of redemption and salvation. Man ought to be humble. Without humility, self-forgetfulness, and entire devotion to Christ and his way there is no coming-to-be of the image of Christ in us.

The Book of Mormon declares that the "natural man is an enemy to God." A more modern writer has stated it this way:

As he comes from the hand of Nature, Man thinks only of himself, loves nothing but himself. Little by little, with tremendous but slow efforts, he succeeds in loving for a while his woman, and his children, in tolerating his accomplices in the hunt, in assassination, and in war. Very rarely is he able to love a friend; more easily he hates the man who loves him. He does not dream of loving the man who hates him.

All this explains why Jesus commands us to love our enemies. To make over the entire man, to create the new man, the most tenacious center of the old man must be destroyed. From self-love come all the misfortunes, massacres, and miseries of the world. To tame the old Adam, self-love must be torn out of him, and in its place must be put the love most opposed to his present nature, love for his enemies. The total transformation of man is such a sublime paradox that it can be reached only by fantastic means. It is an extraordinary undertaking, wild and unnatural, to be accomplished only with an extraordinary exaltation, opposed to nature.—Papini's Life of Christ, page 125.

Goodness in the Nature of Man

We come now to consider the recessive godlike potentialities in the soul of man as they are revealed in the teachings of the Book of Mormon. Therein it is clarified that there are hidden within man certain Christlike possibilities which need awakening and nurture. Man is capable of consciousness of and responsiveness to the Spirit of God and of spiritual rebirth:

And also, we know of their surety and truth, because of the Spirit of the Lord Omnipotent, which has wrought a mighty change in us, or in our hearts, that we have no more disposition to do evil, but to do good continually.—Mosiah 3: 3, page 224.

A gleaning of the teachings gives us the following capacities for good in man:

1. Faith—in God and godly things. (I Nephi 1: 53, page 6; II Nephi 2: 46, page 90; Enos 1: 10, 11, 17, page 194; Jarom 1: 9, page 197.)

But behold, if ye will awake and arouse your faculties, even to an experiment upon my words, and exercise a particle of faith; yea, if ye can no more than desire to believe, let this desire work in you, even until ye believe in a manner that ye can give place for a portion of my words.—Alma 16: 151, page 423.

2. Repentance and humility. (I Nephi 5: 208, page 63; Mosiah 9: 28, page 258; Alma 14: 51-53; page 394; Helaman 4: 12, 18, pages 580-581.)

But if he [the natural man, see preceding verse] yields to the enticings of the Holy Spirit, and putteth off the natural man, and becometh a saint, through the atonement of Christ, the Lord, and becometh as a child, submissive, meek, humble, patient, full of love, willing to submit to all things which the Lord seeth fit to inflict upon him, even as a child doth submit to his father.—Mosiah 1: 120, page 218.

Therefore, my son, see that ye are merciful unto your brethren; deal justly, judge righteously, and do good continually; and if ye do all these things, then shall ye receive your reward.—Alma 19: 78.

And now I would that ye should be humble, and be submissive, and gentle; easy to be entreated; full of patience and long suffering; being temperate in all things; being diligent in keeping the commandments of God at all times; asking for whatsoever things ye stand in need, both spiritual and temporal; always returning thanks unto God for whatsoever things ye do receive, and see that ye have faith, hope, and charity, and then ye will always abound in good works.—Alma 5: 39-41, page 326.

4. Patience, long-suffering, meekness. (See above quotations from Alma 5:39-41; Alma 10: 28, page 351-352.)

Preach unto them repentance, and faith on the Lord Jesus Christ: teach them to humble themselves, and to be meek and lowly in heart; teach them to withstand every temptation of the devil, with their faith on the Lord Jesus Christ; teach them never to be weary of good works, but to be meek and lowly in heart; for such shall find rest to their souls.—Alma 17: 66, 67, page 441.

And blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.—Nephi 5: 52, page 636.

5. Love, affection, charity:

... and we can witness of their sincerity, because of their love toward their brethren, and also toward us. For behold, they had rather sacrifice their lives than even to take the life of an enemy; and they have buried their weapons of war deep in the earth, because of their love towards their brethren.—Alma 14: 117, 118, page 401; Moroni 7: 50-53, page 768.

Love is very patient; very kind. Love knows no jealousy; love makes no parade, gives itself no airs, is never rude, never selfish, never irritated, never resentful; love is never glad when others go wrong, love is gladdened by goodness, always slow to expose, always eager to believe the best, always hopeful, always patient. Love never disappears.—I Corinthians 13: 4-8, Moffatt's translation.

6. Appreciation, gratitude, thankfulness:

And he commanded them that they should observe the Sabbath day, and keep it holy, and also every day they should give thanks to the Lord their God.—Mosiah 9: 56, page 260.

Yea, and in the valley of Alma they poured out their thanks to God because he had been merciful unto them

And they gave thanks to God, yea, all their men; and all their women, and all their children, that could speak, lifted their voices in the praises of their God.—Mosiah 11: 70, 72, page 279.

7. Obedience, loyalty, endurance, faithfulness. (Mosiah 9: 40-48, page 259.)

... yea, and they did obey and observe to perform every work of command with exactness.—Alma 26: 95, page 517.

8. Hope:

Behold I say unto you, that ye shall have hope through the atonement of Christ and the power of his resurrection, to be raised unto life eternal; and this because of your faith in him according to the promise.—Moroni 7: 47.

(Read Moroni 7: 45-49, page 767.)

9. Righteousness, virtue, goodness, joy.

For I perceive that ye are in the paths of righteousness: I perceive that ye are in the path which leads to the kingdom of God; Yea, I perceive that ye are making his paths straight, I perceive that it has been made known unto you by the testimony of his word, that he can not walk in crooked paths.—Alma 5: 33, 34, page 325.

10. Self-forgetfulness, selflessness.

Recessive Powers

It is possible and necessary that the recessive powers in man be brought to fruition if he is to become what he is intended to be—a child of God. But in order to achieve this, the natural man—the man who is carnal, sensual, and devilish—must be born again and lay hold on those things that will apply a power greater than his own to his potentialities and enable him to break off the chains of his spiritual bondage. Man must recognize his own smallness, his literal "nothingness" before God, ere he can come to a condition of mind and spirit that is truly repentant and humble. Mosiah recorded these words of King Benjamin:

For behold, if the knowledge of the goodness of God at this time, has awakened you to a sense of your nothingness, and your worthless and fallen state; I say unto you, if ye have come to a knowledge of the goodness of God, and his matchless power, and his wisdom, and his patience, and his long sufferings towards the children of men, and also, the atonement which has been prepared from the foundation of the world, that thereby salvation might come to him that should put his trust in the Lord, and should be diligent in keeping his commandments, and continue in the faith even unto the end of life; I mean the life of the mortal body; I say, that this is the man who receiveth salvation, through the atonement which was prepared from the foundation of the world, for all mankind, which ever were, ever since the fall of Adam, or who are or who ever shall be, even unto the end of the world; and this is the means whereby salvation cometh.—Mosiah 2: 8-11, pages 219, 220.

Again: "O how great is the nothingness of the children of men, yea, even they are less than the dust of the earth."—Helaman 4: 57, page 585. Then Mosiah states:

And now, in the first place, he hath created you, and granted unto you your lives, for which ye are indebted unto him. And secondly: he doth require that ye should do as he hath commanded you, for which if ye do, he doth immediately bless you; and therefore, he hath paid you. And ye are still indebted unto him; and are, and will be, for ever and ever; therefore, of what have ye to boast? And now I ask, Can ye say aught of yourselves? I answer you, Nay. Ye can not say that ye are even as much as the dust of the earth: yet ye were created of the dust of the earth: but behold, it belongeth to him that created you.—Mosiah 1: 57-61, pages 212, 213.

God's Superiority

Man certainly ought to realize that he is neither superior to nor equal with God. Jacob asserts:

Behold, great and marvelous are the works of the Lord. How unsearchable are the depths of the mysteries of him; and it is impossible that man should find out all his ways. And no man knoweth of his ways, save it be revealed unto him; wherefore, brethren, despise not the revelations of God. For behold, by the power of his word, man came upon the face of the earth; which earth was created by the power of his word. Wherefore, if God, being able to speak, and the world was; and to speak, and man was created, O then, why not able to command the earth, or the workmanship of his hands upon the face of it, according to his will and pleasure. Wherefore, brethren, seek not to counsel the Lord, but to take counsel from his hand.—Jacob 3: 9-14, page 176.

A. J. Cronin (in the September, 1950, Reader's Digest) aids in clarifying this truth in these words: "I lost my superiority and this, though I was not then aware of it, is the first step toward finding God." Papini, after long study of the sovereignty of Christ and his way of life, asserted:

Love for ourselves, the origin of our hatred for others includes all other tendencies and passions. He who conquers self-love, and the hatred toward others, is already entirely transformed; the rest flows from this as a natural consequence. Hatred toward oneself and love for enemies is the beginning and end of Christianity. The greatest victory over the fierce, blind, brutal man of antiquity is this and nothing else. Men cannot be born again into the happiness of peace until they love those who have offended against them. To love your enemies is the only way to leave not an enemy on earth.—Life of Christ, by Papini, page 111.

Until now man has loved himself and hated those who hate him; the man of the future, the inhabitant of the kingdom, must hate himself and love those who hate him. To love one's neighbor as one's self is an insufficient formula, a concession to universal egotism. For he who loves himself cannot perfectly love others, and finds himself perforce in conflict with others. Only hatred for ourselves is sufficient. If we love ourselves, we admire ourselves, we flatter ourselves too much. To overcome this blind love, we need to see our nothingness, our baseness, or infamy. Hatred of ourselves is humility, is the beginning of improvement, or perfection. And only the humble shall enter into the kingdom of heaven because they alone feel how far they are from it.—Ibid., page 127.

Need for Spiritual Rebirth

Thus we see how admirably the humble servants of God in ancient America, through the enlightenment of the Spirit of God, caught the basic threads of truth about the nature of man and his need to become spiritually reborn in order to achieve his best manhood and to help usher in the glorious kingdom for which men have so long yearned.

Man's spiritual degeneration and descent are often rapid. Like a falling body, he plummets to the depths. His ascent to the Christly character is never a mushroom growth. It is a slow process, a steep, upward climb. The thorns of his Adamic nature constantly tear at him. The potential child of God becomes a "new creature in Christ Jesus" only through travail of spiritual rebirth and pain of growth in experience. It is not a discovery. It is an achievement. But he "can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth" him.

The gospel principles—faith in God and Christ; repentance from dead works in humility; the new birth and the spiritual resurrection to newness of life, attitude, and disposition or nature; the fact of eternal judgment, that whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap—are fundamental to man's becoming a "new creature" in Christ Jesus. Intelligent abiding in the "soundest" doctrine of life ever propounded—Christ's Sermon on the Mount—delivered in both ancient America and Palestine, gives growth to "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear" (Mark 4: 28). "For the perfecting of the saints . . .

"San Day" Comes Again

Elder Donald V. Lents directs student nurses in their early morning devotions before classes and work begin.

The Day Begins At 6:40 A.M.

By Donald V. Lents,
Chaplain

EACH NEW HOSPITAL DAY at the San begins with a fifteen-minute chapel service for nurses, student nurses, faculty members, and the occasional patient visitor. We look together to God before the daily duties start.

It is here (in the assembly or lecture room, for we haven't yet a chapel) that the group sings Latter Day Saint hymns and shares in the written and spoken word of God. As our voices filter up through the halls, we have reason to believe not only that our day has begun right, but that the patients who hear us are given additional courage and confidence in those of us who are co-laborers with God. This hope and courage gives them the determination to recover from illness, which is a strong factor in every recovery.

Patients have been known to wonder at the spirit of cheerful willingness to serve that is present with the majority of our nurses for hours upon end in the face of continual suffering. Patients many times have received from the nurse a spark of her faith in the belief that sickness and disease can be overcome and, if not overcome, can be borne bravely and made a strengthening force in their personalities. We feel this results largely from starting the day at 6:40 a.m. in companionship with God.

We need a love for our work and a love for suffering humanity. To be successful in our hospital, this love must always shine from us as co-laborers with God in the art of healing. We need to understand the principle of service that will return repeatedly to sustain us. This principle is that we are co-laborers together in the eternal, creative work for God. Life persists, and life is creative. It means that our communities may be improved, homes made more livable, lives brought to a higher moral standard (temporally and spiritually). We are constantly aware that everybody has a soul, and that soul in the sight of God is important. We realize that the physician does not heal . . . he helps to supply the conditions favorable to healing. God heals by forces which even the wisest but dimly understand. We are reminded that we do not stand alone—we are a part of an institution established and directed by inspired stewards of God. This and more we receive from our daily chapel experiences.

OUR STUDENTS are given the opportunity to hear the leading men of our church. For a week at a time these brethren give their time and ministry with the chaplain. Every department of the church has been represented in this early service in the past few years. We also invite ministers from other Independence churches to come share the devotions of the day. These ministers are seen daily on the floors, calling upon their parishioners, so we feel the nurses should become acquainted with them in an official way and see the type of ministry offered by other churches. A girl becomes a better nurse by seeing and understanding a little of the other person's philosophy.

There are many reasons why we start our day in worship with God.

The "San" Measures Up

By Vida E. Butterworth, R.N.

Nurse Examiners and is working on a program toward accreditation from the National Nursing Accrediting Service which it hopes to be able to meet within a five-year period of time. Some of the additional things needed are more extensive education for faculty members; recreational, auditorium, and chapel facilities; ward teaching classrooms, and conference classrooms; additional library and living quarters; and such equipment as a wire-recorder, Dictaphone, typewriter, better projection facilities, and more models.

AT PRESENT the school has an enrollment of seventy-seven student nurses from Canada, the Hawaiian Isles and all sections of the United States in the three-year course. Many patients have remarked on the fine quality of the student nurses in our school and the kind, cheerful, professional service they render. Similar unsolicited remarks have been made by relatives of former hospital patients, visiting physicians and surgeons from Kansas City, and other impartial judges of the quality of professional service rendered in our institution. Many patients have come from considerable distance to enter our doors for service.

EACH YEAR we stand Johnnie or Mary up against the wall to see how tall each one is and put them on the scales to learn their weight. We compare these marks with former marks in an attempt to prove to ourselves exactly how much Johnnie and Mary have grown. We also try to find out if development has been made mentally, emotionally, and spiritually.

Similarly, we try to size up the growth of institutions such as the church "San" and its School of Nursing. In order for an institution to progress, it must measure up to definite standards. As old goals are reached, new goals must be set higher. This the "San" has tried, and such is the scale of growth which challenges it.

Now the hospital is struggling to get new facilities built to meet the needs of its patients—a physiotherapy department, a children's ward, an additional pathological laboratory, central supply facilities, a cast room, a laundry, maintenance and repair space. It is trying to meet the requirements for approval of the American Medical Association for internship. Already it has been approved by the American College of Surgeons and the American Hospital Association.

The School of Nursing is accredited by the Missouri State Board of THESE THINGS we have done and are doing:

We are having staff education programs for our graduate nurse staff and nurse aids.

We are conducting extension courses from the University of Missouri in ward management and ward teaching for interested graduate nurses.

The Medical Staff sponsors educational meetings and pathological conferences for its staff.

We have made community contacts with the newly-organized Jackson County Health Council—co-operated educationally with the Jackson County Health Department and other community agencies and civic clubs such as the Business and Professional Women's Club, American Association of University Women, Rotary Club, and Optimists.

The professional people within the institution are active members in their professional organizations: The Kansas City Area Hospital Council, Missouri and American Hospital Associations, The Missouri State Nurses Association, and The Kansas City and Missouri Leagues of Nursing Education—one member is on the Missouri State Board of Nurse Examiners that issues licenses, accredits schools of nursing, and sponsors state examinations for graduate nurses—Jackson County, Missouri, and American Medical Associations.

This past year more babies were born in the "San" than ever before, more operations performed, more emergencies treated, more patients cared for. These bespeak the ever-growing service of the institution as a community and church health center.

Some of the intangibles that cannot be measured too accurately but are an indication of progress are the number of former patients who have made further church contact following the chaplain's ministrations in the hospital and the continued success of the "San" nurses in other hospitals, other communities, and other health agencies.

According to standardized ways of appraising employed by the nursing profession—the National League of Nursing Education's Achievement Tests in Nursing and State Board Examinations sponsored by the National Test Pool of the League's Department of Measurement and Guidance—"San" students measure up to high professional standards. We want you to be as proud of your Sanitarium and your School of Nursing as we are, and show this by your continued support.

Your Gift to the "San" Means

By Nelle Morgan, R.N.,

Director of Nurses

Instructor Florence Nowack directs use of microscope by Student Nurse Marilyn Wismer of Amberstburg, Ontario.

SUNDAY, April 22, brings to the people of the church the third "San Day"—their third opportunity to learn about one of the church service institutions and give support to the work being done in it. The "San Days" of 1949 and 1950 have enabled us to maintain a good school of nursing and to make much progress.

It has been said often that a really good teacher can teach the student even though the tools and physical setup are inferior. To some people, this old saying serves as a good excuse for slipping along and not making the effort to secure the necessary tools and equipment with which to do a good job. We here at the "San" would be forced to rely solely on our teachers for "good learning" if we did not have your support.

The microscopes in our science laboratory are one good example of what "your gifts mean" to us. We have nine microscopes—five of them new and very fine—made possible by our friends; four of them are old and cannot be used to study the activities of bacteria. Your gifts this year will make it possible for us to replace two of these worn-out tools. Next year, after "San Day," we hope to replace the last two. Our microbiology teacher is good—very good—but no matter how efficient she is, she cannot magnify those "little bugs" as does the microscope.

In the February 26 issue of the Herald was a picture of Dr. C. F. Grabske teaching about the heart, using a model of that organ. Having the model there makes the lesson much more realistic than just hearing about it. This model was the gift of one of our friends last "San Day." We have in our classrooms five such models of the body and its organs. We need more. Your gifts will help us to secure them.

Chemistry is a most difficult subject to teach, especially to girls. Student nurses seem to be allergic to it. The atomic poleur models help to make at least that part of the subject clearer to the student. Your gifts enabled us to secure a set of them.

STUDENT NURSES lead very busy lives. Their classes are difficult, and much study is required. A good deal of this study must be done in their rooms. Their practice on the patient floors is strenuous, and they become physically tired. They need cheerful, attractive rooms to go back to after exhausting hours in the classroom and in the wards. "San Day" last year made it possible for us to renovate the rooms on third floor of the nurses residence. The ceilings were sound-proofed, the walls redecorated with attractive-patterned wall covering and the floors covered with asphalt tile. These rooms are now attractive as well as comfortably furnished. The first and second floors need the same renovation. Will the 1951 and 1952 "San Days" make this possible?

Your gifts have helped us to begin building a reserve fund. This is absolutely essential for the future security of the school. The Board of Directors has wisely set aside a percentage of each "San Day" offering as a reserve, to which we hope to add each year.

Much has been done; much more needs to be done. As the church sponsoring a school of nursing, we must give consideration to a building in which to house the school. We are outgrowing our present facilities. We need more housing; we need an auditorium; we need recreational facilities; we need a larger library; we need larger laboratories. We need a classroom on the patient floors, in which to hold our ward classes. We need a chapel which can be kept sacred for religious activities.

OUR FACULTY continues to improve itself with your help. One faculty member is on leave of absence this year, attending the university. Next fall she will return, and another member will go. Faculty

Memories of C. I. Carpenter

A Career in Faithful Service

IN EVERY LIFE there is some central theme or meaning. And while no word or phrase could ever sum up all the various aspects of a personality, a basic plan can be seen. In this respect, the character of Brother Claude Irving Carpenter could be indicated in the statement: "When time and circumstance called for him, he was at his post of duty."

How many years, even until very recently, we were accustomed to seeing him in his regular place on the west end of the platform at Stone Church Communion services, ready to perform his task in the beautiful and orderly sacrament. Many times we have gone to meetings, or to some service for the church or General Conference, and were told, "Brother Carpenter will be in charge." We have been in prayer services when there would come a pause and nobody knew what to do or say next. Rows of people had come to drink at the spiritual fountain, with no sense of their responsibility to contribute. There are spiritual sponges to soak up the blessings at every meeting, but not many to give. Then Brother Carpenter would arise and begin to talk. He always gave something good to be remembered.

Most of us first became acquainted with him at some time in our youth through the pages of his quarterly lessons. They were clear, informative, and well organized. Even in his literary style, his kindness and humility were present, making one like him.

Brother Carpenter was one of God's quiet servants. His voice was clear but members have been privileged to attend professional institutes and meetings. We are striving to keep them stimulated to meet the growing needs of the profession so that they may give a better training and experience to your daughters and young friends who come here to learn to be professional nurses.

These things your gifts have helped us to do. They have bought equipment and made possible the education of faculty members. Even more important, they have told us that you are interested in this institution—that you want it to do a good job, that you realize its significance in the whole Zionie movement.

gentle. His manner was friendly, strong, and unafraid. He was never timid, but he let others make the noise.

For many years the family has lived at 410 North Grand Avenue in Independence. The house reflects the church work, the cultural and literary interests, the interesting hobbies, and the happiness of a good church home.

On Saturday, March 17, when the family was ready to go out, Brother Carpenter, seeming in his usual health, stood near the door. He had a heart attack. The end came with merciful quickness.

BROTHER CARPENTER was born in Richland County, Wisconsin, December 30, 1869, and baptized at Plano, Illinois, November 8, 1885. He and Blanche A. Sprague were married at Lamon, Iowa, on December 25, 1904. They have one son, Milton.

In church service Brother Carpenter was president of the Northeastern Illinois Sunday School Association in June, 1892. On the following July 6, he was ordained a priest at Plano. In December, 1893, he received the first of many appointments in church work. On December 12, 1896, he was ordained an elder.

In April, 1900, he became assistant church recorder, a department in which he gave much service. On April 9, 1906, he accepted the office of church recorder. His literary work was recognized in 1910 when he edited the "Elders' Bulletin."

In 1918 he moved the recorder's office to Independence. On August 3, 1919, he was ordained a high priest at this city. After further appointments, he moved his family to Independence in July, 1922.

In 1928 he began his work on adult church history quarterlies, and in 1932 he was editing Book of Mormon quarterlies. He was Church Librarian from 1924 to 1930. In a number of places, he has served as district president in church work.

Brother Carpenter had some interesting hobbies that were used to advantage at Harvest Festivals and on other occasions. He collected stamps, rare coins, and English Bible translations. Of the latter he had forty-five or more.

His companion, Sister Blanche Carpenter, who is serving as acting statistician of the church, and his son, Milton, survive him.

Kindly memories and appreciation go with Brother Carpenter. The Master has called him to a new "post of duty," which he will fill, we know, in a devoted way.

Question:

"Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained."—John 20: 22.

Did Jesus give his disciples the power to forgive sins?
Michigan

J. R.

Answer:

If the question is intended to cover the forgiveness of sins as held and practiced by the Catholic and some of the Protestant churches in their confessionals, involving the hearing of confessions, imposing penances, delaying or withholding remission, and the granting of forgiveness according to the judgment of the priest, the answer must be "no." Christ never yielded his grievances against those who sinned against him and the administration of judgment into the hands of men with power to administer retribution, pronounce forgiveness, and grant absolution in his behalf. Such judgments require infinite knowledge and wisdom to be administered in justice.

No such practice as the forgiveness of sins for God was known to the New Testament church, the beginnings of the later custom having appeared only in the third century A.D. It did not then become an established practice until near the end of the fourth century. No such practice existed in the Nephite church, neither is the doctrine found in the revelations of God to his restored church of latter days.

The continued existence of any and every corporate body is dependent upon having the right of self-discipline. The sins of members—whether of a public nature which tend to bring the church into disrepute or of personal conflicts arising among members, which being unadjusted threaten to spread their evil effects to the disruption of the church—cannot be ignored by the church. In such cases the church corporate becomes a party sinned against and must seek reconciliation through the repentance and confession of the guilty ones. The law of the church which is given of God determines the procedure, and when reconciliation is effected, the church by its officers and by vote of its members is to forgive. If transgressors persist in their sin and resist all efforts to bring them to reconciliation, the church is commanded not to forgive but to cast them out. Herein lie the church's divinely granted powers of forgiving and not forgiving, of remitting and retaining, of loosing and binding, according as the law provides.

In remitting a man's sins or in the retaining of them, the church does not act arbitrarily but by law, for the law says if he repents, "him shall ye forgive": "Thou shalt be reconciled." The church must forgive when the law is complied with by the transgressor. On the other hand if there be no repentance the law is just as explicit, "Whosoever will not repent of his sins, the same shall not be numbered among my people," and "He that sinneth and repenteth not shall be cast out." In either case the law is mandatory and leaves no option, neither room for favoritism, prejudice, or passion.

The power to remit or to retain sins might seem to some, as it did to the medieval church, to suggest the power to dominate the souls of men and to subject them to certain penalties. This the Lord has never authorized. The administration of judgment he has ever retained in his own hands. The law is, "To me belongeth vengeance and recompense." "Man shall not smite, neither shall he judge; for judgment is mine, saith the Lord; and vengeance is mine also, and I will repay."

The text quoted in the question is somewhat obscure as to its full meaning and application, but the interpretation given it by the medieval church could be reached only by inference; we consider the interpretation as without justification and the practice unwarranted.

The above comments are based mainly upon the following texts: Matthew 16: 20; 18: 15-18; Doctrine and Covenants 42:6-7, 22, 23; Mosiah 11:111-113, 118-146; John 16: 8; Deuteronomy 32: 35; Mormon 4: 25; Doctrine and Covenants 81: 6.

Question:

How can Hill Cumorah be in Mexico when Joseph Smith found the plates in New York? (Weldon article, Herald, January 1, 1951.)

Iowa

Mrs. C. W. L.

Answer:

Mormon 3: 3-8 tells of the records being hid in the Hill Cumorah in the year 384 A.D. Moroni (1: 1) says that he finished the abridgment, but there was still more to be written. In the last chapter of the book of Moroni (10: 1, 2) he records that in the year A.D. 420 he was still writing. Then he sealed up the book; but nowhere is it stated what he did with it, or that he was in the land of Cumorah.

The internal evidences of the Book of Mormon indicate that the battles of the last forty years of recorded Nephite history were fought in Central America, but inasmuch as the plates were found in New York undoubtedly Moroni, while alone and hunted, continued traveling northward and eastward until he reached the hill in New York which has carried the popular name of Cumorah, though it is certainly not the Cumorah mentioned in Mormon 3: 5. Question:

Why is the Latter Day Saint church so small numerically?
Colorado

E. C. D.

Answer:

Many people go through life thinking that the "mass of humanity must be right." This is false in most every instance. Christ's church in his own day attracted but a mere handful of followers, while the other churches had large followings. He answered this question himself, "Few there be that find the kingdom of heaven, but broad is the way and many there be that walk therein which leads to destruction."—Matthew 7: 22, 23. We are accused of being both small numerically and small in viewpoint because we believe in closed Communion and other doctrines which prevent our complete fellowship with the Protestant churches. The churches of Christ's day felt the same way about him and his church. In fact, our claims should be given especial consideration because of our comparatively small numbers. Christ's church has always been a small organization. WARD HOGAS.

What Has God Done for Us Lately ?

By Mildred Dorsey

WE ALL CAN tell of the goodness of God to us in times past. Many people bear beautiful testimonies of the truthfulness of this gospel of Christ. Many others have spoken of the miracles and blessings that have come to them as they exercised their faith. All these things happened to them in the past. Are we still receiving these blessings and evidences of God's loving-kindness, or are we content with past blessings and expect no more?

A missionary once told this story. A lady said she had been shown in a dream that the Reorganized Church was God's only true church. She had never received any more assurance or manifestation of his spirit than this. The missionary learned she had never been baptized into the church. God had shown her his church plainly and unmistakably, yet she had done nothing about it. God had done nothing more directly because she had failed to follow his earlier leadings. Many of us are like this—content to know it is the true church of a living God, content to recount the blessings of the past, content with things as they are. Need we wonder that he has done little for us lately?

We need daily spiritual nurture if our souls are to grow. Souls are like bodies in that they need to be continually fed. Our bodies cannot function now on food received in the past. Nor can our souls continue to grow on past experiences. They, too, have daily needs that must be met.

GOD WILL NOURISH US daily. If he cannot reach us, he can do nothing for us. We need then to reverse this order of things and ask ourselves, "What have we done for God lately?" We need daily communion with him if we would know his will concerning us. If we would receive from him now, we must be in contact with him now.

We all need the loving watch care of a heavenly parent. We all want it, yet we go on trusting in the arm of flesh and our own foolish wisdom. How much more enlightened we could be if we would but take the time to ask him about the things that concern us. He is only too willing to help us now as he has in days gone by. He has seen fit to bestow the gift of his wonderful gospel upon us. That should be only a beginning, for we have the promise: "Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room to receive it."—Malachi 3: 10.

We need to be able to pray with the Psalmist David: "Give ear to my words, O Lord; consider my meditation. Harken unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God; for unto thee will I pray. My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteousness because of mine enemies; make thy way straight before my face. . . . But let those that put their trust in thee rejoice; let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them; let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee."

If we love God we will want to serve him. We need to keep constantly in touch with him by daily communion with him. We need to do this that we may truly act like children of God who are always listening to the wise counsel of an ever-loving Father.

OREGON DISTRICT.—The district priesthood institute was held February 24 and 25 in the Central Church at Portland. The average attendance to all classes was 61, and 133 of 195 members of the priesthood attended at least one meeting.

On Saturday night a banquet was held with Elder Miles Whiting of the district presidency as master of ceremonies. The ministry honored for long years of service were High Priest Marcus H. Cook, Evangelist W. H. Barker, Elder P. G. Hager, Elder Leonard Rhodes, Elder J. M. Vail, Priest Peter Van Summers, Priest Joseph Larson, and Deacon August Oleson. Teacher Albert Lasley was especially commended because of his faithful service under tremendous physical handicap. This was followed by a challenging sermon by Seventy Arthur F. Gibbs.

District President J. L. Verhei was in charge of the Communion and fellowship service Sunday morning. Harold Carpenter, district director of church school, was in charge of the morning worship, and Bishop M. E. Lasater taught the morning class.

The priesthood was saddened to learn of the sudden passing of one of its members, Brother Joseph Rasmussen of Kelso, Washington, who was buried the day of the opening of the institute.

A mission with regular Sunday services has been organized at Albany for the members there and at Corvallis. Corless Nitchee is the new leader. The Eugene-Springfield mission now meets in the Eagle's Hall at Cloverleaf Pass, between Springfield and Eugene. Elder Lowell Shultz is the pastor. This group has grown to between forty-five and sixty in attendance.

The Bend ministry is helping the district officers to serve and assist all of Central Oregon at such places as Klamath Falls, Madras, Burns, Mitchell, and Shevlin, as well as Bend. Elder George Dyer is pastor, assisted by Elder D. B. Williams. This congregation has grown under this leadership to over fifty in regular attendance.

Elder F. E. Chapman of the district presidency is in charge of the fourteen ministers to isolated Saints. He is making an attempt to create a condition where no Saint will be isolated from church services, at least part time. He is not only having each isolated member visited and written to, but also plans to hold services at centers where each can occasionally attend services.

The new church at Myrtle Point is almost completed. Elder George Price is the pastor, assisted by Priest Tom Coffman. An outstanding increase in attendance has been reported.

The new Longview church is progressing. Elder Miles Whiting is pastor.

Baker, in eastern Oregon, is preparing to become a worship center for the communities in that section of the district. The leaders will attempt to serve the isolated members. Assisting Pastor John McKee are Elder Will Ferguson, Priest Joseph Schofield, and Brother Reginald Fritschle, the church school director.

Elder Lloyd Shannon was selected to replace his father, J. L. Verhei, as pastor at the Central Portland Church. Elder Verhei resigned because of district activities.

Elder Glenn Haviland was selected to replace Missionary Elwin R. Vest, pastor at First Portland Church, who resigned to take up missionary work in the Hawaiian Islands.—Reported by J. L. VERHEI.

Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."—Ephesians 4: 12, 13. (Read Moroni 8: 29, page 771.)

And the first fruits of repentance is baptism; and baptism cometh by faith, unto the fulfilling the commandments; and the fulfilling the commandments bringeth remission of sins; and the remission of sins bringeth meekness, and lowliness of heart; and because of meekness and lowliness of heart, cometh the visitation of the Holy Ghost, which Comforter filleth with hope and perfect love, which love endureth by diligence unto prayer, until the end shall come, when all the saints shall dwell with God.—Moroni 8: 29, page 771.

Time will not allow additional lengthy consideration of the nature of man as regards his spiritual entity and destiny, but brief mention is made of the most essential items therein involved.

The Book of Mormon teachings about this phase of the nature of man are:

2. Physical death brings about the separation of the spirit from the physical body. (Alma 19: 43, page 448; Moroni 10: 31, page 777.)

3. The Spirit of man is deathless; it is not annihilated. "Not the destruction of the soul, save it be the casting of it into that hell which hath no end."—I Nephi 3: 208, page 39. (Also Mosiah 1: 66, page 213; Alma 9:34, page 345.)

4. The spirit of man has consciousness after death and may exist independently of the body. (II Nephi 6: 28-35, page 107; Alma 19: 40-47, 56, pages 448, 449.)

5. The body will be resurrected and restored to its complete and proper frame. (II Nephi 6: 32, page 107; Alma 8: 99-103, page 342; 19: 65, 67, page 450.)

7. The quality of life and character we build into personality in this mortal state on earth, either a spiritual rebirth or a continued perverseness and rebellion against Deity, determines the condition, inheritance, and destiny of man in the eternal world or in the life to come. (Alma 16: 228-232, pages 430-431; 19: 66, 67, 75-77, page 451; Helaman 5:69-74, 85, 86, pages 592, 593, 594.)

The Ministry of Women

By Olive J. Davidson

THE OXFORD UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY defines the noun "minister" as "one who acts as an agent or representative for a superior." As a verb it means "to serve, to furnish, to supply, impart help, to manage affairs, to render aid or assistance to the needy and the sick."

The Scriptures show that women are called to serve. They need not be ordained to the priesthood to be helpful. In fact, the church could not do without women who feel the responsibility of their high calling as mothers, helpmates, and teachers.

Motherhood is a partnership with God. But mothers cannot teach children faith in Christ unless they have a living abiding faith in him, and practice what they preach every day. Children quickly detect sham. They can be taught to pray sincerely only when those who are trying to teach them kneel with them and set the example. They learn to do by doing.

There is no greater responsibility than to train children so that lessons of value in later life may be early implanted in their minds.

God did not intend that women should take over the entire care and responsibility of the family any more than of the church. In both fields they are called to be partners with men. Often their share of the partnership is to be a true helpmate in faith. They must have faith not only in God, but in their husbands.

When the husband is a member of the priesthood, the quiet faith of the wife can be a very real help to him in his developing ability to carry the responsibility God has given him. God needs the help of good, intelligent women in order to have good, intelligent men in the priesthood.

WOMEN ARE CHALLENGED by the number of things they are required to teach in order to render proper service to God. The older women are to teach the young women to love their husbands and children and care for their homes.

They are not left in doubt about what and how they should teach. Specific instructions are given in Doctrine and Covenants 68:4. The closing paragraph of this section reads: "These sayings are true and faithful; wherefore transgress them not, neither take therefrom. Behold I am Alpha and Omega and I come quickly. Amen."

The Lord advises women to teach their children these things before they are eight years old—before evil crowds into their minds. Children who bring the greatest worry and grief to their parents are the ones who are taught "too little, too late."

Children learn by feeling before they understand what is said to them. If a mother enjoys a prayer service because of the Good Spirit there, a very small child may feel that, too. Many things in early spiritual development are influenced by how the mother feels about them.

Child musicians and actors and even "boy preachers" are ordinary children that someone has succeeded in teaching before their minds became cluttered up with other things.

It is surprising how great an understanding of music little tots can absorb under right conditions before they are old enough to play an instrument or sing.

I CARED FOR A LITTLE GIRL an hour each day for some time. She could say only a few words and was quite backward. I began by having her repeat what I said—first words, then nursery rhymes, songs, and stories. Soon she was memorizing new ones every day. Her family decided she was very bright. She has two older brothers who were slow in learning at school, but she began taking honors in her first year and eventually became a high school teacher.

Some children are considered "dumb" because no one had ever taken time to teach them to talk or to express themselves in any way.

When we have little children we can find wonderful opportunities to develop their self-expression in ways that are good, including all the things the Lord wants them to know. Let us hope the time will come when children will not have to be punished—when parents will be given wisdom to teach them.

Doctrine and Covenants 45:10 says: "And their children shall grow up without sin unto salvation."

One of the great tests of character is what we do with our leisure time. We will be surprised at what can be accomplished in only a short while, perhaps a few minutes each day, if we know exactly what we are trying to do.

Most church members are interested in the missionary program. Women, too, are expected to witness for Christ to their neighbors and friends. To do this they should be able to tell the story of the gospel in a simple and accurate way; keep informed on the latest developments in archaeology which relate to the Book of Mormon story, and know what tracts are available. One phase of the ministry in which women can serve particularly well is in keeping the Word of Wisdom. Only a casual glance at the number of ill and afflicted members indicates that this section of Doctrine and Covenants needs to be studied thoroughly and put into practice.

There are many wonderful examples of women who have served their Lord.

Martha—the perfect housekeeper, troubled about many things, concerned about the welfare of her home.

Mary—who chose the better part, to follow the Master.

Dorcas—concerned about the needy and fashioned coats for them.

The mothers of the 2,000 young men—who were saved by their great faith.

Emma Smith—who preserved the manuscript of the Inspired Version of the Bible and so reared her sons that when the time came they were ready to take their place in the Reorganization.

The wives of early missionaries—who reared their children alone while their husbands carried the gospel message across this vast continent and to foreign shores.

Emma Burton—who, when she needed a shawl to protect her from the bitter cold in the mountains of the West, prayed for one and received it almost immediately.

Sister Goodwin—who lived several miles from the J. J. Cornish home. One night she dreamed that Sister Cornish was ill and the family in dire need. The next day she could not forget the dream, so she walked through deep snow and bitter cold to the homes of all the Saints in that area asking, "What can you do to help?" Though all were poor people they gave as they could: one, a sack of flour; another, a quarter of pork; another, sugar. One who had very little said, "I'll take my team and sleigh to haul what the others give," so food and medical supplies were loaded on the sleigh, and Sister Goodwin went along. That evening they arrived at the Cornish home. The children were cold and hungry, and the mother was very ill. Before they left that night, wood was brought from the forest, food prepared, and someone provided to care for the sick woman. The ministry of Sister Goodwin will be long remembered.

The church today has heroines, too. It is every woman's duty to rise to the heights of her privileges and make good the promises of Almighty God.

We Don't Know We Are Witnessing

BY RUTH MIDGORDON GOODWIN

Mother and Father sleep late each Sunday morning and do not get up in time for church school. They feel they are entitled to sleep on Sunday after a hard week, since Sunday is the day of rest. They don't know they are witnessing to their children and their neighbors that their religion is not worth getting up for. They don't know they are witnessing that a few hours extra physical rest is more important than inner strength and peace.

* * * * *

From a Methodist pamphlet entitled "They Didn't Know They Were Teaching" comes this example. A group of ministers were discussing the influence of parents on their children. One remarked that his people had roast minister for dinner every Sunday. What does it do to children when parents constantly criticize the pastor or the church school director or anyone else? They don't know they are witnessing that they have not put the love of Christ into their lives. And how better will children know about Christ's love and fellowship than through their parents' love and fellowship for people around them?

* * * * *

Two-year-old Ann's parents left the Mother Goose and little animal books for daytime reading and substituted simple stories of Jesus' life at bedtime. And each night as she was tucked in her crib, Mother had prayed with her—a prayer that was mostly a sentence by Mother and then its repeat by Ann. But one night shortly after the Jesus stories had replaced ones about sleepy rabbits, little Ann in her prayer said spontaneously, "And thank you, God, for Jesus." Mother and Father hadn't realized they were witnessing. Nor had they realized the power the Master would have, if allowed, in such a young life.

Can't We Be Friends?

By Louise Wrigley

MILDRED TOOK one last look at her shining, spotless house, tucked her curls under her new spring hat, and ran next door to call upon her new neighbor. As she paused before ringing the bell, she noticed that the door certainly needed paint. Upon entering the living room, she immediately spotted the worn place on the sofa. Her neighbor's house dress which, though crisp, was soft in color. "Too drab" was her mental comment. Mildred went home happy—happy because she had made the call and found that she could feel superior to this new neighbor. She knew she could safely like her, because the neighbor would be no real competition as a housekeeper, as a clothes-horse, or—perhaps—as a person.

MIDDLE-AGED ANNA pulled on her last year's good, black coat, brushed it neatly, and let her firm, steady step carry her out of her familiar front door to a strange one behind which she hoped to find a new friend. Anna's new neighbor had a serene, smiling home which Anna warmed to, and this neighbor was eager to ask if Anna sewed, if she painted, if she liked to create her own small touches about the house. Anna did and said so, but when she saw how beautifully her neighbor could do everything, how deft and sure her touch, Anna felt the neighbor's talent far outshone her own. She wasn't jealous—that wasn't it at all. She only felt that she could never make any contribution of any sort to this woman. It never occurred to her that her smile might be valuable, her philosophy might be helpful. Anna went home and stayed there, and the new neighbor grew lonelier and lonelier, wondering whether she had been cordial enough, remembering Anna's cheerful, wholesome face. She was afraid of what she might have said unknowingly. A friendship died in the bud.

MARGARET WENT CALLING TOO. She happened to plan her visit at a time when her neighbor, unfortunately, had a vexing cold. Margaret was met with a slightly impatient manner. Her neighbor was a little less than cordial, then warmed to Margaret's nice smile and her considerate manner. After Margaret had cut her visit short, the neighbor began to think more about her and to regret her own chilliness.

In the meantime, Margaret was not harboring this reception against her neighbor. She realized sensibly that it must have been a bad day for her. She resolved to give it another try. The next time, the neighbor had a smile for her and soon confided that she felt she should apologize. Margaret didn't require this of her. Instead, she suggested that she herself often had days when inconvenience seemed too much, when nothing worked out quite right. She brought a new book she thought the neighbor would like. She mentioned a free afternoon when she would like to entertain the neighbor in her own home. She didn't push—she didn't visit with the idea that she might be slighted, snubbed, or hurt in any way, and she gained a friend.

CAN'T WE BE FRIENDS? Can't we take just a little more time to think before we say something we don't need to say? Couldn't we, perhaps, school ourselves to overlook things which might be prompted by circumstances beyond our knowledge? We all need to do this more often, for if we would be friends and have friends, this is one of our responsibilities. Friendship is another phase of God's love, another law for man's benefit and pleasure.

What will our good-neighboring visiting policy with one another be? We might well look to it now, for friendship is a beautiful experience we don't want to miss.

Nothing Short of a Miracle

By Barbara Peavy

Ursula

YOU HAVE A RESERVATION on the boat, Miss Pawlowski. It's nothing short of a miracle that you could get passage in three months. Most people work for about three years to make connections and get passage to America. You're a lucky young woman. We'll see you then at the station Friday. Good-by."

The "click" that followed indicated that the person at the other end of the wire had hung up. As she stood staring at the telephone, Ursula could hardly believe that she had heard the man speaking. Only last week she had been tempted to return to Germany. Her mother and father had not wanted her to come to Paris, and her funds were getting low. Now the dream that had begun in the government office in Berlin was being realized.

So much had happened in the past two years. The disappointment when she realized that she could no longer continue in medical school after the invasion of eastern Berlin was a thing almost forgotten. The days in the government office when the Americans talked of their homeland and the initial interest in their way of life seemed to have happened only yesterday. She could not forget the American family she had worked for. They had been such nice people.

She remembered their promise, "If you ever come to America, Ursula, let us know. Come to see us." That would be her first objective. They had wanted her to return to America with them, and now she would get to see them again.

How had it all happened? The voice on the phone had said, "It's nothing short of a miracle." Perhaps that was right. The German quota of people to come to America was filled for the next ten years. She had come to France because there was a possibility that she could find a place on the French quota, if it was not filled. The three months in Paris had been months of waiting. And now—America.

ON THE BOAT Ursula had time to look back over the events of the past years, and a wave of nostalgia swept over her when she remembered the fun she had had at home. Her brother's teasing, the pranks they had played together when children, her mother and sisters, her dad's stern but loving way were poignant memories. Could she really be in her right mind? Just to leave her home and strike out on her own was daring enough, but to go across the ocean to a strange land, a strange people—was she being foolish? Her ability to speak several languages, including English, would prove beneficial, she was sure. But still new lands have new customs.

She went out on the deck to read, and as she sat with the book in her lap, she remembered what trouble books had caused in her home. There was the time that her father had burned all the books she had been reading that were written about any other religion than their own. The priest had spoken to Father Pawlowski and advised that he prevent Ursula's reading books that would cause her to question her own faith. "She has her prayer books, and if she learns her catechism, she will be kept busy." Father obeyed the priest. He burned the next books he found in the house about religions. The scene that followed was unpleasant but humorous. Father had not known that the books were from the public library. He had not thought that he would have to pay for them. Dear father, how he fumed and fussed and finally paid for the books.

She would miss her parents and the fun they had together. But there was adventure and freedom in the new country. And if she were unhappy, her parents had instructed, she was to return.

THE BOAT DOCKED in New York, and the first few days of Ursula's life in America were spent in sight-seeing. But the big city of New York with all of its sights can be very cold to a lonely young woman. She was happier when she planned to go to Boston. At last she would get to see her American friends again.

In Boston she worked for her friends for a few months and attended the college at Cambridge in the evenings, but she was still lonely. It was no easy matter to make new friends in a strange land.

At Christmas Ursula sent out cards, using her album to get the address of a friend she had known in Germany during the American occupation. The address of the friend was Independence, Missouri. What had she heard of Independence? Oh, yes—the president's home town. She sent the Christmas card, and the next couple of months were spent in correspondence with her friend.

She wrote of how lonely she felt in the new land. She wasn't sure that America was a friendly place. Then her friend invited her to visit the Middlewest before returning to Germany. She had not yet decided to come to Independence when she met Almer Sheehy in Somerville, a suburb of Boston. He recommended Independence as a friendly town. "You'll like Independence," he said, "there's something different about the people there. I know you'll be happy."

Ursula had been attending church at the cathedral in Boston. Somehow she felt that it was not really filling any need. Her reason for coming to the Middlewest was not religious, though. She wanted to find friends and to be happy.

SHE ARRIVED IN INDEPENDENCE on Friday night and found a room at the O. F. Webster home. Sunday morning the Websters asked her to go to church with them. "There are some German people we would like you to meet," they told her.

In order to be friendly to these kind people, she went to the service at the West College Street R.L.D.S. church. On this Sunday she witnessed a different type religion. She also saw her first baptismal service of this church. Baptism by immersion—at first it frightened her, for she had only known sprinkling as a form of baptism. Ursula met the Henry Schaefer family and the Otto Elser family that Sunday morning, and Brother Schaefer invited her over to his home during the week.

In their conversation she told him her feeling of dissatisfaction when she saw the low moral standard of the people of her faith in France, and the aloof manner of the people who attended the cathedral in Boston. Brother Schaefer told her about his conversion experience and a little about his church. As she left, he gave her a copy of the book, A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, to read.

When she first started reading the book, she would read a part and put the book aside. There was much in it that seemed too incredible to believe. The facts regarding the Pope shocked her. The apostasy, the Dark Ages, a restored gospel—these terms had never been a part of the vernacular of her people. Ursula read the book twice and asked for more literature.

FACING THE DECISION to believe what she read, she went to confession to repent, because she had been reading about a different church and had been attending other services. As she awaited her turn, she realized that she had done nothing wrong, that she had committed no sin. There was nothing to confess. She left the church building with one idea in mind. She would follow the way her heart directed. She would become a part of this "Restoration Movement."

Three weeks after her arrival in Independence, Ursula joined the church. Truly converted to the truth, she found a great thrill in the prayer services that were being held before General Conference. A new spirit came from prayers that were not read—prayers from the heart.

General Conference followed the week of prayer, and Ursula attended every meeting she could cram into her schedule. New in the church, she found power in the classes and services she attended. One of the greatest thrills of the Conference came when she met Brother Sheehy who said with a great deal of feeling that he had known she would find the church—that she would find happiness.

Much has happened in Ursula's life since last April. She worked at the San for several months and then came to the Herald Bookshop to work.

But the story does not end with Ursula's happy disposition making the bookshop a more pleasant place. This May she finds even greater happiness. For not only did Ursula's miracle bring her to America, not only did she find God's church; but as she and Wade Liggett, linotype operator at the Publishing House, unite in the sacrament of marriage on May 4, Ursula finds that she has been led to a challenge—the beginning of a more wonderful miracle—that of a Zion home.

The other, on branch administration, is under the direction of Dean M. L. Ritchie and Dr. G. A. Platz.

The 217 students who will receive diplomas next June will comprise Graceland's fifty-fourth graduating class. The commencement convocation will be held at 9:30 a.m. on Friday, June 1. Delano, director of food service.

Graceland is issuing a new publication called the Graceland Counselor, which will appear periodically throughout the spring and summer. It is intended to help prospective students in their college planning and to furnish them with general information on the college. It contains information on mobilization and vocations, general campus news, and other announcements of interest.

Ray Zinser of the faculty, assisted by Ed Barlow of Brewton, Alabama, and Dick Howard of Independence, Missouri, presented the members of the faculty to the student body at a recent assembly. They told of where the faculty members have been educated, the degrees they hold, their families, and their hobbies. Mr. Zinser also explained the meaning of the academic gowns and hoods worn by the faculty at commencement.

First, because it is right; second, because there is power in united prayer and worship; third, because it gives us opportunity to remember others; fourth, because it strengthens the influence of the church in the community; fifth, because it brings personal blessing; and sixth, because it permits a better ministry to the patient from the nurse.

Having daily group worship experience is rare among school and industrial groups, but we feel that it gives our girls a radiance that is appreciated, although not always properly accredited by many nonmember patients. We recognize it as the Spirit of God which helps us truly to make this a "place of refuge and help" for the afflicted who come to us.

* STOP LIGHTS

A popular religious author received this comment from a friend of his who was retiring from his business: "I have gone past too many stop lights!"

It is not only in cars that we ignore the stop lights. It is in overwork, worry, anxiety, fear, too great loads of responsibility.

The pain in the stomach that turns into an ulcer is a stop light. The flutter of the heart, or the first warning attack, is a stop light. The fainting spell, or the feeling of excessive fatigue or depression, is a stop light.

Yet too many of us rush past the stop light, hoping to ignore it or outrun it. But Nature, the grim traffic cop, whistles us down and takes us over at the curb, perhaps for a while, perhaps permanently.

Have you been going past stop lights lately?

* HERALD

There was an invitation in the paper to visit some new exhibition homes in a suburb of Kansas City. Naturally, as veteran visitors of exhibition homes, we went. A type called the "western ranch house" seems to be much in favor at present. . . . One of the houses was completely furnished. It had the appearance and feeling of a place where somebody has been living, and had gone out just a few moments before for a drive. It seemed to be still vibrating with the life of the family. There was food in the refrigerator, and other little touches of humanity. . . . And just as we were leaving, my lady called attention to something on the magazine table near the fireplace: the latest copy of the "Herald," face up and ready for perusal. . . . Somebody's idea of a properly furnished home. There was nobody to ask, nobody to get acquainted with. But we left with a kindly thought for you, Sir or Madam, whoever you are!

* RELUCTANCE

My attention meandered whimsically and capriciously through the back pages of a magazine (the high-collared "Atlantic Monthly," if you must know). I scanned it with an eyebrow lifted, hoping something would turn up. I followed it apathetically.

And so I came across an ad by General Electric commending the excellence of its "Variable Reluctance Cartridge," a thing for a radio-record player. The expert will be thrilled by such a gadget, but to the literary mind it only leads to something else.

My reluctance, too, (I must confess) is variable. Did Mother Nature install some such cartridge inside of me, perhaps alongside an adrenal gland? Sometimes it would seem so.

Take those days—mornings especially—when I am unwilling. Very unwilling. I'm against everything. Reluctance is at its maximum. . . . Of course there are the "eager beaver" days when I'm so enthusiastic, so foolishly hopeful, that I'll bite on anything. Reluctance is at a minimum.

And sometimes there are the happy days when my ship rides the sea of life on an even keel; the sky is blue, the wind is fair, and the little waves kick up their heels in white froth like fawns at play. I am neither eager nor unwilling. My reluctance, whose variations often bother me and sometimes get me in trouble, is for a brief while at its optimum.

Christiana Salyards died April 16 at Resthaven. She served in many capacities for the church while living. She was the author of many quarterlies and several books. Born in 1861, she celebrated her ninetieth birthday on March 30 this year. Her husband, Richard Salyards, who passed away in 1944, was once secretary to President Joseph Smith III.

ATTENDS CONFERENCES

Apostle D. T. Williams attended a district conference at Wichita, March 31 and April 1, in the basement of the new church which is being built there. Seventy James Daugherty, Supervising Seventy of Kansas, was present in addition to regular district officers. Apostle Williams reports that if progress continues, the auditorium of the new church will be available for services about the last of May. April 7 and 8 a conference was held in Ottumwa, Iowa. This was the first conference in the new church which is now completed. Elder D. J. Williams presided at the conference with the assistance of the apostle in charge, D. T. Williams. At this conference Charles Korman, under church appointment, was ordained to the office of elder, and Byron Barker was ordained to the office of deacon.

KANSAS CITY STAKE

The Kansas City Stake set apart the week of April 1-8 as Restoration Week. The first emphasis was given at the Communion service, April 1, with the theme, "Hear Ye Him." Sunday evening the Zion's Leagues presented dramatic interpretations of the Reformation in the different branches. Wednesday evening sectional prayer services were held at Central, Van Brunt, and Grandview churches. Friday evening dramatizations of the Restoration were presented. These were for the most part under the direction of the young adults. On April 8, the morning services in the branches were dramatizations by the children's departments and special sermons on the Restoration.

We'd like you to know

Odess L. Athey

IF YOU COULD SEE Brother Athey's desk any day, you would know he is not a clock-watcher. As senior accountant in the Presiding Bishop's office, he handles the accounts from missions abroad. He has to translate francs, guilders, pounds, and marks into dollars and cents for the bishop's reports. His administrative ability has been shown by his successful organization of the funds and labor which produced the beautiful West College Church. He also served as the first pastor of the congregation.

Odess was born at Taborville, Missouri, and was baptized by his father, Elder C. H. Athey, when he was eight years old. He was graduated from the Schell City, Missouri, high school in 1921. He taught school in Vernon County for the next six years and then finished his requirements for a B.S. degree at Central Missouri State Teachers College at Warrensburg in 1930. He continued his graduate work there in 1931 and attended Denver University and the University of Kansas City in 1937-38, majoring in accounting.

He was principal of the Consolidated Schools of Latour, Missouri, in 1930-31 and then came to Independence as principal of Noland School, transferring to the commercial department of William Chrisman in 1934. He resigned in 1942 for his present position. Help for Our Girls

Editorial

In Recognition of Oriole and Skylark Week, April 23-29, 1951.

PERHAPS your church has a class of girls. They seem to consist mostly of braids of hair, ribbons, and shoes a little too big for them. They are suffering from their first pangs of self-consciousness, and they do too much giggling. They don't appear to be paying much attention to what the teacher is saying.

"All fluff and frivolity!" you think, judging them from the viewpoint of your own middle age and fatigue. "Not a serious thought in a carload of them! What is the young generation coming to?"

Maturity, citizenship, responsibility, and church membership—that is what those young people should be coming to. And you can help them if you will, or drive them away.

You may think they are not very important. But it is better to refrain from harsh judgments. Life will be very serious for them soon enough. In a few short years they will be in business and professional life, in church work, and making homes.

THIS HAPPENED to a young mother, a member of the church.

Her daughter was reaching the age when she was ready for the organized activities provided in the church by our girls' organizations. Seeing the need, the mother decided to help in organization and leadership work. She hadn't been in it long when another church member said to her, "Why don't you get into something important? That doesn't amount to much!"

Imagine being told that your daughter's welfare, mind, and soul, are not important! How would you feel?

In spite of that and similar discouragements, that mother today is one of the able leaders in girls' work in this area.

IN THESE YEARS of transition from childhood to maturity, the girls can either be won to faithful membership in the church, or they can be lost—they, and their children after them, and grandchildren too.

Don't let anybody tell you that they are not important. Think twice before you make such a statement. Such girls will either make or break the church in the future.

Mormon President Dies

After six years in office, President George Albert Smith, head of the Mormon Church, died on April 4, his eighty-first birthday. He succeeded Heber J. Grant who occupied from 1919 to 1945.

President Smith was a kindly person, who loved his fellow man and evidenced special regard for those who were related to him by ties of blood.

Under the Mormon rule of seniority, if followed—and we assume it will be—Apostle David O. McKay, president of the Council of Twelve who served as a counselor in the First Presidency with both Presidents Grant and Smith, will succeed the deceased president.

Israel A. Smith.

Some congregations are losing both boys and girls because of indifference. If we think that young people are unimportant, they will soon think that the church is not important. Judgments can work both ways.

EARLY IN MARCH I received a letter from one of our readers and contributors. She gave me plenty to think about. Here are a few things that she said:

Picking up this week's Herald for March 5, I was interested in your editorial, "The Third Generation." I'm wondering if — is one of the men who has felt that we do not need any girls' organization in our church

When I began working with girls I was told, "You will be criticized for linking with us." Surprised, I asked, "Why?" "Because many of our ministers feel the girls' work is unnecessary," etc. I could scarcely believe this, but as time progressed I realized it was true.

"The Third Generation"—now the fourth and fifth generations—in my father's family have failed to contribute their share to this church. Most of them are not interested, preferring some other church or none at all. Why?

THE REASONS the girls gave her were various, but perhaps we had better refrain from quoting them here. They might start an argument that would only divert us from the main purpose of this editorial.

Here is a far more useful question: What can we do about it now?

During the week of April 23 to 29, we can call the attention of our people to the importance of the girls and of the work that the Oriole and Skylark organizations are doing. We can ask for help and support for them.

We can consider the needs of youth for a good, comfortable, and pleasant meeting place at the church, for trained and effective leadership, for an adequate program of social life, personal training, incentive to self-improvement, knowledge of the church, and preparation for service.

"Keep the children in places where they will learn," says this leader. "Keep them in the youth organization. Give them something to do. Sitting and listening are not enough. They must have an opportunity to live the gospel and not just know about it."

Remember, if we lose the girls, we may lose the future of the church.

Patriarch Elbert A. Smith Honored on Eightieth Birthday

Patriarch Elbert A. Smith, who celebrated his eightieth birthday on March 8, was honored by members of the Los Angeles, California, Stake. Accounts of the observance appeared in four Los Angeles newspapers: The Mirror, The Examiner, The Times, and The Evening Herald and Express. The following is from The Mirror:

Thirteen congregations honored Elbert A. Smith, president of the Order of Evangelists of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, on his eightieth birthday last Thursday at the home of his son, Lynn E. Smith.

Mr. Smith is a grandson of Joseph Smith, founder of the Latter Day Saints movement, and the only son of David, the prophet's fourth and youngest son.

The Missouri branch of Latter Day Saintism, which Mr. Smith represents, regards itself as the church in succession to the original movement founded by Joseph Smith, according to G. E. Tickemyer, stake president of the Los Angeles area.

"The movement was formed around the leadership of the three living sons of the prophet and members of their families including Elbert A. Smith, who still have great influence in the councils of the church," Tickemyer said.

Mr. Smith makes his home in Independence, Missouri, world headquarters of his church.

Israel's Army Aided

By Arthur U. Michelson

The following article is reprinted from The Jewish Hope by permission of its author. We feel certain that readers who have long been interested in the prophetic destiny of Israel will enjoy reading it. It contains evidence of two instances where the enemies of the new nation of Israel were stopped by the appearance of mysterious personages under circumstances which compelled them to pay them respect and stop the fighting by surrender.

It was marvelous what God did for the Jews, especially in Jerusalem, during the fighting with the Arabs. Though quite a few months had passed since the victory of Israel's army in Israel, they were still talking about what had taken place. Everywhere I went I heard how God had intervened in their behalf, and how He helped them to win the battles. One of the officials told me how much the Jews had to suffer. They had hardly anything with which to resist the heavy attacks of the Arabs, who were well organized and equipped with the latest weapons. Besides, they had neither food nor water because all their supplies were cut off.

The Arabs, who had a great army in strong position, were determined to destroy the Jews, while the Jews were few in number, without any arms and ammunition. The two or three guns they possessed had to be rushed from one point to another, to give the Arabs the impression that they had many of them. The Jews had quite a few tin cans which they beat as they shot the guns, giving the impression of many shots. But as the pressure was too great, they were unable to hold the lines any longer and finally decided to give up the city. At this critical moment God showed them that He was on their side, for He performed one of the greatest miracles that ever happened. The Arabs suddenly threw down their arms and surrendered. When their delegation appeared with the white flag, they asked, "Where are the three men that led you, and where are all the troops we saw?" The Jews told them that they did not know anything of the three men, for this group was their entire force. The Arabs said that they saw three persons with long beards and flowing white robes, who warned them not to fight any longer, otherwise they would all be killed. They became so frightened that they decided to give up. What an encouragement this was for the Jews, who realized that God was fighting for them.

God performed the same miracles on other fighting fronts, for He wanted to show the nations that He had turned to the Jews again, and like in the olden days, would help them to conquer the land. The Arabs were especially strong in the Negev District, not far from Beersheba, for they were backed by a large Egyptian army. The Jews were encircled by the Egyptians, and humanly speaking, had absolutely no chance to escape. One morning, to the amazement of the Jews, the Arabs and the Egyptians suddenly gave up the fighting and surrendered. The Jews were at first very skeptical, because they couldn't believe that the Arabs and the Egyptians would give up their strong position and surrender. But when they saw how the Arabs threw down their arms, they learned that God had intervened for them. When they asked the Arabs and Egyptians for the cause of their surrender, they told them that they saw an old man with a long beard who was dressed in a white robe, and who warned them not to fight any longer, otherwise they would all perish. This man was seen and heard by almost all the enemy troops. A great fear came over them and they decided to give up the fight. These and other stories I heard from various Jews who fought on the battle fronts. They said to me, "If God had not intervened we would all have been killed. We could never have conquered Palestine because we were so few and without arms and ammunition."

Too Little, too Late

By Roy E. Weldon

Wherefore the voice of the Lord is unto the ends of the earth, that all that will hear may hear; PREPARE YE, PREPARE YE FOR THAT WHICH IS TO COME.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 3.

ONE BRIGHT sunny day last summer while sitting in a reunion prayer meeting in Michigan, I heard a testimony I shall long remember. A man had grown indifferent to the work of the Lord. He had become more interested in worldly pleasures than in attending church. He had become addicted to the tobacco habit. Then one day his wife became very ill, and her condition grew steadily worse. This man loved his wife, and in agony of spirit he knelt by her bed and poured out his soul to God, calling on the Eternal Father to reach forth his hand and touch his beloved companion in order that her life might be spared. When he had finished his prayer, the Lord answered him in an audible voice: "You ask so much and give so little." His wife died, and he was unprepared for the emergency he faced. It was a matter of "too little, too late."

In contrast to this story is the experience of a man who was just the opposite. Recently I was asked to give some Book of Mormon lectures in a Midwestern city. Upon inquiry I learned that this congregation had started about ten years ago. On graduating from college a young man and his wife moved to this city, and he obtained a position as a teacher in the high school. He wrote to the Department of Statistics and obtained a list of addresses of some scattered Saints in the region. Some had been dead for quite some time, but this good brother succeeded in locating a handful of church members. He even gathered them up in his own car on Sunday mornings to get them together for church meetings. That was ten years ago. Today this young man is an elder and pastor of a live, growing congregation. These people own their church building, free of debt, and had more baptisms in the past year than some congregations four or five times their size.

Like the woman in Michigan, this man's wife became very ill. Blood transfusions were given to keep her alive. Like the man in Michigan, this brother loved his wife deeply and knelt beside her bed and poured out his soul to God in her behalf. The Lord answered his prayer as soon as it had been uttered, but it was a different kind of answer than the man in Michigan received. There was a knock on the door. Our brother says the instant he heard the knock, he knew it was the Lord's answer. When he opened the door, there stood two elders who said they had come a considerable distance under divine impulsion. They immediately administered to the sick woman, and the tides of mortal illness which were swiftly carrying her into eternity were reversed, and she was brought back to health.

"If It Be Thy Will?"

I would not wish to draw the conclusion that God will heal everyone who is consecrated to the building of his kingdom; because healing, or even deliverance from death, is not always the best thing for us. The conclusion I draw from these two experiences and others like them is that God is not slow to hear the prayers of those who love him and give themselves without reservation to the building of his kingdom. When emergencies arise for such people, they can rest assured that as they have ministered to others, so will the Lord minister to them in the hour of their need. Sweet and wonderful is the experience of those who love the Lord and labor in his kingdom, but bitter and tragic is the experience of those who have had too little interest in the Lord's work too late.

"Wherefore the voice of the Lord is unto the ends of the earth that all that will hear may hear; Prepare ye, Prepare ye for that which is to come . . ."

Among the experiences we may meet, there is one great one that none can escape. Few of us may ever have to face the emergency of a desperately ill wife, but all of us someday will have to stand before our Creator and render an account of our stewardship.

The Scriptures contain much that is graphic on this question of "too little, too late."

"And again I say, Hearken unto my voice, lest death shall overtake you; in an hour when ye think not, the summer shall be past, and the harvest ended, and your souls not saved."—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 1.

"And we see that death comes upon mankind . . . nevertheless there was a space granted unto man, in which he might repent; therefore this life became a probationary state; a time to prepare to meet God . . ." —Alma 9: 40, 41.

There is only one answer for the problem of having "too little, too late"—"Prepare ye, prepare ye for that which is to come."

One day many years ago as I was hauling bees up a steep canyon road in the coast range in California, my car went over the grade. During the fall I found my entire life passing before my mind's eye with the speed of lightning. I realized that I was not prepared to meet my Maker and cried out for him to save me. The car landed in the mud and water on the bottom of the canyon. The door was open, so I crawled out unhurt and determined to give myself to the Lord's work so that when the real call came I would not be found with "too little, too late."

Sins of Omission Versus Sins of Commission

During my recent trip to South America with my genial traveling companion, Francis Anderson, of Holden, Missouri, I spent several days in Panama while waiting for passage on a banana boat for Esmeralda, Ecuador.

Brother Anderson had attended Graceland College and was well acquainted with a Gracelander whose father operated a barber shop in Balboa. We decided to go and visit this man, a Mr. Holcomb. He was delighted to meet us and immediately turned the barber shop over to an assistant and the three of us spent the next two days roaming the roads and jungles of Panama in his car. Mr. Holcomb, a sportsman, lover of nature, and breeder of thoroughbred hunting dogs, enjoyed hunting in the jungles. He took us into these jungles where tapirs, boa constrictors, crocodiles, and wild turkeys roam.

On the afternoon of the second day, after a bumpy drive over rough jungle roads, we came out on the bank of a river. It was crocodile country and crocodile snouts were visible on the surface of the water. As we followed the river Mr. Holcomb told us that some of the crocodiles were twenty to twenty-five feet long. He also told us that the big crocodiles would lie hidden in the high grass and when a dog came close enough, one of them would whip out with his long tail and knock the dog into the river. Then it would jump into the water, grab the dog, and roll it under the water.

He told us that he had lost several of his good hunting dogs that way. I had heard that some of the crocodiles were called "man eaters," so I did not venture into the tall grass.

Some months after this my oldest son and I walked along the banks of a different kind of a river—a river of human derelicts (Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois). Within a distance of four blocks we counted twenty-four men, some of them young, lying on the sidewalks, in the doorways, and in the gutters. They were alcoholics. I have the same kind of feeling toward alcoholic liquors that I have for the tall grass that grows along the banks of that crocodile-infested river in Panama. I believe that no amount of persuasion could move me to touch either one.

Most of us will never commit the sins of commission. We will never become alcoholics, steal another man's wife, or forge our name to a worthless check. We will shun these gross sins of commission, just as I shunned the tall grass on the banks of the river in Panama. But I sometimes wonder if we are kidding ourselves. Do we think: "We don't drink. We don't smoke. We don't swear. We don't deal dishonestly. We don't quarrel with our wives. Therefore we are good Latter Day Saints and are in the process of marching onward to Zion"? To me this is a very serious question. Can Zion be built by the things we don't do? Can the goals of the great Restoration Movement be realized from what a smug, complacent generation of Latter Day Saints doesn't do? Obviously most Latter Day Saints are not guilty of the gross sins of commission, but how about the gross sins of omission?

The parable of the ten virgins is a case of "too little, too late." Need I point out that these ten were "virgins" and not adulterers? They were not guilty of the sins of commission, but of omission.

Too little study, too little prayer, too little fasting and self-discipline, too little visiting of the sick, too little warning of our neighbors, too little priesthood visiting, too little attendance of the Wednesday evening prayer services, too little filing of tithing statements and paying of tithes—surely the great work of the Lord in the last days—the preaching of his gospel to the nations and the establishment of Zion will result from what his people do, rather than from what they don't do. The first and great commandment is "Love . . . and serve . . . with all your might, mind, and strength." On this hangs all the law and the prophets.

In the parable of the talents, the man who hid his talents in a napkin (sin of omission) was called wicked, slothful, and unprofitable. The poet has said, "The saddest words of tongue or pen are these, it might have been!" I am almost persuaded that the sins of omission are as fearsome and terrible in their consequences as are the sins of commission.

The Family Altar

It seems to me that this matter of "too little, too late" finds one of its most bitter and tragic expressions in our failure to minister to our children when they are small. A Catholic priest has been credited with saying: "Give me a child until he is six years old, and he will always be a Catholic." Our own church law recognizes this same principle in its commitment to the proposition that a child of eight years of age should be sufficiently instructed and grounded in the church to make the covenant of baptism.

A child's mind is unbiased and impressionable. Whatever is most deeply impressed will eventually be expressed. If loyalty to God, to Zion, and to the ideals of love and consecration are deeply impressed, the child will eventually do something about it. I think the writer of Proverbs spoke wisely when he said, "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it."—Proverbs 22: 6. One prominent church official is said to have estimated that if we had saved all our children to the church, we would now have a church membership of five million people.

Recently I was present when a newly ordained young man preached a sermon. After the sermon was over, a man of influence, means, and high ministerial ability came up to the father of the young preacher and with tears in his eyes declared, "I would give all I have in the world for a son like that." It is a matter of personal knowledge that the mother of the young man mentioned was faithful in her stewardship over him when he was a small child. I was personally present on more than one occasion when the mother presided over the worship service at the family altar and the influence of the Lord's Spirit was distinctly and clearly recognized. Surely effective, continuous, well-planned family altars in which the children worship with the Lord himself as an unseen guest will pay glorious dividends and bring rejoicing to the soul and good to the Lord's work beyond all computation and measurement. On the other hand too little ministry to our small children can cast a shadow over their life's journey that may ever follow us. I can scarcely think of anything more discomfoting than the picture of a father and a mother, deeply devoted to the work of the Lord, having children who are either lukewarm or showing no interest at all in the work of the church.

Prayer and Fasting

When Jesus and his three disciples came down from the mount of Transfiguration, a man brought his son to Jesus to be healed. The disciples had tried to heal the child but could not. After Jesus healed the lad, the disciples came and asked why they had not been able to heal him. Then Jesus told them that such cases of healing require fasting and prayer (Mark 9: 26).

About ten years ago, in the fall of the year, my father took the flu. Before long it became evident that he was seriously ill. The elders administered to him, and the Saints at Berkeley, California, had special prayers for him at the Wednesday evening service. He received only a temporary blessing, but then his condition grew worse. He had reached the place where he could do nothing except labor for breath. It was Easter week in April when the doctor informed my sister, who is a trained nurse, that it was useless for him to come back, because there was nothing he could do, and the end was near. One of my brothers and I talked the situation over. Our parents had been very good to us. We decided to make a final effort in their behalf.

We dispatched telegrams to all members of the family, setting aside the succeeding three days for fasting and prayer, at the end of which (Easter Sunday) we would administer for the last time. I will never forget that beautiful Easter Sunday when we went quietly into the sick room, and Patriarch William Dawson of the Northern California District, assisted by Elder Myron Schall of Sacramento, laid hands on my father and administered to him. As soon as it was over we filed quietly out. It was very evident that unless the Lord acted promptly, it would soon be all over. The next morning I returned and was overjoyed to find that the Lord had acted. I found my father breathing quietly and normally. The fever which had been with him so long had departed to return no more. He recovered and in a few months sold his holdings in California and re-invested in the Stakes of Zion where he now lives at Warrensburg, Missouri.

Suppose we had not had a three-day fast for my father? I have noted other cases where the ordinary routine of calling in the elders and having prayers at church have not availed, and then some of us decided to go a little further and had a period of fasting and prayer. In one such instance in our stake a remarkable, clear-cut blessing came which has greatly strengthened and encouraged all who know about it. Perhaps it is the usual practice when illness or disaster overtakes some of us to call for the elders or have prayers in church. If this does not suffice we conclude, "It is the will of the Lord." In view of the circumstances I have related and others like them, I raise the question, Are we writing off some of the results of our own shortcomings as the will of the Lord?

The scriptural equivalent for "too little, too late" is the word, "shortcomings." Paul says, "For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God."—Romans 3: 23. Coming short or omitting to do all we might have done seems to be the major sin of our day and time. Within the past year as I sat in the congregation of the Lord's people, one man arose and spoke in the name of the Lord. Several sentences were significant. "Many of my lambs and my sheep are languishing. My standing ministry whose responsibility it is to minister in the homes of my people cannot be held guiltless until they have done all they can."

Are We Doing all We Can?

Recently while engaged in ministry in one of the larger cities of a neighboring stake I was invited to the home of one of the most devoted young men of the church in that area (a high priest, member of the stake high council, and leading figure in pastoral activities). We had scarcely started to eat the fine meal spread before us when this young man's wife turned to me and asked if I would like to hear how her husband was converted to the church. In response to my affirmation she told one of the most impressive testimonies I have heard in a long time. This young man was reared a "hard-shell" Baptist. Then he met this Reorganized Latter Day Saint girl, who took him to church and tried to convert him to the Restoration story. After considerable prayer, time, and effort, she put into his hands the Call at Evening. The next Sunday afternoon, one week later, he returned the book after reading it. He was unimpressed and said he could not see anything to it. It was then that she decided to make an extraordinary effort. She took her problem to the Lord in fasting and prayer. She fasted the entire week. When the two met the following Sunday, something had happened. The young man announced he was ready to join the church.

In the Book of Mormon we find these words, "Nevertheless, the children of God were commanded that they should gather themselves together oft, and join in fasting and mighty prayer, in behalf of the welfare of the souls of those who knew not God."—Alma 4: 6.

Are we falling short and bringing too little too late to bear upon the souls of our neighbors and non-member friends in not seeking the Lord in fasting and mighty prayer to win them to the kingdom?

It is the spirit of our time to find the easy way. Some people want to reduce the easy way—eat all of whatever you want, then just take such and such pills. We don't even have to push the button. Thermostats and automatic controls are taking over. We don't have to shift gears any more in the latest motor cars. It seems this attitude of looking for the easiest way out has invaded the field of our relationship to God and the building of his kingdom. Fasting is not an easy religious exercise. Abstaining from food for one, two, or three days is not an easy thing to do, but those who have tried it in sincerity and in harmony with the Lord's commandments can testify that wonderful blessings are sometimes forthcoming.

Jesus fasted forty days without food (Luke 4: 1-7). He has commanded us to fast. "Also, I give unto you a commandment, that ye shall continue in prayer and fasting from this time forth."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21. "I have fasted and prayed many days, that I might know these things of myself."—Alma 3: 79. The Scriptures are replete with evidences of the results which accrue from fasting and prayer as well as the results accruing from keeping the other commandments.

God is calling us. The adversary is calling us also. Again I ask, Are we kidding ourselves? We refuse to heed the call of the adversary to gross sins of appetite and passion. Can our complacency and negative righteousness save us? The call of God is to give ourselves—all we have and are and ever hope to be—to the building of his kingdom. Failure to respond to this call constitutes a major sin, regardless of the fact one may have resisted the calls of the adversary to sins of animal appetite and ambition.

Jesus said, "Break not my commandments to save your lives." By falling short with too little too late we break the first commandment and the great one, "Thou shalt love and serve with all thy might, mind, and strength."

There is or can be no hope for Zion or the glorious achievements of the goals of the Restoration Movement until the Lord's people move out of the wilderness of Mosaic "thou shalt nots," into the promised land of response to Zion's "thou shalt." It seems high time to move from the land of "don'ts" into the fruitful, fertile plains of "do."

The Day of the Lord's Preparation

The well-known prophecy of Nahum in the Bible about the day of railroads and automobiles (Nahum 2: 3-6) contains this very significant phrase, "The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation." The apparent purpose of this prophecy is that when men see such chariots as Nahum described, they may know that it is the day of the Lord's preparation.

Jesus spent thirty years in preparation before assuming his role as the Messiah and Savior of the world.

The Restoration Movement is irrevocably moving toward the day when it must come out of obscurity, assume its rightful role, and set up a standard for the nations.

Preparation for the endowment and the establishing of Zion has been going on for a long time. Our recent revelations have been placing increasing emphases on preparation.

It is apparent that great events are in the offing. There are glorious promises and prophecies that the Lord is preparing to fulfill.

Behold, I say unto you that Zion shall flourish, and the glory of the Lord shall be upon her, and she shall be an ensign unto the people, and there shall come unto her out of every nation under heaven. And the day shall come, when the nations of the earth shall tremble because of her, and shall fear because of her terrible ones.—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 8.

Wherefore, I the Lord have said, Gather ye out from the eastern lands, assemble ye yourselves together ye elders of my church; go ye forth unto the western countries, call upon the inhabitants to repent, and inasmuch as they do repent, build up churches unto me; and with one heart and with one mind, gather up your riches that ye may purchase an inheritance which shall hereafter be appointed unto you, and it shall be called the New Jerusalem, a land of peace, a city of refuge, a place of safety for the saints of the most high God; and the glory of the Lord shall be there, and the terror of the Lord also shall be there, insomuch that the wicked will not come unto it; and it shall be called Zion.

And it shall come to pass, among the wicked, that every man that will not take his sword against his neighbor, must needs flee unto Zion for safety. And there shall be gathered unto it out of every nation under heaven; and it shall be the only people that shall not be at war one with another. And it shall be said among the wicked, let us not go up to battle against Zion, for the inhabitants of Zion are terrible, wherefore we can not stand.—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 12, 13.

As we look at the darkening clouds that hover over the horizons of the future and feel the tremors that at times literally pass through our modern social order as the very pillars that sustain our modern civilization crack and tremble under the pressures and weights of two world wars and the human maladjustments that follow in the wake, surely we can see that forces are now already set to explode which could bring the fall of Babylon and the end of the "times of the Gentiles."

How can we look upon the advanced stage setting for the realization of the goals of the Restoration

Trephining or Trepanning

An Article for the Archaeological Minded

By Aleah George Koury

The picture of the trephined skull shown is the most remarkable yet found in Peru. The skull has five holes, the edges of which show evidence of healing. It is certain the patient survived the operation. This picture was supplied by Paul M. Hanson, who received it and permission for its use from Dr. Hiram Bingham, leader of the Peruvian Expedition of 1914-15 of the National Geographic Society and Yale University.

THIS IS A SUBJECT that should concern those who are interested in archaeology because it plays a vital part in the practices of the American aborigines. It is constantly brought to the foreground by various members in the church as one mark of proof that surgery was practiced by the early Indians. This is used as evidence that they had an advanced culture hundreds of years before Columbus set foot on American soil.

Trephining, according to the Encyclopaedia Britannica (1947 edition, page 20) is the act of making openings in the skull. It was known to the ancients as many recently recovered crania (skulls) inform us. The methods employed have been the subject of much speculation and argument and seem to have ranged from attrition (wearing out by friction) with flint implements, to drilling and crosshatching. Trepanation, an obsolescent word, means making a hole by chisel or gouge; trephining means cutting out a disk of bone by a special ring saw.

"There are amazing instances of the way primitive man could use his flints in the unexpected field of surgery. Trephination, in which a modern surgeon employs the most delicate steel instruments in what is considered a major operation, was undoubtedly performed in the more advanced period of the Stone Age with a flint implement," for tre-

phined skulls from Neolithic (the later stone age, when ground or polished stone weapons prevailed) graves of Europe have been collected. "The most skillful examples on a living person show a series of small holes were drilled in the skull and the necessary bone removed."¹

"Trephining has been widespread in ages of the past, for numerous specimens from Peru (and Bolivia, according to Charles Hill-Tout, F. R. C. S., F. R. A. I.), New Caledonia, and the Loyalty Islands are known."²

IN SOME CASES the reason behind this operation was for the purpose of relieving the brain from pressure or irritation.

The "Amautas" (members of the highest order of the Inca priests) practiced trepanation of the skull for fractures from club blows and also for less adequate reasons. They scraped the surface of the bone with a stone knife, incised a square, circular, or irregular segment, forcibly pried out the button and rasped the edges smooth.³

It is also interesting to note that this same operation was practiced by the people who inhabited the northwestern coasts of North America, for an interesting discovery was made in British Columbia.

In prehistoric times two types of men lived on the coast. One was, like the existing Indian today, very broad headed; the other with very narrow faces and heads, which no longer exists. They have left behind them stone cairns (taken to be contemporary) in which little but their bones are found and enormous clam and cockleshell heaps, some from a mile to two miles long and nine feet deep, that are now buried in dense forests, and certainly date from many hundreds of years ago, in some cases even perhaps thousands. The interest lies in the fact that the builders of the shell heaps practiced trephining.⁴

AMONG THESE PEOPLE the operation was done by the shaman or medicine man, and it was supposed to act in an occult or mystical way for the benefit of the sufferer. They believed that all headaches, dizziness, epileptic fits, etc., were caused by an evil spirit enclosed in the skull; so an opening was made through which it might escape.

The examination of some of the trephined skulls indicate that tumors or some such malignancy lay at the cause for the operation, but it is very unlikely that the ones who performed the surgery knew about it. They did know the patient was suffering from pain in the head, but they attributed this to an evil spirit, and they did what they thought would result in ridding it.

Summing up, we necessarily come to the conclusion that trephining was practiced in the Americas and other parts of the world including Europe and some of the islands of the sea.

It is difficult to claim that trephination (or like practice) in America was the result of a culture due to previous advancement through Christian living and consequent development, although in some cases (as Peru) it is not anti-Christian.

Here, as in many other anthropological developments, is a subject still in its infancy, and undoubtedly much more light remains to be revealed.

Pioneering in Oklahoma - Part I

By Mrs. Hubert Case

IN APRIL, 1898, my husband and I returned from the South Sea Islands mission to our old home at Moorhead, Iowa. The appointment for that year read "Little Sioux District" and was for two years since there was to be no Conference held in April, 1899.

My father, George Montague, was appointed for the same period of time to Gallands Grove District. We went to my father's house to make our home so that mother and I could be company for one another while the missionaries went about their Master's business.

In June our daughter Dorothy was born. Since this made two children for us, we began to think of the future and how we should ever get a home of our own. Neither of us had any worldly assets when we were married, and we had not amassed any since that time.

At the Conference of 1900 Hubert was assigned to Oklahoma—then a raw, new territory. We resolved that here, perhaps, was our opportunity since there was still land for homesteading. In fact this was the year for the opening of the Caddo country. We were not early enough for that, however, so had to wait until later on to find a better chance.

Hubert went to his mission in May, 1900. In August I followed with the two little girls. A reunion was being held in August for the whole territory, as there were only scattered localities where our people were living. I believe there were two branches then organized in the east-central part of the territory.

The reunion was held at Hennessey on the Rock Island main line. The prairies I saw from the train looked brown and dry. Wheat had been harvested since June, and there had been no rain since. All looked desolate and wind blown to me as I stepped from the train with my babies and luggage. The little town had obviously not been there long.

Trees had been planted, but none had grown into shade trees. Though I had sent a letter saying I would be there that day, no one had come to meet me.

I waited in the depot a short time but saw no one who I could think was a Latter Day Saint. Then, taking the babies by the hand, I walked up the street toward a livery barn which could be seen from the depot. There I engaged a team and driver to take us to the reunion ground.

No one seemed to know where the reunion ground was. I inquired of several men around the depot, but no one had even heard of it. I had a handbill which Hubert had sent, and we followed the directions on that.

The driver, a boy about eighteen years old had evidently had a drink or two. He was not really drunk, but he kept acting silly and dozing off. The children were soon sound asleep, and taking care of them and keeping him awake kept me busy; but at last we reached the reunion ground. The babies awoke and found their daddy! He had not yet received my letter saying when we should arrive and was very much surprised and delighted to see us.

AT THIS REUNION I met many of the Saints who still live in Oklahoma. We met some of the best friends we have ever had. There was a tall, slender lady with a heavy coil of almost golden hair who was led around by a strap fastened to her thumb. Her leader, a little boy named Rex, looked to be about the age of our Dorothy. Mrs. Rowland was not then a member of the church but was baptized not long after. I was much attracted to this sweet lady and still count her one of my best friends. Her husband, who was a member, was there also. Their son is now a man with a family of his own.

After the reunion we went down the line of the railroad to Okarche, a small town where L. W. Pate and

W. W. Smith had their homes. Elder W. M. Aylor, a missionary to Oklahoma at this time, also had lived here, and there were several families of Saints not far away. (Brother Rowland, the Clessons, and the Tennyers, had joined some time before.)

We spent the winter in Okarche. My sister, Mrs. N. E. Koestner, came in the fall and rented a hotel building near the depot. We rented part of the building and lived there with her. Later in the fall my father came for a short time to serve as missionary-in-charge of Oklahoma. He, my sister, Brother Pate, Brother Smith, and my husband, took up claims in the far western part of Oklahoma near Redmoon, Roger Mills County, close to the western boundary of the territory. Oklahoma did not become a state until a year or so later. When my mother heard we had all filed claims, she also came down to Okarche. Not long after she came she was stricken with an illness which resulted in her death in April, 1901. She was buried in Okarche.

In May we all set out for the claims. Teams and wagons had been bought and we loaded all our possessions and started for the west together. I have not mentioned the arrival of my brother, his wife, and their four children. They came at the same time mother did and made the journey with us. My sister was the only one who did not leave with us at that time. After she disposed of the hotel she had rented, she joined us.

IF I REMEMBER RIGHTLY, we traveled about four days, camping at night wherever we could find water. When we reached our destination, we drove to the western side of the land where there was a small spring and a tree or two. Here we pitched our tents, using one for a kitchen and one for a bedroom. An arbor between them made a dining room. As the one tent was not large enough for sleeping quarters for us all, we set the overjet off the wagon, leaving the cover attached to the bows as it was, and made an extra bedroom out of that. The overjet is a large frame which sits on the top of the wagon box. It made the wagon bed wide enough to accommodate a bed spring of the old-fashioned woven wire kind that needed no slats. There was our bed. At the other end of the overjet, using slats and old-fashioned coil springs, we made a bed for our two children, thus leaving the tent for my brother, his family, and father while he stayed with us. Brother J. W. Hancock, his wife, and their three children had been in the neighborhood long enough to have a dugout house with a sod front. Others who came in our crowd were camping in much the same way as we were.

The part of Oklahoma to which we came had long been settled along the river bottoms, and the choicest places. The early settlers were cattlemen, and they had used the hill country which we were in as grazing ground for their cattle. We expected them to show some resentment, but nothing of the kind happened. Instead, when it began to rain a short time after our arrival, one of the settlers rode by and was very much troubled at seeing women and little children camping out in the rain. He wanted us to move down to Redmoon and occupy the schoolhouse as a dwelling until we had houses built.

Redmoon, which was about one and one-half miles from us and near the Washita River, was our nearest post office. There was a little store and, I believe, a blacksmith shop. Of course the schoolhouse was also a part of the village.

As soon as we had settled down in something like a routine, Hubert began to think about holding meetings in the schoolhouse. The proper authorities were interviewed, and, since they made no objection, we arranged for a few meetings.

WE HAD OFTEN HEARD of cowboy boys, but none of us had ever met any until the Redmoon meetings. They came from far and near on their cow ponies. One would ride up to the vicinity of the schoolhouse, dismount, and throw the reins over the pony's head, leaving them dangling. The pony was trained to stand as long as the reins hung in that fashion. The rider would stride into the schoolhouse, spurs jingling and broad hat in hand. Many wore red sashes girded about their waists. All of them wanted to sit in the back seat, which was impossible because there were too many boys and not enough back seats. I am quite sure that all the singing some of these boys—and girls, too—had ever heard was some voice, or voices, singing some ballad or hymn; for I never saw so interested and delighted an audience as these people when we began to sing.

There were enough of us together to make quite a choir, and although none of us were specially good singers, we had voices to carry all four parts—to the amazement of the natives.

I am sure they would have come to the meetings to hear the singing, but those who were older gave careful attention to the preaching. We continued the meetings for a short time and organized a Sunday school before deciding to close the preaching effort. Then Brother Case had to leave, but nearly every Sunday we had preaching from someone. Brother Hancock was an elder. Brother S. S. Smith also had located near us and met with us frequently. We had a thriving Sunday school and things looked very favorable for us.

ALONG IN JUNE we learned that Redmoon was to have a Fourth of July celebration. These, we learned, usually lasted over the third, fourth, and fifth. All kinds of races, frontier sports, singing, and orations were arranged for. We newcomers were asked at once to help with the music. Someone had an organ, and I was drafted to play it. Another new settler—not one of us—knew a little about leading, and he and I proceeded to train a group to sing the "Star-Spangled Banner," "Hail, Columbia," and other patriotic songs. We were getting along very nicely, when on the Sunday preceding the Fourth, my brother's family was invited to spend the day at Mr. Dudney's—an old settler down on the river. Somehow during the day my brother's little son got hold of some unripe peaches and ate them. A day or so later he became very ill. We did not know about the peaches and were out on the prairie miles from a doctor or drugstore. At first we did not think he was seriously ill, but he grew rapidly worse, and the night of the third of July, in spite of all our efforts, he died. It was a terrible experience for these young parents—a new, rough country, strange people, and no real home as yet.

Of course we knew all the old settlers would be at the celebration. They had so little opportunity for association with one another, we felt sure they would be there. Of course all our own church folks came at once, and much to our surprise, when we had to lay the little one away, five or six families of the early settlers left the celebration to attend the funeral service. We were truly grateful for this kindness, and it helped us to overcome the loneliness of spirit caused by the passing of the little one.

WE MOVED OUR CAMP shortly after this. The little spring was drying up as the long summer set in, so we moved near another. The men set about excavating for a half dugout, the upper half to be built of logs. That was soon finished, and we lived in it a short time. Then we obtained a little money with which to buy enough lumber to erect the shell of a twenty-four foot house.

This was enclosed and floored just before it grew really cold in the fall. We had left most of our household furnishings in Iowa until we should have a place for them. Now we were ready for them to be shipped to us.

All that winter we had a hard time keeping warm. The house was unfinished inside at first. Along in January, my husband bought some building paper, with which we lined the walls. By nailing it fast to the studding, we partitioned off rooms and covered the ceilings. This made it easier to keep warm as the heat could not rise to the roof as before.

But building paper is not immune to accidents, and it was not many months until something else had to be done. In fact we were forever trying to add a little more comfort all the time we stayed there. But we loved it. We loved the farm. It was our own and it was beautiful, too. I enjoyed standing on the big rock, which was our front doorstep, and looking off to the east. The hills followed one another in long, undulating lines like waves of the sea.

ONLY ONE THING marred my happiness—that was having to stay alone with the two little girls. There were no animals to be afraid of, but there were travelers on the road, and I did not know what sort of people they might be.

The main road to Cheyenne—the county seat and the largest trading point between us and the railroad—ran right through our claim. After fences were put up, the road went directly in front of our house. Down in the valley about half a mile from the house was a spring where many of the travelers camped. This spring was directly between our house and that of our nearest neighbors, the Hancocks. (And there were no telephones.) Occasionally a traveler would miss the spring and go beyond our house to camp. One evening a man camped by the road about a quarter of a mile from us. The children and I were alone, and I hoped he would drive on to Cheyenne, but no! As we were eating our supper, I heard him call, "Hello! the house!" This was a habit peculiar to the locality. If one had a bad dog, the man was safe and could dismount if necessary. I hated to go outside, because then he would know there was no man on the premise, but I had to go.

He asked the way to the spring, saying he had missed it, so I told him and he went away to water his team. I went back and tried to eat the rest of the food on my plate so the children would not know I was worried. I put them to bed at the usual time, and when they were asleep, I closed and fastened all the windows and doors as best I could. I slept but little. Time after time the noise of the wind, which almost never ceases to blow in that region, would rouse me. Early in the morning I arose and went out to milk the cow. As I was getting water at the cistern, the man who was responsible for disturbing my rest rode up again. "Good morning," he called, "isn't this the place where Elder Case lives?" "Yes," I replied. "Well," he said, "I thought last night that this must be where he was located. I was right interested in his preaching when he was up at Antelope Hills."

I was filled with disgust at myself for being such a "fraidy cat," and with him for not telling me the night before that he was a harmless citizen who sometimes attended church. As I lived there longer, I learned that I really had nothing to fear.

MAYBE THAT LAST STATEMENT is a trifle rash. I found out late that same summer that I could be afraid of a very common beast. I started from the house one day to go to the mailbox. The mailman drove right through our pasture from east to west. There were wire gates in the fence on each side of the claim. He always left our mail in the box at the east gate. As I walked toward the box, I saw cattle coming over the brow of the hill. Now range cattle have plenty of respect for a person on horseback, but none at all for one on foot. There was not a horse on the place, nor a man to ride one. I shuddered when I thought of what they would do to our fields of milo maize and kaffir corn—the only crops we had to feed the pig, cow, and chickens through the winter.

Then I had an inspiration! I had on the oldest of my dresses, made with a very long, full skirt—perhaps six yards around the bottom. I pulled the skirt over my head, holding it out with outspread arms. The good, old southwest wind filled it like a balloon, and I ran toward the oncoming herd. The leader flung up his head with a snort. He still ran but veered away from the unusual object coming toward him. All the other cattle followed the leader who suddenly was backtracking as hastily as he had come, headed toward the west gate. I kept on, too, and they never stopped running until the last one had passed through the gate which someone had failed to shut. When I finally reached it, I found a tangle of barbed wire and stakes lying on the ground. I hastily picked it up, put the bottom of the pole into the wire loop at the bottom, and the other end through the wire loop at the top of the post. Then I sank down on the ground and leaned against the post, disregarding the barbed wire. I was panting for breath, but sat only a minute or two, for I knew the babies would be looking for me.

I started back—and sure enough they were coming. We were afraid of rattlesnakes and tried to keep the children out of the pasture. So I hurried, going back almost as fast as I had while following the cattle. Let me say here that that was the only time anyone ever left a gate down while we lived there.

My husband afterward brought me a dog—a big, handsome fellow. He would lie across the kitchen doorstep, and no person could have entered the house without first killing him. But he had such a great voice, and so frequently would hear a far-away coyote's voice and burst into his thundering bark, that he often startled me worse than the all-enfolding silence or the rustle of the wind. So I had Hubert give him away.

Question:

Why was it necessary for God to make a personal revelation to Joseph Smith?
Texas M. F.

Answer:

Revelation has always been God's way of conveying his intelligence to mankind. He has done this by means of angelic visitations, by his voice, through his Son, and through men appointed by him. Every time a prophet speaks for God, God is revealing his will to and through that prophet. Every time God answers prayer, he has revealed himself.

I sense a note of another question that rests behind or in this one: Why did God choose Joseph Smith to be the prophet in these latter days when his gospel would be restored in all its fullness?

The miracle of the restoration of the Church of Jesus Christ needed to be such that reason and intelligence could be called to verify it as truly divine. If a prominent scholar had brought the Book of Mormon forth, it could have been assumed to be the result of scholarly research and ingenuity. This was offset by its coming through a stripling youth. The years have proved the wisdom of that calling.

Question:

I find some who believe that during the millennium the earth will be tenanted by both mortal and immortal beings. Is this correct?
Minnesota E. E. F.

Answer:

Yes. The righteous children of God from every age of the world will come with Christ at his coming while the living Saints will be changed from mortality to immortality, all becoming the inheritors of the Holy City (which will be built up upon this land of America) where no evil can find place. These are the redeemed.

Besides these redeemed ones there will be remnants of the nations left after the great destructions among the wicked.

They remain in mortality, though partaking of the general change which will affect the whole earth, whereby sickness and death will be stayed, so that they live to full age. They will be changed to immortality and "caught up," presumably into the Holy City for they are thus redeemed. The sinner (for some will sin) shall be accursed, which probably means he will be assigned a place with the sons of perdition. These mortals do not live in the Holy City but outside, occupying other parts of the earth. (See Isaiah 65: 20-25; Doctrine and Covenants 63: 13.)

Question:

Do we approve of entertainments in our church buildings?
Missouri Mrs. A. C. T.

Answer:

In a general way I would say "yes" to the inquiry. However, there are types of entertainment which would be acceptable to us and some upon which we frown as a church by natural leaning and because of General Conference resolution.

We have often said that the Restoration Church offers to one a complete life. It would not be consistent then to deny such social expression as banquets, dinners, good drama, and similar types of entertainment in our churches. Much of the objection is removed when our physical plants have lower auditoriums, but in our smaller branches these are not always available.

If the inquirer is concerned about outside interests using our auditoriums for commercial profit by paying a rental fee and reducing the sanctity of our churches by the use of tobacco or intoxicating beverages, then my answer would be in the negative. In our administrative organization, the pastor must give his approval for every use of the church edifice.

I have encouraged mother and daughter banquets, men's club dinners, family night luncheons, Graceland College Alumni entertainment, music club programs, and church school week-day activities in our church buildings, which activities and many not enumerated are consistent with the gregarious nature of man. Incidentally, some of these contacts have kept prospective members interested in our groups until the right missionary secured the decision.

Question:

Why does the Book of Mormon state that without the fall man could not have had children, when the book of Genesis contains God's command given to man before the fall to "be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth"?
Pennsylvania Mrs. R. W.

Answer:

There is no conflict in the texts. The commandment as given in Genesis was given to man in the spirit world before there was an Eden, for the story of creation tells of two creations of man: one on the sixth day when all the children of men were created spiritually in heaven; and the other when Adam was made of the dust of the earth and placed in Eden, which was the physical creation. The command given to men in the spirit was in view of their subsequent earth life in the flesh when they would participate with God in his great purpose of populating the earth. The Inspired Version of the Scriptures is clearer on this matter than others.

Children were not born to Adam and Eve in Eden most probably because it was not within the provisions of God's will that they should be. Lehi says, speaking of matters relating to the physical creation, "All things have been done in the wisdom of him who knoweth all things," so that children could not have been born there without frustrating the wisdom of God. What particular steps the Lord took to obviate such birth we are not told.

Eden was but a temporary place provided of God for our first parents in the beginning stage of their lives, but it was not a place where man's latent powers could be developed, or where he could be brought to perfection, for life was too easy there. Read II Nephi 1 for Lehi's description of that place and note its unfitness for meeting the requirements for human development, which development could come only through hard struggle and patient labor. These were waiting outside. Eden was a necessary nestling place for the first couple on earth, but when parents were established, children found their nestling places in their mothers' arms under their fathers' bounty, and Eden was no longer necessary.

Helped by "Herald" Articles

I read the article, "Christ in Everyday Living," and remembered how I used to sing our children to sleep. I believe those songs have helped to guide them in their lives. There are many ways every member can help to spread the gospel, and singing hymns is an important one. I also enjoyed reading "Retreat" by Leonard Lea and the article on the Word of Wisdom. I have been taking the Herald since before the publishing house in Lamoni burned. It has been encouraging to me through my twenty years of isolation. My heart goes out in gratitude to God for his watch care and for this beautiful gospel. My prayer is that he will protect the boys in the Army and bless the leaders of the church and nation that they may have wisdom to discharge their duties as he would have them to.

Protected From Harm

A year ago last summer I went on a boat cruise up the St. Lawrence River. On the boat I met a woman and her husband who often took such excursions, and we became good friends. After the trip we continued to write each other. In her last letter, the woman told me of their plans to go to the Thousand Islands and asked me to accompany them. I wrote back that I would enjoy making the trip but couldn't afford to. Later I got a card saying that they were in Toledo en route to Toronto where they would spend the night in the harbor. That same night I had a terrible dream about being trapped on a boat and unable to escape. All about me was confusion. The next morning I awoke, grateful to find that I was still safe in my own bed. The morning's paper carried big headlines about a boat being burned in Toronto Harbor, and I found the names of my friends listed among the missing. In spite of the terrible accident and loss of my friends, I was grateful that God had protected me. This feeling of thankfulness and contentment remained with me for days. I shall never forget the experience.

The Power of Faith

Years ago when we lived on a farm near Battleford, Saskatchewan, I had three small children and a husband to care for. One day I felt ill and, realizing that if I became bedfast there would be nobody to help my family, I went upstairs, knelt down by my bed, and told God about my problem. I said, "You have told me that if we have as much faith as a grain of mustard seed great things can be accomplished. Surely I have that much faith, and I am so needed here now." I was instantly healed, and for this blessing I shall always be thankful. We are not always healed in this manner—why, I do not know—but I hope I may never complain. So long as I trust God

I have nothing to fear. My prayer is that the Saints may always be faithful.

Visits Center Place

As we are leaving this morning for our home in Senlac, Saskatchewan, we wish to send our sincere thanks for the directions for our trip here, and for our visit with you at the office.

This has helped to make our visit a happy one in the Center Place. We have visited many interesting places here, and have enjoyed an airplane ride over Kansas City and Independence. One Tuesday morning by request I spoke at the Social Service Center, where there were about one hundred and fifty women and twelve men in attendance. I had no idea of the greatness of this project and will report to our branch that the half has not been told. Could it be the beginning of the storehouse?

The Restoration

For many weeks I have been pondering in my mind as to whether we ought not, as a church, turn our teachings more directly to the potent factors spiritually associated with the Restoration.

Restoration is more than the creation of just another church. It is far more than restoration of priesthood and the revival of first principles of the doctrine of Christ. Restoration is the set time for God to bring in the culmination of his divine purposes for the establishment of his kingdom and Christ's reign over all the kingdoms of this earth.

Many speakers on this theme mention the time of trouble such as we have never known before. But how many of them present the way out, the next item on God's program, which would give us the joyous impetus (Luke 21: 28) to anticipate this culmination of the age?

The direct scriptural vision of all our old Restoration hymns is often forgotten or ignored. How long is it since we have heard a sermon on the coming of Christ, depicted in the Scriptures as King of kings and Lord of lords? When has "the times of the Gentiles" been made comprehensible, and scripturally substantiated?

We need such themes as that found in III Nephi, chapter 10 (pages 664 to 666), correlated with the other two books. We need to be touched with the spiritual fire of the hymn—

Lift up your heads, ye heirs of glory,
Cast aside your doubts and fears;
He who called you to his kingdom,
Soon will reign a thousand years.

The inspiration on which the Restored Gospel is based will never be out of date. Though some may forget it, no one will find anything better.

I have spent over fifty years in Bible study and have been associated with the Latter Day work for forty-eight of them, forty-seven as an elder. Thinking of these things recently, and scanning the evening paper as my wife washed the supper dishes, I heard her singing, "See heathen nations bending before the God we love."

It was like a flash of inspiration—how does the first verse go? "The morning light is breaking . . ." I looked it up in several hymnals and found it in some of those published by the Protestant denominations. It is very probable that the author of "The morning light" was not a member of the Restoration Movement, nor had heard of its message. For the vision of a revival of God's working was voiced by Wesley, Watts, Doddridge, Rawson (turn to No. 416 and read his inspiring hymn theme). Read also the revealing truth spoken by Wesley in No. 409, "Almighty God of love, Set up th' attracting sign."

Are we limiting the truth of God with our poor reach of mind? Is it true that "The Lord hath yet more light and truth to break forth from his Word"? Wesley, a hundred years before the angel's visit to Joseph Smith, could vision clearly the divine "setting up of the attracting sign"—the calling of those whom God approved as messengers divine—from Abraham's favored seed the new apostles chosen to spread the soul reviving news in isles and continents of the world.

In days such as these, we of the Restoration Movement, who have been offered added light and divine inspiration, should be ringing out to the perplexed world the clearly outlined purposes of an all-wise Creator. The Scripture text in this morning's paper read:

"He Created It Not in Vain. 'For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens: God himself that formed the earth and made it: he hath established it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited: I am the Lord; and there is none else.'—Isaiah xlvi: 18."

And we, above all others, should be intimate with the Lord's ways, for, "the works, and the designs, and the purposes of God can not be frustrated, neither can they come to naught."—Doctrine and Covenants 2: 1.

Blessed Through Prayer

I had suffered for thirty years with an ailment which finally caused me to be bedfast three months. During this time I asked the Saints to remember me in prayer, which they did. I continued to pray also and then, much to the surprise of my doctors, I suddenly became much better. I am now able to do all my work, and I want to thank those who remembered me with prayers, letters, and cards. I am reading the Book of Mormon to my husband, and he listens carefully to each page. I wish all could read it and compare it with the Bible; surely many would be converted if they did.

A Baptismal Blessing

The story by Addie Spaulding Stowell in the December 4 issue reminds me of a similar experience I witnessed in 1904. Elder John Shields was holding meetings at our home on Cockburn Island at that time. A sick lady who lived at the boardinghouse in the village asked if she could come to our home and stay while the meetings were being conducted. When she arrived I put her to bed until time for the service, then I helped her into a chair so she could hear the sermon. After several evenings she asked for baptism. Elder Shields had been denied use of the schoolhouse and also threatened by unbelievers; these same people were eager to have him perform the baptism since they thought the woman would never survive and they would have just cause to persecute him. Brother Shields was not afraid, however. The sick lady was taken down to the creek in a buggy and helped into the water. After she was baptized she got back into the buggy and returned to our house where she put on dry clothes; then she was confirmed. Soon she was well enough to go into the village and shop alone.

Again God's power proved greater than Satan's.

A Testimony of Healing

One night after retiring I awoke to find that I had a very sore throat. Since I had to teach school the next day, this worried me considerably. (My work is teaching music and art in public schools.)

I prayed to God that I might be spared the discomfort and inconvenience of teaching the next day with a sore throat and hoarse voice. The next instant I was wrapped in a vision in which I stood before a most wonderful doctor. He examined my throat and said he would paint it for me (or words to that effect). He took me into another room where there were four or five other doctors. I could tell they were doctors by their dress. They all had a striking appearance. My interpretation of the experience was that they were doctors of the celestial world.

Immediately after the vision passed away I was wide awake. My throat was perfectly normal with no trace of soreness left.

Helped in Preparing Address

When I was first asked to address our community women's institute I said, "No," since the meeting was only two weeks away and I thought I couldn't prepare a speech in that short time. Then the thought came to me, "Here is an opportunity for you." So I said I would try. I wanted very much to share the beauty of the gospel with these women, and I made my preparation prayerfully. As I thought about the talk, I put down several ideas. The following Sunday one of the elders at church gave me such good advice and help that I felt certain I could fulfill this assignment. Then I searched the Herald and Daily Bread and found that they contained material that fit exactly with the ideas I had jotted down. Although I was nervous the night of the meeting, I offered a prayer just before I was to speak, and I know God was with me because I was able to give the reading without difficulty. The happiness I feel now that I have given the talk is that reward that comes with serving. It is certainly worth the effort.

Faith, the Best Medicine

While lying in bed unable to attend church because of the flu, the thought came to me that the Saints of today are calling more for penicillin than for administration. I believe that the gift of healing through the laying on of hands is God's way of saying, "Thank you, my child, for having faith in me." Surely we need to trust him more.

From a Nonmember

We have read the Call at Evening and found that it answered many questions we had wanted to ask. The tracts we have read are helpful, too, and we have passed them on to other people. We hope they will get as much good from them as we have. There aren't many who believe in the Bible according to these teachings, and we are sorry for them because their religion is so harsh and unfair. We plan to read the Book of Mormon now when we can get one.

PORTLAND, OREGON. — During December the women's department of First church held the annual bazaar and dinner, which also included a musical program directed by Sister Fay Hawes. The proceeds of approximately $300 were donated to the building fund. The women hold a bake sale the last Saturday of each month in one of the local stores. These sales are for the building fund, and have netted approximately $35 each month.

A Christmas program was presented by the junior department on December 17 in which the entire junior department participated. A Christmas party followed the program. On December 22, a special Christmas musical program was presented by the choir.

The New Horizons sponsored a progressive dinner for their group during December, and fifty members attended. Approximately $30 was received and given to the building fund.

Elder and Sister E. R. Vest conducted a New Year's Eve Stewardship service.

One night each month has been designated as branch night and under the direction of Sister Caroline Larson a program and social evening is held. The junior department has assisted in these as well as other groups of the branch.

First Church participated in the World Day of Prayer, with Sister Peggy Vest, secretary of the community World Day of Prayer in charge of the final period of prayer. Through her efforts and others of the women's group, First Church has been selected for next year's worship service.

The branch took definite action on the building program at a special business meeting, January 28. Elder Vest was in charge. Elder Vest was voted to supervise the building fund committee and the following people were appointed on the committee: Stanley Stoyhoff, chairman; Dorothy Haviland, Forest Moore, Albert Gardner, Gladys Nelson, and Clifford Bryson. This group will endeavor to raise approximately $10,000 this year.

Elder Glenn Haviland was elected to succeed Elder Vest as pastor. Brother Haviland served in the armed forces during the last war as a colonel in the Air Corps and will receive his degree in law the latter part of May. Sister Caroline Larson was unanimously elected to the office of women's leader to replace Sister Peggy Vest.

The entire branch held a farewell party honoring Brother and Sister Vest and their family, assigned to the Hawaiian Islands, March 16. A short program was given and a gift was presented to them in appreciation for their services.—Reported by EULA STOYNOFF.

STOCKTON, CALIFORNIA. — A Junior Zion's League has recently been organized under the direction of Joyce Colville. There are twelve young people between the ages of twelve and fifteen who meet every other week.

They waited tables for the Thanksgiving dinner, helped a needy family at Christmas, went caroling, held a patriotic party, and took a trip to the snow in February.

The Call of Church Camps

By Edna Easter

GET OUT THE OLD SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY and turn to the map of the United States—or find a road map left over from last year's vacation. Then refer to the listing of the camps to be held this summer and mark the location of each on the map. It's surprising how extensive church camping has become in recent years, isn't it? Except for the North and South Carolina area in the southeast, and the larger area of Nevada, Utah, Arizona, and a part of Idaho in the west, youth camps are quite accessible from any place in the United States. In Canada the Ontario youth camp is to be held again at Erie Beach.

The growing extensiveness of camping is meaningless, though, unless camping is a means of furthering Christ's work on earth. It is true that among the important reasons campers attend are to have fun, adventure, a change from the day-by-day living pattern, to make new friends and enjoy the old. There is nothing wrong with these desires, in fact, they are to be commended. All these activities and desires help persons to learn to live together. Dr. David L. MacFarlane, president of the Kansas State Teachers' College at Emporia once said, "Education is the process that teaches us to live with each other." The definition of Christian education would add little to this.

Camp programs are planned to include the fun—swimming and all the rest. To these are added nature appreciation activities. All that God has provided through nature for the benefit of man can never be fully appreciated, but as man studies and observes, appreciation grows. From the appreciation of God's handiwork, it is easy to come to love God.

Suggested program helps are supplied by the Department of Religious Education, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, for the use of each camp. To be developed in class and discussion periods is the study "Jesus Reveals Himself," divided into these sections: "Through Acknowledging the Father," "Through His Sonship with the Father," "Through His Mission on Earth," "Through the Examples of His Life," "Through His Teachings," and "Through His Prayers."

The over-all theme, "Faith For Our Times," ties the work of the church and church beliefs into present-day living, endeavoring to be of maximum help to the individual camper.

Each fifteen-through-eighteen-year-old boy or girl is invited to attend one of the church youth camps—and to bring along his member and nonmember friends.

The Stewardship of Happiness

By Mrs. Donald V. Lents

AS LATTER DAY SAINTS we think and hear much about stewardship—not only of our financial life but of all phases of living. I like to think of the stewardship of homemakers as the stewardship of happiness, not for ourselves alone, but for our husbands, our children, and any others who are part of our home life.

We find our call to stewardship in Psalm 24: 1-5.

The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof, the world, and they that dwell therein. For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods. Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully. He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, and righteousness from the God of his salvation.

Since the world is the Lord's, and we are only loaned the use of it for our short sojourn here, we must accept the responsibility of being the best possible stewards.

When asked, "What is home?" one young boy wrote, "Home is a place that my father likes to work to support, that my mother likes to work to keep comfortable, and where we all like to be." Could it be better stated what the "ideal" home means to each member of the family?

briefly. The first is health. The joys in accepting its responsibility are well described in these four lines from the poem, "My Career," by Elizabeth A. Thomas:

I longed to write a noted book
But what I did was learn to cook!
Yet when I see boys' hungry eyes,
I'm glad I make good apple pies!

Our success in the stewardship of health calls for meals that are nutritionally adequate and served artistically. In this day of high prices and shortages, our stewardship in this field is harder to fulfill—but it is more important than ever before because of the pressure under which we live. With all of the information available to us today on the preservation of food values in food preparation, there is no excuse for incidents such as the one told me recently by a doctor friend. A worried young mother called the doctor to check on her son who was not progressing satisfactorily. With other routine questions the doctor asked if the baby had been drinking a sufficient quantity of orange juice daily, for it appeared that his trouble was scurvy—a disease easily prevented by the adequate intake of Vitamin C. The mother replied, "Why, yes—I give him a whole bottle of orange pop every day."

IN THE AREA OF FINANCES or good management, we find much information available to help us in planning our income and expenditures for the greatest benefit of the entire family. Blessed is the wife who can manage the family income and expense so as to live happily. It often involves learning many short cuts in economy and a thorough examination and evaluation of the needs and desires of all family members—but it must be done ungrudgingly if the stewardship of happiness is to be successful. Children should be allowed to help decide which needs in the family group must receive prime consideration in the budget. Perhaps they will be less demanding and more understanding and co-operative if they are "in the know" of today's budgetary problems. They may very well offer helpful suggestions.

Home should be a place of physical attractiveness, since the beauty of our surroundings has much to do with our happiness. Our home should be neatly furnished (not necessarily expensively). The facilities, meager as they may be, should be made as adequate as possible for each member of the family. Old, sturdy pieces of furniture can be refinished when dollars do not stretch to replace the outdated pieces. Good unfinished furniture provides great opportunity for expanding the limited family furniture allowance. Beauty at home can only be accomplished by cleanliness and neatness in conjunction with good taste. Housekeeping is made easier when we provide a place for everything and insist that all things be kept in that place. Small fingers and short arms soon learn habits of neatness by consistent attention to this practice.

THERE ARE SEVERAL FIELDS included in our stewardship of happiness which we shall mention

Home Column

PERHAPS MOST IMPORTANT of all in our stewardship of happiness is the stewardship of attitudes—for all we are and do result from our attitudes. Our spiritual teachings, social consciousness, and community-mindedness are largely a result of the attitudes and actions observed and heard at home.

A small boy came home from the vacant lot ball game of his neighborhood several consecutive nights bubbling over with praises of a player named "Sam." The mother, a good woman concerned over the quality of her son's playmates, went to the lot one evening to quietly observe the game. She was greatly chagrined to discover that "Sam" was a very black little Negro boy. That evening when her son began praising Sam, she interrupted him with the statement, "Son, don't you know Sam is a Negro?" The little lad, wide-eyed and concerned, replied, "Why, mother, I don't care what color Sam is—he's the best ball player on our team."

Are we careful to seek out true values before reflecting attitudes of unfair discrimination? In this respect our stewardship of conversation becomes of primary importance in our homes. It is best to speak constructively and affirmatively, even when we feel criticism must be aired in front of our family. If we must talk, we can talk to ourselves for awhile, then blush if we wish, and after that make a change for the better.

I recommend that everyone read the requirements of a saintly home as listed in the Church Member's Manual, then accept the challenge of this list. All God requires of us is that we try to the best of our ability. When we do, he gives us his help and promises us the sure reward of "receiving his blessing and righteousness from the God of his salvation."

Prayer will make a man cease from sin, or sin will entice a man to cease from prayer.—John Bunyan.

Leaving Out Godliness

By Maude D. Anderson

A RECENT NEWS ITEM comments on the remarks of a professed atheist who is campaigning against the teaching of religion in the public schools. Naturally, no right-thinking person wants the creeds taught in the public schools, but if this nation is to survive, people will have to recognize the fact that the bulwark of our "Declaration of Independence" and the Constitution is Christianity in its simplest and highest form—minus creeds. The Constitution guarantees the right of every individual to worship God after the dictates of his own conscience, but it does not delegate to the atheist the right to deprive children of learning that there is a Supreme Power to which they are accountable for their acts. It recognizes the responsibility of the individual to society as a whole; it encourages the development of the urge to do right through choice, rather than because forced to do so by a dictator.

Many have begun to realize that this nation which was founded as a Christian nation has departed from the ideals and high standards of those who came to these shores in order that they might worship God. During the past years, we have become so intent on acquiring the material things of life that the importance of cultural and spiritual things have been overlooked. The schools teach children how to make money, but fail generally in teaching how to live successfully. The major portion of our young people are not Christians but neither are they pagan; for the pagan at least has his idols to cling to. These young people have nothing. The atheist is to be pitied rather than censured, for his parents and teachers have deprived him of the greatest wealth life has to offer. There are all too many of these young Americans who have nothing to which they can cling, and thus their minds are a fertile territory for undemocratic doctrines.

MANY PEOPLE have come to realize in recent months that, if our way of life is to survive, there must be a great spiritual awakening, and that there is more to living than the acquiring of material possessions, important though these may be. A generation ago, even those with a limited education had some knowledge of the cultural attainments of the past and were in a position to know why and in what way other civilizations had succeeded and failed and were thus better fitted to make a contribution to their own civilization. Recently I heard a high school teacher remark that his students had no idea who Samson was until the movie, "Samson and Delilah," came to town.

While it is only right that religion of a controversial nature should be kept out of the public schools, American children are entitled to have some knowledge of its basic principles as well as the cultures of other people. All denominations can agree on enough of the structural principles of Christianity to give the young people of this country something to cling to. It takes more than a knowledge of how to operate some machine in order to make more money in order to keep more night clubs running for people to be happy. Such will not maintain a civilization worthy of the protection of its Creator.

After the crisis had passed in World War II, I heard an army chaplain remark that it was not our defenses that kept our enemies from "following up" and doing as they had planned on the coast after Pearl Harbor, but merely the fact that God did not will it that way. Let us pray that should the need arise again we may merit His intervention.

Build a Church for $8,000

By Lawrence F. Smith

← Sketch of a church with solid stabilized soil walls.

IMPossible!" YOU SAY? I say teamwork plus some ambition and good planning will bring a beautiful, inexpensive church to your branch. How can this be accomplished? Have you ever given any serious thought to the building material, known for centuries, called earth? You may say that with all the building materials now available and with so much knowledge of their use by skilled labor, why consider earth construction? With the influx of commercial materials, building with earth almost became a lost art until the revival of interest in it during the past fifteen years. Commercially produced materials have cheapened in cost and have become popular through advertising. As a result the advantages of this native material have been overlooked. It is said that the first building erected by the white immigrants in the United States is the Palace of the Governors built in Santa Fe, New Mexico, in 1609 of adobe brick, and it is still in good condition. Examples of such structures have been built since 1920 in Washington, D. C., Michigan, North Dakota, Idaho, Illinois, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, and all the southwestern states. A more recent structure is the new engineering experiment station laboratory at the University of Kansas which has walls made of soil-cement building blocks.

Within the last few years a process called stabilized soil construction has been developed as a great improvement over adobe. As a result it is now possible to build with this material in a climate which has over twenty inches of rainfall a year; this is one of the limitations of adobe construction. Stabilized soil is a process that makes soil hard, water-resistant, and free from changes such as shrinkage and swelling. Tar, asphalt, or Portland cement in quantities ranging from 10 to 50 per cent are the most common and economical products used in this process. One of the chief assets of stabilized adobe construction in some instances is the availability of the material near to the site, which eliminates transportation problems and expense. Other important features of earth construction are that attractive, sanitary, comfortable, fire-resistant, dry, soundproof, and thermally insulated structures may be built of this material.

THERE ARE MANY MORE ADVANTAGES to this type of construction than I have mentioned, but of course there are disadvantages also. The chief one is that stabilized soil must be made to the same consistency throughout. This is so important that it may determine whether the building is to stand for five or one hundred years. Consequently there is need for strict supervision or leadership when building with this material. However, this need not be a real disadvantage, because through good planning and teamwork, this material permits "self-builders." Not only is it possible to provide a beautiful, inexpensive church for your community, but there is also the satisfaction of having helped in the actual construction of a place to worship. The cost of stabilized soil construction will depend greatly on planning and supervision. Any person familiar with the principles of standard construction can utilize the methods of earth construction with assurance of success. There are several government bulletins available with the most recent accounts of various techniques of building with stabilized soil.

Here Is the Writer

Lawrence Smith will complete his course in architecture at the University of Kansas this year. When he was very young he showed his artistic talent in various ways such as clay modeling, wood carving, and playing musical instruments. He began his college training at Graceland where he was a student for one year.

It was during this period that he decided to prepare himself to be an architect. This decision greatly pleased his father, Henry C. Smith, who is the Church Architect. Lawrence feels that there is a need for good planning in church building and is deeply interested in investigating all of the possibilities of building construction.

Religion Can Be Beautiful

By Naomi Russell

I CAN REMEMBER as a child that church was a place of hard benches to which I stuck in summer and on which I shivered in winter. When I grew tall enough to see over the back of the bench in front of me, I discovered church was a place with water-stained walls and faded green shades. The only really attractive thing I can remember about it was the occasional vase of flowers some thoughtful person would bring when flowers were in season. Undoubtedly there was a good spirit present, but I failed to recognize it because I was too busy trying to figure out if the water mark around the leak in the ceiling looked like a dog's head or a monkey's. It was a pleasant surprise years later when I visited the church of my childhood to find that it had been entirely re-decorated, even to new lights and floor covering. "Here," I thought to myself, "is a place where even children should like to worship. Maybe if it had been like this when I was growing up, I wouldn't have disliked going to church so much."

Another early impression of church I'd rather forget is being shouted at from the pulpit. I think I must have taken it as a personal insult that the minister considered it necessary to scowl and pound his fists and bellow. I can remember nudging the parent nearest me and asking, "What's he so mad about?" I'm still allergic to this sort of ecclesiastical sounding-off. Fortunately fewer and fewer ministers are indulging in it, and probably within another fifty years it will be as outmoded as lengthy prayers and testimonies.

RELIGION CAN BE BEAUTIFUL, and certainly it should be. An attractive church is only as far away as people's willingness to get busy and make it so. It may take a little money, but mostly it takes initiative. The plainest building can become a shining sanctuary under the hands of members who are willing to roll up their sleeves and go to work. Paint, polish, soap, and water can transform a neglected church into a shrine worthy of the presence of Divinity. And people who are willing to serve in so humble a manner will find themselves richer for the experience. I once heard a woman say that she and her sister spent a part of each Saturday cleaning the church (because the congregation couldn't afford a janitor), and that the service they gave on Saturday often brought greater spiritual rewards than their attendance on Sunday.

Landscaping is almost as important as a good paint job and shining windows. A carefully kept lawn with shrubs around a church will make passers-by conscious of the fact that the people who attend it care enough to make it a place of beauty. This is sufficient advertisement to encourage some to attend services.

A comfortable church with seats that neither induce sleep nor produce a backache invites the visitor to stay. Adequate heating in winter and ventilation in summer are courtesies to be expected. Good lighting is a factor too often overlooked. The person who faces a glare of poorly placed, insufficiently shielded lights will likely close his eyes soon after the opening song and keep them shut most of the service. If he is too conscientious to close his eyes, he will probably get a headache, in which case he won't remember much of what is being said to him.

THE MINISTER, of course, has the best opportunity to make religion beautiful for his listeners. He can help them discover God as a kind, all-wise father, or he can preach hell fire to them until they are afraid to smile. He can speak with poise and assurance that will make them eager to hear every word, or he can give them a disorganized jumble of thoughts and unfinished sentences that will keep them watching the clock and wondering how much longer he can go on saying nothing. It is not so easy to groom a minister for his job as it is to groom a church. However, there are aids he can use, if he will, to improve his delivery. Lessons in the art of public speaking, plus a knowledge of his subject, plus the blessing of heaven (which he has a right to expect if he does his part) will make almost any minister a speaker worth listening to.

MUSIC IS THE DESSERT of any service—if it is presented as it should be. It sets the stage for worship before any words are spoken; it adds its benediction at the close and gives its listeners something pleasant to carry away with them. People who care little about doctrine often go to church to hear the music because it brings them something they can't find elsewhere—a release from tension, an appreciation for the good and beautiful, the will to live a better life. Bitterness can be turned to love, frustration to purpose, and grief to hope because of a song. Music is a ministry demanding the best of those who would serve because its reaching power is so limitless.

Religion can be beautiful, and any organization that is content to let it be less than that is not worthy to ask God's blessing upon its endeavor.

New Horizons

Movement and remain unmoved or unstirred by a sense of urgency? How can we stand idly by and watch the obvious preparations the Lord is making to raise the curtain on the final and dramatic scenes of his dealings with the children of men?

Surely a great new day looms on the horizon, the day of which and for which prophets and holy men of old have dreamed and yearned, the great day of the redemption of Zion toward which the ages have been rolling since time immemorial. In the face of such glorious challenges, opportunities, and possibilities surely our watchword should be, "Prepare ye, prepare ye, for that which is to come." Zion is to come. What could be more glorious than that the Lord should find us worthy and prepared to participate in this establishing of the Lord's house in the tops of the mountains that all nations might see its light and come to it? On the other hand, what could be more bitter than that such an hour should find us with too little too late, and like the five foolish virgins, we should find ourselves without the gates where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth?

Information Needed for New Student Directory

The general church Committee on Ministry to College Students is preparing a Campus and Student Directory to be issued this spring to assist students planning to attend college, or to transfer upon graduation from Graceland, in selecting schools where there will be church congregations and students groups.

Church members are invited to submit to Dr. Lawrence Brockway, Department of Chemistry, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan, before May 1, the names of students enrolled in colleges and universities anywhere in the country as a double check to make certain that they are included in the Directory since its usefulness in showing the distribution of students will depend upon its completeness. Information concerning the major field of study and the year of graduation of the students reported should be added where possible.

This Committee, composed of all volunteers busy in their own fields, is doing an excellent work in serving our young people in schools of higher education across the country. We urge your assistance and support.

* CRITICISM

The young child generally has a choice of only two critical ideas. He either likes a thing or he dislikes it. Unless he is very precocious, this is his normal experience.

But as he grows to maturity and his cultural development takes place, he finds that there are many other observations to be made in understanding and appreciating art, music, architecture, literature, and people. Sometimes he forgets to say whether he likes a thing or not. Sometimes he defers judgment and really doesn't know if he likes what he is considering. It may not be very important.

Too many of us remain on the childhood level of judgment. We like or dislike things or people without understanding them.

As far as possible, let us grow in critical maturity. Before liking or disliking, let us know and understand.

* POPULARIZATION

Sallman's pictures of Christ appear everywhere: in the larger and more costly frames, and on little cards and mirrors in the dime store. Is this good or bad? Does it cheapen Christ?

Composers of popular songs "borrow" (forgive the euphemism, please) many lovely themes from the classics and "swing" the wonderful old melodies for uncritical listeners. Is this good or bad?

Arguments go both ways. We remember a statement made by the eminent critic and composer, Deems Taylor. We don't have his exact words, but this was his idea: People hear a popular form of a tune lifted from the classics. They love it. They hum it and remember it. It haunts them with beauty. They would probably never hear it at all in its original form, or might not like it at first. But they can appreciate the popular form After a time they hear the original, and they awaken to a new and wonderful experience—the discovery of really good music.

So it is with these little pictures of Christ. People see him who might not otherwise see him at all. Perhaps there is a cheapening—or is there? Can anything really cheapen Christ? These people see him and find something in him to love. Thus some of them will one day come to know him better in his true greatness as they find him in the gospel.

* Whenever Friendship sends a compliment your way, Vanity will tell you that you deserve it.

* CHEERING SECTION

Irby Mundy has a fine idea he has worked on consistently for the last two years. When he finishes his daily reading of the worship message in "Daily Bread," he sends a post card expressing appreciation to the writer of those that he particularly enjoys, and he seems to enjoy most of them.

Last Conference the editors invited the cowboy friend to attend the Writers' Reception which was held at the Auditorium following the Wednesday business meeting. Irby is not a writer, but he made a good cheerleader, and he seemed to enjoy the meeting of many of those who had contributed to "Daily Bread" and other Herald publications.

Thelona D. Stevens

THIS IS "THE STUDY LADY" who practices what she preaches. Firm in the faith that she has been called to prepare and to teach The Three Books, she has made this her life's work and is always teaching and writing. She has been at this desk in the Department of Religious Education since June, 1942, and during this time has written Bible Studies (1945) and Book of Mormon Studies (1948).

Thelona was born in Fort Worth, Texas, baptized in Independence, and graduated from high school in Dallas, Texas. She then finished business college and took three years of special courses, but her educational efforts have been hindered because of an illness which resulted in an impairment of her hearing. Her hobbies are "studying worth-while things, particularly the Scriptures," and needlecraft.

She wanted to spend the winter of 1921 in Florida, "got sand in her shoes," and remained nearly twenty years. In 1923 she was married to Frederick L. Stevens, chief steward of a large ocean-going yacht which traveled to many foreign ports. His long absences from home, together with "a strong determination to hold to my faith in the church," spurred her on to an unusual amount of study. They have one daughter, Mrs. Richard E. Matson, who is teaching at the University of Missouri while studying for her doctor's degree.

About ten years ago the Stevenses moved to Independence to live in property they had purchased the year before as an investment. In a few months Elder C. B. Woodstock's health failed and Sister Stevens was asked to "help out for a time" in the Department of Religious Education office—and she's still working there. She has long prepared or directed in the preparation of the "Worship Suggestions" which were carried in the Herald until a year ago when they were transferred to Guidelines.

Sister Stevens has been largely responsible for the development of the Christian Education and Leadership Training Curriculum set forth in Bulletin No. 103. Through her stimulus, many persons throughout the church have taken creditable courses of study to better prepare them for various positions of leadership in the church.

Editorial

What Are You Worth?

"Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? . . . Fear not therefore: ye are of more value than many sparrows."—Luke 12: 6, 7.

WHAT ARE YOU WORTH? Somebody has set a price on your head. How much is it?

You can rent yourself to a factory for so-many-odd dollars a week. A gangster would kill you for a certain fee. The government will pay you so much to enter the armed services, if you can qualify. A fertilizer factory would pay very little for you. Hitler, we are told, placed so low a value on the Jews that he used their bodies for industrial purposes.

Different prices have been set upon you by different kinds of people. Your mother would set your value high. Your enemy would set it low.

Who sets the highest value on a human being? Christ. He sets the highest price upon you because his purpose for you is eternal life.

* * * * *

JESUS SPOKE of the sparrows. We pay little attention to them because they are so common. Otherwise kind people will not leave the sidewalk to keep a cat from eating one of them. The sparrow's obsession that there are not enough of his kind in the world has greatly reduced his value.

Probably sparrows were as abundant in the time of Jesus as they are now. People saw them everywhere. So it was quite natural for him to use them as an object lesson.

"Look," he said to his disciples: "Sparrows are so cheap that you can get five of them for a farthing. Yet God remembers each one of them.

Don't be afraid. You are worth more than many sparrows."

Human life was cheap in Palestine in the time of Jesus. He was trying to remedy that situation.

* * * * *

TO THE ROMAN EMPIRE life was cheap. A man was not worth much. The individual was unimportant except as he contributed something to the state. Caesarism is always like that. Could that be one of the reasons why Rome fell . . . and ought to fall?

To God, things are different. "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord."—Isaiah 55: 8. The most precious thing in the world is personality. Anything that hurts or restricts it is evil. Anything that promotes its development toward righteousness, truth, and service, is good. We know that personality is important because one great Personality created everything.

* * * * *

THE VALUE of material things is relative. It shifts and changes. Wheat is priced in terms of gold. Gold is also valued in terms of wheat. Increase the supply of either, and its worth per unit goes down.

There is no value in any material thing—gold or silver, gems or wealth, material possessions or power—except as it relates to personality. Things are useless, utterly unimportant, by themselves. If people were to disappear from the earth, precious metals and stones would amount to nothing.

* * * * *

FROM A MORAL VIEWPOINT we must say that spiritual values are fixed and absolute. The worth of truth, righteousness, and justice do not fluctuate.

The soul of a person is a spiritual value. We must assume that it has an absolute worth to God, and that therefore it should have an absolute worth to Christian people.

In heavily populated parts of the world, the value of one man is low. In sparsely settled areas, a good man is highly esteemed.

The world is quite ready to place all its regard for an individual on his physical and material worth. The commercial world does not care for souls. It is not interested in spiritual values. It is willing to buy and sell people for as little as possible.

* * * * *

ONE OF THE GREAT TASKS of Christianity in the world is to hold up the value of human personality. We must work against the cold, calculating forces that depreciate human value. We must insist on the absolute worth of the immortal soul. We must remember the worth of the human mind.

If we would be valued, we must value others. If we make other men cheap and little, we become cheap and little, too. Booker T. Washington once said, "You cannot hold another man down in the ditch without going down into the ditch yourself."

Be sure that you respect human life and personality. It is Christ's way. This must be one of the foundations of the kingdom of God.

Begin Prebaptismal Classes Now for Children's Day June 10

Now is the time to start. Unless something is done soon, it will be too late. Prebaptismal classes for children should be organized and conducted immediately if those who are looking forward to Children's Day on June 10 are to be given adequate preparation for membership in the church. Pastors, church school superintendents, church school teachers, and parents should act soon.

There is always a danger that when children are reaching the "age of accountability," they will be urged to accept baptism and will submit to it without knowing what it should mean in their lives. Membership in the church cannot count for much in their thinking.

There are some practical steps that can be taken. A prebaptismal class should be organized immediately and taught by the pastor or some capable officer or member of the church. Preferably, the teacher should be a member of the priesthood. Local conditions will determine the best selection.

This course should include instruction leading to some understanding of the fundamentals of the faith, the meaning of repentance, baptism, and membership in the church. Some effort should be made to promote and develop a feeling of love and loyalty to the church and its ministry.

Highly recommended as a basis of instruction for these classes is the prebaptismal manual, "This Is Jesus' Church," available at the Herald Publishing House.

Pastors and church school officers should move immediately to organize the prebaptismal class for this year in order that the Children's Day program may be both significant and beautiful.

A Library for the Branch

The George Morey Memorial Library is a new feature of the Pleasanton, Iowa, Branch, once known as the Little River branch. Sister Lucy Keown of Des Moines established the library in memory of her father, George Morey, and to perpetuate the heritage of the Restoration. The library contains pictures of famous church men as well as much valuable church literature.

The late Samuel Burgess was the guest speaker at the dedication of the library on June 5, 1949. Many of the books in the library are church books that have been out of print for years. Descendants of the church pioneers have donated numerous books, and some contain the signatures of outstanding men of the past. Several interesting books were presented by Jessie and Lee H. Campbell and contain the signatures of their parents Duncan and Lida Campbell. Brother Duncan Campbell was president of the branch when Sister Keown was a child.

President Robert Farnham, of the Lamoni Stake, commended Sister Keown on the establishment of the library. Brother Farnham stated that many of the valuable, old, historical books of the church have been sold and lost. The library can serve the branch in many ways.

Sister Keown is interested in contributions of church books, particularly books from church families in Decatur County.

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Mrs. Jennie Weed Haan of Rock Rapids, Iowa, writes under date of April 13:

I was unexpectedly a recent patient in "our San" for ten days. To you, as President of the Board of the Hospital, I would like to pay my tribute to the institution. Having spent many years as a nurse in several different hospitals over the country, I feel I am qualified as a critic. Brother Smith, the Sanitarium is an institution to be proud of. The staff members—as many as I became acquainted with—are second to none. I had every attention I needed. Knowing life as I do, I am sure the nurses have problems of their own to solve, but there was never a hint of it in their hours on duty. They are capable and willing.

I received spiritual help. Brother Lents is a very spiritual man, and his administration was humble and comforting.

I did not mention the fact that I was the first superintendent, but it got around by grapevine.

The following is excerpted from a letter from Evangelist Ray Whiting who conducted a series in Rock Island District with Brother Lyle Woodstock:

We usually have one or two meetings or calls in the afternoon and often two cottage meetings in the evening. Four people have been baptized so far, and several more have given their names.

This is the type of activity that will bring about the baptismal record we are looking for for this year.

The following paragraph is from a letter dated April 9 from Elder Frank McDonald, pastor of the St. Louis Branch:

There were four baptisms in the month of March: a young couple, husband and wife; a husband to complete another family circle; and one young man, a Mormon boy who is stationed at Scott Air Base. He is a very fine young man with possibilities, who is engaged to one of our girls. We feel happy over these baptisms.

From letter of Apostle Arthur A. Oakman, March 27, 1951:

I just returned from a series of meetings in London, Ontario, the results of which are extremely gratifying. Eleven people, eight of them adults, were secured for baptism and the general tone of the group was, I believe, very much uplifted. The objective in this series was not the conversion of people to the church, but rather the enlargement of vision and the inspiration which comes therewith.

The Field Is White

By Clark E. (Tommy) Vincent

doom and the destruction of civilization to an attitude of withdrawal and self-righteousness. (Historically, it would appear that the step can be taken as readily from the latter to the former.)

Not an Assumption of Progress

It is not my intention here to attempt to "prove" that things are getting better and better in an evolutionary progression. Viewing material innovations and technological advances this might be feasible, but when we view qualitative traits and trends, any attempt to "prove" unilateral progress becomes a discussion of assumed values.

PROPHETS OF GLOOM, doom, and despair are having a field day! For posterity they have labeled our time as the "neurotic, aspirin age." With drab and worried colors they have portrayed us as "nervous jitter-birds sitting astride a high tension wire chewing bubble gum," lacking even the gourd-sheltered composure of a Jonah, because the destruction of modern Nineveh includes ourselves.

Many modern media of communication thrive on this intensification of our apprehension and divert our time perspective to daily and even hourly segments. Too frequently even from the pulpit comes the cowering cry of despair, fright, and immediacy when an assuring voice and Pisgah view are most needed.

We are made to tremble by the ominous sounds of approaching destruction, but are solaced when we remember that someone said, or somewhere we read, something about everyone being destroyed in these "last days" except the righteous few. This encourages us, because surely we must be those few.

Convinced by means of selective reading and listening that the kingdom of God will come for the few when everyone else is destroyed or in the process of destroying each other, we come to identify ourselves as the righteous few and "the others" as evildoers destined for destruction. It appears to be a short step from a belief in impending

Surely some of the inhabitants of Enoch's city and some of the participants in the Nephite Golden Age reached both above and below our spiritual progress at given moments. The "proof" of whether we are on the road to decay or progress is beyond the scope of this particular article, but I am convinced that the philosophy of doom and its concomitant attitude of withdrawal is disastrous as well as the antithesis of the gospel message of "good news." Though perhaps we cannot prove that "day by day we are getting better and better" as individuals or as a collective society, such an attitude does far more to promote such a condition than the message of the prophets of gloom.

Can Zion Come Out of Chaos?

In an interesting article entitled, "Creation and Destiny," Apostle Arthur A. Oakman has stated:

Some people would tell us that Zion will be built on a heap of ruins, that the government and the constitution and the economy of the nation are going clear out of existence; and that when we have nothing left, other people who have nothing are coming to us, and out of nothing, we are going to build the Kingdom. *That is absolutely untrue.*¹ (Emphasis mine.—C.E.V.)

History indicates in part that positive preparation, rather than negative destruction, has preceded many Christian events. The preparation throughout the Old Testament for the coming of Christ and the work of the reformers before the Restoration are suggestive of this trend.

There is also an idea expressed in modern-day revelation which suggests that positive conditions precede heralded Christian events. In April of 1829 Oliver Cowdery and Joseph Smith were told, "Behold the field is white already to harvest, therefore, whoso desireth to reap . . ." ²

But apparently the Lord felt the idea important enough that it deserved reiteration to additional men and at other times: to Hyrum Smith in May, 1829, "Behold the field is white . . ." ³ to Joseph Knight, Sr., in May, 1829, "Behold the field is white . . ." ⁴ and to David Whitmer in June, 1829, "Behold the field is white . . ." ⁵ The language changes a little sixty years later, but the thought remains the same as given to another Joseph Smith in April, 1894, "the field so white unto the harvest. . . ." ⁶ Over twenty-five years later on October 2, 1922, the language changes in the message given through Frederick M. Smith, but again the idea remains, "The field is large and the time opportune." ⁷

The period of time over which the message is given suggests the time perspective of the Father. A message that many would like to interpret as applicable only to their particular hour is reiterated through revelation for almost one hundred years. (To be sure, the idea has been expressed in other terms for a much longer time.)

Agrarian Terms

The texts suggest at least two questions. First, "What is a field like that is 'white already to harvest'?" These are agrarian terms, so we go to those associated with farming and farming methods. We find, in contradistinction to our prophets of gloom, that a field white already to harvest is not rotten, evil, wicked, and perverse, but in a condition as near to perfection as it can get without being brought in or harvested. Since the message of God concerns people, the texts do not suggest that people in the world today are rotten, evil, and of little worth, but rather that there are many who are "good," or "ripe," and ready to be brought to a knowledge of the fullness of the gospel. In fact, there are so many ready to be brought in, or harvested, that "the laborers are few."

Second, "Where are the fields, or where is that which is to be brought in or harvested?" Again the farmer answers that it is not in the shelter of the farmhouse or barn, but "in the fields." These people who are "good" or "ripe" are not only the members within the household but those in the fields of everyday activity. Even as the farmer must go into the fields to harvest the grain that is white, so we must go into the market places, civic organizations, professions, government, and schools—not only with dogma but with a way of life.

Unfortunately we have listened sometimes too well to the cries of destruction and "unclean" and have withdrawn from active participation in these organizations and fellowship with these people. Like Jonah, we await their destruction.

When Are They Ready to Harvest?

As we look at "other" organizations, churches, and people in the world today, how shall we know when they are white, ready for harvest? Jesus gave us the measuring device in his Sermon on the Mount: "Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them." Emerging from our shroud of self-righteousness long enough to look at the fruits of other people, organizations, and churches, we may be pleasantly surprised at the whiteness of their fruitage. We may even remember with shameful faces the warning of the philosopher, William James, who long ago noted our inclination to judge people by their heritage or roots, instead of by their works or fruits.⁸

We may also judge our time and our particular civilization by its fruit. If for just a moment we can remove the bifocals of gloom and replace the worm's-eye view with the bird's-eye view, we may find that conditions are not as desperate or as evil as many would have us think.

The Family

Many would tell us that ours is a decaying civilization because of our soaring divorce rates. Our gloomy spokesmen point to the figure of over 450,000 divorces in a given year as against less than 2,000,000 marriages for the same year. They tell us this means that almost one out of every three marriages ends in divorce. What they don't tell us is that the 450,000 divorces occurred not from the 2,000,000 marriages of that year but from a total of over 35,000,000 married families in the United States at that time. This of course is the opposite misuse of the statistics, but closer examination does reveal that the ratio is not 1 to 3 for even the highest year. We also hear little of the fact that the divorce rate has decreased since the high of 1946-1947.

Even more important is a recognition that we do not know what the rate of divorce might have been in 1900 if women had been as independent economically as they are today, and if legal and moral sanctions had granted divorces as easily then as now. There is evidence that families stay together today because they want to, not because of social pressure, legal barriers, and economic dependency. Such internal control in the face of increased possibilities for good or evil surely produces lives of higher quality than does external control.

This is not an argument for divorce—the effects upon the lives of children of divorced parents are all too evident—but it is an attempt to point out that perhaps internal control in the family of today has replaced the external pressures of earlier years. If family structures are more democratic today and if husbands and wives are held together by positive love for each other rather than negative pressures, a strong case might be made for progress in contemporary family life. Divorce rates are higher today than fifty years ago, but under like conditions they might have been much higher fifty years ago; thus the divorce rate itself is not an indicator of the progress or decay of a civilization.

Mental Illness

Many would say that a sure sign of our decaying civilization is the increase in mental patients. Here again the statistics are misleading. Today the emphasis is upon finding such persons and treating them. Thus the number of mentally ill who are confined shows an increase over the days when they were left at home or secluded in back rooms without treatment with little chance for rehabilitation and return to society.

Even today we have little enough data on the percentage of mentally ill in our total population. Our earlier conception that they were to be punished as "possessors of evil spirits" has left us with normative attitudes that make it difficult to locate and treat those who are mentally ill. We can expect an increasing rate in coming years as our attitudes mellow and it becomes as respectable to be treated for mental illness as for physical illness. The increasing rate reflects as much our more Christian attitude toward mental illness as it reflects an increase in mental illness itself.

Crime

Similarly those using the increase in crime as an argument for the decay of western civilization forget the scientific methods of apprehension and detection as well as the tremendous increase in population and opportunities for crime. Proportionate population figures to rates of crime fifty years ago give a much brighter picture of the present. We also forget our added awareness of crime that happens anywhere, any time, because of our improved media of communication.

Even more important is our treatment of those guilty of violations against society. Not too many decades ago the people of England gathered every Saturday to watch the "public hangings" of those found guilty of "picking pockets." In our own country we blush as we remember our unfortunate forefathers who were put in jail for being in debt. A former "hedonistic calculus" has given way to a philosophy of understanding and treatment. Surely the fruitage here is nearer the method of the Master—to hate sin, but love and care for the sinner.

Prejudice

An examination of the fruit of contemporary American life in the area of prejudice against minority groups is rewarding. We have yet a long way to go, but there is notable progress. The student body presidents of large university campuses such as the University of California at Los Angeles, and others throughout the country recently have been Negroes. In Alabama, Negroes have functioned as jurists in trials condemning a white man to death. Fraternities have been accepting Negroes faster than many churches. Sports have broken down the racial barrier within recent years. Jackie Robinson was chosen baseball's most valuable player in 1949. University faculties are admitting more Negro scholars to their ranks. The Staffordville, Connecticut, Congregational church recently welcomed as its new pastor a Negro chosen by the unanimous vote of church officers and congregation, all of whom are white. There are countless such evidences that suggest the melting of discriminating barriers and the acknowledgment of the reality of universal brotherhood.

Provincialism

The ethnocentrism of communities, states, and even nations is being overcome by a wider interest in other people from distant lands and different patterns of life. The gifts of clothing, food, and money by hundreds of civic organizations and churches throughout the country to people of other lands manifest a growing awareness that we are our brother's keeper.

In giving the charter day address for the University of California two years ago, Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall told of his pride in the youth of America today for their growing spirit of internationalism. A group of Boy Scouts had come to visit his office when he was Secretary of State; looking at those boys seated around his large official desk he remembered well the provincialism of his own boyhood when he knew and was concerned only with the people in his own neighborhood and was suspicious of anyone from another town or county. He related how tears came to his eyes as he remembered this provincialism when the assembled Scouts asked him that day what they could do for the unfortunate boys of their age in countries like Germany and Japan. We are humbled as we note the goodness, "the whiteness," of the people in our world today.

Auto Accidents

Here, surely, the defenders of despair can wield a convincing argument that we are "going to the dogs" and destroying ourselves. But, horrified as we are by the traffic fatalities, our apprehension is always increased by a lack of time perspective. We forget how many more cars are on the road and how many more miles are traveled.

The peak year for horse-travel in the United States was 1909. For every one hundred million horse-travel miles in 1909 there were thirty persons killed. However, during 1949, for every one hundred million motor-travel miles there were only seven persons killed. We are not proud of our traffic fatality rate, but to use it as an indication of our trend toward destruction and decay is misleading.

Graft in Government and Strife in Industry

When we become despondent over the graft in high places today, we need to reread the early history of our own country, the era of the city bosses and government scandal. When money interests in the present global conflict disturb us, we need to regain our perspective by reading again the accounts of cartels during World War I.

Depending upon the vantage point, we hear of the self-interest and greed of management or labor. We talk long of labor-management troubles and forget the hundreds of companies and industries that maintain excellent employer-employee relationships of give and take. We forget the improvements in working conditions and the loosening of the tyrannical hold of men like Ford over the private lives of their employees as recently as two decades ago.

We forget how industry mixed the English and Irish better than church congregations could; how the Protestants of North Germany established industries in the Rhine, and Catholic peasants of surrounding regions worked in them and both groups overcame much of their bitterness against each other. We forget how the mills and factories of India are breaking down the ugly caste system, and how immigrants from the back provinces of countries all over Europe have met and dispelled their fears of each other in the mines, steel mills, and factories of America.

A Challenging Time

The evidence of "goodness" and "badness" is so massive that any attempt such as this to report it becomes selective. But this is not an attempt to "prove" that things are getting better and better. Rather it is a plea for an honest appraisal and awareness of the "whiteness of the fields" as measured by the fruits of people with whom we live and the fruits of our institutions and society in general.

Ours is a challenging time to be alive! Our texts covered almost one hundred years saying that the field is white. It is hard to say whether one time is more ripe than another. Each age has its problems and seeks the answers to those problems. Enoch succeeded in taking advantage of the ripeness of his time, as did the Nephites of the Golden Age. In order to take advantage of the ripeness or whiteness of our time, it would appear that two things at least are crucial: first, a conviction that people are good, or an acknowledgment that the field is white; and, second, going into the fields where these good people are in order to share with them the fullness of truth contained in the Restoration Message.

Paul found a challenge in his religion. He hired the largest lecture halls and coliseums to speak before the leading men and women of his day. We, too, need to be constantly taking a fuller way of life to civic and community leaders. The world has had enough of dogma, but people eagerly await a way of life that should be the fruitage of the Spirit of God and the fullness of truth.

Chosen for Service—Not for Special Reward

After reading considerable church literature and rereading the Book of Mormon, an international Protestant leader recently commented that the church which we represent has a wonderful mission and a great deal to give to the Christian world. However, he felt that many of our members—and too often some of our literature—presents an emphasis that thwarts our efforts to work with others in making a needed contribution as the church of Christ.

First was his observation that as individuals we were among the most humble people he has ever known, but as an organization we are among the most bigoted and self-sanctified. Our literature and membership too often suggest that we are the only organization working for God's purposes at the present time. There is a tendency to give the impression that "we are chosen because we are chosen." Each denomination has gone through a similar attitude before it realized that other organizations are receiving guidance from God and also have a work to do. Being a "chosen people" is a matter of being chosen for work and service—not chosen for special considerations and rewards.

His second observation was that we have a tendency to preach a church to the exclusion of Christ and talk organizational structure to the exclusion of a way of life. Ironic as it is, this particular Protestant leader has argued in the past, and will continue to argue in the future, before international and national assemblages of churchmen that we do believe in Christ.

A careful reading of our literature, especially the Book of Mormon, will make it clearly evident that we do accept and follow Christ and his teachings, but other people too seldom hear this part of the Restoration Message, perhaps because we are often too busy "proving" the Book of Mormon (or using it to prove us) and too busy proving that we are the chosen people because of our organizational structure. These things are important, but perhaps we have too often been content to live vicariously from our roots and our heritage, forgetting that the world today is looking for the fruitage of a way of life. Whether we withdraw from the fields because we feel we are a chosen people, or feel like the chosen people because we have too often withdrawn is an open question. The point remains that the field is white and the laborers few.

The gospel is good news. The message of Christ is one of hope, faith, and assurance. The gloom and despair of many is the antithesis of the philosophy of Christianity. The multitudes followed the Master not because he foretold the end of time, was moody and pessimistic, but because he was full of assurance: He saw the good—the whiteness—in those about him and had faith in their potentialities.

Even as Jonah was convinced of the inevitable destruction of the people of Nineveh, so our prophets of despair and "last days" would have us await the mass destruction of the "wicked," forgetting that the gospel is to go to all peoples. A withering gourd may yet remind us of God's concern and love for all people. A closer inspection of our own history may reveal that we, too, have occasionally been given third-class whale-style passage and that we, too, have wept over the loss of something we didn't create, yet failed to appreciate God's love for all he has created—even those we have "written off."

The field is white; the time is opportune. We are not called to stand afar off in our sheltered groups or places of refuge with those of like beliefs but to go into the fields where people are. In the words of Walter W. Van Kirk, we have a more active mission than just being "attachés of the mortuary."

People are good wherever we look, and if occasionally we find evil ones, then we are needed there as physicians—not to condemn or to withdraw but to love, to help, and to harvest. To be despondent is to deny the hand of God in history. It is to say he has failed. To withdraw is to identify ourselves with those of the Israelitish people who knew not Jesus when he came because they were the "chosen people" with their own private conception of what righteousness was.

With an awareness of the whiteness of the fields and a better time perspective, we may discard our aspirin-bubble gum and use the live wire we sit astride to tap out messages of hope, confidence in the future, and assurance of God's love for all humanity—which love is his power.

"Duty Hath no Place for Fear"

There have been previous times in the history of our nation when men became fearful and sought to flee for refuge and withdraw from the work before them. John Greenleaf Whittier wrote the story of a plain, simple farmer who was a member of the Connecticut legislature in May, 1789, when the end of the world seemed at hand. It is called Abraham Davenport, and a part of it tells of one of those days when the sky became fearfully dark at midday and men's hearts failed them in fear.

Birds ceased to sing, and all the barnyard fowls
Roosted; the cattle at the pasture bars Low'd, and look'd homeward; bats on leathern wings
Flitt'd abroad; the sound of labor died;
Men pray'd, and women wept; all ears grew sharp
To hear the doom-blast of the trumpet shatter
The black sky, that the dreadful face of Christ
Might look from the rent clouds, not as he look'd
A loving guest at Bethany, but stern
As Justice and inexorable Law.

Meanwhile in the old State House, dim as ghosts,
Sat the lawgivers of Connecticut,
Trembling beneath their legislative robes,
"It is the Lord's Great Day! Let us adjourn,"
Some said; and then, as if with one accord,
All eyes were turned to Abraham Davenport.
He rose, slow cleaving with his steady voice
The intolerable hush: "This well may be
The Day of Judgment which the world awaits;
But be it so or not, I only know
My present duty, and my Lord's command
To occupy till he come. So, at the post
Where he hath set me in his providence,
I choose, for one, to meet him face to face—
No faithless servant frightened from my task,
But ready when the Lord of the harvest calls;
And therefore, with all reverence, I would say
Let God do his work, we will see to ours.
Bring in the candles," And they brought them in.

Then by the flaring lights the Speaker read.
Albeit with husky voice and shaking hands,
An act to amend an act to regulate
The shad and alewife fisheries. Whereupon Wisely and well spake Abraham Davenport.
Straight to the question, with no figures of speech
Save the ten Arab signs, yet not without
The shrewd dry humor natural to the man;
His awe-struck colleagues listening all the while,
Between the pauses of his argument,
To hear the thunder of the wrath of God Break from the hollow trumpet of the cloud.

And there he stands, in memory, to this day—
Erect, self-poised, a rugged face, half seen
Against the background of unnatural dark,
A witness to the ages as they pass
That simple duty hath no place for fear.

The Lord's Prayer

In 1940 the A. J. Holman Company, Bible publishers, printed a new translation of the New Testament. It is called The Modern New Testament according to the Eastern text. It is not a revision, but claims to be a translation from original Aramaic sources by George M. Lamsa. In a lengthy introduction printed in this New Testament, Mr. Lamsa says, "I know Aramaic and I speak it. English is my adopted tongue." I present here the prayer, commonly called the "Lord's Prayer," Matthew 6: 9-13:

Our Father in heaven, Hallowed be thy name.
Thy kingdom come. Let thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth.
Give us bread for our needs from day to day.
And forgive us our offenses, as we have forgiven our offenders.
And do not let us enter into temptation, but deliver us from error. Because thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

While there is a little difference in the wording as recorded by Luke 11: 1-4, Mr. Lamsa's translation of the sixth petition is the same as found in Matthew, and reads:

And do not let us enter into temptation; but deliver us from error.

From the Inside

The picture "The Light of the World," painted by Holman Hunt, shows Christ in a garden at midnight. In His left hand He is holding a lantern and His right hand is knocking on a heavily paneled door.

When the painting was unveiled, an art critic remarked, "Mr. Hunt, you haven't finished your work. There is no handle on that door."

"That," said the artist, "is the door to the human heart—it can be opened only from the inside."—Fairfax Downey, Disaster Fighters (Putnam)

Pioneering in Oklahoma - Part II

By Mrs. Hubert Case

NOT LONG AFTER our Sunday school was organized, some of our members began to make unwise remarks concerning the prowess of our elders in debate. All the people had been friendly, and there was absolutely no need of provoking a discussion. Finally, however, enough was said that some of the old settlers were nettled and remembered that they had once been affiliated with the Christian Church, so they began to boast about their champions. The result was that during our second winter there, a discussion was held between Elder H. O. Smith of Independence and C. R. Nichol of Texas. Some antagonism was stirred up, and the school board decided finally that the schoolhouse should not be used for public worship while school was going on. Brother H. O. Smith organized us into a branch, and for a while we held our Sunday services in Brother Pate's house. My brother, J. E. Montague, was ordained an elder and chosen to preside over the branch.

Soon after the debate, the children and I went with Hubert across the state to attend a quarterly conference, and from there to General Conference at Lamoni, Iowa. We drove our team—stopping for the nights mostly with friends and members along the way. We made many such trips, and there is no part of the United States with which we are so thoroughly acquainted as Oklahoma. We have dragged through her sand, climbed her gypsum hills, and forded her rivers. How we dreaded the Cimarron and the North and South Canadian—all of them wide with flat banks and water concealing quicksands. After the children had crossed them once or twice, they were never quite happy until we had crossed safely the one which lay in our path.

AFTER WE HAD MADE OUR VISIT and were returning home in May, we spent the night at Brother R. M. Maloney's. He felt somewhat nervous about the South Canadian, which was seven miles from his home. Being used to the crossing, he and another brother drove with us when we started that morning. The river was high. One of our horses was steady and dependable; the other was unreliable. As we drove into the water, the one horse held back, the other tried to pull the load and the singletree snapped. In quicksand one must keep moving or sink.

Hubert jumped out and began unhitching the team. Brother Maloney drove his horse and buggy close to our wagon, took the two children over, and helped me step down into the buggy.

Then he drove across and left us on the further side, hastening back to help draw the wagon across before it sank too low in the sand. The water was so deep as we crossed that we stood the children up in the back of the buggy seat, and put our feet on the dashboard. The front end of the buggy dipped tubfuls of water for a short distance.

The men finally got the wagon back on the bank, repaired the broken singletree, and drove on across. Brother Maloney drove ahead with brave little "Topsy"—who made four crossings of that deep water in one morning. All the men were wet to the skin. Brother Maloney and the other brother had to drive seven miles before changing clothes. The little town of Taloga was close to the river so we drove there, and Hubert changed to dry clothes.

THE SPIRIT OF HOSPITALITY was and still is strong in Oklahoma and all the Southwest. If we did not find acquaintances or church members when night drew near, we tried the nearest place that looked as if it had room for travelers. We were almost never turned away. Usually we were warmly welcomed by lonely folks to whom a visitor was an event.

I knew that feeling myself and have often kept people overnight, just from the sheer pleasure of having some woman to talk with. We had been absent from home for quite a long time on this trip. My sister, Mrs. Koestner, and her family had finally moved back to El Reno. My brother and his family were living on her place. We shortly resumed meetings and Sunday school in the Redmoon schoolhouse, as school was over until fall, and there was no objection from those in authority.

The people who were still friendly to us began to attend as before. Some who had been antagonized by the debate remained away. Some Latter Day Saint families were now located on the west side of the Washita River and they began to attend and bring their neighbors. At one time we had a branch at Redmoon numbering more than one hundred.

When school started again in the fall, no one made any objection to the Sunday school's continuing. We kept on as usual except for one Sunday in each month, when the 11 o'clock hour was to be occupied by a Baptist minister, who had been persuaded to include Redmoon in his itinerary. It was rather funny. If we all stayed, the others complained there was no room for them, and the Baptist brother was embarrassed. If we left they had no crowd, and they complained about that. What reason he gave I don't know, but it was not long until he ceased to come.

In the fall of this second year, in order to make our house more comfortable, we adopted a plan which I have never seen used anywhere but in Oklahoma. We hadn't sufficient funds for lath and plaster, or to pay the plasterer. So we got a quantity of lath and building paper, and both of us worked at the lathing, I doing my part on the walls, Hubert working overhead. The laths were placed very close together on the lower part of the walls, but the upper part and on the ceiling we spread them four or five inches apart. Then I made paste out of flour, applied it hot to the building paper, and papered all four rooms. It was astonishing what tight smooth surfaces it made. There was another long wait before we saved enough money to have baseboards, window and door frames inside. But we finally got those. After another period of saving I sent to Sears-Roebuck in Chicago for wallpaper and inside paint. When it came I applied the paint, and with the assistance of my brother's wife, hung the wallpaper. I have never experienced such thorough satisfaction before or since. This was the first house we had ever lived in that was our own. We had built it and added to it little by little, so we liked it.

IN THE FALL of this second year I received word from my sister, Mrs. Vredenburg, that she was going to pay us a visit. Her husband was planning a change of business, and she—with the two younger children—would stay with us two or three months if convenient. I was happy to have her come. The thought of congenial company through the winter was so pleasant that I could hardly wait for her arrival. She came about Christmas time, and for a few weeks we would sit and crochet or embroider for hours after the children were in bed at night, making articles for a bazaar we intended to hold in Cheyenne. We had begun to talk of building a church, and, like all other "ladies aids," we wanted to make money to add to the fund.

My sister had been with me only a few weeks when she rose one morning with a troubled look on her face. She had had a dream—a strange, vivid dream—and she could not forget it. About all she could recall of it was seeing someone very ill at her father-in-law's house. All else was jumbled, and her uneasiness grew in spite of all our reasoning about it. The latter part of the week she received a letter saying that her husband was very ill. We hastened her departure as fast as we could, but it was thirty miles to the railroad and two days and nights of travel before she could reach the old home in Iowa. She arrived on Friday, and her husband died on Sunday.

THE CHILDREN AND I were bitterly lonely when she left. Hubert was away with the team, and we stayed close at home for that reason. Usually some neighbor gave us a ride to church on Sunday. One gray, lowering day, the children were very restless from being shut in, so I wrapped them up and let them go on the south side of the house to play. After awhile I went to the kitchen door to see where they were, and looking north I saw a team coming along the road. I called the children: "Come here and see if you know what I see." They came, gave one look, and began dancing and singing, "Papa and the white ponies." As soon as he arrived, he put away the team and carried in his luggage. He said, "We are going to have a storm. I felt sure of it this morning, and though I had intended to go to Leedy today, I decided to come home instead."

As the day waned, it began to snow. There was a strong north wind. Hubert brought many armfuls of wood into the kitchen, and we kept both stoves going at top speed. How glad we were that he was there! The children stayed up past their usual bedtime, and we popped corn and enjoyed the evening in spite of the howling wind.

Next morning the snow still fell. We could not see as far as the stable. I was indeed glad that I did not have to fight my way through the snow to milk the cow, feed the pig, and carry in wood. Of course I could have done it, but I was surely glad for help and companionship.

We visited as I worked around the house. I was seldom without something to do. By the second evening, however, all the late Heralds had been read, and the man of the house was without occupation. He kept fidgeting around, and I was revolving an idea in my mind. I said nothing however, thinking the storm would cease in the night. We went to bed early and slept late, but when we arose the snow was still falling, and we could see but two or three rods through the blinding veil. After breakfast and morning's work were over, I presented my new plan. "Do you think you could learn to run the sewing machine?" I asked. "Why, I guess so," he replied. "All right, then, if you can, we'll have a new carpet to put down on this floor next spring." For a long time I had been saving and sewing carpet rags in my spare moments. Every housekeeper in my youth had her sacks of carpet rags, and when time permitted, sewed a few. I had several balls sewed and some rags cut in strips. We hauled them all out and began to sew. I showed him how to lap the ends and stitch them—take up the other end and stitch on another, not stopping to cut the threads until he had yards of them. It went slowly for a while, but when he caught the idea of it, I saw I couldn't take time to sew with a needle as I had intended. I began to cut rags; the little girls cut threads and wound the rags into balls. We worked all the time we had that day and continued that evening and the next day. Finally I could find no more rags, and I had as many balls as I felt sure I would need to make the carpet I wanted.

We had done in two days and one evening what I would have been weeks in accomplishing by myself. So I did have the new carpet when we papered and painted the following spring.

Next day the storm abated, clearing by afternoon. An enormous amount of snow had fallen. Hubert got out at once and shoveled paths to the stable and woodpile. It was the last great effort of winter, and in a few days the warm south wind and bright sun sank the great masses of snow right into the ground. There was still quite a bit of cold weather, but none so severe after that.

IT DID NOT SEEM LONG until signs of spring were everywhere. The trees, which we had planted in goodly number, began putting out leaves, and all the spring activities began again. I bought some schoolbooks for the children, and began teaching them regularly every day. We kept up the lessons as long as we were on the claim. When we moved to town, Cicely entered the fourth grade and Dorothy the second, with children of their own age. Before the winter was over, I received a letter from my sister, Mrs. Vredenburgh, saying that she and the children were coming again to visit us. She liked our community, and she and I had always been so close while in our father's home that she felt eager to come, and I was most delighted to have her.

A short time after she came, she heard of an old brother who was alone on his claim, offering to sell his right to the land for a very nominal sum. After talking it over with our brother and others of the neighbors, she decided to buy his right to the land. She gathered up enough housekeeping material to be able to get along for the time she and the children must live on the place. By staying often at our house for a day or night or maybe two days, she managed to get along without being too lonely. It was near enough so that she and the children: Max, 9; Amy, 7; and Charles, 3, could walk back and forth. She stayed until the heat of the summer began, and her half-dugout house became uncomfortably hot. She then decided to pay out on the place and return to Iowa. We all felt sure she had best do that, as she could only rent the place at best, and could not live there.

WE ALL PLANNED to go to the reunion of the west district, which was at Richmond that year. After the reunion she took the train north for Iowa, and we went on to Central Reunion, which was at Piedmont. By now Oklahoma was divided into three districts—Eastern, Central, and Western. It is still so divided after long years. We met many good friends at both reunions, and I canned fruit at the latter one—fruit which the Saints there brought and gave to me. One brother brought all the stalks of rhubarb he could carry—a really tremendous armload. I canned it all, and we used it. There were peaches and early apples, too. Of course, the trees we set out had not had time to produce. So I canned all that was brought to me right there on the reunion grounds. Everyone brought her own cooking facilities in those days, and glass jars were easily obtainable as we were near the town of Piedmont. That was one great advantage of traveling in a covered wagon. We could put the boxes of fruit under the bed in the back of the wagon and forget them until we reached home.

Another advantage in traveling by wagon was getting to know the country. We came to know Oklahoma much better than we ever knew Iowa, our native state.

One year we attended three reunions, and in driving through the farthest eastern portion where we had never gone, we passed through Langston—a town which boasts an entirely Negro population, and the site of the only Negro university in the state. I afterward met some of the graduates—a man and his wife—in Kingfisher, Oklahoma. She was almost white, but their one little girl was as dark as her father, who was really black. It amused me to see her mother tie a little white sunbonnet on her when she went out to play.

When we returned from our round of reunions, we found my brother had rented a farm down on the river a little further away from us than they had lived before. While they were there their daughter, Marjorie, was born. She was the first newborn baby I had ever attended.

THAT WINTER the Redmoon Branch began to push the idea of building a church more centrally located than the Redmoon schoolhouse. We held a bazaar or two at Cheyenne, where we had a few members, and a few dinners at different homes. Of course this was the work of the women of the branch. We still kept up our meetings at Redmoon. Slowly we accumulated a little money, and building materials were very much cheaper then than now.

By this time we had baptized several of the earlier settlers, the first being Sister Jefcoat. Her husband and young daughters soon followed. Then there were the Corby and Edwards families. These all lived on the west side of the Washita, while we newcomers were on the east side. Afterward the Lytle and Amend families came and took claims on the west side.

We were still having services at the schoolhouse. One Sunday, shortly after Children's Day I remained at home. Hubert and the girls hurried home as there was a storm brewing. He unhitched and turned the horses into the pasture. One of the mares had a small colt. As more of the church people came up the road, the clouds were so threatening that my brother's family and one or two others stopped and came in to escape getting wet. It was well they did! It began to rain and then to hail. I have never in my life witnessed such hail. My brother and another man unhitched quickly and put their horses into the stable. Our horses not being able to get in, circled, running neck and neck with the colt pressed close between their bodies to shield it as much as possible from the hail. They were the largest hailstones I ever saw—not round but flat and jagged. They completely ruined the flat deck of our house which was covered with composition roofing. The only compensation was that we had to get a new cover for the deck, and that time we got a good one.

On July 7, after the hailstorm late in June, our youngest daughter was born. We had a hard time agreeing on a name for her and called her "Polly Toodles" until I feared the name would stick to her. Of course we had no doctor, and I was very seriously ill after her birth. I can never express the gratitude I felt toward Sister Hancock and my brother's wife for all they did for me during that illness.

FINALLY I BECAME WELL ENOUGH to begin to prepare for another trip to Iowa. We had been urged to come as soon as possible to see Hubert's sister, Mrs. Emma Hogue, who was very sick with tuberculosis.

It was in late August, 1903, when we started north. We went to the railroad station by team and wagon, and from there to the Stillwater Reunion. Hubert had agreed to be there. We met my father there, too, and I had a chance to show him the new baby. He was very fond of all the grandchildren. Immediately after the reunion we started north.

After visiting Emma a few days, we drove over to Decatur to see Father and Mother Case. From there we went to a town in Missouri where the children and I took the train for Lamoni, and Hubert returned to his field in Oklahoma.

Our visit to Lamoni was prolonged beyond expectation. Mrs. Vredenburg had located there, expecting to make it her home. She was not at all well and was still unreconciled to the death of her husband, although it had been two years since he had died. I did all I could for her, but toward Thanksgiving we left for Oklahoma City to meet the rest of the family.

We had no facilities for sleeping on the train except chair cars. The little girls were soundly sleeping in their chairs, and I was holding the sleeping baby, when along in the night, a lady from across the aisle came over and asked me to let her hold the baby while I took a nap. She said her head ached so she could not sleep. So I let her take the baby and had a good nap. I woke feeling very grateful to the lady, and as I took the baby I noticed the lady had a very bad cold. (I remembered about that "bad cold" later.)

After eating Thanksgiving dinner in Oklahoma City with some kind Saints, we started on our home drive.

Instead of making the trip in a covered wagon, we rode in a one-seated buggy. When the luggage was all in, we were pretty well laden—especially when we added the nice wicker baby carriage which a sister in Oklahoma City had given us. It had to be strapped on the back of the buggy throughout the trip. But the carriage was a boon to me that winter. To be able to put the baby to sleep in it, and then wheel it beside the heater where I was sure she would keep warm on wintry days, was something to write home about.

WHEN WE ARRIVED HOME, we went in the house and started fires in both stoves before we took off any wraps. Baby—her name was Ardyce by this time—was not very well. I supposed she had taken cold on our trip from Oklahoma City. The day after our arrival my brother's daughters, Frances and Allie, my namesake, came over, and the four little girls played beside the stove all afternoon. Very soon after that baby Ardyce developed a rash. Some more experienced neighbors told me she had measles. After racking my brain as to where she could have caught measles, I remembered the kind lady on the train and her headache. I'm very sure she was taking measles right then; of course, she did not know it. All our children had them—my brother's four and our three. Winter was nearly over before we could get out with the children. They were not very ill, but I was afraid to let them go outside of the house to play until the warm spring days came. Hubert and Brother S. S. Smith had been holding meetings east of our place in a settlement along a little river called Dead Indian, because the body of a lone Indian had been found by some people who first settled in that locality. It was too far for them to drive back and forth very often, and the road was rough. So I was alone practically all the time the children were ill.

AFTER THE SPRING PLANTING was done, the men of the branch decided that they would start building the long-talked-of church. Brother Hancock donated the building site, and the church went up in a very short time. It was just enclosed and roofed, floored, windows and doors set in, when we started to use it. The families which had been recently added by baptism—the Jefcoats, Corbys, and Edwardses had come across the river, about two miles further than to the Redmoon schoolhouse. Our seats were planks placed on blocks of wood. We loaned three kitchen chairs and our organ. I missed the organ from my home terribly, but it added so much to the church music that we didn't move it until we left the claim for good. The chairs were used behind the desk or pulpit.

Our baby was blessed in that little church and named Ardyce Lucile.

As the time neared when we could all prove up on our land, people began moving to town to find employment. They would come back and spend week ends on their land, but remain in town to work. Brother Will Smith put in a blacksmith shop in Cheyenne, and Brother Pate also found employment. They moved everything but camping equipment in the houses.

Our meetings were not so well-attended as before. Some families who lived north of us could come, and when it was possible, the Saints on the west side came. Their time was not up yet, as they had filed later than we had.

IN THE FALL of that year I received word of the serious illness of my father who lived in Wilburton, Oklahoma. He had married a lady whose home was in that town. As soon as we could arrange to get my brother's folks to look after threshing our wheat, which was our principal crop that year, we left for Wilburton.

Father lived but a short time after we arrived there—less than a week I think. We decided he should be buried beside Mother at Okarche. Hubert, the children, and I took him there by train. We were his only relatives present at his burial and the only Latter Day Saints. There were no telephone lines to the country those days, so we could not notify our people who lived twelve miles east; at least four families would have come had they known. We left immediately for Cheyenne and home. Thirty years or so later, we returned—Hubert and I—and had the gratification of placing a marker at those graves through the generosity of our son-in-law, Arthur B. Church.

ON OUR RETURN HOME, we found our wheat had been threshed and there was a better crop than we had anticipated. Shortly after this my brother and his family moved to Cheyenne, where he did freighting to and from the railroad. Their children needed school privileges. That fall and winter seemed unusually long and lonely. The children and I missed my brother's wife and her children who had so often visited us and played with ours. Hubert was away most of the time. The children and I walked to the little church about three quarters of a mile away. I would put Ardyce in her buggy and push it over the road—a rather hard job, as the ruts were worn deep and the center too high and narrow to accommodate the small wheels. But we got there. Everyone was needed. The members from Cheyenne would come every week end to their claims if it was possible to do so, but they could not be counted on. Two families who had not attended often at Redmoon were steady supporters here as it was nearer than before. Brother and Sister Rook and their large family were quite an addition to the Sunday school. Brother and Sister Brown were young people, but they also helped. Thus the winter wore away and spring came again.

This was 1905. We had filed on the claim in 1900, so this year would complete our five-year occupation, and the U. S. Government would give us our deed or patent to the land, as it was called. We rented the farm land to Brother Redwine, who had arrived too late to get land in the neighborhood. Our place looked very nice that spring. Our trees were all growing beautifully. I knew that we would soon be leaving, and I couldn't help feeling a little sad.

Hubert and Brother Smith had continued to hold meetings at intervals over on Dead Indian, and the interest was very good in that locality.

My sister and her children came back to Oklahoma early that summer, and were with us again for quite a while.

It was decided that the reunion for Western Oklahoma District should be held near where the meetings had been conducted on Dead Indian. This took place in the latter part of August. We all attended together—my sister and her three children, we and our three. It took two tents to accommodate us, and we cooked and ate outside. I do not remember that there was even a shower of rain to bother us.

A large number of people gathered and camped, many of them from the northwestern part of the state, as well as those who lived near by. We had a good reunion, and thoroughly enjoyed it.

AFTER REUNION WAS OVER and we returned home, my sister decided she would live in Cheyenne that winter so the two older children could attend school. Accordingly she made her home with our brother.

We also were thinking our children should have school privileges, so we arranged with my brother's wife—who always had room and time for one or two more—to keep our two oldest girls five days a week. Hubert was working in the vicinity where the reunion was held that fall and came home every few days. But he always had to go back at night for evening preaching, so baby Ardyce and I were alone through the fall months. She was as lonely for her sisters as I was and followed me from room to room like a little shadow. How we rejoiced when Hubert would bring them home on Friday night. We would have Saturday and Sunday together, and Sunday afternoon he took them back.

When December came we began making preparations to leave the claim. Although those three months had been so lonely, I hated going. But I was anxious to get to town where I could see my own people every day and have my children with me again.

We sold quite a lot of our household furniture, for as soon as the school year was over, we intended to locate somewhere in Central Oklahoma. We found some rooms to rent, and early in December we moved to Cheyenne. We rented the place to Brother Redwine for

Warn Your Neighbor

By Vassie Z. Sheets

THIS COMMAND was given to the church in 1830, "Let him that has been warned, warn his neighbor." It is still a command in 1951.

To warn is to admonish or counsel. My neighbor is not only the person who lives next door but anyone with whom I come in contact and to whom I can do good.

I must not be shy in broaching the subject of Christ and his church to my friends and acquaintances. It is my high calling this mission to fulfill.

I have prayed for many years that Zion might become a reality, that God might give the endowment to priesthood members, and that righteousness might sweep the earth as a flood.

Prayer alone cannot bring about these things. I, personally, must do something about it. It will take the consecrated efforts of each member of the church to realize the goal of Zion, and it will come only when each member wants this condition so much that he will sacrifice everything to accomplish this task.

It was the "little leaven" in the three measures of meal that worked. It will be the "little rock" cut out of the mountain without hands that will roll until it fills the whole earth. It will be the "little" congregations of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints which will leaven the whole earth. Each member is a potential missionary.

MUST AN A BOMB be dropped on our Promised Land to awaken us to our responsibility as co-workers with Jesus Christ? God and the angels are waiting. Recent revelation tells us, "Zionic conditions are no further away nor any closer than the spiritual condition of my people justifies."—Doctrine and Covenants 140: 5. It puts the test strictly up to each individual.

If we, as a church, join hands the world around in this task of winning souls, our effort will bring Jesus Christ into the world again.

Nothing is impossible with God when we do our best.

Question:

Does the Bible have all in it that is necessary for salvation?

Texas

M. F.

Answer:

What do you mean by "salvation"? If it is something that can be achieved once and forever, never to be lost again, the Bible does not speak of this kind of salvation. Bible salvation is a life process.

We immediately recognize that the individual is important in the salvation pattern as well as the word of God. Jesus said to his apostles as they were together after the supper, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now."—John 16:12. The disciples had to grow in order to receive further instructions pertinent to their salvation.

The Bible does not have all that is necessary for salvation. It must be supplemented by personal response. It needs God's revelation of himself to the individual to make it full and effective. The Bible is adequate, as far as it is correctly translated and as far as any book can be adequate. But salvation is more than knowing the truth. It is living the truth.

Question:

If I went out teaching your idea of Zion, the people would brand me a Communist. Isn't the idea of the kingdom of God as you are teaching it more communistic than democratic?

Texas

G. D.

Answer:

Communism and Christ do have one basic concept in common: if men are to live together in peace and development, they must share with one another.

From that point they walk different paths.

Communism says the way to get men to share with one another is to force them to share. It denies the right of agency and says that man lives for the good of the state. It says man is sufficient unto himself and able to accomplish all things without divine help.

Christ said that men must share with one another because they love one another. He said the kingdom of God is to give men abundant life, and it must be the servant of all. Even the Son of God must serve; he showed that without God we accomplish nothing.

To sum it up we see that, though the Zionistic plan calls for men to labor in common endeavor through the plan of the storehouse so just needs and wants and surplus will be cared for and the kingdom of God increased, it is not communistic in any sense. It is basically a theocratic-democracy—God giving the laws and man freely choosing to follow them.

Question:

Will only those who merit celestial glory dwell on the new earth? If so, where will all the other people be?

Oklahoma

L. S.

Answer:

The final purification and glorification of the earth will take place at the close of the millennium and after the judgment, a partial change having taken place at the beginning of the millennium when Christ comes. Following the judgment all the people will be assigned to their permanent inheritances in four distinct groups, the celestial or highest receiving inheritance upon the earth which has itself become celestialized.

As to the other three classes, no specific place is designated as their habitation, though it is said that they must inherit another kingdom, or world—either of a terrestrial glory or celestial glory. All these three groups are saved in the kingdom of God but in different realms, having different glories.

There is the fourth class whose inheritance is a "kingdom which is not a kingdom of glory." This corresponds to the place of "outer darkness." These are the unsaved. (Read Doctrine and Covenants 85: 4, 5; 76: 4-7.)

Question:

1. What is your opinion regarding the Apocrypha to the New Testament. Is it wholly or in part spurious?

2. If the Inspired Version contains all of the Scripture as given to Moses, how long was it a part of the Hebrew texts after Moses?

3. Were these missing parts of Genesis lost, or were they deleted intentionally? If so, by whom? Is there reason to believe they were deleted for some political or theological reason?

Missouri

R. W. H.

Answer:

Apocryphal writings of the New Testament times are numerous and bear some characteristics of sacred Scripture, but few are of known authorship, and many are attributed to other than the real authors. They date from the late first century A.D. to the third. Some were apparently designed and used for the advancing and upbuilding of certain factional groups, and some for purposes of proselyting. Some are fictional, using stories, tales, and myths which grew out of the lives of Christ and his disciples. Their historical and ethical value is low.

The Lord, referring to the Old Testament Apocrypha, said that many things in it were true and many not true. This may apply to the New Testament Apocrypha also, though on the whole the quality of the latter is much inferior to that of the former. It impresses us as generally lacking any inspirational quality springing from the Holy Spirit.

2. We do not understand that the Inspired Version restores all the Scripture as given to Moses or all that was had by ancient Israel. There are evidences pointing the other way. We know no way of determining how and when portions of the original Scripture text were lost. However, the brass plates brought by Lehi from Jerusalem (600 B.C.) which contain a current record of the Hebrew Scriptures from the beginning, will be complete when they are revealed as promised in the ancient Scriptures.

3. How portions of the Scriptures became lost is not known, though it is probable that the sacking and burning of Jerusalem and the taking of the Jews captive to Babylon had much to do with it. According to Bible critics most of what we now have in the Old Testament was gathered and compiled after the captivity.

I wish to express sincere thanks to all who sent cards, letters, and offerings or prayed for me during my recent illness. So many cards and letters came I cannot write to each person who remembered me, so I take this means of expressing my appreciation. My health is improving each day.

Advertising for God

Some Latter Day Saints seem to be ashamed of the gospel and want to keep it "hid under a bushel." Perhaps a few are afraid their standing in the business world will be harmed if they make known the church they belong to. I think it would be a good idea if people who have places of business would place copies of the Herald, Daily Bread, the Book of Mormon, and the Inspired Version of the Scriptures where the public could see them. This would probably help more people than the popular magazines one usually finds in a waiting room. There are souls in darkness hoping to find the light; it is for those who have it to share with the rest of the world. The Restored Gospel holds a way of life for all who seek to follow Christ

They Shall Know

Nearly thirty-five years ago, while under General Conference appointment, I went to Moors Junction near Sterling, Michigan, to hold a series of meetings. A large tent was set up in the neighborhood, and in this I preached the old Jerusalem gospel. Interest brought people for miles around to hear. God blessed me with great power, liberty, and discernment in reaching the people and calling them to repent.

When I had preached almost two weeks, some asked for baptism, and, as I kept on preaching, whole families were inducted into the fold. I continued preaching and baptizing until seventy-six were added to the church. It seemed like the day of Pentecost.

I tried to get people to pray after their baptisms so that they might receive a testimony of this work. When Brother Adolph Hanggi went out to the barn one afternoon to feed his cattle, he was thinking seriously of the church and about receiving a testimony to know that this is the true church restored by angels. All at once a bright light appeared. Standing in the light was an angel who spoke to Brother Hanggi and told him that he had obeyed the true gospel and that Joseph Smith was the prophet whom God used to set up his kingdom in these last days.

Then there was a Sister Wilson, who came into the church with all her family. She formerly belonged to the Methodist faith. By a wonderful vision of the Savior descending out of heaven and standing upon a rock she was made to know that, through her obedience to the gospel, she had built upon the rock of the true church of Jesus Christ.

A family by the name of Fox also attended the meetings. Mrs. Fox and her daughter were baptized with the consent, I thought, of the husband and father. However, the next day when I went to the home at Sister Fox's invitation to have dinner, I found Mr. Fox in a violent and threatening mood, saying that he had no use for Mormon preachers in his home. Previous to my coming he had tried to terrify his wife and daughter to get them to leave the church. Undismayed, I remained for the meal and talked of the wonders of God and the restored gospel as the mother and daughter asked questions. Sister Fox told of how in vision she had seen the Savior nailed upon the cross. He had said to her, "Behold my hands and my feet. All they who live godly in my name shall suffer persecution."

Soon after I left their home, Mr. Fox took his gun and went back into the woods to hunt. Suddenly his legs buckled under him, and he fell to the ground and lay there as helpless as a little child. His wife and daughter found him later and, by enlisting the aid of the neighbors, got him home and to bed. In a few days his former strength came back, but not until he had repented of his evil ways. He testified that he knew the judgments of God had fallen upon him and asked forgiveness of the wife and daughter for his harsh treatment.

And so I did my part by preaching and converting people to the restored gospel, and the Lord bore testimony to the truth of his work.

Agrees With Blue Pencil Notes

I agree with Elbert A. Smith's opinion that too many ministers "preach to themselves." Many times I have sat in church and listened to a sermon which I did not understand. I am sure this is the true church of Jesus Christ, and I do not mean to complain about the ministry, but I believe there must be others of just average education like myself who often miss the point the preacher is trying to put across. I know God answers prayers, for he has answered mine many times. I have faith that he will help all who strive to serve him.

From an Isolated Member

I attended the December Communion service in Oklahoma City and rejoiced over the good spirit there. Since I had not been able to attend for more than a year it meant much to me.

I have received many blessings by using consecrated oil. Once when an injury caused me to lose a thumb nail, the doctor said I would probably never be able to grow another to replace it. But I poured oil on the wound and asked God to heal it. In about a year the nail grew back. I have also been healed of flu and a respiratory ailment. However, I have had gland trouble for over fifteen years, and I ask the Saints to pray with me that I may become physically able to help with the work of the church. I feel the time will soon come when the gospel is preached in this community, and I would like to be able to help when it is.

A Tribute to Arizona Members

The little brick church in the Valley of the Sun is a hallowed place to many who have come to Arizona seeking health. Because there were a few faithful members who kept its doors open through years of financial uncertainties, it is now to become part of a new and modern church building. Their efforts have borne fruit, and membership has grown to over 300.

We came here five years ago to regain our health, and we have done so. Many times we have thanked God for the climate of Arizona where asthmatics can breathe and rest. We have tried to repay Him by giving such service as we could to his people. I have served as pastor since 1947, but now because of long hours at my secular work and the added demands of building, I have asked for a leave of absence as pastor. Elder Keith M. Rogers will serve in my place.

I am grateful to those who have kept their trust and made possible a place where our sons, who come to the valley during days of training, can find an open door and fellowship.

the coming year. He also bought our team. We took our organ from the church which soon fell into disuse.

Brother J. W. Hancock, who was president of the branch, was the last one to leave. He was practically alone with his family all the years he remained.

Early in December we received our deed signed by President Theodore Roosevelt. We still have it.

We left Cheyenne, if I remember rightly, in March, 1905, and located in the small town of Piedmont. We attended church about seven miles away in the country. We remained there two years while Cicely finished the eighth grade; then we moved to Kingfisher. The girls were very well pleased with the school there, and we remained six years. During that time, Brother Case began his work with the Indians. The Cheyenne Reservation was only one and one-half miles west of town.

At the end of the sixth year we moved to Lamoni, Iowa. Cicely, who had attended Kingfisher College one and one-half years, entered Graceland to finish her sophomore year, and Dorothy finished her senior year of high school. So ended our sojourn of some fifteen years duration in Oklahoma, a state which we have always loved and were always glad to re-visit.

One Year In Zion

By Barbara Peavy

THIS APRIL is my anniversary—I have been in Zion a year. In the past year many wonderful occasions have endeared the city to me. The very heritage of the town is an inspiration in itself. It has not been hard to see Zion in the development of the Auditorium and in youth activities that have enriched many lives, but the greater vision of Zion has come in the lives of people who live here—who possess kingdom-quality personalities.

* * * * *

A lady stepped inside the office to explain the use of the material she was loaning me. "It makes a beautiful setting," she said, "if you drape it around a picture." Each Sunday morning she prepares a worship center for a church school class. The settings are planned for helping those who attend to have a true worship experience. For a moment she spoke of the joy that had been hers in the menial task of setting up chairs. "Deacon's work, they call it, but each Sunday there's a prayer that the efforts will be acceptable in His sight. I always feel blessed."

She has a Zionite attitude. She loves to serve—not for the glory attached to the service, but for the joy of giving. She feels rewarded for her efforts by the spirit that prevails at the classes. It is not difficult to see Zion in such a life.

The weather was terrible. The ice and snow made driving almost an impossibility, but the young woman had several "cheer" boxes as she calls them, to deliver. This was no outstanding contribution, just a gift of love, but given with one motive in mind—to cheer some saddened person. Deeds like this are a part of the young woman's personality. They are not accompanied by fanfare. She expresses her love for humanity in an active manner. She lives her religion. She helps to establish Zion.

A mother's love for her family has given one woman a keen understanding of young people. She has contributed three devoted daughters to the church. Each has dedicated her talents and serves to the best of her ability. One leads a girl's choir and will soon marry a man recently called to the priesthood, one teaches a church school class, and one has a single purpose in mind at the present—to convert her fiance to her way of life. And she's doing just that. This mother has shown love not only to her own children but to other young people in unselfish living. This is also a characteristic of the kingdom.

* * * * *

"What can we do to make the League better?" is the chief concern of one young man. He is not only a youth leader but a friend to those he leads. He is not afraid of hard work and serves in anything he can find to do. There is nothing spectacular about him; perhaps he is weak in some things, but he loves young people. He cannot help growing as he works with them, for his life has been much richer since his association with Leaguers. His every thought is for the benefit of some fifty or sixty young people. Their trials become his; their joys, his happiness. A genuine concern for people with a will to work—will these not be part of the kingdom?

* * * * *

One man's entire personality is an example of love. He has had heartaches and disappointments, yet through all this he has retained a loving disposition. I was hurt and angry at someone, so I went to talk to him about it, and in the kindest voice he admonished: "Anger can be a very dangerous thing. Forgive the person who hurts you the most, and you'll find out a wonderful secret: Once you have truly forgiven someone, he can never hurt you again. True forgiveness frees you from hurt. That's the blessing of forgiveness." A simple truth and yet one that few people ever realize. Is not this kind of wisdom to be in Zion?

"I want to get at the heart of the church. The men in the past had such wonderful testimonies—they had convictions that meant something." One young man was holding a church history book in his hand and was speaking sincerely. The kingdom does not seem an impossibility when young people desire to build up such convictions. Zion is evidenced in youths who have set their hearts and minds steadfastly on the goals of the church.

years ago. He has a testimony that has significance. "I'm so glad I live here," he says. "I'm sure 'nough blessed you know. My folks are so swell, and the church has meant so much in our lives." A testimony of gratitude. There will be many prayers of thanksgiving in a Zion community.

My year in Zion has been enriched by the association with a pastor who is never too busy to be concerned about the individual. His warm friendly handclasp and genuine interest in people has given me an understanding of the commandment "Except a man be humble and full of love . . ." It is a challenge to know men whose lives are directed to one goal—the kingdom.

* * * * *

In his capacity as a leader of young people, another man has served untiringly. There has been more to his service than the hard work and the many hours given. In his devotion many young people have seen a vision of what the church can do in the life of a person. He loves people, he loves God, and he is concerned about the lives of young people and their relationship with God. His life symbolizes what Jesus meant when he said, "And I, if I be lifted up, shall draw all men unto me." The art of lifting souls to God will surely be included in Zion.

* * * * *

I find that after a year in Zion, the word has a new and deeper meaning. In the lives of men and women who daily walk the streets that have been trod by pioneer Saints of old, I find the hope of the kingdom. But the greatest thrill has been the knowledge that in the little branch in which I grew up, there are men, women, and young people who live similar lives, have like aspirations, and are of the same desires as these I have known in Independence. One year in Zion has strengthened my faith in the kingdom—has presented to me a living panorama of the church of God.

Bouquets

By Edith G. Beggs

The greedy gormand who needs constant back-patting to feed his ego and keep up the strength of his morale usually grows obese in his own conceit, lapping up all praise and flattery offered him, but seldom saying anything kind about others.

Bouquets are nice, we all like them, and few of us get too many while we're living. But let those who refrain from such generosity remember that they who most deserve them seldom want them. However, they might wish one bloom now and then from that closed garden within the heart. One should open up and give freely if he wants to go on producing flowers.

A Shining Faith for Our Times

By Louise Scott Wrigley

SURELY IN THESE UNCERTAIN TIMES we need a special degree of faith to keep us moving, smiling, and serene through the days which could be crowded with doubts and fears. It would be all too easy to fall prey to uncertainty and hesitation, and in so doing cut to a great extent our capabilities and accomplishments.

The trend of thinking is back to essential values. More and more, people are realizing that they cannot exist on the foundations they have built underneath themselves. It is much more difficult to go back and fill in the chinks and cracks than it is to cement the foundation firmly in the first place. However, the firm foundation takes more time initially, and requires a more skilled workman. Will we have more know-how and time to repair the flaws later than we do now? It looked so easy to do a "fair" job back through the years. How wise were we?

It might seem plausible at this point to give the world up for lost, to cover our heads and moan. The lazy ones and the gloomy ones favor this solution. Can we so easily toss to the forces of evil this beautiful and bounteous world which God meant to be ours? Wouldn't it be more profitable to say, "You can't have this. I'll do more than my share to see that you don't!" What quitters we are when the prospect seems uncomfortable. If we toss it all out the window, we won't have a thing to show for living. If we fight for a better life and work for it and believe in it, we might very well earn it. Evil reigns many places, but is that any excuse for letting it reign in our hearts?

PERFECT FAITH is based on complete confidence. This needs no explanation. It goes all of the way; it makes no reservations or stipulations. Any thing less than complete confidence in the God who created us is disappointing.

Do we really need faith? Faith is the basis for life, and we live by it whether we wish to or not. If we eat our food, confident that it will sustain us, and cross the street believing we will reach the other side safely, we are living by a degree of faith. We ordered today's groceries yesterday, believing that we would still be alive today. Our faith sustains us quietly and without fanfare. Our confidence is such that these things seldom occur to us as acts of faith.

Would you desire to see your future laid out in a pattern before you? A few might say "Yes"; most would say "No." While the idea may be intriguing, serious thought would reveal that the human soul often retains unpleasant memories far too long. If we could contemplate all of the trials and troubles to come, we might be apt to regard the happiness as pale and unpromising beside the burdens, for we are more often conscious of suffering than of joys. Each of us must live by faith, and wisely so.

IS FAITH JUSTIFIED? Surely, for most of us regard the future as being the time when we will realize many of our dreams and ambitions—and we do, don't we? We don't plan for failures and heartaches. The thing we look forward to is a joyful time, a time of fulfillment of our desires. Without a great deal of faith, we could never do that, as a result the faithful are not burdened with an overabundance of troubles which they have borrowed from the future.

And blind faith—is it really blind? This term is generally used to describe the kind of faith which goes on without a qualm when life is filled with problems. It is the assurance that there is a purpose and a plan worth waiting for. That kind of faith is not blind at all, but sees beyond today or tomorrow to the wisdom and mercy of God's long-range plan; it is willing to trust him to guide and direct—not capriciously—but every moment of every day. This kind of courageous faith must make the heart of the Father glad.

He who has no faith is a coward. He is afraid of everything. He does not trust even himself, and he does not know how to trust God. He is a pitiable creature.

FAITH IS A POSITIVE FORCE. In these days especially, it is constructive and desirable. We have no time for negative thinking; it will defeat us as individuals and as a group. We need all of our energies for creative, positive activities. Faith is especially invaluable now, for by faith only can we move productively from day to day without being possessed by vague fears and the proximity of destructive forces. Faith says, "With God at my side, I can and I will."

We must believe in ourselves in order to make our faith work today.

To believe in ourselves is to acknowledge that God created us for something. Because we respect God's wisdom and see everywhere about us the inexorable law, we cannot believe that there was any degree of whim or "happenstance" in either the method or the purpose of the creation of the human being. God did not wish the earth merely crowded with people. If he had, the level of our intelligence would matter little. But since he created us for a specific purpose, he will never leave us to manage unaided. It is only when we refuse his guidance that he must watch us destroy ourselves. Since he has created us, we can safely believe in our own ability, for it is God-given and supplemented by God's power.

We must believe in each other. Every morning the newspapers scream accusations and scandal, threats, charges, and countercharges. Surely the time has come when many do not believe their own brothers. Wisdom is one thing. Suspicion is another. Distrust is a subtle enemy that can, with ease, destroy a good man. It is not simple to know where to place our faith . . . until we remember that when we place it in God the rest will follow, for this is his law which never changes.

FAITH IS NOT THE EASIEST THING in the world to spread, but perhaps it is the finest. How can we underestimate the effect of our own attitudes upon others? Surely every one of us has been inspired by the manifestation of faith on the part of our associates. We never fail to sense a lifting of responsibility when we see the refreshing evidences of faith in other lives. It is as if we could breathe easier, as if the day had become brighter. Our hearts respond with warmth and appreciation to the person who has a happy outlook. These people are good to know. In this sense, faith is not an intangible at all. We can see it, feel it, and know it in the lives of the faithful, and it can and must be the sustaining factor in our own lives if we are to survive with any degree of happiness.

There are many degrees of faith. All of us contain the spark on which we may build for a greater faith. Only when we reach a certain stage in our development and our ability to surrender ourselves to God can we know the implicit faith which is born of experience with God's fairness. This faith is a beautiful force which molds a life into a living testimony of God's great love for us.

The way is so simple, too simple for many of us in this scientific age. We spend long hours and much money seeking—always looking beyond and above and below because we will not recognize that the plan so simple in every detail could be so workable and so right. With the chaos of world turmoil deafening us and invading our homes, with the heat of the world arguments suffocating us, we could so quickly escape from the tension of these times into the beautiful simplicity of Christ's way. Faith tends the front gate, and the path is Peace, and we will not. But we must!

Why shouldn't our faith shine more than ever today? If it is true faith, it will be so lovely and steady that we couldn't conceal it if we wished to do so. It will be like an eternal flame fed by our trust in God, and it will shine out to strengthen and cheer our fellow man, our neighbor.

Introducing

CLARK E. (Tommy) VINCENT, Berkeley, California (page 5), was born in 1923 at Otis, Colorado, and was baptized eight years later at Yuma, Colorado. After graduating from the Otis high school in 1941 he went on to do structural steel work at San Diego, California, for eighteen months and then served nearly three years in the Army Air Force, including two years overseas service. He mustered out as a first sergeant. Following this he took a year and a half at Graceland, then went on to receive his A.B. degree cum laude in 1949 at the University of California, majoring in sociology. He continued his studies there and received his M.A. degree in 1950 and is now working on his doctorate, teaching part time as assistant in the department of sociology. While in Graceland he was president of the Student Body 1946-1947, was a member of the Lambda Delta Sigma, and received the Gold Seal. At the university he served as president of the Graduate Sociology Club. He is interested in counseling. He was ordained a priest in 1946, an elder in 1950, and at the present time is pastor's counselor in the Berkeley Branch. He was married in 1946 to Mary Jane Parks who is also a graduate of the University of California.

VASSIE ZULU SHEETS, Columbus, Ohio (page 12), was born in Jackson, Ohio, but was baptized and has lived most of her life in Columbus. After finishing grammar school she completed a business college course and worked as stenographer and bookkeeper. In 1908 she married Richard David Sheets who died the following year. After an accident which partially paralyzed her, she took rehabilitation courses and has been able to support herself. She still finds time to help in the women's department and do some literary work. Her hobbies are "writing short articles and cheering the unfortunate."

* GEMS FROM A POLITICAL CAMPAIGN

"The winner never quits. The quitter never wins."

"You can't pray a man out of a pool hall, but you can legislate the pool hall out of existence."

"Those who do not vote are ruled by those who do."

"How you feel about conditions doesn't mean a thing unless it gets you out to make your mark on a ballot."

* LEGENDS OF CHARLES—2

When Charles was only a little tyke, he was taught to pray, and he liked to take his turn in asking the blessing at the table. He prayed for everybody around the table. He prayed for everything on the table. He opened one eye to see if everybody else still had theirs closed. He prayed for everybody in the neighborhood, the little boys, the pet dogs. No matter what it was, if he could pronounce the name, he prayed for it—and some he couldn't. Then he had a standard conclusion: "And please bless Charles—that's me!"

* POPULAR SONG

A long memory betrays one's years. Perhaps some of you have been around long enough (as this scribe has) to remember a song, "Red Wing," that was very popular for some years before the First World War. Anybody who had a piano played it morning, noon, and night, and sometimes it seemed to be the only piece of music in the house. Uncounted numbers of old tubular records of it were sold and played endlessly to the evening air.

What was the secret charm of "Red Wing"? How did the composer manage to make such a minor classic?

The answer came at our house recently, when the lady was playing from a collection of classics, and turned to one of Robert Schumann's exercises for children, "The Happy Farmer." And there, with but few notes changed, was the music for the verse of "Red Wing."

The composer's secret? He knew where to steal.

One mystery remains. Where did he get the chorus? If any reader knows, would he please tell P.S.?

* FRANCE

If you are interested in international relations, you will enjoy reading "The Case for France," by Barry Bingham in the May issue of "The Atlantic." Americans have always been interested in France but have not always understood the country and its people. Mr. Bingham, director of the E.C.A. Mission in France in 1949-50, relates a number of facts that will be appreciated. More of us should know, for example, about the declining Communist influence in French politics. We should know something about the rising standards of living, the improved spirit and morale, and the industrial recovery of our friend and ally in several conflicts.

COUNCIL BLUFFS BUILDS

Apostle D. T. Williams attended the groundbreaking ceremony for the new $200,000 church at Council Bluffs, Iowa. About six hundred members of the congregation of 1,335 were present at the ceremony. Pastor V. D. Ruch was in charge. Members of the building committee with others of the congregation took part in the ceremony. Mr. Ross, president of the Council Bluffs Chamber of Commerce, gave a speech of welcome and congratulations. Apostle Williams expressed the congratulations of the General Church and turned the first spadeful of soil. The building program will begin immediately and will be under the direction of the Branch Construction Company. Apostle Williams preached twice while in Council Bluffs.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION DEPARTMENT

Church institutes were held April 15 at Boone, Iowa, and April 22 at Knoxville, Iowa, under the general direction of Florence Freberg, director of religious education of the Des Moines District. District President Ralph Wicker and Patriarch Henry Castings assisted at the institutes. The study courses combined the use of the new audio-visual aid kit, which the department has been using in its field work to promote teacher education, and demonstrations of teaching theory, techniques, and methods by capable leaders in the district. John Darling, Associate Director of Religious Education, attended the institutes.

The Department of Religious Education spent six evenings conducting institutes in the Central Missouri Stake. Two evenings were spent at each point and the series lasted three weeks. The institutes were held at Lexington, Pleasant Hill, and Warrensburg, Missouri, and were arranged by J. Edwin Swall, director of religious education for the stake. The General Church Department was represented by Thelona Stevens and John Darling. The emphasis for the series was in the field of leadership training.

VETERAN CHURCH WORKER DIES

Elder Albert G. Miller, pastor at Vancleave, Mississippi, died March 20. Brother Miller was under church appointment from 1912 to 1922. He passed away after a year's illness. Elders R. L. Booker, W. J. Breshears, and J. A. Pray conducted the funeral service. For details of his death, see the obituary column in this issue.

SKYLARK-ORIOLE WEEK

Skylark-Oriole Week was observed in the Center Stake April 22-29. A mother-daughter tea was held, award services were held in all congregations, the girls participated in fun night at the South Chrysler gym, and other activities were held. Mrs. Rachel Oeser is the director of girls' activities in the Center Stake.

COMMUNITY CONCERT GIVEN

The Community Chorus, the Independence Symphony Orchestra, and soloists presented a concert, April 22, at the Memorial Hall. Included on the program were "Song of Destiny" by Brahms and "The Inimitable Lovers" by Vardell. The orchestra also played "Egmont Overture, Op. 84," by Beethoven.

FIRST SERIES HELD

The first missionary series ever held in Great Bend, Kansas, was conducted by Seventy Virgil J. Billings from March 10 to April 8. Most of the work was done through cottage meetings and personal contact. A baptismal service was held on April 8 at which a young married couple united with the church.

J. C. Bergman

IF THE NAME JOHANNES CORNELIUS BERGMAN seems to carry a foreign flavor, this is no coincidence. And it seems entirely appropriate that the bearer of such a name should be a teacher of foreign languages at Graceland. "Joe" as he is known to his intimates, is the son of immigrants from Holland and spoke nothing but Dutch until he was five years old. Today he speaks at least four other languages: French, Spanish, German, and English, and is often called upon to use his knowledge of other tongues to translate letters sent to him for translation from many places and persons.

He was born in South Dakota in 1894, baptized at the age of twelve and graduated as valedictorian of his class from Lamoni High School in 1913. He later graduated from the University of Iowa (which school had awarded him a scholarship) and came to the staff of Graceland College as a teacher of languages in 1919. He has been a member of the staff continuously since that time—longer than any other person now teaching at Graceland. In 1921 he became registrar of the college, and has had that job ever since.

He is a man of many interests of a widely divergent nature. In Lamoni Branch he is known as a flower gardener of no mean reputation, and as a church decorator without peer. Scarcely a church service is held in Lamoni without the benefit of one of his beautiful and appropriate floral displays. His cornucopias displayed during

The Nature of Testimony

Editorial

"We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen."

—John 3: 11.

WHAT SHOULD I SAY in a testimony?" a young church member asked. "I am somewhat confused on the subject, and I'd like some help."

She is a serious and devoted member. She serves in the work of her congregation. She has passed by the congregations where there is little work to do and where her part in church work would be easy. She has purposely elected to serve in a congregation where there is much to be done—a new building to be erected and paid for, classes to be organized and taught, young people to be led, music to be furnished. She has chosen one of the hardest working spots in the city.

No one can question the motives or the seriousness of this kind of young person. She asks for help, and every resource that we have should be made available for her and for those like her.

* * * * *

To this young member we say: Let us turn first to the Scriptures and see what help we can find there.

Take our text for a beginning. A sincere young Pharisee had come to Jesus for spiritual help and light. And because he was honest, Jesus gave him the most serious kind of help. Here is what Jesus said to Nicodemus:

"We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen."

There is the essence of testimony. Jesus spoke out of his own knowledge. He related his own experience. He was not borrowing the words and ideas of others. Testimony is what we know for ourselves.

There is a little ambiguity in that statement. The language of three hundred years ago is not exactly clear; it seems possible that the statement looks two ways. Among the modern translators, Moffatt gives it one emphasis: "We are speaking of what we do understand, we testify of what we have actually seen." Goodspeed says, "We know what we are talking about and we have seen the things we testify to."

But all of the translations agree on one thing: we are to find our source of help in our own experience.

* * * * *

This brings us to the point where we can ask some questions of the young lady who brought the subject up.

Why do you attend a church where you have to work so hard? . . . Put that into your testimony.

Why did you go to all the trouble and expense of learning to play the piano to help with the church services? You don't expect to make any money with that skill. You are dedicating it to God. Why? . . . Put that into your testimony.

You believe in prayer, and you practice it. You get help from it. What kind of help do you get? . . . Put that into your testimony.

You are planning your future home now. It will be a Christian home. It will be a Latter Day Saint home. . . . Tell the people about that. Put it into your testimony.

You have prayed for friends and loved ones. You have witnessed God's blessings come to them. You have seen people whose hearts were changed by the Holy Spirit. You have seen lives that were thoughtless and idle turned to good purposes. . . . Tell the people about these things. These are the subject matter of testimony.

* * * * *

You have seen something happen on the street—you have heard a snatch of conversation on the bus—some beauty of nature has appeared to you through your own window—while you were thinking, God sent you an idea. Think about these many things; find the pearl in the rough shell, and tell about it.

* * * * *

You have observed how flat a little sermonette will fall when it is given in a prayer and testimony meeting. How idle and presumptuous admonitions are when they come from members who are as weak and faulty as ourselves. The little homilies are certainly out of place. Prayer meeting is not an occasion for preaching.

Stories that we have heard others tell do not always "go over" well, particularly if they are not typical of our own experience. It takes a skilled narrator to tell a story well. Even then, it may be out of place.

But there is something personal and intimate about our own experiences and observations that makes them more important than anything else we can give to the meeting.

Here is a good rule for those who testify: "Look within, look without, look at God. Then report what you find."

Testimony includes self-examination. "Let a man examine himself," said Paul in I Corinthians 11: 28. "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves." —II Corinthians 13: 5.

We should confess our faults and weaknesses: "Confess your faults one to another, and pray for one another, that ye may be healed."—James 5: 16. This does not mean that we should boast or make a vain display of our sins. The purpose behind this kind of confession is to change our lives.

We should attend prayer meeting for two reasons: to receive help for ourselves, and to give help to others. In testimony, we give help to others. Think of it that way, and you will find something to say. L. J. L.

Official

Administration to Isolated Members

Various members of the priesthood are doing their best to maintain warm and helpful personal contacts with members of the church who are isolated from branch privileges. District presidents and pastors of nonresident Saints are doing an especially important work in this connection. Wherever possible requests for administration should be addressed to them, not to the apostle in the field or to the First Presidency. This is not because the general officers do not wish to help, but because better help can usually be given by the district officers named above.

Despite the foregoing, the relatives of persons in urgent need of administration should feel entirely free to make contact with the First Presidency or with the appropriate member of the Council of Twelve whenever this is necessary. Under such circumstances it is helpful if those asking assistance will state whether they can meet any expense which may be incurred. This does not mean that we will not do our best to secure help even when no guarantee is given. But it will help the administrative officers concerned to know whether they are free to ask the most available elder or whether they must take the time to find out who can afford to render this service without these out-of-pocket expenses being met.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

From Seventy F. Edward Butterworth, Papeete, Tahiti, April 2:

It has been some time since we have had an opportunity to get mail off to the States. I shall take advantage of this opportunity to inform you of our activities here in French Oceania.

The most important news is about the arrival of Patriarch J. Charles May. He arrived on the "Waitemata" Friday afternoon (March 30) at 4:30. All the members at Papeete were out to see their beloved mitimare set foot again on Tahitian soil. It was a fine reception, and I believe Brother May was not only pleased but surprised to see the progress that has been made over the years. He will no doubt be writing to you when he gets settled.

Yesterday at the Communion service we ordained Horahitu to the office of Seventy. It was a very spiritual meeting and an impressive one, even for us missionaries who have sat in like meetings in the fenua roa. Brother May was the spokesman, and he used the native tongue. We were thrilled to hear him speak so fluently when he had not used the language for so many years. I am certain he will be able to accomplish much in the office of patriarch here.

The work moves forward and with renewed interest. Everyone is well for the present, but the flu, measles, and pneumonia have taken hundreds of natives in the last few months. The doctor informed us that the flu scourge of 1918 would have been dwarfed had it not been for the miracle drugs from America. Our children have been saved twice by injections of penicillin. The newest menace is an outbreak of polio. Within the last few days nine cases have been discovered. This is the first time in the history of Tahiti that polio has been found on the island. If this turns into an epidemic, we may lose many more natives and possibly some of our own family. Medical advice beyond injections of penicillin is not to be relied on here. We have often commented, "What penicillin won't cure can't be cured in Tahiti." But we rely on administration and have had marvelous testimonies of the love of God in our behalf.

ALASKA INFORMATION

Do you have friends, relatives, or former neighbors who now reside in Alaska? If you do, please send their address to office of Council of Twelve, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri. If possible provide street address, if not, name and city. Any pertinent information will be appreciated.

Brother May wishes to inform his friends in America that he has arrived safely and in good health, and will write when he gets settled.

The plane will leave in a few minutes, so I must close for the present. May the Lord continue to bless you is our sincere desire.

In a recent letter Evangelist A. V. Arnold of Houston, Texas, writes to Presiding Evangelist Elbert A. Smith as follows:

I was very glad to receive your general letter to members of the Order, showing the fine new members who have been added to our list recently. That means that we have practically doubled since my coming into the ranks in April, 1944—not that I had anything to do with it, but all of us can see the need for our ministry.

Our Missionary in this District, Brother Alfred Yale, held classes every night during the week two weeks ago on cottage meetings; these were well attended and much appreciated. Last week each member of the priesthood who took the course started out on his own with one or two members to hold meeting in the homes which only nonmembers would attend. Crete was on my team, and we succeeded in getting seven nonmembers out. They all promise to attend for the entire six weeks and seem much interested. It is a new type of ministry to me, for I have always felt that my work lies along the line of shepherding the flock. However, I see no good reason why I cannot learn the missionary side also, and I am enjoying it even though it keeps me very busy preparing.

CORRECTION

In April 9 issue of the Herald the article, "The Testimony of the Witnesses," by W. Wallace Smith, a typographical error occurred which should be corrected by those who may wish to use this data concerning David Whitmer. In the middle of page 7 at the top the statement is made that David Whitmer gave an interview in 1898. This should have been 1881. An account of the interview appeared in the Kansas City Journal of June 5 of that year and also in Millennial Star number 43, pages 421-423 and 437-439.

Grammatical Structure, Language, and Absence of Anachronisms

IN MY LABORS among the Saints, I have been under an impulsion to confine my efforts to topics of general interest to the church and related directly to our distinctive movement.

I therefore am well pleased with what is engaging our attention this week, for there is nothing so much Latter Day Saint as the Book of Mormon. I like to think of our labors here at this time as an extension of what was begun at Kirtland in October of last year, an educational movement akin to the School of the Prophets in which all of modern Israel may receive instruction.

Since the more important part of my effort is not lengthy, I wish to take a little time for some general remarks and lay a foundation from a personal experience.

As all of you have recognized, there is in the world today a feeling of secularism. It has been called "death of the heart." People quite generally have lost interest in life. Even church people are losing interest in the church. They no longer find in the church the spirit of high adventure. I suggest for Latter Day Saints an antidote for the situation that confronts us: It is the Book of Mormon.

The early Christians told a very simple story: Certainly to them it was one of consuming interest and thrilling adventure. They told the story of a man born of woman, who claimed to be the Son of God, who was persecuted for his claims, crucified, and resurrected. With that cause they went out in small numbers, and in the course of some three hundred years converted the major portion of the civilized world.

The elders of the Restoration in its beginning went out with the same story to tell to the world. They, too, had a story of wondrous adventure.

An address given at the Book of Mormon Institute on Wednesday, January 10

Israel A. Smith

They had everything the early Saints had: a man had been born of woman who averred he was the Son of God who was persecuted on the cross, executed, and then resurrected. In addition to that they related the marvelous way in which the gospel had been restored to the earth, and took, as a special witness on behalf of their Lord and Master, the Book of Mormon which we believe is perhaps a better, a more exact witness for Jesus Christ as to doctrine, than the New Testament, because it contains the gospel as revealed by Christ in its fullness—the everlasting gospel, which is the same yesterday, today, and forever.

That this book opens up new and interesting vistas is being amply demonstrated here at this time.

We have many able preachers and writers who are giving us valuable material in support of the Book of Mormon. We have among us men who have devoted much time and energy to archaeological evidences in support of the book, and the elders from the beginning have been able to substantiate it, at least to their satisfaction, from the prophecies found in the Bible.

However, my approach to the book on this occasion is from a different angle, and in doing so I will relate a personal experience.

WHEN I WAS MUCH YOUNGER—without admitting my age, however—I was a member of the Iowa Legislature. There I became acquainted with many men who became prominent in the affairs of that state. A number of them later served as Governors of Iowa. One of them was William L. Harding. Some years after I removed to Missouri, I happened to be in Detroit when Governor Harding was there, and I had a very pleasant visit with him.

It was well known when I was attending the Legislature that I was a member of the Reorganized Church, and my church background was respected. As a matter of fact I was given a prominent committee chairmanship because of the excellent reputation of our church people, not because of any request made by me or by them, but because the Anti-Saloon League, the W.C.T.U., and the Prohibition Amendment League made specific request to the Speaker of the House. But while my connection with the church was known to all, very few of my colleagues ever talked with me about it.

This day at Detroit, however, after we had canvassed many things and recalled mutual experiences, Governor Harding very abruptly asked me a question. He wanted to know if I believed my grandfather had participated in a conspiracy with others to impose upon the public a spurious record in the Book of Mormon. The question, coming so unexpectedly, quite staggered me. I did not flatter myself that I was fully prepared to meet a situation like that; but through the years since then, as I have recalled the experience, I believe there was a degree of inspiration in the way I met it.

It flashed through my thinking: "Here is a very astute lawyer." I knew of his reputation as an attorney. I knew he had been specially successful in criminal cases. "Here is a man," I thought, "who understands human nature, or he would not be so successful with juries."

So I said to him, "Governor, do you believe that some eight or eleven or more men could go into a conspiracy, such as you suggest, and give their testimony with respect to the Book of Mormon, a false document, and put over anything of that kind without some one or more, or perhaps all of them, at sometime during their lives, acknowledging they had perjured themselves or borne false testimony?"

And then I followed about like this: "Governor Harding, history records it to be a fact, and I accept it as a fact, that my grandfather had very little in the way of scholastic advantages. In other words he was an unschooled youth. But I believe he was an intelligent, studious man, and I believe that those who are at all familiar with his life's history will have to admit that before his death he was fairly well educated according to the standards of his day—and even according to the standards of the present time. But," I added, "at no time during his life was he smart enough to write the Book of Mormon."

The Governor responded very satisfactorily: "That is a pretty fair answer." Then he expressed a desire to read the book, I gave him one, by chance happening to have a new copy with me. I saw him frequently after that, up to the time of his death some fourteen years ago, but we never discussed the matter again, though perhaps I should have asked him about it. And I do not know whether he read the book.

THIS INCIDENT has led me to think about the work of Joseph Smith in connection with the Book of Mormon from an entirely different viewpoint. I began to speculate about some of the mistakes that Joseph Smith or Sidney Rigdon or any other man of his day would likely make if he were writing such a book as a work of fiction or out of his imagination, unless he were a man of great mental endowment coupled with a profound, firsthand knowledge of the Bible, both the Old and New Testaments, as well as a knowledge of the history of many peoples.

You know, of course, that the first reaction to the claims about the Book of Mormon was that Joseph Smith had committed a rank and palpable forgery, that he was a deceiver and a fraud. And then, to people's astonishment, it began to dawn upon their thinking that this Book gave evidence of something more than Joseph Smith could possibly have produced, and so they looked about to discover who had written it. They heard of Solomon Spaulding and loudly asserted he had written the book, until, fortunately and by the grace of God, that story was so entirely and completely exploded that nobody of any intelligence who has been at all advised in these times ever attempts to explain away the Book of Mormon by setting up the Spaulding story. And yet, strange to relate, there are sporadic efforts to do so even at this late date.

Ever since those earlier years, there have been various exposés and treatises of the work of Joseph Smith, and they have been so conflicting as to their theories that they have practically canceled out each other, like the witnesses who appeared before the Sanhedrin and testified against Christ: "But their witnesses agreed not together."

A book will soon be published, giving the various theories that have been advanced about Joseph Smith. It will be called, "The Changing Explanations Concerning Joseph Smith."

IN TREATING THE BOOK OF MORMON from this special angle, I believe we can agree on a few things:

1. If written by descendants of Manasseh, its language would reflect words and constructions typical of its alleged Hebrew origin. If discovered, they would have unquestioned evidentiary value.

2. If written as a mere work of fiction by a contemporary of Joseph Smith or by himself, there would likely appear colloquialisms and provincialisms, expressions common to their day, or slang expressions. These come within the range of probabilities, and of course would not have the weight of what I have listed under number 1.

3. An examination of the story would also suggest that an unlearned man, or even one ordinarily versed in history and in the Bible, in weaving narrative along with scriptural quotations, would make such egregious errors and commit such apparent anachronisms as to impeach the work beyond satisfactory explanation by its proponents.

Stated briefly, then, we aver there are ample evidences of words and idioms of Hebrew origin. There is a challenging absence of expressions that would otherwise stamp the book as a creation or fiction of the day; and there are a number of things in the record which give evidence of its divinity and authenticity, because only the most profound and astute Bible student could have avoided making errors that would at once condemn the book. I would also suggest that in the case of Joseph Smith there might have been gross errors of grammar.

I WANT TO BE FRANK with you. I am going to set out with respect to evidences of Hebrew origin and absence of so-called "modernism" something of the work of others, and I should mention that I have received material help from a small book prepared by Doctor John Widtsoe, though I have not confined my language to that found in his book, called Seven Claims of the Book of Mormon.

Common contractions, such as can't, couldn't, don't, shouldn't, and others found among English-speaking people are not found in the Book of Mormon and are never found in Hebrew writing.

There are no titles in the Book of Mormon, such as Mr., Mrs., Miss, Professor, Dr., M.A., B.A., Hon., Ph.D., lady, gentleman, sir, madam, or reverend, and no titles of nobility. There are only two exceptions as to titles: the word "king" and the word "captain" are used.

If the writer of the Book of Mormon had put in any surnames, it would have been a fatal mistake, because surnames did not come into general use until the eleventh century. That would not harmonize with the alleged history of the Book of Mormon.

There are no q's, x's, or w's in any uncorrupted proper names. And you do not find them in the old Bible, nor in the Hebrew language—another evidence indicating the Hebrew origin, because the Nephites were of Hebrew descent.

There are no modern names of cloths, such as calico, muslin, linsey, broadcloth, and many more.

There are no modern names of wearing apparel, such as skirts, pantaloons, waistcoats, collars, cuffs, gloves, boots, shirts, and many others, which very easily could have crept in there, if the book had been written out of the imagination of some man of that time.

No schools nor institutions of learning are mentioned; no libraries, museums, or collections; no phrases or single words, such as "namely, as follows, the following, to wit, the foregoing, the above, to sum up, for instance, for example." None of these, also, are found in Hebrew writings—another "straw in the wind" which indicates Hebrew origin.

No names of churches or religious movements are given. The Mohammedans are not mentioned, the Jesuits, Franciscans, and so on.

There is no principle of science in the Book of Mormon under any modern name.

In money it would have been fatal if the decimal system had been suggested, such as five and five tenths, or eight and two tenths, because the decimal system was invented in the Christian Era, since the days of Christ in another sphere.

There is no reference to relative values in English or American money.

No weekdays are mentioned. That is something to think about; and no names of months as we have them; because the names of our days of the week are Anglo-Saxon in origin and do not come from Hebrew at all. Our months are of Roman or Latin origin.

There are no specific religious days, such as Easter or Lent.

There is no mention made of modern drinks, such as tea, coffee, and chocolate.

The narrow neck of land is mentioned repeatedly in the Book of Mormon. Any one in the nineteenth century, speaking about that little neck of land down there, instantly would have thought of Panama; but it is always referred to as the narrow neck of land, showing there was fidelity in the translation of the book.

If there had been any references to latitude or longitude, it would have been a fatal mistake. There are none such in the Book of Mormon. Latitude and longitude were principles developed in the fourth century, about A.D. 382, in other places.

The Indians—the aborigines of this country—were known to Joseph Smith and his confederates and his contemporaries. They were known as Indians, but never are they referred to as Indians in the Book of Mormon. They are always referred to as Lamanites.

The time of the crucifixion set out in the Book of Mormon, taking into consideration that the crucifixion took place on the other side of the world, exactly corresponds.

There is no mention of the trial by jury.

The words "quite," "just," or "guess" are not used.

Some of these things seem insignificant, and they would be if taken by themselves and alone; but all together they have strong evidentiary value in demonstrating—or at least proving satisfactorily—that the Book of Mormon gives evidence of a Hebrew origin and that it was not the work of men of the last-century, English-speaking persons of and from the common men of the times of Joseph Smith.

I NOW CALL TO YOUR ATTENTION something that indicates the genuineness of the work and is of great importance to me.

Let us go back to the story of Lehi and his colony, which allegedly left Jerusalem about 600 B.C. You will remember that some of the family went back, and among other things they brought out was the "book of the law." This was of course what we call the "Old Testament." You will remember that when Jesus began his ministry at Nazareth, he entered the synagogue, asked for "the book of the law," and read certain passages from Isaiah. Now the book of the law, or the old Bible, while it at that time may have contained the record of other prophets than those recorded in the Bible of today as we now have it, shows that following the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah approximately six hundred years before Christ there were a number of prophets who lived and spoke and whose words were recorded in the record.

There are several hundred passages or quotations from the prophets which are quoted in the Book of Mormon, and that they are sometimes quoted differently than as found in the Bible speaks much for the correctness of the work of translation, when you give the matter consideration. Since the colony of Lehi allegedly left at a certain time, if any of the later prophets were quoted, it would have been fatal indeed to our claims concerning the book. Fortunately for the integrity of the book, there are no such passages to be found in it.

Let us consider the Book of Ether: This is an account of a colony that, according to the record, left about two thousand years before the birth of Christ—if Ussher's chronology is accepted as correct. A careful reading of the abridgment known as the Book of Ether, which does not require any length for reading, discloses that it does not mention any of the many things that a man writing from imagination, or even as historical fiction, would likely have brought into the story. Here are some of such things: the Law of Moses is not mentioned, neither the Ten Commandments. If they had been brought into the record, it would have been fatal. If Mount Sinai, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Palestine, the Dead Sea, Jordan, or the priesthoods had been mentioned, any of them would have been fatal, because they did not exist, so far as the people of Ether, Jared, and his brother were concerned.

If Joseph Smith is chargeable with writing the book, it is inconceivable that he knew enough about the Bible and biblical history to have avoided the almost inevitable mistakes that he would have made. This applies to Sidney Rigdon or any other man of the same period. These things relate to the internal evidences of the book.

I NOW WISH TO CONSIDER one of the most remarkable statements of the Book of Mormon, in considering which we must resort to things not of record in it. I quote from the fourth chapter of Mormon, beginning with the ninety-ninth verse. Moroni says: "If our plates had been sufficiently large we should have written in the Hebrew, but the Hebrew hath been altered by us, also, and if we could have written in the Hebrew, behold ye would have had no imperfection in our record." Now, please note what follows:

"But the Lord knoweth the things which we have written, and also that none other people knoweth"—that is, no other people at the time Moroni was writing, for it is in the present tense, "that none other people knoweth our language. . . . therefore he hath prepared means for the interpretation thereof." We, of course, know what these means were.

Here was a man writing a record, pursued by deadly enemies, and theoretically killed soon afterward, and he was saying, on his own authority or by inspiration (though if a true statement, it must have been by inspiration, which is in harmony with our entire theory about the book), that there was no people in the world that knew the writing of his record. What could he possibly have known, on his own account, about the people in the Old World? There were no means of communication, such as we now have, between the Old World and the New.

Now Moroni said: "We have written this record according to our knowledge in the characters, which are called among us the reformed Egyptian, being handed down and altered by us, according to our manner of speech."

WE take Moroni at his word as to the time he was writing, for in the seventh verse of the safe fourth chapter of the Book of Mormon, we find this: "Behold, four hundred years have passed since the coming of our Lord and Savior."

The word "coming" must be construed, I submit, as referring to the Savior's advent in the Western Hemisphere. Well, according to the usual belief of the Christian world, the Savior lived approximately thirty-three years. If so, then, we find Moroni saying, according to his record, that about A.D. 433, the present or Christian dispensation, there was no people in the world that knew Egyptian writing. I submit, unless Moroni was given this knowledge, it was a daring—an audacious statement for him to make.

We have learned that the Hebrew children were four hundred years in Egypt. We are told that Moses was much learned in the Egyptian lore. And we can well believe that the people down to the time of the alleged departure from Jerusalem could have retained their knowledge of the Egyptian.

I go to history recognized as authentic and find in the Historians' History of the World, Volume 1, pages 250, 251, this statement about Egypt:

About the beginning of our era (that is, the Christian Era), Egypt having become a Roman province, all of its personal life was stamped out. The hieroglyphic language was no longer written or read, long before that the language of the people had been greatly modified from its ancient purity, and in the days of Egypt's greatness it was only the scholarly few, chiefly the priests, who could read and write the language. Now this speech became still further modified. Finally, through the slow mutations of time modern coptic has developed as its lineal descendant.

In the early days, however, probably before the time of the oldest existing records, the original picture writing, or hieroglyphics proper, had been modified into a sort of running script or symbol writing, which the Greeks called hieratic, and this again had undergone (just as the writing said) another modification some four or five centuries before, the development of a script called coriorial or demotic, which, in the days of the Ptolemies, represented the language of the Egyptian people. But after the complete disruption of the Egyptians under the Romans, the hieratic and demotic forms of writing, as well as the hieroglyphics, ceased to be employed, and presently, as has been said, all three forms became quite unintelligible to any person living. From that time on until the early days of the nineteenth century, the records of Egypt, preserved so numerous on their monuments, on the papyrus rolls, and on mummy cases, were a closed book. No man lived during this period, in Egypt nor out of Egypt, who did more than effect the crudest guess at the meaning of this strange writing. For something like two thousand years the Egyptian language was a dead language in the fullest sense of the term, and the records locked imperishably in the hieroglyphics seemed likely to hold their mysterious secret from the prying minds of generations of men. But then, in the early days of the nineteenth century, the key was unexpectedly found and to the delight of the scholarly world the Egyptian Pandora box was opened.

Now, if these historians are correct and they are said to be, two thousand years back of the beginning of the last century Egyptian was a dead language. Therefore in A.D. 433, there was no people in the world who could know the Egyptian language or could read Egyptian writing. That statement is absolutely demonstrated and proved by these facts.

How was the Pandora box opened? A soldier in the French army under Napoleon in Egypt at a town called Rosetta, found a peculiarly marked stone. He took it with him, and today it is lodged in the British Museum in London. It was broken somewhat, but most of it was in good condition. After it found lodgment there, early in the last century pictures of this stone were sent out to the men of the scientific world. They were asked to see what they could do toward deciphering it. Well, they knew that one part of the record was the hieroglyphic and another was demotic.

They saw that the third part was Greek. It occurred to a Frenchman named Champollion, after he had been thinking about it and noticed a recurrence of characters in each one of these writings that it was the same document, only in three different writings—hieroglyphic, demotic, and Greek! That gave him the key, and starting with that small key, he and others finally developed Egyptology to an exact science, so that by 1865 they had not only hieroglyphic dictionaries and hieroglyphic grammars but also demotic dictionaries and demotic grammars.

BUT JOSEPH SMITH knew nothing of these events. In February, 1828, he handed a piece of writing about the size of 5½x11 inches to Martin Harris. You have heard the story. Harris took that paper to New York City and talked to Professor Anthon and some others there who said it was Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyrian, and Arabic writing.

I do not know where Joseph Smith got those characters. I do not know where Joseph Smith got those records. But here is something that has been demonstrated. He said that he had copied them from the plates. Let us put that aside for the moment.

We have that Anthon transcript, the very identical paper that was taken to New York City by Martin Harris in our vaults in Independence. When we purchased the manuscript of the Book of Mormon from the heirs of David Whitmer, about 1904, they turned over to us this document which had been with the manuscript all these years and which David Whitmer told a committee, consisting of my father, my Uncle Alexander, and some others, way back in the 1880's, was the same document that Martin Harris took to New York City. We know what those characters were like. They were first published to the world in 1844 in The Prophet (New York City) so there is no dispute about what those characters looked like.

Some Egyptologists who are interested not only in that subject, but also in the Book of Mormon, who are connected with the Utah Mormon Church, have gone into the demotic dictionaries and discovered out of the two hundred thirty-six characters altogether on that paper, about a hundred thirty-five different ones, and of these there are ninety-seven exact identities found in the demotic dictionary.

Now, wherever Joseph Smith got those characters, it is thus demonstrated that they are Egyptian.

Suppose they had found all the different characters in the demotic dictionary. That would have proved too much, and to prove too much is just as fatal as proving too little, because Moroni, you remember, said the characters had been changed by them according to their speech.

I submit to you that this is an outstanding and significant fact which tends to prove this is a genuine record.

I DO NOT BLAME anybody for having reservations about the Book of Mormon, especially those who are investigating, because of the marvelous and miraculous way in which it allegedly has come about. My own father early in his ministry had some hesitation about it. There are those here who knew him, who probably have a pretty good idea as to his character. I think that of all the men I have known—and I had pretty close contact with him for a number of years as his secretary—in my time in whose integrity I had absolute confidence, he would take undoubtedly the top place with all of them. He said that he had reservations about the Book of Mormon for some years after he took the presidency of the church; but one day, when he was occupying the pulpit, he mentioned the Book of Mormon. As he did, an audible voice spoke to him, as if coming from a person at his right, saying, "The Book of Mormon is of divine authenticity." He related that he stood still and listened. A second time the statement was repeated, and still he stood there, and the third time the voice said, "The Book of Mormon is of divine authenticity." He said he never had any difficulty in talking about the Book of Mormon after that.

Paul says that to some it is given to know, to them knowledge is given, just as many of you have received a testimony about the truthfulness of this book; and to others it is given to believe on their testimony, and it is even more blessed for the latter to exercise faith and believe than it is for those to whom the testimony was directly given. It is disastrous for one to have a testimony and then repudiate it. I declare that if I did not have any testimony about this Book of Mormon myself, I could believe on the testimony of my father. I believe there are others here who could almost say the same thing.

Now I believe that of all the people in the world, we have the least excuse for finding lodgment in our hearts and minds for this spirit of secularism. I think we have a story of adventure such as no other church in the world has, and I don't see any reason why we should lose interest and faint and fall by the wayside.

Adopting the words of Henry Van Dyke:

So let the way wind up the hill or down,
Or rough or smooth, the journey will be joy,
Still seeking what I sought when but a boy—
New friendships, high adventure, and a crown.
My heart will keep the courage of the quest,
I know the road's last turn will be the best.

"WITNESSING THROUGH THE SACRAMENTAL ORDINANCES"

BY MAURICE L. DRAPER

For General Class Use.

The reunion theme, "Sources of Spiritual Power," is significantly related to the ordinances of the gospel. "In the ordinances thereof the power of godliness is manifest; and without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto men in the flesh."—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 3.

The course of lessons prepared for the general class is intended to reveal the nature of the ordinances, thus showing how they are "sources of spiritual power." But the purpose of God in the revelation of spiritual power is certainly for the winning of men to the fellowship of the kingdom of God. We therefore suggest that the missionary value of the ordinances be constantly kept in mind and stressed in the class sessions.

Not much attention is given to the mechanics of administering the ordinances. This part of worship, however, needs attention, and as the theological and philosophical aspects of the ordinances are discussed, the teacher may well relate these to the circumstances under which the various ordinances should be administered so as to give them dignity and beauty, enhancing the appeal for both nonmembers and members alike of these symbolic expressions of divine power.

The sacramental values of baptism, Communion, the various ordinances requiring the laying on of hands, and marriage are discussed in the lessons. The material is not exhaustive but intended to be stimulating and point the direction for discussion with major points of the nature and purpose of the various ordinances stated briefly. In each case the ordinance is related to the basic missionary ministry of the church. These sources of spiritual power provide resources for witnessing—through the sacramental ordinances of the gospel.

"THE POWER OF STEWARDSHIP"

BY BISHOP EARL T. HIGDON

This study unit deals with the simple fundamental principles of stewardship. It is not an all-inclusive treatment of the subject, but is intended as an aid in understanding these principles and the resulting power from their application.

A brief treatment is given to the source of power and the means of appropriating the power available. The place of the church as an agency or means of empowerment is presented and direction given to the use of power.

The practical application of the doctrine of accountability, dealing specifically with the matter of filing the tithing statement, is presented with illustrative charts. The processes within the church leading to the development of stewards is explained, also the resulting gain in the power of the church to minister to the needs of the world because an increasing number of Saints improve and respond to the obligations and opportunities of stewardship.

The first movements in the development of the storehouse are presented. New horizons open before church members as they develop in their appreciation of common obligations through the merging of individual resources. In the storehouse new opportunities unfold. But this is only possible as individuals develop the power of personal stewardships and grow in an appreciation of the principles involved in the development of the storehouse.

"DEVELOPING SPIRITUAL POWER"

For Women's Classes

Prospective teachers of women's classes in the 1951 reunions should secure as soon as possible the study outlines recently prepared by the General Women's Council, at the request of the First Presidency. This course guides teacher and class in a detailed examination of this year's reunion theme, "Sources of Spiritual Power," from a woman's viewpoint.

Some of the subjects considered are where and how spiritual power is recognized and how it finds expression in personal service, the Friendly Visiting Program, missionary endeavor, and in accepting personal responsibility for the success of the women's department.

The outline is detailed and specific but can be used only as a starting point for the preparation of each course. Each teacher will need to study and make prayerful preparation to add personal incidents and examples from history, literature, and real life which will make the classes her own creation. Such preparation leaves the door open for the inspiration of the hour to meet the need of that particular class and occasion when a teacher comes prayerfully and carefully equipped for her task.

"SPIRITUAL POWER THROUGH THE MINISTRY OF PRIESTHOOD"

For Priesthood and Men's Class

Text: The Nature of Priesthood, by CHARLES FRY

First Day—Priesthood Is the Power of God.

Second Day—Priesthood Organized for Ministry of Spiritual Power.

Third Day—Priesthood Ministers Spiritual Power Through a Living Church.

Fourth Day—Spiritual Power Through the Ordinances and Gifts.

Fifth Day—Spiritual Power for Today's World.

Sixth Day—Keeping Fit for a Ministry of Spiritual Power.

The text for this course should be in the hands of every person in the class. It may be procured either from the Herald Publishing House (price 35c), or from the Herald Bookstand at the reunion. This is a fundamental text which treats thoroughly the question of priesthood and its functions. It is the type of book that will answer many questions by those who wish to know the scriptural basis of priesthood organization, and it should be in the library of every Latter Day Saint home.

A mimeographed outline of the course has been prepared and is available to teachers who will write F. M. McDowell, Director of Priesthood Training, The Auditorium. Ten cents in stamps should accompany the order to cover mailing costs.

By CARL MESLE

Reunion Classwork for Young People

As a guide to teachers who are called to inspire young people with the resources available to them in the church, the subject matter has been broken into six chapters:

CHAPTER I: Acknowledge God—

In which the need to recognize God and his place in peoples' lives and in the universe is discussed.

CHAPTER II: The Latter-day Concept of God—

Here the concepts of God restored by the Restoration are discussed. The teacher should inform himself on different concepts held by other churches.

CHAPTER III: Seek Strength Through Worship—

Herein is discussed worship as the source of strength to meet daily problems and to achieve the abundant life.

CHAPTER IV: Seek Power Through Study—

The importance of study and the acquiring of accurate knowledge as a tool in building a full and rich life is suggested in this chapter.

CHAPTER V: Seek to Serve Your God—

Activities and service within the church and on behalf of one's fellow man are discussed as the key to the well-balanced, well-adjusted life.

CHAPTER VI: Be Valiant in Testimony—

The whole purpose of Christianity is suggested in Latter Day Saints' responsibility for their neighbors. The necessity of demonstrating their conviction in action as well as in words is brought out.

The challenge to the teacher preparing to teach this course will be to bring its message to young people in concepts and in a vocabulary which they can understand. He will be required to start at their level and build from there to make the class effective in the lives of those who may take part.

The Call of Evangelism

By W. J. Breshears

I READ A STORY recently about the proverbial old deacon who was leading in prayer. One of his stereotyped phrases was "O Lord, touch the unsaved with thy finger." As he intoned this phrase in his prayer, he stopped short. Other members came to his side and asked if he were ill. "No," he replied, "but a voice seemed to say to me, 'Thou art the finger.'"

Too many people are like the old deacon. They believe in a program of evangelism that will carry the message of the restored gospel to all nations. They pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven." But they are willing to let someone else do the work which is necessary to get the job done, because they have not caught the spirit of evangelism.

Into the Kingdom

The term "evangelism" is not original with Latter Day Saints, but we have given it a much broader application in the very nature of the Restoration Movement. It is the preaching or promulgation of the gospel in its fullest sense. We have been given the assignment to build up the kingdom of God on earth. Therefore the term "evangelism" is applied to "the gospel of the kingdom." We are to declare the good news or glad tidings that "the kingdom of God is at hand"; that it actually exists upon the earth today; and that it will bring to the world peace, joy, happiness, and brotherly love. The people of the world do not recognize the kingdom and do not know what to look for. It is our business to take it to them.

Evangelism is the basic program of the church through which we seek to minister to men wherever we find them, both in and out of the church. Through the program of evangelism we endeavor to reach them on their level of understanding and lift them to higher levels, to help them to become the kind of people God would have them be. So they can qualify for all the blessings he has in store for his people. It is a teaching program and in that sense every member may become an evangelist. However evangelism is not confined to the office of evangelist.

The function of the branch is not merely to provide a place and a service of worship for members of the church, but to share "the gospel of the kingdom" with all the people in that area. The branch in most places has a much larger nonmember responsibility than member responsibility. Unless it takes the gospel to the nonmembers it may never have an opportunity to enjoy the blessings of the kingdom of God.

The program of evangelism did not begin with a General Conference resolution, or with Joseph Smith, Martin Luther, the Bible prophets, or the Great Commission. It originated in the heart of God. "This is my work and my glory to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man."—Doctrine and Covenants 22: 23. It is God's program for his people. He sent man to the earth that he might receive "a fullness of joy" (Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4) and "enter into his rest—which is the fullness of his glory."—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 4. It is God's purpose that man might qualify himself by obedience to the gospel law to enjoy eternal life in a celestial glory.

Religion and Evangelism

Religion has been designed to get men to conform voluntarily with the laws of God, which are for their benefit. These laws are eternal and are to bring man into a right relationship with the Heavenly Father. But he must obey the laws to receive their benefits. He has his agency. He always has had and always will have, even in eternity. He must learn to make the choices which will bring him into the right relationship with God. Religion seeks to help man do that which God wants him to do.

Someone has said, "Evangelism is the program; religion is the application of the program; and salvation in the kingdom of God is the result."

To evangelize we must have social concern over the terrible ravages of sin and error. Christ saw the effects of sin, and he cared. In his life and death we see the full extent to which a member of the kingdom of God will go to win men back to ways of God. We, too, must be deeply concerned over the ravages of sin. Our hearts should ache when we observe people who are content with lesser things. We will show our concern by doing the work the Master has given us to do—by heeding the call of evangelism and sharing with others the blessings of the kingdom of heaven. God through his church seeks to convince men to accept the kingdom way of life through a program of evangelism.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. The answers are the opinions and interpretations of the panel member signing them, and do not commit the Herald nor the church.

Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only questions with contributor's full name and address will receive attention.—EDITOR.

Question:

When Jesus said, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect," he asked more than we can accomplish. No man can be perfect. Why not accept the things Jesus taught that we can accomplish and disregard the rest?

R. B.

Answer:

Jesus was most practical and never asked men to do anything beyond their personal power to do, or if beyond their power he provided the means for their accomplishment. "My yoke is easy" suggests that he makes possible every requirement of his will. He did teach deep and mighty things, but interpreted them in terms of man.

In his own person he revealed the infinite God within the compass of human flesh; and while he held before men divine perfection, his plan was not to require or expect immediate perfection in man, but to start him on the way that led to perfection. This was the purpose, as Paul says (Ephesians 4:12), of the gospel and the church with its officers. Jesus said about entering into this way, "If they will forsake all things for my sake, with God whatsoever things I speak are possible" (Matthew 19:26, I. V. See also I Nephi 1:65; 5:59, 157).

This text presents some difficulty because of imperfect translation. Translators seldom or never find corresponding words in different languages identical in meaning, hence an unavoidable variation in shades of meaning between the translated work and the original. The original of "perfect" is the Greek teleois which has the meaning more of "completeness" as applied to labor, growth, conduct, etc., than to absoluteness of perfection. While the word does sometimes refer to the absolute degree, it more often refers to the process of attaining it.

Closely allied to this defect is our imperfect interpretation of the word. We are inclined to add to this word the idea of absoluteness, which is not always fitting. A study of the word in an unabridged dictionary will show various uses of it with limitations. Luke 6:36, quoting the Lord on this same statement, puts it "Be ye therefore merciful," etc.

A study of the context shows that Jesus was talking specifically to his chosen disciples, not to the people at large, giving them official instruction as to their ministry. In part it had to do with their personal deportment. It was in view of this that the statement in the question was uttered about being perfect and came as a climax to that part of his instructions he had given, as shown by the word "therefore" meaning, "in view of what I have said, be ye therefore perfect." It was in effect saying to them, "As ministers of mine you must conduct yourselves among the people in a manner that is circumspect, kind, sympathetic, patient, upright, and charitable, ministering in love and avoiding everything that would justify any word of reproach, even as your Heavenly Father deals with you." This is the light in which the word "perfect" applies. If others may find it convenient to adapt the advice to their lives it will be well.

Professor J. Newton Davies, writing in the Abingdon Commentary, says, "The perfect man according to Epictetus was the man who had set his feet on the true path and was still advancing—going on unto perfection." Absolute perfection is reached by man only at the end of the journey.

Question:

Please explain Isaiah 2:2, 3, concerning the Lord's house being established in the "top of the mountains."
Oklahoma

L. S.

Answer:

This prophecy refers to the re-establishment of the kingdom of Israel in the last days; but since its fulfillment is yet in the future, it is not possible to describe it in detail. It is best to study the chapter as a whole, together with Micah 4 which deals with the same thing. From these chapters we gather the following points:

Mountain of the Lord's house: a figure of speech meaning kingdom.

Established in top of mountains: in the midst of some great nation.

To be exalted: under divine protection and blessing.

Let us go, etc.: will draw from all nations.

Will teach us of his ways: the kingdom will have spiritual aspects.

The law go forth from Zion: God will be revealed there.

Word of Lord from Jerusalem: to be the center of gospel work to the nations; Zion and Jerusalem being considered as synonymous.

Beat swords into plowshares, etc.: growing peace merging into the millennium.

Lord shall reign over them in Zion: the Lord rules in justice and righteousness.

The first dominion: kingdom—return to Israel.

To the daughter of Jerusalem: not the original group at Jerusalem, Palestine, but to the daughter, signifying offspring or branch; also mentioned as daughter of Zion. Zion and the kingdom are to be built by a branch of Israel in a greater land far from Palestine.

Question:

How can we harmonize the teaching that America is Joseph's land with Genesis 48:28, which states that his portion was taken from the Amorite?
Pennsylvania

E. U.

Answer:

The Amorite was one of the tribes occupying the hill region of Canaan before Israel entered. When the land was conquered and divided among the tribes of Israel, this portion fell to the sons of Joseph, Ephraim, and Manasseh, as stated in Genesis 48:28.

Another land was also given to Joseph, greater than that given to his fathers, which in the light of modern revelation Latter Day Saints hold to have been America. According to the Book of Mormon, America was settled by a colony of Manassehites, descendants of Joseph, 600 B.C., who maintained a national existence upon the land for about one thousand years and was eventually broken up. The Indians of today are understood to be the remnants of that nation, and consequently of the line of Joseph. This inheritance was in addition to his inheritance in Canaan.

Tell Me the Story of Jesus

By Marie Gosline

Personalities in the News

THE NEW PROGRAM DIRECTOR of radio station WHLS in Port Huron, Michigan, is Richard A. Whitford. Brother Whitford, better known as Dick, assumed his new duties on March 26, 1951. Before his appointment as program director, he served as a special commentator and newscaster. He has worked for the station since its beginning twelve years ago.

Born March 25, 1908, Brother Whitford is the son of Elder and Mrs. Charles C. Whitford. He was the youngest of six children. His mother died in 1913 when he was five years old. His father, the first pastor of the Port Huron Branch, is still active despite the fact that he is almost eighty years old. Some years after the death of his mother, Dick's father married the former Mrs. Elizabeth Plato who was active in music direction and pioneered music work with choirs for the church throughout the Eastern Michigan District. Under her leadership, Dick began his musical training, joining the local choir when he was fourteen. He became prominent throughout the district as a bass soloist and choir director. He served as director of music for the Port Huron Branch from 1944 to 1950. During this time the choir presented a forty-weeks series of Sunday afternoon programs over WHLS. Brother Whitford received voice training under the direction of Henrietta Davis of the Detroit Conservatory of Music, who is a member of the church. He teaches a class in the church school in the Port Huron Branch and has served as a teacher many years.

Prior to his affiliation with WHLS, Dick was connected for ten years with the Mueller Brass Company, Port Huron's largest industry, where he served as

SO MANY TIMES in this life we need the story of Jesus, yet many children are growing up without it. And this is a tough world. Sometime or other as these children grow older, they are going to find this out. They are going to find out that they need the simple but strong faith of David, the shepherd boy. How much better it would be if they had within their hearts an abiding faith—something to cling to when the seas grow rough.

On a street of San Francisco a mother was walking with her little boy. The child had fallen and bruised his knees. He was wailing loudly—far more loudly than the hurt knees demanded. The mother went on her way, paying no attention whatever to the little boy. Down at the end of the block, she passed a woman going in the opposite direction. This woman was evidently greatly concerned over the child's knees. She was apparently of the old school—the "kiss and make it well type." "Your little boy seems to be hurt," she said to the mother. Without a moment's hesitation the mother answered. "Listen, this is a tough world, and the sooner he finds it out the better. A boy's paths may be rough, but when he grows to be a man he'll find that a man's paths are rougher still. If he learns now that life isn't all a bed of roses, it will be just that much easier for him when he becomes a man."

TODAY THE WORLD NEEDS JESUS.

It needs to accept the teachings of this simple Nazarene. Each one of us needs to have every word of Jesus written deep on our hearts. We need to be able to realize that only through him can we love more abundantly, that only through him can we have eternal life. This is no time to sit on the sidewalk and nurse our wounds. This is no time for us to wail and cry—to expect someone to come along and kiss the hurt and make it well. The time is ripe. We must be up and doing.

The other day we attended a funeral. It was of a young man—just turned twenty-four years old—a "jet" pilot who had been killed, ironically enough, in an automobile accident. It was a military funeral, and as the guns gave their last salute, and as three "jets" swooped down out of the sky in their final tribute, I could not help thinking of the time young Tommy, just entering the service, had said to his mother, "Surely we believe something, Mother! What does our family believe?"

Everyone, no matter how hard and tough the world has made him; evan insurance investigator and adjuster. Previous to this, he worked over six years as a proofreader for the Port Huron Times Herald. Brother Whitford conducted a research classification study of the Sanilac County, Michigan, records which were jumbled in a common vault from the date of a courthouse fire in 1915 until he was engaged for the study in 1938. He also became a deputy sheriff in Sanilac County, which adjoins his native county of St. Clair. He terminated his residence in Sanilac County when he returned to Port Huron to become affiliated with the Mueller Brass Company.

On January 1, 1931, Dick married Frances E. Merrill. They have three children: Richard C. Whitford, now stationed with the United States Air Force at Lackland Air Base in Texas; Dawn E. and Jane E., students at Port Huron high school.

In his new position, Dick Whitford will increase his acquaintances throughout the area covered by radio station WHLS. A friend of his has stated, "As his acquaintances increase in number, so will his friends increase, for he is that type of person. His honest decisiveness is frank and direct. His faith in God and the rightness of intelligent compliance with divine law has given him a testimony of value. He is firm in his positive faith in the risen Christ and the powers of the Almighty."

everyone, no matter how honest, upright, and sincere; everyone at some time or other in his life needs the story of Jesus. Let us not nurse our wounds. Let us not leave our children unlearned and have them come to us and say, "What do we believe? Surely we must believe something."

THE OTHER DAY a minister, the pastor of one of the town's more popular churches called upon me. In the course of the conversation, he asked me to what church I belonged. After I told him he paused for a few moments, thought a while, and said, "I don't believe I know your church." Then all at once, he said, "Oh, yes, I do. Of course I do. You used to have a little publication called The Ensign." Then he paid our church a great tribute. I shall never forget his words. "I know your church now—I have known many of your people, and many of your missionaries, and I know nothing but good about it." When I thanked him, he said, "Anyone—anyone at all who ever says anything different is simply ignorant. Yours is a wonderful heritage. You have much to be proud of, and much to live up to. . . . We have need for you people here in Marin County."

Indeed we, the members of this church, do have a wonderful heritage. We have a past that we can be proud of and a future full of promise. But you and I cannot relax and rest on the oars of those who have gone before. We have a little job to do—just you and I. We cannot leave it to future generations. It is ours alone to do, and now is the time to do it. It is the job of living Christlike lives. It is the job of telling the story of Jesus in our everyday living. Like David, we need to put on the armor of faith—to let the story of Jesus be seared upon our hearts.

Let us, in these days of strife and worry not forget the old simple story—"the sweetest that ever was told." Let's each one tell it in his own way.

We'd like you to know the harvest season are works of art. He also serves the branch as a deacon and is a member of the Lamoni Branch Choir.

Mr. Bergman donated the west sixty-four feet of his property to be used as part of the front yard of the new Lamoni church. He is a member of the park board in Lamoni.

He has been a member and usually an officer of the Lamoni Fireside Drama Club since 1929, and has played many dramatic roles. One of his best performances was that of Scrooge in Dickens' Christmas Carol. His interest in drama has had other outlets, some of them amusing. About 1932 he was asked to wear an appropriate costume and assist in a comic dance for a program sponsored by a Graceland group. His "Dance of the Nymphs" and other creations have been "musts" on many a program since. He interprets the aesthetic points with a grace which has been compared to Ichabod Crane. At the other end of the histrionic spectrum is his annual performance as Uncle Sam in Lamoni pageantry on the Fourth of July.

At Graceland he is a member of the Committee on Student Selection, the Curricular Adjustment Committee, and the Academic Council. He was the first secretary of Lambda Delta Sigma—Graceland honor society—and has served as its president. He is a member of Phi Beta Kappa, honor society for scholarship.

He was married in 1921 to a Montana girl, Frances Rees, who was teaching in the Lamoni grade school. As Graceland's Registrar he has evaluated the transcripts of three of his children. A fourth child is expected to enter Graceland next year.

Christ, the Master Teacher in the Home

By Joyce Anderson

Sydney, Australia

*The author and her son,
Ian William*

RECENTLY I READ A STORY of a young housewife. As this young woman was doing her weekly washing, a prayer of gratitude moved within her heart: "I thank thee, Father, that thou hast taught me to enjoy life's homely tasks." The words came again and again, and finally she reached for her pad and pencil and wrote down the words of her prayer. They were followed by more expressions of thankfulness for the blessings that come from doing the many everyday tasks of her home. She saw the freshly ironed shirts and mended socks as part of her stewardship and not to be thought of as drudgery. She knelt in a prayer of thankfulness and praise to her Heavenly Father. Never before had she experienced such an abundance of the Spirit of God in her home. It was a revelation and one of the happiest days of her life because it taught her a beautiful lesson. Her soul had expanded, and she saw that work was love made visible.

A lesson learned from Jesus Christ? I think so. We shall enjoy our daily tasks if our minds and hearts are centered upon him.

Prayer is of vital importance in the home, especially when we have the God-given task of rearing young children and bringing them to a true understanding of him. All members of the family should pray together often for mutual understanding, strength, courage, and wisdom. And where could we find such a perfect teacher of prayer and the power of prayer as Jesus Christ?

We think of Christ as the essence of love, patience, hope, trust, faith, and gentleness. Can we exclude any one of these attributes and still have Christlike homes? I believe that we should try to the end of our lives to keep Christ's virtues in our homes, because they are the foundations of our daily living.

ONE OF THE THINGS for which I am most grateful in regard to my home is the picture that my boys see each morning when they wake and every time they enter their rooms. Ours is an old house with big windows which we keep wide open when the weather permits, to let in an abundance of sweet, fresh air. My oldest son looks out through his window onto a big plum tree, which at present is in full bloom. The picture framed by the open window is one that never fails to thrill me with the beauty of nature. The other two little boys look through their window into a big persimmon tree, now a mass of new soft green leaves. Both these pictures vary as the trees come into bloom, then leaf out, bear their fruit, shed their leaves, and through the winter stand bare and silently waiting for the warmth of spring. I am grateful for these living pictures, and I pray that my boys through them will learn to see God's hand in the beauty of nature.

"Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin. Yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these"—a lesson we can learn from Christ to teach in our homes? I think so.

THE STORY OF MARY AND MARTHA has meant much to me since I have become interested in the church. Before marriage I had no experience with small children. I was reared in an orderly home and have tried to keep my own home neat, but sometimes children make this almost impossible. The conflict between orderliness and the confusion caused me a great deal of concern until I heard the story of Mary and Martha told with a different emphasis placed upon it. In my previous casual consideration of the meaning of this story, I had always had a strong feeling of sympathy for Martha who worried about the housework, but with experience I have learned the beauty of Mary's attitude. She had chosen the "good part," which would not be taken away from her. Many times I have been like Martha, "troubled about many things" and have failed to heed the teachings of Christ. I like to think of the story of Mary and Martha and visualize Christ in that home as a wonderful friend and teacher, sharing their hospitality and enjoying their friendship. Think of the joy that must have been in Mary's heart as she sat at Jesus' feet and of the "careful and troubled" Martha as she went about her work. She, too, had her virtues and loved and served, but perhaps did not have the right sense of values. It can be difficult to stop in the middle of making beds, washing dishes, sweeping floors, cooking a meal, or doing any of the things that have to be done in a home to teach two little boys to share, to lend, to play happily with one another, to be kind and loving. I rather think that housewives who find that "work is love made visible" will share a place with Mary at Jesus' feet.

THE STORY IS TOLD of a mother of five small children who was ill and unable to do her daily work. Her household chores were mounting up. Various neighbors called to see if they could do something, but she did not want to be a burden to them. Then Mrs. Kelley dropped in. "I'm doing my washing, now let me have yours. I've no time to argue whether you want me to or not—and I also want your ironing." A good Samaritan? Yes, she saw a need and did her part.

The picture of Christ taking into his arms the little children, whose mothers had brought them to him to be blessed, is a lovely one. Most people like children, and find them amusing and entertaining. The person who really loves children and understands them is harder to find; theirs is an attitude which can only be called Christlike. "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God," is a lesson learned from Jesus that we can use in our homes.

Most of us at some time or another have lived near an underprivileged family. When we lived in one of the best suburbs of Sydney there were two families close to us who were either not spoken to, or spoken to only with condescension. In one family the mother was like "the old woman who lived in the shoe." She had too many children and, consequently, they were not always clean and well dressed. The other family had the misfortune to have a father who drank his wages away, and the children went without many of the necessities of life. The mother used to go out to work at nights to feed them. No one spoke to these people. When I think of these families, I think of Jesus and the woman of Samaria, who asked, "How is it that thou being a Jew asketh drink of me who am a woman of Samaria?" Think of this woman and the families I have mentioned. Is this not a lesson for us from Christ, the Master Teacher?

THERE ARE MANY HUMBLE TASKS to be done in a home, yet what a virtue humility is. What a lesson in humility Christ gave when he, the Son of God whom the disciples called Lord and Master, stooped to wash their feet! There are many lessons to be learned from Christ that we may practice in our homes. Let us be humble in our homes and full of love, patience, and understanding. Let us be a good Samaritan to our neighbors and friends and those in need.

Son of the Carpenter, receive
This humble work of mine.
Worth to my meanest labor give
By joining it to thine.

The Prayer of a Tired Mother

THEY ARE ASLEEP, O God, and I am tired. I want the hush of a half-hour with thee. I want to bathe my soul in the infinite, as workers covered with dust and sweat plunge into the sea.

Let my hot heart feel thy cool vastness, my muddy mind lose itself in thy crystal wisdom, my bruised love be healed in the waters of thy love, so sure, so calm, and deep.

God, I could not bear to be a mother another day if I thought I should be called to account for all my mistakes. I would never seek thee unless I thought thou wert as forbearing and loveblind as I; but, because my own children never come to me without my heart leaping to meet them, so I learn to be very bold toward my Father which is in heaven. I am all faults. My very love trips up my wisdom, and my care breeds worry. My sense of expediency makes me disloyal to truth.

One has to be very great and good to be a mother. No one short of God himself could be equal to it; but I love them, Father, and I love to climb beside thy seat.

Teach me thine own wondrous skill, and in due time I may also learn to wait and to suffer, and by loving wisdom, to circumvent.

I know it is of no avail to tell them anything. I know that their little eyes are sharp and see my soul and that they copy me; therefore make me good—good in my deepest purpose, good in my desires. Make me all I want them to be—strong, true, and great-hearted. Save me from the irritation of little things.

Give me the inspiring long vision, the sense of perspective, so that I may judge between essentials and nonessentials.

Let me be a real mother to my children, mending their souls and fancies, and helping to weave their dreams as well as attending to their bodies. Help me to learn wisdom from their dear humanities, the secret of trust in thee from their trust in me—and keep them from harm. Let them grow up sound and unspoiled, and let them always love me. Amen.

Religion on Trial - Part I

The First in a Series of Discussions by College Students and Their Instructors

By Dr. Roy A. Cheville

Dean of Faculty and Instructor of Religion, Graceland College

Are there qualities in members of the church that discourage nonmembers from wanting to join the church?

THIS QUESTION does not come out of an encyclopedia. It comes right out of the book of life. All of us have heard the charge that church members are stumbling blocks to nonmembers. We hear that if we could remake or re-do our members, there would be marked numerical increase. It is healthy and honest for an institution to face such a question and consider it frankly.

Young people at Graceland are known for their frankness. Some of my friends have said they would rather face a firing squad than teach a class in religion at the college. "You never know what they're going to ask," observed one commentator. "Why, they'll inquire about things I've always taken for granted," has come from another onlooker. "You never know what they'll accept as proof," has added another. With these three comments I agree. The first and second save us from staleness. The other provides an educational opportunity for evaluating what are sound data. I like this frankness. I like the language free from trite phraseology. Sometimes youngsters have a touch of cynicism and oneness to their views. I have discovered the same traits in oldsters.

WHAT YOUNG PEOPLE ARE SAYING

So when this question is asked me—the one with the implications about the shortcomings of members—I accept it and then turn to college youth to ask them what they are thinking. We want to discover if they believe members of our church do get in the way and become walls rather than doors. Here are what students say.

A young woman from Arkansas speaks:

I do not see many qualities in our church members that definitely discourage nonmembers from wanting to join the church, but there are some qualities that wouldn't encourage them to join. One thing is the low importance too many of us attach to the church in its relation to our lives. An onlooker might be surprised at the almost insignificant role the church plays in the lives of too many of us. They wonder how much it means to a member.

A young man from Canada, not long of our church fellowship, writes of his views about Zion.

Sometimes we seem to concentrate on the Utopian society that will do things for us. We forget the person outside who needs Christ. We fail to see how Zion will help him. Not uncommonly we want to gather for self-centered purposes when nonmember friends need us in places far from the center regions. Those outside may think us self-centered without concern for the needs of all mankind.

A sophomore from Michigan puts himself in the shoes of the outsider and imagines the viewpoint of the person looking at Latter Day Saints:

Yes, I believe some qualities in Saints do discourage nonmembers from joining the church. The one that stands out to me is the self-righteous attitude of those who do not live as they talk. "Hypocrites" is the word we use for these members. One right next to this is the Saint with the blunt authoritarian manner who is cocksure of himself and unsympathetic to others. Another quality that hinders is the bound-in-the-church program that never includes community activities. Such persons cannot get acquainted with anyone to invite into the "marvelous work and a wonder."

A young man from what he calls the "outlying areas" speaks of what he thinks has hindered the church's growth in the region of his home:

Some of the members have not been good exhibits of what the church stands for. Some are living back in the middle ages in their thinking. Some do not do a good day's work when employed; they lack occupational competence. At least a job should not reflect on the church. Some members and some teachers pass on information that is unsound. Young men and women often have to unlearn what they are taught. They need to be brought up-to-date in all fields of learning. I consider the most discouraging attitude to nonmembers is self-righteousness.

A freshman from Independence was asked the same question. He summarized our stumbling block under three headings. They need no comment.

1. Many of us emphatically profess our belief in and our desire to live in accordance with the principles stated in our Scriptures on Sunday or Wednesday nights. Then we denounce what we have said by the hypocritical lives we live the rest of the week.

2. Many of us busy ourselves trying to impress upon nonmembers the erroneous fact that God loves his "Latter Day Saints" a little more than other people, instead of trying our best to fulfill our divine mission of improving the lives and personalities of all with whom we make contact.

3. We aren't friendly enough. When we are friendly, we often let our personal desires become the basis of our friendships. Too often we ask ourselves, "What's in this friendship for me?" rather than asking our conscience, "What can be gained from this friendship for God and his work of kingdom-building?"

A young woman of the Midwest comes up with a spicy response. She even expressed thanks for the chance to speak out. She finds us responsible for keeping nonmembers out on two counts.

Yes! Too many of us haven't got any guts. So many of us venture a pussy foot reply to the question, "To what faith do you belong?" If we don't believe in something with enough strength and enthusiasm to speak up and declare ourselves, then we have no right to suggest that anyone join forces with us. We can't wait for "new blood" to give us the spirit and "up-and-at-em-ness" that is the very essence of a growing movement. If Latter Day Saints aren't people of conviction, then the work they're involved in isn't big enough to bother with.

Yes, again! Too many branches are nets of tight cliques that make periodical attempts at being friendly but usually are so wrapped up in their petty quarrels and jealousies they can't be of any service to anyone. They tend to become self-satisfied and narrow. Through their very attempts at missionary work they repel people by their superiority attitude.

A young woman of California sees us sharing in the conventional spirit of our times. She gathers her charge under the word "smugness." Apparently she has no place for a passive religion.

The worst preventive factor is smugness. We say our church gives meaning and purpose, then we sit down and wait for friends to rush to the waters of baptism. When they don't, we wonder what is the matter with them. We need to get out of this smugness and get adventuresomeness in our religion. We need to get out of ourselves and lose ourselves in God's great purpose for men—all men.

A sophomore from the central regions of the church takes a look at the church in action as a close observer might see it. He selects three counts in which members set up hindrances.

1. The "We've got it" and "We're it" attitudes come first. Such rigidity cannot attract thinking persons. The member must retain flexibility for the world of 1951.

2. We could stand more of the democracy we boast. An observer at General Conference would see the delegates as a "yea" and "amen" cheering section.

3. We need some friendship for the nonmember in meetings, especially in large congregations and in communities. A nod or perfunctory handshake is not enough.

A young man of the Midwest with occupational and military experience behind him looks at nonmembers and concludes that these qualities discourage them:

1. Using terms not meaningful to nonmembers—and not clear to us—confuses them. We have a set of terms such as "gifts" and "Zion" that do not mean much to others.

2. We spend too much time in attempting to "prove" the gospel by argument when we would do better to interpret it and live it.

3. We tend to overstate our rightness. We need to give credit where credit is due. Discounting all other religious movements is regrettable.

4. Some members live too low in social and occupational life. They do not meet financial obligations. Their lives do not witness of the Christ they profess.

Here is a voice from Australia. This will give the round-the-world flavor to our inquiry. Some weak points are listed by this youth from "down under."

1. Unfortunately we have those who take a very dogmatic and bigoted attitude. They can see no good outside the church.

2. Then there are hypocrites who leave their religion at home when they go to work. With these are backbiters and grippers who give a bad picture of the church.

3. Some live so much like the common run of the world that they give the nonmember no reason for joining the church.

4. There is a lack of sustained friendliness. I have seen the Saints make a fuss over a nonmember and then drop the attention after baptism, leaving him stranded. Either extreme was more than he could take.

SO WE CONCLUDE

These comments are not catty. One student handed in his paper with the observation, "I've found fault with the church most of my life and found I didn't have very much when I went to put it down on paper." Said another, "This list of undesirable points is negligible in comparison with the fine things I've experienced." Another with honest fervor added, "There are many things that need improvement, but complaining won't help. Let's get busy and raise better Latter Day Saints."

In review, let's look at the job designed for the church. It is not a museum of plaster saints nor an exhibit of angels. It is a laboratory in which men and women are busy at the experiment of living together—with God. Laboratories do not have the finished product. Paul's counsel to the Ephesians (4: 13ff.) pictured a company of believers working together at the business of building lives. I think nowhere is this viewpoint more needed than in circles of youth. Young people are in the laboratory experiment of growing up. We do not always read the directions for the laboratory experiment. Sometimes we get mixed up on proportions, and there are blowups and bangs in our relationships. The more we regard the church as a laboratory the more wholesome will be our relationships.

How selective shall the church be? Who has the answer? If we have no screening, then the church is like the common run of the world and has no reason for existence. If it becomes highly selective, the members may become "spiritually snooty." Where do you place the line? Why not help formulate a sound public mind on this matter? I am on the administrative staff of a college.

New Horizons

Many times we are criticized for keeping students who ought to be "kicked out," as critics say. Sometimes youths who appear aimless, cynical, and hostile to fine qualities of good students come round to a new way of life. Some become pillars in the church. Where do we draw the line?

Let's admit that many of our members do not live an everyday religion. Many get concerned about the glories of heaven when they ought to be concerned with building a glorified society here on earth. I confess it irks me when members waste their time speculating about the hereafter when practical jobs are begging for their energies now. I admit how often it bothers me when members who live in the twentieth century think as if they were in the twelfth century. Two things deliver me. First, I must see the total structure and not concentrate on any one queer feature of a building. I looked at all of Notre Dame cathedral, not at one grinning gargoyle. There was an oddity or two in the little branch into which I was baptized. The members were blessed with peculiarities. Truly the kingdom of heaven had gathered of unusual kinds. I could have centered on these and become cynical of the church. I hope observers are likewise tolerant of my idiosyncracies. Second, I resolve to see these persons not only as they are, but as they may become. With this goes a sense of responsibility to make all this come true. Sometimes friends of mine with college advantages forget their responsibilities to those of less privilege. There is a thrill in seeing friends mature in the church laboratory.

There is a placement of emphasis we shall do well to remember. The central figure of the church is Christ. The salutation to Joseph Smith was not, "This is Sam Brown; look at his mistakes," nor did it advertise his good points. The source of my inspiration and the norm by which I measure my life is not any apostle or bishop or deacon. It is the Christ himself. We need to say and say this again to prospects for membership. And we need to point to the lives in which Christianity has found a good expression. I can point to a friend—we shall call him Willis Quickpopple—who took one course in biology, called the church a back number, and asked that his name be taken off the record of the church, or I can point to a Lawrence Brockway who made a synthesis of science and theology. I can dwell on Tyrone Doolittle who sponged off the neighbors and never did an honest day's work, or I can turn to the integrity of an Art Lane in my home town.

Let's be honest, however. Let's admit there are members a bit shady in business affairs, a bit dirty in personal appearance, and a bit cantankerous in dealings with their neighbors. We lose by denying facts. It was said of Marietta Walker's mother that she so loved to be with the Saints that a Latter Day Saint jack-ass would sound like a singing angel. To the other fellow it would be a donkey's bray. I have found that honest admission is good for us all. The mere name of the church does not transform us.

So we conclude. Yes, some qualities of some members do deter some nonmembers from affiliating with the church. To these we make these resolutions. (1) The church shall be considered a laboratory for developing Saints, not as a counter for exhibiting them! (2) We shall center upon Christ as the norm of our achievement, not on any member or group of them. (3) We shall cooperate to develop a quality of membership that shall exhibit the church in action, and I am resolving to begin with myself.

* ONCE UPON A TIME

In the days of my youth there was a time when I had the impression that the Lord had given me an endowment of wisdom. I was gifted with special insight on the faults of others, and in the hope of "making this a better world to live in," I went around telling people their faults and how they should correct them.

Then an older and wiser man took me aside and gave me a new revelation of truth. He discussed a few of my outstanding faults—clearly indicating that he did not wish to mention all of them at that time—and particularly the fault of discussing faults. "There is a better way," he said, and unfolded to my astonished mind the gospel law of love.

From the splendid service he rendered to me, I have developed a hobby. I read all the personality and self-improvement stuff. I even read the Dorothy Dix things to see how man's faults look to women, and I'm sure to find some of my own in the list. These articles have helped me to weed out many a bad habit. And if you think I am still as full of faults as a cactus is of spines, you should have seen me before this hobby began! I find it is a good idea for me to keep a small, hot fire built under myself.

Observe this: The person who is always finding faults in others seldom knows anything about his own. The person who knows his own faults and tries to correct them will find many splendid qualities and kindly traits in others.

Paraphrasing Munro Leaf: "This is a Watch Bird watching a Fault Finder. This is a Watch Bird watching You. Have You been a Fault Finder this week?"

* R. I. P.

These three familiar letters are the initials of a prayer often found on early Christian tombs: "Requiescat in pace," meaning "Rest in peace."

The Travelers Insurance Companies' 1951 safety booklet appears under this title, with a different meaning, "Rest in Pieces." Lively and sometimes sanguinary cartoons, from the pen of talented Virgil Partch, illustrate the text.

Crash stop lights, and you'll rest in pieces. Exceed speed limits, jay-walk, hog the road, neglect your brakes, or drink while driving and you'll rest in pieces.

A car in the wrong hands can be a deadly weapon. Be careful not to kill anybody with it. The corpse might be you!

* VEGETABLES

The March issue of the "News Bulletin" of the Canadian Vegetarian Union which arrived recently carries a number of interesting items. We noted the slogan under the title: "The Future Belongs to the Vegetarians." In consideration of the prices of meat, one is inclined to say, "How true! How true!" We walked by the big refrigerator where the ready-package cuts were displayed and noted the prices. We came home with some lettuce, three carrots, and a loaf of bread.

Kisuke Sekine

WHILE MR. SEKINE is not a staff member of a church institution, the editor feels that his coming to Graceland as the first student from Japan is epochal. His attendance is made possible under the provisions of the Graceland College World Fellowship Fund established by members of the alumni and other friends of the college to provide assistance to students from abroad who face problems of travel and currency restrictions.

In Japan, Sekine lived with his mother and sister at Hanno, just outside of Tokyo, and worked as a chauffeur before coming to the United States. After completing his college work in America, he plans to return to Japan and set up an export and import business of his own. His father was a foreign trader before his death in 1934. Besides his interest in commerce and business, Sekine for a long time has made writing his hobby, and he hopes someday to become an author.

He left Yokohama on the S.S. "President Wilson" on February 11 and arrived in San Francisco on February 23, where he was met by Elder Alma Andrews and other members of the Berkeley Congregation. He reached Graceland on Monday, February 26.

Besides this representative from Japan, Graceland is expecting four students from England, one from Holland, the usual representative group from Canada and Hawaii, several from Australia, and perhaps Mexico, Ecuador, and Germany next year. The spirit of world fellowship is continuing to grow on the Graceland campus.

INSTITUTE IN ILLINOIS

A priesthood institute for three districts was held at the Brush Creek reunion grounds April 28 and 29. The districts represented were Southeastern Illinois, Central Illinois, and St. Louis. About eighty priesthood members registered. Attending the institute were President W. Wallace Smith, Apostle D. O. Chesworth, High Priest Frank McDonald, and Seventies Cecil Ettinger and Sylvester Coleman. President Smith preached at the closing service at the institute and stopped over in St. Louis to preach the evening sermon there Sunday. He also visited in the home of Evangelist Clarence Archibald of St. Louis.

TWELVE IN NEW OFFICES

The Council of Twelve have been handicapped in their official and personal work by inadequate office space. Five men have been together in one room and their work has been carried forth under difficulties. A suite of rooms has been completed off the main foyer of the Auditorium on two floors. Individual rooms are provided for each member of the Council; a small council room for committee meetings is also included, as well as a general office for the secretarial staff. A modern color scheme has been used to decorate the rooms.

EASTERN MISSIONARY EFFORT

Apostle Maurice Draper, Sister Blanche Mesley, and Apostle C. George Mesley have conducted a series of women's institutes and rallies on evangelism at Toledo and Dayton, Ohio; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Washington, D.C.; Baltimore, Maryland; Williamsburg and Scranton, Pennsylvania; Providence, Rhode Island; Boston, Massachusetts; and Buffalo, New York. Brother Draper and Brother and Sister Mesley were greeted with full churches at every place. Brother Draper reports that the spirit of evangelism manifested in these institutes speaks for the future growth of the church in these areas. Some outstanding responses have been received to missionary work by Seventy James Menzies in Wellsburg, West Virginia, and Fayette City, Pennsylvania.

SERVICE FOR ELDERS

A prayer and testimony service for elders in the Center Stake was held April 22 at the West College Church. Over one hundred elders attended the meeting from 7:30 until 9:00 a.m., and participation was excellent. The Stake Presidency—Charles Graham, Glaude Smith, and Fred Davies—presided. Also participating in the program were Myron Zerr, Clyde Baker, and Wynn Jones who are presidents of the councils of the stake. The theme for the service was "The Joy of Ministry."

VISIT TENNESSEE

Bishop Henry Livingston and Apostle Percy Farrow were in Paris, Tennessee, April 28 and 29. They visited the branch in connection with the building program there.

GRACELAND SPONSORS INSTITUTE

A Missions Abroad Institute was held at Graceland College April 28 and 29. Representing the General Church were President F. Henry Edwards, Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp, Sister Blanche Mesley, Apostle C. George Mesley, Elder and Mrs. V. D. Ruch, and Seventy Albert A. Scherer. Representatives from surrounding areas attended the institute. The missions studied were Tahiti, the British Mission, the German Mission, the Scandinavian Mission, the Netherlands Mission, and the Australasian Mission.

The Seven Pillars of Wisdom

"Wisdom hath builded her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars." —Proverbs 9: 1.

THAT SCRIPTURE is something to intrigue the imagination. What a picture it makes for the mind! No wonder it appealed to the scholar-soldier, Lawrence of Arabia, who based the title of his book, The Seven Pillars of Wisdom, upon it.

Read the ninth chapter of Proverbs and consider the poetic invitation of personified wisdom. She spread a feast before her guests. But that chapter does not tell what the pillars of wisdom are.

What did they represent? Every good life is based upon foundations of faith, philosophy, and purpose. Wisdom selects those foundations.

Suppose you were asked to select the seven pillars of wisdom as a foundation of life—what would you choose?

All good things will be found somewhere in the gospel. May we offer some suggestions from the teachings of Jesus?

THE FIRST PILLAR: WORSHIP

"Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." —Matthew 4: 10.

Our life begins with God the Creator, and ends in him. The most important relationship is that which brings us to him.

Every man dedicates himself to something, some purpose, some philosophy. The gangster gives himself to crime; the murderer gives himself (as well as his victim) to death; the teacher gives herself to education; the philosopher gives himself to truth; the ordained man gives himself to ministry.

And every true Christian believer gives himself to God.

THE SECOND PILLAR: LOVE

"Love one another as I have loved you." —John 15: 12.

From the cradle to the grave, our greatest spiritual need is love. Jesus made love "the first and great commandment of the law."

The pity of it is that we are so reluctant to give to others what we so greatly need for ourselves. There is a dearth of love in the world, because people give so little of it.

Love is the basic relationship between God and his human children, and it should be the basic relationship between them. It is the essential ingredient of the divine harmony in the universe.

THE THIRD PILLAR: TRUTH

"The truth shall make you free." —John 8: 32.

We have an insistent need for truth. Men have put more thought and effort into the search for it than into any other quest.

The worst bondage is that which is exercised over the mind.

The truth makes us free of mistakes and errors. It makes us free of wrong and sin. It frees us of evil and turns us toward God. Truth itself is the most precious of all our possessions.

THE FOURTH PILLAR: BENEVOLENCE

"Freely ye have received, freely give." —Matthew 10: 7.

The philosophy and social program of Jesus was based on our love and care for each other. Love is not inert. When it sees a need it does something. It goes to work. Love is for consequences and results.

Unless we give to others, we dry up. The richness of the social exchange comes from what we give to others and receive from them. One never gives without receiving something in return. No gift is a loss.

THE FIFTH PILLAR: RIGHTEOUSNESS

"Blessed are all they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness." —Matthew 5: 8.

The most beautiful things in life are the clean things.

Only those who have felt the Spirit of God know how clean and pure it is, and how it is completely incompatible with impurity of any kind. No stain of sin or character can endure in the presence of God.

Righteousness comes from an Anglo-Saxon word, "rihtwisness." It meant "rightmindedness."

THE SIXTH PILLAR: SERVICE

"He that is greatest among you shall be your servant." —Matthew 23: 8.

Goodness should be good for something. Goodness that does nothing is nothing. Goodness has a work to do in the world.

The greater souls—those who have knowledge and have acquired skills—should help and serve others and lift them up. They have greater obligations because they have greater power.

It is as if we were all on a ship together in a storm. We survive or perish together. The skilled mariner must try to save the ship, and to save himself he must save others. It is so in the ship of the world.

THE SEVENTH PILLAR: KINGDOM BUILDING

"Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness." —Matthew 6: 33.

The highest type of Christian citizen cannot live by himself. He must live and serve in a community, and he can do his best work in a Christian community. There his good work will be best utilized and perpetuated. There evil has the least power to tear it down.

The greater soul needs the kingdom of God as his country, as it needs him for a citizen. The greatest work we have to do is to build that kingdom.

There are our selections for the seven pillars of wisdom. What selections would you make?

By Israel A. Smith.

FROM THE RADIO DEPARTMENT:

There is available tape recordings of a program entitled "Voices From the Past." This is a recording of the voices of several of the stalwart men and women of the church who are no longer with us and whose lives and testimonies have meant much to the church. They are Levi Gamet, Joseph Luff, F. G. Pitt, G. J. Waller, R. V. Hopkins, J. F. Garver, F. M. Smith, Mrs. E. A. Smith, and Elbert A. Smith, who, we are grateful to say, is still with us. These persons are all heard in fervent testimony.

This is available on Scotch plastic tape to be run at 7½ inches per second speed, tape wound either A or B, according to individual machine specifications. The radio department would need to know what machine is to be used, so that the correct winding of tape is sent. Notice that this recording is available on tape only. A nominal charge for this service will be made, and the exact date of use will also be required, with prompt return of tape to the Department requested so that a minimum number of recordings may be made.

Those who heard this program given at the Stone Church at the last General Conference know to what this offer refers. Address further inquiries to the Radio Department, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Notice to Boy Scouts, Scoutmasters, Pastors

In Regard to the "God and Country" Award

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has its own church requirements for the Boy Scout "God and Country" religious award. It was and is the intention of the Boy Scout national Protestant Committee on Scouting that individual denominations prepare their own requirements for the award. Our church was one of the very first in developing its own manual of requirements.

A few Boy Scouts have completed the general Protestant requirements and have expected to receive our church "God and Country" award. We are sorry to have to notify these boys that their awards must be held up until they complete all requirements of our church.

All Boy Scouts, or their leaders, should write the Department of Religious Education, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, for the "Information Folder on Church-Scout Award," and for the application blank for enrollment in the program. Requirements and other information are given in the booklet, The Scouting Program in the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 50c, The Herald Publishing House.

Associate Director

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

We are indeed pleased to give the following story to our readers. It comes from Seventy F. Edward Butterworth who is in charge of the Tahitian Mission.

TO OFFICE OF SEVENTY

Elder Taruiarii a Tauhiti, known to the church as "Horahitu," has been ordained to the office of seventy at Papeete, Tahiti. Horahitu has spent many years in the General Church ministry, and is a respected and powerful missionary among his brethren of the Polynesian race. His selection as a delegate to the 1930 General Conference so enriched his ministry as to qualify him to meet the insidious falsehoods about the church introduced into Tahiti by the impudence of Brigham Young's missionary posterity. Delegates to General Conference year after year will be glad to see this picture of Horahitu, having often heard his name read off in the long list of appointments.

Horahitu a Seventy

Horahitu is a relative of the last king, Pomare. It is said that he was in line for a position in the local kingdom had the Native race continued to govern Tahiti. His father, Teriinohorai a Tauhiti, was a governor under Pomare V and a signer of the final document which turned the Tahitian Kingdom over to France. It was Horahitu's father who lowered the Tahitian flag, folded it ceremoniously and, after kissing it, handed it into the hands of King Pomare's son, Hinoi, who in turn turned it over to the French representative. This was the last official act of the Tahitian Kingdom.

A look at the document signed by Horahitu's father and other of the of-

Concerning "The Call at Evening"

By Jessie Ward LeBaron

MANY HAVE ASKED how I came to write The Call at Evening. I cannot answer that question. Even after it was planned and started I had no thought of writing a book. If anyone had suggested such a thing I would have said, "Impossible!"

Two things started the book on its way. One of them was a Religio program committee meeting. Someone suggested that a story be written to be read at the Religio program hour. I was thinking of that when a more important event—one with a sad ending—happened. This brought about the real beginning of The Call at Evening, although even then I did not think of writing a book, or even writing for publication.

I think I can see him now . . .

Robert Smithwick

Robert was the talented young engineer of the company for which I worked. It fell to my lot to work that Sunday morning in the year 1915, and I was not happy about it, for I had so wanted to attend church.

I noticed him sitting in the manager's private office, his face buried in his hands. I wondered if he were in deep thought or sorrow. Presently he arose, came to my desk, and—sitting on one corner of it—said, "I would give anything in the world if I could only believe."

"Believe what?" I asked in surprise.

"All this about God and Christ."

Then he picked up a stone paperweight from my desk, and continued, "I have studied geology. I could analyze this stone and tell you in what age it was formed. If I can't believe the first chapter of the Bible, what basis have I to believe any of it?"

I felt that I did a poor job of answering him, for at that time nothing had been printed by the church on the subject that I had ever read; in fact I personally had not been concerned about it. I don't know how I answered him, but he seemed satisfied, for his face brightened. As his car arrived to take him out to his work, he said, "I want to talk to you again. I expect to be back in about three weeks. I'll talk to you then."

That evening I fairly tore that first chapter of Genesis apart, analyzing it sentence by sentence, using all the scientific knowledge I had or could find by research. I was determined not to fail Robert again, and I knew I had found his answer.

It seemed perfectly natural to cast the result of my study in story form. I thought, "I can read it at Religio."

So it came that The Call at Evening, as first written, opened with a dissertation of the first chapter of Genesis. But Robert Smithwick never read it, nor did we talk again, for a few days before his scheduled return, his life was taken in a construction accident. His chapter was taken from the book. Later, when the Herald Publishing House asked me to write a dedication for the book, I could dedicate it to no other than Robert. So there appeared the following:

DEDICATED

To the memory of one whose earnest cry: "If I could only believe!" prompted the writing of this book.

I notice that most people refer to the book as "The Call of Evening." Perhaps, since the evening did play such an important part in its setting, I should have given it that title. However, another thought was in my mind. I felt that earth's probationary day was indeed "fading fast," that the trumpet call had sounded, and that the "light at eventide" had come. This latter day message rang out in fact as The Call at Evening—the last great call of God to the people of the earth to repent ere "the night come, when no man can work."

Some have asked with unbelief in their voices—an unbelief which I myself have felt—"Are you really the author of The Call at Evening?"

I wonder if they have sensed the evasion in my reply—"Well I remember burning the midnight oil over the manuscript."

I have never felt that I was really its author. In fact, The Call at Evening has had many authors. Let me tell you about a few of them.

The first one was an infidel—my own grandfather.

Jacob Ward

He little dreamed that he was the first author of The Call at Evening, but he was. It was vindictiveness on his part at the time, although I didn't know that. He spent his last several years in our home and due to his influence, it was far from a Christian home. There was no teaching of God there, except when he wished to annoy my mother who believed in God but dared not voice her belief. At such times he took me on his knee and, in his masterful way, told me a Bible story. His favorites were "Jonah and the Whale" and "The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes." I missed entirely the sarcasm that passed over my head to my mother as he said, "Now, that's true. You must believe it, because it is in the Bible."

And I, sitting enthralled, believed, because it was in the Bible and because my grandfather had said it was true. Soon after he had gone to explore that world in which he had never believed, another author appeared on the scene.

Mrs. Vickers

I remember that the neighbors laughed at her, but to me blessings surround her memory, for she was concerned that no religious teaching went on in our neighborhood, and she did something about it. She engaged the schoolhouse and started revival meetings on her own. How we reveled in it. I found myself with others as a penitent at the homemade "mourners' bench" seeking salvation. I was told to get up and say I was saved and, feeling it was true, with childish timidity I bore this testimony night after night.

Learning that there was a "second work of grace" available, again I was at the altar seeking "sanctification." Those were happy days, and although I was far too young to know what it was all about, I did experience great joy in feeling "I belong to Jesus"—as Mrs. Vickers often affirmed. Laugh at her? Blessed woman! She shared with us gladly all the light she had.

About that time I experienced my first answer to prayer and, as a result, my first religious backset.

I wanted a New Testament. I dared not go so far as to want a whole Bible; that would have been like reaching for the moon. I was far enough along in school to be able to read haltingly, and I did want that Testament. I had no idea of how to get it, and I confided in no one. So I went out into the woods near our home where we often gathered flowers and, kneeling on a soft bed of moss, I told Jesus that I wanted a Testament, and I didn't know how to get it. About three weeks later Mrs. Vickers came to me, one Sunday morning, with a small book in her hand. "Would you like to have this book?" she asked.

Jesus had answered my prayer! I doubt if I even thanked Mrs. Vickers, but I imagine my face did that.

I took my prize to show to Aunt Maggie, who hadn't been pleased about this new "religious folderol," as she called it. "Bosh," she said, "they aren't even telling you the truth! Sanctified, my eye! Why, that Bible tells you," she misquoted, "that if they say they are without sin, they are liars and the truth is not in them."

I had been standing up in meeting and saying I was sanctified, therefore, I was a liar and the truth was not in me!

I left the house crushed—the value of my Testament gone.

When next I went to meeting I bore no testimony. Mrs. Vickers prompted gently, "Jessie, haven't you a testimony for us?" I stood up and said, without great conviction, "I'm glad Jesus has saved me."

"Saved, and what?" she prompted again.

My face burned. Even yet I can feel the weakness of my voice as I answered, "Just saved."

The next day at school, her daughter, Blanche, who was about my own age, took me out into the woods back of the schoolhouse and said, "Jessie, my mama says she is afraid you are backsliding."

And then I felt the very maws of hell opening to devour me.

At that critical spiritual time another author of The Call at Evening appeared.

Amelia Gelatt

She was the first Latter Day Saint we had ever seen. A pale, sickly little woman with a sparkle in her eye and the love of God in her heart, which she manifested outwardly toward her neighbors. The picture she made is still in my mind, as she came to visit us—too weak to walk, carried like a child in the arms of her sturdy husband, waving her hands in greeting and calling out, "John, is the coffee pot on?"

Right then she became one of us. How we came to love her and lean on her leadership! She did not criticize our religious understanding; never once did she suggest we were wrong. But before we knew it, she had engaged the schoolhouse and sent out her invitation, "Come and hear my minister."

So another author of The Call at Evening came.

Elder F. W.

Allow me to withhold his name. I want to say something that I hope will help some other timid young elder on his first mission, or perhaps some teacher or deacon who fears his own lack—or fancied lack—of ability. Brother W.'s wife thought he couldn't preach, and other Latter Day Saints shared her opinion. Unfortunately, he knew this and came to accept their opinions of himself. A short time later he left the mission field in discouragement, and was comparatively inactive all the rest of his life. How many he might have reached in his quiet way!

To us he was never dull. We sat with our hearts and minds open, drinking in his words as nectar from heaven. I wonder, had he known that the homely little girl in the faded calico dress, with bare feet dangling, would gather up his message and broadcast it far from that little country schoolhouse, would he have been so discouraged? Would he have felt his efforts useless?

Do we, by our lack of faith, often discourage some man whom God has called because he does not measure up to our standards of oratory? Or perchance does that man, divinely called, fail in his mission because he fails to see the importance in the sight of God, of that little freckled-faced boy, or that pug-nosed girl in pigtails, or that audience of only four or five? Perhaps these children are considered too young to understand the words spoken, but what is felt in the childish heart may be the foundation upon which a later life of spiritual value may be built.

There were many other authors of The Call at Evening down through the years—far too many to mention. I pause as they pass in panoramic view before me, one by one, and as they pass I brush the memory of each with love. Only God can evaluate their ministry.

Elder George Shippy

As an author of The Call at Evening, Elder George Shippy should occupy a prominent position. He did not know I was writing at that time. I had taken no one into my confidence, except my immediate family.

Every evening our small group gathered in the little church where Brother Shippy conducted his series of meetings. It was only natural that his clear message, backed by his well-drawn charts, should color the book I was writing. Brother Shippy little knew how much of himself found its way into The Call at Evening.

Elbert A. Smith

The book would never have been completed if it had not been for the interest shown by Brother Elbert. Down through the years he had been a very active influence in my life. His authorship happened like this.

I had written the first seven chapters. They seemed poorly written to me, and I had stopped in discouragement. I knew Brother Elbert would never criticize harshly, so one day I penned a note in one corner and sent them to Brother Elbert, who was then editor of Autumn Leaves. The note said, "Is this worth finishing?"

Time went by and I did not hear from him. I was not surprised, nor was I offended. I knew his judgment was best. Then one day a package came. I knew by the shape and size it was not the package I had sent. To my surprise it was my first seven chapters, neatly typewritten and the message, "Finish up as rapidly as possible."

Encouraged I went to work vigorously for awhile. Then I grew discouraged again. About that time Brother Elbert became very ill and found it necessary to go into isolation. Then one day a letter came from Sister Clara saying that Brother Elbert would like to know how the book was coming along. I hung my head in shame. Too ill to be allowed visitors, Brother Elbert had thought of me enough to ask his wife to write for him. The shame that this had been necessary sent me to work once more, this time to the end.

Snags

My first real snag appeared when I wrote the chapter on the organization of the church. It seemed worthless to me. Brother Elbert had told me that the secret of writing was rewriting. So my system had been to write each chapter three times. In disgust I had thrown the first writing of this chapter into the wastepaper basket. I tried again and again, each time producing what I considered a failure. Finally I thought, "Perhaps there is something in that first writing I can use."

So I dug that crumpled first writing out of the waste basket and it went into the book without one word of revision. Strangely, I think it has been used by missionaries almost more than any other part of the book.

Our Lord

The real author of The Call at Evening.

How we vacillate from underconfidence to overconfidence! My subject was the resurrection of the dead. I picked up my pen with perfect confidence in myself. It was my favorite gospel theme. I had listened carefully to many fine sermons regarding it. I knew most of the Scriptures relating to it very well—hence my confidence. I had no sooner quieted myself to write than a voice seemed to say, "You don't know enough to write it."

Completely surprised, I laid down my pen and began to pray. My prayer was exceedingly simple. I did not even make a request. I merely said, "Lord, somebody will form an opinion from what I write, and I don't know enough to write it."

That prayer was offered several times a day for about a week. Then an experience came. Strangely I never knew whether I was asleep or awake, whether it was dream or vision.

I suddenly seemed to be with a group of Saints, just emerging from the little brown church in Centralia, Washington. We were descending the outer steps, when a sister near me seemed to say, "Now, listen; you will hear some music. It will come out of the air."

The statement was so startlingly strange that I turned to look at her in astonishment. I found myself looking out on the lawn at the side of the church. There stood a being who engaged all my attention. He stood in the center of light which extended outward from him in all directions about three feet. It was day; the sunshine which before had seemed so bright, in comparison to the radiance around him took on a strange gray hue, as though its brightness carried a mixture of darkness. He was the most beautiful personage who had ever greeted my eyes.

I first noticed his hair. It fell back from his forehead, waved softly, and although its original color was easily discerned as a light brown, yet each hair gleamed with an unspeakable radiance. I can liken it only to the filament of an electric light globe. Then I noticed his face, and I knew that I had never before seen a perfect face. As I looked at him a passage of Scripture came to my mind, which I did not know was in the Bible. It is Job 33: 25: "His flesh shall become fresher than a child's. He shall return to the days of his youth."

The face on which I gazed was as much fresher than the face of a child, as is the face of a child fresher than that of an old man. It has always been my desire, since that time, to hear some minister use that text in a farewell address over the remains of some aged brother.

This radiant one wore a white robe, girded in at the waist, which fell in length to just a little below the knees. My eyes next rested on his arms, which were bare to the elbows. They were athletic in appearance and I could see the formation of well-developed muscles beneath his gleaming skin. Then I noticed his feet and legs, and I heard my own voice repeating the words of Revelation 1: 15: "And his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned, in a furnace . . ." and Revelation 10: 1 ". . . his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire."

Now I knew why the prophet had used those words; they came nearer to describing the beauty I beheld than any of which I could think. The language of man is inadequate to describe the divine.

Next came the peculiar statement with which this experience started: "Now, listen, you will hear some music. It will come out of the air."

With it came understanding. Mankind devises instruments to produce and control vibrations which we know as sound. The glorious one on whom I gazed needed no such crude mechanistic control of the elements. These had become his by virtue of the spiritual planes to which he had ascended.

As he raised his hand and brought it down, the note of music sounded in the air above, rich and full, yet soft and tender. Harnessing the forces of nature at will, he played such melody as human ears have never heard, unless opened to hear the divine. I was next shown that other forces of nature were under the control of his will and were indeed his servants.

The vision closed and my mind was once more directed, this time to I Corinthians 15: 35 and 40: "But some men will say, how are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come? . . . [There are] celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; . . . but the glory of the celestial, one; and the glory of the terrestrial, another."

That was the thing I had not known about the resurrection of the dead. The glories—celestial, terrestrial, and teletial—were not only glories of place, but glory of being. The body which comes forth is determined by the life we live here: a celestial body for a celestial glory, a terrestrial body for a terrestrial glory, bodies suited for the varying degrees of the teletial, for "another glory of the stars (teletial), for one star differs from another star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead."

This thought is further clarified in Doctrine and Covenants 85: 6. There the prophet is instructed in regard to the new glorified earth.

The earth abideth the law of a celestial kingdom, for it . . . transgresseth not the law . . . the righteous shall inherit it; for, notwithstanding they die, they also shall rise again a spiritual body; they who are of a celestial spirit shall receive the same body, which was a natural body: even ye shall receive your bodies, and your glory shall be that glory by which your bodies are quickened. Ye who are quickened by a portion of the celestial glory, shall then receive of the same, even a fullness; and they who are quickened by a portion of the terrestrial glory, shall then receive of the same, even a fullness: and also they who are quickened by a portion of the teletial glory, shall then receive of the same, even a fullness: and they who remain shall also be quickened; nevertheless, they shall return again to their own place, to enjoy that which they are willing to receive, because they were not willing to enjoy that which they might have received.

So I was able to write the chapter on the resurrection of the dead. I knew then how wonderfully complete was that glorious experience. We are not only to be saved from death and from hell and permitted to dwell in heaven, but conditioned to dwell with God and receive of his glory.

The Bible Is God's Book ■ By E. B. Hull

THE CHINESE TELL US that their god, Pwangu, carved the heavens out of granite. If such a foolish statement were found in the Bible, we would know the Bible is not God's book. Other writers give their ideas: Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle (400 B.C.) taught that the earth was a living being. Zeno (300 B.C.) held the universe sprang into being from its own inherent energy. Epicurus (300 B.C.) said the universe came into existence by a fortuitous concourse of atoms. Thales of Miletus (600 B.C.) taught that water was the origin of all things. Anaximenes said air was the origin of all things. Heraclitus of Ephesus (500 B.C.) maintained that fire was the origin of all things. In Moses' day the Egyptians led the world in science, yet the best Egyptian scholars taught that both the earth and the heavens originated out of a kind of pulp, and men were generated from slime of the river Nile. Other Egyptian scholars taught that the earth was hatched from a winged egg.

Compare the creation story in Genesis in the Bible with the beliefs of the Hindus, Chinese, and others. The following is from the sacred books of the Hindus:

Millions upon millions of cycles ago, this world came to be. It was made flat, triangular plane, with high hills and mountains, and great waters. It exists in several stories, and the whole mass is held up on the heads of elephants, with their tails turned out, and their feet resting on the shell of an immense tortoise, and the tortoise on the coil of a great snake; and when the elephants shake themselves, that makes the earth to quake.

In 1885 Gladstone and Huxley debated whether or not the creation story in the book of Genesis in the Bible was in accord with the findings of modern science. When both men had completed their arguments, they agreed to hand their papers over to Dana, the greatest living geologist of their time, and let him decide. Dana closely examined the arguments of both men, and printed his decision in the 19th Century Magazine of August, 1886: "I agree in all essential points with Mr. Gladstone, and I believe that the first chapter of Genesis and science are in accord."

Sir William Dawson, a distinguished Canadian geologist, agrees with Dana: "The order of creation in the Bible is faultless in the light of modern science, and many of the details present the most remarkable agreement with the results of science born in our own day."

SOME SCIENTIFIC FACTS were known to Bible writers hundreds of years before men were aware of them. In Proverbs the earth is spoken of as a circle, and in Isaiah 40: 22 (700 B.C.), "It is God who sitteth on the circle of the earth." Modern teachers say that the earth hangs on nothing, as Job says in chapter 26: 7, when all men down to Copernicus (A.D. 1475) believed that the earth rested on some great solid foundation. The Bible writers also knew that this earth rotated on its axis. This is clearly implied in Genesis, where the days are described as succeeding one another, each day consisting of "evening and morning, day and night." This succession is explained by the earth's rotation on its axis. Unless the earth rotated, one side—that nearest the sun—would always be light, while the opposite side would always be in darkness the same as the moon. Not until Galileo's time (A.D. 1630) was it recognized that the winds had regular circuits, and that rain clouds were only evaporated water. Yet Bible writers knew this hundreds of years before Galileo was born. Ecclesiastes 1: 6-7 (900 B.C.) says: "The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again, according to his circuits. All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full."

Isaiah records this conversation supposed to have taken place in heaven:

How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north; I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High.—Isaiah 14: 12-14.

Five times Satan says "I will," but Isaiah says in answer to him:

Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit. They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and shall consider thee, and shall say, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; And made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof; and opened not the house of his prisoners? . . . But thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch, and as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword, that go down to the stones of the pit; as a carcass trodden under feet. Thou shalt not be joined with them in burial, because thou hast destroyed thy land, and slain thy people.—Isaiah 14: 15-20.

These are some questions propounded by Isaiah which are hard to answer. Lucifer seems to be talking of going back to the place in the north, from whence he was cast out. Why did he say he would sit upon the mount of the congregation in the sides of the north? Is God's headquarters north of this world?

The earth today is not like it was in the beginning, but Doctrine and Covenants 108: 5 says the oceans are to be "driven back into the north countries . . . and the earth shall be as it was in the days before it was divided."

In Job 38: 35 we read: "Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are?" All down the ages infidels have laughed at the idea of sending messages by lightning, but this is the only word the Hebrews had for electricity. Actually Job made a very scientific statement regarding this age of radio and modern communication.

In Job 38: 19 (1500 B.C.) this statement appears: "Where is the way where light dwelleth, and as for darkness, where is the place thereof?" Note it does not ask, "Where is the place light dwelleth?" This would have been scientifically wrong, as light travels at the rate of over 186,000 miles per second, so it does not dwell in any one place. Here we have an exact scientific statement regarding light fully 3,000 years before any scientific statement on the subject was ever made. God is light; in the creation of this world in the Adamic age he said, "Let there be light," and that was before our sun was made and set in the heavens.

THE BIBLE is the only ancient book that insisted on quarantining contagious diseases. In Leviticus 13: 45, 46 directions are given for dealing with lepers.

No wonder that prince of modern scientists, Sr. John Herschel, said: "All human discoveries seem to have been made only to confirm more and more the truths of the Bible." The Bible is not primarily a book of science, but it makes scientific statements; these can always be relied upon.

In the year 1865, 617 members of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, including the greatest scientists of the British Empire, drew up a document setting forth their views on the relation between science and the Bible. The following three paragraphs are quoted from this document:

We, the undersigned students of the natural sciences, desire to express our sincere regret that researches into scientific truth are perverted by some, in our times, into occasions for casting doubt upon the truth and authenticity of the Holy Scriptures.

How "Young Joseph" Came to Amboy

Selections from the "Autobiographic Sketches" of Edmund C. Briggs, of the Council of Twelve

Part One: Early Guidance and Spiritual Experiences

INTRODUCTION

TWO GREAT PURPOSES motivated the early life and ministry of Edmund C. Briggs, one of the strong men of the Restoration Movement. One was to see the Reorganization firmly established to regather the scattered members of the church. The other was to see "Young Joseph" Smith, son of the founder and prophet, Joseph Smith, Jr., brought to the leadership of the church. These purposes were also dear to many other people at that time. There is something heroic and of an epic character in the narrative that Apostle Briggs presented to the church, showing how these purposes were eventually realized.

The "Autobiographic Sketches" were written partly from memory and partly from the carefully kept diary of Brother Briggs. We have attempted to select the passages in a manner that, with a few guiding subheads, they will tell their own story.

Edmund C. Briggs was born February 20, 1835, in Wheeler, Steuben County, New York. In 1838 the family moved to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and the next year to Jefferson County. In February, 1842, young Edmund first heard about the "Mormons" from his father, who had witnessed a rough argument in a hotel, in which the proprietor, formerly from Quincy, Illinois, had defended Joseph Smith from an attack by one of the hotel guests.

Louisa Wilkinson, an older daughter, wrote a letter to the family telling that a brother, Jason W. Briggs, had joined the Latter Day Saint Church while he was in another part of the country. This news brought distress to young Edmund, but as he continued to learn more of the church his attitude changed.

The reference, "SH," indicates Saints' Herald, and the figures indicate volume and page.

We trust that this inspiring story, as told by one of the great men of the Reorganization, will bring both interest and encouragement to the many readers who will see this account for the first time.

A PROPHECY OF MISSIONARY SERVICE

I had already had a manifestation that punishment was permitted to come on the wicked people to bring about a reformation, and that when they ceased to do evil and learned to do good they would indeed be saved, though they had died in sin; that the arm of the Lord was not shortened so it could not save; and my soul was lit up with the glory of God, my Savior. A calm, serene sensation pervaded my mind, and I heard these words; "You will yet receive this gospel, be baptized and ordained an elder, and preach it to your fellow men." How these words came to me, or who spoke them, I did not know; but they were so impressed upon me that they have ever been as fresh to my mind as though just spoken.

The Bible was now a new book to me, and many things so obscure before were now plain.

THE ASSASSINATION OF THE PROPHET

One bright, beautiful day in July we had all been to dinner except my brother Edwin. He had gone to Beloit. Upon my entering the dining room he was sitting on the lounge reading a newspaper, awaiting preparation for his lunch, and read the account of the assassination of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, the "Mormon" prophet and his brother, at Carthage, Illinois, by an infuriated mob.

As he read the account a strange power, such as I never experienced before, rested on me. It seemed to rest on my head first and pass down through my whole body; this was repeated three times in the same manner. I was transfixed so I could not move and was lost to all sensibility and consciousness of everything I ever did or thought, but realized I stood in the room with my mother and brother present. And then I saw a marble statue of a person, and while I looked at it I wondered what it meant. A voice, a little back of me and to the right, said (and I seemed to be conscious that some person stood there), "You are compared to that statue," and it passed away out of my sight. And immediately I saw a beautiful hand, it seemed almost transparent, extended toward me, and a pointed, flowing white sleeve hung from the wrist. As I looked at it, I noticed that between the thumb and index finger it held a spotless sheet of paper. The under leaf hung down a little lower than the other, and I could see between them. As I gazed I wondered what it meant, and the same voice said, "You are compared to that sheet of paper," and as it passed from my sight, a serene, calm, peaceful sensation pervaded my mind and all around me. And then I heard a voice just in front of me and over my head say, "Joseph, the son of Joseph, is the prophet of the church." Then I was conscious of the fact, or seemed to realize, that the prophet, Joseph Smith, was dead, and his son would take his place in the church.

CONFUSION, AND A VISION OF APOSTASY

I confess I was much troubled and hoped something would develop soon to relieve my distress of mind. The thought came to me that Joseph was a little boy. How could he be the prophet to the church? . . . While all these things were perplexing me, the Times and Seasons came again and again, and finally it was published that the Twelve claimed to be the leaders of the church, with the announcement "Joseph stands in his own place behind the veil, and let not another presume to take his place, for he stands in his own place and always will."

Many claimants to the leadership of the church had arisen. James J. Strang claimed to be the successor of Joseph by a letter of appointment. James Colin Brewster, Gladden Bishop, and others followed with their claims to be leaders and prophets to the church, until confusion reigned complete in the church, it seemed.

While I was in this state of mind, I had a vision, but I cannot now remember the circumstances I was in when I had it. In the vision I stood north of the city of Nauvoo, Illinois, and saw the woods and the prairie north and northeast of the city, with scattered houses in the timber, on the hill, and down the sloping plain to the low land along the river. While I viewed the city I saw a thin mist like crepe, descending from northeast of the city. It settled down on the trees first, but did not stop its course until it settled down closely over the city; and while I stood wondering what it was, a voice nearby, to the right and a little back of me, said, "It is the spirit of whoredom, and it will be poured out upon the church first, and then it will be poured out upon the whole world." Then immediately I stood in a room with a fireplace in the west end. . . . I saw two women near the east end of the room. . . . Each was in tears, crying and wringing her hands as if in distress, and one of them said, "Is that so?" They walked toward the fireplace, and again one of them spoke out in her sobs as though her heart would break, "My God! Is that so?" I then seemed to understand that they were being taught something repugnant to their feelings that caused them great sorrow. . . . And immediately I saw two Mormon elders following these women. . . . They were gleefully talking together. . . . And I repeated in the anguish of my heart, "What does this mean?" And a person I had not noticed before seemed to stand at my right and said, "They are being taught whoredom under a new name." . . . And immediately after I saw a pail of blood splash on the floor just behind the men, and the person standing at my right passed behind me, went up to them, took hold of one of their coat collars, showed me the seams of the collar . . . and every seam was lined with blood. He then said, "That is murder."

This vision troubled me for days. I could not understand it; I did not even know the meaning of the words. . . . While meditating over the matter in the latter part of the summer of '44, I resolved to go and ask my mother the meaning of the words used by the person in my vision, but when I got near the house a voice said to me, "It was the besetting sin of the prophets and kings of ancient Israel."

THE DOCTOR PROMISED DEATH, THE SPIRIT PROMISED LIFE

At one time I had fallen from the hay loft into the barn and hurt one of my legs. While I was sick my leg began to pain dreadfully. I suffered excruciating pain most of the time for months. Finally I became so weak I could not turn in bed or help myself. My brother was very busy on the farm at the time, and most of my care was from my sister-in-law, Sarah Briggs, who was al-

Word of Wisdom

A FUGITIVE NEWS CLIPPING reaches us which carries some interest to all who believe in the timeliness of the Word of Wisdom which was given to us more than a hundred years ago. It began with the startling statement that there are "276 chemicals in food" that may be "gradually poisoning" the public.

From this we quote:

An "alarming" situation in the widespread postwar use of chemicals for growing and processing edibles has been reported by a special seven-man congressional committee headed by Rep. James J. Delaney (Dem., N. Y.).

Of the 704 chemicals now in use in connection with food, says the committee, "only 428 are definitely known to be safe" for the purpose. After looking into the matter for three months, the committee thinks a new chemical food control law may be needed, meanwhile it wants to continue its inquiry until July 1.

Just what are the chemicals at which the committee is slanting a skeptical eye? Some are sprays used by the farmer—DDT, chlordane, selenium and phenyl mercury compounds, for instance. More knowledge needs to be developed, the committee says, as to the effect on humans of foods protected from insects and plant diseases by these sprays.

Chemicals used in processing or preserving foods, such as "bread softeners," have also been getting the once-over from the committee. There is controversy among reputable scientists, they point out, as to whether certain emulsifiers that make and keep bread tender are safe for continuous use over the life span. These are now being used to a considerable extent in baked goods, cake mixes and ice cream.

The replacing of natural fats in baked goods by chemical emulsifiers has also come in for scrutiny by the committee. They want to determine the "extent of the reduction of shortening and other nutritious ingredients in bakery and other food products" and to what degree this has been caused by chemicals.

Chemical fertilizers have been subjects of the inquiry, too. The committee reports, however that "no reliable evidence was presented that the use of chemical fertilizers has had a harmful effect on the health of man or animal." It's the so-called "organic farmers" that claim food grown on chemically-treated soil is inferior and leads directly to many present-day illnesses.

If the committee gets its life extended by Congress, it hopes to look into the new and widespread use of hormones in poultry and livestock raising. The 276 chemicals mentioned in the first paragraph will also get a more thorough investigation, for the committee's report is strictly of an "interim" nature and they feel more study is needed before any new law is recommended.

Question:

How will my Lord speak to me in heaven—vocally or spiritually?
Pennsylvania E. U.

Answer:

It is a striking fact that God's revelation as found in the Scriptures gives us no detailed description of conditions in the world of the redeemed, probably for the reason that for the present the conditions there are so far different from what we now know that they are beyond our comprehension. Doctrine and Covenants 76:7 says of the lowest glory of the saved, that it "surpasses all understanding; and no man knows it except him to whom God has revealed it." Human language is not capable of describing it. Paul too says, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."—I Corinthians 2:9. Conditions there must be seen to be known.

CHARLES FRY

Question:

From A Commentary on the Doctrine and Covenants, page 163, I read: "The dead are fully conscious and are deeply interested in the events which are now rapidly culminating toward the day of resurrection and rejoicing."

Do they know the church is progressing, and can they see us?
Missouri

Mrs. J. H.

Answer:

Evidences abound through Scriptures showing a correlation between the heavens and the earth. The work of Christ in both places moves somewhat co-ordinately; those in heaven retaining a deep and sympathetic interest in the affairs of this world. Genesis 7:43-46 of the Inspired Version shows that all of God's workmanship mourned over the destruction of the wicked in the flood.

The angelic host joyously sang a song of glory to God at the birth of Christ, for that birth was not only of glad tidings to earth but to heaven also. The ministering of many angels at the time of the latter-day Restoration, each performing some necessary service in behalf of the people of earth, reveals the close tie that binds the living and the dead to each other.

Angels are invariably holy men of earth who have entered into their rest. Moses and Elias appearing to Christ at his transfiguration marked the transition from the Mosiac dispensation to that of Christ (Matthew 17); likewise the various angels who, by their ministrations, ushered in the last dispensation of latter days (Doctrine and Covenants 110:20, 21). None of these came of their own will, but were sent of God.

On the other hand earth effects the heavens. The Lord warned that the wickedness of men would cause peace to be taken from the earth and also the withholding of his Spirit from the people which would result in wars—a condition we see in process of fulfillment. The heavens are moved by faith and righteousness in men, and the Lord sends an increase of blessing.

However, little is revealed of the personal experiences of those passed on, and we cannot, in the light of what is revealed, consistently suppose that they have a detailed knowledge of us or that they see our personal activities.

Question:

Will the righteous who died without a knowledge of the law receive the ordinance of baptism in the millennium?
Iowa H. O. D.

Answer:

The Scriptures contain no mention of baptism in the millennium. Baptism of water is an ordinance belonging to this life and this life only, its obligations and requirements being fulfilled in this world. Furthermore it is an ordinance of limited application, being designed for those who are under sin and not for those who are not under sin. It belongs to a group of requirements and conditions such as faith in God, belief of the truth, repentance from sin and dead works, and obedience to the whole law, without which the ordinance becomes of no effect. Witness the case of Simon the sorcerer (Acts 8:21).

Jesus taught, "I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."—Matthew 9:14. There are some people who need no repentance and consequently need no baptism. Paul said, "Sin is not imputed to them who have no law," and "where no law is, there is no transgression" (Romans 4:15; 5:13). Sin comes from acting contrary to known law, and where there is no law, or where persons are not capable of knowing, they cannot sin, though they may do wrong things. Little children, being incapable of understanding the law, are not responsible for the petty wrongs they do and consequently are without sin. In many heathen lands the gospel law is not known, and the people, though mentally competent, are without sin. To all such, baptism does not apply.

The Lord has said to this church:

This thing shall ye teach, repentance and baptism unto those who are accountable and capable of committing sin . . . little children need no repentance, neither baptism. Behold baptism is unto repentance to the fulfilling of the commandments unto the remission of sins. But little children are alive in Christ, even from the foundation of the world. . . . He that saith that little children need baptism, denieth the mercies of Christ, and setteth at naught the atonement of him and the power of his redemption. . . . For behold that all little children are alive in Christ, and also all they that are without the law. For the power of redemption cometh on all they that have no law; . . . and unto such baptism availeth nothing.—Moroni 8:11-26.

Question:

If a branch hasn't elected officers in two years, is it in a disorganized state?
Oklahoma Mrs. T. S.

Answer:

Not necessarily. Branch officers continue to serve until their successors are appointed. However, if branch elections are unreasonably delayed, some member of the priesthood concerned might well bring this to the attention of the district president, or, if necessary, to the attention of the apostle in the field.

F. HENRY EDWARDS

Out of Their Yesterdays

By Mabel Williams Crayne

L T. ANDREW GRAYSON lay on the clean, white hospital bed and considered himself lucky that he had left only a foot in Korea and that the wounds on his face and head would leave but slight scars. The doctor had said that the shock to his heart would eventually be overcome by rest and right living.

Andy had been just an ordinary young man in his first year of college before going into the Army. His parents were hard-working, frugal people. His father made and refinished cabinets, and when they were polished, stained, and polished again, they showed all the beauty of the wood. Andy wished now that he had helped his father more and had spent less time with the neighborhood gang that he had grown up with. His father had hoped that he would be interested in cabinet work, but he chose engineering instead.

The nurse came in bringing a visitor. Andy was scarcely able to hide his embarrassment as he saw the slouching form of Luke Lewis coming into the room, his eyes as shifty as ever and his clothes wrinkled and soiled.

"How are you, old pal?" said Luke as he came toward the bed with outstretched hand.

"I'm fine, Luke," said Andy. "But what brings you here?" His tone was not very cordial, and Luke resented it.

"So you're not glad to see me after I came all the way from your own home town to bring you something from the boys." Luke opened a paper bag he carried and took out a bottle of brandy. "The boys said you wouldn't get nothing like this to cheer you up here."

Andy looked at the bottle and for a moment his eyes brightened and his heart beat a bit faster. He realized that it would not take much to arouse the old desire.

"You can just hide it under your pillow and take a little nip once in awhile," continued Luke in a coaxing tone.

This man was the "go-between" for the gang. A feeling of remorse came over Andy as he thought, "Why should

I be rude to him? Who am I that I should be so high and mighty?"

Light footsteps in the corridor made Andy reach for the bottle and quickly hide it under his pillow. As the nurse came into the room he was saying, "It was very kind of you, Luke, to come so far to see me. Give my regards to the boys, and take this to help on the carfare." He took a dollar bill from a drawer and handed it to Luke. "I think they are getting ready to work on me. Good-by now."

Luke shuffled his way out, feeling that he had been cheated because he had not been asked to sit down and talk over the town gossip.

"Your caller did not stay long," said the nurse. "I just came to bring the paper. Could it be that you were not happy to see him?"

"You are very observing, Miss Lambert," said Andy. "I'm glad you came in just now . . . thanks!"

AFTER SHE LEFT the room Andy took the bottle from under his pillow. "What can I do with the stuff?" he asked himself.

"It looks good," said the Tempter. "Why not just taste it and then ask the nurse to throw it away?"

A sudden wave of weariness came over Andy. He hid the bottle and had just closed his eyes when he heard a voice beside him, "Even as a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, so is a man no stronger than his self-control."

Andy opened his eyes and saw a man standing beside his bed. "Who are you," he asked, "and how did you get in here?"

His visitor smiled and said, "You can call me your Ghost of Yesterday. Haven't you heard that our yesterdays are made up of happy memories or haunting regrets? I helped to save your life, and I don't want to see you throw it away now. You have been called a hero, but that bottle under your pillow will make a miserable coward of you. Won't you give it to me?" He held out his hand and waited for a moment, then continued, "You can trust me and the nurse need never know. You think a lot of her, and she is fond of you. You don't want her to know, do you?"

Andy brought out the bottle and said, "I do trust you, and I know what you say is right. Your face seems so familiar. I wish I could remember where I have seen you before. I have the feeling that somewhere we have been together and have been friends. Here, take it, and I'll try to watch out for that weakest link of mine. When I get out of here I think I'll go home and help Dad with the cabinets. He and Mom will keep me straight."

"Yes," said the man, "they and the nurse will help you. You and I were very good friends and some day memory will tell you who I am." He went to the wash basin and Andy heard the brandy being poured down the drain, but his eyelids felt so heavy he did not try to raise them.

WHEN HE AWOKE the nurse was saying, "You have had a nice, long sleep, Lt. Grayson, and it is time to eat again."

As she fixed the tray on a little table across his knees, Andy asked, "Did you see the man who came to see me this afternoon, Miss Lambert? He didn't tell me his name, but I'm sure I've seen him somewhere."

"The only visitor I saw was the shabby one you weren't so glad to see. How was this other man dressed?"

"I didn't notice how he was dressed at the time, but since you ask, I seem to remember that he wore black clothes and a white collar."

"I'll go out and ask at the desk. The receptionist may know something about him."

As soon as she left the room, Andy put his hand under his pillow and was relieved to find that the bottle of brandy was not there. That was proof to him that his visitor was real and that it was not all a dream.

When Miss Lambert returned she reported that no one had seen a person of that description. "You must have dreamed about him, Andy," she said, "or perhaps he got by without anyone's seeing him."

For the moment Andy forgot the man, his eyes lighted, and a smile came over his face. "Why, Miss Lambert, you called me Andy—may I call you Letty? Would you mind?"

The nurse laughed, "No, I don't mind if it will make you any happier. But tell me more about this man. What did he say to you?"

"I wouldn't tell anyone but you, Letty, but just saying your name seems to make me feel that it is all right. You will believe me, and no one else would."

"Yes, Andy," she replied softly, "I'll believe you."

"Well, I guess I'd better begin with that fellow who came first. Before I left home I was chasing around with some school friends, and we thought it was smart to get drinks by sending Luke to buy them. None of us were of age, and we couldn't buy anything stronger than a Coke. He came to bring me a bottle of brandy and couldn't understand why he was not the good friend he used to be. I guess I was pretty wild for awhile after I went into the Army, and then after we went across our outfit learned what it was to be dead tired, hungry, and cold. I used to get so homesick I wouldn't write to the folks because I couldn't stand getting letters from them. With every letter they sent me I imagined I could smell mother's homemade bread and ginger cake, and I'd see Dad working on a special order that needed my help. Then I met a buddy who helped me to snap out of it. He was a real Christian and belonged to a church I had never heard of before."

"What was the name of the church ... do you remember?"

"I'm not sure, but I think it was Reorganized Latter Day Saints. Anyhow it sounded good to me."

"Do you remember your friend's name?"

"He went by the name of Lambie, but I think that was a nickname they gave him because he was so mild and never resented the things the Army does to a guy. He didn't mind what they called him; he just went on being himself no matter what happened."

If Andy had been looking at Letty he would have seen tears in her eyes. "Tell me," she said, "of your strange visitor. What did he say to you?" After Andy had told her what the stranger had said, she was very quiet for a moment. "But, Andy, it was I—" she said, then noticed that his face was pale and his lips trembling.

"Letty, I know now!" he cried out. "He said I would remember his name. It was our chaplain, Robert Monroe, who came here. He was the one who found me and pulled me out from under the tank after the others had moved on thinking I was done for. That was why he was so concerned and said that he had saved my life once and didn't want me to throw it away."

"Here, Andy, take this," she said firmly. "You have had an exciting day, and I am giving you a sedative. I'll see you later."

Andy had not realized that she was off duty and had spent her own time talking with him. As she hurriedly left the hospital building she placed the empty bottle in a trash can and said to herself, "I'll tell him some day, but not now."

HE WATCHED EAGERLY the next morning for Letty Lambert to come on duty; but instead the house doctor came with a strange nurse. "Lt. Grayson, meet Miss Bishop," he said, "Miss Lambert has a two weeks leave of absence, and Miss Bishop will take good care of you while she is away. I have some very good news for you."

Andy's face showed disappointment as he asked, "What is it, Dr. Larson? I can use some good news right now."

"I'm sure you'll call this good," said the doctor with a smile. "The day your parents were here they came to my office and asked how soon you could come home to them. They feel that you will improve much faster in your own home. Of course you will have to remain quiet and have a nurse for awhile. I promised to give them an answer as soon as I talked it over with the rest of the staff. We have decided to make it in about two weeks. Now I must be getting along."

The two weeks were almost up when Andy received a letter from a hospital in Japan, the same one he had been flown to from Korea. It was from a GI he had known there. "I heard them talking about you the other day, and the place where you are, and how much you've improved. I hope to make it there myself before long. Too bad about the chaplain and Lambie. They say Lambie has a nice little wife over there somewhere. Hope you can get to see her and tell her what a swell fellow he was, and how we all liked him."

Andy laid the letter aside and lay thinking for some time. It was true what he had heard them say over there. It couldn't have been the chaplain who came to see him, unless the Good Lord had let him come because the chaplain had more influence than anyone else—except Lambie. What greater thing can a man do than to lay down his life for a friend? His eyes smarted with the tears he could not control. He wished he could talk things over with Lambie once more. He wanted to thank him for what he had done, and tell him what a nice girl Letty was.

THE MORNING MAIL brought him some church literature, which was not unusual, except this was different somehow. One pamphlet had the picture of a man on the cover page and the title, "Hear Our Story." The other was "The Church of Jesus Christ. Where is it? How Shall I Know It?" Andy's eyes opened wide when he saw beneath the title, "The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints." Lambie's church! He had longed for a contact with his friend. Would he find in these pamphlets a message that would ease the loneliness in his heart?

He asked Miss Bishop if she knew anything about this church or belief, and showed her the papers he had received.

"Yes, Lt. Grayson," she replied, "that is Letty's church and mine. I imagine she sent them to you." It gave him a nice warmth in his heart to think that Letty had not forgotten him.

That same day, Letty Lambert sat in a well-furnished, comfortable home, saying, "I wish I could stay longer with you, Mother Lambert, but I must get back to the hospital and take over my special case. It will mean a month or two in a private home. You have been a good mother to me, and I will never forget your kindness. No matter where I go, I will always come back to you. I have no other home but yours now."

"Letty, there is something I want to say to you, and I don't know how to say it so you will understand," said the older woman. "Please don't forget that you are still young and entitled to a share in life's happiness. You have many years before you. Don't waste those years grieving over your yesterdays."

"I understand what you mean, Mother Lambert," replied Letty, "and it is generous of you to say this to me when your own heart is so full of pain and loneliness, but I can never forget Ralph or my love for him. I have assured him many times that no one would ever take his place."

"Letty, my dear girl, I know that no one will ever take Ralph's place in your affections, but someday there may come a man worthy to take his own place. I am sure that you remember your own father and mother and that your love for each of them was equally as strong. Neither could ever take the place of the other."

Letty kissed her soft cheek as she answered, "I believe you are really sincere, Mother Lambert, but time will have to soften my sense of loss a great deal before I can ever consider anyone else."

IT WAS A HAPPY SURPRISE when Andy learned that Letty was to be his nurse in his own home. Life was pleasant in the Grayson household, and they often discussed the books of the church. Letty never urged him to accept the gospel, but she often prayed that he would.

One day while talking over a passage in the Book of Mormon that spoke of the coming of Christ, Andy exclaimed, "Why that's the same thing Lambie read to me! I know now that he was a true man of God. I can remember the exact words as he read them, 'But this much I tell you, that if ye do not watch yourselves, and your thoughts, and your words, and your deeds, and observe to keep the commandments of God, and continue in the faith of what we have heard concerning the coming of our Lord, even unto the end of your lives, ye must perish.' Letty, I wish you could have known Lambie. . . ."

The girl sat silently looking out of the window, as though her thoughts were far away. Andy waited, wondering what was on her mind, then she turned toward him and said, "I did know him, Andy. I was his wife. The Book of Mormon that I hold in my hands is the same one he held when he was reading to you. It was sent back to me. I didn't tell you before because I didn't want your pity. It is something I must work out for myself. . . . They nicknamed him Lambie because his name was Ralph Lambert. It has been a great comfort to know you and hear you tell of your friendship with him. You have brought him very close to me."

Andy was too astonished to speak for a moment, then he took her hand and said, "Letty, he belonged to both of us, and loved us both. Don't you think that he would be happy if he knew we were here together?"

"Yes, Andy, I am sure he would," Letty replied.

AFTER LETTY had gone back to her routine work at the hospital, an elder from a neighboring town came to talk with Andy and his parents and explained many things to them about the gospel. When Andy was able to use a crutch they went to the church where the elder was pastor and heard their first Latter Day Saint sermon. It was not long before they asked for baptism.

Two years passed. Letty made several week-end visits to the Grayson home, and Andy saw her when he went to the hospital for a check up. Then came the day when there was a quiet little wedding in the church. The groom walked so straight and sure down the aisle that few remembered he had an artificial foot. The bride smiled happily when he put the ring on her finger. Mother Lambert was there and as proud of them both as though they were her own. For Andy's father and mother it was the happiest day of their lives.

When Letty's and Andy's son was eight weeks old he was taken to the church and blessed and given the name of Lambert Monroe Grayson. As the pastor held the tiny boy in his arms he prayed, "Our Heavenly Father, we pray that thou wilt bestow a blessing upon this child. May he have the gift of faith and the same degree of love for humanity and desire for service to thee, as characterized the good men for whom he has been named. May his parents enshrine in their hearts and home the fond memories with no haunting regrets out of their yesterdays."

The faces of Andy's parents and Mother Lambert beamed with love and pride. Andy cuddled his son close in his arms as he and Letty walked back to their seats, but there was something deeper than paternal love and pride as he laid the baby gently in Mother Lambert's arms and whispered, "Our Little Lambie."

ways very kind and attentive to see that everything was done for me that could be done. I asked my sister-in-law what the physician said about my getting well, but I quickly saw that she evaded my question. . . . Three long days I urged her to tell me. I said to her, "If he says I am going to die, I think I ought to know it. If I am to be a poor, feeble cripple to linger a worthless life, I ought to know it."

She finally yielded, and after cautioning me not to take it to heart, replied, "The doctor says your physical system is all gone. There is nothing to build on, and you are liable to drop away at any moment. You may possibly linger a short time, but will never be able to feed or dress yourself again."

Upon receiving this sad answer, I involuntarily replied, "I will be up and dress myself within a week."

My sister-in-law went out into the other room. A quiet, serene sensation seemed to come over my mind, and the manifestation I had at my conversion—when the voice said to me, "You will embrace this doctrine, be baptized, and preach it"—came to my mind in great force. I then told the Lord, "If you want me to preach the gospel and will give me my health and the use of my legs so I will not be lame, and will tell me anything, I will do it. I do not want you to tell somebody else and then have him tell me. But I can't travel and preach and be lame; I ask for the use of my limbs or death."

As I said these words the Spirit rested on me and assured me, "You will recover and be baptized, and for evidence to you that the one who baptizes you has authority from God, he will have the gift of prophecy and revelation to indicate your calling, and ordain you an elder the day you are baptized, and then you will preach for a time, and then be chosen into the high council of the church."

(Briggs did not tell how he recovered, but apparently he did, for his narrative goes on to indicate the activities of a well man.—Editors.)

John understood this, for he said, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him. . . ."—I John 3: 2.

Paul, also speaking to the Philippians, said, "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ; Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body. . . ."—Philippians 3: 20, 21.

. . . and, whom he justified, them he also glorified."—Romans 8: 30, A.V.

" . . . Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."—I Corinthians 2: 9.

So it happens that "Every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth," when they see the true splendor of God's great gift of salvation, will be brought to cry out in worship, deeper than we can now comprehend:

Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. Amen! and Amen!

The Call at Evening had many authors. It was my happy privilege to stir in some imagination and push the pen.

Embers

Do you want to set the world on fire? If so, you must have patience. Many a small flame has been blown out in the wind before it ignited anything. And even after you have a big flame roaring to the skies, remember it is the glowing embers that provide the steadiest warmth.—IONE SARTWELL.

LOS ANGELES STAKE.—Approximately thirty newly ordained men of the Los Angeles Stake priesthood spent April 8 and 15 in intensive training for priesthood work. The district priesthood meeting March 27 was attended by members of the priesthood from as far as 500 miles away. The meeting was for instruction and demonstration.

Because of the increased responsibilities at the Central Portland Church, Elder Wayne Lapworth was relieved as pastor of the Scapoose mission, and Priest Robert Taylor and wife, Wanda, were appointed by the district presidency to take over its leadership. Brother and Sister Ted Ostrem donated a lot on which to build a new church.—Reported by J. L. VERHEI

HUNTSVILLE, MISSOURI.—A new church has been purchased, located at Elm and Cly Streets. Church school, and also morning and evening services are held each Sunday, with midweek prayer service each Wednesday.

Brother Orman Salisbury of St. Joseph, Missouri recently completed a ten-day series of meetings, lectures, and visiting. This resulted in four baptisms. The pastor for the group is Brother Morris E. Worden, Jr.

The group was organized December 4, 1949. Since then there have been thirteen baptisms and one ordination. Brother Rhodes Burton was ordained to the office of deacon.—Reported by MRS. HELEN SWAN

COLUMBIA, MISSOURI.—A new building has been purchased for the church group. It is a large residence, containing several rooms which had served as homes for university students. A new couple in the group, Brother and Sister John Faurot, consented to move into the building and they have been assuming the responsibilities of permanent residence. The entire group has co-operated in refinishing and redecorating the house. The upstairs is occupied by male students, many of them church men.

WEST VIRGINIA DISTRICT.—A two-day district institute was held at the Wellsburg Branch March 3 and 4. Seventy James S. Menzies, missionary for the district; Elder Samuel M. Zonker, district president; and Elder Otto Melcher, bishop's agent, conducted study classes for the Melchisedec and Aaronic priesthood groups. Sister James S. Menzies and Elder Robert Rodgers, evangelist, led the discussions in classes for the women who attended the institute. "Tell the Restoration Story—Teach All Nations" was the theme of the institute. Worship services, classes and a Communion service were held Sunday. After the Communion service an ordination service was held. Curtis Rield was ordained to the office of priest. Following the ordination service, Bishop's Agent Melcher conducted a class on the financial law. At the closing meeting of the institute District President Zonker outlined the general program for the district for the coming months. Lodging for the institute guests was provided by members of the Wellsburg Branch, and meals were served by the women's department of the branch.

Another important event occurring in the district during March was the revision of The Cowant, a district missionary paper. The paper was published by the Wheeling, West Virginia, Branch a number of years ago, but was discontinued during the depression. Early this year, Seventy Menzies, in conversation with Elder William Schoenian of the Moundsville, West Virginia, Branch, former editor of The Cowant, discussed the possibilities of resuming publication of the paper. It was decided to include the tri-district area of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; Youngstown, Ohio; and West Virginia, in the scope covered by the paper. The initial issue was published in March. It will be published once each month.—Reported by MARGARET C. PACK

CENTRAL TEXAS DISTRICT.—Elder Alfred H. Yale, missionary in charge, spent three weeks in Dallas during the month of March. While here he conducted cottage meetings at strategic points throughout the city.

Meetings were held in the homes of Frank Fey, Glen Fordham, Linden Wheeler, Merlin Metzler, and Thelma Mottashed. Colored slides to illustrate the life of Jesus, the church he established, and archaeological discoveries of South America were shown. Fifty-four nonmember friends were contacted during the course of these meetings.

A school of instruction for missionaries began in Houston, April 2. Twenty-seven members of the Houston Branch enrolled, with Elder Yale as teacher. Following the weeks of instruction, the class was divided into teams and cottage meetings were held for six weeks. During the period that cottage meetings were held an experience seminar was held each Sunday evening.

A similar program of study and missionary work for the Hearne Branch and Bryan Mission began April 23.—Reported by NELLA JUNE DOTSON

MINOT, NORTH DAKOTA.—Elders E. Y. Hunker and H. C. Hobart were present at the first meeting since the winter months which was held April 15. Elder Hunker left to visit Saints in the Bantry area and Elder Hobart visited homes and held cottage meetings in the Minot area. April 22 church school, preaching and a Communion service were held at the Logan schoolhouse with Elders H. C. Hobart and Nelt Wager of Bantry in charge.—Reported by VIRGIL D. SMITH

BAY MINETTE, ALABAMA.—W. J. Breshears, district president, held a series of meetings which closed April 28. Three adults and one child were baptized. Brother Breshears preached every evening during the series and conducted cottage meetings in the afternoon.

Transcription Service for Broadcasting Purposes

UNDER OFFICIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS notice of transcription service from the Radio Department is given, and in this article we set forth some details of further available service.

We believe in many instances this type of program is worthwhile where we have congregations. Two types of programs are available in considerable numbers. First we have the devotional type program which consists of organ, Scripture reading, prayer, and devotional talks by Evan Fry, with organ background for local announcements. It is advisable to open a series of broadcasts with the devotional and follow with the doctrinal sermons. The devotional program acts as a "door opener," breaks down prejudice, and creates good public relations.

The doctrinal sermons are in three series of thirteen units each, including what we believe about the organization of Christ's church, the apostasy, the Restoration, the principles of the gospel, authority, and revelation, all given in an affirmative manner, also our beliefs on tithing, stewardship, Christian marriage, and allied subjects of the Zion program.

Free time is available on some stations for public service religious programs, such as the devotional transcriptions offered. Commercial rates vary according to the power and listening rating of the station. Small market stations offer rates as low as five dollars for fifteen minutes while stations of the metropolitan areas charge as high as forty-five dollars for a morning program. While prices vary, some desirable time is available at the more reasonable prices.

There is a rental charge of one dollar per program plus transportation costs. Mimeographed scripts of the sermons are available from the Radio Department for a nominal cost of one cent apiece or less in larger quantities.

These transcriptions are made at 3 3/4 r.p.m. and are available for broadcast purposes only. These programs are of a quality that will lend credit to the church and are useful in preceding any series of meetings in a particular listening area. By urging the use of this transcription service, anyone can do a fine missionary work.

The Wee Little Church With the Wee Vestibule

A Presentation for the Children's Department

As David and Jeanie came in through the door Where many a time they had entered before— They saw a blue sign in the wee vestibule Which said, "Each One Bring One to Our Sunday School."

Now many a time they had come through that door But neither had noticed that sign there before— So, reading aloud in the wee vestibule They said, "Each One Bring One to Our Sunday School."

They scratched their wee heads as they went on their way To the wee little classroom to study and pray— And there they again met the same little rule Which said, "Each One Bring One to Our Sunday School."

Their teacher was waiting to greet them that day, To tell them their stories and teach them to pray, To tell them how each should remember the rule Which says, "Each One Bring One to Our Sunday School."

She taught them how Jesus would like them to share— She taught them how Jesus would answer their prayer— She taught them that Jesus would follow the rule Which says, "Each One Bring One to Our Sunday School."

Next week, when the children came in through the door, Instead of just two, the number was four, There were David and Jeanie and Mary and Julie— And they read, "Each One Bring One to Our Sunday School."

If each one will bring one then one grows to two— Then two grows to four, and before we are through, We'll have to make bigger the wee vestibule So that each one can bring one to our Sunday school!

PLANS FOR USING THE POEM

Each verse of the poem was written with the idea that two pictures could be shown during its reading. In each verse the first two lines suggest a different picture, while the last two lines suggest the same picture throughout— simply a repetition of the slogan, EACH ONE BRING ONE TO CHURCH SCHOOL (The words "Sunday school" were used for their utility in rhyming). Pictures should, preferably, be Kodachrome slides but mounted pictures would suffice. The verses must be read clearly and slowly.

VERSE ONE:

First two lines—the two tots entering a boy and one a girl, entering a little vestibule of a little church (like the symbol church used on general church publications for the campaign)

Second two lines—Either a picture of the slogan itself or a picture of the two tots looking up at the slogan on the wall. Since this picture will be repeated in most verses, it will be identified as the slogan picture

VERSE TWO:

First two lines—the two tots, with heads to one side in quizzical expression

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

Dorcas Served and Gave

By Mrs. William Nixon

DORCAS AROSE THAT MORNING feeling weary in body and rather depressed in spirit. She had been quite busy during the past week. Her neighbor's little girl had been ill, so she had spent many hours ministering to her needs. This family was poor and it had taken a little more than a reasonable amount of service.

Dorcas sighed as she prepared her simple breakfast. She tidied her room and breathed another sigh as she looked toward the pile of garments on the chair. She must get to work on them. She coughed and pressed her hand to her chest. If she could only get rid of this troublesome cough and the hurting in her chest. She had mixed an herb poultice and applied it, but she did believe this running in and out in the damp weather aggravated the condition.

Just then the door opened and a woman looked in. "Ah, you are home I see. I came twice in the past two days and you were away."

"Greetings, Rachel, I was only next door helping Elizabeth with her little Lara," answered Dorcas. "And is the child no better? It seems she has been ill some time," remarked Rachel.

"She is troubled with a high fever which leaves her weak, and her little lips are parched from the heat of it," replied Dorcas, as again she started coughing violently.

"You seem to be a little ill yourself. You must be careful of your own health, Dorcas. You've been running in and out, forgetting to throw your shawl around your shoulders," chided Rachel.

"It is true, I have been careless, but I must get to my work. I am making a warm coat from one of mine for the little one who is ill. Hers is so thin and threadbare," sighed Dorcas.

"Deborah likes very much the coat you have made for her. It fits quite snugly and is very warm. She urged me to convey to you her thanks. Now I must be on my way," said Rachel. "I have some meal to grind for cakes. I will stop in tomorrow and . . . do be careful," she urged, wrapping her shawl about her.

"Farewell, Rachel," said Dorcas gently closing the door as she again coughed. "I am so thirsty," she whispered as she dipped her gourd into the bucket and drank of the cold water. "I must slip over to look in upon little Lara," she said to herself as she slowly picked up a shawl and threw it over her head.

IN A SHORT WHILE Dorcas returned, coughing as she entered the room. She pressed her fingers to her temples. "My head is throbbing so, yet I must make a little broth for the aged brother who lives at the end of the road. It is enough to live alone without having the body also cold and spiritless. The meat grows lean on his bones, and the blood flows thin. A little broth will warm his body and cheer his heart." She hastily went about her duties; she felt the need of haste, so great was her desire to lie down.

Finishing her task, she took to her bed and immediately fell into troubled slumber.

She dozed and tossed the rest of the day and through the night arising only to drink great quantities of water, which always seemed to leave her coughing.

Early the next morning, the door again opened and Rachel entered. Finding Dorcas in bed she became alarmed and tried to arouse her.

Dorcas' face was flushed with fever, and her mutterings were barely audible. "The broth must be taken to Brother Jocot. I must take it from the fire. . . . The coat must be finished. . . . I must go over to Lara's," were among the words Rachel was able to distinguish.

Really afraid now, Rachel hurried next door to bring Elizabeth, and together they ministered to Dorcas.

She was ill for many days and finally one morning Rachel awoke with a start from the nap she had been taking by the bedside of Dorcas.

Seeing her lying there—so white, so still—with such a beautiful expression of inner peace on her countenance, Rachel felt her heart swell with love for her sister. She leaned over and quietly pressed her lips to Dorcas' brow; then hastily drew away and spoke to her. Dorcas neither moved nor answered. Rachel put her hand to her sister's shoulder to arouse her and drew back with a cry of sorrow. "Dorcas has left us," she cried, and ran to the home of Elizabeth.

TOGETHER THEY RETURNED with another, and great was their sorrow. "Oh, if only Peter were here," cried Elizabeth.

"He is over at Lydda's," answered a sister. "Let us send for him."

"I will send my Andrew and Simm for him at once," another sister called back as she ran from the house.

The women who were left with Dorcas gently bathed her and laid her on the bed. The women were still waiting when much later someone knocked on the door. Opening it, they saw Peter.

All started weeping again at the loss of Dorcas. They told him of her good works. They showed him the coat and garments, lying yet unfinished. They told him of the little pan of broth Dorcas had been making for the aged brother.

To all this Peter listened with a look of compassion on his face. As they followed him into the upper chamber where Dorcas lay, he stood silently by the bed and looked down upon her. Then he asked them to leave him alone with her, as he wished to pray. When they had left the room, he knelt and earnestly sought God in Dorcas' behalf.

"Thou knowest of her work," he prayed. "I have no need to tell thee. Through her ministrations many have been helped. Inasmuch as she does those things for her friends, she exemplifies her love for thee. In thine infinite mercy, lengthen her days so that she may continue her good work," prayed Peter.

Feeling the assurance of God's Spirit he turned and said, "Tabitha, arise!" Slowly Dorcas opened her eyes, and when she saw Peter, she sat up.

He gave her his hand and lifted her up, then called her friends and presented her to them, alive.

Great was their rejoicing, and Dorcas hurried to the kitchen to prepare something to eat for Peter.

Working with Teen-agers

By Hattie May Bishop

Program Director, Y.W.C.A., Springfield, Missouri

TO BE ENTRUSTED with the leadership of a group of teen-age girls is an expression of confidence. It implies that a person likes and understands girls, and that she has some knowledge about the things young people like to do. Above all it denotes that she is the kind of person with whom it will be good for young people to associate.

The importance of the role played by youth leaders in the shaping of the future of young people cannot possibly be overestimated, for it is in group activities that the young person learns to get along happily with different kinds of people through the give and take of working and playing. Herein they learn to think and make the right decisions.

The leader herself learns new skills she would never have attempted if she had not been looking for something new to interest young people. It may be a new devotional topic; it may be in dramatics or art; it may be visiting places she would never have thought to enter if she had not undertaken to broaden the scope of teen-age interests.

There are interesting contacts with persons in the community. The girls profit by visiting a large department store, a silk mill, a dairy, a hospital, a day nursery, the state capitol.

There is the great satisfaction of watching backward girls develop into leaders. There is joy in helping young people to grow as persons who can live happy and useful lives. It requires time, patience, and a deep conviction about the worth of each young person—the quiet, the noisy, the gay, the eager, the shy, the alert.

HERE ARE SOME BASIC PRINCIPLES of life that teen-agers need to learn:

1. To face life without confusion
2. To get along with others
3. To care what happens to others
4. To judge conduct, one's own and that of others, in terms of its contribution to the common good
5. To make sound plans and carry them out
6. To take responsibility
7. To face personal problems intelligently and with fortitude
8. To appreciate the values of education, good health, and good citizenship in a free country
9. To learn and know of the love of God

Adolescence is the period of transition from childhood to adulthood. Many girls move rather easily through these teen-age years. But for other girls the adjustments required to become an adult are more difficult. Some girls have had wise parents all through their growing years to help with their problems of physical, emotional, and intellectual maturing. Others are less fortunate.

The giggles and temper tantrums of adolescent girls are evidences of childish behavior; they are characteristic also of many grown persons. Teen-agers themselves are puzzled by the wide range of their feelings and behavior, the almost sudden changes in their attitudes toward themselves. Parents are often bewildered and uncertain what to expect of adolescents. They do not see beyond the apparently self-sufficient exterior of a teen-ager the wistful anxiety she has of whether or not she will know the right thing to say and do on her first date. They do not see that many times she wishes her parents would have more confidence in her.

Adults are often not much help to teen-agers because they themselves are uncertain about life. Grown women, and men, too, for that matter, have not yet clarified their own life goals. They have no deep-rooted convictions; they are unconcerned about social and economic problems; they count success in terms of money; they seek to be entertained by others because they have never learned to create leisure time enjoyment for themselves; they are fearful of the future, fearful of jobs, fearful of atomic energy and the rest of the world; many are tense with prejudices toward others. Often they are fearful of the point-blank questions of teen-agers.

MANY FACTORS ARE IMPORTANT in understanding the individual teen-age girl: whether a girl is liked better at home than her brother or sister; whether parents are happy or unhappy together; whether a girl lives on the "right" or "wrong" side of the tracks; what conflicts there are in the teachings of her home, school, or church.

There are certain needs of adolescents. Among the first are these:

1. The need to love and be loved
2. The need to come to terms with authority, to distinguish between domination by a more powerful person and authority which furthers the common concerns of all
3. The need to re-evaluate accepted values
4. The need to give and take by belonging to groups outside the family circle which are idealistic in principle

The greatest satisfaction one can have as a leader of teen-agers is the feeling of having contributed to the growth and well-being of young persons through group work.

The Old Cedar Table

By Mrs. Harold I. Velt

RECENTLY I received a letter from Dad in Australia. He said the old cedar table had been sent to an antique repairer and had returned with a shining new look.

Immediately my mind was flooded with memories of the table which had served our family for nearly half a century.

It was second-hand when brought into our modest missionary home. Although it cost only a few pounds, to me it was symbolic of family and church devotion, family loyalty, unity, friendships, and hospitality. There many of life's priceless lessons were taught.

Friends, many of them God's leading church officials and their companions from abroad, surrounded it and partook of the bounties provided by a gracious host and hostess. I can yet see the gleam in mother's eye as she looked the table over to see that everything was in order and that all needs were well supplied. I can yet see her joy in preparing for such honored guests. The homeless, bereaved, sick, friendless, and needy were no exception and received the same careful consideration. In small tubs, babies of several generations received their first baths upon this table. It was here that little ears received lasting impressions of the wonders of the gospel told by their elders. It was from here that Scriptural reading and family prayers ascended to the Father, for his watch care and guidance. It was here that young people congregated to recreate, matching skill in table tennis or other such games. Sewing was taught and garments made on this table. Around it school and Sunday school lessons were learned and counsel was given. It was here that church manuscripts were written and mission periodicals were assembled, folded, and made ready for distribution. For the home where this table served was the church headquarters for many years.

I could not help reminiscing when I heard that the old cedar table had been freed of its scratches and scars. I felt it had served its family well and had earned its shining new look.

Dr. Gould

Religion on Trial - Part II

By Doctor William Gould

Instructor of English Literature and Communication, Graceland College

Why should there be a hell? If God is as merciful as the Bible says, hell would be unnecessary.

THIS QUESTION was asked the Graceland students of a class in English Literature during their study of Milton's Paradise Lost. With Milton's vivid description of hell in their minds, but realizing that Milton himself would deny the literal accuracy of the picture, they answered the question.

The thirty-five concepts of hell which were expressed by the students fall into about nine divisions, with three ideas claiming two thirds of the class. The dominant concept, stated by about half the class, was that hell is a place in which man will be given a chance to redeem himself. Jesus himself will minister to those in hell, and they will be taught the nature and will of God. Hell is described as a sort of modern reform school where punishment is always purposeful and remedial. Punishment is to teach men the consequence of sin, not to torment us or to express the vengeance of God.

In sharp contrast, five students' conception of hell was a place of torment and punishment, "otherwise what reason would we have to be good?" These students thought in puritanical terms of "a place to make us fear God," and "to punish us for the wrong which we do." They assumed that sin was attractive and goodness dull. Therefore we must have a hell in order to "scare" us into being good.

Another five students thought of hell as necessary if man were truly to have agency. If there were no choice but heaven, what opportunity would there be for man to choose? Since it is by learning to choose to do the will of God, without coercion, that we develop into godlike persons, we must have more than one possible choice. Therefore, if there is a heaven, there must be a hell.

CLOSELY ALLIED to this in thought were several other expressions. Hell and heaven are not absolutes; there are an infinite number of variations or gradations between the two extremes. The life we inherit is the natural consequence of our deeds, for God is law-abiding. Hell is the natural consequence of broken law, not a personal vengeance. Whatever torment we endure in hell is in reality self-inflicted, for we have chosen to act as we do, knowing that universal law attaches unalterable consequences to every act. Those who sin because they have had no opportunity to learn of God's will shall be given a chance to learn of him in hell.

Three students differed from all the others in denying the existence of hell. One said, "Hell is any life of misery and wickedness—God did not create it. We do." Another said that since we apparently have no real choice but to sin, being naturally weak and easy prey to temptation, a merciful God will not punish us for our weakness since he created us that way. One student, recalling the visual image of fire and brimstone which is usually associated with hell, denied its existence because, "How could fire hurt a spirit?"

WHILE MOST STUDENTS did not express specific notions of the nature of hell, their answers to the question indicated that they thought of the burning lake and fiery pit as literary images rather than reality. Some of the answers which did touch on the nature of hell were interesting. Several thought of hell as "a condition of conscience." A similar idea was that hell is the unrest of a soul which comes to the realization of its own imperfection and the wasted potential of its earthly life. Several of those who thought of hell as "a place of education" apparently conceived of the suffering as more mental than physical. Remorse and regret over neglected opportunity were mentioned. One student suggested that each age will create its own concept of hell. The physical torture of the fire was a natural symbol for primitive people. Other tortures are more appropriate for our age. He suggested that to us isolation is the most intolerable punishment. To be utterly rejected, unregarded, and isolated from God and man is a kind of hell which is suited to the damned of our age.

In summary, we may say that the great majority of the students thought of hell as having a corrective purpose. It is to perfect the sinful and to teach them the ways of God so that they will not need to live in hell eternally. Man's free will must be respected, even in hell. God will try to redeem man through teaching, love, and persuasion, but man is the master of his own destiny, even in hell, for he chooses his own course and will know the consequences of his choice.

Graceland women elected twelve girls as Crescents for the 1951-52 school year. They are Helen Russell, president, Independence, Missouri; Arloe Baughman, secretary, Denison, Iowa; Bonnie Carmichael, Kansas City, Missouri; Janet Cooper, Charleroi, Pennsylvania; Carol Freeman, Independence, Missouri; Betty Masterson, Independence, Missouri; Valda Poole, Drummoyne, N. S. W., Australia; Marian Robinson, Independence, Missouri; Phyllis Shank, Lamoni, Iowa; Jeanne Slasor, Detroit, Michigan; Doris Turley, Bald Knob, Arkansas; and Ava Wallace, Bald Knob, Arkansas. The Crescents is an honor organization; the girls are chosen for their friendliness and their willingness and ability to serve their fellow students. Their duties include writing letters to incoming freshman girls during the summer, meeting the new students as they arrive on campus, and supporting whole-heartedly Graceland's activities and policies.

The Graceland Tower, weekly student newspaper, has been given a first class rating by the Associated Collegiate Press. The ACP, located at the University of Minnesota, makes its rating after an intense study of the first semester's issues. In the past four years, The Graceland Tower has rated consistently in the first class (excellent) bracket.

The workshop on children's activities presented a recent Sunday morning service. The adult and children's choirs of Lamoni Branch sang, and Dr. and Mrs. William Gould, Graceland instructors and youth leaders in Lamoni Branch, spoke to the campus congregation on their work with the children.

The classes in English Communication, studying the motion picture as a medium of mass communication, were recently divided into committees for the purpose of writing scenarios for a movie to depict Graceland and Graceland life. The college staff is planning to produce this picture next year, and it is expected that either the scenario produced by one of the committees or a composite of several of the best ones will be used for it.

Three of the Graceland music department's sophomore voice students recently presented graduation recitals. They are Glendora Rieske, soprano from Lewisburg, Ohio; Maurice Bottom, baritone, and Gordon Wilder, tenor, both from Lansing, Michigan. The presentation of a recital marks an important step in the development of a music student and is a major event in his life. Graceland gives all its young musicians who have the ability to do so the opportunity to present a complete recital.

The dramatics class, taught by Roscoe Faunce, presented five one-act plays to an enthusiastic audience on April 12. Each of the plays not only had a student cast but was directed and completely supervised by members of the class.

This occasion marked the debut of the newest addition to the playshop's lighting equipment, a new type of dimmer. This dimmer, through which six circuits can be run, takes up only a fraction of the space required by conventional rheostats, a decided advantage in Graceland's very little "little theater."

The Graceland music department presented a concerto recital on Friday, March 23, by four students—Kenneth Cooper of East St. Louis, Illinois; Mary Lou Henson of Decatur, Illinois; Kenneth Stubbart of Independence, Missouri; and Mary Lou Crayne of Kansas City, Kansas. Each played one movement of a piano concerto. The program was unique in that the orchestra parts were played by an organ in combination with the usual second piano. The organists were Ilene Sheehy of Greeley, Colorado, and Kenneth Cooper. Paul Deaver, piano instructor, was at the second piano.

The Hand on the Mouth

By Lois Ernsberger

Job 21:5 presents an interesting custom in connection with the educational courtesies of that day. When a student sat in front of his teacher, he put his hand upon his mouth to indicate that he had nothing to say but that he was all ears, listening.

This brings to mind the three little monkeys, "see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil." Each monkey in turn is covering his eyes, ears, and mouth.

We probably all have at some time been bothered by gossipy acquaintances or friends. Do we relish the juicy bits of gossip and join in, or do we do as Job declares, "I will lay mine hand upon my mouth" (40:4) and have nothing to do with this harmful pastime, which is very displeasing to God? It is written, "But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison."—James 3:8. James 3:10 goes on to say, "Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be." In trying to live up to the high standards of our church training let us be sure that our "fountain send forth sweet water," and forget the "bitter water" of our gossipy neighbors.

The Bible Is God's Book

We conceived that it is impossible for the Word of God, as written in the book of Nature, and God's Word written in the Holy Scriptures, to contradict one another, however much they may appear to differ.

We are not forgetful that physical science is not complete, but is only in a condition of progress, and that at present, our reason enables us only to see as through a glass darkly, and we confidently believe that a time will come when the two records will be seen to agree in every particular.

This document can be seen in the Bodleian library, in Oxford, England.

THE BIBLE is immeasurably superior to such heathen documents as the Koran, the book of the Mohammedans; or the Vedas, the book of the Hindu religion, or the writings of Confucius, in whom the Chinese believe, or the Zend-Avesta, book of the so-called sun worshippers of Iran. Compare any of them with the Bible, and you will need no other argument to cause you to believe that the Bible writers were moved by a power far above themselves, and that they received revelations of truth from God and his pattern for salvation.

ficials (which included the secretary of the king, the father of the present mayor Poroi) reveals the Christian character of the men who made up the native government. The document was formulated by the king and was to become effective after his death. It included restrictions upon the French possession of the Islands to the effect that no Tahitian blood be spilled upon Tahitian soil. This was an outgrowth of the native fear of the French form of capital punishment by guillotine. Another restriction was that the several faiths represented were not to be molested. The Tahitian flag was to be supplanted by the French flag upon Tahitian soil, and the Native flag was to be raised upon the French warship which lay at that time in the harbor. Upon the departure of the ship, the power of the Tahitian government slowly died as the ship sank out of view.

These are intimate reflections which Horahitu has confided to us for publication in the Herald. He was present at the whole ceremony and attended King Pomare's funeral, being among the relatives who mourned his death.

Patriarch J. Charles May, assisted by Seventies F. Edward Butterworth and Allen J. Breckenridge, ordained Horahitu on April 1 before an exceptionally large congregation of natives who had assembled for the Communion service. It was a most impressive service climaxed by a statement from this venerable missionary who has served the church for over forty years.

Patriarch J. Charles May, writes from Papeete, Tahiti, April 1:

I feel very highly honored in having been so well received by the native Saints and other friends here on the Island of Tahiti at the two branches of Tarona and Outumaoro, and also out in the district of Paea some fifteen or twenty miles around the Island. Three receptions were also given me in homes, one at the missionary headquarters, one at Brother and Sister Mervin's home, and at the home of Dede, whose husband had recently returned from a tour of the upper islands as supercargo on the boat "Orophena." They took great pleasure in showing me the rooms where you and Brother Siegfried slept while here.

During the past several days I have been busy renewing acquaintances, making new friends, and getting ready for the special work to which I have been assigned as patriarch.

I have enjoyed my work thus far, and I feel grateful for this happy privilege of meeting once again with the Butterworths, the Breckenridges, and our native Saints and friends of these Islands. I can see that much progress has been made in this mission. Your and Brother Siegfried's visit has been a great boon to the mission, and will ever be one of the high points in the history of the church here.

I wish to thank the many Saints and friends of America for the kind messages that reached me at Los Angeles to be read on the boat. The voyage was a very pleasant one, and my record of never being seasick was not broken. My cabin mate was a very fine Christian gentleman. We appreciated each other's association for the twelve days and more at sea. This helped to make it an unusually pleasant voyage.

The ordination of Elder Horahitu last Communion Sunday was to all present a very impressive occasion. I have known Brother Horahitu since before he was baptized by Elder Savage in 1910, and he has been a very dependable, consistent, active missionary for forty years. This honor has been well earned. Seventy Horahitu left yesterday for missionary work at Makatea, and when he returns I will make a tour of several islands with him. Elders Butterworth and Breckenridge are also to make a tour soon of several other islands.

We feel that much good will be accomplished this year. At the beginning of my work I appreciate this great welcome extended me in my new work as a patriarch among these people.

May God bless you in your work that great progress may be made in all departments of the church throughout the world.

* DEATH ON SUNDAY AFTERNOON

We were crossing the Intercity Viaduct on our way home from a church service on the Kansas side and noticed a little training plane buffeted in the wind like a frightened sparrow. Then high above it a jet plane cut across the sky at incredible speed. When it reached the river, its clear exhaust turned black, and it went down. Another jet was following it and circled the spot where it descended. We wondered, but didn't know what was happening. . . . However, we had to watch our traffic problems and continued on our way home.

The radio newscast at six o'clock told the story of the jet plane that had plunged into the river, killing the pilot. Not realizing, we had seen it in the last few seconds of the pilot's life.

It is a solemn thing to know that you have seen another human being die. That pilot was young, full of life and hope. There were those who loved him and anxiously followed his movements on every dangerous trip. This flight was only one of many he had planned. He could not have known, when he left the ground, that it would be his last. Something went wrong, there were a few desperate moments of trouble, and Death, riding the sky more swiftly than the plane, reached his victim in the muddy waters of the river.

The last view of the plane and its ominous black plume of smoke haunts the memory. Isaiah said, "They should mount up with wings as eagles." . . . But one who trusts his life to these swift couriers of aerial space never knows whether his ride will end Here, or Hereafter.

"He contracted the habit of dominating his associates, and that is an enormous mistake because it means associating with satellites."—Comment by Francis Hackett on George Bernard Shaw.

* VISITORS

Pastor Myron F. LaPointe of our Wichita, Kansas, congregation led a group of more than fifty young people of his church on a tour that began April 26 and took them to Far West Stake; Lamoni and Graceland College; Nauvoo and Carthage, Illinois; and the church headquarters at Independence.

On May 2 they called at the Herald Publishing House and were conducted through the offices, bookstore, and printing plant in small groups, each one led by a member of the staff who explained the work of this department of the church.

The party visited a number of the fine new churches here as well as the Auditorium. At the Social Service Center they participated in a worship service. Stake President Charles V. Graham was in charge of directing the whole Independence visit.

Consider the importance of that group of young people to the church at Wichita and to the General Church. Consider the importance in their lives of these visits to our churches, properties, offices, and shrines. Brother LaPointe and his helpers have done a fine service.

Herald Publishing House has always welcomed visitors, glad of an opportunity to explain the highly complex tasks involved in the important business of church publication.

One hundred fifty-two members of the priesthood in Far West Stake attended the priesthood classes conducted by Floyd M. McDowell, Leslie Kohlman, Lewis Landsberg, D. T. Williams, Charles Hield, and Emery E. Jennings. The classes were held at St. Joseph and Cameron, Missouri, with five nights of classwork at each place. The stake conference followed the next day.

VISIT COLORADO

Dr. Floyd M. McDowell and Apostle Reed M. Holmes attended a priesthood retreat for the Eastern Colorado District at Fort Collins April 28 and 29. The theme of the retreat was "Our Ministry of Conservation." Brother McDowell preached April 29 at Denver. APOSTLE AT WARRENSBURG

Apostle D. T. Williams attended and participated in seven meetings at Warrensburg, Missouri, May 6. A priesthood meeting was held in the afternoon at which about eighty members of the priesthood of the Central Missouri Stake were in attendance. Seventy John Puckett has stimulated this area and has received outstanding cooperation from Stake President Harry J. Simons.

BRANCH ORGANIZED

The branch at Bernie, Missouri, was organized April 29. A total of eighty-five people attended the service. Thirty-five of those attending were charter members. Apostle D. O. Chesworth preached the sermon and presided over the organizational meeting. The pastor of the branch is Dr. F. O. Kelley. He is assisted by Brother Fred Fears, who is the new bishop's agent, and Brother Charles Ziegenhorn of Sikeston, Missouri.

HERALD MANAGER ELECTED

Kenneth L. Graham attended the organizational meeting of Protestant Church-Owned Publishers Association in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on April 26 and 27. Gomer R. Wells

People from all over the states and in many parts of the world know Brother Wells. The picture shows him in a characteristic pose while serving the many visitors to the Auditorium during the past sixteen years. In this guide service many thousands of pieces of church literature are sold or given away every year to inquiring guests. He started his general church work back in April, 1890, in Missouri. In 1893 he went to Australia where he served for fifteen years, with only one trip home at mid-term. In addition to these two major assignments he has carried many interesting and important responsibilities. He was general superintendent of the Sunday school, editor and publisher, pastor, and member of the college board, as well as missionary and guide.

Gomer Wells was born in Montana (1867), graduated from Knob Noster (Missouri) high school (1885), and nearly finished the teacher's course in State Teacher's College (Warrensburg, Missouri, 1888) before church work claimed his whole time. While in college he was manager of the college paper, The Normal Student, and played clarinet in the college orchestra. This same instrument proved a great help in all his missionary work, especially in parks and on the streets of Australia.

At the General Conference of 1950, he was given the honorary badge of "well done" (called superannuation), but his love for the church and his desire to serve people keeps him at the post where you see him in the picture.

Who Are Protestant - Who Christian?

ON ACCOUNT OF OUR PECULIAR CLAIMS as a religious movement, I have taken more than a casual interest in an article in a leading religious magazine on the subject, "Are Baptists Protestants?" We will not canvass the matter at length, as it appears Baptists themselves are not wholly in agreement, and we are not specially interested in Baptists; but we make use of the writer's preliminary statement that, in essence, the question should be decided by the dictionary; "that is, by the vocabulary of present-day thought and writing."

"On that basis," says the writer, "Baptists are definitely Protestants, and," he adds, "there is no occasion for them to quibble about it."

Well, that's enlarging the circles to bring them in willy-nilly, in spite of possible objections, with little opportunity for a demurrer on the part of any of that sect.

Our curiosity aroused, we make the appeal to Webster, and we find, as a second definition of the word "Protestant" the following:

"Popularly, any Christian not of the Roman Catholic Church, the old Catholic Church, or the Eastern Church. The designation is rejected by many members of the churches of the Anglican Communion."

HAVING ARRIVED AT THIS PLACE, we begin to wonder if we are Protestant. We believe we are Christian, and we know we are not Catholic, and if Webster is dependable, we have all the requirements.

However, as the word connotes something beyond mere classification, the word to many—and it certainly does to me—means one of a religious body that some time moved away in "protest" from the "Mother" or Catholic Church. It has perhaps more interest to us than to others; but we are founded in part on a premise of authority, and we therefore resist any idea that we "stemmed" from Roman Catholicism, resting on the claim that our movement is a restoration; in this we are decidedly unique.

Our claim then to being Protestant, if any we ever make, rests wholly on the bare facts that we are Christian and that we are not Catholic.

IN MANY QUARTERS, however, we are held not to be Christian. The Federal and National Councils of Christian Churches, and numerous ministerial alliances, have drawn about themselves a tight and insuperable circle that keeps us out; in this we have always believed there has been a large portion of bigotry and prejudice.

I have often believed that if such councils and alliances had made proper distinction between us and the Mormons, they would not have discriminated against us, since the Latter Day Saints in Utah give allegiance to doctrines not a part of the faith of the church founded by the Prophet Joseph, and most certainly not countenanced by us, that should obviously, we believe, be an effectual bar as to them. Their beliefs in a plurality of gods, Adam-god theory, eternity of the marriage covenant (plural marriage), all distinctive Mormon doctrines, cannot be sustained as the teachings of Christ.

Of course, in those anti-Christian beliefs or doctrines we have no part.

OFFICIAL Council Action

The members of the Council of Twelve were in session in Independence May 3 to 10 inclusive. The First Presidency took advantage of the availability of the brethren to call a Joint Council of the First Presidency, the Council of Twelve, and the Presiding Bishopric May 8 and 10. Some important business was transacted. Four new appointments were approved and assignments made, and these will be announced when some details have been cleared. Elder Glen H. Johnson, who is returning to this country from Holland in the near future, was assigned to work in Independence and the Stakes. Elder John F. Sheehy was released from his assignment to Maine because of ill health and for the next few months will work in Independence and vicinity by arrangement between him and the First Presidency and the Apostles concerned. Because of the release of Brother Sheehy from Maine, Elder Ray J. Ashenurst has been assigned to that field and the appointment of Elder Loyd Adams has been extended to cover the State of Ohio.

Church Immigrants

Recently we have had considerable inquiry from some of our church members indicating an interest to serve as sponsors for church immigrants to the United States. The following is an excerpt from one of the forms put out by our government which will give a general idea of what is required of those who wish to serve as sponsors. Any desirous of doing so after reading the following may feel free to get in touch with the Presiding Bishopric for further information and advice.

IV. DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE OF SUPPORT

No alien who is likely to become a public charge may be admitted to the United States. Each applicant must present clear and convincing evidence that he will have adequate means of support for an indefinite period after arrival in the United States. Evidence of applicant's own financial resources should be in the form of letters or statements from his bankers or solicitors.

An applicant proceeding to the United States to join relatives or friends in the United States, upon whom they will be dependent, must present affidavits executed by them guaranteeing his support.

Affidavits of support from sponsors in the United States should cover the following points:

- 1) The name and address of the sponsor, and a statement of his relationship to the applicant.
- 2) The citizenship of sponsor, and if he is an alien, the place and date of legal admission to the United States and name of the ship which bore him to that port (see note below). If the sponsor is an American citizen, he should state how the citizenship was acquired. A naturalized American citizen should state the time and place of naturalization, the name of the court that naturalized him, and the number of his naturalization certificate.
- 3) The yearly income of the sponsor (which may be required to be supported by corroborative evidence).
- 4) Amount of present bank deposit and average balance during the past five years.
- 5) Market value of other property including stocks, bonds, or real estate. If there is an encumbrance on the real estate, the amount should be stated.
- 6) A list of sponsor's dependents, showing the age and sex of each.
- 7) An assurance that the sponsor is able and willing to support the applicant for as long a time as necessary and a solemn guarantee that he will not permit the applicant to become a public charge if admitted to the United States.

- 8) If the sponsor and the applicant are engaged, the affidavit should contain a solemn declaration of intent to wed upon the applicant's arrival in the United States.
- 9) A person in the United States sponsoring an applicant to whom he is under no moral or legal obligation to support, should outline the plans being made for the applicant's economic assistance upon his arrival in the United States. The sponsor should also touch upon the reasons to undertake the burden of the applicant's support in the absence of a legal or moral obligation to do so. Moreover, the sponsor should give the names and addresses and economic condition of any other applicants he has agreed to assist.

Note: An alien resident of the United States sponsoring the immigration of relatives or friends must prove that he was legally admitted to the United States. In order to do so, he should complete form I-475 verifying his legal admission to the United States. Form I-475 may be obtained from the office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service nearest home. The completed form should be returned to the Immigration and Naturalization Service in accordance with the instructions on the form.

A Most Important and Timely Priesthood Conference

By F. M. McDowell

THE PRIESTHOOD CONFERENCE to be held on the Graceland College Campus, June 10-17 is one of the first, if not the first, church-wide, church-sponsored gathering of the standing ministry. Conditions extant in the world today and the needs of the church everywhere give support to the conviction that such a conference is most important and timely. The over-all theme of the conference is "Winning and Holding Our Own," or "The Conservation of Our Natural Resources."

What the Priesthood Needs

1. The editor of Guidelines recently sent a questionnaire to the readers of that journal. When the results of the replies were tabulated, it was found that priesthood member readers of the Guidelines felt a special need for helpful material in the following fields:

Preparing sermons
Conducting worship
Preaching methods
Preaching subjects
Ways of using priesthood most effectively
Pastoral ministry to children
Cottage meetings
Receiving new members after confirmation

2. Some weeks ago the First Presidency called together twenty-five representative church leaders for a Priesthood Education Seminar. When the "findings" of this seminar were summarized at the end of a two-day discussion, the two items found at the top of the list as the greatest needs of local priesthood members were (a) the organization and supervision of our priesthood man power, and (b) a specialized "on-the-job" training for each man in harmony with the particular duties and responsibilities of his office.

3. During the past two and one-half years, the writer has visited with and instructed men of the priesthood in some fifty-five districts and stakes in the United States and Canada. It is his observation that the preceding represents the most pressing needs of priesthood generally. The church has not fully learned how to utilize its man-power resources. Priesthood members are not adequately trained and far too frequently they are not well organized, supervised, or used in the work of the ministry. Consequently they are inactive, unhappy, and failing to grow. Because of this, the light and life of Christ fails to shine through the church, which in turn is without sufficient life and spiritual power to grapple with all of the problems of these critical days.

What the Conference Provides

The program of the conference, already made available to the readers of the Herald, provides twenty-five or more courses of study, some ten laboratory workshops (representing many of the areas of ministry) and practical down-

The Lord's Government

By Carl Self

Ye are the salt of the earth.—Matthew 5: 13, A. V.

They were set to be a light unto the world, and to be the saviors of men; and inasmuch as they are not the saviors of men, they are as salt that has lost its savor.—Doctrine and Covenants 100: 2.

IN THE BEGINNING OF TIME there was a war in heaven, the Scriptures tell us; the "Devil was cast out with his angels" (Revelation 12: 7-9), and "Satan deceived the nations" (Revelation 20: 3). The cause of this war was agency and power (Doctrine and Covenants 28: 10). The Devil and one-third of the angels were cast out of heaven, because of the use of their agency.

Satan rebelled against me and sought to destroy the agency of man, which I, the Lord God, had given him; and also that I should give unto him mine own power; by the power of mine Only Begotten, I caused he should be cast down; and he became Satan.—Genesis 3: 1-4, Inspired Version.

Satan's policy was to assume power and to take away the free agency of man. That has been the great cause of the conflict between God and Satan ever since the beginning of the human race. As the race grew in numbers, the conflict became more acute.

First there were rulers and kings who assumed dictatorial powers. They became oppressors of the common people and suppressed individual rights. Most of the civil wars of history have arisen over the question of power and individual civil rights.

When the tribal nation of Israel was set up under Moses and Joshua it was governed by representatives from each of the twelve tribes who were godly men. This was called the reign of the judges. But the people desired a king, and the Lord, through his prophet Samuel, said:

I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, and of them that oppressed you; And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations; and ye have said unto him, Nay, but set a king over us.—I Samuel 10: 18, 19.

The change in the form of government from a representative government to a kingdom was against the will of God, but since these people decided to have a king the Lord permitted their will to prevail, though they rejected him in doing so. Here is a case of free agency, which is God's policy of government.

FOLLOWING ON DOWN THROUGH HISTORY we find a long and continuous policy of absolute monarchy among the great majority of the nations. Always there was a suppression of the private civil rights and liberty of the common people. It was Satan's governmental policy. A tendency toward public expression of the people gained partial expression once in Greece and in the Roman governments, but it was not until the granting of the Magna Charta in 1215 in England that the people began to have individual civil rights. We search through history for an expression of God's governmental policy which gave free agency to the people and vested in them the power of government; the privilege to find this expression rests only in God's restored gospel revelation in modern times.

Let us analyze God's interest in national affairs. In his revelation to Nebuchadnezzar as interpreted in Daniel, second chapter, God predicted the rise of the great Babylonian dynasty, followed by the Grecian and Roman Empires which were to be terminated in a division of the world power into ten kingdoms. It is significant to note the language of the ancient prophetic interpretation by Daniel:

And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom [government], which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter; and the dream is certain and the interpretation thereof sure.—Daniel 2:44, 45.

We think that the logical interpretation of the term "kingdom" is government. It will be noted that in this dream or the interpretation there is no mention of the spiritual kingdom set up by Christ during his ministry. Answering a direct question, Jesus said to Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence."—John 18:36. In the next verse Jesus makes it clear that his kingdom is spiritual and not a worldly kingdom as referred to in Daniel.

LET US NOW SEARCH the Scriptures to determine if God did set up a kingdom (government) in the days of these kings and see what effect it is having or will have in the days of the ten kingdoms. Bible students have generally agreed that these ten kingdoms are represented in the governments of our modern times. Modern revelation has established important facts clearing up some of the ancient prophetic utterances. The Book of Mormon (I Nephi, chapter 3) describes the Lord's interest in the discovery of America by Columbus, which is continuously described as "a land of promise." It states that the Spirit of God descended upon the Gentiles and multitudes of them came out of captivity to this land of promise; God "was with them in the war of the revolution, and by his power they were delivered out of the hands of all other nations. The promise is made that it would be a choice land, free from bondage, from captivity, and from all other nations under heaven, if the people will but serve the God of the land, who is Jesus Christ (Ether 1: 34, 35).

The Gentiles shall be blessed upon this land and God will fortify it against all other nations. The Lord will be their only king, and a light unto them forever. Gentiles shall be blessed and be numbered among the house of Israel, and the Lord will consecrate the land—a better land than Palestine (II Nephi 7: 18-34). America is the land of Joseph and carries his blessings (I Chronicles 5: 1, Deuteronomy 33: 13-18, Genesis 48: 13-22). Most students of prophecy agree that America is the gathering place of the peoples of Israel, especially the tribes of Joseph, and that Joseph's blessings are upon this land.

Let us go a step further to see if God established a form of government for them. We have been unable to find that he was instrumental in establishing a civil government for any people since the time of ancient Israel. There is some light upon this question in Doctrine and Covenants 95: 2, in which the Lord says:

And now, verily I say unto you, concerning the laws of the land, It is my will that my people should observe to do all things whatsoever I command them, and that law of the land, which is constitutional, supporting that principle of freedom, in maintaining rights and privileges belongs to all mankind and is justifiable before me; therefore, I, the Lord, justifieth you, and your brethren of my church, in befriending that law which is the constitutional law of the land; and as pertaining to the law of man, whatsoever is more or less than these, cometh of evil. I, the Lord God, maketh you free; therefore, ye are free indeed: and the law also maketh you free.

Here we find that the constitution of this government is justifiable before God; he is in favor of it and recommends its observance and maintenance. It is indeed significant that God should speak in such favorable terms of the governmental policies of this nation. But while this may indicate that he is favorable to it, we have yet to find where the "God of Heaven" set up his government. In this connection the Lord, speaking in the first person, says in Doctrine and Covenants 98: 10:

And again I say unto you, Those who have been scattered by their enemies, it is my will that they should continue to importune for redress, and redemption, by the hands of those who are placed as rulers, and are in authority over you, according to the laws and constitution of the people which I have suffered to be established, and should be maintained for the rights and protection of all flesh, according to just and holy principles, that every man may act in doctrine, and principle pertaining to futurity, according to the moral agency which I have given unto them, that every man may be accountable for his own sins in the day of judgment. Therefore, it is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose have I established the constitution of this land by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood.

Here we have God speaking in no uncertain terms, "I established the constitution of this land." Here we find the government that the "God of Heaven" would set up in the days of these kings; the principles are of free agency, and the power of the government in the people is finally established. We call it the government of civil rights and representation, a government of democracy, wherein man is free from bondage, and has his own free, moral, and civil agency. This principle of democracy has spread into nearly all the world, until the entire Western Hemisphere has representative forms of government. As prophesied, there are no kings and most if not all of the kings referred to in Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream have been replaced by a representative form of government. The prophecy is being fulfilled that "it will fill the whole earth."

IN THE WAR IN HEAVEN, God wanted man to have free agency and the right of self-government. That has been the continuous conflict ever since. The issue has changed its form from absolute monarchy to dictators, and the conflict will go on, but God's will shall prevail, and democracy shall be world-wide. But this cannot be accomplished without great sacrifices and the shedding of much blood.

As children of the "light," having the benefits of the revealed will of God in the restored gospel, and the help of God through the Holy Spirit to interpret the mystery of prophecy, we should read the signs in this hastening time. Events are transpiring quickly toward a feverish close of the conflict between God and Satan. Satan is mustering his forces, and God is mustering his. The nations are rushing to their respective camps. Dictatorial power is making its last stand against free agency. We are now speaking of a cold war, but it will only take a spark to burst it into a great conflagration—the forces of God against the forces of Satan; freedom and free agency against dictatorial power and human bondage. The final conflict is about to be tested out between the great powers of the earth.

The question may be asked, Why was the Lord particularly interested in this land of America, especially in the northern hemisphere? He continuously refers to it as a goodly land, a land of promise, a "choice above all other" lands, a land of God-worshipping people. Referring to the Scriptures for light we find:

They [the Gentiles] shall be numbered among the house of Israel (I Nephi 3: 202) . . . that they may be numbered among my people, O house of Israel. (III Nephi 9: 92) . . . and they [Gentiles] shall come in unto the covenant, and be numbered among this the remnant of Jacob, unto whom I have given this land for their inheritance, and they shall assist my people, the remnant of Jacob; and also, as many of the house of Israel as shall come, that they may build a city, which shall be called the New Jerusalem; and . . . be gathered in . . . unto the New Jerusalem. —III Nephi 10: 1.

"This is a land of Promise . . . the Center Place . . . Independence . . . Land of Missouri . . . in this land . . . The place for the City of Zion . . ."—Doctrine and Covenants 57: 1. ". . . and it [Zion] shall not be moved out of her place . . . for the gathering of my saints."—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 4. ". . . it [Zion] shall be called the New Jerusalem."—Doctrine and Covenants 45:12. Funds of the saints are to be used for the "building up of the New Jerusalem."—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 10. ". . . For the gathering of his saints to stand up on Mount Zion, which shall be the city New Jerusalem; which city shall be built, beginning at the Temple Lot, which is appointed by the finger of the Lord, in the western boundaries of the State of Missouri. . . . Verily this is the word of the Lord, that the city New Jerusalem shall be built by the gathering of the saints, beginning at this place, . . ."—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 1, 2.

IN THE TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER of Revelation the Apostle John records his vision. He "saw the Holy City, the New Jerusalem . . . and it had twelve gates and lieth four square, and the length is as large as the breadth and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs." Bible Encyclopedia, Volume II, page 1719, says: "The furlong referred to in the New Testament Scriptures, (Luke 24: 13, John 6: 19, Revelation 14: 20, Revelation 21: 16) is a Greek measure and nearly the same as at present, viz one-eighth of a mile, forty rods, 660 feet. Twelve thousand furlongs, figured on a basis of one-eighth of a mile, would be approximately 1,400 miles, and a territory 1,400 miles square with Independence as the center place, would take in approximately the whole of the Mississippi Valley and the Missouri Valley and the entire basin between the Rocky and Allegheny mountains, approximately seventeen states and parts of states. Roger W. Babson in his article "Own a Farm," advertising Utopia College, Eureka, Kansas, draws a circle around Eureka including parts of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Tennessee, and Mississippi, advising everyone to invest in farm land in this territory and not neglect the great opportunity which God has provided for people to live in this area. It contains a wealth of natural resources, diversified agricultural productions, temperate climate, abundant water, native labor, excellent educational facilities, and the best national health record. It produces, per capita, the largest in value of minerals in the United States, including petroleum, lead, natural gas, zinc, coal, gypsum, helium, stone, asphalt, bentonite, chalk, clay, volcanic ash, building materials, and enough salt to last fifty thousand years. Wheat, corn, oats, sorghum, hay, flax, soy beans, alfalfa, pears, cherries, barley, rye, sugar, peanuts, cotton, wool, meat, vegetables, and fruits are produced in abundance. The annual income runs to more than fifteen billion dollars. Babson believes that in this territory where the people have good health, Christian fortitude, thrifty habits, and an abundance of the necessities of life there is an assurance against communistic uprisings and a third world war.

There comes again the question, where do the Saints, "the salt of the earth," fit into this great picture? Salt is a preservative and "savior." Every Latter Day Saint in his or her community may be the savior of that community. The salvation of the people and even the nation may be dependent upon the righteousness of the Saints in the various communities, states, and even the nation (Genesis 18: 40).

Every Saint should adhere closely to the gospel principles, the church's Zion-ic program, support the American government, and not be deceived by alluring communistic teachings, for there is little doubt that Satan inspired the mind of atheist Karl Marx when he wrote his communistic Utopia so nearly like the Zion-ic program that it would deceive the very elect were it possible. But Marx left God out of his Utopia and substituted the worship of the government and material things. Success for such an order can come only under a dictator who, by compulsion, would regiment the lives of the people, taking away their individual civil and religious rights. This is the way of life the Devil wants; it is what he proposed in the beginning and is what led to the war in Heaven. Every Latter Day Saint should with all his power and energy, and even his life's blood, if necessary, support this God-given constitution as he should never fail to cast his ballot and exercise his right of choice in government that, in the language of the immortal Lincoln, "... this nation under God, shall have a new birth of freedom and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

The "Helping" Hand

By Nora Walters

Let not thine hands be slack.

—Zephaniah 3: 16.

YESTERDAY as I observed the members of another church leaving the door after morning worship I could not help noticing how their pastor stood outside the door, greeting and shaking hands with all as they departed. I wish that we as a church might practice this gracious act a bit more—especially the pastoral handshake.

Often it is easy for members of the priesthood and a few with whom they are closely associated to congregate in little groups and talk. Without their to leave church "alone" in feeling, noticing it, many other members are left. Sometimes a tired worker needs the encouragement a handclasp from the pastor might bring. Church attendance should not become just a commonplace thing; each visit to God's house should be an experience in courage, uplift, and determination to carry on God's work.

These simple things which denote friendship are one means by which church members may "bear one another's burdens."

Because everyone looks to the pastor as the shepherd of the flock it seems fitting that he stand at the door to bid good-by to each of his sheep. Lambs are important too. What a change in attitude toward priesthood authority might result if boys and girls were counted worthy to shake hands with the pastor regularly after Sunday services? "Let not thine hands be slack." Standing a few moments and extending them to God's people may be the means of helping them along the path of service.

David H. Smith wrote in his poem, "Only Hired," these words, "We miss the strength of a helping hand, never prized till the sad loss came." A friendly handshake can convey the message, "It's good to have you here; we need you and you need us."

"Let not thine hands be slack."

Doubting Thomases

By Ora Beardsley Carter

But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering.

BECAUSE THERE ARE TIMES when we become troubled with doubt about doctrines, we may become disaffected and out of agreement with all things of the Church. But it is dangerous for us to separate ourselves from fellowship with our brothers and sisters of the faith.

When our Lord was crucified many had doubts and fears, but they remained for a while together near Jerusalem where Christ had been entombed. While they were together, Christ appeared to them, but Thomas was not among them.

Let us see what Thomas, who had separated himself, missed. For one thing he missed the fellowship of his brethren; they had gathered together talking and were comforting each other. Companionship with others in times of confusion and sorrow gives us strength and courage. We have a common tie, our love for Christ, which draws us together and makes it easier for us to "love our neighbor as ourselves." He also missed seeing his Master and hearing him preach his first resurrection sermon. He missed the commission which Christ gave to his apostles: "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you."—John 20: 21. Thomas missed the assurance that Christ had overcome the world, death, and sin.

WHEN WE REMAIN APART or separate ourselves from the body of the church because of dissension, we lose power to overcome Satan. All Satan asks is that we stay away from the gatherings, permitting doubt, discouragement, and rebellion to enter.

When the apostles were again assembled, Thomas was with them. There was still hope for he did meet with them, but his faith was wavering. Christ knew of this so he called to Thomas and said, "Thomas, reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing."—John 20: 27.

Then Thomas said, "My Lord and my God."

We must have faith. We are not privileged as was Thomas and the others to see the risen Christ, yet we believe and have the assurance from Christ, when he spoke to Thomas, "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; but more blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."—John 20: 29.

Whatever occurs, we must have faith in God, hope for the future, and loving kindness and forgiveness for the erring.

The Voice of the Lord in the Wilderness

By Apostle D. O. Chesworth

Eastern Central States Mission

OUT OF THE WILDERNESS of Western New York State has come the record of one of the most momentous events in world history, the restoration of the holy priesthood to the earth centuries after it had been withdrawn because of abuse and neglect.

From a revelation to the church in 1832 explaining the parable of the wheat and the tares we learn that the church was driven into the wilderness. There are several instances recorded wherein the church sought refuge in the wilderness when those who were to direct its activity and growth were denied such expression. We also know that in this generation the church was to come forth out of the wilderness, clear as the moon, fair as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners.

A statement of the boy prophet, Joseph Smith, places the location of the wilderness (in those days an uninhabited or wooded area) where the voice of the Lord was heard, between Harmony, Pennsylvania, and Colesville, New York. This is a distance of thirty miles. The road between these two points today follows the Susquehanna River the entire distance.

Listen to that thrilling statement from Joseph Smith:

And again, what do we hear? Glad tidings from Cumorah! Moroni, an angel from heaven, declaring the fulfillment of the prophets—the book to be revealed. A voice of the Lord in the wilderness of Fayette . . . declaring the three witnesses to bear record of the book. The voice of Michael on the banks of the Susquehanna, detecting the Devil when he appeared as an angel of light. The voice of Peter, James and John, in the wilderness . . . declaring themselves as possessing the keys of the kingdom, and of the dispensation of the fullness of times.—Doctrine and Covenants 110: 20.

This was an experience never to be forgotten. Sensing his indebtedness to heaven for such a rich blessing Joseph advised:

Brethren, shall we not go on in so great a cause? Go forward and not backward. Courage, brethren; and on, on to the victory! Let your hearts rejoice and be exceeding glad. Let the earth break forth into singing. Let the dead speak forth anthems of eternal praise to the King Immanuel, who hath ordained before the world was that which would enable us to redeem them out of their prisons; for the prisoners shall go free.—Doctrine and Covenants 110: 22.

His inspiration and ecstasy caused him to further write:

Let the mountains shout for joy and all ye valleys cry aloud; and all ye seas and dry lands tell the wonders of your eternal King. And ye rivers and brooks and rills, flow down with gladness. Let the woods and all the trees of the field praise the Lord; and ye solid rocks weep for joy. And let the sun, moon, and the morning stars sing together and let all the sons of God shout for joy, and let the eternal creations declare his name for ever and ever.—Doctrine and Covenants 110: 23.

IN THE SECOND DECADE of the nineteenth century the great day of the Lord was at hand. His voice had been heard in America; men were called through revelation from heaven as was Aaron; his church was restored again for the last time. Through the Church of Jesus Christ in this latter-day dispensation has come the voice of the Lord, as recorded in the Doctrine and Covenants, speaking from the wilderness to the world in the following language:

1. The voice of warning shall be unto all people by the mouths of my disciples, whom I have chosen in these last days, and they shall go forth and none shall stay them, for I the Lord have commanded them.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 1.

2. The Lord shall come to recompense unto every man according to his work, and measure to every man according to the measure which he has measured to his fellow-man.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 2.

3. Prepare ye, prepare ye for that which is to come, for the Lord is nigh; and the anger of the Lord is kindled, and his sword is bathed in heaven and it shall fall upon the inhabitants of the earth.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 3.

4. The day cometh that they who will not hear the voice of the Lord, neither the voice of his servants, neither give heed to the words of the prophets and apostles, shall be cut off from among the people; for they have strayed from mine ordinances, and have broken mine everlasting covenants; they seek not the Lord to establish his righteousness, but every man walketh in his own way.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 3.

5. I, the Lord, knowing the calamity which should come upon the inhabitants of the earth, called upon my servant Joseph Smith, jr., and spake unto him from heaven, and gave him commandments, . . . that they should proclaim these things unto the world; . . . that faith also might increase in the earth, that mine everlasting covenant might be established; that the fullness of my gospel might be proclaimed . . . unto the ends of the world and before kings—and rulers.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 4.

6. He that repents and does the commandments of the Lord shall be forgiven; and he that repents not, from him shall be taken even the light which he has received, for my Spirit shall not always strive with man, saith the Lord of Hosts.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 5.

7. . . . the hour is not yet, (November 1, 1831) but is nigh at hand when peace shall be taken from the earth and the Devil shall have power over his own dominion; and also the Lord shall have power over his saints, and shall reign in their midst, and shall come down in judgment upon . . . the world.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 6.

THE VOICE OF THE LORD was heard in Jerusalem and again in ancient America, but now in this latter-day dispensation we profit by the instruction given in the eleventh hour as his voice was heard from the wilderness of the United States. The book of Doctrine and Covenants records these many instructions to the church today and should be zealously studied if we are to gain the utmost knowledge and profit by divine counsel in our modern attempt to build up the kingdom of God.

I bear testimony today that the "voice of the Lord" which Joseph Smith, Jr., heard in the wilderness of Fayette was shared for our benefit. Time and time again during the past twenty-three years I have read the testimony of Joseph and Oliver concerning the authority bestowed upon them by John the Baptist to serve in the holy priesthood. The spirit of God which has consistently attended this reading has confirmed me as a special witness to the fact that these men were authorized by heavenly action.

"The assurance that we were in the presence of an angel; the certainty that we heard the voice of Jesus, and the truth unsullied as it flowed from a pure personage, dictated by the will of God, is to me past description, and I shall ever look upon this expression of the Savior's goodness with wonder and thanksgiving while I am permitted to tarry . . ." stated Oliver Cowdery (Church History, Volume I, page 39).

Evidences of a growing appreciation of this trust which has come to us suggest a greater zeal for the church in this decade. Responding to the last revelation to the church through President Israel A. Smith, I have enjoyed the fellowship of the men of the ministry as we have met for study in preparation for the greater endowment of spiritual power which awaits our ability to receive it. We, too, have heard a voice! It is the voice of heaven. Speaking out of hearts of gratefulness we shall be endlessly indebted to the Lord who permitted his voice to speak in the wilderness of Fayette, New York, and who today speaks according to our need as a church.

Brethren, shall we not go on in so great a cause? May we be restless until we apply our energies in missionary endeavor to "each one win one" for our Lord.

United States of the World

EDITOR'S NOTE: The policy of the Herald has been against intensive discussion of political or world problems since such issues are rather amply cared for by the secular press and radio. However, the editors have been intrigued by the boldness and scope of the views set forth in the following article by Bernard Dewavrin, a Frenchman. He has given much already in helping to arbitrate world struggles on the fields of battle and is now spearheading the spread of a great idea which might become a peace offensive. Therefore it should be of interest to Herald readers.

Doubtless many will wonder what chance there is that the Congress of the United States will accept France, Finland, and the Fiji Islands into statehood when it is so hesitant about acting on the petitions of Hawaii and Alaska to whom we already have some political ties. It has been observed that the economic issues involved in expanding our borders affect seriously our national idealism. It has long been the policy of our Commerce and State Departments to encourage our industrialists to find world markets for our goods. However, this creates an obligation upon our government to see that the rights of our citizens to do business in these countries are respected. When our warships follow our dollars to protect such interests, a great cry against a capitalistic war is raised. Doubtless this same issue must be resolved and all our obligations faced on a broad front before a plan similar to Mr. Dewavrin's can make much headway.

A Bold, Constructive Plan

In order to save the world before war destroys it, or Asiatic-Russian imperialism puts it into bondage, France, with its open mind and generous heart, feels it is its duty to take a bold step.

The time has now come to give a wider hearing to the following problems. I have discussed these questions very often since 1947 with men and women in every walk of life, holding different opinions, without meeting with serious objections.

France, Starting Point of the United States of the World

Would you be shaken in your patriotism if, tomorrow, France offered to become the forty-ninth State of the United States of America? These States would immediately take up the title of "United States of the World" and become gradually open to all countries willing to join them.

Would you agree to become an integral part of the economic system of the United States of the World, with the dollar as the only currency?

Would you agree to choose English as the world's language, each one naturally keeping his mother tongue?

Would you agree to be a member of the United States of the World, on an equal footing with Texas, larger than France, or Rhode Island, smaller than one of our French "départements"?

Would you agree to travel and live freely in the 49 States, whose citizens would be equally free to travel and live among us?

Would you agree to the defense of our frontiers, that is to say the frontiers of the United States of the World, by an army raised in the 49 States?

Would you agree to the political development of the countries belonging to the Union Française, this placed under the supervision of France, in an effort to enable them gradually to join the United States of the World?

Do you not believe that the example set by France would soon be followed by the free-minded nations, and that the new United States of the World would exercise an irresistible attraction upon the oppressed countries?

Do you not think that the United States of the World would grow to be so powerful that attacking it would be out of the question? And that, in any event, it is better to have two huge blocs facing each other than an imperialistic bloc tempted by the weakness of its scattered neighbors?

The United States of America, a Strong Foundation for Building Up the United States of the World

Do you not believe that the United States of America is in a better position than any other country to become the nucleus around which the other peoples of the world would crystallize?

Yes, and here is why:

1. Their political system, consisting of a federation of sovereign states, having a central government based upon a constitution ratified by these states, makes it easy for other new states to join their federation. Each state is self-governing, retains its own character, its traditions, its aims, its way of life, as long as it is in accord with the Constitution.

2. The four more important racial groups have taken active part and are still taking part in the growth of the United States of America. Most United States citizens have ties or relatives outside the States.

There exists practically no civilized human being who is not related to or befriended by an American citizen, or else, who could not find in the United States American citizens speaking his native tongue.

3. The American character is made up of idealism and realism, of youth and experience, qualities essential to the development of the world. Their ideals of freedom, their spirit of tolerance are so many guarantees for the future of a world federation.

4. The United States is the only nation in a position to finance the expenditures deriving from the temporary steps to be taken so that the new citizens of the United States of the World would not have to suffer during the adjustment period.

5. For the past five years the countries that have been more or less ruined by war have been financed, fed, rebuilt, given new military equipment, and even supported in their foreign policy by the United States.

The States are now deeply involved in the defense of our civilization. The gratitude that we owe them and our own self-interest oblige us to join them openly, to help them advance their task, until universal peace can be established, through the United States of the World.

The Mirage of European Union

1. There remain between European countries too many old feuds, too many old hatreds, too many bad memories, too much distrust to imagine that France, England, Germany, etc., could be united, even if reason dictated the union. On the European level, nothing would be changed, while on the world level, all these countries being equal before a single government constitution, the rivalries would be transformed into a normal competition between human beings.

2. Squeezed between the two giants of the East and the West, the United States of Europe would run the risk of inciting rivalry and becoming the prize of their struggles. They would risk serving merely as a buffer standing between the hammer and the anvil. In spite of the wishes of the United States, nothing can guarantee the future European union from suffering one day, on a larger scale, the same fate as Poland.

3. The colonial policies of European countries are too dissimilar.

4. Europe is too ancient a continent, sometimes too stiffened by age, and above all, too densely populated, to be able to regain in the European Union the political and economic balance that she has lost. We must open up new horizons and more hopeful futures to the best young men of our old civilization.

Conclusion

In spite of important social and scientific progress, the balance sheet of the first half of this century shows a tremendous loss of human happiness.

During the past fifty years, states have sprung up and vanished, tyrannies have come one after the other, despite the opposition of the people. The men of 1950 are not as free and happy as those of 1900. Compulsion, hatred, and difficulties of living are still far too prevalent everywhere. An anxious world is searching for a better way of life. Shall it be done in vain, amidst tears and bloodshed? Or shall we see the return of happiness to human hearts through joining an entirely different political order?

If the United States agrees to serve as the foundation of the United States of the World, if France agrees to become the first bloc—the cornerstone of the United States of the World—if we make up our minds bravely, the United States of the World will be created, and through it human anxiety will vanish from the earth.

The United States of the World, conscious of their power, shall be able to wait patiently until the political system of other countries, whose ideologies take no account of the longings of the human heart, crumbles into ruin.

During this second half century, the United States of the World shall have as its aims:

1. To arrange the admission of other States to their Federation, should they express the wish to do so, while refusing to exert the slightest pressure toward influencing their decision.

2. To achieve a standard of living not to be compared to that of countries where man is subservient to the economy of the state.

3. To demonstrate that men, freely, by keeping their independence of spirit and by restoring fundamental moral values, are able to create a sufficient measure of human justice to dispense equitably, among all, material well-being and the right to happiness.

From the Presiding Patriarch

TO THE ORDER OF EVANGELISTS, GREETING:

Following the General Conference of 1950 I mailed to each of you a rather detailed report covering the meetings of the Order during the Conference, together with a digest of the various lectures. Subsequently I mailed you a list of all members of the order, together with the dates of birth and ordination and mailing address.

Since that time there have been twelve more ordinations of men whose names were not on that list. The latest of these ordinations being Evangelist J. Charles May, veteran missionary, who has been ordained to the office of Evangelist and Patriarch, and who was sent almost immediately to the Society Islands where he occupied in years gone by. This, I believe, will be the first patriarch to live and labor among that people. He will be received with great joy.

You will note with especial interest the names of men overseas. Four in Europe: Franz Beil, A. J. Mosterdijk, Arthur Munslow, and Edward Thum; and one in Australia, Walter Swain.

Certain developments in the church give grounds for courage and thanksgiving. There has been a marked increase of interest in missionary endeavor. Our missionary force has been increased and our missionary program systematized—in particular to utilize organized branches as bases of operation. More attention is given to improving our pastoral ministry. And there has been a fine degree of peace and unity among the membership and the priesthood. The increased influence and augmented numbers of patriarchs are gratifying to us. We now number sixty-nine.

Some events have tended to promote these improved conditions. For example, the character of the General Conference of 1950. Members and delegates went forth from that peaceful Conference carrying good news to many fields far and near. Then the spiritual character of the reunions of last summer had a reviving influence with many people. The Conference of High Priests in Kirtland Temple gave an endowment to numbers of the General Church officers and administrative officers in pastoral work, enriching their ministry to the people. It was a historical event in our own order, as there were twenty-five or more of our members in attendance, and one meeting of the order was held in the upper court of the Temple.

The church program challenges us as evangelists to help to the extent of our ability and opportunity in missionary work. It challenges us as patriarchs to give a fine, fatherly ministry to the church members—to comfort, counsel, and bless them.

You need not to be reminded that the world is in confusion, bordering at times on chaos. Fear and confusion torment many people. Many, having no worthwhile convictions to steady them, have thrown to the winds old standards in morals, business ethics, and patriotic allegiances to their country. With too many, old-fashioned honesty, decency, and honor are all but forgotten—in business, in family life, and in politics.

Our own people need to strengthen their basic convictions so that they may face the situation with faith, courage, and fortitude. It may be our most pressing responsibility to so preach, teach, testify, and live that we may strengthen their faith in God as Creator and Father; in Christ as the Son of God and our Savior; and in the gospel as the power of God unto salvation, and the plan of life to which they should conform. We ourselves need to be reminded often of the Master's admonition, "Let not your heart be troubled: you believe in God, believe also in me."

May divine light, peace, and blessing be with you in your ministry.

to-earth training for those who attend. These classes and workshops are to be conducted by a score or more of representative church men, including members of three presiding quorums of the church. In addition to the courses and workshops, the program provides the following special features:

- Daily worship
- Daily inspirational message
- Daily recreation
- Four panel discussions
- Two fellowship services (prayer and testimony)
- One social
- Two special services

These will be open to all who attend the conference.

Nothing quite like it has ever before been provided for the standing ministry of the church. Surely the command "seek to bring forth and establish my Zion" applies to the men of the ministry today.

On Graceland's Campus

Graceland belongs to the church. It represents an investment of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Its only justifiable purpose is service to the members and priesthood. The church cannot afford to let it stand idle several months of the year. This Priesthood Conference represents one of the things that can be done about it. Graceland invites you. Her facilities are adequate, her campus is one of the most beautiful to be found anywhere.

Register on or Before May 28

Those planning to attend should register on or before May 28, enclosing a check or money order for $2.50 to cover registration and tuition and indicate first and second choices of courses of study desired. Address registration to office of Business Manager, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa. Address inquiries concerning conference to Director of Priesthood Education, Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

You can't afford to come? The church asks, "Can you afford not to?"

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. The answers are the opinions and interpretations of the panel member signing them, and do not commit the Herald nor the church.

Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only questions with contributor's full name and address will receive attention.—EDITOR.

Question:

Is faith more important than works?
Missouri M. Q.

Answer:

The fact that faith must come before good works have their full meaning does not imply that one is more important than the other.

A dynamo will produce electricity. Coupled with the dynamo may be a complete system of circuits to take the electrical energy to every part of a city. But, if there is no electrical appliance at the end, no motors to turn wheels, no lights to burn, or any of the other useful devices to use that energy, the dynamo and the system of circuits are to no avail and might just as well never have been set up. The power is there but not used.

So it is with faith and works. They go hand in hand. The power of God is there and through the system of faith it may be put to work. Works are the fruit of faith.

Question:

My minister says that we are all on our way to the same place, though it may be by a different route. Can't I be saved by being the best that my church teaches?
Texas E. B.

Answer:

This world would be a better place to live in if all would live up to the best that our churches teach. I wonder, though, just what salvation means to you?

We are saved from something and for something. Salvation from past sins comes through divine forgiveness. There are many who stop here and do not recognize that there is something to be saved for—something definite! Let us see how "from" and "for" interrelate.

Jesus spoke to his disciples about their care in the world for the worldly things, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you." —Luke 12: 31, A. V. The kingdom of God was the primary purpose for which Christ came into the world. "To save men," yes. But this salvation was, and still is, through the establishment of the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

This being the method and Christ having said that he is the door and anyone entering in by any other way is a thief, the only criteria for us to judge whether that which is being taught by your church is the "way unto salvation" is to depend upon the things Christ taught.

There is only one way to the kingdom. Christ always insisted that it is through obedience to his commandments. Any church that does away with any part of his teachings as being "unnecessary" or "meaningless" is not teaching Christ's way. Any church that changes his ordinances or alters their meaning has apostatized from his teachings.

Do not take what any man says to be truth until, in the light of the fullness of the gospel of Jesus Christ, you have settled such questions as: By whose authority? By what manner of organization? What are all the teachings (doctrine) of Jesus Christ? What should I know about faith, repentance, baptism, laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, eternal judgment, the kingdom of God, stewardship, etc.?

The church of Jesus Christ established at his direct command (Galatians 1: 12) will teach all that he taught. It will have all the ordinances administered as Christ ordained them to be—without change.

On our way to the same place? If we are, we will be entering by the same gate—Jesus Christ—with all he taught.

Question:

What is the book mentioned in II Nephi 11: 125-145 that is not to come forth in the day of wickedness and abomination of the people?
Minnesota E. E. F.

Answer:

This book is the same as mentioned in Isaiah 29, and is the book that was revealed by the angel Moroni to Joseph Smith in 1823, and delivered into his hand in 1827 for the translation of the unsealed part. That portion which was translated and published in 1830 is called The Book of Mormon. Mormon who lived in the fourth century A.D. was the original compiler of that part of the work, except some additional matter supplied by his son Moroni.

This book was engraved upon plates of gold bound together by rings somewhat after the manner of a loose-leaf book, but a considerable portion of the plates were bound on both edges so that they could not be opened or read without breaking the seals. Joseph Smith, to whom was given the Urim and Thummim by which to translate the unknown language, was commanded of God to translate only the unsealed part and leave the sealed part untouched.

Because of the sealed part, which the Lord said in ancient time should not be delivered in the day of wickedness, the book was not to be delivered permanently into the hands of men, but after the open part was translated it was to be returned to the angel for safekeeping until the Lord's appointed time when the whole should be revealed. Joseph relates that it was so returned.

The sealed part of this book contains a great revelation given by the Lord to the Brother of Jared, the leader of a colony which came to America from Babel after the confusion of tongues, and by divine command was sealed up at the time because of the unworthiness of the people. The Jaredite nation kept the record for about 2,000 years when it came into possession of the succeeding Nephite nation, and during the righteous period after Christ's appearance was published among them. When the Nephite nation fell, Moroni was directed to incorporate it with the Book of Mormon, and to seal it up again to be preserved until the latter days. The revelation covered a historical and prophetic account of world events from the beginning to the end, and in the day when Israel is restored and righteousness again prevails, it will be republished to serve the Lord's purpose of that day.

Part II -- His Baptism and His Mission

BAPTISM AND PEACE—PROMISES FULFILLED

Restlessness, sorrow, and disappointment finally took possession of my mind, as I concluded that it was too hard a task for me to be a Christian, and I wished that I might sleep like others and not be bothered any more over the subject. I got up tired, unhappy, and lonely; helped do the chores; sat down to the table without an appetite; was sick at heart and stomach, and could not eat; arose from the table, and took a walk. I did not think where I should go, but went up to Mr. Barrett's. As I opened the gate, Elder Powell, who stood by the house putting on his overcoat, or linen duster, in readiness to start on his journey, said, "Good morning."

Involuntarily I replied, "I want you to baptize me."

Soon as I had made this request all the fear, distress of mind, and discontent left me. I felt glad and had perfect peace in my mind; all the burden that had depressed me so long left and I felt free and happy. From that glad hour I commenced life anew.

Elder David Powell in answer said, "Well, we were about to start on our mission, but as I came here on purpose to baptize you, we will stop and attend to it, and not go until tomorrow." As we walked down to the river he said, "I was in Galena, desiring to go down the river, but the boat shoved off just as I got to the wharf and we had to stay over night in the city. That night, in a dream, I saw you and the place where I baptized you, so I have come all this distance [one hundred miles] to baptize you." As we came to the river he said, "This is not the place," and following up the stream, as he led the way, we came to an open, clear place, free from brush or grass, and he exclaimed, "Here is the place."

I was baptized, feeling the solemn obligation I had taken upon me to follow my Master all the days of my life. Elder John Harrington, Mr. Barrett, and my brother Edwin accompanied us. As we went home a calmness reigned in my heart. I was confirmed by Elders David Powell and John Harrington, after which Elder Powell said, "Brother Edmund, it is manifest to me that it is your calling to be an elder in the church, and if you will allow me, I will now ordain you an elder."

I answered, "I can't preach."

Brother Barrett then arose and prophesied to me: "Thus saith the Lord, It is my will you should be ordained an elder in my church, and it is your calling to preach my gospel in this land, and you shall also cross the briny deep and in foreign lands declare my gospel in power, for your calling is to the world and not at home, for the world is your home. Amen."

Elder Powell then pressed his question, "Will you allow us to ordain you?"

I replied, "I desire to do right, but I cannot preach now."

He said, "The Lord will prepare you for that." And he and Elder J. Harrington ordained me on the day I was baptized. Thus was fulfilled the promise made to me when my life was despaired of. When I was ordained in 1860 to the high council, another part of the revelation was fulfilled, and I declare in words of truth and soberness that no human being knew of these promises to me, for I had not mentioned them to a single soul on earth.—SH 48:83. January 30, 1901.

A MISSION TO "YOUNG JOSEPH" SMITH

Our meetings continued to be more interesting, and all the Saints were faithfully attending the services. One Sunday afternoon Elder Reuben Newkirk, while prophesying, came and laid his hands on my head and said, "Verily thus saith the Holy Ghost, I ordain you to take a mission to my people, scattered latter-day Israel, and to my servant Joseph, son of the martyr. Tell him what you know and most assuredly believe, and say to my Saints, 'Establish your family altars,' and preach my gospel with a warning voice. Fear not, for I will be with you by the voice of my Spirit, and I will protect you from evil, and you shall not be confounded."

While this manifestation was being given, the Spirit rested on me in a great degree, attesting to me its divinity and the sure word of God calling me to a mission to the Latter Day Saints. . . .

The next Wednesday evening while in the meeting I was in prayer, and the spirit of prophecy rested on me and said, "My servants shall not return until my servant Joseph comes forth to preside over my people."

After I returned home from meeting, I retired to my room and read a chapter in the Bible; and when I came to the last verse of the chapter I continued to read, "Thou shalt start on thy mission Wednesday, three weeks from today, and on your journey call on my servants Alva Smith, Edwin Cadwell, Jotham Battett, and W. W. Blair."

Here I will mention a remarkable conversation I had on the cars with a stranger who sat in the seat back of me. Brother Gurley sat across the aisle from me at the time. The stranger, with whom I had had no conversation, and without any seeming intrusion, or at least I did not even think of the singularity of his conversation at the time, said: "When you meet Brother W. W. Blair he will express joy and gladness in a marked degree, so much so that you will notice it very particularly, and when you get into conversation with him he will oppose you very much, but do not have any fear. Brother Gurley will contend and discuss with him, but you will not. Brother Blair's mind will be lit up and his tongue loosed, while Brother Gurley's mind will be darkened, and he will be confounded. But have no fear. It is wisdom in me. You will have no contention or debate with him, and you may ask a sign that when you are there at Brother Blair's it may be given you."

I replied, "I can't think of anything to ask."

"Then," said he, "I will give you one while you are there, and ever after, whatever may be your condition of mind, or however much you may be cast down in mind, if you can recall the sign or bring it to your mind, it will revive your feelings and give you assurance until you will feel bright in your mind and have perfect confidence and faith again."

I was becoming very much interested in his conversation by this time, and wondered who he was, but at this instant my mind was all absorbed over the knowledge this stranger had of my mission, and he was gone without my observing when he left. . . . I was satisfied he was a messenger sent from God to prepare me more fully for my mission, and that it would not be wise for me to tell Brother Gurley of it.—S. H., 48:123. February 13, 1901.

James A. Baker

By Marcella Schenck

JAMES A. BAKER was known in our home as the fireside missionary. He was revered right along with R. M. Elvin. Both for a very special reason.

We were taught to revere Brother Elvin from our cradlehood up, and yet I never saw the man until a quarter of a century had slipped behind me. Whenever his name appeared in the church publications or was spoken in conversation, mother stood up a little straighter and said proudly, "Brother Elvin baptized me."

To us older children, it seemed to be something special to have been the one who baptized mother. So it came to be with Brother Baker, who baptized father.

Brother Baker was a tall, thin man. His back was straight. He had the military bearing of a soldier who had fought in the Civil War. Father said, "The man has no meat on his bones, but he carries with him plenty of the meat of the gospel." And father should have known.

Brother Baker did not enter the missionary field until he was past middle age. He had a bad heart and was hesitant at first about accepting a missionary appointment, but a spiritual promise was given that God would lengthen his years to enable him to accomplish "the work that was his from the beginning." Thank God for those added years! It was in them that he met my father.

THE NEWS that father had finally decided to take the step was one of the high lights of my church experience—a matter close to the hearts and prayers of the whole family. He had attended church, although rather irregularly. A series of missionary services found him listening every night. He enjoyed attending district conferences, two-day meetings, and reunions. Father desired his family to be found in their places. We must have clothes to attend even if he made the sacrifices. He could take care of a baby if anyone needed to remain at home.

Still he always put baptism off with, "Maybe I will join if Brother T. W. Williams returns." "I'm not quite ready yet." "I want to hear Heman Smith again."

I hurried home from the baptismal ceremony and was full of questions.

"What did Brother Baker say to convert you?" I asked.

"Brother Baker didn't convert me," said father. "Your mother and grandmother did that years ago. He made me see the necessity of taking the baptismal step."

"How?" I asked, knowing that for twenty-three years missionaries had labored, off and on, to get this "in-law" to join the church.

"Brother Baker sat down over there on the other side of the table," said father, "and got right to the heart of things. 'Dode,' said he, 'you believe every bit of the gospel. I don't want any put-off excuses. Give me the real truth about why you don't join the church.'"

"And what was the real truth?" I asked.

"The name of Latter Day Saint was very important to me, and I hate hypocrites. I couldn't seem to see myself claiming to be perfect when I wasn't. Perfection was what the words meant to me. You were the first of my children to be baptized. I went off in the woods that day and cried because I wasn't good enough to go down into the water with you. I have been waiting all these years to get good enough."

"And now?" I asked.

"I know I am never going to be perfect," continued father. "But Brother Baker made me see clearly something I never saw before. He is a man of keen insight. He didn't try to convert me when I was already converted. He talked to me as one individual to another. I think that man even loves me."

"He explained something to you," I said.

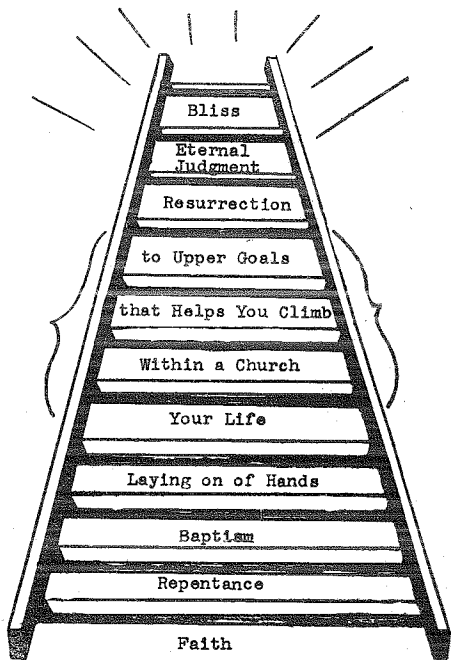

"Yes," answered father. "He said God didn't expect perfection all at once. That is a matter of growth. The church is like a garden wherein we grow. Each person is like a seed—of no good unless planted by baptism in that garden. He said I needn't worry about all of life at once. I had only to live one day at a time, obtaining strength in prayer and from God's Word; one week at a time, finding new strength at services and with the Saints; one month at a time, then renewing my covenant. I think more than anything else he made me see the importance of the Communion services. To me they will be like a new baptism, a repenting and beginning again."

"I am so glad," I said. "I have prayed for this a long time."

"You know the gospel ladder we have seen pictured so much," continued father. "Here it is:

"But I had a life between 'the laying on of hands' and 'resurrection.' To me it wasn't such a short jump from one to the other, and that was what worried me. When Brother Baker got through with the gospel ladder it looked more like this:

"Within the church I expect to find added strength to overcome my faults that I may be carried through eternal judgment to bliss. In that Eternity I hope to meet my little son, James, if I am worthy. I shall have to lean heavily upon God and the church."

IT WAS A BEAUTIFUL DAY in every sense of the word when Brother Baker, tall and slender, walked with my short, sturdy father down into the slow-flowing stream. They came up out of the

God's Word Is Law in Minnesota

Editor's Note: The following article first appeared in "Magazine Digest." Later it was distributed as a folder by the Institute of Crime Prevention. Because of the direction given to the church (Doctrine and Covenants 95:2) "When the wicked rule the people mourn; wherefore honest men and wise men should be sought for, diligently, and good men and wise men, ye should observe to uphold . . ." "Herald" readers should find this article very stimulating.

WOULD YOU WANT your state governor to keep all his election promises to the very letter? Here is what happened when one governor did.

Luther Youngdahl is a God-fearing athlete who would rather play ball with kids on a back lot than with political lobbyists in the back room of a saloon. Also, he prefers to teach Sunday school than to talk political horse-trades with business tycoons in a country club locker-room.

All of which caused Mr. Youngdahl to consider himself a fairly average human being—until a group of friends, including Harold E. Stassen, persuaded him to run for the governorship of Minnesota. Then he discovered, with some astonishment but with little dismay, that he was one of the most unusual politicians in the United States.

His campaign was simple. "Do you want a good government, a new deal for youth, and honest law enforcement?" he asked the voters. They answered by electing him.

TO YOUNGDAHL, the victory meant $1,000 a year less salary than the state supreme court judgeship he resigned—plus three times as much work.

As Judge Youngdahl, he had had time to hold morning prayers with his wife, two sons, and a daughter; as governor, he was frequently at his office at 5:30 A.M., to dictate 100 letters before the day's business started.

Within a few weeks he found himself in the midst of the hottest political controversy ever to erupt in Minnesota—simply because he carried out his election promises. But by the end of the first session of the legislature the Christian Herald was able to point out that "observers agree that not since 1939 . . . has a legislature accomplished as much as did the one in 1947 under Youngdahl's leadership."

The trouble started when the new governor tried to get rid of Minnesota's 8,500 slot machines, which took in $8,000,000 a year, but were illegal under state law, and to crack down on 1,000 beer-license taverns which also sold hard liquor.

He urged two laws on the legislature; one to give liquor control agents the power to arrest violators, the other to provide for cancellation of licenses of businesses which permitted slot machines on their premises.

At the same time the governor presented his major constructive program, his "new deal for youth"—calling for improvements in education, child health services, increased grants for dependent children, and a state-wide plan for youth conservation.

Surprisingly, the first bill, dealing with liquor enforcement, was defeated by a narrow margin. The governor's opponents, heartened by this reverse, were picking holes in his youth program, branding it as too expensive or "too liberal." They attacked the slot-machine bill, next due for consideration, as "ridiculous" and "unnecessary."

GOVERNOR YOUNGDAHL realized that he would have to make an issue of this bill, or risk having all his measures defeated or modified out of usefulness. He appealed to the people twice a week on two state-wide radio hookups. Letters poured in to the governor's office—and to state senators and representatives—from parents, teachers, ministers, and businessmen, pledging support.

The Minneapolis Star conducted a state-wide poll. More than 70 per cent of those questioned approved the bill. Opposition collapsed, and the bill passed by an overwhelming majority.

But resistance to the new law did not end immediately. County sheriffs and prosecuting attorneys, called to the capitol to confer with the governor on law enforcement, were partly hostile. Some thought Youngdahl was committing political suicide and were unwilling to throw in their lot with him.

Craftily, one sheriff asked: "What about church bingos, county fair lotteries, Legion and 4-H club raffles—do you want those stopped too?"

The implication was that it was politically dangerous to antagonize such organizations. The governor answered grimly: "A gambling device is a gambling device, whether it applies to one organization or another. I don't know how I can be more specific than to say to you that I want everything stopped that is a violation of the law, no matter who sponsors it."

The county officials went home convinced that the governor meant business. Soon wags were scrawling "Luther was here" on the blank spaces where slot machines had stood in taverns, restaurants, stores—and even in state liquor stores and post offices.

Still, the opposition did not die down immediately. Youngdahl's enemies predicted that country fairs would be dismal failures without midway games of chance. But when the fairs were over, the governor had a sheaf of clippings from local papers proving otherwise.

Said the Windom Citizen: "The same reports come from all fairs—it is suddenly discovered that the gambling stands served only to detract from all the other entertainment and instructive features. There has been a lot of crying, but suddenly it is discovered that nobody was hurt. Minnesota stands as the unique example of a State with a governor who actually thinks laws are made to be obeyed."

"It was amusing to note," observed the Buffalo Lake News, "that both the State and county fairs were operated more successfully than ever before . . . without gambling wheels."

NEVERTHELESS the opponents of the "Sunday school governor" would not accept defeat gracefully. One tavernkeeper spoke for his colleagues when he said: "I supported Youngdahl when he spoke of helping the young people—but what has a youth program to do with ruining my business by taking away my slot machines and cracking down on liquor sales?"

In Governor Youngdahl's opinion, there was a close connection between law enforcement and youth conservation. One aspect was illustrated by an item in the Virginia Range Facts: "Where's the money going that went into gambling and slot machines before Governor Youngdahl took office? An inside source tells us that it is going into legitimate channels, where it should have gone before."

In other words, home life was being better maintained, at the expense of the gambling joints.

ANOTHER ASPECT was given by the governor in a radio talk: "One of the most effective ways to conserve youth lies in developing in them a wholesome respect for the laws of society. If an adult . . . flagrantly violates them, we can expect no better from the boy or girl."

Therefore, law enforcement set the stage for Governor Youngdahl's program of "government for youth." In rapid success now, the legislature passed these "youth measures":

Provision of public health nursing in each county.

Increased grants—$85 instead of $67 a month—for a dependent mother with three children.

A youth conservation program which aids both juvenile delinquents and "normal children," the former by setting up boards which pass on each case of delinquency individually, and recommended remedial measures without regard to the nature of the crime; the latter by providing healthful recreation and hobby opportunities for all the children in the state.

Increased appropriations for schools in 1947 and 1948 of 84 million—compared with 48 million—dollars for the previous two years. Even the state's new housing program, aimed at encouraging low cost building to replace slums, is partly a youth rehabilitation measure. For Governor Youngdahl, who is fond of quoting obscure proverbs, believes with the Chinese that "if there is harmony in the home, there is order in the nation." And harmony, he maintains, is impossible unless the home is worth living in.

THE GOVERNOR SHOULD KNOW. His own early home life, if not affluent, was extremely harmonious. He was one of six sons of John Youngdahl, who migrated from Sweden and ran a grocery store in Minneapolis for more than forty years.

As a boy, Luther delivered groceries for his father and operated a newstand to help pay his way through school. At Gustavus Adolphus College and at the University of Minnesota he played football and other games which have left him with a fine, lean physique.

His broad shoulders, handsome face, wavy gray hair, and six-foot-two height, led one observer to comment: "He would make a fine model for one of those 'man of distinction' ads—except that he doesn't smoke or drink."

Youngdahl served twelve years as municipal and district judge before 1942, when he led the poll for a supreme court judgeship. Always interested in youth, he had been a leader in the Big Brothers, Boy Scouts, and YMCA.

His campaign to make Minnesota law-abiding undoubtedly has lost him votes. After his no-gambling law had been in effect for several months, a poll reduced his support from 70 per cent to 52 per cent. But at year's end he was named "Minnesotan of 1947" in a Minneapolis Tribune state-wide poll.

THE "SUNDAY SCHOOL GOVERNOR" will undoubtedly run for office again. As to his chance of victory, the governor shrugs his shoulders.

"I'm like the lifeboat captain who put out on a perilous rescue," he says.

"When a member of the crew pointed out that wind and tide would make it fairly easy to reach the wreck, but almost impossible to come back, the captain replied: 'We have to go out, but we don't have to return.'

"I had to do what I did—but I don't have to be re-elected if the people of Minnesota don't want me."—Used by permission of Magazine Digest, New York 17, New York.

NORWALK, CALIFORNIA.—Elder G. E. Tickemyer, president of the Los Angeles Stake, announces the formation of a new church group at Norwalk, under the sponsorship of the Compton Branch. High Priest Albert K. Knowlton of Los Angeles is in charge.

The population of Norwalk has increased from 7,000 to 35,000 in the past five years. Church members living in the area number approximately fifty and include three members of the priesthood. Thirty-one persons attended the opening service held at the home of one of the members April 29. Plans are being made to rent temporary meeting quarters until such time as the group is able to erect its own building.

This makes the sixth new congregation formed in the Los Angeles area in the past three years, bringing the total congregations to fourteen. Two of these new groups have acquired their own buildings and are thriving congregations.

The Los Angeles Stake has had an increase of 125 members in the past eight months and has already reported fifty baptisms for the first four months of the current year.—Reported by GARLAND E. TICKEMYER

Observe Golden Wedding Anniversary

Elder and Mrs. J. H. Beaudin of Providence Bay, Manitoulin Island, observed their fiftieth wedding anniversary on Easter Sunday. Elder Beaudin, who has served as pastor of Providence Bay Branch for twenty-five years, was baptized in 1903, ordained a priest in 1916, and an elder in 1921. He had been a farmer until 1947, when he retired. Sister Beaudin joined the church in 1902 and has actively supported her husband in his ministry ever since. They have four children; all of them were present on March 25 for a dinner in honor of the anniversary. Open house was held on March 26 for friends and neighbors of the Beaudins.

water with a strong bond between them. This missionary loved each of his fellow men as a person.

After that my father loved to gather his family about the old organ with Mary playing it, or myself, as we sang together the songs of Zion. Mother always had first choice. "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," she often chose. Father loved best and sang with most fervor, "I Have Found a Friend in Jesus," and our closing song, "I Have Found the Glorious Gospel."

Silver-tongued orators are needed in the church to move the resolves and actions of congregations. Perhaps each missionary, deep in his heart, wishes he could do just that. Brave, unafraid men who dare to warn sinners have also their places. Just as important are the quiet, unpretentious, fireside laborers who feel tenderly for the one man alone, needing to understand some vital point and receive a lift of extra courage.

There is a beautiful picture of Christ searching for a lost sheep, and another of him bearing a lost lamb back in his arms. A very significant picture could well be painted of Christ standing at the door of the fold encouraging a hesitant sheep to just step inside.

The Word of Wisdom - Part VIII

Sweets

MANY, NO DOUBT, have read the splendid article, "Our Underfed Children," by Gladys Denny Schultz in the March issue of The Ladies' Home Journal. She calls attention to the surveys that have been made to find out what American children actually eat every day. The results have been astounding:

In some sections of the country 75 per cent of the children canvassed report no egg, no milk, no citrus fruit, no green or yellow vegetables in a three-day period. But children are few who report no soft drinks, no ice cream, no candy bars, or other sweets in the same period. Four soft drinks a day is not unusual.

And the situation is getting worse. Wherever studies have continued over a period of years, the boys and girls have reported poorer diets in 1947 than in 1946, in 1948 than in 1947. More and more sweet drinks, candy, ice cream concoctions, and pastries; less and less milk, eggs, and the inexpensive whole grain cereals, and green and yellow vegetables required for balance.

It is only in recent generations that we have learned how to refine the sugar used in these many products which are crowding out the wholesome foods which should be in our diet.

Professor H. C. Sherman says:

Refined sugar constitutes an extreme case of a one-sided food, its sole nutritive function being to serve as a fuel, so that, as the energy requirement of the body is met to a larger and larger extent by the consumption of refined sugar, there is a constantly increasing danger of unbalancing the diet and making it deficient in some of the substances which are needed for the building and repair of body tissues and for the regulation of physiological processes.

NUTRITIONISTS do not include sugar or sweets of any kind in the basic seven groups of food. Our body can obtain all the sugar it needs from ordinary food—fruits, vegetables, and cereals. Sweets are to be eaten in addition to the basic seven foods, but not in place of them.

Yet think of the millions of tons of sugar that are consumed every year in the form of candies, soft drinks, pastries, and syrups, and of all the wholesome food it displaces. We all know how sweets "spoil the appetite" of our youngsters. And their intake is too limited for the demands of their active and growing bodies to allow this displacement factor.

Mary Swartz Rose says that "the delectables of the soda fountain and ice cream parlor" should be avoided by everyone except at the end of a regular meal and that candy should not be eaten by children until after the fifth year, then only the simplest kinds and a minimum quantity as a dessert. Nutritionists say that milk or fruit should be used for that between-meal snack, and that fruit either raw or cooked should become the favorite dessert.

Excess carbohydrate is blamed for the blotchy skins which make so many adolescents miserable. Excessive use of sugar puts a heavy load on the pancreas. E. V. McCollum states:

Sugar, being readily soluble, is quickly absorbed from the digestive tract, and if eaten too freely at one time tends to enter the blood faster than the liver and other tissues can abstract it and causes a high tide of sugar in the blood. It is not improbable that when this high tide of sugar occurs the pancreas puts out more insulin than is necessary, thus putting a strain on the insulin-forming structures. If this is true, eating excessively of sugar over a considerable period may tend to bring on diabetes. . . . Nature did not intend that we should eat freely of the simple sugars and did not make them available. She gave us much starch instead. This was a wise provision, since starches eaten with an ordinary meal require several hours for complete digestion and absorption, hence the resulting glucose enters the blood slowly and does not cause the high tide of blood sugar.

The Iowa Medical Society in a radio talk on the treatment of diabetes says, "It is quite certain in most cases that diabetes is not caused by actual disease of the pancreas but by exhaustion of the insulin-producing cells in that organ."

By Florence Sanford Ourth

AS THE USE OF SUGAR has increased, so has the number of dental cavities. It is thought that sugar contributes to the acid formation in the mouth which causes decay. One school of dental research holds that it is the constant bathing of the teeth with soda pop or sweetened saliva that causes decay.

In A Guide to Practical Nutrition written by the Philadelphia County Medical Society (a free publication) are expressed these generally accepted views:

"Tooth decay occurs almost exclusively among animals and human beings subsisting largely on carbohydrate food. Refined carbohydrates in the form of sugar and candy lead to tooth decay."

It is interesting to note that "diabetic patients subsisting on a restricted diet develop arrest of dental caries and show deposition of lime salts within the tubules of their carious dentine."

Refining processes have taken away all the vitamins and minerals from our white sugar. Since it is so deficient as a food, it should be avoided as much as possible. Honey, the natural sweetening, should be used, or the other more nutritious sweets—maple sugar, raw sugar, sorghum, molasses, and blackstrap molasses.

FOR MANY GENERATIONS honey was the only sweetening known. It is a very old food. We find it mentioned in Genesis, the first book of the Bible, when we read of Jacob's including honey with the gifts he sent to Egypt when his sons went to get grain. In the New Testament we read that honey was eaten by John the Baptist. Isaiah foretold of Christ, "Butter and honey shall he eat that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good." And Luke records that after Christ's resurrection he ate broiled fish and honey comb.

In the Book of Mormon we read that as Lehi and his family were journeying in the wilderness they came to a land they named Bountiful "because of its much fruit and wild honey prepared by the Lord that we might not perish." When they embarked on the ship to come to this land they were commanded by the Lord to include in their provisions "honey in abundance." And when Jared and his brother came to this continent they brought swarms of bees with them.

Honey is a natural, unrefined food, in fact it is the only unmanufactured sweet available in commercial quantities. Not only is it one of the oldest foods, but also the purest food. It has a concentration of sugar so high that bacteria cannot live in it more than two hours. Because of its high sugar content, it is second to few foods in energy-producing value. It is composed mainly of levulose and dextrose, the simple sugars that need little digestion and are quickly absorbed into the tissues of the body.

Studies at the University of Wisconsin show that honey contains vitamins and minerals—not a large amount, but enough to help conduct the processes which go on in the body to help it use up the sugar.

THE COUNCIL ON FOODS and Nutrition of the American Medical Association has found it to be a pleasant, safe, wholesome food even for children. Many specialists in the care of children recommend its use as a sweetening for milk in the feeding of babies. The late F. W. Schultz, M.D., says:

Honey appears to have a special advantage in infant feeding. It is easily obtained, is very palatable and digestible. Honey would seem to be a form of carbohydrate that should have a wider use in infant feeding. Bobs Roberts Hospital for Children is continually using honey in the clinic and finds it very successful.

Recent research has shown that "honey would seem to have a definite beneficial influence upon the retention of calcium by young infants."

The Nauvoo women have been interested in using honey. They find that it is an excellent yeast food in bread-making. Also, because of its moisture-absorbing qualities, it helps bread, cake, and cookies to stay fresh longer. It is said that a cooky sweetened with honey only may keep soft and moist for a whole year.

HONEY IS MORE EXPENSIVE than sugar, but if bought in five, ten, or sixty pound containers it is much more economical than the small jars. Since it contains less water than commercial syrups, it can be diluted, which also makes it easier to pour. For sweetening cereal, pancakes, barley, fruit drinks, baked apples, for candying sweet potatoes and parsnips, and for sweetening raw fruits such as strawberries, raspberries and peaches, the American Honey Institute suggests three cups of honey blended with one cup of quite warm water. This should be kept in a covered container in a cool place. It is best to sweeten cooked fruits with undiluted honey, adding it after the fruit has been taken off the heat. The American Honey Institute, Madison, Wisconsin, prints Old-Fashioned Honey Recipes, price, 10c. Many of the recipes can be adapted for use with whole wheat flour. The Institute will also be glad to help with any problem in the use of honey.

Honey differs in color and flavor depending on the flowers from which the bees obtain the nectar. The lighter honey is better flavored, but the darker honey is said to have more vitamins. It can be bought in the comb, liquid, or solid, sometimes called granulated. The granulated can be creamed with butter and used in sandwiches in place of jam or jelly. Sprinkled with nuts, it is excellent.

In the American Bee Journal for July, 1950, appears an interesting article, "A New Use of Honey for Children," written by Dr. D. C. Jarvis, whose name is listed in Who's Who in America. He became interested in Vermont folk medicine, made a serious study of it, and soon learned that honey was one of the important remedies used. It was used as a sedative and to produce sleep at night; for inflammation, especially of the breathing tract; for arthritis; in convalescence from sickness when the digestion was weak; and as a pick-up to give new energy. It was a favorite remedy for headache and was used for hay fever and as a heart tonic. Dr. Jarvis writes: "The medicinal value of honey far outweighs its food value, even though this food value is very great." He also says it can be used as a treatment for bed-wetting. A teaspoonful given to a child at bedtime acts as a sedative to the child's nervous system and will attract and hold fluid in the child's body during the hours of sleeping, sparing the kidneys.

The statement has been made that we average a hundred and eight pounds of sugar per person per year in this country. But even the most enthusiastic advocate of honey would not recommend the use of such an amount of honey per person, for that is too large an amount for any one who wishes to be healthy.

HAVING HEARD of the experience of one of our sisters in Wisconsin, we wrote and asked if she would

Religion on Trial - Part III

By Malcolm L. Ritchie

Dean of Student Personnel
Graceland College

Is Christianity Impractical Now?

I WOULD LIKE TO BE ABLE to believe in this church, I would like very much the security it brings."

The young man sitting across my desk (I'll call him Jack) went on to tell me that he had been brought up in a church which emphasized authority and theology a great deal more than it did Christ's teaching and examples in the everyday affairs of living. A keen student, Jack had grown beyond the point at which the idea of accepting everything on faith appealed to him. Through the course of these events he had given up the faith of his childhood, and now at Graceland he was expressing a need which he felt in his own life. This need, he believed, could be met at least in part if he could bring himself to a full belief in the Christianity of the Restoration.

After Jack left, I thought about his situation a great deal. Here was a man, I reflected, who was struggling with the basic ideas of religion. He had a serviceable system of ethics and morals. He was unusually intelligent and socially competent. According to the going standards he stood a good chance of becoming a success in life. Yet through it all he felt deeply the problem of the Preacher of Ecclesiastes, "What makes life worth living?"

On the Graceland campus Jack had seen that other people, too, had met this problem. Here were many students and faculty members who had a conviction that there was a purpose to life; that God had put them here to help bring into being lives of eternal quality. These people were dedicated to the cause of developing these lives, and of developing the kind of society which would foster lives of this quality.

THE CHRISTIAN should be able to say to any person, "Through this set of values you can obtain the greatest degree of happiness which may be found." It is the job of every Latter Day Saint to show people that through love and understanding our contact with others may be made the most effective. We should show people that through the principles of stewardship and accounting all of us may achieve the best organization of our expenditures of energy, material, and spiritual resources. The practical benefits of following the principles of the living gospel include the rewards of becoming good citizens, useful workers, capable and responsible parents, and well-balanced individuals. We are held responsible for proclaiming these advantages and educating all who will try in ways of making the most of these rewards.

There are a number of agencies in our country which are actively engaged in promoting some of these aims of Christianity. Not only churches but countless other agencies, including labor unions, the National Association of Manufacturers, and even the government itself sponsor services designed to promote one or more of the social and personal objectives embodied in the Christian message. That so many institutions with such a wide range of goals and ideals find themselves in the position of incorporating one or more ideas which were Christian in origin, I hold to be a testimony of the practicality of these ideas.

In the years since the founding of Christianity the practicality of the principles of living involved have been proved by the way that they have been taken over and absorbed into businesses, governments, and other agencies. The ideas of Christianity and the agencies sponsoring them are spread now throughout the world. With all this, the supremely practical problem is in the province of religion itself, and only religion. A man may not be able to utilize and direct all the assistance he can obtain in learning to live more effectively until he has answered the problem of Jack and of the Preacher, "What makes life worth living at all?"

IT IS NOT ENOUGH for a person to live a clean life. It is not enough to be a success in business. It is not enough to be a good counselor, carpenter, or minister. Though a man be helpful, clean-living, and successful, if he lives for no purpose his living may be in vain. Like Jack and like the Preacher, millions of people in the world today are searching for something which is worth giving their lives to. The dilemma of modern man is that the question of the ultimate goal of life may be answered only in religion, and modern man too frequently is undeveloped in religion. This is a problem which philosophy can but help us phrase and which science alone cannot solve. In its largest sense religion is concerned with the relation Graceland students were recently hosts to two hundred visitors, delegates to the Youth Institute on Missions Abroad. Six workshops were held representing Australasia, Britain, Germany, Holland, Scandinavia, and Tahiti. Each workshop prepared a gift to send to the mission it was studying. The Tahitian workshop sent a recording of greetings in three languages, English, Tahitian, and French, the official language of the islands. The German workshop made a scrapbook to illustrate life at Graceland and is sending it to the Saints at Hannover. The Scandinavian mission will receive a year's subscription to The Saints' Herald, and the one in Holland will soon have a church flag. The Australian workshop sent letters of greeting to the Australian Zion's Leagues, and the one on Great Britain took a collection and with the proceeds assembled the food and materials for two Zion's Leagues to have parties.

Through these gifts, the delegates to the institute hope to help promote a feeling of closer fellowship among members of the church, especially young people of the church throughout the world.

of man to the universe. Christianity affirms that the forces of the universe are personal and spiritual as well as physical and material. Along with this, Christianity insists that man is created for a purpose and should be about the business of fulfilling that purpose.

An all-school banquet was held in Student Center on May 18. The theme was "A Cruise on the S.S. 'Gay Diversion.'" The Center was transformed into a ship, and the tables were locations where the "Gay Diversion" dropped anchor. A variety program provided entertainment, and a king and queen were chosen to reign over the affair.

Mr. W. Hobart Hill, Dean of Humanics at Missouri Valley State Teachers College, spoke to a recent assembly of students and staff. He explained the development, aims, and content of the college's new humanics curriculum, a program of social leadership for social workers, Boy Scout and Girl Scout leaders, and all who work with groups of people.

A "service in song" was presented on a recent Wednesday evening. A series of hymns sung by the congregation, the concert choir, and soloists, traced the development and changes in hymn literature from the earliest days of the Christian church to the Restoration. A brief talk reminded students that they should carry the ministry of music to their home branches.

Representatives from fifteen four-year colleges were present on the Graceland campus on transfer counseling day. Some colleges were represented by their administrative personnel, some by Graceland alumni now attending there, and others by their alumni who are now on the Graceland faculty. These representatives advised students who plan to transfer to one of these schools about their transfer problems, scholastic and social opportunities at the schools in question, and opportunities for church participation in the places where each is located.

Doris Marriott has accepted the position of instructor of women's physical education to take the place of Ruth Ralston who has been a member of the Graceland Family since January, 1947. Miss Ralston will marry Mr. Robert Holman of Independence, Missouri, in June. Miss Marriott, who comes from Des Moines, Iowa, is a graduate of Graceland and will receive her degree in physical education from Iowa State Teachers College this summer.

Granville K. Thompson, Graceland business manager, has resigned his post to accept a position in Washington, D.C. Working in the United States Office of Education, he will be responsible for priorities and allocations to college and university construction projects. Mr. Thompson and his family hope to establish a permanent residence in Washington about July 1.

The student council in a recent assembly presented to the student body the results of a survey it has conducted on the campus. The survey sampled student opinion on a number of points concerning Graceland life and asked for suggestions of possible changes and improvements on the campus. Council members, Dean Ritchie, and Dr. Roy Cheville commented on a number of the suggestions that were made in response to it.

A week-long priesthood school will be held at Graceland June 10-17. The school, sponsored by the General Church, will be under the direction of Dr. F. M. McDowell, Director of Priesthood Education. The staff will consist of General Church officers and Graceland instructors. Two to three hundred priesthood members from all over the United States are expected to attend.

Who Are Protestant— Who Christian?

They are obnoxious to us, and we confidently believe that if there is a Christian body on earth we should qualify as Christian, and that we have far more to offer in witnessing for Him than other churches, even those that are automatically accepted by the world as Christian.

WHILE WE ARE CONSIDERING the subject, let us adopt the rule stated in the beginning of our discussion. Let us go to the dictionary and "present-day thought and writing." Again to Webster, under "Christian":

"One who believes, or professes, or is assumed to believe, in Jesus Christ, and the truth as taught by Him, an adherent of Christianity," etc.

I would contend, therefore, as long as we profess belief in and allegiance to the principles and teachings of Jesus Christ, and do not believe in any doctrine or tenets that may rightly be held to be adverse or contrary to His truth, we have every right to call ourselves and to be considered Christian. This, of course, we do, and we will ever be willing to answer for the integrity of our beliefs, in spite of the fact that portions of so-called Christianity draw the circle too small to receive us.

True to our beliefs, however, we can include all men in our circle and will continue to do so.

Paraphrasing some lines from Edward Markham that appeared a few years ago:

They draw a circle that shuts us out,
Heretics, rebels, things to flout.
But Love and I have the wit to win—
We draw a circle that takes them in.

And let's do it in all sincerity of soul.

The Word of Wisdom

share it with us. This she has kindly done. Her letter is as follows:

About two years ago while I was being administered to, it came to me that I should observe the Word of Wisdom. I did not hear a voice, but the Spirit came to me very strongly and brought this message: "You come to me for blessings, but what do you do for yourself to obtain health?" I said, "Lord, what should I do? Tell me, and I will do it." Then the Spirit said, "I have given unto my people the Word of Wisdom which, if they observe, will bring them health."

After that many things were opened up to my mind in a vision in regard to foods that I had never thought of or known before. Sugar was one of the things I found to be harmful. Before this I craved sweets. I have not bought any sugar or sweets from that time. I use honey, the natural sweetening. I eat more vegetables and fruit than I have ever eaten before, whole wheat bread and whole wheat cereals, milk and butter. I do not drink tea, coffee, or cocoa. I do not use much meat, but eat a lot of cheese.

About three months after the experience I had, I went to the doctor for a check-up. He said I was in better condition than he had ever known me to be, and I have doctored with him for years. He said that my high blood pressure ailment, and muscle spasms were gone. I had lost weight, which was good, and now I maintain an even weight. God has been good to me and has wonderfully blessed me in trying to keep the Word of Wisdom.

Introducing

CARL T. SELF (page 5), Omaha, Nebraska, is an attorney, specializing in War Risk Insurance, Veteran's Compensation Law, and Land Title Law. He was born near Palmyra, Nebraska, in 1878, and joined the church in 1891 at the reunion in Wilber, Nebraska. He was graduated from the Nebraska City high school in 1901, then took a course at the Omaha Commercial College in 1902-3. In 1905 he began studying law under the supervision of Hugh A. Meyers, an instructor in Omaha University. He was admitted to the bar in 1912, and is a member of the City and State Bar Associations; the R.L.D.S. Lawyers' Association, and the Omaha City Farmers' Association.

In 1903 he married Irene Fremming. They have three children: F. R. Self, Mrs. Merile Withee, and Mrs. Anne Hartwig. Brother Self was ordained a deacon in 1905, a priest in 1915, an elder in 1916, and a high priest in 1917. He served as Northeastern Nebraska District president from 1916 to 1921, as pastor of the Omaha Branch in 1922 and 1923, as bishop's agent in 1932 and 1933, as counselor to Bishop Wellman from 1935 to 1946, and as bishop's agent from 1946 to 1950. He also served as secretary to the Omaha Branch fifteen years, and has been district and branch historian since 1921.

BERNARD DEWAVRIN (page 9) was born in France in 1893 and twenty-one years later became a second lieutenant commanding an infantry regiment at the battle of the Marne. Two years later he was promoted to the rank of captain of the French reserves, and in 1917 received the award of "Legion d'Honneur" for bravery and wounds received in service.

He married in 1918 and reared a family of eight children. In 1919 he founded the Dewavrin Cotton and Spinning Mills in partnership with his brother. In 1928 he founded the Franco-Hungarian Cotton Industry in Budapest. During the war he strove to protect Jewish workers who were greatly persecuted in Hungary, and also received 150 French prisoners of war who escaped from Germany. Because of these acts of mercy, he was arrested by the Hungarian Gestapo, but the following year when the city was under siege by the Russians, he escaped to France with his family.

Since last October he has been semi-paralyzed. According to his own statement, he is "too much of an invalid to nourish the slightest ambition, but not quite enough to have lost the desire to serve." After several months' reflection, he was more convinced than ever of the need of proposing the idea summarized in the text: "A Bold, Constructive Plan."

Every little while a case comes to light in which parents have forbidden (an action with no legal foundation) a mature, competent son or daughter to get married, saying that it is the child's duty to remain single and take care of one or both parents. They overlook the fact that the child will be very lonely when they die.

Circumstances differ. Sometimes a delaying action seems advisable to prevent an unwise marriage that would cause trouble or sorrow. But sometimes parents are guilty of pure selfishness in obstructing the marriage of their children. They prevent good marriages.

It is possible for children to marry, have their homes, and provide care for the parents too, if all parties are reasonable.

There is one good answer for the arguments of these parents. In their youth they quite rightly left their parents and married for love and happiness. Why should they deny their children a right that they selfishly took for themselves?

It is a regrettable fact that selfishness is found in some parents as well as in some children.

* TWO FINE CONCORDANCES

By this time there are probably few active members of the church who are not aware of the excellent reference work, "A Concordance to the Book of Mormon," a work of devotion produced by Brother Arthur E. Starks. With this single book, Brother Starks is assured that his name will be known to generations of church members yet unborn.

Now Brother Starks has produced, and the Herald Publishing House has published, another important reference work, "A Concordance to the Doctrine and Covenants." It is printed and bound in the same style to make it match the other book.

These books are keys to the knowledge contained in the two books. With them, the student can locate any passage he desires. Ministers and teachers will especially appreciate them.

We'd like you to know

Vance E. Link, M.D.

NATURE HAS ADMIRABLY endowed Doctor Vance for his work in life. It may have been the Nebraska atmosphere in which he was reared, or the parental influence of the Nebraska home in which he was born that is responsible. We know only that he has a good sense of humor, a winning poise, and a sturdy physique which have won him many friends and patients. It has helped to identify him as a integral part of the Sanitarium.

He came to Independence in 1943 as an associate of Dr. Charles F. Grabske. After three years service as secretary of the medical staff of the Sanitarium, he was elected its president. He is a member of several committees: Cancer Detection Clinic, Student Nurses Health Program, Doctor's Record Committee, and the Greater Kansas City Academy of General Practice. He is also a member of the board of directors of the Jackson County Chapter of American Cancer Society.

Doctor Link was born in Eustis, Nebraska, in 1918; baptized in 1928; and graduated from Eustis high school in 1935. He received his B.S. in Medicine from the University of Nebraska in 1940, his M.D. in 1942, and interned at the University Hospital in Omaha.

Margaret Catherine Weller of Lincoln, Nebraska, became Mrs. Link in 1941. They have three children: Karen Sue, 5; Richard Dennis, 3; and Ronald Vance, 1. Doctor Link's hobbies are photography and boating. During his college days he was a member of the medical fraternity, Alpha Kappa Kappa. He is a charter member of the Independence Optimist Club.

An active member of the Stone Church congregation, he was ordained a priest in 1942 and an elder in 1944. The picture shows him in a characteristic pose. The admiring gaze of freshman nurse Jean Franks may or may not be posed.

The Reorganization and the Law

THE YEAR OF 1952, rapidly approaching, will make us mindful of the events of a century ago, when the Church of Jesus Christ was saved by the loyalty and the courage of men of the priesthood who, refusing false leadership, found security in the "law of the Lord."

Many hundreds were led astray into heresy and followed after strange doctrines and new gods like ancient Israel; but there were faithful men and women who "stood by" for a time, who forgot not the Lord's instruction to Israel, as found in II Kings 17: 37:

And the statutes, and the ordinances, and the law, and the commandments, which he wrote for you, ye shall observe to do for evermore; and ye shall not fear other gods.

They also had received a "command" in latter-day revelation:

Ye shall receive my law, that ye may know how to govern my church, and have all things right before me.—Doctrine and Covenants 41: 11.

These things they remembered and respected. They knew that following Nauvoo certain leaders had turned their faces away from the church statutes, ordinances, and commandments which made up the "law" of the church, and had persuaded many others to do likewise; after a time, it appeared that the faithful must be shepherded else the church divinely begun and divinely led by the Prophet could not be salvaged.

I have frequently expressed an admiration for the conservative and careful men who were at the helm of the faithful from 1850 and thereabouts, and for their great concern to follow the law, to "observe" the statutes and ordinances and the commandments which the Lord had given the church from 1830 to the date of the death of the Prophet.

RECENTLY I HAVE REVIEWED the history of the movement to find and gather the sheep so severely smitten by the events begun on June 27, 1844, and following.

It has been charged that some of these men to whom I refer were "apostates." Like the "cynic's ban" this epithet has been and is often yet "hurled" at our ministers; but when a bill of particulars is requested or a proposal "to make more definite and certain," our ministers are given nothing that would indicate that Elders Briggs, Gurley, Powers, Blair, Marks, and others had rejected anything other than Mormon leadership.

Evidently the term "apostasy" has not been understood. I find Webster defines it as "an abandonment of what one has voluntarily professed; a total desertion or departure from one's faith, principles, or party; an apostate's act of renunciation; especially the renunciation of a religious faith."

The great lawyer Blackstone defined apostasy as follows: "This consists in the total renunciation . . . The offense can only take place in such as have once professed the true religion."

It has always appeared so inconsistent for those who confessedly in the 1840's embraced doctrines diametrically opposed to the plain and uncontroverted doctrines of the church to cry "apostate" to those who stood immovable on the proposition that God is unchangeable and who gave unalterable allegiance to the "statutes, and the ordinances, and the law, and the commandments, which he," the Lord, had given his church through the Prophet. Unless, forsooth, one could be an apostate because he would not conform to what—by hearsay only—the Prophet Joseph allegedly received, but which was never established.

WHILE I PREFER to deal with principles and not personalities, I feel at this point to call attention to the alleged "revelation on plural marriage." The men who brought about the reorganization of the church specifically urged, in opposition, the fact that the Prophet had not submitted it to the church for acceptance. That omission has recently been voluntarily admitted by Mormon leaders, though they mislead their people by a distortion of the facts.

In the latest (1950) edition of the Mormon Doctrine and Covenants Commentary, Apostle Hyrum M. Smith and Janne M. Sjodahl, editors, we find the following on page 836:

. . . the Revelation on the subject was not committed to writing until the year 1843. It should be noted that even then it was not given to the church. This step was taken on the 29th of August, 1852, when the Revelation was read to a General Conference in the "Old Tabernacle," Salt Lake City, and accepted by the assembly as a revelation from God and part of the law of the church. In voting for the Revelation, the Saints firmly believed that they were . . . (The italics are mine.)

This is clearly contrary to the published record of that meeting. The facts are that the document was read and then simply "proclaimed" by Brigham Young; it was not submitted to a vote. No vote was asked for—no vote was given. The printed account of this conference—not a General Conference, but a "special conference," so-called by them and today not counted as one of the General Conferences of the Mormon Church—discloses that no action by the conference was taken.

Thus it is evident from the facts that the Mormons had departed from the faith and had in fact been

To Stake and District Presi- dents, Chairmen Reunion Committees:

Material has been prepared for each area of classwork for the coming reunion season. This is in harmony with the wishes of the Joint Council that a unified reunion program be carried on with an over-all theme based on "Sources of Spiritual Power."

It is anticipated that those who will be teaching the various classes will want to have the recommended text materials in their hands in advance of the reunion period so that they can make adequate preparation for presenting it.

We are not attempting to regiment these classes. We hope each individual teacher will feel free to interpret and present this material in his own characteristic style. It is available, however, and we recommend its use. Reunion Committee Chairmen are urged to send for

The Fourth Dimension

By Frank W. Rucker

Editor's Note: This commencement address was delivered at Stone Church on the occasion of the graduating of the thirty-seventh class from the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing. Others participating in the program were Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp, secretary of the board of directors (invocation) Nelle Morgan, R.N., director of nurses (presentation of the class); Israel A. Smith, president of the board of directors (presentation of diplomas); Gertrude E. Copeland, R.N., hospital superintendent (presentation of pin); and Donald V. Lents, hospital chaplain (benediction).

IN THE REALM OF SERVICE there is a fourth dimension, just as there is in the realm of mathematics. This dimension is particularly demonstrated in the field of nursing.

Good nursing embodies more than knowledge, skill, and devotion to duty. It includes heart interest, sympathy, tenderness, and encouragement.

In other professions and in all walks of life we need to find that fourth dimension—the thing that makes our outlook on life, our deeds, our ideals beautiful, wholesome, and worth while.

The world judges by certain standards, but we must go beyond those standards to find the standard by which God judges and by which we become useful in his world.

A rich young ruler went to Jesus pretending that he wanted to become his follower. He told the Master that he knew and kept all the commandments. The trouble was he kept them to himself; he did not use them to make life helpful to others. When Jesus told him that he lacked the fourth dimension, which was a generous heart, he went away sorrowful. Jesus told him to go sell what he had and give it to the needy, but selfishness stood in his way.

An Indian chief was being taken about to see the sights of New York. He was taken to the top of the highest skyscraper. The guide said:

"Look around you—you can see so far. From here you can see four states."

The Indian looked but was unimpressed. The guide said: "But, Chief, look how far you can see—four states!" The Indian stood silent for a moment longer and then said: "But from tepee on the prairie I can see moon and stars."

I. A. R. Wylie says that soon after the war she was in England where, to a large extent, money had lost its significance — its buying power. Those who had it could no longer get what they thought they wanted with it. Clothing, food, cars, the gas to run them, and old, accepted forms of entertainment and pleasure were either rationed, nonexistent, or just too hard to come by. But if you expected to find a doleful population, you were pleasantly disappointed.

She stayed with an old school friend who, in the piping days of peace, had been a chronic grumbler. She had everything—and nothing pleased her. Now she has not much of anything and a great many things please her. She delights in simple, priceless assets that she once took indifferently for granted. She has found capacities for happiness within herself which money had actually concealed from her.

The value of money is not in the bulky, tawdry things it brings into our possession, but in the joy that we can give to others with it. It has a dimension that many of us fail to see.

THE NEWSPAPER MAN, who meets life in all its stages and forms, comes daily to a high appreciation of the commonplace things of life, which bring to each of us our happy and our sorrowful moments, our successes and our failures, our friends and our foes, and keep us scrambling ahead.

The Almighty has placed in this world plenty of the good to overcome the evil, sweet moments to make us forget bad days, startling experiences to keep us awake, hope sufficient to lure our faith and ambition.

No story is more interesting than the everyday life of the everyday man. It is for this reason that the newspapers of today give so much space to the ordinary happenings of life that never make big headlines but always stir the higher emotions and arouse pleasant thoughts.

From time to time in the editorial columns, we have commented on such common things as items of food that we especially enjoy, the dew and the rain, the sunrise and the rainbow, the good fellow who sprinkles cinders on the highway so that our tires can hold to icy roads, the interesting books that our neighbors have lent us, the style of women's hair dress and men's whiskers today and yesterday. We have turned memories back to the country schoolhouse, the butchering days on the farm, blackberry picking in the woods, and other experiences that give fiber to our being.

Genius finds in our everyday words
The music of the woodland birds,
Discloses hidden beauty furled
In the commonplace stuff of the everyday world.

This is worth remembering when we inventory our good fortune. Let us not overlook the common blessings that come with everyday living.

IT IS NOT the architecture, the location, or the costliness of the house that gives it value. Edgar Guest so well said: "It's the livin' in it that makes it home," and the more livin' there is in it the more we appreciate that home.

When we measure it by the true joy it gives to us, we comprehend its real worth.

Emerson said: "The true test of civilization is not in the census, nor the size of cities, nor the crops, but in the kind of people the country turns out."

And William Jennings Bryan said: "The humblest citizen of all the land, when clad in the armor of a righteous cause, is stronger than all the hosts of error."

During a recent election campaign a newspaperman was asked by a well-known candidate what his fee would be to "ghostwrite" a speech.

"Five hundred dollars?" suggested the journalist. "Okay! But actually you'll be getting much more. I have an expense fund that I don't have to account for, and I can pay you in cash. Forget it on your income tax, and no one will ever know."

Had the journalist accepted the proposal, he would have been committing the crime of tax evasion, for which many a man has gone to prison. But the candidate, in urging him to cheat the government, was apparently committing no crime at all. His action was not dishonest. It was simply dishonorable.

Commenting further on this thought, Fulton Oursler, author of The Greatest Story Ever Told, says:

Our greatest danger today is not from Russia, but from ourselves, from our growing disregard of principles and our reliance on expediency. Along this immoral road we have already gone far, feeling meanwhile more discontent than ever before. In bookshops and drugstores, in correspondence courses and lectures, we seek peace of mind, peace of soul. Our private lives reflect the public evidences of decay, and we are not happy about it. The renewal of conscience in modern society is its only hope.

In the darkest days of the Civil War a group of compromisers called on Abraham Lincoln with a plan for a patched-up peace. When the President declined to accept it, he was told that his best friends would be shocked at his stubbornness. Old Abe replied:

I desire so to conduct the affairs of this administration that if at the end, when I come to lay down the reins of power, I have lost every other friend on earth I shall, at least, have one friend left, and that friend shall be down inside of me.

It is not altogether gone—that old sense of honor which felt a stain like a wound. Our most important need is for better men to lift the fallen banners of our integrity and lead us again toward the light.

WHEN I WAS A STUDENT at the University of Missouri School of Journalism, I became well acquainted with a member of the faculty, who afterward became a Washington correspondent and later a foreign correspondent for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. He attempted to pass on to the journalism students the fine principles that he afterward practiced. This teacher was Charley Ross, press secretary to President Truman, who fell dead at his post of duty a few months ago. Concerning him President Truman said:

Patriotism and integrity, honor and honesty, lofty ideals and nobility of intent were his guides and ordered his life from boyhood onward. He saw life steady and saw it whole. We shall miss him as a public servant and mourn him as a friend.

Charley Ross was not just an ordinary newspaper man. He had that other dimension that set him above the rank and file of his profession. He was a journalist whose search for the truth was persistent, a teacher whose instruction influenced a generation of writers and thinkers, a public servant who gave his heart, his soul, and his mind toward the interpretation and understanding of national affairs, a loyal friend and a man of great character.

A noted physician says that he once counseled a successful and very egotistic businessman, who could find no time to concern himself with the affairs and woes of his fellow men, to go to the Grand Central Station in New York and to look for someone to help. Largely in a spirit of supercilious condescension he obeyed the doctor's prescription.

He found a poor woman who had come from the rural districts to New York to meet her daughter. She had lost the slip with her daughter's address and sat weeping silently in a corner. The businessman approached her and offered help. He managed to find her daughter's address in the telephone directory, took the old lady and her bags and put her in a taxicab and accompanied her to an obscure street in the Bronx. On the way he bought the old lady a few roses. She wept for sheer joy on his shoulder. He deposited her, smiling, in her daughter's house, and then rushed to the telephone to call his doctor.

"My heavens, Doc, I feel like a human being at last!" he blurted as he told the story.

Since then he has become one of the directors of a boys' club on the lower East Side of New York and a member of various child welfare and civic organizations.

If we want to know what happiness is we must seek it, not as if it were a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, but among human beings who are living richly and fully the good life.

JESUS HAD IN HIS LIFE that other dimension that made him the Brother and the Savior of men. He was not only physically, morally, and socially strong, but he had that touch with God that gave him spiritual strength, courage, and joy.

Paul urged the same thing upon us when he told us to put our minds on things that are just, pure, lovely, and of good report.

Lord of the far horizons
Give us the eyes to see
Over the verge of the sundown
The beauty that is to be.

On this occasion when these fine young women, equipped and measured to the fourth dimension of service, receive their diplomas, we know that they are impressed with the responsibilities of character, cheerfulness, and sympathetic understanding that must be theirs as well as the obligation to perform their routine and special duties well.

May we, too, sense the obligation that rests upon all of us to live beautifully and helpfully.

There is a petition in the Common Prayer Book that is fitting for us all:

Deliver us, we beseech thee, O God, from the service of mammon, that we may do the work which thou gavest us to do in truth, in beauty and in righteousness, with singleness of heart as thy servant and to the benefit of our fellow men.

TRI-CITIES MISSIONARY ENDEAVOR

Evangelist Ray Whiting and Elder Lyle Woodstock have completed a missionary series in the Tri-cities area in Illinois. This area is composed of Rock Island, Moline, and Davenport. Fourteen people were baptized and several have indicated a desire to unite with the church.

CHURCH SCHOOL INSTITUTE

John Darling attended a church school institute for the Rock Island, Illinois, District April 28 and 29. Lyle Woodstock, district president, and Winifred Stiegel, district church school director, were in charge of the institute, with many of the key leaders in the district participating. The theme for the institute was "Leadership for Christ."

Included in the excellent contributions of local officials was the panel discussion Sunday afternoon under the direction of Brother Lyle Woodstock. The theme was a summary and evaluation of the institute under the title "These Things We Shall Do." Three constructive speeches were made by Brother Leonard Hendricks, Brother John Harrington, and Sister Winifred Stiegel.

BISHOP IN NEBRASKA

Bishop Leslie Kohlman was at Grand Island, Nebraska, where the Southern Nebraska District held an evangelistic institute April 29. The theme was "Our Present Task—Witnessing for Christ." Sister Aarona Kohlman and Elder Clifford Cole, district president for Northwest Iowa, were also on the staff. District President Clarence Williams of Lincoln, Nebraska, directed the institute.

"Follow Me"

By Harry Black

For whosoever would save his life, must be willing to lose it for my sake.

—Luke 9:24.

MANY YEARS AGO a certain rich man called Naaman found himself stricken with leprosy, and on information acquired from a servant girl he proceeded to the house of one Elisha, a prophet of Yahweh, the Hebrew God. On his inquiry as to a cure he was told to dip himself seven times in the River Jordan. At first he was furious with indignation, deeming it below his status to contaminate himself in such foul waters. In the midst of his rage one of his servants suggested that he try the advice given, saying that if the prophet had desired of him some great thing, he would have done it and how much more he should be willing to do this small thing. Naaman took this advice and became whole.

When Jesus was walking the earth he endeavored to illustrate the necessity of forgetting one's self and becoming immersed in working for the welfare of others. He did this in a carefully planned way. There was no bustling or bullying, just the simple invitation, "Come, follow me." In natural sequence followed periods of teaching and exhortation, then the command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel"—go and give what you have been given.

As with the leprous ruler, the disciples of Christ had to forget themselves and become conscious of the full meaning of the words given and of their possibilities. They had to sever connections with certain social practices that they might fully immerse themselves in the doctrine of Jesus Christ and emerge with a regenerated body. The fear of ridicule had to be pushed aside to make room for a more developed understanding of truth. At first the disciples misunderstood the teachings of Jesus when he instructed them to be in the world but not of it. These misunderstandings can be exemplified in the account of John's desiring the Lord to call down fire on a village that did not receive him, but Jesus walked on down the road.

Slowly the principles that Christ had been endeavoring to get across to his disciples began to take hold, and they were awakened to what their master meant when he spoke of emancipation from worldly ways. His sociability and friendliness with the Samaritans, proved his love for all races, and his helping hand offered to publican and prostitute proved that he looked deep into the actor rather than on the action. Here a little, there a little, precept upon precept, he led the acceptors to realize that the ways of the world were the fruits of those misguided individuals who had misunderstood the teachings of God and had allowed themselves to be led astray by the powers of darkness. Now they saw why their Heavenly Father had considered it necessary to incarnate his spirit into the personage of Jesus Christ in order that man might be led back to happiness and joy. This work suddenly burst into reality before the apostles' eyes as they saw the swarms of misguided individuals grasping life—life that could come only through Jesus the Christ.

No wonder he cried, "Follow me." His heart was yearning to bring about a healthy, fruitful, joyous life for those he loved. He realized the indispensable necessity of becoming "straightened out" from the hodge-podge that misunderstanding and selfishness had brought. So today his call rings clear, asking that we become lost in his teachings that in turn we might find again the path that leads to eternal glory.

"Let Them Come to Me"

By Clifford J. Long

Editor's Note: This article is timely and of vital concern in most branches. It is well for the adults to have their attention called to the fact that children are people, and that they belong to Christ even before baptism. Incidentally the author touches on a conference experience to illustrate his point. This may be a good time to mention that it is not always the fault of the minister that sermons go past the customary hour of closing. It is altogether possible that after all the special announcements on this occasion, with the reading of the call to worship and the Scripture, the singing of a solo and an anthem, and the introduction of notable visitors, that the minister did not start his sermon until 11:38. Should he have ended it abruptly at 11:57 it is quite certain that not only would the adults have been disappointed, but some of them would have expressed themselves loudly. It may not be an ideal thing to say, but the people who pay the bills usually get their way. The preacher should not be expected to condense a forty minute sermon to a twenty minute talk under such circumstances.

CAN'T YOU HAVE THE CHILDREN do something else? They are disturbing the people so much they can't hear the speaker!" These were the words of the assistant pastor of the host congregation at a district conference. The speaker, a man of much ability and prominent in church leadership, was preaching forcefully and had extended his sermon well past the usual closing time.

And what were the children doing which should be stopped? They were singing familiar church hymns! The teachers and leaders had been told to have their junior worship service close shortly before noon. Now they were waiting for the adult service to come to a close. After a while—twenty minutes past twelve—the children became restless, and their leaders had them sing hymns. Into this group activity, which in itself would appear harmless, the children gladly joined, and it did help to ease the tension. But immediately came word from the main auditorium that the adults were disturbed. "Let the children do something else. Keep them quiet. Don't even have them sing!"

To make matters worse, the children were asked to vacate the large room in which they had their service so arrangements could be made for lunch. The speaker still was going strong. In the room to which the younger members were herded, chairs had been removed for the dining room. The youngsters were expected to do nothing but stand in the middle of the room—not to sing, not to walk around, not to get too near the windows, not to say or do anything which might prevent the adults from hearing every word the speaker said.

This actually happened in a church of our faith—a church which professes to be of and to minister for Jesus Christ. But it was not ministry truly representative of the Spirit or the words of Jesus; for he said unto those who, in his days on earth, would have shoved children away so the older folks could enjoy his companionship, "Let them come to me."

When grown men and women selfishly request children not to sing the songs of Zion, they evidence a great lack of conversion to the gospel of Christ.

LET THEM COME!" says Jesus. And this does not mean that children are only to come, sit, be still, and keep out of the way of older people. It means that provision should be made for the children to come and be ministered to—to share in worship, communion, and in companionship with the Christ. It means that they should have their share of the finest ministry that can be offered to anyone in the congregation—not just the leftovers of those features or activities which might not annoy others.

On one occasion a young mother with her small child was greeted in the lobby of a church she had come to visit with directions to take the child to the nursery. "We don't want the service to be disturbed," the usher explained. The woman's husband was participating in the service, and she wanted to attend. In her home congregation she regularly went to church in the main auditorium without the baby's disturbing the rest of the congregation. But, because of the brother's warning, she and her mother-in-law took turns sitting in the nursery with the child—who did not need to be there.

Is a church where no child ever is heard to cry for a few seconds truly a representative church of Jesus Christ? By no means is this article meant to excuse the parents of a child who is allowed to squall lustily in church for several minutes. Certainly they should take him out as a courtesy to the rest of the congregation. My argument applies to the un-Christian attitude of an arbitrary, systematic exclusion of all infants from a regular service in the church.

Parents sometimes join hands with some ministers, unthinkingly, to flaunt the commandment of the Christ. One father was heard to say in a meeting of church workers, in support of an argument for junior church services, "We need some place for the kids so we can enjoy the service." His point was that he couldn't hold one of his youngsters, keep an eye on the others, answer a question or two, and get anything out of the service. Unfortunately this distracted father also was an elder; more unfortunately, he is not the only parent who seems to share this feeling.

"Let them come!" says Jesus—to be ministered to! A room to meet in and some activity called a "service" designed to get children out of the way of older folks or to relieve parents of their own responsibility have no place in our church. But an activity or service planned to minister to the rightful needs and desires of children and young people in helping them grow in Christian character is in accord with the Master's direction.

YOUNG PEOPLE must find their place in church—and this includes children, too. They must be helped to develop a sense of belonging to the church, and of belonging in the main auditorium of the church as well as in their classrooms and junior chapels. But this sense of belonging to the main body of the church does not come overnight at a time when a boy or girl reaches a certain age. It is a growing process and must be fostered over a period of years. People cannot be excluded from church services while they are children and then be expected in their "teens" or early twenties to suddenly take their places as members of the congregation.

Effective ministry to juniors in many churches naturally involves some slight disturbance. Children's bodies, as well as their minds, are active. But, if a choice in values must be made, which is of greater value to the church and to Christ—an effective worship experience on the part of a group of young people, or a greater measure of comfort on the part of some older members acquired through limiting the singing and other worship activities of the children?

A few weeks ago an eight-year-old boy stood by the front seat in the Stone Church. Having been baptized and confirmed, he was introduced to the congregation on this particular Sunday morning when he was to partake of the sacramental emblems for the first time. While other ministers were serving the emblems to the priesthood, Elder Glaude A. Smith, pastor of Stone Church, personally went down from the rostrum and served the boy. For one hour this child had his place in the church of his elders and was made to know he belonged in the congregation. May the ministers and teachers, and other adult members of the congregation, with whom this boy comes into contact during the next eight to ten years encourage him to feel he has place in the body of the Saints. If this can be effectively done over such a period of time, and with adequate parental support along the way, he can be counted on to take his place in the church as a young man and make the contribution of which he is capable.

IN THE CHURCH are many good, devoted, capable men and women who make it a point to minister to younger members of the congregation; and most of them do well considering the limitations surrounding their work. I speak not for myself, for I do not claim to be one who can minister effectively to juniors. But the effectiveness of many able workers is often circumscribed by parents, adults, and ministers who have not grasped the significance of the place of children in church and their need of worship. Generally speaking, it is the same ones who also circumscribe effective teaching and ministry to younger members by failing or refusing to give support by way of adequate class facilities, teaching aids, and study materials.

To these people I address my plea for the sake of the church of tomorrow, for the sake of fulfilling the full import of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Make room in your hearts for the children of all sizes and ages; and as an outward expression of that inner conversion, make place for them—not just to sit or stand still, doing nothing, but to share in worship activities of the congregation, even if that should involve some slight sacrifice on the part of your comfort or pleasure. Take pleasure in the enjoyable participation of the younger persons in various aspects of worship. Only by so doing can you adequately fulfill the charge of the Christ; and only by so doing can you possibly assure the success of the church ten to fifteen years from now by grooming these young people to take the lead in carrying the work of the church.

"Let them come!" says the Master. These words deserve fulfillment.

Picked From the Periodicals

By Aarona Booker Kohlman

May is the month that begins to usher in summer, and hot weather interests, activities, and foods largely fill the magazines, together with the usual general interest features and articles.

"What America Means to Me," American Magazine, was written by Jesse Stuart, and if you are familiar with his writings, you won't want to miss this. Even if you know nothing about him, you will find it interesting.

"Inattentive—or Hard of Hearing?" Ladies' Home Journal, is for parents who may be troubled about special behavior problems that might possibly be caused by inability to hear perfectly.

"New Ideas for Easy Sewing," Ladies' Home Journal, shows new fabrics and trimmings and patterns.

Again for those fashion-minded, Good Housekeeping contains 25 pages of a "Special Collection of Fashions for the Cotton Season."

Because the ailment seems to be fairly common, the article "Phlebitis," Good Housekeeping, is recommended. Causes, preventives, and cures are discussed.

We hope the occasion discussed in the next article will never occur, but if you are bothered by fear of an atomic attack, "Survival At Home," Woman's Home Companion, will be reassuring. Its object is to teach you how to protect yourself and your family:

"Do You Need a Friend?" Woman's Home Companion, is the inspiring account of one man's answer to the desperate need of so many people.

"Love, Marriage, Children—and Security," Reader's Digest, discusses marital security and happiness, and how to achieve it.

Many of us feel the urge to do some redecorating, and if you are searching for new color schemes, "Twenty-six Color Schemes—Take Your Choice," American Home, is just the help you need.

"Why Boys and Girls Go Wrong or Right," Parents' Magazine, gives the results of some new studies of well-adjusted children, and how home conditions can influence a child for better or worse.

"Guard Your Child's Foot Health," Parents' Magazine, tells how fast children's feet grow, and offers help in protecting foot health and selecting shoes.

National Parent-Teacher always contains a wealth of good material, and there are three articles in the May issue that deserve special mention: "Vanquishing Childhood Fears," "Emotional Stability in a Shaking World," and "Learning to Like Our Neighbors."

Beautiful Enoch Hill Church

New and Old Structures Combined in Graceful Harmony

Leadership and Achievement

NOT THE LEAST of the rewards that have come to the good people of the Enoch Hill congregation in Independence upon the completion of their church home are the ringing words of appreciation and commendation from President Israel A. Smith, as given in the fine illustrated historical and program brochure issued for the opening of the new worship auditorium on November 26:

Many pastors, whose labors will always be remembered, have shared the fortunes of this congregation; but it remained for Elder Sanford Downs to direct them at this time of their greatest success. To him and his associates, the priesthood of the group, the women's organizations, and all the faithful members, we extend our thanks and congratulations on a work planned in hope and aspiration and achieved with joy and satisfaction.

Stake President Charles V. Graham and Stake Bishop H. W. Cackler, who have planned and worked unceasingly for the development of our people and their churches here, concluded their message with these words:

We commend you for your worthy efforts and achievements, and pledge our best in ministry with you as we bring the ministry of Christ more adequately to the souls of men, women, and children as a result of having the use of a larger, modern house of worship.

In his message to the congregation, Pastor J. Sanford Downs directed their attention to the future:

We . . . pray that the blessings of God may continue with you as you hasten to utilize this new church as a better tool for bringing to pass the redemption of Zion and the salvation of men.

The Exterior View

The twin gables are over the two new classrooms finished in 1949. The outside stairway with the iron railing leads to the junior chapel and the classrooms. The new doorway leading to the foyer can be seen just to the left of the outside stairway.

The sturdy brick exterior affords a pleasing blend of various tones of red and brown. The new doorway, like the two big windows at the far right, and the coping over the twin gables, is trimmed with white limestone.

The main spire is of copper and very attractive. The auxiliary spire to the left appears to be of the ventilator type, and serves to give a visual break in the long roof line.

Set on one of the most beautiful sites in or near Independence, the Enoch Hill church is an addition of which all may be justly proud.

Old and new have been advantageously combined in the new front so that to the outside world all of it looks new.

In the Main Auditorium

The visitor steps into the wide modern doorway, and finds himself in a pleasant, well-lighted foyer, with plate glass completely separating this part from the auditorium—a feature to prevent noise and disturbance in the meetings, and to provide distressed mothers a convenient place to escape with children.

The pews are of blond oak in a modern design. The concrete floor is covered with variegated asphalt tile. There is a wide chancel covered with heavy carpet, and a large pulpit fitting the dignity of the church. The choir is back of the chancel, with dark paneling on the wall above it. As the audience faces the chancel, the choir room is at the right and the pastor's office is at the left.

The program informs us that "The new Enoch Hill church has a seating capacity of 325, with the balcony which has fifty-six seats." The windows are of pleasing pastel-tinted glass, and admit plenty of light without glare. The color is a gentle deterrent of the tendency for attention to wander.

Brief History

In August, 1910, Bishop Ellis Short invited church people to consider this area at the south side of Independence for homesites. Church families came, built, and stayed.

In 1913 they subscribed six hundred dollars for a church. Volunteer laborers did the building, and even the women helped to haul rock for the new foundation, held lanterns, and nailed laths. The church was finished on the inside in the spring of 1915. In 1919 a basement was dug, and the building was moved to the new foundation, being enlarged at the same time. In the mid thirties a basement annex was added at the northeast corner, which now houses the kitchen, dining room, and heating unit, and provides the foundation for the two class rooms which are under the twin gables. These were added in 1949.

On March 12, 1949, the groundbreaking ceremony for the new worship auditorium took place. The building was completed in November, 1950.

Credits

The pastorate of Enoch Hill congregation at the present time, bearing the responsibility of leadership in this work, are J. Sanford Downs, pastor; Frank D. White, associate pastor; Myron L. Holman and A. E. Boos, counselors.

The building committee is composed of Amos E. Allen, Verla Waters, Delbert Johnson, Hubert Whitehead, Myron L. Holman, J. Sanford Downs, Alma T. Whipple, and A. E. Boos.

Space prevents use of names of all the firms who participated in the work, as listed in the program. It is noted that James E. Cleveland, formerly a pastor there, made the fine Communion table and pulpit.

Statistics

The Enoch Hill membership, at the time of the opening of the new auditorium in November, was 418, representing 204 families. The old church, now the junior chapel, seats 160. The new worship auditorium, has a seating capacity of 325.

Opening Celebration

As is customary, the dedication will come later, when all expenses have been paid. But the splendid celebration for the opening of the new worship auditorium provided an occasion for rejoicing. Pastor Sanford Downs was in charge of the morning service, and gave a pastoral message. The sermon was by President Israel A. Smith. In the afternoon there was an informal homecoming and acknowledgment service with A. E. Boos in charge. At the evening service, Frank D. White was in charge, with Bishop W. N. Johnson giving the sermon. The many features of the program were interesting, but cannot be recounted here.

The booklet issued on the occasion, the source of most of the information given here, was edited by Howard Downs (son of the pastor) and Frances Hartman. They acknowledge gratefully the assistance of Mrs. John T. Jones, historian of the congregation for a number of years.

Satan Quoted Scripture

By Joseph A. Ferris

JESUS AND SATAN were on a pinnacle of the temple, and the Devil said to Jesus, "Cast thyself down; for it is written, they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone."—Matthew 4: 6. Satan distorted Scripture by omission.

This Scripture that Satan quoted is in the ninety-first Psalm. Satan omitted seven words, "To keep thee in all thy ways." This refers to the godly, that all during their lives on earth, while saints were "godly," under direction of God Almighty angels will have charge of the faithful, to "keep them in all" their ways. To make this ninety-first Psalm apply to Jesus only, the Devil left out the statement that angels will assist the godly in all their ways. Of course this would include times when they would be tempted. So Satan left out the statement which covers every act of their lives and emphasized, "And in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone."

The Devil asked Jesus to jump off the high pinnacle of the temple, wanting Christ to prove that he was the Son of God. He quoted Scripture to show if he did jump and if indeed Jesus were the Son of God, that angels would guard him and bear him up in their hands, preventing any harm from coming to him.

More than one person has told me that Satan was "good at quoting Scripture." The only time I know of that the Devil quoted Scripture was the instance referred to, and although he was cunning and deceitful, he was far from being "good" at quoting Scripture when he quoted part of the ninety-first Psalm in his vain attempt to persuade Jesus to jump off a pinnacle of the temple.

THE SECURITY OF THE GODLY

The heading of the ninety-first Psalm is "The Security of the Godly," proving that the Lord had given his angels charge to protect the godly in all their ways in life. The heading of this Scripture in the Catholic Bible is "The Just is Secure Under the Protection of God." This agrees perfectly with the heading in the Inspired Version. The fact that Jesus was slain on the cross proves that this Scripture Satan quoted did not apply especially to Jesus. Being nailed to the cross took his life, which was much more severe than merely dashing his foot against a stone.

Jesus said to the chief priests and others, "Ye are of your father the Devil, and his deeds will ye do." In the book of Revelation Jesus warns against just such work as Satan did when he quoted the Scripture in question. To add to, or take from the word of God is doing the work of Satan, and the punishment is very terrible.

Part III: The Winning of W. W. Blair

MEETING W. W. BLAIR

Night came on us as we reached East Paw Paw, where Brother Blair was living, and we went to his store. He and his clerks were waiting on customers who seemed to fairly crowd the room. I knew Brother Blair, but he did not notice me so particularly as he did Brother Gurley. I introduced Brother Gurley as "Mr. Gurley" to him. At that he at once gave some directions to his clerks about shutting up the store, etc., and then turned to me and said, "Let us go home." Soon as we stepped out of the store he turned to us and said, "Who is this Mr. Gurley? Is it Elder Zenos Gurley?"

I replied, "It is Samuel Gurley, his son, and we are on a mission."

He exclaimed, "Oh, I am so glad to see you! I never was so glad to see anyone in my life! What news have you?"

I at once informed him it had been revealed to us by the Spirit of prophecy that little Joseph would soon take his father's place, and it was his right by lineage.

He replied, "I do not know about that, but I am glad to see you anyway." When we reached the house he introduced us to his wife, who very coolly said, "Good evening," and soon got us some supper. As we sat down to the table Brother Blair told us to be at home and eat our supper, but to excuse him and he would build a fire in the sitting room. As soon as the room was warm we went in, and Brother Blair again expressed himself as being extremely glad to meet us, and said, "As we are going to talk on matters of great importance, I suggest we have a word of prayer first." We readily assented; in fact, we too felt the spirit of prayer. He led, and we each prayed in turn, and when we arose from our knees I introduced Brother Gurley as the speaker, saying, "You now have the floor. Enter into business at once, and I will take the lounge, as I have nothing to say." They both demurred, saying, "I guess you will have something to say, too." I replied, "No, I am a spectator tonight." As I was very weary I reclined on the couch, and they were soon in earnest debate. Brother Blair believed that Joseph was a fallen prophet, hence had nothing to descend to his posterity; that the choice seer would be a descendant of Joseph, son of Lehi, and therefore would be an Indian or a Lamanite. In fact, at this time he was inclined to favor the views of James Colin Brewster. His tongue was loosed and his mind filled with thoughts to successfully oppose Brother Gurley in everything he brought up.

GURLEY CONFUSED AND CRYING

Brother Gurley was baffled and much confused. I thought several times that I would help him out, but instead of entering into the conversation or debate, I would refer to some of our prayer meetings and experiences in relation to the gifts that we had enjoyed at Zarahemla, and promises we had received, which seemed to encourage Brother Gurley, and again he would renew his argument. Thus matters continued in a spirited contention and debate until three o'clock in the morning, after which Brother Blair said, "I guess we had better retire, and we will continue this controversy in the morning." He showed us our rooms and bade us good night.

Soon as Brother Blair left us, Brother Gurley burst into tears and sobbed like a child. He said, "I am confounded and can't say anything, and you don't try. We might as well go home." I felt very sorry for Brother Gurley, yet I could see what the messenger had told me on the cars was coming true . . . I did not know how it would be brought about, but I was certain we would have the victory in the end and Brother Blair would see the light. . . .

When I awoke the sun was shining brightly. Brother Gurley was very much overcome. He said, "I have not slept a wink tonight, and you have been sleeping like a log. We might as well go home. I am confounded and can't talk, and you don't try."

I replied, "Do not get discouraged. I guess it will come out all right." All the burden had left me, and I felt we were in the hands of the Lord, and he would deliver us so we would not be finally confounded, although I could not yet see how it would be done.

We got up and united in prayer before we left our room. Brother Gurley felt better, and tried to be cheerful as we met the family. Breakfast over, we retired to the sitting room, and after we had all joined in prayer again, Brother Gurley led in the conversation. . . .

They continued the debate until ten o'clock, when Brother Blair went out after wood to build a fire. As soon as he left the room, Brother Gurley burst into tears and cried out, "I am confounded, and I will give it up. We might as well go home!" I involuntarily replied, "I am glad of it." Brother Blair returned with a smile on his face, and while he was putting wood into the stove he remarked, "Brethren, all I want is the truth. I do not care how it comes," and just as he sat down the Spirit of the Lord rested upon me in power and I took up the Book of Mormon, intending to find Lehi's prophecy to his son Joseph and his quotation in relation to the choice seer and read it, but instead of finding it, I read the following words: "I will forgive whom I will; and have mercy on whom I will have mercy." I then commenced expounding those passages of Scripture they had been discussing, and delivered a prophecy, declaring that Joseph would soon come forth as prophet and president of the church. When I sat down, Brother Gurley arose and prophesied the coming of Joseph, saying it was his right according to the law of lineage and the blessing of his father upon him. Brother Blair in a flood of tears immediately said, "Brethren, pray for me! One living prophet is worth more than a hundred dead prophets."

BLAIR CONVERTED

Brother Gurley then led in prayer. Brother Blair was converted, and we had a season of rejoicing together. We knew that the Lord was with us in very deed by the power of the Holy Ghost. Brother Gurley was ever so happy, realizing that God had delivered him from all the trials and distress of mind which he had suffered. From that time on, while we were at Brother Blair's, we had a feast of gladness and joy in the Holy Ghost. . . .

Growing Shadows

By Robert Tate Allan

Editor's Note: No one can be at all conversant with current events without sensing the development of certain issues involving the Roman Catholic Church and a stiffening of resistance on the part of Protestants. The POAU (Protestant and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State) is apparently becoming more militant. This has aroused certain Catholic orders.

Mr. Robert Tate Allan has recently written for "The Washington Daily News" columns a summary of the present status of the controversy. The "News" kindly consents to let us use his article, which is as follows:

Two Catholic Groups Call Critics "Religious Bigots"

Two national Catholic organizations today branded as "religious bigots" the organization of Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State.

The statements come from the Catholic War Veterans of the United States and the D. C. Knights of Columbus. They were in answer to criticism voiced last night at a mass meeting in Constitution Hall.

Author Paul Blanshard and Dr. Edwin McNeill Poteat, POAU president, charged that "a fundamental conflict exists between the ideals of democracy and the political ambitions of the Roman Catholic Church."

"DISUNITY"

Officials of Catholic War Veterans, of which Donald J. McQuade is commander, charged the POAU with "creating disunity by unproved accusations, and by distortions and misrepresentations against the spiritual leaders of 26,000,000 American Catholics."

"Fair-minded Americans" should recognize POAU "as a self-seeking, articulate minority, dynamized by professionals and aligned with forces that misunderstand Catholic teachings," declared the statement. It added:

"They will challenge the right of POAU, which numbers but a few thousands at the most, to express the views of Protestants and Jews—generally. And they will repudiate it—as many already have done—for sowing the seeds of misunderstanding and bigotry against their Catholic fellow-citizens."

KNIGHT'S STATEMENT

C. Eugene Nichols, state deputy of the Knights of Columbus, said in his statement:

"The Catholic position on church-state relations in the United States is a matter of record. Let it be repeated that Catholics uphold the sound American principle that church and state should be separate—but not antagonistic. They reaffirm that if Catholics ever constitute a majority here they would not seek a union of church and state. They would, then as now, recognize their moral obligations as Catholics to uphold and defend the United States Constitution and its amendments. POAU, unfortunately, misrepresents and maligns that position."

NOCTURNAL PRAYERS

Members of the Nocturnal Adoration Society, a Catholic laymen's group, meeting last night at the Shrine of the Sacred Heart, 16th St. and Park Road NW, offered prayers for "enlightenment of POAU in regard to the principles of the Catholic Church."

Mr. Blanshard, author of the best-seller American Freedom and Catholic Power, in his address claimed there are "five deadly parallels between Vatican policy and Kremlin policy."

"LIKE ITALY & SPAIN"

Mr. Blanshard charged "the Catholic hierarchy is trying to break down the wall of separation between church and state in this country as it has done in Italy, Spain, Portugal, Belgium and Germany," and added that "the chief American battlefield on that issue for the next decade will be the education committee of Congress."

"The first skirmish is on the issue of school buses for parochial

Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Question:

I am a new member of the church and would like to interest some of my friends in it. How do you suggest I commence?
Australia F. P.

Answer:

We would suggest, first of all, that you continue your relationship as a friend and intensify that relationship by kind deeds and a spirit of helpfulness. Always be sure to grant to your friends respect for their choices and judgments. In other words, give full respect to their faith and seek to help them understand that you have all they have, but even more.

Always be prayerful, remembering that humility of spirit and contrition of heart is more likely to open the door to the mind of your friends than any other approach.

Make the proper kind of literature available to those you seek to win to the faith. In this matter it is not well to overburden them with a great abundance of reading matter, but give them a little at a time of that which you feel might interest them.

Then see that your friends have an invitation to come to church, particularly when something of special interest is going on at the place of worship. Such friends should have an earnest and sincere invitation to your home and an opportunity for friendship which can develop into brotherhood.

When a minister of your faith who is particularly qualified is available, make an opportunity for him to meet your friends to discuss with them the points of faith which have already been under consideration but which may need further elaboration than you have been able to give.

Question:

Can a church of only 150,000 people possibly hope to establish the new order of Zion?
Australia F. P.

Answer:

Not by themselves. But "with God all things are possible." The size of the church is quite important. The Lord made this clear many years ago when he said, "Let my army become very great." But although numbers are important, quality and numbers are even more important. That is why the Lord went on "... and let it be sanctified before me: ..."

Question:

Why do we as a church believe in and practice close Communion?
Colorado C. B. W.

Answer:

We are close Communionists because we are an authoritative church. We teach that because an apostasy caused a rejection of the church and a loss of priesthood authority during the Dark Ages, a restoration was necessary. Without such a restoration, there was no church or ministry on earth with authority to represent or commit God in the ordinances of salvation, such as baptism and the laying on of hands.

The Communion is properly reserved for those who have made a definite, authoritative covenant through baptism and confirmation, thus becoming members of Christ's restored church on earth. Partaking of the Communion is a public avowal and pledge of continued adherence to that covenant. In reason, therefore, those who have made no such covenant through the ministry of an authoritative priesthood, have no right to participate or share in an ordinance which pledges continued remembrance of that covenant.

Neither have those who have made such a covenant any right to partake of Communion administered under any other authority than that under which they made the covenant in the first place. To do so would be to deny the unique authority which we believe exists in our own church and to recognize the authority of others as valid. If valid authority exists elsewhere, then our unique concept of restoration is fallacious, and our priesthood and our church are superfluous among the multitudinous denominations of Christianity today.

EVAN A. FRY

Question:

We are expecting a missionary series in a month or two. What preparation can we make to insure a successful series?
Australia F. P.

Answer:

Perhaps the initial effort should be to see that a prospect list has been developed in the branch and that each member of the church has an opportunity to contribute his part to the growth of such a list of prospective members.

Preparation for such meetings should be made in the spirit of prayer and right-living among Saints. In fact, it would be well prior to the meetings contemplated to have a number of prayer services particularly dedicated to the success of the effort.

To succeed in this kind of endeavor it is essential to have a united priesthood, not simply the unity of ideal which already exists, but a spiritual unity of individuals that they shall be one in an effort to arouse the congregation and to inspire the people to make the best of the series once it is begun.

Weeks before the beginning of such an effort there should be cottage meetings held in the homes of people who have a sincere desire to know more about the truth. The prospects in these homes can well increase the interest by inviting others to come and partake of the ministry of those who have responsibility for the cottage meeting effort.

The congregation should be so inspired and so directed that each person is willing to make an endeavor to bring another. Let there be running through such an effort the spirit of "Each One Win One." If this can be stimulated in the minds and hearts of the membership, success will attend the endeavor.

come a different church, different in doctrines and tenets, and entirely different in organizational functioning; while the Saints who brought together the faithful members of the original church continued to give their full allegiance to "the statutes, and the ordinances, and the law, and the commandments, which He [God] wrote" for the Church of Jesus Christ.

At another time I shall deal with the procedure followed in reforming the broken ranks of the church and demonstrate that the statutes, ordinances, law, and commandments given to the church were, as they have been ever since, the "guiding star" of the Reorganization.

schools," said Mr. Blanshard, "and if the hierarchy persuades the Federal taxpayers to assume that burden, we will soon be on the high road to the European system of church-state alliance."

"TWO IMPERIALISMS"

Calling for "consistent and frank dealing with the Vatican as we now have with the Kremlin," the speaker said:

"We are confronted with two forms of foreign imperialism that are both animated by their own type of self-interest. We should not recognize the Vatican by sending an ambassador unless we are prepared to tell the Vatican to keep hands off American institutions in the same way we tell the Kremlin. If we do send an ambassador, we should also send one, in order to be consistent, to the Chief Rabbi of Jerusalem, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Moscow Patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church."

A Testimony

I was baptized into the church when I was fifteen, but before my baptism I had a rich spiritual experience. My mother had joined when I was eight. Several years later she became ill and, since she had often cared for tubercular patients, she believed she was developing tuberculosis. As she grew steadily worse, she called my younger sister, my brother, and me to her side and told us how she wanted us to live if she were unable to rear us. I was heart-broken to think she might not live, but I prayed for her often and made covenants with God of things I would do if she could be spared. Although she had been quite ill, she drove with father to a conference in Clear Lake, Indiana, so that she could receive administration. Most people thought she was foolish to ride seventy miles in a buggy when her very life was at stake, but she did, and when she returned from that conference she was as well as she had ever been. One of the covenants I had made when asking for her recovery was that I would join the church if she were healed. However, I kept putting it off for three years. Once I was baptized, I had what seemed to me a great spiritual experience. I was made to know that Christ is my Savior and that I should trust him. My whole body was filled with his spirit.

When I was seventeen I moved to Belding, Michigan, and became active in the church work there. I served in several offices, but since I particularly wanted to teach, I studied and prayed that I might make my greatest contribution in that field. After my husband and I were married, we established our home in Montana and a branch was organized at Andes where we lived. We helped with the work there, and it is gratifying to see that some of the young people who used to attend meetings in that branch are now actively engaged in serving the church.

Everyone needs his own personal testimony. I once heard a man say that his father had told him in his youth, "John, my testimony of the truthfulness of this gospel and our Lord is not enough for you. I want you to seek the Lord very humbly so that you will have your own testimony to lead you into all truth. You must know for yourself."

God loves all the laborers in his vineyard. We should begin in our youth and have our parents help us develop spiritually, but we must each, individually, make our own choices and discover God. It will soon be fifty years since I covenanted to serve my Lord, and he has been near me all the while. Truly it has been written, "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance."

"Zion Shall Flourish"

By Ruth Lewis Holman

SUE WAS TIRED—very tired! "How can I get through this day? Surely God doesn't require so much from one weak mortal!" She mused and stopped her sewing machine abruptly, feeling sorry for herself. She seldom spent time on self-pity, and her years of training conquered now. Picking up the coat she was making for one of her twins she resumed work. The last week had been exceptionally hard on her. The nine-year-old twins, Jean and June, had been exposed to measles. When they developed colds, Sue kept them home from school. That was four days ago. The colds cleared and no further measles symptoms appeared. But the twins were restless and demanded, rather vehemently, that they be permitted to return to school that afternoon. However, Sue thought it would be better to wait another day.

"But, Mother, we're so tired of staying home," Jean pleaded. Sue took time out from her regular duties to help them practice their piano lessons. Then she played games with them for a couple of hours, trying to keep them happily busy.

"Mother, have you forgot that the Skylarks meet today?" June asked suddenly.

"No, my dear little reminder, I have not. As much as I dislike leaving you, I'll have to leave now," she answered.

"Let us go too," Jean begged.

"I'm sorry, but it wouldn't be wise to let you go after being kept at home all week. Why don't you try your hand at cooking? That will count on your awards, and you do have to make up on that point, you know. Arrange your menu and prepare supper while I'm gone. Elbert will be home from school about six. 'Bye now," and Sue kissed the girls hastily and left before they had a chance to protest.

Ten little Skylarks attended the meeting that afternoon at the church. In spite of her weariness, Sue enjoyed the meeting. She was a very efficient leader, and had prepared herself for this work by taking leadership training courses. She also had taken a special course in handcraft. She prayed daily for physical strength and ability to use her talents in a wise manner.

When her pastor asked for Skylark leaders, Sue said, "I'll try to do my best to teach the girls, especially those whose mothers do not have time to devote to them." She had been teaching in church school for a number of years. The longer she taught the more she realized that one hour on Sunday was not enough to train girls who, before long, would be "mothers in Zion." So for the past two years she had been serving as a Skylark leader also. However, being a wife, a homemaker, and a mother of three very active children was almost a full-time job, and Sue was indeed weary.

After the Skylarks left the church that afternoon, she made a decision. "I've done my share. I will give up this additional work."

George was late in getting home from work and while waiting for him Sue sat down to rest. Leaning her head over a table, she instantly fell asleep.

"Sue, wake up and come with me!"

"Did some one call me? Oh, I must have fallen asleep! I was so tired," she said. Looking up she saw a young man neatly dressed in a dark suit. He was smiling at her, and his right hand was outstretched.

"Come with me," he urged. Unhesitatingly she arose, surprised to find her weariness had disappeared. It did not occur to her to ask, "Where?" Neither did she seem surprised that this man had come instead of George, her husband.

"Feeling rested now?" he asked as she followed him out of the church.

"Oh, yes, I'm not one bit tired," she answered. As they walked along she realized she was always just a few steps behind her guide, for surrounding him was a brilliant halo of light. She felt the wonderful radiance but was never permitted to step within the circle of light.

"Would you be interested in a bird's-eye view of the girls in your home town?" the man asked. "Would you like to see how they work and play?"

"I would like that very much," she assured him. "I've often wondered how girls—outside my own band—spend their time."

"Fine. We will visit two or three schools and then look into some of the homes."

Sue was conscious of walking, still no effort was involved. "This must be walking on air," she thought. They traveled swiftly and soon arrived at the school nearest her home. It was recess, and the children were playing in various groups on the schoolground. She knew some of them and was glad to see they were clean and neat. She heard them talking, and her guide said, "Listen carefully and mark the difference in conversation among the groups." She did so, and was thrilled when she heard the girls talking of their plans for after-school activities, for being helpful at home and taking part in school, church, and community affairs.

About fifty feet from these girls was another group of girls and boys. The boys were fighting, and the girls were urging them on. They had scowling faces and talked in a harsh, coarse manner. "How terrible for children to act and talk that way!" Sue exclaimed and started to walk toward them. But the man reached out a restraining hand and said, "You can't reach them that way! . . . Come now, and we will visit another school on the other side of the city." As they left Sue was disturbed to think such conditions existed where her own children were obliged to attend school.

In a very short time they arrived at another school, and Sue saw the same conditions there. One group of children was happy and contented. Another stood watching these children play and seemed to wish they could join in the fun. A few of the older ones were talking in low tones, and Sue heard them planning their after-school "fun" which was anything but wholesome. Again she was disturbed.

"Why are these children allowed to talk and act this way? They must be reached and taught differently," she said to her guide as she lingered, wondering how she could help them. But the man spoke softly to her, "Come, we must hurry. The children will be going home from school now, and we'll stop in a few homes. You will understand better why the children are this way."

First they visited the home of a little girl whom Sue knew. Her mother worked part time. Lily was washing the dishes and singing as she worked. Her younger brother was helping to straighten up the rest of the house. Lily said, "Thanks, Bud. Mother will be home in an hour. If we get everything cleaned up she can take over, and then we can play."

"How thoughtful!" Sue smiled. "Evidently that mother takes time to teach her children even though she works away from home."

Their next stop was at a home in the more pretentious residential section. Two little girls were entering their yard. "Hurry, Gladys! We'll ditch our books and then tell mother we have to go to practice for a school play. She won't know the difference. She's so wrapped up in the bridge club she's entertaining!" Gladys held back a bit. "But that'd be lying." Louisa grabbed her sister's hand and said, "Aw-w—come on, don't be such a baby. I promised the boys at school we'd meet them at the corner at 4:15." Still Gladys hesitated, but again Louisa pulled her along, saying, "Mother doesn't care what we do just so we have fun, and I know this will be fun." Finally Gladys halfheartedly went along.

"There ought to be a law against this," Sue said emphatically and started after them. But again the man reminded her. "No, Sue, you can't reach them merely by saying, 'Stop!'"

They visited several homes. Some were poorly furnished but neat and clean. Others were just the opposite. Some children were busy, working and playing. Some were idle or getting into mischief.

"Why do the parents of these children permit them to roam the streets?" Sue asked. "Why don't they teach them at home? Surely these are not representative of the average home."

The man nodded assent. "I could show you many, many more. Ever since the world began people have assumed the responsibility of parenthood without fully comprehending their real duties. Of necessity some mothers work. Others prefer working away from home as the steady home grind upsets their nerves, so their children grow up without adequate training. Fathers often shirk their responsibility, feeling that the duty of rearing children belongs to the mother.

"Only mothers like you realize the need for training children and undertake the arduous task of teaching others as well as your own."

"I have felt it was my duty to teach the children the best I could. But I became weary and discouraged. So today I made my decision. I will quit and let some other women do their share. It's not fair that a few assume all the responsibility," she explained.

The man listened attentively, then said, "When the gospel was restored to this earth the Saints needed leaders, teachers, and preachers. The Lord spoke to them many times. One of the most beautiful promises made was, 'Zion shall flourish, and the glory of the Lord shall be upon her, and she shall be an ensign unto the people, and there shall come unto her out of every nation under heaven.'"

"How do you think Zion shall flourish unless these children are properly taught? You are seeing a partial fulfillment of this revelation today, for in your city, from time to time, you will find people from every nation under heaven." He paused and Sue said thoughtfully, "Yes, I believe we do have people here from every part of the world."

Then the man asked, "Would you like to know of a surety that 'Zion shall flourish' and be an ensign to the world?"

"Indeed I would. I believe it with all my heart, but we are so far from it now! Sometimes I am doubtful of its ever happening," and her tone emphasized her doubt.

"Don't despair. Do your part with the girls; help others to see and feel the need for working as you have seen and felt it. 'Be not weary in well-doing, for ye are laying the foundation of a great work. And out of small things proceedeth that which is great!'" The powerful assurance accompanying this statement brought tears to Sue's eyes and a strong conviction of truthfulness to her soul.

"That sounds very familiar!" Sue said. "Where have I heard it before?" Pondering on this for a few seconds, she did not miss the man nor realize he was gone. Then remembering she looked in his direction but he was not there.

Straightening up she exclaimed, "Gracious me, I've been asleep and dreaming! I was so tired, but now I feel refreshed! Surely this was not merely a dream or figment of the imagination! God must have sent this personage to teach me, and I know he has sent his Spirit."

Religion on Trial - Part IV

Why Doesn't God Who Is all Powerful Stop the Misery, War, and Poverty on the Earth?

SIXTY GRACELAND STUDENTS writing on this question were of almost unanimous opinion that for God to "pass a miracle" of this kind would be contrary to his nature and the laws of the universe. He has given man his agency and has, as Milton states it, made him "sufficient to have stood, though free to fall." God will help, but not to the extent of robbing man of his freedom of choice and his opportunity to work out his own salvation. The following excerpts are typical of the thinking of the students:

"Most people assume, in posing a question such as this, that God is all-powerful. My own concept is that God is first all-wise, all-intelligent, and perfect in capacity for eternal love. By very nature of this capacity, he is a creating being. He seeks to create that he may love his creation and that it may recognize and love him. He has always sought, in creating man, to bring into the universe a being close enough in nature to himself that the two can share in mutual love, in mutual knowledge, and in mutual creation. The only way in which a being can grow capable of such meaningful experiences with the Divine Power is for that being to be a free, self-directing creature—a being with agency. Robots and puppets can never love, nor have they the capacity for a soul which shares and experiences with God. God is all powerful in creating everything in the universe except a loving, eternal soul—that soul must help to create itself."

"God is not a genie who touches a magic wand for all bad things to disappear in a cloud of smoke.

Neither does he move man about as a little toy to satisfy the needs of the world, or to adjust man to his environment, or to get man out of the scrapes he gets into. Instead, God is a wise Father who lets his child—man—take all the consequences of his actions, enjoyable or miserable. Whenever God begins to perform large-scale miracles to stop all the misery in existence, man's priceless free agency will be gone too!"

"When God gave man his free agency, he gave him a soul, a conscience, and the power to do good on the earth. It is up to man, therefore, to stop the wars he himself has made. Why pass the buck to God?"

"To stop the poorer fruits of man's agency—war, misery, and poverty—would mean getting rid of man, or staging a puppet show. Destruction of man would indicate God's plan of creation was a failure. A puppet show is not desirable. God instead counts on man to finish his task, that of building his kingdom on earth."

CLOSELY ALLIED to this question of agency, as some of these quotations have implied, is God's plan of salvation for man, the process by which "the soul must help to create itself." The students have this to say:

"God has a plan more intricate and more marvelous than man can imagine. There is a time when God will end these things but not until man and the world have evolved sufficiently to bring it about.

"God is waiting for the time when man will become intelligent enough to fulfill his stewardship to his greatest capacity, to allow the love of God to rule his heart. Then war, misery and poverty automatically will not exist because man will be too intelligent to allow them to have any place in the lives of people."

"If God removed all our problems, there would be no growth. We would become dependent upon him in a way which takes away human initiative. We would assert, as did the Apocalypticists, that God will in his own due time raise up and bowl over the wicked. All that he would require of us would be to wait, watch, and pray."

"Until we decide that peace and love are what we want more than power and wealth; until we lose our individual selfishness; until we open our hearts to God and prepare ourselves to live with our fellow man, God's hands are tied. He can help and sustain us in our moments of trial, but he will not actually remove our suffering. He can help us to make the right choices and decisions, but he will not make them for us."

"We learn to cope with fear through actually experiencing it; we learn to squelch greed, hate, vice, and selfishness by battling with them in a world that is full of them."

"The strains which now exist among mankind are contributory to the growth and development of something bigger and better. God works through man as a process, a slow progressive change."

"Man needs to find God even if it is by trial and error."

THERE WAS AN AWARENESS in many of the answers that suffering was visited upon the righteous and unrighteous alike, but it was always coupled with the belief that such suffering could contribute to the growth of man. The following quotation is a representative sample of this thought:

Graceland is one of twenty-four Iowa colleges chosen as testing centers in the United States Government's recently set-up deferment program for college students and high school graduates desiring to attend college. Under the program, deferment of a high school graduate is based upon the result of the test to be administered by the Educational Testing Service, and the deferment of a college student is based upon that or his rank in class as certified by his school.

"I wonder if God doesn't do us a favor when we are allowed to suffer. From this suffering can grow a deeper feeling and insight into our surroundings, goals, friends, etc. An understanding which is almost an inspiration can come from a walk down the path of pain, suffering, and war."
The great bulk of the responses centered around the three divisions indicated. A few students suggested that war might be a fulfillment of prophecy, that it was sometimes necessary to resist a tyrant, and that it might be God's means of decreasing the population for a new and better generation.
It is rather remarkable that not one paper stated that it would be desirable for God to remove the unpleasant conditions in the earth. These students were interested in a miracle, but they were aware that the greatest miracle of all was the human soul. When it comes in contact with the positive forces in the universe, when its aspirations become akin to those of God, it will truly be fashioned in his image. The "miracle" will come to fruition, and wars, poverty, and misery will be no more.

Sue sat meditating for a short time, then she got up and went to the door just as George drove up. He waved to her and said, "Sorry to be late, Dear, but I was busy at the office. Hope you didn't get tired of waiting." One glance at Sue's face answered his question.

"No, George, I'm glad you were late," she said and told him of her wonderful experience. "I'm still at a loss to know just where I've heard the statement the messenger made just before he left me."

"I think you'll find it in the Doctrine and Covenants," he suggested. "It's part of Section 64 in which the Saints are rebuked for not doing their part. While this was not given as direct instructions regarding children, it certainly is applicable to leaders of girls' and boys' church organizations, 'Be not weary of well doing for ye are laying the foundation of a great work, and out of small things proceedeth that which is great.' You know, Sue, if we continue doing our part Zion shall flourish."

Introducing

FRANK W. RUCKER, Independence, Missouri (page 5), has had great influence in the development of the Independence which we know today. Through the art of journalism he has influenced the thinking of community leaders, and his influence has always been on the side of a morally clean and civically progressive community. Mr. Rucker was born on a farm near Jacksonville, Illinois, in 1886, and acted as business manager of the high school paper, which was the start of his present career. In the same capacity he served on the student publication of the Illinois college at Jacksonville where he received his B.A. in 1910. The next two years he was reporter for the Jacksonville Journal, a daily newspaper. He received his B.J. degree from the University of Missouri in 1913, and immediately received four offers of employment; selecting the Independence Examiner as the choice of these. He became general manager of the Examiner in 1922 and president of the publishing company in 1950. The University of Missouri awarded him a "medal for distinguished service in journalism" during Journalism Week in 1932. While at the University he was a member of the Sigma Delta Chi and Kappa Tau Alpha, journalistic fraternities. He has served as president of the Missouri Associated Dailies, vice-president of the Board of Directors of the Inland Daily Press Association, president of the Independence Chamber of Commerce, the Independence Kiwanis Club, and the Knife and Fork Club. He belongs to the Masonic Order and is an active worker in the Methodist Church.

In 1914 he married Esther Asplund. They have one daughter, Mrs. John H. Bunyar of Wichita Falls, Texas.

Mr. and Mrs. Rucker are leaving their lovely home in Independence next month to take up residence in Columbia, Missouri, where he is to become an associate professor of journalism at the University.

CLIFFORD J. LONG, Independence, Missouri (page 8), was born, reared, and educated in Missouri, save for the two years he attended Graceland, receiving his A.A. degree in 1932. He was born in 1912, graduated from William Chrisman high school in Independence. He received his Bachelor of Journalism degree from the University of Missouri in 1934. He is now attending the University of Kansas City Law School, taking night courses which he hopes to finish next year. His hobbies are writing, photography, and gardening. He is a Naturalization Examiner for the U. S. Immigration and Naturalization Service in Kansas City.

In 1941 he married Mary Thistlethwaite and they have one daughter, Nola Jean.

He is an elder, belongs to the Stone Church congregation of Independence, and was formerly pastor at Grandview, Missouri, and director of religious education for Central Missouri Stake.

RUTH (Lewis) HOLMAN, Independence, Missouri, (page 18) is the daughter of Patriarch William Lewis and accompanied her father and mother to England on one of his missionary appointments. She was baptized in Llanelly, South Wales, and attended school in Cardiff and Llanelly for two years, though she completed high school in Scranton, Pennsylvania. Following this she took a business course at Lackawanna College in Pennsylvania and attended Missouri Wesleyan College for two years, and studied one year in the American School of Music. Following this she gave private voice lessons for two years. She traveled much throughout the States and Canada to report patriarchal blessings for her father, and in all reported over two thousand blessings which he gave to the Saints. In addition to this, she did some work for Patriarchs J. W. Wight and Ammon White.

In 1918 she married Mark Holman of Xenia, Illinois. They have one daughter, Margaret Ann, who is just graduating from Graceland. For a number of years she and Brother Holman owned and operated a drug store in Xenia, Illinois. She is a member of the Independence Music Club, formerly was a member of the Stone Church Choir, Messiah Choir, Aeolian Chorus, Gresty Quartet, and Stone Church Ladies' Quartet. She is a charter member of the "Pollyanna Club." She is now serving on the Headquarters Committee in charge of girl's work, and as a Counselor in the Independence Skylark-Oriole Administrative Council.

 AH, ME!

There are days (in which our need of help is infinite) when a man feels like the first cousin to a pretzel.

 REJECTION

Editors are always in search of some new rejection line for very poor manuscripts. Here is one we have thought of, but never dared to use: "Dear Brother: Couldn't we just agree to forget the whole thing, and not mention it again?"

 OBJECT LESSON

Try this for the benefit of the children. Take a good piece of writing paper, and with ink write such a phrase as "God is good" upon it. When it is dry, take a soft pencil and mark over the writing until it cannot be seen. Then use a soft eraser and rub over the place. The pencil marks will disappear. The ink will remain, and "God is good" will be seen again. What is good and right will remain. Inferior work will soon pass away.

 CHURCH WORK

This gem appeared in a manuscript recently: "One couple lived there who had been inactively engaged in church work for the past twenty years." Ah, how many, many members, like those two, are "inactively engaged" in church work. No wonder it goes so slowly!

 TYPEWRITER TROUBLE

Sister Jennie Elliott, a blind member who lives at the Catherine Hale Home in Kansas City, runs her typewriter by the touch system and produces articles and stories for church papers. Recently she wrote: "My typewriter and I have been in trouble again. Herbert Lively got around to see it this morning. I hate to bother him with it . . . but he's the only person I have now to help me with it. . . . It is probably the only typewriter in existence that has to have the elders of the church called when it gets sick!"

 DEATH AT SUNDOWN

It was nearly supper time, but the beleaguered little army in the vacant lot was unaware of it. A very young Hopalong Cassidy was there with a few trusted companions, outnumbered by the foe. Charley had planned a beautiful and dramatic end to his career. "Shoot me, Maurice—go ahead and shoot me!" he ordered. Maurice delayed, and his eyes wandered. "Please shoot me," Charley intoned. But the cap pistol remained in its gaudy holster. The execution had to wait. Maurice, with his six years of philosophical calm, was tired of war, and turned his attention to the sand pile where a castle of dreams waited its completion. . . . Some mother at a back door raised her voice in an off-key soprano to call her son to supper, and suddenly the small warriors remembered their appetites. As the sun turned to a deeper orange color and dipped into the horizon, the battlefield was deserted.

The truth will judge you, whether you can understand it or not. Therefore, try to understand.

News and Notes

COLUMBIA HAS DEDICATION

President W. Wallace Smith, Bishops G. L. DeLapp and Willard Becker met with the group at Columbia, Missouri, May 20, to dedicate the new meeting place. A large house has been purchased, portions of it remodeled and re-decorated for a chapel. The balance is used as living quarters for students attending the University of Missouri. A number of former students instrumental in inaugurating and helping carry out this project, returned for the day. Some were from Independence, Princeton, Conception Junction, and St. Louis. A delicious basket lunch prepared by the women was served at noon. The group is to be congratulated for the way they have carried out this project. Brother Harold Condit is pastor. Harry Simons, president of the Central Missouri Stake, who has been active in guiding the project, was unable to be present for this meeting.

FROM THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC

Comparative statements of General Church contributions, contributors, and tithing statement filers for the year 1950 have been mailed from the office of the Presiding Bishopric to bishops, bishop's agents, district presidents, and church appointees in the United States, Canada, and Hawaii. These reports rank each district and stake as to the percentage of membership contributing, the amount contributed per member, and the percentage filing tithing statements during the year. For the General Church, the percentage of contributors has increased to 26.3; the amount contributed per member to $9.86; and the percentage filing tithing statements to 11.43.

PROGRESS IN UTAH

News of progress in the Utah area has been received in a letter from Seventy Russell Ralston. Brother Ralston said, "Elder James Everett, appointee president of the Provo, Utah, Branch, was able to reap some of the fruits of his conscientious and intelligent work of past months as he inducted nine people, six of them adults, into the church. This service united four families and brought another in the church."

MUSIC DIRECTOR HONORED

Franklyn S. Weddle was initiated at the University of Kansas City as an honorary member of Epsilon Mu Chapter of Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia, men's national professional music fraternity May 19. Other church members taking part in the service were Max T. Steele, warden; and Charles P. Denny, Jr., secretary of the chapter. A banquet followed the initiation, after which Brother Weddle gave a talk concerning his work with the church and the Community Music Association of Independence. Brother Weddle is the first honorary member of Epsilon Mu Chapter, which was formed only last year.

SPRING RIVER CONFERENCE

A special conference for the Spring River District was held at the Ozark Reunion Grounds May 20. The purpose of the conference was to approve the ordination of a number of men to the priesthood. Six hundred people attended the conference which opened with a class by District President Stephen Black. His subject was "Joseph Smith—Was He a Prophet?" A fellowship followed the class, and the morning sermon was given by Elder D. O. Chesworth of the Council of Twelve. The afternoon was given to a business meeting and an ordination service.

LATTER DAY SAINTS teach the ideals of "seeking first the kingdom" and of "doing one's job the best he can do it." These two ideals are personified in Gladys. She had only one year in high school, but her education has never stopped. Her hunger for knowledge has led her to take advantage of every opportunity for more formal training. When advanced courses were offered in the Independence Institute of Arts and Sciences, she took all that her time and strength would permit. She was graduated in 1928.

She was born in Clitherall, Minnesota, and her mother was a "Cutlerite." She took teacher training at the Minnesota State Normal School and taught in rural schools for seven years. Then she enrolled for the secretarial course at Grace-land, which she completed in 1921. Since then she has done stenographic work in general church offices. During these thirty years she has worked for the church architect, the local bishop, the social service bureau, the Presiding Bishopric, and since 1942 for the First Presidency.

Her hobbies are books (especially poetry and scrapbooks) and flowers. She is a shrub and bulb gardener and is skilled in flower arranging. Her keen intellect gives her a sense of humor of which only her intimate associates are aware. She likes to write and does well in the juvenile story field. She has contributed many times to Daily Bread and the Saints' Herald. During the last three years she has finished college extension courses in literature and creative writing from the University of Kansas.

Gladys is secretary to the Gudgell Park congregation and she has taught in the church school children's department many years.

The Problems of Children

Editorial

"The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge."—Ezekiel 18:2.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY, the popular term for identifying our topic, is one of those things invented by adults to be pushed upon children. We wash our hands of them, and put them away by themselves in a sort of social quarantine, disclaiming responsibility for them.

Whenever a child gets into trouble, you may be sure that somewhere there are adults to blame.

"Juvenile delinquents" isn't a very fair name for children in trouble. One social writer said, "The principal cause of juvenile delinquents is delinquent parents."

For the children who are delinquent, trouble has begun long before with home and society doing nothing to remedy it. There are times, too, when society is delinquent.

* * * *

VANDALS invaded the beautiful Country Club Plaza during the last Christmas season and destroyed a large statue of Rudolph the Red Nosed Reindeer and other holiday decorations erected there for the pleasure of young visitors seeing the lights. People were horrified by everything but the suffering and maladjustment of the boys who did the damage.

Vandals broke the windows in a warehouse and a school. Vandals upset the flowerpots in a lawn. Vandals wrote swear words in chalk on the sidewalks.

Who were those vandals? What was the cause of their trouble? Did anybody care?

Police, teachers, social workers—all say that these destructive persons, juvenile delinquents, come mostly from broken or unhappy homes. They are children in trouble.

Let us be very careful here to make the distinction clear. For the moment we are letting go by the fact that adults are having trouble with these juveniles. We are emphasizing the point that the juveniles are having trouble—trouble with the world and with the people in it.

* * * *

THE CHILD is a stranger in the world, a new immigrant to our country, a pilgrim finding a home in a foreign land. He needs all possible help: material necessities, protection, love, kindness, and care.

If we do our duty by him, his chances are very good for a normal, wholesome, happy development into good citizenship. If we fail, he gets into trouble. He may even be hurt and receive the punishment for our mistakes. Then, unmindful of our responsibility for his condition, we label him a "juvenile delinquent."

* * * *

THE MISSOURI ASSOCIATION FOR SOCIAL WELFARE published in December, 1950, a fine illustrated pamphlet entitled You Can Help Stop Juvenile Delinquency.

Here are a few of its many interesting and significant passages:

"Part of a child's growing up is learning what truth is, what belongs to him, how to control feelings like anger and jealousy. When a child has someone to help and understand him, growing up is not too difficult. . . . When the child does not get the help he needs . . . he may become a delinquent. Someone, somewhere, has failed—his parents, his teachers, his church, or maybe even in a broader sense the community."

Speaking of the child's need, the author says, "Love is the greatest essential. If understanding can be added to it, all the better."

Well, there you have it, borrowed directly from the gospel. The child needs love and understanding, and he needs it on an individual basis. If the home and society can provide that, they can help. If not, they are helpless.

What must be done to help any specific problem of juvenile delinquency depends on the individual and circumstances. Some need medical care. Some need financial help in the homes. Some need jobs. Some need friendship. Some need religion.

Communities can organize to see that widows and orphans get the means to live. This can prevent some cases of juvenile delinquency. They can provide playgrounds and supervised recreation, which will give great help. Social service, intelligent probation officers, play, opportunity for individuals to develop and provide for themselves—these humanitarian fields all offer opportunities to change children from potential criminals to potential good citizens.

* * * *

THE CHURCH has a great opportunity for service in connection with the children. It can be the expression of the organized love and good will of the people. Individually and as a group we can do much to keep informed as to the needs of the children and their families, and do something to help. Whatever needs to be done, that should be done.

To the loving heart, no rules are necessary. Intelligence is needed of course. Loving intelligence will keep alert to do what needs to be done for each individual and his home.

Above all, if we see that the children's teeth are set on edge, let us remember the words of the prophet.

Fathers' Day

Sunday, June 17, is designated as Fathers' Day. This will be a good opportunity for all pastors to bring a message in harmony with the suggestion of the National Fathers' Day Committee on the subject of "A Good Home Means Good Citizenship." This will give all an opportunity to emphasize the sacred bonds and duties of fatherhood. This is a very important area of our ministry and its importance is brought to our attention even by such men as Senator Kefauver in his recent statement while in Kansas City that we should give direction to guide our young folks away from crime.

We trust that these suggestions can be followed out and emphases be given from our pulpits on this date.

A letter from Kenneth C. Briggs shows that some of our boys in service are getting together for worship and trying to do some missionary work in Japan. A part of his letter follows:

"Before we were taken into the army, Richard Hocker, Wesley Nunamaker, Roland Postlewaite, Charles Bickle, and I attended church at the Temple City Branch in the Los Angeles Stake. We were taken into active duty with the Fortieth Division on September 1, 1950, and are now serving in Japan. At the present time, we are stationed at Camp Schimmelpfing in Sendai which is located about 200 miles above Tokyo on the seacoast. We have organized into a small worship group and meet on Sunday mornings and Wednesday evenings.

"Since we organized ourselves two weeks ago, we have brought two young men into our midst and seem to be making good headway with them, in all ways.

"We have been studying as much about the Japanese as possible, as we feel someday it may benefit the spreading of God's word."

The Kemps Leave Hawaii

We are glad to share with our readers the following editorial tribute from the Hilo Tribune-Herald of Sunday, April 8, 1951, as the Kemps left to take up their new assignment at Portland, Oregon:

THEY ARE COMMUNITY ASSETS

The Rev. and Mrs. James Kemp during their residence in Hilo have established a unique niche for themselves. These two talented individuals have given endlessly of their time and fine musical ability to the community, and around them and depending more or less upon their leadership and initiative were the beginnings of new participation and appreciation in the field of music.

Seldom can it be said, literally, of an individual that "we can't do without him," but this seems to be the case with the Hilo Symphonic Ensemble and Mr. Kemp. Besides his contribution in this field, Mr. Kemp's work with the children of Waiakea and the juvenile court has been a further asset. Hilo regretfully sees them go.

Brother Kemp has just completed a four-year mission in the Hawaiian Islands. He labored for a year in Spokane, Washington, before going to the Islands. He is a native of Springfield, Missouri, and married Helen Delores Hoefgen in 1940. Their daughter, Jacqueline Sue, is now two years old.

The Word

By E. Gladys Gould

"In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God . . ."¹

IT LIES NOW upon our bookshelves—the record of this Word which was in the beginning in the mind of God—his plan for man's creation, redemption, and way of life. As this plan began to unfold and creation in the spirit realm took form, the "morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy."²

We have the record, from Genesis to Malachi, of man's groping for the way of life. Meanwhile, the Word was being taught to Adam by an angel, spoken by the voice of Jehovah to Abraham, traced in stone by the finger of God at Sinai, and revealed through prophets to direct mankind to the Living Word which would walk among men, lighting their way.

Then the Word became Flesh.

From Matthew to Revelation, we have the testimony of witnesses that the Son of God did walk upon the earth and did become the way, truth, light, and life. Such is the claim of the Bible.

Recently a teen-ager asked me, "Why did people back in the beginning believe that the Bible was true and not a fairy story?"

LOOKING BACK to the beginning, just outside the gates of Eden, we find Adam telling his children the truths of creation—the wonders of the Garden, why they were on the outside, and the one way by which they might re-enter—as he had been taught by God's own voice, by an angel, and by the Holy Spirit.³ For some nine hundred years Adam told what he knew of the Word to his children's children. Also a book of remembrance was kept, "for it was given unto as many as called upon God, to write by the Spirit of inspiration."⁴ Such record was brought to America by the Jaredites.⁵ If duplicate records were left in the eastern world, they may not have been readable after the confusion of tongues at Babel. Yet it must have been the will of God that his plan should be known in all ages when men would receive it, and he searched the hearts of men for those who would make a record of his Word available. Finding such promise in Moses, God called him to a mountain top and, face to face, revealed through vision the whole earth and all the children of men, then dictated to Moses the story of creation.⁶ To this record Moses added the history of the Israelites as it unfolded under his leading. Thus the five Books of the Law came to us.

Later the books known as The Prophets were written as "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,"⁷ and each made a separate record of what was entrusted to him.

The story of Job, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Daniel were written and collected and called The Writings. The Psalms were treasured as hymns of worship.

These various writings were copied painstakingly by the scribes, some devoting their lives to the task of writing them by hand upon parchment rolls. It is even possible that fragments of the Scriptures were written with pen upon potsherds, an early method of recording. Many copies were lost in the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C., by Titus in 70 A.D., and by the decree of the King of Syria in 167 B.C. that all copies be destroyed. But the Jews risked their lives, and often gave them up, to protect the hidden manuscripts. In Babylonia, Ezekiel and Ezra preserved copies. In Egypt, Jews had translated their Scripture into Greek. This Greek Old Testament, called the Septuagint, was the Scripture used in the time of Christ and the Apostles.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD did come to the manger in Bethlehem and grew into the Word, to live and walk among men in the flesh, fully illustrating God's way of life for man. His disciples bore witness to what they actually knew of him, and their written experiences became the New Testament.

As Rome's power spread and took over the church of Christ, Latin became the language of the church rituals, and the Scriptures were translated from Hebrew to Latin by monks in their cloisters.

Monks introduced Christianity and their Latin Bible into Great Britain, translating it into English as they preached. The many dialects of the country made difficult a written translation of Scripture into English. But He in whose mind the Word had its conception was interested in its reaching the English people in their own tongue. In the mind of an Anglo-Saxon scholar, Bede, the desire to write an English Bible grew into a devotion which continued to the day of his death. Weak and in pain, he struggled to finish the Gospel of St. John. With the last words of the book his life ended. Later his work was destroyed, but the idea lived and earned for him the title, "The brightest light in Western Europe."

Others took up the work, but in 1066 A.D. the Normans conquered England, the Anglo-Norman language came into use, and Bible translating stopped. Translations in existence were hidden in monasteries until the fourteenth century.

IN THE DAYS when England spoke the idiom of Chaucer and suffered oppression—from church and state, from serfdom and highwaymen—John Wycliffe (1320-1382) of Yorkshire was “born with a will to crush wrong and enthrone right.”⁸ His idea was to give an English Bible to an oppressed people to enrich their lives, to open their eyes to the deception of pope and friars, and to teach them to think for themselves. He had won honors at Oxford and was aided by her scholars in the translation. Volunteer workers, called Lollards, were organized to travel on foot in coarse, brown robes and sandals, teaching this English Bible. By this means some two hundred dialects of the English people were molded into a common language. Persecution by pope and clergy resulted. Decrees were issued threatening loss of possessions and life of those guilty of reading the English Bible. Still the books were sought and prized. A load of hay was given for the use of the New Testament for one day.

Forty-four years after Wycliffe's death, his bones were dug up and thrown in the river in condemnation of his memory, but today Wycliffe is known as “the Morning Star of the Reformation.”

IN 1453 the printing press was invented. And in 1484 William Tyndale was born in Gloucestershire, on the border of Wales, to pioneer in the printing of an English Bible. The king and church authorities were opposed to putting the Bible into the hands of the common people. They also objected to the marginal notes in these Bibles, uncomplimentary to the pope and bishops and his comments on controversial subjects. Destruction of Tyndale's manuscript was decreed, and he left England to hide in Germany. Three thousand New Testaments were printed and smuggled into England. Others followed, but whole editions were purchased by church authorities and burned. Tyndale began work on the Old Testament, but his hiding place was betrayed and he was thrown into a dungeon. There he continued to translate. He was tried as a heretic and condemned. Tied to a stake, before being strangled and burned, his last words were, “Lord, open the King of England's eyes.”⁹ His book created an appetite for the English Bible and a demand for it which the government thought best to recognize, and William Tyndale has been called the “most influential Englishman that ever lived.”

TYNDALE'S PRAYER was answered when James I, a Bible student, came to the English throne in 1603. He was interested in establishing a more accurately translated version of the English Bible. Fifty-four scholars were enlisted and divided into six groups, two at Westminster, two at Oxford, two at Cambridge. Each group was given specified portions of the Scripture to revise. Comparisons were to be made with the Hebrew manuscript of the Old Testament and the Greek manuscript of the New Testament. Every man of the entire company was to pass upon the work of every other man. The men chosen were well qualified. They were professors of Hebrew, professors of Greek, noted Latinists, a doctor “skilled in Latin, Greek, Chaldee, Arabic and the Ethiopic tongue” . . . one “noted for exquisite skill in Hebrew and Greek idioms” . . . and “a Bishop who might have been interpreter general at Babel, so learned was he.”¹⁰

Of the utmost importance is the fact that this revised English translation took place in the era of England's greatest literature, at a time when Shakespeare and the illustrious writers of his day had lifted the quality of the English language to its highest peak. This council of professors could not in that day be satisfied with producing less than the highest excellence of expression. And the King James Authorized Version of the Bible of 1611 is accepted by the world's thinkers as a masterpiece, “a monument in words . . . the perfection and simplicity of its every line having inspired more poetry, art, music than any other work of man.”⁸ The rhythm and cadence of this translation is due to Hebrew influence. The Author of all beauty must have been interested in clothing the Word in the finest English of which man is capable.

To illustrate the superiority of the Authorized Version over former translations we note one example. The Great Bible and Bishop's Bible agree in rendering Proverbs 3: 17: “Her wayes are pleasant wayes and all her paths are peaceable.” The Geneva Bible says: “Her wayes are wayes of pleasure and all her path prosperitie.” While the Authorized Version gives us: “Her wayes are wayes of pleasantness and all her pathes are peace.”

The simplicity of the Authorized Version is appreciated when compared with an eighteenth century version of the Lord's Prayer. Instead of “Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name,” this later version reads:

Thou great governour and parent of universal nature—who manifesteth thy glory to the blessed inhabitants of heaven—may all thy rational creatures in all the parts of thy boundless dominion be happy in the knowledge of thy existence and providence, and celebrate thy perfections in a manner most worthy thy nature and perfective of their own.¹⁰

George H. Hartwig, Professor of English, Midland College, Fremont, Nebraska, in his article, “The English Bible and the Teacher of English,” says:

“In my teaching of English, the history of the Bible in England has gone hand in hand with the history of England's literature.”¹¹ He predicts that generations of students to come, in the colleges where culture is real, will combine with their study of English an intensive research of the ancient Bibles and manuscripts and will thereby gain an increasing respect for the heroes who from the beginning studied, labored, and suffered, not withholding their lives, that the Word might continue with man and become more perfectly recorded.

Sermons From Science

By Felix B. Streychmans

All photographs furnished by the Moody Institute of Science.

FOR YEARS, theologians and organized religion have been plagued by doubters who found the existence of God incompatible with the laws of science. But with the passing of time more and more scientists have come to learn that the new rules they have been discovering recently fit into a general pattern which indicates that there is an over-all plan. For this reason, study of science is no longer a breeding ground for atheism.

But in even more recent years, science and religion have become closer, to the point where the rules of life on this planet no longer merely make science compatible with religion—they are in themselves the best proof of a Creator and a Ruler with a master plan.

Those who doubt this complete merging of science and religion should see one of the color motion pictures being produced by the Moody Institute of Science, which is a part of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. Four motion pictures already completed by a small band of technicians have created amazement among scores of industrial and community group audiences during the past year or so. With what appears to be Divine assistance—because these pictures are produced on tremendously small budgets and without any of the high-priced personnel available to Hollywood—Dr. Irwin A. Moon, the director, and his eleven assistants, who had never seen the inside of a major picture studio, have surpassed anything that has come out of Hollywood in the way of nature study, coupled with time lapse and microscopic photography. The resulting pictures deserve all the fabulous terms of praise associated with Hollywood enterprises from the entertainment standpoint, while at the same time they have exceeded anything previously produced anywhere with regard to theme.

THE THEME IS THIS: Without asking you to have faith, without asking you to believe in the Bible, without appealing to your idealism, and only requiring that you have an open mind, Moody shows you these photographs of animal, vegetable, insect, plant, and bird life, without argument, without quotations from Scriptures, and lets you decide at the end of each film whether what is taking place right here on earth now, before your own eyes, is a grand coincidence, an evolution of survival, or the plan of a Master, who not only has created according to his own design the world in which we live, but most obviously has a direct interest in every one of the creatures in it.

Laymen who have seen these films agree that anyone who witnesses this photographic evidence of miracle after miracle without admitting the dependence of every one of us upon a Higher Source simply has not viewed the pictures with an open mind. Here is what these remarkable films portray.

A bat has his eyes covered with adhesive tape and then he is released to fly through an areaway where vertical sticks are placed a few inches apart so that the passages are too narrow for his wing span. But when the bat comes to this line of obstacles, he banks sharply, and flies through one of the openings without touching a stick on either side. The bat obviously does not depend upon sight to avoid an object, nor does he see in the dark in order to get about, as many people think.

In another sequence, the same bat has his jaws tied shut with a thread. Then, with eyes open, he is released to fly through the same obstacle course and flutters helplessly against the upright sticks. Why? Through sound amplifications and photography, you are told with astonishing clarity.

THE MOODY INSTITUTE of Science has made its own equipment to translate into a frequency audible by the human ear the sound with a maximum output of about 35,000 cycles per second that a bat makes when it flies. This sound is outside the range of the human ear, which cannot detect sound above 15,000 cycles per second. The pictures show several bats flying around the microphone and as each comes near to it, the loudspeaker records the humming sound. And so, with eyes shut or open, and in the dark or in light, the bat sends out this wave of sound as he flies and whenever it hits an object ahead, it is transmitted back to him enabling him to gauge the distance and direction of any impediment in his path.

"Just like radar," you say. And you are right.

The bat's use of radar is just as complicated as man's. The humming sound that a bat makes is a series of clicks which emanates from his throat, each one lasting only about one one-hundredth of a second. But although the click itself has a constant duration, the number per second varies considerably, according to the information portrayed by the Moody Science Institute's film.

When a bat is flying in the open and there are few obstacles, the rate is only about five clicks per second, but as an obstacle is approached or if he is in close quarters, the rate increases to as many as sixty clicks per second. The more information the bat needs to navigate properly, the more impulses he sends out, increasing the amount of information he gets back. All this is shown very clearly in photography of great technical excellence.

And, as a viewer assimilates this sequence of pictures, he is bound to ask himself, "Who created the bat's radar system? Surely not the bat into whom it has been born." And the producers of the film are willing to let you decide for yourself. As the audience is deciding, each person is bound to review the articles he has read about the invention of radar by man and how great the writers of these stories have regarded man's creative ability—without ever having mentioned before that for centuries one of the lowly creatures of God has used this same system unflinchingly.

When one in the audience sees the first of these sequences, he marvels at the excellence of the photography and becomes well aware of the expensive laboratory and research work that the Moody Science Institute has in back of these films. The incident itself he regards as one of those phenomenal things that occur occasionally in nature as well as everywhere else, and perhaps he is not convinced. But as these pictures run on, and miracle after miracle is vividly impressed upon him, the mechanics of the picture, excellent though they are, begin to become less important and he begins to see, first, the plausibility, and then the surety of the Divine plan.

TAKE THE CASE OF THE GRUNION. The grunion is a fish from five to seven inches long, which makes its home along the shores of southern California. During the spring of the year, thousands of them come up on the beaches to lay their eggs. Grunion nights are written up in the newspapers of that area. There is no question when the schools of fish will come up on shore because the eggs must be laid at precisely the right hour each year or the specie will not propagate. This is during the highest tide in the spring of the year and at night at the period of the new moon or two weeks later, during the full moon.

Not only must the grunion lay the eggs at this period, but exactly at the peak of the tide, because these small fish ride on the tide up onto the sand to the highest point that the water reaches. But even before the water reaches that point, the female arches her back and buries her tail in the sand to the depth of several inches. She couldn't do this if the sand were not thoroughly saturated with water to make it easy to penetrate. Which means that if she were to wait only a few seconds when the water had receded, her attempts would be in vain.

Moreover, the female grunion would be marooned on the sand, because she had come during the peak of the tide and succeeding breakers would not wash up high enough to get her back to the sea. As a result these fish must come in at the very moment when the tide is about to reach its greatest peak, bury parts of their bodies in the sand for just a few brief moments while the eggs are laid and while the male grunion deposit their milt in the sand around the bodies of the female. The female must then wriggle herself free immediately so that when the next wave comes, she can be washed out into the water again, because from then on the tide will be receding.

And if you are not yet convinced that this minute accuracy is essential, consider this. If the eggs were to be buried an hour too soon, succeeding waves that come up would wash the eggs out to sea where they would be destroyed. If they were buried just an hour late, when the waves were receding and not reaching their farthest point upon shore, the rising tide on the succeeding nights would wash them out.

And so, the Moody Science Institute has taken motion pictures of this phenomenon and lets its audience decide how the grunion knows just when and how to lay its eggs.

THESE REMARKABLE PHOTOGRAPHS also show the development and hatching of grunion eggs under a high-power microscope. The eggs are transparent, so with the addition of time lapse photography, the audience is able to see the cells multiply.

At the center of the egg is a cluster of globules of oil which supply food for the growing embryo. By a continuous process of cell division—itsself a miracle beyond the ken of man—the egg grows until finally one can see a rhythmic throbbing, the very pulse of life.

After two days, the fish begins to take shape. Plainly formed are the circles that are to be the eyes, and before the fish is fully developed, there is a more pronounced throbbing that will be the actual heart beat when the heart comes into being. And right on the motion picture screen, egg after egg pops open and a tiny grunion comes forth—a fish which, although unable to read and unable to listen to the instructions of his parents whom it will never see, will be able in the future to lay eggs on the sand at the very time when—shall we say Nature?—intended it.

If you wonder whether the tiny grunion might be hatched in the sand and never reach the water, your wonderment is being dispelled. The narrator tells you that the tiny fish develops in seven to ten days, but does not hatch until and unless the shell of the egg is dissolved by moisture. Therefore, the fish will not hatch unless a wave comes up over the sand in which it is developing and is therefore able to wash the young fish out to sea.

Can any audience wonder who taught the grunion all this without having the answer that theologians expect? For centuries man has studied the tide in order to navigate the seas, and there are many hulks of wrecked vessels along the rocky coasts of California to show where he has failed to perfect his knowledge. Yet man—and especially the Unbeliever—is supposed to be smarter than the grunion. If he is, it is the grunion, plus Something Else smarter than man that controls the breeding life of that small fish.

THE PACIFIC GOLDEN PLOVER is a bird that lives and mates off the coast of Alaska and Siberia but flies 2,000 miles in the wintertime to the Hawaiian Islands. If that bird's navigating instruments were only a small percentage off, the tangent would widen in 2,000 miles to the point where he would miss this small island by a wide sweep. But each year, thousands of these birds, with a wingspread of only twelve inches, arrive at their destination. And what is far more miraculous, the baby birds that are hatched too late in the season to have the ability to fly at the time the rest of the flock leaves stay behind a few weeks and then fly to Hawaii by themselves later.

When this flight is diagrammed in the film put out by Moody, the audience is left to wonder how these young birds who have never been there fly successfully to an unknown, unseen destination. And when wonderment is at its height, the film shows the instrument panel of a modern airplane with all the gadgets it takes for man to fly blind, even when he knows where he is going and has a map.

Here is a case where we may use the term, "Divine guidance," in even its narrowest sense. These young birds not only don't know where they are going—they don't even know why. But they get there—and anyone who insists upon attributing their navigating ability to what is so easily called "instinct" will be more inclined after seeing the picture to spell the word with a capital "I."

These examples are from the latest picture produced by Moody, titled Dust or Destiny. The three previous ones are God of Creation, God of the Atom, and Voice of the Deep. In all of these pictures, the examples from science of a Master Plan seem to be limitless.

IN God of Creation there is one more excellent example that is all the more impressive because most movie viewers think they know all about it. That is the transformation of the caterpillar to the chrysalis and then to the butterfly. But in the Moody film, the audience learns that it would be impossible for the caterpillar to shed his skin by means of acrobatic movement if he had not previously attached himself firmly to the twig of a tree around which he had spun his cocoon. This is done first by spinning a silken web on the twig, onto which he hooks his cremaster—that is the name for the part of the caterpillar body at the rear end, which is no larger than the head of a pin yet is covered with 140 tiny, sharp hooks. Through microscopic photography, the audience sees all this quite vividly.

So after the caterpillar has spun the webbing onto which he hooks himself, he spins a silken loop holding it between his first and second pairs of feet as he joins strand after strand to form a strong cord. Then he ducks his head through the loop and hangs there quietly for a few days.

While he is hanging, suspended through this loop, his ambulatory organs, which are the equivalent of feet, gradually disappear.

Anyone who has seen the film, God of Creation, has had a close-

Moses' Last Birthday

An Interview by David Russell, D.D.

Editor's Note: In our files we found a clipping from the "Homiletic Review" containing this phantasy which is thought-provoking and should prove of interest to our readers.

WHEN our wise old men celebrate their birthdays, our newspapers send reporters to get an interview. With a keen sense of what will interest their readers editors do not allow these opportunities to pass. And whether the words these wise old men speak are frivolous or serious, weighty or jocose, they get a prominent place in next day's edition and are eagerly read. They are eagerly read because we all find life difficult. And we feel that anyone who has lived courageously and accomplished much must have something of special value for us in those mellow days when, his fiercer battles done, he lays aside his armor, lets himself relax, and is free to play the part of philosopher and sage.

So it was that the city editor of the Moab Monitor called a young reporter to his desk some 3,000 years ago, and said: "Moses has just finished his latest book. Probably it's his last. He calls it Deuteronomy. He's 120 tomorrow, and of course he can't last forever.

"Go and interview him. He has experienced much history—made a lot of it himself, for that matter. Find out how life strikes him as he looks back over the long stretch. If you can get him to talk, we'll have something good. Do your best. I'm depending on you."

Bar-Eglon took his assignment with some trepidation. He was not accustomed to meeting great personages, and this interview might determine his whole future for better or worse. But his stage fright quickly passed before the gracious mood in which Moses received him. There was a twinkle of sympathy in Moses' eye as he stroked his long beard and told Bar-Eglon to ask him what he would. Gaining confidence by this reception the young man said:

THE FIRST QUESTION

"My Lord Moses, there is a debate among the people. Some say that what we call God is merely a blind force. Some say he is a person. What would be your message to our readers on this point?"

"As a young man," said Moses, "I had some doubts about that matter myself. I could never be sure that divine personality had intervened to save me in my ark of bulrushes. As I grew older and studied history with my Egyptian tutors, a belief in his personality became more and more difficult. Then after that, as you know, I was a long time in the wilderness as a shepherd—forty years to be exact—and I used often to weigh the question in my solitary hours. For a long time I had no assurance. I saw the lightning and heard the thunder. I heard the rumble of the torrent, the roar of the lion, and the scream of the night fowl. I witnessed the procession of the seasons, and the wheeling of the planets—but I had no answer to my problem. Then, quite suddenly one day, it was settled for me. I saw a bush that burned but was not consumed. I turned aside to see this great sight, and there the voice of God spoke to me. Then I knew he was not a blind force, but a person.

"I had been meditating on his greatness. I was longing for some proof of his presence. I prayed, 'Show me thy glory,' and he gave me a most unexpected answer. 'I will make all my goodness to pass before thee.' All my experience subsequent to that moment has confirmed my belief in his benevolence. Every day I have lived his goodness has indeed passed before me."

THE LOVE OF GOD

"Would you care to say anything about the love of God? We always think of you in connection with the law. You will be known always as the lawgiver."

"Yes, I am glad to have a chance to speak about that. You have a papyrus in your hands, Bar-Eglon. Like the good scribe that you are, you are writing your copy on only one side of it, but it has two sides. Nor could you conceive of a papyrus with only one side to it. So God's law and God's love are only two sides of the same thing. It took me a long time to learn that, but I have no doubt about it now. You are doubtless familiar with all my books. [Here Bar-Eglon bowed low over his writing while Moses smiled slyly.] I think I over-emphasized the law in Genesis; as a matter of fact I did not refer to God's love at all. I only mention it once in Exodus. But in my last book, Deuteronomy, I have tried to set things straight. I state the fact of his love for us no less than six times. [Here Moses reported the passages.] And beyond all this—as you doubtless remember—I have written a song for the people which celebrates his never-failing love."

"I can copy all that out of the book," said Bar-Eglon to himself, and aloud: "So far, all my questions have to do with God. Would you care to say anything for our public concerning the conduct of life?"

"No, I could scarcely say anything beyond what I have already written. It is all in the Ten Commandments, you know. But if you will remember that those are the expressions of God's love, you will not find them difficult. And my other admonitions will be easy to understand and follow: I have tried to help my people to love God by making it clear that he loves them. By the way, let me give you a copy of my latest book.

I'll just read this part to you, and then mark it for you.

Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep his commandments or no. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna—that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years. Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God. For he bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills. A land of wheat, and barley and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates; a land of oil, olive and honey. And when thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the Lord thy God for the good land that he hath given thee.

LOVING GOD AND ONE'S NEIGHBORS

"And I feel of course," said Moses as he finished reading, "that if one knows God's love, and is loving God, he simply can't escape loving his neighbors who are likewise God's sons and our brothers. I have put that down too somewhere—I think you will find it in Leviticus. 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. But the stranger that dwelleth among you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself.' That makes the point clear."

"I must not take your time further," said Bar-Eglon, "but I would like to be sure I am representing you fairly. Am I correct if I say that you consider your work as statesman, soldier, lawgiver, and teacher of God's love as the sum of your life's activities?"

"You are like all the rest," said Moses, with a wistful smile that was half a sigh. "Why will none of you remember that I have been devoted, all my life, to art and the beautiful. I have written several songs. I wish now I had written more. I have one psalm to my credit—the one beginning, 'Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations,' I wrote that when we had been wandering so long that it seemed that we never would have a real dwelling-place, and it did more for our morale than I can tell you. Those who ought to know say it is good poetry.

But my chief concern with art has been in a different direction. Israel will never lack poets and musicians—any one who knows us knows that—but mechanical arts; form and design; representations of whatever kind; in these my people show a lack of skill that is positively sickening. In all this they are rank Philistines. However, some of my men picked up a few ideas in Egypt. I encouraged them all I could. There was one fellow particularly. His name was—just a moment—Bezaleel! Now there was a genius. He was a goldsmith and a silversmith, and his brasswork was immense! He could cut stone, or carve wood, or do any clever thing you asked. He got hold of another man named Aholiab. Aholiab was almost as deft as Bezaleel himself. I let them open a school. It was uphill work, but I really think we accomplished something. When we had a group who could tell the difference between a saw and a gimlet I put them at work on the tabernacle. It was a crude affair, of course—the tabernacle.

"But it was beautiful if I do say it. People gave us their treasures—gold and silver ornaments—and we gave good measure back in the work we did. It was half house, half tent. It had to stand all the wear and tear of knocking around the desert. We put it up and took it down a thousand times. But you should have seen the fine twined linen curtains, all blue and purple and scarlet. And the gold clasps that held them! And the roof—rams' skins dyed red! And the woodwork, fire-grade acacia, the ends of the boards in silver sockets! And the beams overlaid with gold, and the pillars also. And the golden altar, and the ark of silver and gold and fine linenwork, and the seven-branched candlesticks—but I talk too much. Your readers will hardly be interested in all this."

"But why did you give so much time and thought to that tabernacle? I could understand . . ."

The editor of the Moab Monitor was pleased with his cub reporter. After a judicious blue-penciling, lest the young man's head swell too much, the story was printed. Near the end were these words: "Although he has reached the advanced age of 120, the patriarch seems to have a good many years ahead of him. His eye is not dimmed, nor his natural force abated." Nevertheless, it was only a few months later that Bar-Eglon was called to the editor's desk again. "We have a rumor that Moses is dead. Looks as if it were true. Drop whatever you are doing and cover that. It will be front-page stuff. If you like you can write it in the first person."

THE DEATH OF MOSES

Next day the editor had the copy before him. "Although some mystery surrounds the disappearance of Moses," it ran, "there seems little doubt that he is dead. I made my way across the plain to the camp through a blinding sandstorm which abated only as I reached the foot of the mountains where the tents stand. There I talked with several elders of the tribe. It seems that Moses knew the end was near. As always, his concern was not for himself but for his followers. He made no excuses, nor did he murmur against his fate. He insisted that his successor be appointed so that, as he put it, the congregation would not be scattered as sheep without a shepherd. He ordained one Joshua to this office and gave him a solemn charge. He repeated once more the ancient law; then gathered up the lessons of the past into a national anthem from which all later Hebrew poets must borrow. He comforted his people, saying, 'As thy days so shall thy strength be. The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms!' Then, according to my informants, he turned away and took the lonesome trail that leads up Nebo. The people—men and women and children—rose as one, and stood at the tent doors to see him pass. Strangely enough, none of the tribe followed him. Some superstition, some fineness of feeling, or some

How "Young Joseph" Came to Amboy

Selections from the "Autobiographic Sketches" of
Edmund C. Briggs, of the Council of Twelve

Part IV: The Call to Joseph Smith, 1856

MEETING EMMA SMITH

We remained at Brother Blair's until Wednesday morning, when he took us in carriages to Ottawa railroad station. By cars and stage we came to Nauvoo on the following Friday, the fifth of December, 1856, and stopped at the mansion house kept by Major L. C. Bidamon. He had married Emma, the widow of Joseph Smith. . . .

He [Major Bidamon] took us into the dining room, where his wife was and introduced us to her. We informed her that we were on a mission preaching the gospel. She appeared quite reserved; seemed inclined to talk very little with us, and we avoided telling our special object of visiting Nauvoo at this time. We stayed overnight in the hotel, and until about the middle of the afternoon Saturday. Major Bidamon informed us he expected Joseph in the city, but as he did not come, about three o'clock in the afternoon we walked out to the farm to see him.—SH 48: 123-125. February 13, 1901.

A LETTER FROM ZARAHEMLA

When we arrived at his place, Joseph was not in the house, but soon came in, and his wife introduced us to him as strangers who wished to see him. Elder Gurley at once introduced himself and me as missionaries of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints and stated that we wished to talk with him. We handed him the following letter:

The Church of Zarahemla, Wisconsin, to Joseph Smith: Our faith is not unknown to you, neither our hope in the regathering of the pure in heart enthralled in darkness, together with the means, to the accomplishment of the same, viz.; that the seed of him to whom the work was first committed should stand forth and bear the responsibility (as well as wear the crown) of a wise master builder—to close up the breach, and to combine in one host, who, though in captivity and sorely tried, still refuse to strengthen the hands of usurpers. As that seed, to whom pertains this right and heaven-appointed duty, you cannot be unmindful nor indifferent.

The God of Abram, Isaac, and Jacob covenanted with them and their seed. So the God of Joseph covenanted with him and his seed, that his word should not depart out of his mouth, nor out of the mouth of his seed, nor out of the mouth of his seed's seed, till the end come. A Zerubbabel in Israel art thou. As a nail fastened in a sure place, so are the promises unto thee to make thee a restorer in Zion, to set in order the house of God.

And the Holy Spirit that searcheth the deep things of God hath signified to us that the time has come, for through fasting and prayer hath the answer from God come unto us, saying, Communicate with my servant Joseph Smith, son of Joseph the Prophet. Arise, call upon God, and be strong, for a deliverer art thou to the Latter Day Saints, and the Holy Spirit is the prompter.

The apostles, elders, and Saints who have assembled with us have beheld the vacant seat, and the seed that is wanting, and like Ezra of old with his brethren, by the direction of the Holy Spirit have we sent faithful messengers to bear this our message to you, trusting you will by their hands notify us of your readiness to occupy that seat, and answer to the name and duties of that seed. For this have our prayers been offered up without ceasing for the last five years. We are assured that the same Spirit that has testified to us has signified the same things to you.

Many have arisen perverting the work of the Lord. But the good and the true are throughout the land waiting the true successor of Joseph the Prophet as president of the church and of the priesthood. In our publications—sent to you—we have shown the right of succession to rest in the lineal descendant of the chosen seed to whom the promise was made, and also the manner of ordination thereto. We cannot forbear reminding you that the commandments as well as the promises given to Joseph your father, were given to him and his seed.

And in the name of the Master, even Jesus Christ, as moved upon by the Holy Ghost we say, Arise in the strength of the Lord and realize those promises by executing these commandments, and we, by the grace of God, are thy helpers in restoring the exiled sons and daughters of Zion to their inheritances in the kingdom of God, and to the faith once delivered to the Saints.

Holding fast that which is good, and resisting evil, we invoke the blessings of the God of Israel upon thee and upon all Saints, for whom we will ever pray.

THE FIRST MEETING WITH YOUNG JOSEPH

After reading the letter, Joseph handed it back to Elder Gurley and said, "Gentleman, I will talk with you on politics or any other subject, but on religion I will not allow one word spoken in my house."

Elder Gurley replied, "But we wish to tell you what we believe."

Mr. Smith in a most emphatic manner replied, "I will not allow one word spoken on the subject to me in my house."

At this juncture I said, "Mr. Smith, while we respect your feelings as a man and do not wish to injure your feelings, we will not allow you to hinder us in doing our duty, as we have been sent by the command of God to tell you what we know and most surely believe in relation to your calling as the successor of your father."

At that Joseph arose to his feet and said in a hasty tone of voice: "When men come to my house and tell me what I must do, I tell them there is the door and they can go out."

Brother Gurley then said to me, "Come, let us go."

I replied, "Brother Gurley, do not be in a hurry," and Joseph's wife said, "Don't, Joseph, don't" (I will never forget her beautiful eyes as she looked up so imploringly to Joseph).

Joseph then calmed down and said, "I do not mean to injure your feelings, and I ask your forgiveness." Brother Gurley also then asked his forgiveness. I did not, for I felt I had only done my duty and need not ask to be forgiven. I told him briefly that it had been revealed to us that he would be the successor of his father in the church, and that we had been commanded to so inform him of our hope and faith in the matter.

He replied, "I do not allow myself to talk on such matters in relation to my own calling, or what I may do in the future." . . . I spoke in an earnest manner and a part of the time quite loud. A quieter feeling now prevailed, and Joseph informed us that Elders George A. Smith and [Erastus] Snow from Utah had been to see him but a short time before, and that he would not have anything to do with that people or their corrupt doctrines.

Supper was now ready and Joseph invited us to eat with him, which we did, and after supper we talked in relation to our mission and hope, but he objected to any reference to his own calling. I then said, "Will you meet us in the morning in the city?"

He promised to do so, after which we bade him good night and walked to Nauvoo. Soon as we had left the house Brother Gurley remarked to me, "He insulted us and will not receive our mission. We might as well go home. He might as well have turned us out-of-doors."

I said, "We have not yet finished our mission to him. Don't you remember that we were commanded in case he did not receive our mission to raise our hands before him and leave him in the hands of the Lord?"

Brother Gurley exclaimed, "Oh, I forgot that! Let us go back and do it now."

"No," I replied, "he promised to meet us in the morning at the mansion house. We will talk some more, and if he does not accept our message to him, then we will present him to the Lord with uplifted hands."

Brother Gurley said, "That will do. How came you to think to ask him to meet us in the morning?"

I replied, "I thought of it all the time."

NO DECISION, 1856

The next morning was Sunday, and after breakfast we started to take a walk. Just as we got to the door, Joseph opened it and said, "Good morning."

Brother Gurley hastily and abruptly said, "Have you received the evidence yet?"

Joseph answered, "No!"

"Then let us go and have a talk," Brother Gurley continued.

Joseph led the way to a room upstairs, and when he had shut the door he said to us, "If you men have been commanded of God to do anything, why can't you do it without any reference to me, for I know that no man or the angels from heaven can lead the church in the condition it is now in."

I then said, "Mr. Smith, we can do our duty without any reference to other men, for we do not recognize any man, priest, or king as our leader save Jesus Christ only, neither would we receive you except that you are called of God yourself. But as ministers sent to scattered latter-day Israel, we call on you as one of the spiritual stones of the house of God to come and take your place as it has been shown to us by the gifts of prophecy."

At that my hands involuntarily rose, and Joseph said, "Don't curse me. I can't stand that."

I looked, and Gurley also stood with his hands uplifted, and he replied, "That be far from us. We rather bless than curse." He then offered a short but fervent prayer for Joseph, and presented him to the Lord in the name of Jesus Christ.

Joseph then asked, "Are you now through?"

Gurley answered, "Yes."

Then Joseph with uplifted hands rose to his feet and offered a most fervent prayer. Among the things he said in his prayer were "Heavenly Father, keep me from wrongdoing, and that my face may be like a flint, that I may not fear the face of clay. In the name of Jesus Christ. Amen." He then said, "I am through, and will take the responsibility upon myself for my own actions." A peaceful feeling pervaded my mind, and there seemed to be a good feeling on the part of all.

A Man and His Friend

By Louise Wrigley

The two were walking down the road—the tall man and the slim. You would have liked the easy gait—the graceful way of him. He looked to be not yet a man until you saw his face. The lines of pain were fine and deep. His smile could not erase the awful agony of tears which hung behind his eyes as if they, mute and dark and clear, held fast his unheard cries.

The tall man swung along beside the slim one, and their stride was matched, and in a friendly way held peace, and calm, sweet pride. Who knows on what their hearts were bent—such clean hearts, frank and pure? It must have been for someone's good. They seemed so glad, so sure.

They strode along the dusty road. They did not talk at all; yet each one knew the other's love, the slim man and the tall. The carpenter, the fisherman, the brilliant man, the weak; they disappeared into the sun. . . .

What is it that I seek? I wish—the slim one would return for me. Why, here he is! I wonder . . . can I ever match my faltering stride to his?

Question:

Why did Jesus say to one of the malefactors nailed on the cross, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise"? Had he previously been baptized and confirmed?

Iowa

H. H. M.

Answer:

To assume that the repentant thief must have been a baptized and confirmed believer we must accept the untenable premise that only baptized and confirmed believers will go to paradise at death. We have no record of Abraham's baptism, nor of Lazarus', but in Jesus' parable of the rich man and Lazarus he refers to paradise, where both were, as "Abraham's bosom."

What about all those who have died without the law? Are they in torment, or in paradise? Would a God of justice torment them for something they could not help or control? The test of salvation is not baptism and confirmation, but acceptance of Christ, without which baptism would be meaningless. This is not to say that baptism is not essential; it is one of the works of obedience essential to a fullness of celestial glory, but it is not necessarily essential to being spared the punishment of hell and the second death.

Those who have had no chance to accept Christ in this life will have a chance in the spirit world and will not be punished for their failure to have heard the gospel. But it is well to remember that such acceptance cannot change the "works done in the flesh," on which their degree of reward and of glory will be based. The thief's belated acceptance of Christ spared him from the punishments which might have been necessary to bring him to that acceptance in the spirit world, but it could in no wise make him capable of enjoying or even enduring a greater glory than he had earned by his works while in the flesh.

Question:

If a member of the church be cut off from the church, would he have to be re-baptized before he would be a member of the church again, or would his former baptism be sufficient?

Arkansas

G. A. C.

Answer:

The following action by the General Conference of 1932, as recorded on page 111 of the Conference Daily, settled this question:

"Whenever the law of the church permits and a court so recommends, persons expelled from the church and desiring to return should be permitted to apply to the proper church officers for re-admission to the church, and should be permitted to re-enter the church without rebaptism."

A modification of this procedure occurs in cases where expulsion for second offense of adultery is involved. Action in such cases may be finalized only by the Standing High Council, and re-entry to the church must be by rebaptism.

Question:

Christ says of the people at the time of the second coming, "One shall be taken in the field and one shall be left" and also about the women grinding at the mill, one was to be taken and the other left. Does this mean that at that time the good and the wicked shall all be living together as they are at present?

Missouri

Mr. R. E. B.

Answer:

When Christ returns three qualities of people shall be living on the earth. One shall be the Zionite righteous, who will be caught up to meet him. Another will be the wicked, who shall be destroyed in the flesh at this time. The third will be those who, understanding and recognizing opportunities, shall lie between that of the righteous and the wicked. Isaiah 65: 20 and Doctrine and Covenants 98: 5 indicate that those in the middle group will be taught the gospel and live to be a hundred years old. Those who live righteously shall be changed from mortal to immortal without tasting death; and those who are wicked shall be condemned accordingly. It is thought-provoking and heart-rending to contemplate this spectacle of husbands and wives and children and friends who shall thus be torn apart in that day of separation of the righteous from the wicked. Members and non-members should unite their families in the family of God, his church, and kingdom. Where this is done it shall be true that "two shall be grinding at the mill and two shall be in the field, and they shall not be separated, but shall go joyously together toward the good things God has prepared for those who love him and keep the laws of his kingdom."

Question:

Does your church believe in co-operating with other Christian bodies? If so, in view of your claim, why?

Australia

F. P.

Answer:

We do believe in co-operating with other Christian bodies wherever we can conscientiously do so. It seems wise, for example, to co-operate in taking a community survey, on the basis of which the various denominations are likely to learn of the church preferences of the citizens of the community. On the other hand, there are some things in which we cannot co-operate. We do not join with other religious bodies, for example, in Communion services.

This question appears to take its rise from our position concerning church authority. We would therefore say that we are happy to co-operate with churches or any other organizations in any endeavor pointing toward the public good which does not involve denial of the fundamental church position on priesthood.

The Bible has been published in modern speech by Weymouth, Moffatt, Goodspeed, and others, and these versions have an appeal for some. However, their works represent the efforts of the few in comparison with the combined wisdom of the many minds that produced the Authorized Version.

THE WONDERS AND MIRACLES in the Book of Books outrival any fairy tales. Why are they held as truths? Recopied and retranslated through the centuries, the Scriptures have suffered loss. Being man's interpretation of the Word, they are faulty as man is faulty. Yet the vital plan of God for man's salvation has been preserved.

The Bible is more than history. "There is a spirit in man; and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding."¹² By such inspiration did men of old write, and others collected and selected that which should be preserved. By such inspiration did Joseph Smith revise the Authorized Version, correcting man's errors and restoring revealed truths, until we can read with understanding and satisfaction the Inspired Version.

The perfect plan of God for man bears its own testimony, for "our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance."¹³ This thought has been expressed by modern writers in the book, God Has Spoken:

The same Spirit of God that gave understanding and vision to the prophets can dwell in us to take away our blindness and confusion. . . . The Holy Spirit will speak through the words of Scripture to the deepest needs of your life. . . . There is no other way for you to be certain that it is true than to have it come true in your own experience.¹⁴

From our own experiences in obedience and through the influence of the Holy Spirit, we today sense:

The truth of Isaiah's assurance,
The grass withereth, the flower fadeth;
but the word of our God shall stand forever.¹⁵

David's inspired counsel,
Be still, and know that I am God.¹⁶

Job's testimony,
I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and . . . in my flesh shall I see God.¹⁷

The everlasting covenant between God and Enoch, renewed to Noah,

That when thy posterity shall embrace the truth and look upward, then shall Zion look downward, and all the heavens shall shake with gladness, and the earth shall tremble with joy.¹⁸

And the promises of the Savior,
My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God. . . .¹⁹

Although the days will come that heaven and earth shall pass away, yet my word shall not pass away; but all shall be fulfilled.²⁰

There it lies upon our bookshelves, the written Word. Preserved through centuries of persecution, refined in translation by the best minds of a most cultured age, corrected and restored by revelation in latter days, it holds secure its timeless message. At great cost it has come down the ages to inspire men through its revelation of the love of God to accept the joyous privilege of being co-workers with him.

Having accepted, our responsibility becomes one with that of the Master of men. We, too, are called to make the Word flesh, to become in our daily lives, to our generation, the way of truth, the light to a darkened world.

PRIMARY STORY WORSHIP PROGRAMS

By Mary Kirkpatrick Berg

These are stories of people, both young and old, who have proved that the Christian virtues of love, faith, hope, gratitude, self-sacrifice, patience, obedience, brotherhood, self-control and service make life bigger and stronger and more useful. Each of them can be effectively correlated with the Bible by song, prayer, and music to illuminate the teaching of religious truth.

Handicap to Happiness

By Celia Rae Zinser

Help the Stuttering Child

MANY TEACHERS are shocked to find that 1 per cent of school children are classified as stutterers. This fact points out a definite need for teachers today to become educated to the problems of stutterers, and to discover a program for helping these children.

Of the million stutterers in the United States, certainly many of them could have been helped or cured by an intelligently sympathetic teacher with an objective and informative program.

In order to effectively begin correctionist work, a teacher must be able to recognize a stutterer. A combination of three factors identify a stutterer as such.

The first symptom is indicated if a child unmistakably shows tension and anxiety about the non-fluency of his speech. Some indications of these feelings may be tightly pressed lips when starting a word, uncontrolled and pointless mouth movements, breath holding, excessive pausing, eye blinking during these pauses, and general tension and strain.

The second criterion for recognition is if the child has been and is now regarded as a stutterer. Careful check should be made of the sources of the judgment to determine the validity of the information and evaluations. The teacher, too, should observe the child's speech carefully.

Again, a child may declare himself to be a stutterer, but this is not an essential criterion, for many children are unashamed or unaware of their stuttering.

Once the teacher has definitely established the fact that a child does stutter, it is her duty and privilege to help him. In beginning treatment the child should be helped to face the problem frankly and should be assisted in developing an attitude of acceptance.

It is important in establishing rapport that the teacher be casual, kindly, gentle, understanding, patient, and careful of her choice of words. She should speak of a speech "tension," "effort," "stoppage," "hesitancy," or "difficulty"—never of a "defect," "spasm," or "abnormality."

Using all sources of information available to become acquainted with the child and his background, she can then get him to talk freely. This has a two-fold purpose—catharsis and rethinking for the child. Reassuring and objective information about stuttering should be made available to the student and his family, and the child should be encouraged to "advertise" his stuttering to teacher, family, friends, and classmates.

Next, the child should be made confident in his basic physical ability to speak normally. To prove to the child that he can speak without stuttering, suggest that he talk to himself or pets when no one is near; sing songs he knows well; read aloud in chorus with the correctionist; and do any types of speaking or reading in which he has no difficulty. Almost all stutterers are able to speak normally in these situations.

Impress the child with the fact that he can become adept in handling speaking situations even as a stutterer. Self-advertising of the fact that he stutters will aid in this. The cultivation of a sense of humor is a help. Also suggest to the child that when he stutters, to think objectively about it and forget it immediately.

Another important step is to rid the child of unnecessary and undesirable speech mannerisms. Often these can be eliminated by mirror work and "faking" the odd sounds or body and facial movements.

A stutterer's speech may improve if he delays or slows down the stuttering reactions. This does not mean that the child should be asked to talk slowly, but to stutter in a more leisurely manner. By imitating his usual, quick, tense way of stuttering, he can become aware of ways to perform at a slower rate.

"Go ahead and stutter," is a helpful thing to tell the child. As he tries to stutter as easily as possible he will discover that he can change the way of stuttering. The key problem is anxiety.

If the child is encouraged to talk as much as possible and rewarded for his efforts, he will benefit. He should cultivate his talents and personality in order to win the much-needed recognition and approval of his peers. He can be guided in participating in clubs and cultural activities and instructed in manners and the acquisition of good personal qualities.

Poor health and fatigue can have a direct bearing on the severity of stuttering. For this reason, the necessity for good physical hygiene practices must be impressed on the child—not because he is different, but because every normal child must observe basic health rules.

By using these simple techniques for helping the stuttering child, a teacher may have an extremely rewarding experience, as she sees a child's stuttering problem greatly lessened or eliminated completely.

What a thrill it must be to a teacher to know that she has helped a pupil overcome his greatest handicap to happiness!

Sermons From Science

up front-row seat at the transformation of a caterpillar into a chrysalis and sees the rhythmic, muscular contractions that he makes as he sheds his skin. And the audience is quite impressed with the predicament he would have been in had he not first attached his rear end firmly to the twig and, second, prepared that loop in which to suspend himself.

All the succeeding operations are shown very clearly, the most startling probably being the emergence of the butterfly from the cocoon. Tiny tubes within the wings fill up. They aren't all the same kind of tubes, and they aren't all filled with the same thing. Some are filled with blood, some with air, and some with a liquid—a liquid that dries to form a cement and gives the wings rigidity and strength.

THE EXAMPLES IN THE FILMS are not restricted to the animal world—Moody Science Institute has gone down to the floor of the ocean to get material and has photographed interesting sequences through a telescope aimed at the stars.

Regardless of theme, many of their pictures are outstanding examples of excellent photography and original contribution to science. The caterpillar-chrysalis-butterfly sequence is the only picture of its kind. Moody has also recorded on sound film the speech of fish, which everyone thinks are mute.

Probably the best indication of the all-round excellence of the films is the fact that they are most enthusiastically received by plant workers in industry. For one thing, the subject has to be really gripping to get the men of the assembly line to say that the pictures are worth while. For another thing, it isn't easy for management to propagandize its employees—especially on a subject like religion, even though it is nondenominational—without danger of resentment. But factory workers in all lines of industry who have seen these films leave the projection hall with nothing but gratitude toward their employers.

Hollywood studios have tried to get distribution rights to these films without success, and some of them would give their eye teeth for the services of several of the Moody technicians, who work for modest salaries and improvise all their equipment.

So here is a wonderful example of not only the triumph of the spiritual over the material, but of a perfect union of them.

Moses' Last Birthday

sense of his desire to be alone held them back. Needless to say, my profession has bred no such restraint in me, so when they pointed out the way he had gone I followed it and made my way to the top. I could find no trace of the body; but as I recalled what he had once said to me about his passion for beauty it seemed that here was the one appropriate death chamber for this majestic, lonely man. In the clear light of early afternoon I pictured him standing and gazing about him there in his last hour. Eastward rolled a boundless plain, a waving sea of corn and grass. Southward his eye ranged over the land till it rested on the sharp outline of Mt. Hor, where he had watched his brother die, and buried him. Beneath him 4,500 feet below, spread the camp in its orderly streets, with the loved people who would see his face no more. Beyond was the Dead Sea, like a long strip of molten metal, with the sun blazing on its surface. Across the dark, winding bed of Jordan was the fair land toward which he had struggled, but was not to enter. The rounded top of Gerizim loomed up, and, beyond the blue shoulder of Carmel, he saw the haze that whispered of the utmost sea. Far to the north was the fine line of Tabor, snowy Hermon mantled with cloud, and Lebanon behind. He stood there drinking in the prospect, glowing with the assurance of the future that awaited Israel. His own past life came to mind, from the floating cradle on the Nile to this border of his long life's goal.

"He had seen all his generations die. Now he himself was to pass a way untried before. He had met God in the cloud. Now he was to see him as he is. The sun was sinking and the sudden twilight cast its veil around. Chastened from all regrets, lifted above all fear, he made his way down the hill into some secluded valley. The wide silence was filled with an unseen presence. And then, tenderly, as a mother lifts her tired child to her bosom, God took him into those 'everlasting arms,' and all was peace.

"I, Bar-Eglon, will never have another assignment like this. I am a wiser man for having known him; a better man since I have looked upon the mountain of his sepulcher. There were some inconsistencies in his life. These will hardly be remembered. His fame as man of letters, soldier, statesman, prophet, saint, and patron of the arts is secure in the five books he has written. Given the choice, early in life, between luxury and honor at Pharaoh's court, and obloquy among his own kindred—between royalty and rags—he chose rags. Because of that choice the world is forever in his debt. He was God's great man. Whatever the future of the human race, his impress will abide upon it. As when a mountain rears itself above the river at its foot, and sends its shadow across the stream, so is he above the current of our life—the might fixing himself immutably upon the changing."

Today's Challenge

By Les Gardner

I CAN'T IMAGINE what life would be like without challenges. From the very day of our birth we are met with challenges one after the other—challenges to live, to learn, and to love. When we are children, the challenge is given to us to “choose . . . whom we shall serve,” and as many as choose to serve God take upon their shoulders the great challenge of building the kingdom of God. I am now in the process of accepting a challenge—that of coming to Graceland—and there, through study in all phases of life, to better equip myself for the service of my church. Let me tell you how this challenge came to me.

In Australia's city of Newcastle there has been meeting every summer since 1945 a group of about thirty young people between the ages of fifteen and twenty-five, who, under capable, qualified leadership, study subjects which will magnify their ability to serve in the church. These subjects range from Overviews of the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, Church History, Latter Day Saint philosophy and sociology, principles of worship, Zion's League planning, teaching principles, story-telling, Christian personality. The group lives for two weeks in the city pastor's home—the girls indoors in bedrooms converted into dormitories, and the boys outside in a big garage or in a dormitory tent. Another large tent on the lawn serves as a dining hall. Each student is daily allotted certain duties such as washing dishes, helping to prepare meals, and setting tables. This makes the work of keeping house a reasonably light burden on the staff. The students also select a student council of four, including a student leader. The council's job is to maintain continuity in program, to plan recreation and other leisure time activities, and to help in all matters of student-faculty relationships.

In the mornings there are four fifty-minute class periods, and in each period two groups meet in different parts of the house. The afternoons are devoted to recreation and trips to the beach or to interesting parts of the city. Devotions are held

Here Is the Writer . . .

Les Gardner, twenty-one years old, is a native of Wallsend, New South Wales, Australia. After graduating from the Newcastle Boys High School he worked in a bank four and a half years to save up money enough to come to Graceland, where he is vice-president of the freshman class and a member of the student council. In Australia he was ordained a deacon in 1948, served his branch as financial agent, and was president of the League at the time he left for America. His ambition, he says, "is to make my life a continual development for the service of my church."

after supper; these are prepared and presented by the students. Then three more class periods, an hour of study, a snack, and off to bed. On the final Sunday evening of the college session, the student body presents a program at the local church. At this service certificates are presented to students who have completed two sessions of study and any individual work assigned to them. In addition to the experience of group study at the college, students are given individual assignments to do at their leisure during the following year. Here at Wandell College—so named after Charles Wesley Wandell, the first missionary of the Reorganization to Australia—young people from every state of Australia and from New Zealand learn to live together. In doing so, they catch a vision of the Zionite life.

IT WAS THROUGH my happy experiences at Wandell that I first decided Graceland must be just like our little college, but on a larger scale. A few weeks after one college session I was discussing this theory with my pastor and telling him how much I would like to find out for myself, when he quietly said to me, "It's good to want to do a thing like that, Les, but it's far better to go ahead and do it. Why don't you save your money and go to Graceland?" Of course I had thought of going to Graceland before and had as many times dismissed the thought, but here it was as a challenge—a challenge I could accept if I wanted to enough. And I found I wanted to enough. I saved and dreamed and prayed and saved some more, and here I am on Graceland Hill.

This story has a happy ending. I met the challenge and have, I feel, been rewarded, for at Graceland I have found the Tower, reaching up into the sky, symbolizing the high ideals and upward path of the college. I have found the West Door, open to all who would enter to learn and go forth to serve. I have found students from all parts of this country and from all over the world who have come here seeking a deeper understanding of life. I have found devoted men and women who have dedicated their lives to the guidance and instruction of the students who pass through their classrooms. I have found precious friendships between teacher and student as they have found the thrill of exploring and discovering together. I have found the spirit of the living Christ on this campus, not only at Wednesday evening fellowships or Sunday morning church services, but every day, every hour in dormitory, classroom, and on the campus. I have found new hope, new inspiration, new courage, and new faith.

President E. J. Gleazer, Jr., announced that the Board of Trustees has accepted the resignations of R. Edwin Browne, Director of Public Relations, and Malcolm Ritchie, Dean of Students. Dean Ritchie, who has been on the faculty for two years, is an Air Corps Reservist and has been alerted for duty. He plans to enroll in the University of Illinois to work on his Ph.D. until he is called for duty. Mr. Browne resigns

GRACELAND has fitted so perfectly into my plan for a more abundant life that I now realize it, too, is but one phase of the great challenge—"to live as Christ lived—to build as he built." There is no challenge more worthy for young people of today to accept than this. There is so much we can do to help build Zion in our life, in our church, and in our world. We have a wonderful church organization to serve—one which gives us a full scope for our talents. I remember once in a discussion group at an Easter youth conference at home, we decided that there was no worth-while idea or activity in life which could not be modified to be included in the program of the church. If this is so, anything we do which cannot fit into the program of the church surely merits a re-evaluation to determine whether it really is a worth-while activity. If we could realize this and put all our talents and abilities into the task of building Zion, if we could meet the challenge of working together to achieve perfection, we could see the promise of Zion coming into fruition in our day. This is today's challenge to the youth of the church. Shall we dismiss it as immaterial, or shall we accept it as the most vital concept in our existence?

Six different groups recently met for Wednesday evening fellowship on the theme, "Once I was . . . but now I see." Since this was the next to the last fellowship of the school year and the directors of religious activity felt it to be one of the most important, the six smaller groups were arranged to provide with the opportunity to participate.

The motion picture Brigham Young was shown to the campus congregation as a Wednesday evening service. The picture begins with the events directly preceding Joseph Smith's assassination and follows the band that went with Brigham Young to Utah from the time of their leaving Illinois to the time of their crop's being saved from the crickets by the seagulls. Many found the picture particularly interesting for its portrayal of the doubt Brigham felt in regard to what he was doing.

Ilene Sheehy, a sophomore from Greeley, Colorado, studying public school music, recently presented her graduate organ recital. She played works by Bach, Mendelssohn, Franck, and others.

Graceland's camping class traveled to Nauvoo on a recent week end accompanied by Mr. Zinser and Miss York. There they set up a camp typical of those sponsored by church groups, complete with crafts, boating, group games, fellowships, and other camp activities. The course in camping is designed to provide instruction for those who wish to be camp counselors and this trip was one of Graceland's laboratory learning experiences.

Richmond, Missouri, Also Served

Our attention has been called to the incompleteness of our Saints' Herald for May 14 (page two) account of Kisuke Sekine's arrival in San Francisco. More complete information indicates that the reception committee consisted of Brother and Sister Donald Rightmeyer and son Allen, Wayne and Mr. and Mrs. Joe M. Ware and two children. He was introduced by this group to his first American dinner and spent the afternoon with them before meeting Brother Andrews and the Berkeley Saints.

We are glad to acknowledge this service by our Richmond Saints.

Concerning Kodachrome Slides

There is an increasing trend among church amateur photographers to make colored pictures and reproduce these in slides. Elder C. Ed. Miller urges that under-developed or over-developed films be not thrown away as it is possible to treat these so that good results can be obtained in slides. At the present time no commercial service is available but he feels certain that if you will keep these that before long a service will be available to obtain good results from these films at a very modest expense.

 A LEGEND OF CHARLES

Barbara tells this interesting story about her young brother, Charles.

He was quite distressed by the fact that his friend, Dick, had picked up the habit of swearing. And if swearing could be regarded as a talent, it might be said that Dick was a sort of genius at it. His vocabulary was rich and colorful; his range original and imaginative.

Charles, trained in a good church home, knew this was all wrong. Yet he recognized in his friend certain traits of character that God would love.

"If you don't stop swearing," Charles said to Dick one day, "I'm going to have to pray for you!"

And who knows? That treatment might be more effective than whippings or getting the mouth washed out with soap!

 DEAD BRANCHES

In trimming a barberry hedge, a place was found where a bush was dying. Where the dead black branches remained, no new living branches could grow. As soon as they were cut away, new branches from adjoining bushes began to fill the space. The process was slow but sure.

The phrase "dead works" is used in Hebrews 9:14, and there may be a lesson for us here. We must get the old faults and sins out of our lives before the new habits of righteousness can take their places. We must give up the evil friends and associations before we can have the good new ones. We must give up evil before we can have God in our lives.

 PATIENCE

When you find life "getting under your skin," when you feel critical of people and dissatisfied with conditions, you might try tacking a card up somewhere that you can see it often. Over the kitchen sink if you are a housewife, over the desk if you are an executive, over the bench if you are a factory worker, perhaps in your heart if you are on the move.

Your card should have two words on it: "Be Patient."

"In your patience possess ye your souls."— Luke 21:18. When you are impatient, something else possesses your soul. You do not belong to yourself. The grievance has "got" you. Patience is a means of setting us free, and putting our fate in our own hands.

 TROUBLE

It is much easier to start trouble than it is to get out of it.

Trouble has a way of spreading, like a gasoline fire. It may get out of control, and destroy many valuable things before it finally burns itself out.

If a person is wise, he will ask himself, before he makes any harsh criticism of other people, "Will this lead to trouble?" If it will, he had better wait and consider.

Many a question, many a problem, can be solved without trouble, if we will take the necessary time and patience to work it out.

TOURS CALIFORNIA

During April, Mrs. S. S. Arnson, Chairman of the General Council of Women, visited women's groups in California. Arrangements for the trip were made by Apostle E. J. Gleazer in co-operation with district and stake officers. Meetings were held in twelve cities. Members of the Southern California District gathered at Santa Ana for the district meeting. Institutes were conducted for the Metropolitan Stake at Los Angeles and for the Northern California District at Berkeley. Talks were also given at other places in the Southern and Northern California Districts. Sister Arnson reports that splendid work is being done for the church by the fine groups of devoted and capable women workers and feels that the trip was mutually beneficial.

The Chicago Tribune medals to the outstanding junior and senior R.O.T.C. cadet for the semester at William Chrisman High School in Independence were given to Sgt. David Freeman, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Freeman; and Capt. Robert Rannie, son of Dr. and Mrs. Paul R. Rannie; respectively. Robert's medal was gold, David's silver.

VETERAN SAINTS PASS AWAY

News has been received from Sweden of the death of Brother A. W. Lundstrom of Jerna. Brother Lundstrom has been in poor health for several years, and passed away April 25.

Sister Allen Schreur of Gaylord, Michigan, was buried May 22. Brother Schreur was president of the Northern Michigan District for many years.

IT ISN'T UNUSUAL to find Roscoe Faunce up high on a ladder adjusting a bit of stage scenery or in his casual and friendly manner teaching his "communication" class at Graceland College. A teacher of speech, drama, and communication, Mr. Faunce is best known for the many outstanding dramatic productions presented on the campus. In 1949 Graceland's theatre fare was enriched by the remodeling of the old boiler plant into "the playshop," and it is in this barn-style workshop that Mr. Faunce instills in would-be actors and actresses the "grand traditions of the theatre."

Born and reared in Nebraska City, Nebraska, Mr. Faunce was baptized at the age of eight. He was ordained a priest in 1938, and an elder in 1943, and assists in many of the campus services.

After graduating from high school, he attended Graceland for three years, graduating in 1926. He then attended the University of Iowa, receiving his Bachelor's degree in 1927 and his Master's degree in 1928. He has taken additional graduate work at the Pasadena Playhouse in 1931 and the University of Michigan in 1932-33.

Mr. Faunce began his teaching career at Kansas State College at Manhattan in 1930 and joined the Graceland faculty in 1934. He has taken an active interest in Lamoni's Fireside Drama Club, his latest dramatic success being in the role of Elwood P. Dobbs in "Harvey." He has worked with the cub scouts for the last year, and has just taken over as cubmaster of Lamoni's pack 116.

He is married to the former Grace Edwards of Dundalk, Maryland. He met her during his first years on the Graceland faculty while she was a student, and they were married in 1937. They have four children, Ed, 12; Art, 11; Billy, 9; and Janice, 6.

Proclaim Liberty to the Captives

"If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."—John 8: 36.

MANY OF THE PEOPLE you pass on the street are slaves to something or other: a bad habit, an uncontrolled temper, a wrong idea or fixation, or a set of circumstances from which they cannot escape. Their chains and prison walls are invisible, but very real.

It is to these people, among other kinds of slaves, that the Son of God comes, offering freedom. It is true in this world that no one can enjoy political freedom without the protection of a great and powerful government. It is also true that no one can enjoy moral and spiritual freedom except under the protection of God.

ONE OF THE FAMILIAR SIGHTS of the city is a man who is never seen without the stump of a cigar clenched tightly in his teeth. If he ever had a fear in his life, it was probably of losing his cigar. He looks as if he couldn't bear to face the world without it. It is as much a part of his costume as his necktie and a clean shirt.

This man appears to think that he has the cigar.

He is mistaken. The cigar has him. It has him in a grip that he cannot break except by dying.

IT WAS AROUND ZERO one winter night when we waited for a bus to cross the river. The "Slow and Seldom Transportation Service" was extra late. The wind from the north-east had a sharp cutting edge. It was going through us, as they say, "without bothering to go around." We were miserable.

Just back of us was a package liquor store, open. Tiers of bottles (and, one might say, bottles of tears) filled the racks. Warmth and comfort were on the other side of a thin plate glass.

An old man went by and said, "Why don't you go in and get warm? It will be all right." Would it? We considered that . . . but we didn't go in.

The clerk was alone in the store. In his clean jacket, he was bent over, elbows on the counter, face in his hands, looking down. He did not look up once while we waited. Of the two miseries, our discomfort of body must have been easier to bear than his distress of spirit. He looked like one in the depth of despair.

That man was a prisoner—a prisoner in his business. The chains that bound him and the walls that enclosed him were invisible, but they were very real.

C. S. Lewis once wrote something like this: The Devil is seeking slaves to fatten for his table; but God wants people to grow in freedom and become his sons.

A YOUNG WOMAN came in to talk about a personal problem. It is hard for anyone to see himself as others see him, and she was no exception. She couldn't understand the one factor that was the cause of her problem. It was clear that only the truth could make her free of that trouble.

"Do you think you can take it if I speak frankly?" she was asked.

"Oh, yes," she said casually, "I can take anything."

An effort was made to tell her, but it failed. She "couldn't take it" at all. The truth hit her emotions rather than registering on her mind. She was hurt. She could not be free of her problem because she could not face the truth.

THE WALL YOU BUILD to keep others out will also keep you in. The man who is defending himself in a fortress may find, too late, that he has locked himself in a prison.

Invisible chains can be broken, not by physical strength, but by faith and an effort of the will.

A story—probably apocryphal—is told of an aristocrat who was imprisoned during the French Revolution. He remained in his cell for many years. Food and drink were brought to him, and he was allowed to read. One day, purely as a matter of curiosity, he pushed at his cell door. It swung open. There was no lock on it. He walked down the hall. No one stopped him. He went out a free man. All those years of imprisonment were unnecessary.

Even so we are the prisoners of many things—ideas, faults, mistakes, sins, weaknesses. Most of them are unnecessary.

WHEN JESUS BEGAN his ministry in the synagogue at Nazareth, he chose for his first text a passage from Isaiah 61 dealing with freedom:

The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound.

Paul also said:

The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free of the law of sin and death.—Romans 8: 2.

All freedom relates eventually to the mind and spirit of man. The greatest of all promises ever given to humanity was spoken by Jesus: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."—John 8: 32. L. J. L.

On Family Relations Institute at Los Angeles

(Editor's Note: Our attention has been called to an excellent opportunity for Herald readers living in the Los Angeles area to get a better understanding of the home and family relations. While the church is in no official way associated with the development of this project, we do commend it to those living near by who are able to take advantage of the workshop. Knowing the splendid work done by Dr. Paul Popenoe and his general reputation in this field leads us to give the project this support.)

Dr. Paul Popenoe, general director of the American Institute of Family Relations, his associate, Dr. Roswell Johnson, and other staff members will conduct a workshop in family relations August 6 to 11 at Los Angeles. Classes will be offered in the technique of marriage counseling, premarital education, dealing with problems of adolescence and old age, use of temperament and personality tests, and methods of education in family life. Such training has been found to strengthen the Christian home; ministers, and religious educators are invited to attend. Ten scholarships will be offered to workers living outside California. Detailed information, together with applications blanks for registration and for the scholarships (which cover the full registration fee of $25) may be had on request to the American Institute of Family Relations, 5287 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles 27, California.

Smoking and Lung Cancer

WITH THE NUMBER of reported cases of cancer of the lung increasing at a startling rate during the last few years, the journal, Radiology, has asked radiologists throughout the country to give more attention to the disease.

The January issue states editorially that many statistical studies have been made to show that chronic smoking may be an important factor in the cause of cancer of the lung.

One study was made by physicians Ernest L. Wynder of Georgetown Hospital, Washington, D. C., and Everts A. Graham of St. Louis, who developed total pneumonectomy. The study consisted of 684 cases of proved lung cancer. In 605 of these (in men) they found that over 50 per cent of the patients were excessive or chain smokers compared to 19 per cent of the general hospital group without cancer. Only 2 per cent of the lesions occurred in nonsmokers or minimal smokers. In 96 per cent of the cancer series there was a history of smoking for over twenty years, "which may account for the greater incidence of the disease in men, as excessive smoking by women is of relatively recent development."

Drs. Wynder and Graham believe, according to the editorial, that there may be a lag period of ten years or more before the development of the cancer.

The editorial said also that the practice of inhalation among cigarette smokers may be significant from a medical standpoint.

The journal also referred to three other investigators who found that cancer of the lung occurs more than twice as frequently among those who have smoked cigarettes for 25 years than among nonsmokers of comparable age.

"The offending agent is not indicated from any of these studies, as distillates from tobacco have never been proved to be carcinogenic," the editorial said, adding that there is a possibility that some other agent, such as spray material on tobacco plants, may be responsible.

"The foregoing observations," the article said, "offer statistical evidence that there may be more than a casual relationship between long-continued heavy smoking, especially of cigarettes, and the occurrence of lung cancer."—From General Electric X-Ray News, March, 1951.

What Kind of a Father?

Based on a sermon preached at South Crysler Church, Independence, Missouri

By John F. Sheehy

From wire recording by Floy Patience

A certain man had two sons; And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods which falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in the land and he began to be in want. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. And when he came to himself he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father, and say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee; And am no more worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants. And he arose and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. But the father said unto his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his finger and shoes on his feet; And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry; For this my son was dead and is alive again; he was lost and is found. And they began to be merry. Now his elder son was in the field; and as he came, and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. And he said unto him, Thy brother is come and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because hath he received him safe and sound. And he was angry, and would not go in; therefore came his father out, and entreated him, And he answering, said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends; But as soon as this thy son was come, which devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. And he said unto him, Son thou art ever with me; and all that I have is thine. It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad; for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; was lost and is found.

—Luke 15: 11-32, I. V.

A LONG WITH THIS SCRIPTURE I should like to read a few verses from the seventh chapter of Genesis, beginning with the forty-second verse:

Behold, I am God, Man of Holiness is my name; Man of Counsel is my name; and Endless and Eternal is my name also. Where I can stretch forth my hands and hold all the creations which I have made, and mine eye can pierce them also. And among all the workmanship of my hands there has not been so great wickedness as among thy brethren; but, behold, their sins shall be upon the heads of their fathers; Satan shall be their father, and misery shall be their doom; and the whole heavens shall weep over them, even all the workmanship of my hands. Wherefore should not the heavens weep, seeing these shall suffer? But behold, these which thine eyes are upon shall perish in the floods; and, behold, I will shut them up; a prison have I prepared for them, and he whom I have chosen has plead before my face; Wherefore he suffereth for their sins, inasmuch as they will repent, in the day that my chosen shall return unto me; and until that day they shall be in torment. Wherefore for this shall the heavens weep; yea, and all the workmanship of my hands.

In the twenty-first chapter of the book of Revelation, second to fifth verses, we read of a day to come when all present conditions will be changed. There will be a new heaven and a new earth. There will be no more pain, no more tears, no more sorrow, no more death. In the second book of Nephi, chapter one, verse 115, we read that God made men that they might have joy.

The Penitent Prodigal

We have heard many sermons about the awfulness of sin and the effects of sin upon the sinner. We know there have been times that, as a result of transgression, man has lost his relationship with God and with his loved ones. As a result of sin, he has experienced the very opposite that God purposed for him in the creation; and instead of experiencing the fullness of joy, he has suffered pain, misery, sorrow, and death.

This morning I would like to talk to you about God, and how the transgression of man affects the Eternal Father. The fifteenth chapter of Luke records the story that Jesus told, commonly called the parable of the Prodigal Son. But Jesus never intended that this parable should become famous because of the prodigal son. He told the story about a father and his two sons, placing the emphasis upon the father rather than upon the sons.

Jesus is the perfect revelation of God. When you see Jesus, you see the Father—infinite in mercy, in compassion, in love, and ever ready to forgive and receive all who will return to him.

Now let us review the parable. This certain man was face to face one day with the problem of a wayward son—a son who was not content to remain within the family circle, a son who wanted to use his inheritance exactly as he wished. This boy was determined to go wherever he wanted without any regard for the desires or commandments or teachings of his father. He wanted to exercise his right of agency—and to do as he pleased. And his father granted permission for him to do so. (It is more interesting when one stops to realize Jesus was telling this story to Jews.)

This young man spent his life in transgression. Sin, transgression—call it what you will—is turning away from God. So that the Jews might understand how far he went, Jesus said that he was feeding swine and was hungry and destitute. He gladly would have eaten the food he was feeding to the pigs.

In this fallen state he meditated upon his condition, and he remembered that the servants in his father's house were treated much better than he was being treated by the world on which he had spent his fortune. Thinking of the misery that was his, he decided to return to his father. He was truly penitent and sensed his unworthiness to be called his father's son, but he returned home nevertheless.

The Father's Suffering

The wayward son was not the only one who suffered; his father also suffered. God created man that he might have joy, and when man does not experience this joy ordained of God, then both God and man suffer. This is true of families. Those who are unitedly engaged in the work of the church experience the highest type of happiness. But if one member of a family forsakes this work, a portion of the joy experienced by that family is absent until the erring one returns.

So the prodigal son returned. His father had waited anxiously for him and, when he saw the boy coming, ran to meet him. In the spirit of humility the boy confessed, acknowledging his mistakes and saying, "I am no longer worthy to be thy son." Then the father threw his arms around the boy and called for the best robe to be put upon him. He also gave him a ring for his finger and shoes for his feet and ordered his servants to prepare a feast.

Joy for Repentance

In Luke 15: 10 Jesus says there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repents. Herein is contained the true meaning of worship. The purpose of all worship—whether in praying, preaching, or singing—is to bring men back to God, and to bring back to God the joy and happiness which belong to him. The heart of God is made heavy by human sinning, and the sorrow will remain until men return to him.

A Brother's Jealousy

How can God be happy when he looks upon his creation and sees it doing everything that displeases him? And why should you or I be disturbed where or when or how a man returns to his father? Likewise, why should we be disturbed at the willingness of God to forgive those who have sinned and restore them to their rightful state?

When the son who remained at home asked the servants about the feast, they said, "Your brother has returned and has been forgiven. The family ring has been placed upon his finger, and he has been restored to the family circle!" But the obedient son was displeased and complained to his father, "You never did this for me." Then his father reminded him, "My son, all that I have is thine, and has always been thine, and will always be thine, but your brother has denied himself the joy he could have had—the association with good people and with God. Now come in and be happy with us, for your brother who was lost is found."

The Father's Work and Glory

It is not God's intention that man find joy in this life alone. In latter-day revelation God says, "This is my work and my glory to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man." The crowning achievement of his purpose is that his creation will be happy throughout eternal ages.

The parable of the prodigal son is really the story of a kind, loving, understanding father who wanted his child to have the best in life, because only then would he himself find joy. The effects of sin are not confined to this earth alone. They are felt in heaven.

God has never taken any pleasure in the transgression of his people; every transgression in every generation has brought sorrow to his heart.

One of the most marvelous things about this relationship is that it becomes a personal thing, and when we try to realize just how personal this is we become amazed at the love of God and his interest in every one of us.

Jesus is the Savior of this world. But listen—Jesus is your Savior! Jesus and God are interested in you, concerned about you. It doesn't matter who you are or what your place in life, God is interested and concerned about you.

The Vision of the Father

In everything Jesus did or said, he he was conscious of the fact that he was representing God to the people. He was successful, though at one time during his ministry he had the feeling that probably he hadn't been as successful in doing this as he wanted to be. Just before he went to the cross he was talking to his disciples about God. Philip said to him, "Lord, show us the Father." Then Jesus said—and I rather think in a tone of disappointment and concern—"Have I been so long with you, and yet thou hast not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." He was aware from day to day that one of his missions during his ministry was to give to this world a perfect revelation of God.

In the story of the prodigal son, as in others, Christ was talking about the kind of a father we have in heaven and would have us remember that our sins affect not only us,

"Thou Art Not Far From the Kingdom of God"

By William McMurray

Now we will compare the word unto a seed. Now if ye give place, that a seed may be planted in your heart, behold, if it be a true seed, or a good seed, if ye do not cast it out by your unbelief, that ye will resist the Spirit of the Lord, behold, it will begin to swell within your breast; And when you feel these swelling motions, ye will begin to say within yourselves, It must needs be that this is a good seed, or that the word is good, for it beginneth to enlarge my soul; yea, it beginneth to enlighten my understanding; yea, and it beginneth to be delicious to me. Now behold, would not this increase your faith? I say unto you, Yea; nevertheless it hath not grown up to a perfect knowledge. But behold, as the seed swelleth, and sprouteth, and beginneth to grow, then ye must needs say, that the seed is good; for behold it swelleth, and sprouteth, and beginneth to grow. And now behold, will not this strengthen your faith? Yea, it will strengthen your faith, for ye will say, I know that this is a good seed, for behold, it sprouteth and beginneth to grow. And now behold, are ye sure that this is a good seed? I say unto you, Yea; for every seed bringeth forth unto its own likeness; therefore, if a seed groweth, it is good, but if it groweth not, behold, it is not good; therefore it is cast away.—Alma 16: 152-158.

THROUGH THE MEDIUM of great writers, most of us, at some time or another, have shared with outstanding men of history the moments of their greatest achievements. The surprising thing about these experiences is not that we are able to project ourselves into the great moments of these men but rather that we are able to feel at home in their presence. As we journey through time with the historian, we are never made to feel that we are unfit to share the triumphs of the heroes of freedom. On the field of Gettysburg we stand side by side with Lincoln and lend silent assent to his words. With the poet we storm into the valley of death in the ride of the gallant four hundred, never questioning our willingness to accompany those brave men in the "Charge of the Light Brigade," or our right to enjoy the glory of their sacrifice. Even into the privacy of love we burst unhesitatingly, never fearing that we intrude as we gaze upon the embrace of Romeo and Juliet, never turning away because this moment is theirs alone. Far from feeling unfit to stand in the presence of these great figures, we tend to become identified with their accomplishments and even take to ourselves the glory of achievement which rightfully belongs only to them.

In the spiritual experiences of religious pioneers, too, we stand unashamed. Leaving behind our worldly possessions, the security which we have enjoyed, the friends who have enriched our lives, we walk in the footsteps of Lehi, never doubting our tenacity nor our ability to display his obedience to divine command. On the road to Damascus we see the light and respond with Paul, "What wouldst thou have me to do?" Then, hearing the command of God, we turn our back upon our past life to follow him, never searching our heart to find the seeds of failure, never seriously wondering if we have the strength to remain constant in our dedication as did Paul. Even in the shadow of the cross we kneel with Jesus and echo his prayer, "Thy will be done." For a moment we experience his love, his sacrifice. But how often do we truly recognize our inadequacy for his task, our unfitness to utter his prayer?

WHEN WE HEAR THE RESPONSE of great men to their challenges, this tendency to identify ourselves with greatness, this experience of spiritual uplift which is ours, is most desirable. Indeed, the ability to project ourselves into the lives of great men and women in the midst of their accomplishments is the germ of greatness in each of us. Too often, however, we are satisfied with this fleeting glimpse into their lives, this momentary dream of greatness. To realize this ambition and achieve this greatness requires effort which we seldom are willing to make.

A story is told of an antique dealer who placed a crucifix in his store window, displaying a sign "This beautiful cross CHEAP." Many times this is the thing for which we hope, the cross of Jesus cheap. We look for the salvation of Christ in the bargain basements of life. We desire great accomplishments but are unwilling to pay the price.

In conversation with his father, Jesus accepted the responsibility of saving humanity. After accepting this challenge he could have experienced the joy of Saviorhood throughout his life and still have turned away in the last moments from the cross. Though he would have had thirty-three years of honor, it would only have been a glimpse of the achievement which was available to him. He would have denied himself the glory which is now his throughout eternity because he paid the price of Saviorhood.

SOMETIMES IN OUR LIVES there are moments when we have brief glimpses of great accomplishments which can be ours. Perhaps in a prayer meeting, at a reunion, preaching service, or possibly as we kneel in the silence of our room, we feel the urge to achieve greatness. Many times in the presence of the complete dedication of another we feel the challenging call of the Savior. In those brief flashes, without effort, we experience the joy of building a kingdom. Just for seconds we gaze on Zion accomplished and know that we have participated in its establishment. These are outstanding experiences in our lives, although they are but temporary. Like Jesus, we must decide whether this joy shall be ours for one brief moment alone or for the eternity that lies ahead.

EXCAVATIONS IN THE TOMB of a rich Egyptian disclosed a few handfuls of wheat which had been buried with other possessions in the vault. The wheat still held its original form. Over the many years which had elapsed no change had taken place. If this wheat had been planted somewhere along the banks of the Nile, its yield returned to the earth year after year, would have made enough flour to feed the teeming millions of hungry people in the world.

We too have been given a few handfuls of seeds. These are the momentary aspirations to accomplish big things, the brief flashes of greatness which have lighted our lives. These are the seeds of the kingdom of God. We must now choose whether we shall bury them in the tomb of our minds or plant them in the garden of Christ where year upon year they shall bring forth good fruit.

If we fail to respond to the voice of Jesus which calls us to ever higher and better service, if we satisfy ourselves with the fleeting glimpses of greatness which are given to us, we shall have been called to heights which we were unable or unwilling to scale. But if we respond to the challenge of the accomplishments of great men and women who have gone before us, we shall share the glory of the Savior in the eternal kingdom which we are called to build.

Man is not the creature of circumstances. Circumstances are the creatures of man.—DISRAELI.

Men might be better if we better deemed of them. The worst way to improve the world is to condemn it.—PHILIP JAMES BAILEY.

The easiest person to deceive is one's own self.—BULWER-LYTTON.

The illusion that times that were are better than those that are, has probably pervaded all ages.—HORACE GREELEY.

Temples for God By Courtney L. Hunter

"Mankind was never so happily inspired as when it made a cathedral."—Robert Louis Stevenson.

THE CREATION OF CHURCHES, both great and small, signifies man's efforts to set aside a place where he can worship—a tangible place, wholesome and pure, where he can meet and commune with his God.

Physical violence, improprieties, and unseemly conduct are virtually unheard of in the quiet recesses of a church. Man respects the sanctity of his temple built for God. Upon entering a church, he dons an air of meekness, humility, reverence which perhaps he duplicates no place else.

But there is another kind of temple—man's body—of which Paul says, "What! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own?"—I Corinthians 6:19. This temple is treated with something far less than deference and love.

If we have a direct and personal concept of God, it is significant that his Holy Spirit would much prefer a dwelling place in the body of man to intermittent lodgings within the cold and impersonal confines of an architectural creation.

It is a misconception to believe that to gain eternal life one must eternally and exclusively occupy himself with spiritual affairs. This is an impossible task in a physical world.

A man once said, "I'm not interested in anything about religion except how to gain the Spirit of God and to keep it. How is it done?" He believed there was a secret combination that would unlock the door to the Holy Ghost, yet require no drastic physical improvement in his own behavior and condition. That man is still seeking.

Yearning and asking for the beautiful, finished product of God's Holy Spirit at the snap of one's fingers is like dreaming of a fabulous wish to be granted by a fairy godmother.

OUR BODIES are God's bodies, and it is his wish that we live this life abundantly. It does make a difference to what use we put our bodies in this world. Physical development and improvement go hand in hand with spiritual growth.

How could God disapprove of the man who puts a strong and energetic emphasis on the temporal law, provided it is done "with an eye single to the glory of God"?—Doctrine and Covenants 4:1. It is the man who allows his physical victories over temptation to become a juggernaut for his own personal ego who will incur divine displeasure.

Legal and public condemnation of the grosser sins of murder, robbery, and adultery is also part of God's law. The condoning of the so-called lesser sins of hate, greed, and jealousy is not part of God's law, ". . . for I the Lord can not look upon sin with the least degree of allowance."—Doctrine and Covenants 1:5.

Frowning upon the use of alcohol and tobacco for the body is considered proper because abstinence from these things is part of God's advice to us. However, ignoring the apparent evils of overeating, unbalanced diet, and improper rest is to prevent the perfection of Zion, ". . . and no one can assist in this work except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope and charity, being temperate in all things, whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care."—Doctrine and Covenants 11:4.

The victory of overcoming the tantalization of brute matter teaches and shows us a spiritual happiness of firm well-being and a confidence in our ability and worth to help establish the kingdom of God. This God-given power becomes an example so strong and irresistible that it inspires untold numbers to seek to follow in the footsteps of the Christ. Mankind was never so happily inspired as when it made a holy, living temple of its human body.

True Worth

*True worth is in being, not seeming—
In doing each day that goes by
Some little good; not in dreaming
Of great things to do by and by.*

TRUE WORTH can be determined by the stand one takes when truth is on the scaffold. It is not resolved by the abundance of a person's possessions, nor is it to be judged by his culture or his acquired education. Neither triumphs nor defeats decide one's course. These are but incidents along the way of life.

True worth comes from the deep recesses of the soul, wherein are determined attitudes toward all things. There is a spark of divinity or true worth in every soul. It is the purpose of the gospel to find that soul and nurture that seed so it will bring forth abundantly. This requires a service to others.

How to Evaluate True Worth

It is a universal rule that mankind finally comes to appreciate merit wherever it is found. The true character of any person is easily determined by the way he treats one from whom he can expect no favors. Great men and women find ways to show their love of the lowly. Small minds are self-centered. It is impossible for big minds to harbor hate. Love finds no barrier in race, class, or creed. It is godlike to forgive and forget a wrong. Assistance extended to the weak and unfortunate of earth makes the giver strong.

The quality of mercy is not strained,
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven upon the place beneath.
It is twice blessed: It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes.

—Shakespeare.

Here again attitudes determine each individual character, for generosity can be a debilitating thing when one is on the receiving end of it.

By Orrin R. Wilcox

Equity, justice, and mercy are becoming watchwords in the tribunals of most nations. Ideals of freedom and democracy are sweeping the earth. The Golden Rule is becoming a standard of measurement among men and nations. No man can be miserable when helping his fellow men. This is also true of institutions and nations.

Let brotherly love continue. Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.—Hebrews 13: 1, 2.

King Benjamin, a wise king of Book of Mormon times, taught his people to be humble. He knew that in the past men and nations had ripened in iniquity because of pride. So well did this great leader teach his people that we are told, "They viewed themselves in their own carnal state, even less than the dust of the earth."—Mosiah 2: 2.

Such humility will help one to get acquainted with himself. It will recognize limitations and comprehend responsibilities together with the equipment for development.

Where Can True Worth Be Demonstrated?

Must one go on a mission to Tibet to convert the heathen? Are there heathen nearer home?

As an outcome of World War II India, Japan, Indonesia, Turkey, Greece, and other nations are on more friendly terms with the United States. It is the purpose of the United Nations to promote this feeling of brotherhood throughout the world. This is a tremendous task conceived in the Restoration Movement. It should pave the way for the preaching of the gospel of peace. We must make friends before we can make converts. All nations must be invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb (Doctrine and Covenants 58: 3).

The true worth and progress of our church might well be compared in some respects to the struggle of the Negro since the Emancipation Proclamation. Upon the liberation of the Negroes in the United States there was a rush among them to secure white collar jobs. Labor with the hands was shunned. Many unqualified colored men became ministers, school teachers, and politicians over night. Turmoil, corruption, and chaos was the result until wise men began to teach the essence of true worth and progress.

Booker T. Washington in his "Atlanta Exposition Address" illustrated their need in this picture of a ship lost at sea:

A ship lost at sea for many days suddenly sighted a friendly vessel. From the mast of the unfortunate vessel was seen a signal, "Water, water, we die of thirst!"

The answer from the friendly vessel at once came back, "Cast down your bucket where you are."

A second time the signal, "Water, water, send us water," ran up from the distressed vessel and was answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are." A third and a fourth signal were answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are."

The captain of the distressed vessel at last heeded the injunction, cast down his bucket, and it came up full of fresh, sparkling water from the mouth of the Amazon River.—Up From Slavery, page 219.

Cast down your bucket where you are. Cast it down in your homes and in the homes of your neighbors. Cast it down in your branches and your districts, in your offices and on your farms, at school and at church. Cast your bread upon the water. Thrust in your sickle and reap where you are.

Some day the call may come to you to carry the gospel to foreign nations. Now is the time to prepare by casting down your bucket where you are. Out of the scenes of confusion of present world conditions God will yet pave a way for more friendly relations with the benighted peoples behind the iron curtain (Matthew 24: 14, Doctrine and Covenants 102: 3; 58: 3).

God can appreciate and use true worth wherever it be found. "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons! But in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him."—Acts 10: 34, 35.

Who Demonstrates True Worth?

Must one wait for a call to the priesthood? Can an elder serve better than a teacher? Can a man serve better than a woman?

Jesus answered these questions by saying, "Whosoever will be chief among you let him be your servant." The service of the widow who cast her mite into the treasury was more acceptable than the contribution of the rich young man who turned away sorrowful "because he had much possessions."

The prayer of the publican was of greater worth than the long prayer of the Pharisee because the publican was humble while the Pharisee was proud and self-centered.

True worth among nations will be determined by their proximity to the kingdom of God. Antichrists will not be produced by any one kingdom or nation. Atheism, corruption, and crime shake the very foundations of our nation today. Though these foundations were laid by inspired men, we must continue to produce even greater men today if our nation is to survive and fulfill its mission.

Gog and Magog will find recruits in many lands. These agents of Satan together with all antichrists will be exposed and overthrown in their time. Meanwhile Saints would do well to get better acquainted with God and Christ! It is the fundamental mission of Saints as well as of prophets to reveal more of God to the world. America will have no fear of other nations if its citizens are righteous. "Perfect love casteth out fear."

Speaking of the inhabitants of America Nephi says, "Wherefore, they shall never be brought down into captivity; if so, it shall be because of iniquity."—II Nephi 1: 13.

How Does the World Judge True Worth?

"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."—John 13: 35. Love is the strongest dynamic in the universe—totalitarianism by force is the devil's counterfeit for equity by love. No government motivated by hate can expect to overthrow this counterfeit.

Not long ago a Jewish scientist gave this simple equation: $E=MC^2$;

Helps Along the Way

By Mabel Williams Crayne

Lives of great men all remind us we can make our lives sublime, and, departing, leave behind us footprints on the sands of time; footprints, that perhaps another, sailing o'er life's solemn main, a forlorn and shipwrecked brother, seeing, shall take heart again.

—LONGFELLOW

THE PEN of many an inspired writer has helped solve serious problems and lifted heart-broken souls to God. We seldom remember the whole of a lecture or sermon, but the speaker may drive home one vital point that changes the course of our entire lives. We would be amazed if we could look back and see how many long-forgotten people—some friends, some foes—have helped to mold our characters and personalities and even changed our environments.

The cover page of the January issue of Vision and Revision is most challenging. In the upper right-hand corner is this permanent slogan, "The future belongs to those who prepare for it." The rest of the page is taken up by the following in very large print: For your 1951 and for all the years thereafter My wish for you: Vision to See, Faith to Believe, Courage to Do.

This will be interpreted as each life demands. To most of us it means seeing our own mistakes and the good in others, visualizing the future as filled with opportunities for service to God and those about us, and not losing sight of the God-given beauties of the earth, even though the smoke of battle darkens the sky above us. It means having faith in the promises of God and the ultimate triumph of right over wrong, and having the courage to do what we know to be right no matter how great the sacrifice.

In the book Courage for Today by Preston Bradley, the following has so that is, "Energy equals mass times the velocity of light squared." This led to the atom bomb. Now Einstein says, "Civilization can avoid disaster only by the way of Gandhi, the path of nonviolence, and love." Love will ultimately triumph over all the power of Satan and release the captives of earth and hell; death, hell and the grave will be destroyed by love. It will bring about Zion from which the wicked will flee away and say, "We will not go up to battle against Zion, for Zion is terrible."

impressed me that I want to share it with others. This book is out of print, but can be found in most public libraries.

The good news of a life which casts out fear and worry is that each of us can begin wherever he is today, whatever his age may be. It makes no difference whether we are fifteen or eighty, what our social position is, whether we are rich or poor. I want you to claim your heritage. Every broken, worried, fearful and distorted life, every ravaged heart, every spirit that has lost touch with the reality and the loyalty of nature, is entitled to its own share. In the daily walks of life, if a man owes you a debt, you feel justified in asking him to pay it when it is due. Why should we not practice, in the world of spiritual and eternal truth, the same technique? No heart is entitled to disaster; no mind obliged to experience the agony of fear and worry. Each of us has the right, if he is living beautifully, to life's best. I fling you the challenge:

Demand and ask for yourself from the eternal, undiminished source of all unity and all life and all power that which is your very own, and it will not be denied you.

Reconstruct your approach as the nation must reconstruct its technique. As America faces the future, the mere equitable adjustment of economic machinery, the mere perfection of industrial processes and the mere growth of governmental regulation will never be the answer. The human heart of the Republic, as our own, must be safely anchored to the promise of eternal and everlasting spiritual perfection.

Let's make the start! Worried, fearful, tired, sick—what has fear done to you? Well, say right back to fear; "You have done all you are going to do. There are no obsessions that I am going to carry with me twenty-four hours a day. I am through with them. Do you think they are big enough to break me? No, I shall have no place for fear, no place for worry, for my days will always be crowded to overflowing with aspiration and good deeds."—Page 38.

Civilization is enduring now, as it has endured through repeated stress. It will survive because true civilization is born of the spirit and there will always be someone, somewhere, to keep it alive. So in this hour, let the pessimist croak. In this hour, let the materialist have his fate. I still have left my dreams and my ideals and my love, and so have you.—Page 42.

Repentance

By Ladd Duryea

... according to justice, the plan of redemption could not be brought about, only, on conditions of repentance of men in this probationary state; yea, this preparatory state; for except it were for these conditions, mercy could not take effect except it should destroy the work of justice.—Alma 19: 94.

ONE OF THE BASIC REQUIREMENTS of the plan of salvation, as stated in the above Scripture, is repentance. And the prophet Alma is not alone in giving this instruction. It is evident from the hundreds of examples in the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants that repentance is an absolute prerequisite to baptism by the Holy Ghost and to eternal salvation. Doctrine and Covenants 16: 3 says that Christ urged David Whitmer and Oliver Cowdery to turn from every appearance of evil, "... for, behold, I command all men everywhere to repent." Alma adds, "And the Father, said, Repent ye, repent ye, and be baptized in the name of my beloved Son."—II Nephi 13: 14. In the Holy Bible the Prince of Peace pleads with his people to turn to things of virtue and truth, for "... except ye repent, ye shall all ... perish."—Luke 13: 3.

Now the question arises as to what is meant by repentance. According to The Winston Dictionary, to repent is "to feel regret or sorrow on account of something done or left undone."¹ However the meaning of repentance, as the word is used in the Scriptures, is much more comprehensive than this. In his tract, "The Latter Day Saints and What They Believe," A. B. Phillips says:

The restored gospel teaches that repentance is more than sorrow for sins committed. It is sorrow plus a reformation of character in conformity with the law of God. True repentance prompts the sinner to make all possible restitution for his trespasses. Until one turns from sin to righteousness, he has not fully repented.²

ACCORDING TO F. HENRY EDWARDS³ repentance in the fullest sense of the word consists of four steps. The first step—and the most obvious one—is sincere, godly sorrow for past sinning. This sorrow is caused primarily by a growing love of God. One hates to hurt those dear to him—parents, children, friends, husband, wife, God, or Christ. His trespasses often hurt his mortal friends and relatives, and it always hurts Christ and God. Jesus wept over Jerusalem because it persecuted the prophets and would not accept him. Surely he weeps over the wickedness of the world today. As one comes to realize the pain which his sins have caused the Savior, he is sorry that he has transgressed.

The second step in repentance is, as Brother Edwards puts it, "to face sin in its true guise." This simply means to accept the blame for one's sins and to offer no excuses for them. Alma tells his son, "Do not endeavor to excuse yourself in the least point, because of your sins."—Alma 19: 114.

It almost seems natural for one to try to defend his actions. He always seems to have excuses for himself. I doubt if anybody has ever committed a crime without some excuse, feeble or otherwise. Hitler published many of his excuses for the armed aggression which led to World War II in his book, Mein Kampf. Probably every murderer considers his crime less reprehensible than a murder committed by another person. Nearly everyone tends to offer excuses, if only to himself, for things he has done wrong and things he should have done but did not. However, in the eyes of God, sin is sin. An act is either wrong or right. Undoubtedly being a just God, he makes allowance for different circumstances; yet one must face the reality that any sin is a transgression of God's law and must, therefore, be repented of or the person who committed the sin must be punished in accordance with the law of justice.

The third step in repentance is "to divorce oneself utterly from sin." This involves a complete change of attitude. Sinfulness comes from following the selfish demands of one's being. Righteousness comes from following the dictates of a spirit in tune with God's wishes and from depending upon God. Repentance means that one must start an almost new life, abandoning pride, selfishness, and vanity, and substituting for them humility, devotion, and benevolence. In Proverbs 8: 13 the wise man of Israel recognized that the Lord hates "pride, arrogancy, and the evil way . . ." And in I Peter 5: 5, an apostle of the Almighty God writes: "Yea, all of you . . . be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble."

The fourth step in repentance is "to build safeguards against future sinning." One must not only regret his past sins, but also fortify himself against sinning in the future. He must develop a deep determination to cling to what he knows is right in God's sight and to avoid actions which are contrary to His laws. He must vaccinate his character against the disease of sin with faith and prayer. This step is obviously completely necessary, for of what value is passive sorrow for sins committed if it is not backed up by action?

ALTHOUGH THE SCRIPTURES quoted so far have been chosen primarily to define repentance, a number of them contain information concerning who should repent. Doctrine and Covenants 16: 3 states: "... for, behold, I command all men everywhere to repent." Everybody is to repent. However, one must recognize that all men are commanded to repent not because they are men, but because they have sinned, as stated in Romans 3: 23:

“... all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God.” This statement is substantiated in I John 1:8: “If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.” The tenth verse says the same thing in a slightly different way: “If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.”

These are just a few of the Scriptures which charge that no man is sinless. Accepting this, the fact from Romans 7: 16 that God and Christ hate sin, and the statement from Isaiah 13: 11 that God is going to punish the world for its evil, one is given a gloomy picture of what is to come. It would seem that no one has a chance of escaping His wrath. This is where repentance comes in. Through it one can escape the wrath of God for past disobedience. Repentance is the means by which he can take advantage of Christ's atonement for men's sins. He was born, He lived on earth in a fleshy body, and was crucified that the sins of men might be forgiven; but it is for each individual to repent. If one does not repent the atonement has no value for him. Christ's atonement applies only to those who admit they are sinners, sorrow for it, ask forgiveness, and determine to sin no more.

If one does truly repent of his transgressions, he is forgiven; God's mercy will have claim on him, and His law of justice will be satisfied by Christ's atonement. Man is assured in I John 1:9: “If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.” In the Book of Mormon the Lord tells Alma: “And if he confess his sins before thee and me, and repenteth in the sincerity of his heart, him shall ye forgive, and I will forgive him also;

“Yea, and as often as my people repent, will I forgive them their trespasses against me.”—Mosiah 11:138, 139.

This promise is as good today as it was in Alma's time.

REPENTANCE IS NOT ALWAYS EASY. In fact, it seldom is. It cost Zacchaeus much in terms of money. He was a rich publican until Christ was his guest. Then he repented and gave half of his fortune to the poor and repaid fourfold those whom he had taxed unjustly. Repentance caused Paul to lose his friends and position. The same can be true today. When one repents, he may be forced to change his whole way of life. Sometimes he will find that people he thought were his friends avoid or ridicule him. Perhaps some people have had to change their occupations due to repentance.

But on the other hand, the things one loses through repentance are temporary and basically unimportant. Mark 8: 39—“For what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?”—could apply inversely here. If a man shall save his soul for eternity, what does it matter if he loses the whole world?

Repentance is an essential act for everyone who wants to gain admittance into the kingdom of God. It is something to be done before baptism into the church of Christ for the remission of sin. After baptism, then, one can start a new spiritual life, spotless in the sight of God. If he could remain spotless, further repentance would not be necessary. However, being human, everyone does sin even after baptism. Therefore, the need for repentance by all members of the church is as great as it is for those just coming into the church. Perhaps it is even greater, for those in the church have a greater responsibility than nonmembers. People out of the church do not have the fullness of the gospel with which those in the church have been blessed. Luke 12: 57 warns: “. . . for unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required; and to whom the Lord has committed much, of him will men ask the more.” Latter Day Saints have been given more of God's truth than any other people existing today. Will not more be required of them?

One should seek to repent as often as he sins. With every sin he should diagnose himself to see what caused him to transgress. Then he should seek to remove that influence from his life or to strengthen himself so that he can meet it the next time without erring.

It is easy to become discouraged and disappointed in trying to do right. One's attempts may seem feeble, almost futile. But even very short, weary steps will add up into miles if enough of them are taken. The promise is given in Romans 8: 13 that the Spirit will help man's infirmities. With daily effort and prayer one can definitely progress.

The life of a Saint cannot be something static. It does not appear possible for one to remain constant as far as living in accordance with God's laws is concerned. He must either progress or retrogress, and to progress he must repent of his sins.

Today in the present wilderness of iniquity, there is still a voice crying, praying that man will hear: “Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” He must heed that voice or be eternally damned.

Good, truth, beauty, have survival values and in the end of every experience they will triumph. Wherever good has been, good remains; wherever life has been, life remains, for life was made to be victorious.

In our own church publications, and from the pulpit, we find this same philosophy advocating that the spiritually-filled life will rise above the fears and hurts that so often beset us. In our association with other Saints we see this same philosophy being lived day after day. We marvel at their endurance, then pick up our own little pack and trudge on, praying that we too may have the vision to see, faith to believe, and courage to do.

Part V: Impressions of the Smith Family

AN INTERVIEW WITH EMMA SMITH

In the evening we had some little conversation with his [Young Joseph Smith's] mother. She made several inquiries about our meetings and the interests of the church at Zarahemla, and we informed her of the evidence we had received of her son taking the leadership of the church, as it was his right by lineage. She seemed to wish to avoid any reference about her children having anything to do with the church; spoke of her former husband with tears in her eyes.

The next morning she said: "I have always counseled the Saints who came to me for advice as to where they should go, to go north."

I inquired, "Why did you give them that counsel? Did you think James J. Strang's claims were right?"

She quickly replied, "No, but I thought if they went up north they could soon get away again, but if they went west they could not, and I always believed the church would arise again in the north. I have always avoided talking to my children about having anything to do with the church, for I have suffered so much I have dreaded to have them take any part in it. But I have always believed if God wanted them to do anything in the church, the same one who called their father would make it known to them, and it was not necessary for me to talk to them about it; but I never had confidence in Brigham Young, and Joseph did not for some time before his death."

I then said to her: "Did Joseph have any knowledge or premonition of his death before it took place?"

She replied: "Yes, he was expecting it for some time before he was murdered. About the time he wrote those letters that are in the Book of Covenants he was promised if he would go and hide from the church until it was cleansed he should live until he had accomplished his work in the redemption of Zion, and he once left home intending not to return until the church was sifted and thoroughly cleansed. But his persecutors were stirring up trouble at the time, and his absence provoked some of the brethren to say he had run away, and they called him a coward, and Joseph heard of it, and he returned, and said, 'I will die before I will be called a coward.'

"He was going to find a place and then send for the family, but when he came back I felt the worst I ever did in my life, and from that time I looked for him to be killed, and had felt so bad about it, that when he was murdered I was not taken by surprise, and did not feel so bad as I had for months before."

While she talked to us the tears flowed from her large, bright eyes like rain, and I could see in every act affection for Joseph.

—SH 48: 144, 145, February 20, 1901.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE SMITH FAMILY

I remained in Nauvoo and vicinity until the fall of '57; worked a part of the time for Joseph on his farm; though he had moved into the city and his brother Frederick worked the place.

I became quite well acquainted with the Smith family. Frederick was prepossessing, in fact, a gentleman in his appearance, open and frank in his countenance, six feet high and well proportioned, and I noticed he was very affectionate to his mother, and often saluted her with a loving kiss and good morning or good-by. Everybody loved him.

Joseph was always cheerful, very respectful to his mother, always seemed to be busy. Alexander was quiet around the house and doing chores. David was a handsome boy, modest and retiring in disposition, studious, and quite an artist; loved and admired by everybody who formed his acquaintance. Sister Emma was an exceptionally good woman whom everybody spoke of as an example worthy of imitation. In fact, the whole family were esteemed by all people who knew them as good worthy citizens above reproach, having the reputation of being strictly moral and temperate in all things.—SH 48: 163. February 27, 1901.

THE INTERVAL OF WAITING

(An Explanatory Note)

From 1856 to 1860 was a time of anxious waiting, of working, of seeking to bring scattered members of the old church into the Reorganization.

In fulfillment of prophecy, Brother Briggs did not return to Zarahemla, Wisconsin, until after Joseph was received as President of the church.

Joseph Smith had reason to wait and be patient until he was fully persuaded that it was the will of God he should take his position in the church. Men had come to him, had sought to persuade and cajole him, even to threaten him, in order to use his name and his influence, to further their designs, and to bring him under their control. He was adamant in his determination that he should yield obedience to only one control—the leadings of the Spirit of God.

No people could expect that their desires in this matter would be had simply by writing a letter and issuing an invitation. Their sincerity and fortitude needed to be tested to see if they were true. Five years was not too long a time to wait. In so great a cause, things move slowly.

When Joseph accepted the call and came to the church, he stated his conditions clearly, and he lived up to them all of his life. They were reasonable and just. By that time the people knew how very much they wanted and needed him; they had passed a test. They were ready to receive their awaited leader, the son of the prophet and founder of the church.—EDITORS.

Note of Thanks

I am grateful to all who remembered me in prayer and sent cards and letters after I received a bad fracture in January, 1948. My leg has mended satisfactorily, although it is somewhat longer than before and I have to wear a built-up shoe to keep from limping. I am back on my regular job as night watchman; this requires over ten miles of walking every evening. Considering the fact that I am sixty-seven years old, I feel that I am very fortunate to be able to keep on working at this job.

Asks Help for Son

Since reading "The Second Miracle" by Ruby Tinkham I have been comparing the story with what has happened in our own family. My son was raised from his bed of affliction like Paula, but he has not been able to find himself. I believe that the united prayers of the Saints can work miracles, so I am asking that those who read this will pray for my son. I believe he could do much good if he could overcome this obstacle in his life.

A MOTHER.

A Glimpse of the Beyond

I have lost my husband, my mother, and my youngest daughter in the past two years. Since their death I often wondered if they were given a chance to choose, would they want to come back. Before Easter I prayed and fasted to know the answer and was permitted to see my daughter. She was bright and happy and her body was clear as glass. I knew then that my loved ones were content to be wherever they are. This made Easter mean more to me than ever before.

I have been ill all winter, and I wish to thank those who have remembered me in their prayers. My prayer is that we may all live humbly before our Heavenly Father so that he can bless us with his spirit.

A Little Child Shall Lead Them

A wonderful experience occurred in our family recently as a result of our nine-year-old grandson's faith. Howard's parents live next door, and ever since he was a small boy I have read to him from church school papers and quarterlies. The nearest mission is eighteen miles away, so he has not been able to attend church regularly. On his way to school he often stops to join us in our morning devotional, taking part in the prayer with us. I have taught him about the good things and the sinful things in life, and he used to reprimand his parents for staying out late nights. A few weeks ago when our missionary came to hold cottage meetings, Howard was the first one to ask for baptism without any of us knowing about it. His father asked him if he understood what he was doing, and he said, "Yes, and I want you and Mother to be baptized too." This, through united prayers and the labors of our missionary, has taken place.

I hope that all parents and grandparents in the church may take the responsibility of teaching the gospel to their little ones. It is so much easier to teach them when they are young and their minds are pure. Even when there is no church near, they can be helped in developing an appreciation of God and his works. Then when the opportunity for baptism comes they will be ready.

Blessings Through Prayer and Administration

I have received many blessings and would like to tell of some of them. In 1904 my husband had blood poison in his arm. It was hard as a rock and the doctor said it would have to be amputated. Before he left for the operation he was administered to and truly received a blessing. When he returned from the city, he still had his arm and soon he was able to work again.

At another time our family had scarlet fever. Our seven-weeks-old son, Albert, was very ill and restless. We did not call the doctor, but we prayed for our sick child. During the night my husband asked, "How is he?" I said that he was sleeping peacefully on my arm and that much of the mucus in his throat had cleared up. My husband said he had just seen the child being administered to by an elder and several angels.

I know God answers prayer when we pray in the right spirit, having faith. I am grateful for the health and strength I enjoy and for the fact that I am able to attend church each Sunday even though I am growing old.

Helped During an Illness

For twenty-one years I suffered with a gall bladder condition which finally demanded surgery. The first three days after my operation I was in great pain, and I wished that I might have administration. However, the opportunity did not present itself, and on the fourth day I told my nurse that I could not bear to suffer any longer. She asked what church I belonged to, and I told her. Then she said, "Sister, I've never seen a Latter Day Saint yet who can't take it." She gave me a treatment that made me feel much better, and that evening the elders came and administered to me. I felt that God made me well at that very moment. The doctor was surprised at my rapid recovery and said he wished that others having the same type operation would get along as well.

A Visit to the Center Place

Two recent visits to Independence have convinced me that Zion may be nearer than many people think. On my first trip I visited the Social Service Center. I was surprised at the variety of merchandise for sale and pleased to see that those who serve there are so kind and ready to help. My only criticism of the place was that I couldn't find any slacks my size. My second visit was to the Sanitarium where a friend of mine was ill. Here I expressed a desire to see the building and was immediately given a guide who courteously showed me both the Sanitarium and the nurses' home. I was impressed by the fact that each has a chapel for worship services. The doctors and nurses all looked pleasant, and each department was an inspiration to me. As I watched the babies in their glassed-in nursery, the words of the Savior came to me, "of such is the kingdom of heaven," and I breathed a prayer that these children might become stalwart, faithful workers for the cause of Zion. From one of the upper floors of the hospital I looked out the window at the multicolored roofs in a sea of bright green foliage. I thought, "What a beautiful setting for the New Jerusalem." If each of us can catch this vision of Zion and use our individual gifts to make it a reality, surely it cannot be long in materializing.

Question:

Is an elder inspired to speak the words given in a confirmation prayer?
Australia F. P.

Answer:

Not necessarily so. On the other hand, when a person has recently made an honest, understanding, and sacrificial covenant with God in baptism, then comes in prayerful mood to ask for the endowment of the Holy Spirit which has been promised to the obedient; and when the officiating minister has carried this person on his heart and mind and conscience in the presence of God, as he should, the situation is favorable to a great measure of spiritual light.

Yet it should be remembered that there is no promise of prophecy, in the sense of foretelling, in connection with this ordinance. What is promised is the endowment of the Spirit.

Question:

A. The Book of Mormon speaks of three men, namely, Zenos, Zenock, and Neum, who are spoken of as prophets of old. Their words appeared to have been written on the plates of brass. What became of the brass plates?
Michigan E. D.

Answer:

The brass plates were among the sacred records deposited by Ammoron in the Hill Shim in the land of Antum when Mormon was about ten years old. Ammoron instructed him to go to the Hill Shim when he should become about twenty-four years old and take the plates of Nephi for further engraving of history, leaving the rest of the plates where they were (Mormon 1: 1-6).

Because of Lamanite encroachments northward between 375 A.D. and 379 A.D., Mormon took all the sacred records from the Hill Shim (Mormon 2: 18-31) and about 384 A.D. deposited them with the plates of Nephi in the Hill Cumorah, northward from the Hill Shim toward the east sea (Mormon 3: 1-8; Ether 4: 3, 4), and where the Jaredites and the Nephites in turn fought their last great battles (Ether 6: 83). Thus the brass plates and all the plates with the exception of Mormon's abridgment, the Book of Mormon, were left in the Hill Cumorah. Escaping northward Moroni carried with him the Book of Mormon plates which in 1823 were revealed to Joseph Smith in the state of New York (Mormon 3: 8). Presumably the brass plates and many others are still in the Hill Cumorah unless angelic hands have seen fit to remove them.

Perhaps the last mention we have of them is in a statement credited to David Whitmer in Richmond, Missouri, September 7, 1878, to the effect that the three witnesses not only saw the plates of the Book of Mormon, "but also the brass plates, the plates of the Book of Ether, the plates containing the wickedness of the world and the secret combinations of the world down to the time of their being engraved, and many other plates." (Latter Day Saint Biographical Encyclopedia, "Whitmer, David.") We do not vouch for the correctness of this reported statement, but under any circumstances the brass plates are yet to be revealed along with other ancient American sacred records. Containing as they did the history of the Jews from the beginning with their genealogy down to 600 B.C., the five books of Moses, the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zenos, Zenock, Neum, and others, the brass plates were of great value to the Nephites (I Nephi 1: 158-168, page 15; I Nephi 6: 1-4, page 67). They are yet to go forth "unto every nation, kindred, tongue and people, that they shall know of the mysteries contained thereon." They will retain their brightness, never being dimmed by time (Alma 17: 17-35, page 437; I Nephi 4: 164-170, page 15).

The prophecies of Zenos, Zenock, and Neum were freely quoted by Nephtite writers acquainted with the records on the brass plates (Book of Mormon, pages 65, 66, 177, 188, 426, 428, 630).

B. Are there any other records concerning these prophets?

We know of no record of them except in the Book of Mormon. There is a parallel case here to that of the Bible. The Bible mentions many prophets and writings not known to us today. (See Jude 14; Numbers 21: 14; Joshua 10: 13; I Samuel 10: 25; I Kings 11: 41; I Chronicles 29: 29; II Chronicles 9: 29; 12: 15; 12: 34.)

Question:

Why should I bother about joining a church so long as I live an honest life and treat everybody fairly?
Australia F. P.

Answer:

You must "bother about joining a church" in order to "live an honest life and treat everybody fairly." You must be honest and fair with God, too. This is not because he says that you must, but because only then are you a fair and honest person. And I am sure you will agree that it is not fair to receive all you do receive from your Heavenly Father and then to refuse to help him in the work he is trying to do for all mankind. Nor is it strictly honest to take the investments which he has made in you and use them according to your own wishes, disregarding the purpose which underlies the investment. God does not invest time and talent in you just for your sake. All his investments in you are for you plus those who might be blessed through you.

The insurance advertisements say that a man "owes his wife a living, dead or alive." In much the same fashion, dead or alive you owe your neighbor a testimony. You can give a much better testimony as a member of the church, cooperating with others according to the gifts of God to you and for the achievement of the purposes of God. This is obviously true while you are alive. It is also true after you have passed on. If you do join the church, and function as an active member in the church, you strengthen a living organism whose testimony goes on down the years when you may have been forgotten, but when a clear, strong testimony is still needed.

There are times when no man has a right to be neutral—when he is under moral obligation to take sides. This is one of those times. In the fight for the kingdom which is now going on, good men need to stand up and be counted.

From Girlhood to Maturity

By Frances Hartman

Fourteen pairs of eyes intently watching me, and fourteen intelligently alert minds absorbing my statements have become a fascinating and most responsible stewardship as I add my experiences to those of countless other church school teachers.

My class of young teen-age girls have expressed again and again in various ways their desire to become acquainted with the personal qualifications of sainthood as well as the qualities necessary for participating in the "great and marvelous work." Looking forward to those last years in their teens and early twenties, they desire also to know what place they can fill in the program of the church. I can remember my own ponderings along this line, and therefore can clearly understand their concern over, anticipation of, misgivings about, and faith in the future that seems heavy with war clouds which show hardly a glimpse of silver linings.

Most young men of the church are taught to study and prepare so that they will be qualified to occupy in the priesthood if the Lord chooses to call them. If they fail to receive instruction in their homes they are sure to glean some conception of this Restoration Movement in every church service they attend. Even the conflicts of the world are spoken of as basically essential to bring about the fulfillment of prophecies so that the time may come when the gospel will be proclaimed in every nation. In this respect the young men are made to feel that they are or may become a part of a great plan moving toward a definite goal, that of world peace and spiritual endowment.

Probably more intricate is the far-reaching and long-term teaching of young girls in their preparation for the place they are to fill in the scheme of life and the church. More often than not upon them will lie, in the ensuing years, the great burden of keeping their homes together and spiritual bonds alive. In a world that demands military service of its young men and long, hard, working hours from its older men, the women must rise to responsibilities not originally intended for them.

Today, most assuredly, girls are encouraged by the church to seek to fill the role of wifehood and motherhood wisely and well. The Skylark and Oriole movements are of tremendous benefit in training them in a well-balanced, general knowledge of homely activities. Not having had the privilege of this early training myself, I was amazed to learn as I accepted leadership of an Oriole circle just how thorough and helpful the program is. Surely it should be considered a great opportunity to parents to have their girls become affiliated in such church-wide organizations which lead the adolescent so gently and skillfully into adult participation of the Zionite endeavor.

But too many of our girls have been reared in broken or limited homes where they are not urged to share in these movements, where they are afraid to ask the questions, or where they would not be answered discreetly or altogether truthfully should their questions be expressed. Unfortunately, not all of them understand what filling the wifehood and motherhood role "wisely and well" actually consists of. In this event, it becomes the responsibility of the church school teacher to win the respect and friendship of each individual in the class so that a forty-five minute session becomes a week-long influence for good in young, impressionable lives. They must be taught that the qualities they need most to cultivate are as Titus expressed it, "to be sober, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home." Church girls must be different than nonmembers in their views and attitudes; they must be "peculiar" in their understanding, in their sense of ideals and morality if they are to come into their heritage.

Today's girls have been exposed to the world's views and often they desire to be recognized as individuals regardless of marital costs; they desire to be commended for personal merits to their own glory; they wish to have condoned their sins of omission in failing to see the need of performing each task presented to them with joyfulness, humility, and meekness of heart. Inhibitions in many adult lives can be traced to misconceptions during adolescence. Because this is true it may be that terms should be clarified; perhaps it should be especially pointed out to our girls that humility and meekness mean freedom from pride, arrogance, and conceit, but certainly do not mean a lack of either self-respect or the respect of others. This is especially true as girls accept life companionships. A wise woman will readily recognize the authority ordained of God and concede to dependence upon her husband, but at the same time will demand benevolence as the "weaker vessel," realizing the importance of Paul's instruction to men, "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it."

A short time ago one particular elder preached an exceptionally fine sermon about the life of Jesus. He did not, however, seem to realize the necessity of good women in the work of the kingdom, for he exclaimed repeatedly that "even though Mary was just a woman she was privileged to become the mother of Christ." It seemed useless to remind this brother, had I had the authority to do so, that Mary was "blessed among women," and had "found favor with God"; that hers was a special and wonderful stewardship in bringing forth the Son of God.

There are many women who have conformed to the laws of their inheritance, and perhaps because of this, have been blessed with the power and spirit to be great influences for good. Such was the influence in Timothy's life, of which Paul wrote "the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice."—II Timothy 1: 5. Of Dorcas it was written, "This woman was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did."—Acts 9: 36. It was related by Mark that after Christ had risen from the dead "he appeared first to Mary Magdalene," who had gone to the tomb with Mary, the mother of James, and Salome, to anoint his body. It was from the testimonies of these women that the disciples learned the joyful tidings of the Resurrection. In the early days of the Restoration we find that for twenty-two years the widow of Joseph Smith was given the great task of preserving the manuscript of the Inspired Version of the Bible, until it could be delivered safely into the hands of three men, appointed by the Annual Conference, for publication.

Surely the "Mothers in Israel" are needed today as never before, to minister to a needy people with tenderness and power in the humility that so becomes them, thus supplementing the missionary endeavors of the priesthood. Not alone upon the parents of girls rests the responsibility of their training toward this end, but upon every teacher and leader who prayerfully accepts the stewardship.

Mowing the Lawn

By Mrs. Kelton Shipley

Back in the good old days when we had a hand mower our lawn was kept in fairly good shape throughout the growing season, for with much puffing and wiping of sweat, and many a hard-earned blister, the woman of the house accomplished the task regularly. But then came the days of an operation, and of summer babies, so the stalwart husband gave orders, and took over the job. You would be surprised how suddenly such a "minor" job grew into a "major" job. You'd be surprised, too, how soon the old hand mower was replaced by an engine-propelled mower. No job is harder on the ordinary farm man than mowing the yard!

Now, our grass grows luxuriantly undisturbed for three or four weeks, and then the good man cranks up his motor and whizzes through it in the few minutes he waits on dinner some rainy day, and feels that the job is well done for another three weeks. The result—about as neat a job as a hacksaw would do. For where the old mower clipped the lawn, these modern power-driven, whirling-dervish machines chew it off, wear it out, and mess it up.

And, of course, there are always the usual interruptions that are enough to gray any woman prematurely. Other women's husbands can nonchalantly pick up the handle of a lawn mower and proceed to do the expected thing, but just let my husband crank this motor, and the entire community look askance at the deal. Then, of all times, they decide to have a chummy chat about the school problems of re-districting, or about the crop prospects for the year, or about a half dozen other things men talk about. Inevitably, too, Grandpa drops around to see if they shouldn't move the cattle from one pasture to another. And it is amazing how long it takes to settle such weighty problems!

Now, if the power mower were built in proportion to a woman's power, our lawn could still be kept under control, except under rare conditions, but as it is, it takes the muscles of a strong man to herd the thing out of the flower gardens and shrubs and keep it cutting grass. My chubby figure is not at all allergic to exercise, but there is a limit to its power and strength. Many another chubby woman can give supporting testimony. And so the rarity of a neatly clipped lawn on the Shipley homestead becomes even more rare. Consequently the sturdy new mower idly adorns one corner of the yard, or sits in solitary confinement in the woodshed, from one month's cutting to the next.

Moral of this story—keep your eye upon the man at the handle of the lawn mower.

New Horizons

By Pamela Price

THE CONGREGATION was singing the last stanza of "Higher Ground" when the door of the little white church creaked and someone quietly entered a back seat.

I arose from the piano bench and was walking to a near-by seat when my eyes rested on the latecomer—a colored man of middle age. My heart seemed suddenly to stop beating; I almost felt frightened. The minister spoke as if the neat, dark-skinned man were not present. But I was torn between two beliefs—that colored people should not associate with whites on the one hand, and that Christ loves all men and that all are brothers, on the other. I heard little of the sermon.

The meeting was over. Although I felt it my duty to welcome anyone who came to worship in the house of the Lord, I quickly bundled the snow suit on my two-year-old child and left the church without speaking to the visitor. That night a feeling of guilt swept over me as I knelt to pray.

"Our Father, if it is thy will, teach me to have love for people of all races," I asked, although I still could not feel brotherly love in my heart.

A few months passed, and the incident was almost forgotten. Then one day a letter came to me from Grace, a friend since childhood. She lived on a farm a number of miles away. I opened the letter quickly and read what she had written about her children, the church she attended, and her neighbors.

"I miss my old friends," she wrote, "but I have many good neighbors here. One of my best friends is Corrine, a colored lady, who lives in a four-roomed log house about a half mile away. I certainly enjoy her friendship."

I wondered as I read the last sentence if it would ever be possible for me to put aside my deep prejudices and enjoy the friendship of people of a different race.

I DECIDED TO MAKE a surprise visit to my friend's home. Later, on a beautiful summer afternoon, my little daughter and I boarded a bus for Harrisburg. Grace's home was located two miles from that little town, and I thought it would be fun walking those last two miles in the twilight. In the late afternoon I noted that to the north a great bank of dark clouds was growing darker and thicker every minute. The sun was being quickly hidden, and by the time we had arrived in the strange little town, darkness had settled over it like a cloak.

As the bus driver lifted my daughter off the steps I heard the low, heavy rumble of thunder. I realized that I should not attempt to walk the two miles to the farm. I looked around amazed to find that the town was composed of only two stores and a few other buildings. There was neither taxi nor hotel services available. We went into the nearest store where I explained the situation to a saleslady. She informed me that one of the customers in the store would be leaving soon for his home and that I might be able to ride with him. I gladly accepted his offer to take us one mile of the way. By the time we had driven the first mile, the storm seemed much nearer. As I stepped from the car I thanked the man, who made no offer to take me the last mile but assured me that if I hurried I could get to my destination before the storm arrived. The sky was lighted almost continually by great flashes of zig-zag lightning. As great claps of thunder shook the earth, I held my child closer and ran down the rough road. The cutting wind which brought with it sand and dirt made the few minutes on the road seem like an hour. As I looked up at the terrible storm I knew there was only One who could help us. Bowing my head I prayed, "Our Father, help us to find shelter that we may be protected from the storm."

I HAD WALKED only a few more steps when the lightning revealed before me the shelter for which I had prayed. It was a little log house. Here lived Grace's colored friend, Corrine, whose skin was darker than

Here Is the Writer . . .

Pamela Price was born and reared in Fisher, Arkansas. Since joining the church at the age of twelve she has served as primary teacher; supervisor of nursery, children's, and junior departments; Blue Bird leader; secretary to the women's department; and reunion and vacation church school teacher. In high school she was active in dramatics, sports, and glee club, editor of the school paper, and valedictorian of the senior class. She is married to Richard Price, a priest. They have one child, Fay, who is six years old. Their home is in Independence, and they attend the Enoch Hill Church.

mine and whose race I had never quite considered my equal.

I stood at the gate hesitating to enter. I visualized the shock some of my friends would feel if they ever found out that I had asked help of a Negro.

"Perhaps I can make it to Grace's," I hopefully thought, but the fierce wind and the falling hailstones made me realize that I had only one choice.

Timidly I knocked on the door.

"Oh, Miss Grace, what's happened to you?" Corrine cried as she opened the door.

"I'm not Grace, but I am her friend," I explained as she pulled me inside the lamp-lighted living room. As I stood shivering from cold and fright, I told her of my plan to surprise Grace.

"My child, you are as welcome as Grace is in our home. Come into this bedroom," she invited. The lamp she carried cast its light into the darkness, and I saw two little heads covered with cork-screw curls peer big-eyed from underneath a snow white sheet.

The house was not untidy as I had expected it to be; it was very neat and clean. The board floors were scrubbed until they were nearly white. On a little table was a worn Bible; above it on the wall hung a picture of Christ.

Hastily I explained that I did not wish to disturb the children by taking their bed. If I could only have a chair in which to sit that would be enough. I told her that I would leave as soon as the storm calmed.

"I will sit with you if you wish," offered Corrine as she placed a comfortable chair near me.

"No, thank you. Please get some sleep," I answered.

She must have sensed my embarrassment and fears for she did not offer again to sit with me. She quietly went about spreading blankets and quilts on the floor in her own bedroom. Corrine then put the children to bed on the floor, leaving their bed for me.

"I may have to seek refuge here," I thought. "But I simply cannot sleep in that bed."

HOURS PASSED and the storm raged on as if it would never end. The little one I rocked had long since gone to sleep. My arms ached, and my legs felt numb from having held her so long. At last I was too sick and tired to sit up any longer. Just as the big clock in the living room struck three, I stopped rocking and stumbled to the bed. Taking the baby's blanket, I pulled it up around her head so that no part of her would touch the bed. Ignoring the pillows, I laid my head on my arms.

"Oh, Father," I prayed, "why should this thing happen to me?" And then my mind went back to the night I had knelt and prayed, "Our Father, if it is thy will, teach me to have love for people of all races."

Immediately a warmth fell over me. With it came a peaceful assurance that God knew and understood my heart. Wide awake I heard a voice which declared:

*In Christ there is no East nor West.
In him no South nor North;
But one great fellowship of love
Throughout the whole wide earth.*

I had never liked nor understood that hymn before. Now its meaning was clear to me. Again the same voice declared, "God hath made of one blood all nations."

I lay marveling at the new revelation to my mind and the change of my heart. Had not God answered my prayer? This was his way of teaching me to love men of all races. Now I understood more of his own love.

Exhausted I laid my head upon the pillow and slept, for I was in the home of a child of God.

"Let nothing separate you from each other and the work whereunto you have been called; and I will be with you by my Spirit and presence of power unto the end."—D. and C. 122: 17.

A special outdoor fellowship service was held on a recent Sunday night with the theme, "I am a part of all that I have met." The Alpha Phi Omega, national service fraternity, arranged transportation to a wooded site about six miles from the campus where the campfire service was held. There, in a setting of natural beauty, members of the congregation told Graceland experiences and friendships that will always be a part of them.

On the following Wednesday, the fellowship was on the Graceland campus. In accordance with tradition this closing fellowship of the year was held outside on the quadrangle, the square of lawn in the center of the campus. Many Gracelanders expressed their regret at leaving and their appreciation for what they had gained at Graceland.

A baptismal service at the fountain followed the fellowship. Two students were baptized and confirmed immediately afterward in the college chapel.

Graduation was the keynote of the closing days of school. The annual cap and gown assembly was held in the year's last assembly period. Members of the sophomore class explained the history of the academic apparel, its meaning to the graduates, and its significance in the community and the church.

What Kind of Father?

but also our Heavenly Father. As we take our departure from him, we leave in his heart a concern and sorrow that will remain until the day we return.

Our chief concern is to bring men back to a closer relationship with God. In doing this, we shall experience the fullness of joy that God intended every man to have. At the same time, we shall eliminate from the heart of God the sorrow that men's departure from him causes.

I trust we shall not only think about the time when immortality and eternal life will be a reality but also return to God as individuals, as a people, as a nation, so that sorrow will be removed from the hearts of men and the heart of the Heavenly Father.

There is joy in heaven over one sinner who repents and returns to God. And until he does repent, there is sorrow and deep concern for him. God patiently, anxiously, longingly waits for his return.

Good people, that is the kind of Father we have in heaven. Instead of telling the story about a prodigal son, Jesus was telling of the love of God for erring humanity.

Horse in America Before Christ

One noon the students announced to Doctor Haury, "We have found a horse." He knew they were down far beyond the days of the Spaniards, who brought the first horses to this continent. . . . But they did have the teeth of a horse as large as an Indian Pony. Students of our antiquity have long told us that our only native horse was a diminutive species, the size of a lamb. This Ventana specimen, says Haury, definitely establishes the fact that a full-sized species had evolved in America long before the time of Christ. It had marked technical differences from the horses of Asia and why the species disappeared is anybody's guess.—Page 127. Quoted by permission of the publisher.

 QUESTION

There has been great discussion of the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and we have heard almost every angle of it debated but one. . . Here is a question for your next argument: Did the father do right in letting the young man have his half of the estate at that time? He knew the young fellow's character. Probably knew that he would go right out to some Sodom or Gomorrah and squander it in "riotous living." What would you have done in the circumstances?

 LATE SPRING

It was a cold, wet, late spring here in Home Town. The bluegrass in the lawns was a feeble, frowsy little bit of green. The trees and shrubs budded and then just sat there, waiting. The birds came, and found no leaves to give them any privacy for their home-making. The robins, disgusted, pulled cold worms out of muddy soil for breakfast. . . Then one day it warmed up and things popped. Dame Nature threw Spring abundance by the carload into our faces. Overnight the trees dressed themselves extravagantly in lush green foliage. Tulips and iris spilled a riot of color. Redbuds and dogwood, forsythia and spirea, mock orange and lilacs filled town and country with beauty and fragrance. At such a time of year it would not be hard to believe the legend that this could have been, originally, the Garden of Eden.

 TROUBLE

When you are in trouble, go to the humble people for help and understanding. For they know what trouble is; they have seen life in its harder aspects. They have met the basic problems. And because they have suffered they often know best how to show mercy.

 COURAGE

The Bible is a book of courage. For example, the concordance lists the phrase "Fear not" seventy times, fifty-five of them in the Old Testament, and fifteen of them in the New Testament.

 REFERENCES

Editors have just been working over a manuscript in which the author, in quoting the Book of Mormon, has included page references as well as the name of the book, chapter, and verses. This has greatly increased the ease and speed of checking, both for the editor and for the ultimate reader. We thank this brother, and commend his good example to others who quote passages from the Book of Mormon. Page numbers, of course, refer to the Authorized Edition.

These titles mean he is in charge of extra-class functions, such as all-school activities, any scheduling of off-campus activities, clubs, and other social groups, the student council, student housing, counseling, and all student personnel records. In the various administrative committees of the college he represents the developmental interest of the student and also the division of extra-class activities. He teaches such courses as educational psychology, introduction to Christian religion, and personnel guidance.

Mr. Ritchie was born in Desdemona, Texas, and reared in Breckenridge, Texas, where he was graduated from high school with honors in 1937. After working a year and a half as an assistant to a drygoods salesman, traveling in the Texas Panhandle and Oklahoma, he enrolled at Texas Technological College at Lubbock. At the end of his first year he took an examination to become an aviation cadet and began his training in November, 1941. While in the Air Force he spent one and a half years as an instructor, one and a half years as a night fighter pilot, and one year in administration as the executive officer of a service group. Then he enrolled at Graceland, from which he graduated in 1947. While at Graceland he was editor of the Graceland Tower, a member of the student council, and a member of Lambda Delta Sigma, as well as being active in campus activities. In June, 1947, he enrolled at the University of California at Berkeley, receiving his bachelor's degree in September, 1948, with a major in the field of psychology and a minor in sociology. He continued his studies at the university until August, 1949, when he came to Graceland as Dean of Student Personnel. He has completed the requirements for a master's degree in sociology on the power relations between family and state as political groups.

While attending Graceland in 1946, he met Bobby Ann Gossadge of Louisville, Kentucky, and they were married in Graceland's Chapel on May 30, 1947. They

News and Notes

NEWS OF THE PRESIDENTS

President Israel A. Smith has returned from his trip to Mexico.

President W. Wallace Smith preached at the Stone Church June 3 at the evening service and assisted in the ordination of Myron Zerr to the office of high priest. Brother Zerr will also serve as a member of the Stake High Council.

President F. Henry Edwards delivered the address at both Communion services June 3 at the Stone Church.

TOUR WEST

During April Apostle Paul M. Hanson and Elder Russell F. Ralston completed an extended visit to places where there are church interests in Idaho, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado. At the conclusion of the trip a successful priesthood meeting was held in Delta, Colorado. This was essentially for the Western Colorado District, and was attended by 100 per cent of the priesthood membership. At Phoenix and Tucson new church buildings are nearing completion.

AWARDS TO STUDENTS

Out of twenty-four awards made to seniors in the graduating class of William Chrisman High School in Independence, eleven were received by young people of the church. Two of the awards made to students were given to church members, and the De Paw Scholarship was awarded a church boy. There were 316 students in the graduating class, and 101 were church members. Ruth Elser, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Otto Elser of the West College Branch, had the highest scholarship rating in the graduating class.

GRADUATES HONORED

Sixty-eight members of the class of '51 attended the senior honor banquet sponsored by the Center Stake, May 22, at the South Chrysler Church. Elder Fred O. Davies was the guest speaker. Also featured on the program were Virgil Woodside, who sang a medley of songs accompanied by Phil Stevens; Bishop Harold Cackler, who offered the invocation; Mrs. Arlene Cackler, who gave a humorous reading; Glaude Smith, master of ceremonies; Elder Marion Talcott, who offered the benediction; and Carl Mesle, song leader. The decorations were prepared by mothers of graduates who are members of the stake women's department.

MUSIC CLINIC IN WARRENSBURG

A music clinic was held for the Central Missouri Stake May 27. Aleta Runkle, Bethel Knoche, and Franklyn Weddle were instructors. Brother Weddle delivered the morning sermon. Norma Smith, also of Independence, attended the institute and accompanied the children's choir. Choirs of the stake attended as well as the children's choir from Holden, Missouri.

PROGRESS IN NEW YORK

The Niagara Falls, New York, Branch has increased its baptisms 10 per cent, and the Binghamton, New York, Branch has increased its baptisms 11 per cent. Largely because of these two branches, the New York District has doubled its percentage in the last two years.

Bigger Barns?

"I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee."—Luke 12: 20-22.

THE FARM HOME had been built some years ago of good materials not available at any price now. It was substantial, roomy, conservative, and comfortable—the kind of home that a man of property might dream about for his later years. There was an orchard near the house such as children would love to play in. And in the big barn they would find a pleasant refuge on a rainy day. It had modern equipment for the cows and horses. Beyond it there was a pretty meadow, cultivated fields, and rolling pastures.

The host told the story of the place. It had been developed by a man who had done well in his business. Then ambition bit him, and he caught a fever for greater things. He mortgaged the place, a depression struck, and he lost everything. From bigger barns he went to no barn at all.

* * * * *

YOU REMEMBER Aesop's fable about the dog who was carrying a bone. Crossing a bridge, he saw his reflection in the water. The other dog's bone down there seemed much bigger and more desirable than his own. He growled and plunged down to get it. He lost his own bone and went home hungry.

* * * * *

ON THE HIGHWAY between Independence and Lamoni there is a farm where the traveler can see a big new barn on a hill. The owner really put his heart into that building. But the house where he keeps his wife and children is small, old, and unpainted. One need not see the family to know what the state of their minds may be. It is not hard to imagine what kind of man the husband is or how the wife feels. And nobody needs to say what the children are getting out of life.

Would it be poetic justice to require that man to live in the barn with his animals? The place is symbolic of the people. If there is any concern for souls there, it is not revealed in anything that may be seen.

* * * * *

YOU understand why Jesus told the story about barns and the successful farmer to his disciples. They were concerned largely about physical and material things. Jesus was concerned about souls. The soul is more important than the body. It is the only thing that endures.

There was a man facing death, but he didn't know it. He probably had a case of heart trouble. He had worked hard and worn his body out. But his eyes were still bright, his hopes were high, and he believed in himself. Too bad he couldn't have believed in God, too.

With what kind of garments does a soul go into the presence of God? Perhaps we must be clothed with the love of family and friends, the quality of our experience, and memories of service. How will you feel when God searches your soul with his penetrating gaze?

Editorial

AN ELDERLY FRIEND visited me. He wasn't lavishly dressed. He had never set his heart on wealth, although he had always met his family needs in a worthy way. But here was a man who could be respected for the rich furnishing of his mind. He had gathered a library of great thoughts in the archives of his memory. He had a love of people, or he wouldn't have bothered to visit me.

There is greatness of soul in that man. He has walked mountain heights in the spirit to be with God. . . . I don't believe that he ever worried very much about a barn.

* * * * *

BARNs CAN be put to great uses. That stable where Jesus was born was part of a barn, the most famous barn in all history. Israel Rogers had a grain barn at his home in Kendall County, Illinois, that is quite famous in the history of the Reorganization. A semi-annual conference was held there in October, 1859, and our present publication had its start in a resolution passed by that body.

A building is significant for how people use it. What saloon ever reflected the glory of God while it remained a saloon? What pool hall was ever a center of culture and refinement? What cocktail bar was ever noted for saving people's money or reclaiming sinners?

If you should visit a crystal gazer, you might be surprised to hear her say, "I see a barn in your future!" Would it be the "bigger and better" barn of that man who died in the night of coronary thrombosis? Or would it be the lowly manger where the infant Christ child was born?

If we must put our hearts into barns, let us put our barns to great uses.

Travelogs

I SUPPOSE EVERYONE who has much administrative responsibility finds how true is the old adage: "Procrastination is the thief of time." The thought comes forcibly home after months of delay as I try to pick up the broken threads of my travel experiences. Yes, tragically broken so soon after my return last year to America from the Pacific area. As I resume, I do so only because I am under an impulsion at last to bring my account down to date. And it is strange how human nature is so easily lured away from the difficult task! How many things come along which we would rather do, and so often the lesser thing looks the more important. Did not Socrates drink the "hemlock bowl" for such a "crime"?

As I pen these words I am in the ancient city of Mexico, the capital of a country of contrasts. I hear the hum of a great city of three million people, the honking of automobiles, the noise of streetcars and buses all so modern; but a few blocks away is a cathedral built early in the sixteenth century.

My readers are doubtlessly aware of the fact that soon after my return from Australia—October 8 last, to be exact—my companion for more than four decades, the mother of my two sons, was called home to her reward. She passed away in her sleep.

This sudden change in my life has been difficult, indeed, and it brought about conditions and attitudes that have disrupted the tenor of my daily life. I am indeed grateful that I have kind, considerate, capable associates in the Presidency who have done much to relieve me; yet there are and have been many and cumulative burdens I feel I must carry alone.

And so, after these months, I strive to take up where I left off, as far as these Travelogs are concerned, though I would not have you believe my life has been without its activities, as evidenced by my many memoranda.

IN PASSING I feel impressed to pay a tribute to Sister Nina—and I believe you will bear with me for a little aside for a word about her who was the greatest personality in my life.

As I shall think of her, her high ideals and her loyalties stand out. I have been a poor man, and we went through some rather hard experiences, but she never complained; and when the church needed me she always put it first in her life.

She was a good mother and did what she could to bring up our boys to be men of character. One we lost, and I am sure her impress on him who remains will be for his good throughout his life.

She loved my father as much as if she were his daughter, and he loved her. When, soon after he died, Ada, my stepmother, too, was called in death, it fell to us in a way to look after my three half-brothers. She was like a mother to them and never lost her interest in their welfare.

I had been prepared for her passing by a spiritual experience while in Australia from which I was given to know her death would happen when I was away from her, and the hour, which indeed corresponded with what the doctor indicated.

In her personal scrapbook I found two poems, one by Kathleen Forbush and one by Harriett Beecher Stowe. I do not know when she clipped them for her book but I believe it was not long ago. I am sure both harmonized with her own ideals and thought. The first one, read at her funeral by Brother John Sheehy, is as follows:

TO A HUSBAND

When I must go, I pray thee do not weep;
Remembered love and joyous laughter keep.
If we should meet again in future time,
Forgotten then this little gypsy rhyme,
My life be there, the same as it's been here,
And endless time for loving you, my dear.
A few small cares to keep our hope in sight;

Some tears for you to kiss away at night;
Some tiny pain through which we joy might know;
Some anxious moments, too, my dear; and oh!
Some wee ones yet, whose ways through mischief tread;
Your shoulder, dear, at night to rest my head—
It will be heaven if these things are so,
And I'll not hesitate, my dear, to go.
If heaven be not this, then shed no tear—
Remember, I have had my heaven here!

Brother Sheehy has told me that he has received a number of requests that this be printed, and it is proper to do so, I think, at this time.

The second to me seems to reflect her thought about death—and certainly she must have thought much about it:

THE OTHER WORLD

It lies around us like a cloud,
A world we do not see;
Yet the sweet closing of an eye
May bring us there to be.

Its gentle breezes fan our cheeks
Amid our worldly cares;
Its gentle voices whisper love
And mingle with our prayers.

So still, so soft, so sweet they glide,
So near to press they seem,
They lull us gently to our rest
And melt into our dreams.

Thus in the hour of rest,
It's easy now to see
How easy and how sweet to pass
The hour of death may be:

To close the eye and close the ear,
Wrapped in a dream of bliss;
And gently drawn in loving arms,
To swoon from that to this.

Truly her passing was well described: "And gently drawn in loving arms, to swoon from that to this."

I trust my readers will indulge me in this digression for one who played a considerable role in the life of the Saints at Independence. In retrospect I often wonder if I had merited such a companion.

REFRESHING MY MEMORY, I find that my last story (at Tahiti) ended as follows: "Brother Siegfried

Are You Saved?

By Paul Wellington

WHILE WAITING in the assembly hall of a small Midwestern college in 1946, I struck up a conversation with a young Protestant minister on the subject of religion. Each of us was interested in the other's viewpoints—so we talked for nearly an hour. We were thoroughly engrossed in our subject when we became aware of a young woman seated near by listening intently to our conversation. As we glanced at her, she asked, "Are you saved?"

* * * * *

This is a question frequently asked today by members of certain Christian organizations. To many this approach to the subject of religion is distasteful. In this modern age there seems to be a touch of self-righteous piety surrounding the individual who asks this question.

Nevertheless Latter Day Saints cannot afford to sneer or make fun of the query—that is, if they expect to make friends or to be able to talk intelligently and tolerantly with such friends. We should be considerate of their views, for we, too, are often misunderstood with our concepts and manner of speech.

Definition of Salvation

What does "Are you saved?" connote? There are different meanings derived from the word "saved." Webster's dictionary gives this theological definition: "delivered from the bondage of sin and its consequences; redeemed; ransomed or liberated as from captivity or obligation; especially by the atonement of Christ."

Many shades of meaning are derived from this definition by Christian denominations. Some imply salvation as being a condition of liberation from the result of sin (which is death, according to Romans 6: 23). If this is all that is implied by the term "salvation," then Reorganized Latter Day Saints believe that all men are saved—regardless of the type of life they live (I Corinthians 15: 22), because future life is promised the whole human race. However the important thing to consider is the kind of a future life it shall be.

Many use the terms "saved" and "converted" synonymously, thereby implying that being saved is a condition of having been converted to Christ—of having accepted him as their personal Savior. If that is what saved means, then Reorganized Latter Day Saints believe they are saved.

Others feel that conversion to Christ brings them into a condition of perfection in which they are incapable of committing sin again. This condition they call salvation. Reorganized Latter Day Saints do not recognize conversion as bringing about an immediate condition of perfection. They feel they are still capable of erring and committing sin. They do, however, expect such perfection can be attained through growth under the tutelage of Christ's personal ministry.

They think of the elements of salvation as including a condition of having endless life with or in the near proximity of Christ or God. It is usually thought of as being a condition of future life. They also see different degrees of salvation, dependent upon the spiritual quality achieved in this life.

Things That Save

Even if and when all Christians reach the viewpoint of Reorganized Latter Day Saints on the definition of salvation, there lies a need of reaching agreement on the things necessary to bring about that condition. All Christians have practically the same Bible (same original source) and find practically word for word the same writings concerning salvation. Yet individual interpretations of each passage vary considerably.

Probably all Christians hold the following Scriptures as containing essential truths in the concept of salvation:

- John 8: 31—saved "if ye continue in my word"
- Acts 4: 12—saved by "Christ"
- I Corinthians 21—saved by "foolishness of preaching"
- I Corinthians 15: 1, 2—saved by "gospel"
- II Corinthians 7: 10—saved by "godly sorrow working repentance"
- II Timothy 3: 15—saved by "holy scriptures making thee wise"
- Hebrews 5: 9—saved by "obedience"
- James 1: 21—saved by "engrafted word [gospel]"
- I John 1: 7—saved by "walking in the light"

But a number of other scriptural quotations concerning salvation are now the basis of quite divergent views among people.

Latter Day Saints believe that Hebrews 6: 1, 2 (Authorized Version) summarizes the essential beginnings of salvation:

Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment.

This Scripture points out the fundamental doctrines of Christ (faith toward God, repentance from dead works, baptisms, laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment) as principles upon which one must build in order to go on unto perfection. Latter Day Saints feel the consistent everyday effort to live and improve Christian attitudes and actions is required to obtain the perfection spoken of in the Scripture. For those who do not obtain perfection, there is a type or degree of salvation commensurate with their spiritual achievements (I Corinthians 15: 41, 42).

Harmony of the Scriptures Teaching Salvation

Reorganized Latter Day Saints believe there is complete harmony between the teachings of Hebrews 6: 1, 2 and all other Scriptures in the Bible on the subject of salvation. And they believe it necessary to harmonize all these Scriptures if they would truthfully present their beliefs to the world for careful scrutiny. One of the legitimate charges hurled at modern Christianity has been its insistence upon taking one verse or text out of its biblical context and using it as the basis for proving a point of doctrine. Reorganized Latter Day Saints believe they can put their beliefs to the test of any and all Scriptures. They believe that if all Scriptures concerning salvation are studied in their context, they will harmonize with others studied in their context.

A Chronological Order of Instructions

When studying a particular Scripture, the student must relive the experience in which the statement is recorded and evaluate the counsel for use in today's world:

Is the statement general and applicable to all people everywhere?

Or is it directed to a particular person in a certain situation?

If particular, should it be applied generally?

Is the statement directed to an adult or to a child?

Could it or should it apply to both?

What previous instructions have been given on the subject?

A great error is often made in reading Scriptures by the failure to recognize a chronological order of happenings and instructions in any life situation. In real life we recognize it. For instance, if a hermit suddenly appeared in a community and for the first time became aware of the custom of marriage, he might ask, "What do I do to get married?" The reply to him would probably be, "Why, first you must find a woman who will love you and agree to marry you!" Then he would have to be given additional instruction (as he needed it) to eventually culminate the marriage.

A similar situation was met frequently by Christ and his disciples in their real life situations with the Jews and Gentiles who made contact with Christianity for the first time. Often the question was raised: "What must I do to be saved?" And as each situation differed, so did the reply differ, depending upon the degree of understanding held by the new prospect. Notice the answer given in the following situations in response to the degree of understanding the hearer had:

1. Acts 16: 25-40 records Paul and Sila's encounter with a jailer. This being the jailer's first experience with such great Christian power, he was unlearned in the teachings of the Christ. So, in response to his question, "What must I do to be saved?" the first logical instruction to give to him was, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." You will note in verses 32 and 33 that Paul and Silas talked to the jailer and his family at greater length and culminated his talk by baptizing them. The Bible does not record the rest of the teachings of that hour, but apparently belief on the Lord Jesus Christ was explained more fully—to the extent that the jailer and his family saw the need of taking further action in their journey toward perfection.

2. Acts 2 tells of the experience of the day of Pentecost after Christ's death, resurrection, and ascension. On this day the disciples experienced many miraculous spiritual gifts. Many non-Christians witnessed the occasion; and in verse 37 it is recorded that many asked Peter: "What shall we do?" Peter's reply was, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Why did he not say, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ"? Because they already did! The spiritual experiences they had witnessed that day and the words they had heard had already convinced them of the authenticity of Jesus Christ. So it was a logical and chronological order of instructions that was given them.

Omissions, Not Repudiations

The chronological giving of instructions can be traced through all the accounts concerned with the subject of salvation. The doctrines of faith toward God, repentance from dead works, baptism (water and Holy Spirit), laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment are all important beliefs and practices in attaining salvation and perfection. Sometimes this continuity of teaching may not seem to be recorded clearly in the Bible; but when it is studied thoroughly, its completeness will appear. The exact wording may be absent, but the meaning is there. (Note the following: Mark 16: 15, 16—repentance implied in term "gospel"; Acts 3: 19—the word "converted" is a widely inclusive word; I Peter 3: 21—Peter speaks to already-converted Christians; Acts 9: 17—the account of Paul's conversion.)

Faith Versus Works

Apparently divergent views of salvation by faith and works exist today based on the following New Testament Scriptures:

For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast.—Ephesians 2: 8, 9.

Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling.—Philippians 2: 12.

Today's view comes from a misunderstanding of the counsel given by the church leaders to the disciples of that day. This misunderstanding again comes through the failure to take into consideration that a Scripture must be kept in its setting. One must consider to whom the counsel is directed, what its historical background is, whether it is general or particular counsel, if there has been previous instruction, or more complete instruction given later in the same situation.

There really is no conflict between the views expressed in the Scriptures just quoted. Both views are correct! People are saved by faith; and people are saved by works! In fact, there are others who are saved without either.

A look at the life-cycle of man will help illustrate when such conditions of salvation are possible:

(1) Jesus recognized a condition of salvation in the lives of children as he said, "of such is the kingdom of heaven." If a child fails to reach an age of accountability (age of being responsible for recognizing right from wrong) he is not condemned for the impossibility of gaining faith in Christ or accumulating works. Here is a condition in which neither faith nor works are a determining factor in salvation. A child, in death, is without sin and receives a type of salvation. (He will undoubtedly in a future life receive faith for a more complete salvation.)

(2) A person of accountability is held responsible for his acts. He must make a choice when presented a knowledge of Christ. He must accept or reject him and his teachings. If he accepts the Christ, he is promised remission of his sins through following the instructions given as necessary to express this acceptance: (a) expressing faith in Christ; (b) being truly repentant; and (c) being baptized. This promise is recorded in Acts 2: 38, 39: "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." Such obedience to the instructions brings with it a condition of salvation (Mark 16: 15, 16). This is salvation brought about by an expressive faith in Christ and his teachings. Through the grace of God, Christ was given to the world; through faith in this Christ comes salvation.

(3) Following conversion, man still finds the necessity of making choices. He discovers himself in error and sin at times. He realizes as did the Apostle Paul: "When I would do good, evil is present with me, for I delight in the law of God after the inward man: But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members."—Romans 7: 21-23, Authorized Version. So Paul and other leaders of early Christianity emphasized the necessity of developing work habits to overcome the "sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us." Paul says again, "We, then, as workers together with him beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain." Then he lists the important acts which keep this grace from becoming vain (II Corinthians 6:1-10).

The Apostle Peter emphasizes: "Give diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things ye shall never fail; for so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."—II Peter 1: 10, 11.

It is to the converted Christian that the instructions to achieve salvation by works are given. For he may fall if not zealously engaged in good works. "Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation . . ."—Philippians 2: 12. "Faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone . . . Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? . . . For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also."—James 2.

It is to the unconverted prospect, or recently converted Christian looking in retrospect, that the instruction to achieve salvation by faith is given: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."—Acts 16: 31. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God."—Ephesians 2: 8.

It is to the unaccountable human (child, and probably mentally retarded adult) that Christ speaks as he recognized their salvation and freedom from sin without the expression of faith or works.

* * * * *

"Let us go on unto perfection" is sound advice for the aggressive Christian who seeks salvation complete. This admonition recorded in Hebrews 6 challenges Christians to overcome the feeling of having arrived. Salvation is the end result of all of life lived at its best! "He that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved."—Mark 13:13.

Author's note: Many of these original thoughts were presented by Elder Carl F. Wheeler, Medina, Texas, in a sermon at San Antonio, Texas, during World War II. Later they were expanded and used by the author.

Initial Judgment

Dr. Donald A. Laird once asked a class of boys at Colgate University to write down as fast as they could the initials of people they disliked. In a half minute some boys could think of only one person, others listed as many as fourteen. And those who disliked the largest number were the boys who, Dr. Laird had discovered from previous research, were themselves the most widely disliked.

How "Young Joseph" Came to Amboy

Selections from the "Autobiographical Sketches" of Edmund C. Briggs of the Council of Twelve

Part VI: Preparations for General Conference, 1860

SELECTING DELEGATES IN WESTERN IOWA

Tuesday, March 6, 1860: I find Elder Leland here, and he has an appointment for this evening . . . He has a letter from Elder W. W. Blair received some time since, soliciting the branches of Western Iowa to send delegates to the General Conference. . . .

* * * * *

Wednesday, March 7, 1860: The Gallands Grove Branch met at ten o'clock this forenoon to perfect arrangements to appoint a delegate to the Amboy, Illinois, conference to be held April 6. Just previous to our assembling, Elders McIntosh and McCord asked me if I expected to attend the General Conference. I replied, "No, sir, I have given it up." They wished me to be their delegate.

The assembly was called to order by Elder Uriah Roundy, and by motion Elder William Vanausdall was chosen chairman; he requested me to open meeting by prayer. While I was bowed in supplication, the spirit of prophecy filled the room and said, "It is my will that my servant shall attend the conference and declare my word to the assembly of my people." At the same time I saw my own name before me. [Apparently this experience came only to Brother Briggs.]

The president then stated the object of the meeting, and many others made remarks, all favoring the appointment of a delegate. I then moved that Elder Andrew Jackson be appointed delegate. This was seconded by Elder McIntosh, and Brother Jackson was declared by unanimous vote our representative to the General Conference. The question of defraying the expenses was then introduced, and Elder Jackson said, "I will bear my own expenses. I have the money and am willing to do it."

After the meeting closed Brethren McCord and McIntosh asked me again, "Are you going to attend the Amboy conference?" I replied that I was and had received evidence while opening the meeting that I should go. They both said, "I think you should go," and Brother McCord gave me two and one-half dollars and McIntosh a one-dollar gold piece to bear expenses. . . .

* * * * *

Lelands Grove, Saturday, March 10, 1860: I came home with Brother Leland fifteen miles from Gallands Grove. It is beautiful weather. I have never experienced a milder winter. There has been but little wind and few cold days. It almost seems providence to me, as I have been very actively engaged all winter. When not in public meetings, I have gone from house to house, visiting both members and nonmembers, and my whole conversation has been upon the gospel of Christ, and prophesying of the coming of Joseph, and the ultimate triumph of the latter-day work. Yesterday I received evidence again by the Holy Spirit that I should attend the April conference, and I am now on my journey, hoping to reach the Amboy conference, though my raiment is badly worn, almost threadbare, with only three dollars and fifty cents to supply needed apparel and expenses. . . .

* * * * *

Council Bluffs, Monday, March 12, 1860: I came to my brother Edwin's house. His wife and daughter Leronia are well, and I find eight letters from correspondents, most of them being good news of the latter-day work and the revival of the Saints in the Reorganization. . . . Brother W. W. Blair writes a nice letter of the work where he has labored in Illinois. His wife, Elizabeth, in her excellent and encouraging letter to me, says: "Elder Blair has been gone from home much of the time this winter, but we have been having some very excellent meetings in our branch, and recently we received a manifestation of the Spirit in which it was said Joseph will be at our conference the sixth of April, and brother Ed, I believe it."

I cannot say that this item of Sister Blair's struck me with very much force. It seemed too good news to have it fulfilled so soon. In fact, it had been the theme of my fondest hope for nearly sixteen years that the Martyr's oldest son would be his successor in the prophetic office, and I had received so many divine evidences by the Spirit of God that he would be called to fill that important office. But to have it come to pass so soon as our April Conference, I could not believe, and the thought soon passed from my mind, . . .

Brother Isaac Sheen's letter is encouraging; he is getting letters from many of the scattered Saints attesting their love for this latter-day work. He acknowledges receipt of money I have sent him.

Tuesday, March 13, 1860. My brother Edwin gave me three dollars, and I purchased a pair of boots for six dollars and fifty cents.

EXPENSES PAID

Farm Creek, Wednesday, March 14, 1860: I arrived at Brother Beebe's at eight o'clock in the evening. It has been a very tedious day to me. I am tired and weary physically, but my mind has been lit up and strengthened all day. A retrospective view of my whole life and experience in the latter-day work has passed before me; the sure evidence I have received of the divinity of the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants and the choice Seer's wonderful work to bless the human family gave me comfort of heart and tended to prompt my love for all my fellow men. It filled me with a great desire to do all I can during my life to make this world better because I am in it. But this evening with the light of day all gone, chilly and weary after a long ride in the saddle, I was surprised as I stood for Brother Beebe to open his door for me, that instead of his usual salutation of welcome, he said, "O Brother Briggs, you are on the way to conference, and I have the money to bear your expenses." I answered, "You are going with me." He replied, "I think not, but I have the money to send you."

Yes, this is wonderful. I can now understand why I must dismiss this whole matter of expense from my mind "for the Lord will certainly open up the way before you so you can attend the General Conference at Amboy." Truly, nothing but God's Holy Spirit could have moved upon Brother Beebe to have made me such a liberal offer to bear my expenses to the conference upon the impulse of the moment as soon as he saw me this evening.—SH 50: 460-463. May 20, 1903.

Thursday, March 22. Prayer meeting this evening at Brother Beebe's was a spiritual feast to the Saints, who were confirmed in our blessed hope. My sister, Mary Stiles, gave me some new linen apparel and money, and Sister Harriet Richards some other raiment, bright and new. So I am nicely clothed to attend our conference. It is marvelous how I am favored when I am in need. I am glad I have not worried over my wants. Truly the Lord has provided just as he promised. . . .—SH 50: 578. June 24, 1903.

Visions and Angels

By Israel A. Smith

A CONTEMPORARY RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE published in Canada recently presented a comprehensive discussion of a belief in angels, "celestial beings and their ministry in heaven and here on earth," using as a text Luke's statement (24: 23, A. V.): "They had seen a vision of angels which said that he was alive."

The writer, after discussing arguments contra, says, "If we believe the Bible, we must believe in angels," and supports this general thesis by giving a digest from both books of the Bible. In the Old Testament, angels are mentioned in "nearly every book." They are Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, Judges, I and II Samuel, I and II Kings, I Chronicles, Psalms, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Zechariah, and Daniel. Angels are mentioned nearly a hundred times (ninety-eight to be exact).

In the New Testament there are more than that: In Matthew 19, Mark 5, Luke (the scientist) 24, John 4, Acts 21, the Epistles 32, and 75 in Revelation.

The writer asks, "What does Modernism do with all these references?" Then he practically answers his own question. He believes what he wants to believe, for in a later paragraph, in dealing with the Hebrew disbelief in the gospels' account of the Resurrection, he says, "Liberal theology has little use for angels, visions, ecstasies, or opening skies," and quotes this paragraph from an undisclosed source:

That such phenomena had a useful place in what we have called "the ministry of error," need not be doubted. They do not verify any one religion. They are cradles for temporary use which the growing child will leave behind him . . . As already suggested, the general psychology of the Hebrews would provide for the Hebrew mind the idea of extraneous origin for many experiences which we should call normal.

He then makes reference to certain "pseudo-prophets," among whom he names, for example, Mohammed, Buddha, and Joseph Smith.

The experiences of these men, as with many others, according to the "liberal trend," are to be explained by the "psychology of prophecy." The writer resists that theory and says such rationalization is utterly foreign to the whole spirit of the narrative and rests on "anti-supernaturalistic bias."

From which we conclude we can believe stories of angels if told by those who are accepted as prophets, but not if told by "pseudo-prophets." Make your classification according to your bias or prejudice, then belief or disbelief becomes mechanical or automatic.

There comes a story out of Palestine, in which angels, or supernatural personages, have been seen, it is alleged, which is receiving much publicity. Arthur U. Michelson, editor of The Jewish Hope, a Christian magazine, recently visited Palestine, and his story of the events was published in full in Saints' Herald of April 23, 1951. Two instances are given in which military action was halted by the intervention of mysterious personalities.

In the first instance the Jews had decided to give up and surrender the city. Then this happened, according to Dr. Michelson:

The Arabs suddenly threw down their arms and surrendered. When their delegation appeared with the white flag, they asked, "Where are the three men that led you, and where are all the troops we saw?" The Jews told them that they did not know anything of the three men, for this group was their entire force. The Arabs said that they saw three persons with long beards and flowing white robes, who warned them not to fight any longer, otherwise they would all be killed.

Later as the Jews were surrounded by the armies of the Egyptians and the Arabs in the Negev area and were about to capitulate—but let Dr. Michelson tell it:

More or Less Random Reflections

I am told that on the occasion of President Israel A. Smith's seventy-fifth birthday, not so long ago, Bishop James Keir called him up on the phone and inquired, "How does it feel to be seventy-five years old?" President Smith replied, "You will know in just five more days."

Money Out of the Window

Some years ago two missionaries, Frank Russell and I, were taking a train trip in Colorado, west from Colorado Springs. Presently the news butcher, a rather young man, came through the car hawking his wares. Frank bought a copy of the Rocky Mountain News and gave the lad five pennies. In those days car windows were open in summertime, and the newsboy, with lofty disdain, turned, threw the pennies out of the car window, and said, "Chicken feed!" I never forgot the look of amazement that came over Frank's face. Then he said, "That lad may see the day when he will wish he had those pennies." The prediction may have come true. Presently the depression was upon us and that young man, older grown, may have been among the men out of work who stood on street corners and said to passers-by, "Brother, can you spare a dime for a cup of coffee?"

For several years our Uncle Samuel has been throwing money out of the window—and not pennies. I wonder! He has had the assistance of a lot of greedy, in-or-out-of-office persons who came with baskets and shovels to help themselves. Again I wonder. All this is not to apply to money spent carefully in worthy projects of defense and help to other peoples. It refers to millions thrown out of the window, reckless of a day of accounting.

Childhood's Make-Believe Realm

Children of tender age live in a strange world in which it is difficult for them to draw a line between the real and the imaginary. Their play is real; their dreams are real. Every boy with two toy guns and a "Hop-along suit" to himself is a real cowboy. This inability to distinguish the difference between the make-believe and the factual leads children to tell tall tales that perplex their elders, if they do not understand. I wonder how the Puritans dealt with such youthful prevaricators. Not gently, I imagine.

At the breakfast table a few years ago we were discussing a news story from St. Louis. A boy visiting the zoo had pressed too close to the bear's den, and a bear had dragged him into the den and mauled him badly. I thought it would be a good story, by way of warning, for little David to hear. But evidently David, then perhaps three and a half year's old, thought the boy in the bear's den was getting too much attention and he too little. So David inflated his chest and said, "One day I was at the zoo in Griffith's Park. I got too close to the chicken's pen and an old hen grabbed me and dragged me into the pen." I inquired, "What was the old rooster doing?" Without batting an eye David replied, "Oh, he was chasing another little boy." We changed the subject. It was getting out of hand.

As children grow up, generally they come to distinguish between the make-believe and the real. It is a shock to learn that Santa is make-believe. But of themselves they come to see that Santa cannot come down a chimney with that big pack of toys. So they learn to condition their language and thought to fit the realm of "things as they are."

However, some people never seem to grow up. Apparently many sponsors of miracle products advertised over radio and television are still juvenile. Witness the tall and fantastic stories about soaps and cigarettes and Hadacol.

The Good Patient Gets Good Service

At one time I was a patient in the Battle Creek Sanitarium, on advice of our church physicians. When I was leaving that institution my doctor, a good Adventist minister and a physician of national reputation, said to me, "Reverend Smith, I congratulate you on being a patient who has been 100 per cent co-operative." I replied, "I have been about hospitals enough to observe that if one wishes good service he should be a good patient." Physicians and nurses are human. They give their best when it is appreciated. More than that, no matter how fine their intentions, they cannot give their best to unco-operative patients.

I have known a few of our own people who came away from our Independence Sanitarium and Hospital full of fault-finding. The food was bad, the nurses not attentive. I suspect that those people made it difficult for both nurses and physicians. On the other hand I have known many of our own people and some nonmembers who left the "San" with the warmest praise for that wonderful institution. They had no fault to find with the food and marveled that the nurses could be so efficient, patient, kind, and helpful. Those people were good patients.

A Testimony

Going back to the Battle Creek Sanitarium—did I ever tell you about my operation? No? Well, I am not intending to do so now. However, I do wish to bear a testimony to something that happened afterward.

The operation came very close to my vocal cords and evidently caused the surgeon much anxiety. It left me with a voice that was a cross between a whisper and a squeak. One day as one of the staff was giving me a treatment, he said, "You are a preacher?" I nodded my head. "Well, what do you intend to do from now on?" As best I could I replied, "Continue my work as usual." He shook his head with finality and said, "You can never hope to preach again."

Question:

Is there any scriptural proof that men had a choice of when or where they might come into the world?
Missouri J.R.S.

Answer:

The only scriptural text we recall touching this point is Acts 17: 26. It would seem that man in the pre-carnate world would be utterly incapable, through lack of knowledge of the future, of judging for himself when, where, of what nation, race, or parentage, he should come. It would require an infinite mind. The text reads that God "determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation."

Question:

What is the kingdom of God? How is it related to Zion and the kingdom of heaven?
Kansas A.D.T.

Answer:

The term is used with several meanings. It is sometimes applied to the church, an organization operating under divine laws, though the government is in the hands of chosen representatives, so that in a strict sense the church would not be the kingdom or government of God. The relation is quite definitely described in Revelation 12: 7, Inspired Version, where the church is pre-figured as a prospective mother who brought forth a man-child which is "the kingdom of our God and his Christ." Doctrine and Covenants 102: 9 identifies this "kingdom" as Zion.

It is sometimes referred to as a mystical or spiritual kingdom, as when Jesus said, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," and "My kingdom is not of this world." The Lord, speaking of his coming in Doctrine and Covenants 65, says he will come "to meet the kingdom of God which is set up on the earth," probably referring to the prophecy of Isaiah 59: 20 as the same thing, "The Redeemer shall come to Zion."

The expressions "kingdom of God" and "kingdom of heaven" are usually used synonymously, though in Doctrine and Covenants 65, as mentioned, the kingdom of heaven apparently refers to the kingdom in heaven.

Question:

What is the difference between faith and knowledge?
Kansas A.D.T.

Answer:

Both are qualities of soul requiring cultivation and development, faith being that quality which inclines one to respond readily to the divine will as made plain from time to time, including a power of appreciation and a love for truth and goodness. Knowledge (knowledge of the revealed gospel) is truth which has been perceived and accepted as the standard of life.

Faith and knowledge are intimately related, each developing in conjunction with the other. Faith is a constant aid toward knowledge, and knowledge is a growing foundation for increasing faith, both working for the perfecting of the soul. As faith advances, knowledge advances, and vice versa. They are like two feet upon a ladder; neither can proceed without the other, each move being an independent action, yet each action makes it possible for the other to move, thus making them interdependent. Each grows with the other. Where there is no knowledge, faith does not grow; and where there is no faith, knowledge is unsought. Both together lead up to God.

Question:

Some people think that when Satan was cast out of heaven he still had power to go right back into the courts of glory where God and Christ dwell and do his evil work. Is this right or wrong?
Iowa F.S.

Answer:

We know of no Scripture affirming it, but from several texts we could draw no other conclusion than that once cast out of heaven, Satan and his followers were out to stay. Being unworthy to abide there, they would be unworthy to return. The teaching that "no sinful thing can dwell in God's presence" would be a bar to their return. Having forfeited their right to eternal life by rebellion, and having lost their first estate, they would inevitably be without the power of recovery, remaining in spiritual darkness and sin. This is what the Scriptures declare:

"And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day."—Jude 1: 6.

Faith Hungry

By Ruby Tinkham

WE CAN GO HUNGRY with food on the table if we like. We can subsist, eat moderately, or grow fat. That's our choice. But we have another hunger that exceeds physical hunger. We have a hunger for faith. This may be buried so deep that we hardly recognize its gnawing demands. Time and again we may push it away or substitute something else in its place. We may even deny it entirely, but denial will never bring us freedom from the pain of this hunger. Many have clung to doubt in life hoping to prove something, only to grab desperately at faith in death. For here again we can subsist, eat moderately, or grow fat.

The way most people use faith it would seem there is a famine and everyone is subsisting by force. This is not so. There is an unlimited supply, and we live meagerly by choice. We handle faith as if it were something delicate and extremely fragile, something that must be kept wrapped up and hidden away to be taken out only on the rarest occasions. Christ went about squandering it! He scattered it here, there, everywhere. He was a spend-thrift, flinging his Father's wealth away on any motley crowd that happened to surround him. He might have caused bankruptcy in the kingdom of God as far as faith was concerned—but he didn't. Christ knew the secret of faith; he knew that the more he used it the more it would expand and grow.

Think about breathing. For no longer than a few seconds can we refuse our body air. Shut off oxygen, and life ceases. Yet, we do not consciously concentrate on every breath we draw. The secret of faith is similar. It is a constant steady intake that purifies and sustains every moment of life. Without it our soul suffocates just as certainly as the body dies without air.

FOR TOO LONG we have taken a simple, beautiful thing and made it complicated. Just to believe seemed too easy; so we've tacked a list of do's and don'ts onto faith that frightens most people before they even get started. They look at it and say to themselves, "I can't do that, I'd better not try, I might fail," and then give up. That's where children come in. They ignore all the Pharisaic interpretations and just get by on believing.

Let's go back and find faith as it really is. We believe in God, and God believes in us. We are friends, partners, co-workers in an important project. It will take all of our foresight, wisdom, and talents to foster this partnership. Here again children have it all over adults. They simply place their hands in God's and say, "I'll do whatever you want me to because I like you." It's that easy. There is an eager expectancy about children as if nothing but good could ever happen to them. How our Heavenly Father must love that.

But how often have we robbed our children of this same quality of faith that we long for ourselves. What happens? Where does it go? Who is to blame?

We spend vast sums of money to teach our children surface skills that will supply them with the physical necessities of life; but we sit back, wring our hands, and pray that morally they will turn out all right. We take the childlike faith they once had in God and replace it with a kind of competitive education hoping that later on in life we can religiously shoot them in the arm with a dose of faith that will suddenly work miraculous changes in their lives. It doesn't work. They become confused and lost, and except for a few rare instances, so are we. Why? Because we can't give something we don't possess. We wouldn't think of sending John to a plumber for piano lessons. To teach faith, we must possess faith. To possess faith we must go back to God, the giver of faith. That puts the whole load right back where it belongs—on our own shoulders. Shall we subsist, eat moderately, or grow fat? The table is laden with good things. Our needs will determine the size of our portion. None of us need ever to leave this table hungry, for the Master himself serves us joyfully.

WHAT HAPPENS TO US? Why are we so hungry for a faith so readily given? First, because we have been falsely taught that belief in God is faith in God, and that belief is sufficient. Unless belief leads us into co-operative action with God there is no faith present. We may believe in God all of our earthly life, and no profound argument can ever persuade us differently, yet we are only holding an opinion shared by millions of others. When our belief causes us to act, then we have the beginnings of a working faith. We must try God, test him and prove him, before we can say we have faith.

Here is where we fall down. We keep putting off faith. We use it only when every other means has failed. We constantly shame God by refusing him the right to help us except when we can no longer help ourselves. Then we add humiliation to shame by doubting that he can help us because we have failed ourselves.

Then there are those of us who save or hoard our faith. We refuse to use it unless the problem assumes mammoth proportions. "Don't bother God. He's too busy. Wait until later. We may need him worse then." It's hard to believe that any God concerned about a hair on our head or a blade of grass is too busy to help us save our soul. Yet we hold back continually as if the demonstration of faith must wait for some big problem. God is not interested in our moving the mountains around—he provided for that in nature. He was and is vitally concerned though that our faith increase to the size of a mustard seed. He purposely used a seed for example because it denotes growth. Growing is doing something. He is saying, "Make your faith grow; make it good for something; cultivate it; encourage it; and you will be amazed at what you can do with it." And when we have learned to use it successfully, we will find higher laws awaiting us which God cannot reveal to us in our present state.

How many of us have gone down on our knees and cried desperately, "Father, help my unbelief, teach me faith," then got up glowing radiantly, expecting a whole new faith to suddenly appear performing miracles before our very eyes? It would be nice if faith could be purchased so quickly and at such a low price. God has a different way. A few demonstrations like that and no one would ever want to go back to ordinary living. Faith must go hand in hand with ordinary people who are living ordinary lives and performing ordinary tasks. God wanted faith placed within the reach of every individual, so—being very wise and taking precautions that none should be cheated—he very carefully hid it inside each one of us.

THAT HUNGER we feel for faith is the first stirring of growth. How long God has waited for that! How eagerly he has cast about for stimuli to awaken us into action! How patiently and lovingly he stands by and waits for that call, "Father, I need your help!"

Since faith is a quality that reveals itself in personal action (just as love does) we each individually develop faith in proportion to the use we make of it in daily life. People of real faith consider no act of too small a consequence to ask God's help and direction. Faith means holding God's purposes in our consciousness at all times no matter what we may be doing.

Let's take our faith out and look at it. Is it a very little? So is a mustard seed. The important thing is that we make it start growing, and the way to do that is just start using it. Now, we don't wait until the next time we go to church, or until we are in desperate need; we simply start from the next act which we are about to perform. This we do repeatedly until unconsciously we are using faith as the main ingredient in everything we do.

This process is like a baby learning to walk. First he pulls himself up to things and looks around. It's wonderful. Then he takes a step and falls down. He reaches for someone's hand to hold and walks a little lopsided—but he is walking. Then one day he sees the thing he really wants and before he knows it he's running—not walking, but running!

Faith in some small act will pull us up where we can look around. It feels wonderful! We want to try something bigger right away. We take that next step, but it might have been too soon and we fall down. Then is when we must grab hold of God's hand and walk even if it's slow and lopsided. We have to keep at it, practicing all the time. And then one day it happens. Something important comes up. We really need faith. We draw on what we have been building up, and suddenly we are running! Then we run completely away from that old way of saving faith until we need it!

WE ARE IN A PARTNERSHIP with God. Everything we do is important to him and us. Instead of going to him with a tale of woe after some mishap, we should go to him first and get our orders. (He is always the senior partner.) He isn't too busy or disinterested: in fact, he is at his best where small things are concerned. He gets a deep pleasure out of small things, for he knows so well that those small things today will shape our tomorrows and therefore our future life with him. He never likes to see an investment go to waste, and we are his most valuable investment.

All we have to do is try him out—talk our particular problems over with him and get his viewpoint, then accept it. Once we accept his way, he is bound to make it come out right. There is one thing you have to consider, however. There is a little difference in the time system in heavenly circles than we have on earth. God could never abide so many different times, so he has a system of his own called eternity. Due to his use of his own system, we will have to divide our faith into two parts, and the second part is patience. This has to be practiced over and over. We must learn to say, "I will not give up the blessing my faith entitles me to have simply by being impatient." Impatience is another way of doubting that God can and will do the things he says. He realizes we have waited a long time. He is pleased, because he sees we have thus more capacity, so what happens? Where you had expected only a little, you get a great amount.

We don't need to look for some marvelous recipe for creating a great big wonderful faith. We only have to start today from wherever we are, and make our faith grow by practicing. We can take the very next thing we are about to do and use faith with it, saying, "I believe that I can do this better than I ever have done it before with God to help." It's important to get the habit of saying, "We," and thinking of God as always being there too.

We are the most precious possession God has. We are his greatest concern. He loves us so much he simply will not keep out of our life. The slightest invitation brings joy and anticipation to his heart, and he keeps himself busy creating ways of helping us—ingenious, winning ways that have cost him much. Yet he asks nothing in return except that we love him enough to have faith in him. And that is like everything else he deals in; we always get more than we give.

People in the News

Mrs. W. T. Hayworth

MRS. W. T. HAYWORTH of Nowata, Oklahoma, Branch has brought cheer to everyone who has entered the Nowata Hospital and Clinic in the past two years. Although she is seventy-eight years old and cannot personally visit people who are ill, she has provided cards for the trays of patients. She furnishes at least one hundred fifty cards a month—all handmade. There are cards for special days—Christmas, Thanksgiving, and Easter, and cards for various age groups—babies, children, and adults.

When a person enters the hospital he is given one of the cards on which is his name, his type of diet, and his room number. An appropriate handwritten verse and a greeting from the church is on the reverse side. The patient keeps the card until the diet is changed or a holiday brings a special card.

Sister Hayworth's contribution represents many hours of hard work, and she does most of it alone. She uses discarded Christmas cards, get-well cards, and other type greeting cards to obtain decorations. The flowers and pictures can be used again on the cards for trays. The hospital authorities have commended the work of Sister Hayworth and feel that the cards are much more attractive and appropriate than any other type card. She never signs them. The only way a patient finds out the source of the card is by inquiry. No charge is made for the cards, even though supplies have to be purchased in order to make them. People often repay her thoughtfulness by furnishing old cards for her use.

Not only has Mrs. Hayworth rendered this service to her community and represented the church in such a fine manner, but she has taught a church school class since she united with the branch in 1912. She has been secretary and treasurer of the branch for twenty-five consecutive years and has been solicitor for the bishop for twenty-four years.

An article lauding Mrs. Hayworth for the unselfish work she is doing appeared in the April 14 issue of the Nowata Daily Star. The article was given to the paper by two of her friends of other denominations.

Visions and Angels

When they asked the Arabs and Egyptians for the cause of their surrender, they told them that they saw an old man with a long beard who was dressed in a white robe, and who warned them not to fight any longer, otherwise they would all perish. This man was seen and heard by almost all the enemy troops.

This parallels the "Angel of Mons" episode of World War I and is worthy of consideration, unless you are so liberal you cannot believe.

Elder F. Edward Butterworth, in charge of the Tahitian Mission, had called for a conference of the Saints to convene on July 26, and he and Brother Breckenridge had recently traveled by ship from island to island, some 3,180 miles to bring a ministry to our Saints and to urge them to come to Tahiti. When Brother Siegfried and I arrived at Papeete, many of them from other islands were already there, and there was a great expectancy in the air and much hope for the first mission conference since 1939. And word had been received that delegates from many islands were on their way.

WAYNE SIMMONS IN TEXAS

Wayne Simmons spent six weeks in southern Texas from April 14 through May 27. He spent one week in Austin, two weeks in San Antonio, and the remaining time in the Rio Grande Valley. He held home discussions or cottage meetings and worked in conjunction with Elder Jack Wight. The purpose of the trip in part was to survey new areas. He had opportunity to follow up on Latin American people who were contacted last November, several of whom are members of the church. In the Valley area a series was held at Brownsville in the home of Brother Hubert Manning; Mrs. Manning who is a Latin American was baptized. On this trip some of the ordinances of the church were performed in Spanish—administration to the sick, blessing of a baby, and a confirmation. Brother Wayne Jackel, priest, performed Sister Manning's baptism in Spanish. Plans are in process to have a missionary class on Sundays in Brownsville in the home of the Mannings, with Brother Jackel in charge. Meetings in Brownsville were attended and supported by Brother Gene Bowden, pastor of the Rio Grande Valley Branch.

COUNCIL BLUFFS BUILDING FUND

For the fifth consecutive year the Council Bluffs Branch reached their goal of $25,000 in cash and pledges at their building fund dinner held Friday, May 25. The excavation of the basement has been completed and footings are now going in. Elder V. D. Ruch is pastor of the branch.

Council of Churches

Yesterday I had a different religious experience. I worshiped with many denominations at the 86th Convention of the Missouri Council of Churches (formerly the Missouri Sunday School Association). Seventeen denominations were represented on the administrative board.

The theme of the convention was "Brotherhood in Action," and it was made manifest by the colored folk occupying front seats in place of obscure back ones and by the interracial participation in worship services and classwork. It was made manifest also in the different congregations uniting in a common purpose, which was found on the flyleaf of their convention program book:

1. To help the churches reach all persons with Christian teaching—Christ commended us to preach the gospel to all people. That good can never be reached by each church going its own way; co-operative planning is absolutely necessary.
2. To help train workers.
3. To Christianize the institutions and customs of the community. Evil forces today are too strong to be challenged by separate approaches of the churches. The churches must join hands (1) to oppose evil, such as gambling, drunkenness, unwholesome movies and comics, et cetera, (2) support better schools and better governments.
4. To develop brotherhood across denominational lines.

A well-planned morning service was in progress as we walked into the main auditorium of the First Christian Church of Chillicothe, Missouri.

After a business session there was an address by the Rev. J. H. Jackson, pastor of the largest Negro church in Chicago. His sermon topic was "The Way Out of the Dark." He has traveled widely and knows well the trend of the times and the pathway we are taking as a nation.

General classwork followed for adult, youth, and children's leaders; there were also classes for the administrative body and conferences for different groups, such as public relations, social action, church and public school, church and community agencies, and temperance education.

There was so much to choose from, it was like a General Conference at the Auditorium. I chose the adult class "Instruction and Opportunities in Adult Education." It was splendid, but the class that followed especially caught my interest. The topic was "Religion and Health," and it was one of the finest classes I have ever attended. The instructor told experiences from his own home of the problems of health. Incurable as far as medicine and doctors were concerned, he and his wife studied their problem. They recognized that God does not send illness upon people, but that prolonged grief, worry, fear, and hate will tear down the system and undermine health. When they put their faith into action, fortified by prayer, health came to their bodies, and the drugs and medicines which they had depended upon were no longer necessary. He stated the need of forgiving and being forgiven, quoting Matthew 5:25: "If thou bring thy gift unto the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave thou thy gift and go thy way unto thy brother, and first be reconciled to thy brother and then come and offer thy gift." This he stressed as a great help in religious therapy and gave other instances of divine healing (he is a member of a large popular Protestant church).

Several eager listeners added their bit by bearing personal testimony of healing through prayer. It was like being in one of our reunion prayer services.

At the afternoon class a layman from Kansas City, a business executive, conducted a class on the part laity plays in the church work. He brought facts, figures, and proofs of how much can be accomplished through the interest and work of the laymen of the church, leaving the pastor free for individual counseling and sermon preparation. He spoke also about a minister not entering into the economic realm, saying that should be left for the laity so that his ministry might be on just a spiritual plane. Individualism entered in and a spirited discussion followed; some agreeing, some disagreeing.

One young minister took a decided stand for fearless denunciation from the pulpit of wrong practices and the pointing out of the right way of daily living. He had an interesting story to tell of his own depression-ridden childhood, the dire need in his home, the discarded food that he picked up and took home to the family. He told of his pastorship in some of the large city churches, where he was asked to resign because he pointed out the right and the wrong way of stewardship. A friendly battle of the thoughts waged on for awhile, and then a middle-aged woman arose. She said, "I am a poor woman but I know this: God does not care if a man is rich. He desires him to be rich. The thing he desires is that the rich hold their possessions in their hands to use as their stewardship in place of holding them in their heart for selfish purposes." The class closed with this thought.

I am thankful that yesterday I had another religious experience.

The Second Mile

The thought has come to me that one of the reasons we have not accomplished the building of Zion is because we are not willing enough to help those in need. Many times when there is sickness in a family, friends will stop by to visit, but seldom does anyone offer to do the work which needs to be done in a home when there is illness, especially if the wife is ill. Better than words are the thoughtful services of one who says, "Let me comb your hair and straighten the bed." Often there is not money enough to pay doctor bills and hire someone to care for the house, too.

I shall appreciate having the Saints pray for my wife who has been confined to her bed since April 19. She has been in poor health for the past eight and a half years.

Note of Thanks

I wish to express my gratitude for the letters and tracts sent me and for the prayers offered in my behalf while I was passing through a difficult time. God has answered these prayers in a wonderful way, and I can say again as I have said before, "Prayer changes things."

Although I have been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1922 it has been many years since I last heard a Latter Day Saint sermon. But my faith in the church is stronger now than when I joined it. With God's help, I am trying to live a Christian life, and I pray daily for the advancement of the work that souls in sin and darkness may be brought to a knowledge of the truth before it is too late.

EL DORADO, KANSAS.—The dedicatory of the church was held May 20. The dedicatory sermon was by Bishop Livingston, assisted by Seventy James Daugherty. A basket lunch was served after the program.

In 1921, the first church school was organized in the home of Sister Sarah Hudson under the direction of Elder J. W. Wooten and J. J. Wilson with six people present. Another church was rented for meetings until 1946 when the group was informed that the church was no longer available. Mr. Walter V. Covert sold an abandoned schoolhouse to the group, and in May 1947, the group had its first church school in its own building. Fifty-four were present. The building is still being used and has been redecorated inside and out.

Approximately two and a half years ago, Elder J. J. Wilson of Wichita, Kansas, was appointed leader of the group. He drives seventy miles twice a week and other times as needed.

Elder John Hofford, Sr., who has been in the branch about a year, is assistant to Elder Wilson. He drives eighty miles to serve.

On April 16, 1950, the mission became a branch. Elder Albert Schmidt and Orville Rowlette, president of the Kansas District at that time, had charge of the organization.

Since the group obtained the church home the following ordinances have been administered: ten baptisms, five babies blessed, three wedding anniversaries, four weddings, a district conference, and a women's institute.

Although Sister Hudson was not present at the meeting, she was remembered. She passed away in January, 1951.—Reported by MRS. ARLIE KNOLLENBERG

JONESBORO, ARKANSAS.—Apostle Percy Farrow, District President T. B. Sharp, and James Renfroe, district missionaries were here to organize the Jonesboro group into a branch May 13.

A fellowship service was held in the morning under the direction of Brother Sharp, and Apostle Farrow delivered the morning sermon. A basket lunch was served at noon. The organization meeting was held in the afternoon directed by Apostle Farrow. The following officers were installed: Giles Turner, pastor; Aubrey Wilson, counselor; Clarence Carmack, associate pastor; Kathryn Wilson, secretary; Bill Stinnett, treasurer; Betty Lou Stinnett, music director; and Martha Lee Vinson, pianist. Brother Renfroe spoke in the afternoon on "Mothers of Men." After supper Apostle Farrow showed slides taken in old Mexico and compared them with Book of Mormon teachings.

Services are held in the Ben Hur Lodge Hall at 410 West Monroe.

Many visitors came from Caraway, Fisher, and Little Rock for the all-day services.—Reported by KATHRYN WILSON Apostle Chesworth presided over the morning prayer service presenting the theme, "He Lives." Joan Margrave and Bob Trimble sang a duet, "Come Ye Apart," at this service.

The morning sermon was delivered by Apostle Chesworth. He spoke on "The Priesthood." The Springfield choir presented "Tell Me the Old, Old Story" under the direction of Kenneth Cady, accompanied by Hattie Bishop.

The children were supervised during the morning sessions in the lodge by E. G. Gilbert, district director of religious education and a staff of workers.

The business session in the afternoon was occupied with the ordination and approval of recommendations for ordinations of men to the priesthood. Recommendations were approved for the following candidates to be ordained to the office of deacon: Buford Palmer, Springfield, Missouri; John Reich, Nowata, Oklahoma; and Thomas Cochran, Joplin, Missouri.

The Word of Wisdom - Part VII

FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

SPRINGTIME BRINGS NOT ONLY birds, flowers, and warm weather, but also a welcome change from winter menus. How eagerly we watch for the first rhubarb and asparagus. How anxious we are to get early gardens planted so we can have an abundance of fresh vegetables, these mean abundant health. Nutritionists tell us the difference between an ordinary diet and an optimal diet is the addition of more fruits, more vegetables, and more milk.

The Bureau of Human Nutrition and Home Economics of the U. S. Department of Agriculture has worked out the National Food Guide for planning well-balanced meals. It has grouped foods into seven basic categories, advising that some food from every group be included in the diet for each day so there will be a proper balance of all the different elements that the body needs to carry on its daily functions. Whole wheat bread, flour, cereals, and other whole grains make up one of these groups, but fruits and vegetables make up three of the seven basic groups of foods.

First is the group of green and leafy vegetables from which we should have one or more servings a day; second, the high vitamin C foods—citrus fruit, tomatoes, raw cabbage, strawberries, etc.—from which should come one or more servings a day. If these foods are hard to get we are to use more from groups one and three, especially raw. Next is the group made up of potatoes and other vegetables and fruit from which should be chosen two or more servings a day.

But with all these servings of fruit and vegetables that we should have each day, we need not lack variety. The Lord has wonderfully provided that we can choose from the asparagus and rhubarb of early spring, on through the strawberry season with lettuce, radishes, green peas, and onions, into the summer with cherries, raspberries, apricots, and plums as well as carrots, beets, string beans, tomatoes, cabbage, corn, cucumbers, new potatoes, melons, and in the fall, peaches, pears, apples, sweet potatoes, turnips, parsnips, celery, pumpkin, and squash. And we should eat our fill of each thing as it comes in season. (But who ever gets his fill of strawberries before it is time for cherries and raspberries?) If we do not like some vegetables and fruits, we should cultivate a taste for them.

I remember as a youngster there were many vegetables that I did not like. But every time we had them my father would put a little helping on my plate "so I would learn to like them." Now I like all vegetables and I am grateful. One writer has suggested that we should try to include some of all the fresh fruits and vegetables to be found in the market in the week's food supply. If we pass by some of them "because we do not like them" we are cheating our bodies of some of the things that God ordained for our well-being. For the Word of Wisdom says: "All wholesome herbs [plants, vegetables] God hath ordained for the constitution, nature, and use of man, in the season thereof, and every fruit in the season thereof."

OUR FRUITS AND VEGETABLES are classed as protective foods, in other words they are our preventive medicine. They are a primary source of essential food minerals, and many of them are veritable treasure stores of vitamins that are a marvelous aid in combating disease, preserving health, and prolonging life. Nearly twenty vitamins that are known or believed to be important to human well-being have thus far been discovered. When we eat a variety of foods, we are pretty sure of getting a well-rounded assortment of the vitamins we need—except perhaps Vitamin D, the sunshine vitamin. And we may also be getting other vitamins still undetected in food, but serving us just the same.

During recent years the market has become flooded with vitamin and mineral pills. But our foods are still the best source of vitamins and minerals. Specific concentrates contain only substances we know and can create. Food contains everything both known and unknown and is surrounded with nutritious factors that have not yet been synthetically reproduced. Separate doses of one or more selected vitamins are best taken under doctors orders, for research is showing more and more instances in which a vitamin or nutrient seeks another element in a meal as a special partner to assist in its work. When a vitamin pill brings in a mass army, the right partners may not be ready to use so much specialized help.

In Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12 we read, "Whosoever among you are sick, and have not faith to be healed but believe, shall be nourished with all tenderness with herbs and mild food."

In the Book of Mormon, Alma 21: 75, 76, we read: "And there were some who died with fevers which at some seasons of the year were very frequent in the land, but not so much with fevers, because of the excellent qualities of the many plants and roots which God prepared, to remove the cause of diseases to which man was subject by the nature of the climate."

MANY OF OUR FOODS are processed in some way or another before they come to us and thus lose some of their goodness. Many of these processes are unavoidable in today's living, but fresh fruits and vegetables come to us as God prepared them, full of "excellent qualities."

However, if we are not careful, some of these "excellent qualities" can be lost in preparing food for the table. We lose some if we peel our fruits and vegetables, if we cook them too long, or add soda to them. Some of these "excellent qualities" are lost in the cooking water, so we should use as little as possible and save the liquids for soups and gravies. Fortunately, quite a few vegetables and most fruits can be eaten raw. It is suggested that we eat fruit twice a day, and once at least it should be raw. Our fruits are best when picked at the peak of their ripeness. Those fruits picked unripe and ripened artificially never have a chance to develop the full vitamin and mineral values nature intended them to have. Bruised and wilted vegetables and fruit have lost some of their goodness, so we should get them as fresh as possible.

How fortunate if we can have our own garden. Victory gardens are being encouraged again, not so much for patriotic reasons as for health reasons. In addition to food, we get lots of Vitamin D as we work in the garden and a deeper appreciation of God's creativeness. We have to marvel at the abundance that can come from a few seeds—the different varieties, the many colors, shapes, textures, flavors, and aromas, all from the same soil. It also gives us a clearer realization of our dependence on God for our food and we are offered his special assistance in growing it if we ask for it. Alma 16: 220 tells us: "Cry unto him over the crops of your fields, that ye may prosper in them." One woman in Independence who was friendly visitor in her group planted several hills of cucumbers in her garden and prayed that the Lord would bless them so she would have some to take to everyone in her group, members and nonmembers. The Lord blessed her with such an abundance that there was more than she could use.

How appreciative we should be of all this abundance. For forty years the Lord provided only manna for the children of Israel, but for us he has provided foods "both to please the eye, and to gladden the heart. . . . for taste and for smell, to strengthen the body and enliven the soul."—Doctrine and Covenants 59: 4.

The National Food Guide can be obtained free from the United States Department of Agriculture as also Family Fare, price 25c, which is very good.

Right Preferences

By Kay Norman Beldin

RECENTLY, while listening to a church radio program, I was impressed by the statement, "What we are or become depends largely on what we prefer from day to day."

As I pondered this statement, I realized how very true it is. As free individuals our days wholly consist of doing, thinking, and saying just what we prefer so long as we do not infringe too much upon the rights of others. And most important is the fact that within these daily choices or preferences lies the molding of our character.

Thus it is most important that we take stock of ourselves from time to time to see just what type of preferences we are making.

On examining my own life, I find many instances when my preferences do not aid me in becoming the best that I might be. For example, far too often as I go about my domestic duties I am preferring to let my mind dwell on idle thinking. There is no better time for Satan to take over than when I am busy envying someone or harboring peevishness. And I know of nothing that can do a better job of impairing my personality, to say nothing of bringing on a good case of "nerves," than giving way to such pettiness. By preferring constructive thinking I leave my mind open for development.

Sometimes I find I need to be more alert to the type of language and conversation I use. In this day of excessive slang, I need to be extra cautious lest I find myself preferring such.

How many times during the performance of our daily tasks do we prefer second-best work to perfection? Do we "just get by" rather than put forth the effort and zeal necessary to accomplish our tasks well? The Master Workman, who himself was never content with a "second-rate" job, has commanded that we keep slothfulness far from us.

A quotation from Proverbs reads: "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he." We might change it to read: "As a man preferreth in his heart so is he." For we cannot hope to be any better than the choice or preferences we make from day to day.

From the Pen of Viola Velt

How strange are the ways of a person's mind;
A man is in a room yet he is not.
His eyes steadily gaze into your own
With seeming grasp of everything you say;
And yet his thoughts to you can ne'er be known.
They're exploring trackless space, far away.

It is consoling to know that, no matter what we think, God is still God.

The Dagger

ARAKI slowly brought himself from the black mists of unconsciousness to the cold grayness of reality. The rough, cold stones of the floor of the cell scratched his young body as he tried to rise. He strained to sit up but the biting of the ropes cut into his flesh and made him bite his lips to keep from crying. After all, he was too old to cry and blubber as smaller boys often did. But his face, straining to keep its composure, betrayed his years. His eyes still had a childish roundness, and his cheeks the tender plumpness of youth. Under his robe his body stretched long and lean, and his shoulders were still narrow. His arms were bruised and streaked with dirt; his hair was in a wild array about his head.

As Araki leaned against the stone wall, his breath coming in gasps after his exertion, he became conscious of the damp, sour smell of the cell. He wrinkled his nose in disgust and turned his face toward the doorway for any air that might enter. It was then he noticed the fire in the courtyard casting weird reflections on the dark-skinned men grouped around it. The thought of the decision to be made came again to him.

The men were drunk with wine and the joy of their plunder of the day. One of them, in a dirty loincloth, was twirling aloft a woman's bracelet that sparkled in the light. His guttural talk and ugly gestures told the way he had gotten it. His comrades slapped their legs in mirth and rolled on the ground in drunken laughter. Araki saw that one of the group was no older than he. The boy was sitting astride an inlaid casket and fingering a length of pure linen. He draped it over one shoulder, and seizing a gold-handled sword, he swaggered before the group with cheers and applause, some slapping him on the shoulder to show that he was one of them.

"I could be like that boy," thought Araki. "I've been asked to join them and live as they do. They said they would teach me the secret words and symbols and let me do as they do, for they are strong men. Their life must be a good one, for they seem happy and they have so much." His face brightened at the thought of not having to attend school any more.

Araki thought again of the beautiful gold and copper dagger they had held before him, as a present if he stayed with them. The handle had jade and turquoise stones in a circular pattern with gold twined about the edges. The blade glittered and was so sharp it split one of Araki's own hairs. How he would love to have a dagger such as that! At home he would—

By Barbara Hands

ARAKI GASPED. How could he have forgotten all this time about his family? The events of the previous night came crowding down upon him. Home seemed so far away . . .

The night had been peaceful as other nights until suddenly the harsh yells of the Gadiantons had startled him from sleep. Things happened so fast: the torches reflecting from the brown skins and painted faces of the men and their cries as they went from house to house in the village pilfering, ravaging, and ruining. They trampled over plants and knocked down furniture in their search for valuables. There was a woman's high, terrified scream and sounds he didn't understand. Acrana! He ran toward the room, only to be caught and held by strong, rough hands. "Here now, you're too young for that, small one, you come with me," the owner of the hands laughed in an odd way and half-carried, half-dragged him out of the house.

Then they left behind the village and lowlands, and he was taken into the wilderness. If he slipped on the moss or stumbled over the vines he was prodded on. Slipping, sliding, muscles aching, eyes burning. Hurry. Walk faster. Get up. Don't fall. Hurry. Keep moving. Hurry.

Araki kept his eyes on the ground until the men slackened their pace, then he looked up. His mouth dropped agape . . . he was in the Lost City—that forbidden place where people said his ancestors once lived many hundreds of years ago. They stood on a high plateau looking across a huge plaza, gray-white in the moonlight, strewn with rubble and fallen columns of former buildings. The terraced pyramids rose in dark, majestic forms on either side, and at one end the shadow of a large flat-topped pyramid fell on the cluttered stones of the plaza. Araki had never in all his life seen anything such as this, and he stared, taking in everything—the broken columns, the board stairway leading down into a sunken court, the low altar in the center of the court, and the carvings! Such wonderful things in stone he had never seen—walls of stone mosaics in graceful spiral designs, beautiful statues of a forgotten god, and sculpture on the sides of the buildings. Intricate designs had been worked by artists now gone from the city; their skilled hands would never again be present among the inhabitants of this desolate and decaying place.

Here the robbers stayed when not out pillaging. Here they lived from other men's wealth and possessions. Here they enjoyed stolen wine and women, in a city that they had wrested from the jungle's strangling hold.

Araki was led into a long, narrow room in one of the decaying buildings. There some of the robbers talked to him with persuasive words. They brought the dagger before him and let him hold it in his own hands.

"You like it, eh?"

Araki's eyes glistened with eagerness. "Oh, yes."

"It will be yours. But you must stay here so we can teach you to use it as a man does."

"Stay here? Not go home?"

"You would live with us. We have many things to make lads happy," the robber chuckled, "many things."

"I . . . I'm not sure."

"You must decide." His voice was harsh.

"I don't know. I would like to . . ."

"Make up your mind. Either be one of us, or . . ." but the robber didn't say what he was going to do. They talked a long time, but Araki's confused indecision tried their patience. Finally they put him in a small room and said that he must decide by morning. Araki was bewildered and exhausted, not understanding and too tired to worry . . .

NOW HE SAT DUMBLY, his decision looming before him. Whether or not to become one of the Gadiantons.

He was staring out the doorway when a low, moaning sound came from the darkest corner of the cubicle. Araki's eyes grew round and his body trembled. He had been told of evil spirits that inhabited the ruins. Perhaps this was one come to do harm to him. But he recognized words were coming with the moans. Someone was speaking as if to a person very near, kindly yet beseechingly. Araki twisted his body across the floor until he could see the speaker.

He was an old man, whose white hair hung long and matted closely to the sides of his head. His face was turned toward the wall, pillowed by a roll of old cloth. The man's body was stretched very straight over the rough stones. Araki wondered why he would lie this way; it would be better if he drew himself into a ball. The harsh floor would at least seem softer.

Araki was searching for something to say when the old man turned his face toward him. His eyes caught and held Araki in their steady gaze. They seemed to look through him, to pierce into his very thoughts. Yet they were kind and sad somehow as he said, "You are awake early, my son."

Araki gulped and continued to be held in the man's gaze. "Ye-yes, I couldn't sleep." He half-smiled shyly.

"It is no wonder with the noise outside," Shadar said kindly and sighed, stretching his body as if it were a comfort to lie on the hard floor.

"Sir, may I ask you something?"

"Of course, my son."

Araki hesitated and then blurted in childish inquisitiveness, "Why do you lie so straight on these stones?"

The old man suddenly seemed to grow older and shrink within himself. He shifted his gaze from Araki's face to the open doorway. After a moment he said, "Those men, out there, want me to do something which I cannot do. They want me to reject my God. They thought that by putting me in a pit too small to stand straight and so narrow that I could not rest by sitting that I would do as they want. Two days I was there until tonight without water or food." He turned back to Araki's unbelieving face. "It gives one much time to think," he smiled. "This floor feels to me like the softest feather pallet."

"Why are you here now?"

Shadar's mouth drew to a thin line. "They thought that treatment was too mild. Tomorrow they have something else they wish to try." His voice was bitter.

Araki drew his knees up to his body and leaned against the wall. "How can this be? Why is it that the Gadiantons do this?"

A sigh, long and drawn came from the old man's lips. "It is because of the Evil One in them. They have shut out God. They want me, and others like me, to give up the God we worship and accept theirs. Their minds have been poisoned; they cannot see goodness any more." The old man seemed lost in thought for some time. Then he said softly, "But it was not always thus. Once this land of your ancestors was peaceful; there were no men seeking the destruction of others."

Araki's eyes grew wide. "When was this? I don't remember."

"No, my son, you would not remember. It was many hundreds of years before your birth, or mine. But the story has been told from that time until now by father telling son. Many of the learned men wrote it, but they do not read of it today." The old man stirred, settling his body more comfortably, and raised his eyes to the fading stars showing in the corner of the door. "I will tell you the story as it was told to me by my father."

MANY, MANY YEARS AGO there came upon the land a terrible storm. So great was the storm, and the thunderings and lightnings that the earth was shaken. Even the cities toppled on their foundations and fell. The sea came over great cities and buried them, drowning all the inhabitants. Mountains appeared where there was plain, and plain where mountain had been. Many people were killed—drowned, buried in earth and rock, carried out by the sea, or swept away by whirlwinds. The fury of the storm was great while it lasted. Then the storm stopped, and a deep darkness covered the land. Nor was there fire by which to see; and great was the wailing and moaning of the people for their lost ones. All over the face of the land was wailing and crying unto God. This darkness lasted for three days.

And the fourth day the sun shone and great was the rejoicing of the people unto their God. And as the people gathered about their temple, there came unto them, out of the eastern sky, a man, descending in a white robe with a long beard. He came to the people and taught them all manner of things concerning life and the way to happiness. He taught them to love their neighbor and to do good toward him; not to stir up the hearts of men to anger one against another; that all men were brothers and should not raise sword against another. Many things did he say to the people of his doctrine, but now much has been lost by word of mouth and writing. But the people believed and remembered in their hearts these things which he taught. Many believed, and obeyed his doctrine, even to the fullest. The god stayed only awhile and then departed into the sky, promising to return again when the time should be right. And his name was known as Kulkulkan among the people.

Shadar paused in his narrative to ease his body out straight, then he continued with the legend. "The inhabitants of this land prospered, for the wealth that comes of the earth is great when people are willing to share with another. And the doctrine caused the people to be creative and to build fine buildings. Beautiful works of art and great cities appeared on the land. Every man did deal justly with another. The teachings linked the hearts of the people together and formed a barrier against the Evil One.

And after many years the people began to be proud, and to claim their prosperity to be of their own making, and did boast of their powers. Many began to wear costly apparel, and to keep unto themselves their wealth, and to oppress their neighbor. The people formed secret organizations and combinations of Gadianton. They sought to bring those who believed in Kulkulkan into their power, and to make them reject the teachings of their fathers.

The old man fell silent for a moment. "This is why it is done, my son. Because of their hatred, they are evil men, and their hearts are hardened by wickedness. They cannot see good. They want others to join in their scheme, to be evil as they are."

Araki spoke slowly at first then faster as if to change the words of Shadar. "I have been spoken to by them. They offer many wonderful things. All the gold I can carry, rich and wonderful foods, fine robes, and even a gold and copper dagger!" Araki became thoughtful. "They truly offer many things. They cannot be so evil that they offer these."

The old man's eyes blazed, and he started to rise when a shadow appeared in the doorway. "Get up! Your rest is finished." The guard leered at Shadar.

"No," he breathed wearily, "my rest is yet to come."

"Out!" the guard seized the man by a frail shoulder and sent him sprawling over the doorstep.

IT WAS MORNING and yet the heat of summer could be felt. The sun was strong and hot as Araki stood in the plaza. The sides of the pyramids wavered in the shimmering heat. Araki looked straight forward, his eyes squinting, perspiration tracing the lines of his cheeks down to the firm-set mouth. He looked older somehow, and well he might, for he had seen many things, and many thoughts had raced through his head since leaving the cell. Yet there was the decision . . . the decision!

Correction

The article, "Personalities I Remember" by Marcella Schenck which appeared on pages 13 and 17 of the May 21 issue, should read "James H. Baker" rather than "James A. Baker."

The robbers had tried many things to make the old man reject his god. They had talked slowly at first, then insultingly; they screamed and sneered at him and made obscene remarks about his god. But so far the old man had remained silent or had only spoken quietly to his tormentors. A fire was laid on the platform and set blazing.

The leader, Laman, stood in front of Shadar regarding him in menacing silence, his arms akimbo, the muscles bulging in his neck, and his shaved head glistening with sweat. Swaggering up and down in front of the standing old man, he suddenly turned on him and screamed, "Reject your god. Say he is false. Deny that he was more than a man. Say it! Say it, say it!"

Shadar raised his eyes to meet those of the thief. "I cannot." Laman struck at the old man's face, causing him to wince, but he did not fall. He raised his arm to strike again but stopped mid-way. His face twisted into a smile. "Sit!"

Araki leaned forward, not daring to breathe, wondering why Laman was allowing Shadar to sit. The old man sat wearily on a fallen column, his legs stretched in front of him, his chin touching his chest in exhaustion. At a signal from Laman two of the robbers ran toward Shadar with drawn swords. Before he could move they had sliced off his toes and the front part of his feet. Shadar groaned and slouched to the ground only to be roughly hauled to standing position by two robbers, his head pulled back so that he had to look at the fire. There, the butchers, their faces twisted in fanatic joy, danced about, holding the feet pierced by the swords over the flames.

Araki felt a sudden terrible disgust and wretched violently. But he had not seen all the evil the minds of these men could invent. For as the robbers held Shadar between them Laman drew a dagger and advanced toward him. Araki's eyes widened in horror and unbelief—that was the dagger, the one they had promised to him! The copper glinted in the sun as if it had come to a burning life of its own.

Just as Laman raised the dagger Shadar lifted his face to the sky and smiled as if recognizing someone he knew and loved. His head fell forward, and he was dead before the blade cut his flesh. Laman in a fit of anger at being deprived of his murder, slashed and cut at the body until he held the bleeding heart in his hands. He threw it on the altar as a sacrifice to his idol. The limp remains of the old man were thrown upon the fire as the robbers danced with wild frenzy, their shrieks and yells echoing from the buildings, creating a scene of grisly bedlam.

Araki, sickened and bewildered, turned and ran blindly away from the scene. The robbers in their hysteria did not see him flee and continued their grotesque rite of sacrifice.

Araki's mind had only one thought. Run! Get away! Evil, evil, evil! Before his eyes was the vision of the old man's face as it was mutilated, the eyes staring, yet not seeing.

He ran, falling over stones, stumbling, slipping until he reached the cool, dark jungle. He threw himself on the ground, sobbing in fear and horror. His stomach heaved, and he was sick.

His sobs dwindled and finally came to intermittent sniffing. Araki's thoughts went back to the cell, and he could hear Shadar's voice speaking softly, telling the story of his god.

Man should love his brother. Do unto others as you want them to do unto you. . . . and the people lived in peace and happiness over the face of the land.

Then he remembered the old man's face just before he died, the curious expression not of fear, but love, almost as if he were really happy.

He rose, brushing the leaves and moss from his tattered robe. He looked back toward the Lost City. The fire still burned making the ruins glow red. Araki looked for a long time, and then he turned his back to it. His shoulders were thrown back and his head held high as he walked down the path toward the village . . . to home and his people.

Blue Pencil Notes

Naturally that statement gave me a shock. I closed my eyes for a moment, and then I had a mental vision of myself preaching to thousands, as I did later to great audiences on the Campus in Independence in the summer months, and in the Auditorium at Conference time. So I opened my eyes and with all the strength I could muster said, "I will preach—and the people will hear me!" My monitor shook his head but said no more.

I was right. He was wrong. And that is one of the innumerable blessings for which I have had and do yet have cause to be thankful to the Giver of all good gifts.

* WEATHER

Have you ever noticed what a meek, sweet, pleasant, and absolutely innocent expression Dame Nature puts on the next morning after one of her midnight debauches? . . . Last night she behaved like a drunken witch, tore down the curtains of the trees, opened all the water faucets, bawled in tones of thunder, beat the flowers down into the mud and threw dust at the stars. . . This morning, in a chastened, repentant mood, she sends up a nicely polished sun into a serene blue sky. Everything is dainty, elegant, refined, and lovely—until the next time!

* REQUEST EDITORIALS

We have had some fine editorial experiences when friendly readers have asked us to write editorials on certain subjects and we have responded. Every preacher, too, knows what it is to receive a blessing when he gives a sermon in answer to some member's request.

The reason for the blessing is the fact that the editorial or sermon is given in answer to a real human need. We believe it is the Lord's desire that the needs of his children should be met in all the services of the church.

Suggestions are welcomed. You may have some question you would like to have discussed. You may have an idea that would make a good foundation for an editorial. You may know of a good quotation (we can generally obtain permission to quote brief passages) that would make a starting point.

We hope readers will recognize that not all questions could be answered in editorials (a few should be handled in other ways). Editorials are checked by the First Presidency and by staff editors before being published, as an assurance to the readers.

If you have an idea, why not write it now? Your typewriter, your Parker 51, or even your humble but efficient Esterbrook pen are very near. It will be a pleasure to hear from you.

* SUNBURN

The mid-week holiday was perfect. Everybody and his sister were out in abbreviated sport togs, exposing large areas of the body to "the beneficent rays of the spring sun," as a poetic advertiser once expressed it. How beneficent you find out later!

Light of heart and as lightly clad, people carried flowers to the resting places of loved ones in the cemeteries in the morning, and in the afternoon went picnicking, golfing, touring, or visiting friends.

Not until they came home at night did they realize what the sun had done to them. (It is always too late when you begin to notice.) Exposed spots turned from dawn pink to beet red, to broiled-lobster scarlet, and burned like undying fire. For a few days the torment seemed unbearable as blisters broke, skin peeled, and young ladies looked like their small freckle-faced brothers. After a fortnight they returned to normal and resumed their customary dignity.

An Indian proverb says: Do not criticize another man until you have walked three days in his shoes.

MEXICO VISIT PROFITABLE

President Israel Smith, Apostle Charles R. Hield, and Brother David Elliott, pastor of Modesto, California, have returned from a visit to Mexico. Apostle Hield reports encouraging results from the trip. The brethren interviewed several government officials, the American Embassy, and the leaders of several Protestant organizations. They feel the trip was very profitable from an administrative standpoint. The men also contacted the three people who are church members in Mexico City. Apostle Hield states that the possibility of opening work in Mexico in three or four years looks very favorable. He feels that the regulations are not unsurmountable, and is encouraged by the quality of the prospects for church members. While in Mexico, they visited eight different ruins, and photographs were taken of recent excavations and restorations.

SUMMER CAMPUS DIRECTOR APPOINTED

Lloyd Hurshman, son of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Hurshman of Independence, will serve as Campus recreation supervisor for summer activities. Lloyd served as an instructor on the Gardner Lake Camp staff the past two years, and had a leading role in the Campus operetta "The Mikado" last summer. In his new position he will supervise and co-ordinate all Campus recreational activities and will maintain the recreational properties and grounds.

APOSTLE VISITS NAUVOO

Apostle D. T. Williams and Elder Emery Jennings made a trip to Nauvoo, Illinois, in the company of eighty-five young people, June 9 and 10. The group spent part of Saturday and Sunday holding services and visiting the places of historic interest. They traveled in two school buses and two station wagons. Brother Williams returned with the group and preached to a congregation of 320 people at the reunion grounds near Stewartville, Missouri, June 10.

BISHOP AT RETREAT

Bishop Leslie Kohlman was present at a retreat held by the young adult group of the Second Church of Independence, June 9 and 10. The retreat was held at the Gardner Lake Reunion Grounds. Brother Kohlman was assisted by the leaders of the local League.

CORRECTION

Elder James Everett was mentioned as appointee president of the Provo, Utah, Branch in the June 4 edition. Brother Everett is president of the Utah District and works as a missionary throughout the district. However, Brother R. A. Nies is the elected branch president at Provo, Utah, and since Brother Nies has moved to Salt Lake City, the major portion of the responsibility at Provo has fallen upon Brother Orville Ritchins.

We'd like you to know

Edna I. Easter

EDNA IS A TYPICAL OUTDOOR GIRL whose social nature has forced a compromise between living in the country and the city. She was born on a farm near Cameron, Missouri—the next to the oldest of ten children, seven boys and three girls, the youngest a Graceland graduate of this year. Following high school graduation Edna attended Central Business College in Kansas City and completed both the secretarial and bookkeeping courses. Then she did graduate work in corporation accounting.

Her first job was in the estimating department of a large construction company in Kansas City, where she worked from 1928 to 1933. From 1933 to 1945 she was executive secretary for the International Printing Ink Division of the Interchemical Corporation. Since then she has been doing secretarial work in the Department of Religious Education and supervising the girls' activity programs.

But Edna has not entirely denied herself out-of-door life. She has her own five-acre place in the southwest part of Independence. Her mother (and sister, between college seasons) resides with her. Here she has frequent opportunity to practice her skill with the hammer, pruning shears, and other tools—knowledge acquired as she came to be her father's "right hand man" when he became an arthritic cripple when she was thirteen years of age.

Edna has visited all but three states west of the Mississippi. These trips have been by auto with members of the family. They have camped out many times and have done their own cooking along the way. The longest trip took her through Salt Lake City, Seattle, Portland, and Los Angeles. On one of these trips, she and a younger brother scaled 14,255-foot Long's Peak in the Rockies.

Edna is a Red Cross First Aid Instructor, and has issued nearly a thousand swimming certificates in her work as Water Safety Instructor of the Red Cross. She is a member of the American Camping Association, the Independence Skylark-Oriole Administrative Council, and of the Stone Church School Administrative Council. Each summer she spends several weeks at various church camps for girls and youth. She is an excellent swimmer, a speaker of machine-gun velocity, a writer, and an all-round good scout.

Worship and Wisdom and Service

WORSHIP AND WISDOM AND SERVICE belong together. This has been emphasized from the very beginning of the Restoration Movement, for as early as February, 1829, Joseph Smith, Sr., was told: "O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind, and strength, that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day."

Nevertheless, all of us tend to offer divided service, setting parts of the whole against each other. We offer the love of the heart in place of the service of the hands, or the cultivated mind in place of persistence in well-doing. Such substitutions are never acceptable. Many of us sense this keenly enough to know that trained intelligence or polished skills are not sufficient of themselves. Perhaps we are not so keenly aware that neither is unskillful service enough, just because it is generously offered. If it is the best that can be given, let us offer it without apology, knowing that our Heavenly Father will understand. But all of us are under moral obligation to grow in goodness and in wisdom and in the skills which make our service effective.

Many years ago the Prophet Moses taught the children of Israel that fine workmanship is a gift of God and is pleasing in his sight.

See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah: And he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship: And to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, And in the cutting of stones to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work. And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he and Aholiab the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. Them hath he filled with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, in scarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver, even of them that do any work, and of those that devise cunning work.—Exodus 30: 30-35.

AS THE CHURCH MOVES FORWARD in laying the foundations of the kingdom, the importance of this balancing of love and skill in service becomes more and more apparent. For example, branches of the church are better housed today than ever before in our history; this would have been quite beyond our power but for the faith and love and skill and hard work of good men and women who have served as architects and designers and cooks and builders and carpenters and electricians and cabinet makers and plumbers, etc.

The skills on which we have drawn to build our churches, and to preach our sermons, and to teach our classes are skills developed at considerable effort and sacrifice. Because of this, members of the Presidency have been very happy to note the friendly spirit in which members of the Committee on Ministry to College Students have been helping younger students in their work of preparation, and particularly in their endeavor to keep spiritual and academic preparation and service in balance.

Among the many good things sponsored by the committee has been preparation of a list of trained personnel, not only under appointment and in church related institutions, but also in professional activities which are not officially related to the church yet provide a wide range of

A Memorial Service

Again we are reminded that on the twenty-seventh of this month will recur the anniversary of the martyrdom of Joseph Smith. His ignominious demise at the hands of a mob while incarcerated in the Carthage jail is a matter of historical record. It is not with the thought of perpetuating the memory of this that we again pause to take cognizance of this date, but it is with a genuine desire to keep alive the memory of a man who was instrumental in bringing forth this Restored Gospel.

In the history of the nation we commemorate many dates of the great men of the nation. Most all organizations have their great men whose memory they hold reverently and on occasion pay homage to them. Such is the case with us. On or about 5:30 in the afternoon of June 27, 1844, mobbers marched upon the Carthage (Illinois) jail; and when they had gone, the life of Joseph had gone with them. However, in our memory what he did lives on.

We call the attention of the church to this anniversary date and take this means of informing members that on the Sunday nearest that date there will be conducted suitable memorial services at the graves of Joseph, Hyrum, and Emma in the City of Nauvoo. This year President Edwards will be the speaker and wreaths will be placed upon the graves by Alice Edwards, a granddaughter of the Prophet Joseph. In this way we pay our respects and keep alive in our memory this great man.

Notice of Appointment of Bishop's Agent, Southwest Iowa District

Notice is hereby given of the appointment of Brother Merle Spence, 25 Bennett Avenue, Council Bluffs, Iowa, as bishop's agent of the Southwestern Iowa District succeeding Brother Lee Landon, whose resignation has been received. Solicitors are hereby notified to send their reports for the month of June and each succeeding month thereafter to Brother Merle Spence at the above address.

We take this opportunity of expressing our sincere appreciation to Brother Landon for the good service he has rendered in this office. He has served as our representative for a number of years. Much of this time he has worked under difficulty arising from several years of ill health and more recently absences from home, necessitated by his vocation, but he has always given liberally of his time and energy in the agent's work and evidenced his deep devotion to the cause of the church by maintaining an affirmative ministry to the Saints of his district.

We have also appreciated the support given by the Saints to Brother Landon during the period of his service and take this opportunity of commending Brother Spence to the Saints for their favorable consideration and support.

A Historic Letter

FOR THOSE SEEKING documentary evidence of the stability of the witnesses in their testimony of the divinity of the Book of Mormon, the following letter will be valuable. The original of this is in the files of the Historian's Department. The letter is in the handwriting of John Whitmer, addressed to Mark H. Forest, Esq. Evidently John Whitmer meant "Mark H. Forscutt." The letter is dated March 5, 1876. John Whitmer died July 11, 1878, therefore this letter was written approximately two years and three months before his death. He was one of the eight witnesses to the divinity of the Book of Mormon. He reiterates his own testimony and testifies on behalf of Oliver Cowdery.

JOHN BLACKMORE

Far West, March 5, 1876
Mark H. Forest, Esq. (Forscutt)

Dear Sir:

Yours came duly to hand 4. inst. and the contents considered.

I hasten to answer according to best of my information at hand.

Mrs. Cowdery resides some place in Colorado. The address is mislaid, or I would give it. However, I think I am able to answer your enquiries to your satisfaction. Oliver Cowdery lived in Richmond, Missouri, some 40 miles from here at the time of his death. I went to see him and I was with him for some days previous to his demise.

I have never heard him deny the truth of his testimony of the Book of Mormon under any circumstances whatever.

I have no knowledge that there was any effort made to force him to deny the Book of Mormon. Neither do I believe that he would have denied at the peril of his life, so firm was he that he could not be moved to deny what he has affirmed to be a divine revelation from God.

I desire to do good when it is in my power. I have never heard that anyone of the three or eight witnesses ever denied the testimony that they have borne to the Book as published in the first edition of the Book of Mormon.

There are only two of the witnesses to that Book now living, to wit., David Whitmer, one of the three, and John Whitmer, one of the eight.

Our names have gone forth to all nations, tongues and people as a Divine Revelation from God. And it will bring to pass the designs of God according to the declaration therein contained.

Yours Respectfully,
JOHN WHITMER

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From a recent letter from Elder A. O. Crownover, president of the District of Hawaii:

On Friday, May 11, I accompanied the Vest family to Hilo, where there was a representative group to greet them in true Hawaiian style with many beautiful orchid leis as they stepped off the plane. On Sunday, May 13, we had a very full day in Hilo. We began the day with the baptism of eight young people. A considerable degree of credit for these baptisms can be given to Brother Avon Yap who spent six weeks in Hilo in the interim between Brother Kemp's leaving and Brother Vest's arrival. At the church school hour, Sister Alice Kanui, the matriarch of Hawaii, was honored as the oldest mother and oldest member present. She was presented a beautiful orchid corsage. Brother Vest delivered the Mother's Day sermon at eleven o'clock, and that was followed with a fine basket dinner on the church lawn. In the afternoon a business session was held at which time Brother Vest was elected pastor of the Hilo Branch. At the installation service following, a fine spirit was in evidence as I presented the charge and responsibility and the people of Hilo to Brother Vest for his pastoral care, and as he humbly and sincerely indicated his desire to render creditable service to the church in that capacity. In the evening I talked to the Zion's League and then preached the sermon, closing the activities of the day. Many seemed to be pleased and expressed appreciation for the worship services of the day. I stayed with Brother Vest until Tuesday afternoon, then returned to Honolulu.

We were happy to learn that Brother Vest had been in charge of the religious services on the "Lurline" on Sunday, May 6. It has happened several times before that our ministers have conducted these services, as it did when I came over last May. Brother Vest tells me that the response following the service he conducted was indeed gratifying. Brother and Sister Ed. Fishburn from Denver (Brother Fishburn is Public Relations Director for the Denver Chamber of Commerce) who were also on the "Lurline" with the Vest family tell me that they heard many fine comments on the service conducted by Brother Vest and that dozens of people were asking him questions about our church during the remainder of that trip. We feel that these contacts are indeed worth while and some of them may eventuate in good prospects in the future.

"Lord God of hosts be with us yet, lest we forget."

—Kipling's "Recessional"

NOT LONG AGO I noted a declaration made by a radio news analyst. He said, "We need to re-discover America." Why? Columbus discovered America in 1492 or so we were told in our school histories. Since that date the world has never lost sight of America and was never more conscious of her existence than now. Relatively cheap and abundant transportation has made it possible for citizens of America to explore their own land from border to border. They travel by rail, bus, and airplane. Families by the thousands, annually or more often, climb into the family auto—old Ford or new Packard—and take off to the mountains, the desert, or the seashore.

We know the physical aspects of our land—her vast forests and plains, wheat fields, and herds of cattle on a thousand hills. We know the beauty of her lofty mountains and the mystery of her ancient deserts with their cliff ruins of past civilizations. We know the grace of her coastal lines and beaches from Bar Harbor to the white sands of Florida, along the gulf coast, and up the lovely vistas of the Pacific coast to Vancouver. We know every mile of the unfortified borders of Mexico and Canada.

Rediscovering America

By Elbert A. Smith

We have explored the body of America. Have we missed her soul? Do we need to rediscover what America meant to our forefathers? What she should mean to us? What she means to God in his plans for the world and for his church?

The United States has no right to an exclusive use of the name "America." Canada is America. So are South America, Mexico, and Central America. However, by common consent the peoples of the world, when they speak of America and Americans, seem to have in mind a more limited area and people. Also, since it was in the area now called the United States of America that the Lord chose to restore the gospel, organize the church, and locate Zion, and since he did have a directing voice in framing the Constitution of the land, we fall into the common uses of the word "America" in this article.

By reason of historic developments America is now forced into the forefront in world affairs—perhaps not too well prepared as yet for that position. In this time of world confusion, bordering on anarchy, which strikes terror to so many hearts, we need to re-evaluate and lay strong hold on our fundamental religious beliefs and our beliefs concerning this land that we may find faith and courage to sustain us in these perilous times. "Lord God of hosts, be with us yet, lest we forget."

America in Prophecy

Probably a great many devout people not of our faith believe that God has a purpose in this land. We have this belief certified to us in our Scriptures, in the revelations of God in the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants, in addition to and helping us to interpret the revelations in the Bible concerning "Joseph's land" as a land of promise.

The plans of the Lord for America were long-range plans. Away back in the time of the Jaredites the Lord gave these promises and commandments to that people concerning this land:

And the Lord would not suffer that they should stop beyond the sea in the wilderness, but he would that they should come forth even unto the land of promise, which was choice above all other lands, which the Lord God had preserved for a righteous people; . . .

And now we can behold the decrees of God concerning this land, that it is a land of promise, and whatsoever nation shall possess it shall serve God, or they shall be swept off when the fullness of his wrath shall come upon them. . . .

Behold this is a choice land, and whatsoever nation shall possess it, shall be free from bondage, and from captivity, and from all other nations under heaven, if they will but serve the God of the land, who is Jesus Christ who hath been manifested by the things which we have written.—Ether 1: 29, 31, 35.

In substance the statements to the Jaredites were later renewed to the Nephites:

And it came to pass that the Lord spake unto me, saying, Blessed art thou Nephi, because of thy faith, for thou hast sought me diligently, with lowliness of heart. And inasmuch as ye shall keep my commandments, ye shall prosper, and shall be led to a land of promise; yea, even a land which I have prepared for you; yea, a land which is choice above all other lands.—1 Nephi 1: 53, 54.

Choice Above All Other Lands

I am told that when Sister George Lewis was in Australia with her husband, the late Apostle Lewis, a good patriotic Australian elder said to her, "Which do you like best, Australia or America?" That was a leading question, perhaps embarrassing to answer. Sister Lewis replied, "I agree with God." The elder queried, "What do you mean?" "Well, he said America was to be choice above all other lands." The elder shrugged his shoulders, smiled, and replied, "It is no use to argue with God."

According to the prophecies quoted this was to be a choice land, a free land with liberty always—on condition. That passion for liberty carried over to modern times. Untold thousands fled from oppression in the Old World, and like the Puritans, came seeking “freedom to worship God,” or seeking political freedom—all the freedoms written into the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Freedom was a passion of the soul to our forefathers. Patrick Henry said, “As for me, give me liberty or give me death!” Was that too flamboyant? In modern slang, was that “corny”? Today deep feeling to many people is “corny.” But that feeling was real. The men who signed the Declaration of Independence pledged their lives, and risked them, and gave them in service or in death.

Thomas Jefferson said, “On the altar of God I have sworn eternal hostility toward every form of tyranny over the mind of man.” To be unfettered in body is not enough. Man must be free to think, to choose, to will, to act. Man must be free in body and spirit. It is written, “The body and the spirit is the soul of man.”

The whole soul of man craves freedom. It must be remembered, however, that liberty must be under the law. Someone has said that liberty under law is like fire on the hearth, while liberty without law is like fire on the floor. Liberty was promised in the Book of Mormon as associated with righteousness. Do we need to rediscover that principle in relation to the destiny of America?

Columbus Led of God

Columbus did not discover America by accident. The Book of Mormon indicated quite clearly that God would lead him across the many waters to the “promised land,” and that many peoples after him should be led to cross the waters to that land (1 Nephi 3: 147-149).

The letters of Columbus clearly reveal that he was conscious of divine guidance. At last, in 1492, finding favor at the court of Spain to promote his voyage, he wrote his friend, Padre Juan Perez Marchena:

Our Lord God has heard the prayers of his servants. The wise and virtuous Isabel, touched by the grace of heaven, has kindly listened to this poor man’s words. All has turned out well . . . I have been called to the court to state the proper means for carrying out the designs of Providence.

After his voyage had ended successfully he wrote:

It pleased the Lord Almighty, that in the year of our Lord one thousand four hundred and ninety-two, I should discover the continent of the Indians and many islands.

The text of his letters as translated by Washington Irving may be found in the book, Christopher Columbus, by Arthur Seedman, published by Rand McNally.

Thus in the purposes of God the new world was opened up to those who fled from tyranny and oppression to seek liberty under democratic institutions in the New World.

Not By Chance the Puritans

It was not by chance that such a remarkable band as the Pilgrim Fathers came to this new land. Before they disembarked they drew up the “Pilgrims’ Pact,” beginning, “In the name of God, Amen.” They pledged themselves to enact just laws, not by edict of a king, but by common consent, and to obey the laws enacted.

Chief Justice Holmes considered this the first great American state document and ranked it along with the Declaration of Independence. These were among the people foreseen in the Book of Mormon who would cross the great waters to seek liberty. James Russell Lowell said, “The Puritans laid the egg of democracy in America.”

Not By Accident the Declaration of Independence

It was not by accident that such a remarkable group of men were drawn together to draft the Declaration of Independence, embodying as it did such outstanding declarations concerning equality, justice, and liberty.

It was not by accident that on July 4, 1776, Liberty Bell rang out its message. For twenty-four years that bell had hung in Independence Hall awaiting that day and bearing on its bronze sides the inscription: “Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof.”

Not By Accident the Constitution

It was not by accident that the Constitution was drafted by a most remarkable group of men who overcame what seemed to be insurmountable obstacles to weld together dissident colonies in a compact union under a constitution.

The delegates to the Constitutional Convention recognized the overruling hand of God. As they were about to enter Independence Hall for their task Washington said to them, “Gentlemen, the event is in the hands of God.” In our own modern revelations we have confirmation of his statement:

Therefore, it is not right that any man should be in bondage one to another. And for this purpose have I established the Constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood.—Doctrine and Covenants 98: 10.

As Others See the Constitution

Perhaps some citizens of the United States who from birth have lived under the Constitution take it for granted and do not appreciate it. Citizens of the British Empire, recalling their long struggle to win the rights of the common man as against the king and the lords and revering the seeds of freedom in the British Magna Charta, may on occasion be more aware of the greatness of the Constitution of the United States than are some of us.

Gladstone, one of the greatest British statesmen of his time or any other time, declared:

As the British Constitution is the most subtle organism which has proceeded from progressive history, so the American Constitution is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.

James Bryce, British ambassador to the United States and an authority on the Constitution of the United States, at a dinner given by the Pennsylvania Society on the one hundred twenty-fifth anniversary of the framing of the Constitution, said:

The Constitution was the work of an extraordinary group of men, such as has seldom been seen living at the same time in any country and such as had never been brought together in any other country to undertake the immensely difficult task of framing a fundamental instrument of government for a nation.

I was with Apostle Arthur Oakman when he applied for his citizenship papers in the Federal Building in Kansas City. The immigration officer questioned me first, privately. He asked, “Do you think Mr. Oakman will make a good citizen of the United States?” I replied, “Yes. In fact I think he will make a much better citizen than numbers of native-born Americans.” The officer then questioned Apostle Oakman in my presence; he sat looking out of the window and asking his routine questions in a routine manner. Finally he said, “What do you think of the Constitution of the United States?” As nearly as I can remember, Brother Oakman replied, “I think it is the greatest instrument of government ever devised by the mind of man.” The officer snapped to attention. That was such an answer as he had not often heard. Then he inquired, “You think then that it is worthy of our continued support?” Brother Oakman answered, “Yes. And I believe that if Americans should go astray and forget it for a thousand years they would eventually come back to it.” I was certain that Brother Oakman would get his citizenship papers.

A lot of Americans who have forgotten the Constitution should come back to it before it is too late. They will do well to rediscover America.

Rediscovering Fundamentals

Amid confusion in world politics and in the religious world we need to rediscover, reaffirm, and strengthen our convictions concerning fundamentals. Only so can we retain faith and courage—even sanity.

In a remarkable edition of Fortune Magazine, February last, it was affirmed that the principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence are as valid today as they ever were. And the affirmation was made, "It is a time for fundamentals: the crisis is such that there must be no doubt in any one's heart concerning them."

These are the fundamentals set forth in the preamble to the Declaration of Independence:

We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; . . .

These, then, are three fundamental principles: individual liberty; equality; constitutional government deriving its authority from the people. They interlock. No man may be deprived of liberty or life excepting in accord with law. The law governing must be constitutional—in accord with the expressed will of the people. That all men are created equal does not mean that all are of the same size, or mental ability, or initiative. It means that in the eyes of the law all men are equal, regardless of color or creed or political affiliations. How patiently have our courts heard the cases of men and women charged with subversive and treasonable activities. No man has the power of a Stalin or a Hitler to order them shot or banished to the salt mines. They have their "day in court"—many days. Constitutional government, deriving its authority from the governed, is the exact opposite of dictatorial government. In principle the two are as far apart as heaven and hell—and that is more than a figure of speech.

The Age-old Struggle for Human Liberty

In the midst of world confusion some may lose sight of the primary casus belli. This struggle began long ago. According to the Inspired Version of the Bible (Genesis, chapter 3), long ago there was in contemplation the salvation of mankind. Satan came before God and volunteered to save men, saying, "I will redeem all mankind that not one soul shall be lost." He proposed to save them by edict, regardless of their choice. He aspired to a world-wide dictatorship. Because he designed to destroy the free agency which God had given man, Satan was rejected and cast down. Then Christ offered himself and came with a persuasive message leaving men their right to choose.

The struggle begun on high has been fought out here below for ages past—fought out in many a wordy debate and on many a bloody battlefield. The issue today is between despotism and democracy in the political realm. It also involves religious freedom. As always, despotism puts men behind the iron curtain and on the iron rack. Badly as democracy may be interpreted, at times, and poorly as it is implemented, it remains on earth the only political champion of liberty and justice.

Whether we like it or not we find America in the forefront of the democracies in this war. The life of America and every democratic nation believing in human liberty is at stake. "Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet!"

The Promise of Liberty Contingent Upon Righteousness

The promises of liberty and divine protection contained in the Book of Mormon are conditional. There must be righteousness and obedience to law. Of late, numbers of persons of prominence who probably never read the Book of Mormon have stressed this very thought. Note the language of Senator Fulbright, Democratic senator from Arkansas, as quoted in the Reader's Digest for June:

Democracy is, I believe, more likely to be destroyed by the perversion or abandonment of its moral principles than by armed attack from Russia. . . .

Scandals in our Government are not a new phenomenon in our history. What seems to be new about these scandals is the moral blindness which allows those in responsible positions to accept the practices which the facts reveal. It is bad enough for us to have corruption in our midst, but it is worse if it is condoned and accepted as inevitable. The values of life which were clear to the Founding Fathers have become dim and fuzzy in outline.

Senator Kefauver, head of the Congressional Committee probing criminal conditions in various states and cities, reported that conditions uncovered frightened him.

Daily the press and radio bring us news of crimes of violence. The congressional investigations uncovered an alarming hook-up among criminals and certain types of politicians and business men—the most dangerous "fifth column" undermining our security in America. Some of these crimes can be dealt with in the courts; however, Theodore Roosevelt in his day remarked that it is easy to distinguish between black and white, but there are shades of gray between the two in which some people are confused. Just outside the pale of the written law, practices have grown up that are unethical, unpatriotic, and contemptible, but the culprits may escape fine or imprisonment, especially with the aid of a certain type of criminal lawyer who is skilled in the art of law evasion. Too often these practices have come to be accepted as a legitimate part of business and politics. Persons in responsible positions, even in the government, have thereby enriched themselves, their relatives, their friends, and henchmen, at the expense of the taxpayers and at the expense of the good name of the nation at home and abroad.

The signers of the Declaration of Independence pledged their "lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor." When did personal honor cease to be sacred? The conditions named remind us of the verse by Edwin Markham. He feared not foreign aggression, but wrote:

I fear the vermin that shall undermine
Senate and citadel, school and shrine—
The worm of greed, the fatted form of ease,
And all the crawling progeny of these—
The vermin that shall honeycomb the towers
And walls of state in unsuspecting hours.

Still let us take heart. Senator Kefauver pointed out in his speech in Kansas City that it is the criminal who makes the headline news. For one such there may be hundreds of law-abiding, industrious, honorable men quietly at work who never seem to rate headline news. It is the old story: we see a flock of a hundred sheep. One is black, ninety-nine are white. Invariably we notice the black sheep and pass by the ninety-nine white ones.

It is well that attention has been focused upon the slimy creatures who "undermine senate and citadel, school and shrine." Yet let us not forget the millions of worthy people and the many goodly homes of the people; those who go quietly about the work of life, paying their taxes, building their homes, serving their country, offering their prayers. These certainly will not be forgotten by "him who dwelt in the bush," whose favor was promised to Joseph's Land.

The peoples of America have had a rich inheritance. Jesus said, "Unto whom much has been given, of him shall much be required." Emerson wrote, "Pay every debt as though God himself wrote the bill." He does write the bill.

"Lord God of hosts, be with us yet, lest we forget."

The College Student Needs a Local Branch

by Sally Harding

Introduction: Many church young people look forward to attending Graceland. We sincerely hope that this will continue to be true. But, for various reasons, attendance at Graceland is not always possible. And—in any event—a steadily increasing number go beyond what Graceland offers. This excellent article is written with such students in mind. Many others, young and old, will find it interesting and helpful.

WHEN A HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATE sets his face toward the pursuit of higher education, he spends much time and thought in selecting a university which will afford him the best possible means to his professional goal. He seeks the advice of one in his own field who has made the adventure before him; and in counsel with informed advisers, he makes his selection of an institution of higher learning.

A Latter Day Saint youth goes another step in his selection of a university. Because his goals include more than mere academic achievement, he takes into consideration the availability of a local church in the college community, and on the basis of the two considerations, he makes his selection. He is motivated by a desire to maintain his appreciation of the church program and objectives throughout his university career. The Latter Day Saint youth realizes the need which a student has for close association with church people.

Education stimulates one to think about new and strange issues. At first sight some of the new concepts seem foreign to a student's religious beliefs. To try to be a diligent student of secular affairs and a Christian at the same time seems to be incongruous. When this problem arises the student needs to look outside himself for the solution. In most situations he seeks the counsel of his academic adviser, but such a problem demands different handling. When a new concept threatens his religious beliefs, a student needs to turn to his religious counselor, who, in most cases, is the pastor of the local branch. With the help of his pastor, the student learns to assimilate new concepts without losing all of the old ones. In this way new and seemingly revolutionary ideas are interpreted in the light of fundamental religious beliefs.

It is easy for a person to lose sight of his goals if he does not keep them constantly in view. Every day in the classroom the student is working toward his vocational objective. His contact with other people who are working toward the same goal makes the effort seem real and rewarding. It is often a temptation for the student to concentrate his time and effort on his vocational pursuits, leaving little or no time for his religious endeavors, unless the importance of the latter is recognized. Sharing religious experiences with other people who have the same objectives in view keeps the religious motivation alive and meaningful.

The religious-minded youth is able to find his niche in the local branch at the same time as he is establishing himself on the campus. The local branch in a college town is a "home away from home" for the student. It affords him the necessary stimulation to increase in spiritual stature while he is developing his mind for the professional world.

THE BALANCE between education and religion is often a hazardous one unless the student is given an opportunity to weigh the two experiences equally. Students who have been unable to maintain this balance have sometimes doubted the ability of the church to meet the needs of the changing world. It is only when the student's mind has not kept equal pace with religion while it raced ahead with education that this doubt occurs.

The local branch is the workshop of the general church. There is an attitude among church members that youth is a time of preparation for work in the church. This attitude is neither correct nor healthy. If a person continually puts off participation to a later date when he hopes to have established himself in his vocation, there is a good chance that he will lose interest in his former religious goals. Activity keeps interest alive. Youth is a time not for passive preparation, but for active participation. "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth" is sound advice. When a student prepares himself for the teaching profession he develops more than good intentions and theories. Before he takes his professional position he participates in a program of directed teaching, where he applies his textbook theories and exercises his good intentions. Just as preparation for the teaching profession entails doing practice teaching, preparation for work in the church involves active participation in the local branch.

It is not unusual for a student to say to himself, "I'll wait until I become specialized in my own field, then I can perform some specific function in the church." By taking this attitude toward church participation, the student is both denying himself a most valuable part of his growing experience and depriving the church of his contribution along general lines. The college student must be reminded that his immediate service in a general capacity toward the main objectives of the church is needed as much or more than any specific service which he might render at a later date. The church needs trained people who have an over-all perspective of the general church program. The college student can gain this perspective only by maintaining an intimate contact with the program of the local church, which is an integral part of the total program.

The student spends much time in the classroom learning techniques involved in a specific field of work. Specialization is a necessary part of church work as long as it is treated as a part of the total general program. The danger of specialization lies in its possible tendency to become isolated from the over-all objectives. The local branch plays an important role in helping the student to see beyond his immediate field and to look at it as only a part of the general program.

From his childhood the youth has been taught that the primary Christian commandment is to "love thy God with all thy heart, might, mind, and strength." This fundamental love is achieved through the love of his creatures, the love of man for man. The capacity for loving is not learned from a textbook, it is acquired through continual interaction with people. Love for the church is developed through association on a local level. Some contemporary political philosophies proclaim love for "the masses," but deny the dignity and worth of the individual man. Likewise, a Latter Day Saint cannot profess love for the general church membership unless he has the capacity for loving the individual members of a local branch.

EDUCATION SHOULD BE A PROCESS of development of the "whole" man. If the development of any one facet of the personality is sacrificed to the development of another, the student is limiting his purpose. Unequal development of intellect and spirit yields lopsided results. When a farmer goes out to plow his field, he makes certain that the whole field gets plowed. It is not enough to seed the entire field and then cultivate only half of the seeded plot.

The result will be that only the half which has been tended will yield the desired crop, while the other half will be overgrown with weeds, which will eventually spread and infest the crops. In the same manner, if a student sows the seeds of intellect and spirit in his garden of education and cultivates only the intellect, the harvest will show the neglect.

Adequate opportunity for worship is required for spiritual development. Private worship is important, but group worship plays a vital part in the development of the religious-minded person. The college youth is not religiously self-sufficient any more than he is intellectually self-sufficient. Fellowship with people of his own field, regardless of the age group, is vitally important to his general well-being and happiness.

The scholarly mind is a questioning mind. The questing spirit of thinking youth is a challenge which should be met through the local church. It is a challenge which calls for a thorough and honest discussion of the issues which are presented. A student group demands that such a discussion be on a democratic basis. Students seek the opportunity to express themselves on questions which are related to their life goals, and they go to their church home where they expect mind to meet mind on a democratic basis.

Most often in a student group this question arises: "How will my proposed vocation fit in with the program of the general church?" This is a question of basic importance to both the student and the general church. When such questions cannot be adequately met by the local pastor, he refers them to counselors who are qualified to offer advice on the matter. Together with these counselors, students seek to integrate their personal objectives with the objectives of the general church.

The presence of college students in a branch creates certain problems which demand wise and careful handling. When a young person first enters college he becomes very much aware of his new status as a student, and he tends to look down upon those who have not had the benefit of higher education as his "intellectual inferiors." This attitude demands a certain amount of forbearance on the part of the local branch until the student makes the discovery that his type of education is not the only one. Gradually, with the aid of branch members, he recognizes that wisdom also comes through years of experience.

IN ORDER TO WORK EFFECTIVELY with its student group, the branch must recognize the vein of common interest which pervades the group and make use of it as a channel through which to meet the student's needs. This common interest must be recognized in such a way that it will not separate the students from the other members of the branch, but make them aware of the interests of the other members.

The student's association with the local branch should not limit his contacts with other nonmember students. An important part of university life is the friendships which are formed in the classrooms and dormitories. The well-rounded personality is developed through contact with people of all social types and religious faiths, but the most fundamental and meaningful relationships are formed by people who share common religious beliefs and objectives. While students are making friends on the campus, it is important that they cultivate friendships within their own church group.

The local branch has much of basic importance to offer to the college youth, but there are reciprocal contributions. Through their acquaintance with nonmember young people, Latter Day Saint students are able to make missionary contacts for the church which otherwise might be overlooked by the local membership. The qualities of freshness and vivacity which are typical of the young serve as a stimulant to the branch membership and excite activity in the local program. The student's spirit of alertness and inquisitiveness keeps the branch on its toes and encourages it to keep pace with the stride of the modern world.

Every college youth needs the assurance that his church is interested in him and in his achievements. This can come primarily through his association with the local branch as representative of the general church. The student has an important role to play in the local church while he is in college, and the church has an important role to play in the life of the student. The objective of the kingdom will be reached sooner if the church and its members in college are brought into a richer association and fellowship.

How "Young Joseph" Came to Amboy

Selections from the "Autobiographical Sketches"
of Edmund C. Briggs of the Council of Twelve

Part Seven: The Trip to Amboy

GOING TO CONFERENCE—(1) BY
STAGECOACH TO ST. JOSEPH

Tuesday, March 27: This morning we continue our journey by the public stagecoach, drawn by four horses, for St. Joseph, Missouri, a distance of one hundred thirty miles. Our fare is fourteen dollars. The coachman is gentlemanly and cracks his long whip lively, though he is careful to avoid hitting his horses, of which he seems proud. They are fine-looking animals.

* * * * *

Wednesday, March 28: At one o'clock in the afternoon we arrived safely in St. Joseph. It was a pleasant journey, though somewhat tedious to ride all night and until one o'clock today. The roads have been good, though dusty, which is remarkable for this time of the year. We passed through Sidney, county seat of Fremont County and took supper at Mr. Thomas's, twelve miles south of Sidney. It cost us fifty cents each. At Rockport, county seat of Atchison County, state of Missouri, we changed coaches and horses again. The country has been picturesque, with its rolling prairies skirted with light timber and its rich valleys.—SH 50:579. June 24, 1903.

* * * * *

We put up at the hotel in St. Joseph. There are no members of the church in this beautiful little city on the banks of the Missouri River. Brother Beebe is quite tired. The long stagecoach ride has been quite severe on him without any sleep since we left Glenwood, Iowa. But he is cheerful and in good spirits and has retired while I am penning these few lines in my journal.—SH 50: 579. June 24, 1903.

GOING TO CONFERENCE—(2) BY TRAIN AND BOAT TO AMBOY

Thursday, March 29: At twenty minutes past nine in the forenoon we are on board the cars of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad. Indeed, in comparison to the slow stagecoach, the Prophet Nahum (2: 4) has very fitly described them when he says, "The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation" . . . The conductor put one passenger off because he had not paid his fare, but he counted all the worthy ones in, and I was one of them, so I continued my journey. When we arrived at Hannibal we took a steamer for Quincy, Illinois, which is situated on the banks of the Father of Waters, the Mississippi River, twenty miles north of Hannibal, and then again on the cars to Galesburg. We reached the city at seven o'clock in the evening. Brother Beebe is not feeling very well, though he is cheerful in spirits. He has been broken of his accustomed rest so many nights that he is very weary and tired. So I suggested we stay over night and rest. He readily accepted the proposition and we put up at the hotel of the railroad passenger house.

* * * * *

Friday, March 30: At ten o'clock in the forenoon we boarded the cars of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad for Mendota, eighty miles from Galesburg, and then changed cars to the Illinois Central, eighteen miles to Amboy, arriving at our destination at three o'clock in the afternoon. We walked one mile and a half to Brother Royal Stone's. Here we met Brother W. W. Blair and wife. After greeting us he said, "Did you come by way of Nauvoo?" I replied in the negative. He then said, "Joseph is to be with us at conference, or at least he said he would; but as all things human are uncertain we will not say anything about it to make talk in the world until he comes." He then informed me that Elder William Marks of Shabbona Grove had received a letter from Joseph in which he said he had determined to take his father's place at the head of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and desired Brother Marks and such others as he might select to call on him immediately at Nauvoo in order that he might obtain their counsel on church matters. Agreeably to this request, Elder Marks, Israel L. Rogers, and W. W. Blair visited him on March 20 and 21 and after this interview, Joseph informed the brethren that he would be at the General Conference at Amboy on April 6. The counsel he wished to have with the brethren was their wisdom and advice about redeeming the Mormons of Utah from their evil practices of polygamy and kindred doctrines. He stated he understood that the law of God to the church was given February, 1831, and cannot be superseded by any other law. He also said he believed that many had been led into the evils of their doctrines honestly and that it is advisable therefore to adopt a mild course toward the Mormons who had apostatized from the faith as his father taught it.—SH 50: 602, 603. July 1, 1903.

Doctrine and Covenants Compared

By Richard A. Nies

WHEN APPROACHED about our work with the Mormon Church we are frequently asked the similarities and differences of the Scriptures of the two churches. In the Herald of July 3, 1950, Brother James Wardle gave a report on the comparison of the two versions of the Book of Mormon. In the Herald of August 28, 1950, I gave a report on the study of the Pearl of Great Price. It is the design of this article to report the finding of a comparison of the two books of Doctrine and Covenants. We hope to have, in the future, an article on the stands of the two churches regarding the Bible.

In the winter of 1948 a professor of a religious class of approximately 150 students at the Brigham Young University gave a three-hour lecture on the Reorganized Church. Among other statements, he said, "They have a Doctrine and Covenants, but they accept only what they want to and reject that which does not harmonize with them." I was quite disturbed by this so set about to find out for myself just who rejects and accepts what. Seeing the magnitude of the task, I recruited the help of Brother James Everett. Together we studied and compared, word for word, paragraph for paragraph, and section for section, the 1835 and 1844 editions of the Doctrine and Covenants of the original church, the 1869 edition, and the present edition of the Doctrine and Covenants of the Mormon Church, and the 1864 edition and the present edition of the Doctrine and Covenants of the Reorganized Church.

The 1835 edition was the only edition of the Doctrine and Covenants published during the life of Joseph Smith, Jr. The 1844 edition was published shortly after his death. This 1844 edition was reprinted by the Mormon Church a number of times, the last being in 1869, the edition of our study. Their next edition was printed in 1876, seven years later, and, with minor alterations, is yet reprinted to this day as the official Mormon Doctrine and Covenants. The 1864 edition of the Reorganized Church is the first published by this group.

Let it be clearly understood that the comparison was based on the sections dated up to the death of Joseph Smith, Jr., as found in the 1844 edition, including the section on the martyrdom.

The bulk of our study was made in Brigham Young University Library, using Mormon books.

We established the following as authentic sources:

Doctrine and Covenants, all authorized editions of the original church, the Mormon Church, and the Reorganized Church.

Times and Seasons
Millennial Star
Evening and Morning Star
History of the Church (Utah)
Church History (Reorganized)

References and quotations have not been used in this report because of their detailed and technical nature. However, any references and/or quotations will be furnished upon request.

First of all, we observed these totals:

Edition	Number of sections received before the death of Joseph Smith, Jr.	Total number of Sections
1835 (Kirtland)	102	102
1844 (Nauvoo)	111	111
1864 (Reorganized)	113	113
1869 (Utah)	111	111
Utah, present	135	136
Reorganized, present	113	142

CONSIDERING FIRST our findings on the Reorganized Church editions, we found that the 1864 edition contained all of the sections of the 1844 edition, plus two more. These two are sections 22 and 36, both concerning the Inspired Correction of the Bible. Both can be found in the Times and Seasons, in the official published histories of both churches, and in the Pearl of Great Price, but not in any of the Utah editions of the Doctrine and Covenants. These two sections were not printed in the Doctrine and Covenants by the original church.

The present edition of the Reorganized Church is the same as the 1864, with the exception of those sections added through continuous revelation to the church, and the practice of open canon. The Reorganized Church, in other words, has not deleted any of the sections contained in the 1844 edition, has made no changes in them, and has only added two dated before the martyrdom, both well-established as revelations received through Joseph Smith, Jr. Since the Reorganization twenty-nine sections dated since 1860 have been added (sections 114-142).

THE Mormon Church printed the Doctrine and Covenants as edited in 1844—as far as the material contents are concerned—until 1876, a period of thirty-two years. All interim editions, the last being in 1869—the edition of our study, were restricted to form.

In the 1876 edition there were twenty-five sections added, (2, 13, 77, 85, 87, 108, 109, 110, 111, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123, 125, 126, 129, 130, 131, 132) and one deleted, (section 109 from the 1844 edition, 101 from the 1835 edition) all dated before the death of Joseph Smith, Junior. One section, 136, dated after the martyrdom, was also added. In this 1876 edition the paragraphing was replaced by versification. Of the twenty-five sections added, dated before the martyrdom, all but ten (77, 114, 120, 121, 122, 123, 129, 130, 131, 132) have been verified by authentic sources. Of these ten, three (121, 122, 123), which are reported as being revelations from God, were taken from a letter written in two parts by Joseph Smith, Jr., and four other men while imprisoned in the Liberty jail. Besides taking these sections from a man-made letter and labeling them as revelations from God, the editors of the 1876 edition saw fit to make several changes in the wording and the punctuation to give support to doctrine not taught by the original church. In addition to these three sections, there is another one of the ten that is worthy of noting. This one is section 132, dealing with plural marriage. Although this purported revelation was printed first in 1852 and secretly taught and practiced as essential to salvation, the stand on singular marriage as officially taken by Joseph Smith, Jr., and the church (section 101 in the 1835 edition, 109 in the 1844 edition, 109 in the 1869 Utah edition, 111 in Reorganized editions) was retained by the Mormon Church in the Doctrine and Covenants until 1876, a period of approximately twenty-nine years. This replacement of sections to support doctrine involves the one deletion mentioned. The other sections of the twenty-five additions cannot be verified by authentic sources and are not of sufficient significance to mention here, other than to say that there are, among them, supporting quotations for teaching that were not taught by the original church. The present edition used by the Mormon Church is, in reality, the same as the 1876 edition.

I SHOULD LIKE to report one other observation taken from our study. Every revelation that has been added to the Reorganized Doctrine and Covenants has been handled according to the prescribed procedure, except section 121, where, as is specifically noted in paragraph 6 an exception has been made. The following quotation indicates the procedure used by the Mormon Church in adopting the changes involved in the 1876 edition, the only time such procedure has been necessary. Note that this action was taken in 1880, four years after the changes were first published.

President George Q. Cannon said:

I hold in my hand the book of Doctrine and Covenants and also the book The Pearl of Great Price, which books contain revelations of God. In Kirtland, the Doctrine and Covenants in its original form, as first printed, was submitted to the officers of the Church and the members of the Church to vote upon. As there have been additions made to it by the publishing of revelations which were not contained in the original edition, it has been deemed wise to submit these books with their contents to the Conference, to see whether the Conference will vote to accept the books and their contents as from God, and binding upon us as a people and as a Church.

President Joseph F. Smith said,

I move that we receive and accept the revelations contained in these books, as revelations from God to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and to all the world.

The motion was seconded and sustained by unanimous vote of the whole Conference. — Semi-Annual Conference Report of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints which was held in Salt Lake City on October 10, 1880.

Operation: Service

By C. Ed. Miller

For who will hearken unto you in this matter? but as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike.

—I Samuel 30: 24

IN THIS ARTICLE I try to pay a little tribute to one of the Lord's choice handmaids. I also refer to some of the pioneers of the Wheeling, West Virginia, congregation.

Some thirty years ago I was sitting on top of a pile of immense logs loaded on a heavy wagon which was being pulled by a team of eighteen oxen along a country road in Victoria, Australia. I said to the driver, "Brother A, an ox is a funny animal. Look at your team, I can't see that any one of them is shirking on the job. All of them seem to be enjoying pulling this heavy load up grade. Yet I have seen you walking beside the team whipping them to persuade them to pull an empty wagon on a level road!" He said, "It is the nature of oxen to pull, and when they don't have a load back of them they lose interest and are bored. And there are Saints in the local congregation who are bored if they don't have a heavy load to pull for the Lord." This was not a crude comparison, but a he-man conclusion.

Mary Gill Brewster, who recently passed away, was of the pulling-the-load type. The late "Brother" Joseph, in his Memoirs, referred to her as "one of the pillars of Christ's church." She had eight children. Her daughter Mary died at the age of eighteen. One morning as Sister Brewster was washing the dishes and mourning over the loss of her child, a voice spoke to her and said, "Be comforted. You gave the body; I gave the spirit. I gave back the body and took back the spirit." Five of the children are living; all are members of the church. William Brewster, an electrical engineer, and Mrs. Schneithorst, R.N., are connected with the Sanitarium. Mrs. S. Edward Hewitt lives in Detroit; Thomas Brewster in Mentor, Ohio; and Robert Brewster in Pleasant Hill, Missouri.

My first General Conference appointment was to Wheeling, West Virginia, where Sister Brewster lived. She was one of the pioneers of the branch, which was organized by the late Gomer T. Griffiths. To bring this church of Jesus Christ into existence, the Lord chose sturdy characters. Many congregations had their start because of stanch men and women. The Wheeling congregation was fortunate in having pioneers and successors of such men and women as the Ebelings, Gills, Brewsters, Listons, Tegartens, Smiths, Thomases, Serings, Tarys, Winships, Martins, and others who faithfully served. The Herald of December 11, 1950, paid a well-deserved tribute to Brother and Sister Tary on the occasion of their sixty-fifth wedding anniversary at Wheeling.

SOME TIME AFTER ARRIVING in Wheeling, I read in the Herald of the hard time some of our ministers were having in their missions, being misrepresented and persecuted after making many sacrifices to get the restored gospel to the people. I concluded I was having it too easy and would be getting "soft." I made up my mind to commence the hardening process, I would do something I didn't want to do—preach on the street! After I held a number of such meetings with indifferent success, a young man asked me if I would go to a little town across the state line in Ohio if he would obtain a schoolhouse for me in which to preach. Of course I agreed.

Mrs. Brewster

I sent to the Herald an order for some of our best tracts. After receiving these I went to the little town, where I found the schoolhouse was not properly situated for my purpose. I took the tracts to the residential section, making three trips to each home. After careful checking I learned not one person had read my tracts, and I had not received a single invitation to discuss our belief. One motherly woman gave me a big apple. Being thin gives the impression of being hungry—which is quite an asset.

I learned there had been a number of fires in the town of incendiary origin. A drugstore had been completely destroyed; only the stone foundation remained. I thought I had a brilliant idea. If the people would not read my tracts I would try to reach them by preaching from that foundation. But how could I get an audience? I wished then that Elder Charles May were with me; he can get a crowd any time with his guitar and pleasing voice. Early one evening I crawled up on the foundation and shouted at the top of my voice, "FIRE, FIRE, FIRE!" I got the crowd. I apologized profusely for the ruse, which the crowd took good naturedly, but when they saw me open my Bible they scattered; only three or four remained. I continued the meetings with no increase in attendance.

AT THE CLOSE OF THE LAST MEETING I walked down the country road toward the place where I was staying. There was a large boulder at the edge of a field, I climbed on top and soliloquized: "Brother, the people here whom you have met will not read your tracts or listen to you preach. Your appearance apparently is against you, and there must be something wrong with your personality, so you better quit and go home."

I jumped down from the rock and was joyously on my way when all nature around me seem to shout, "Quitter! quitter! quitter!"

I said, "I am not a quitter, I am coming out tomorrow evening and preach if there is just one person to listen to me." The next evening, to my profound astonishment, half of the town was at the foundation. I asked a young fellow what was going on, and he said, "A guy is going to preach."

I said, "I am the guy," and climbed up on the foundation. For over an hour the Spirit of the Lord rested on me; no one left. But what brought out the crowd? I learned later why.

As I was about to close the service I noticed a very large woman of prepossessing appearance pushing her way toward me. I was glad I towered over her on my foundation. She asked me if I would answer some questions she had in mind. I replied I would do my best. She asserted I placed too much importance on baptism, even stating it was necessary to be baptized to enter the kingdom of God here on earth. "Now if baptism is of so much importance why didn't Christ baptize?" she asked. "Lady," I replied, "there are four places in the New Testament that state Christ did baptize." I read John 3:22: "After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the land of Judea; and there he tarried with them and baptized." The lady said she was acquainted with the passage and also two others that I possibly would quote. I read

John 3:26: "And they came unto John, and said unto him, Rabbi, he that was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou barest witness, behold, the same baptizeth" . . . I said to the crowd, "Folks, here are two positive statements that Christ baptized, and this lady, who apparently is above the average in intelligence and a Bible student, contradicts these statements and declares Christ did not baptize." The lady said, "Keep on reading, Parson." I then read John 4:1. "When therefore the Lord knew how the Pharisees had heard that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John," and I said to the crowd, "I have now quoted three passages that Christ made disciples and baptized them." The lady called out triumphantly, "Now read the second verse." I read John 4:2. "Though Jesus himself baptized not but his disciples." The lady remarked, "There it states positively that Jesus did not baptize, but his disciples did." I answered, "No, lady, it does not say Jesus did not baptize, it says just the opposite—that he did baptize, but it does not say the disciples baptized." The lady became very much excited. I handed her my Bible and asked her to read the passage, but not to add the word "did." After she read the verse she said, "It is perfectly plain that Jesus did not baptize." I took my Bible and read, "Though Jesus himself baptized not but his disciples. He didn't baptize John's disciples, but he did baptize his own." The only word which describes the woman's reaction is "crushed," I felt sorry for her. Various questions were asked by other persons in the crowd, and it finally dawned on me that they looked upon me as an authority. Then an assurance came over me, "I have called you to teach."

The next day a young man met me on the street; he was convulsed with laughter. He said the woman who had argued with me the past evening was considered the best Bible student in town and had often proved a problem for the ministers. "She is so mad at you," he said, "she is making a spectacle of herself, accusing you of humiliating her before the whole town." The fellow walked away laughing.

I CONCLUDED that if that large woman had developed an unfriendly attitude toward me, expediency and good strategy would suggest that I depart at once. I did. I had made plans to be back in Wheeling. Experienced missionaries have developed techniques to meet their various problems. When in a town containing Latter Day Saints and the missionary is hungry, he tries to locate a home where there is a large family. Such a home must always have plenty of food in the house, and the family is not perturbed when a guest or two appears unannounced. I naturally gravitated to the Brewster home where I was welcomed by Sister Brewster with "After I get you something to eat I want to ask you some questions." After dinner she asked, "Where were you Thursday evening?" I told her, "Were you thinking about quitting the ministry?" I asked her how she knew about it. Upon further questioning I learned that when she was saying her prayers in her room Friday morning she had had a vision in which she saw me sitting on a large stone very much discouraged. She prayed the Lord would in some way encourage me to continue my ministry. Then I understood. Because of a good woman's prayer for me, the Lord moved upon those people to come out and hear a sermon inspired of God and also to encourage one of his humble servants.

This book continues to win friends to the Restoration. In a recent survey this book and the Book of Mormon lead a list of ninety books of literature named by members of our church. Have a copy ready for your prospect to read when your opportunity comes. Through the years it has stood the test. It continues to help in our present emphasis of Each One Win One.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. The answers are the opinions and interpretations of the panel member signing them, and do not commit the Herald nor the church.

Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only questions with contributor's full name and address will receive attention.—EDITOR.

Question:

What references can you quote me proving the earthly kingdom of Zion will be established before Christ comes? Also, why was there no mention of this plan in Christ's talking to his disciples at the Mount of Olives about his second coming? The new Jerusalem in John's vision in Revelation states the city comes down from heaven.

Missouri

Mrs. R. E. B.

Answer:

Genesis 7: 66-72 (Inspired Version), says that Enoch beheld the Son of Man and asked him if he would come again upon the earth. Enoch was told that the Lord would come in the last days. "But before that day the heavens shall be darkened, . . . and great tribulations shall be among the children of men, but my people will I preserve; and righteousness will I send down out of heaven, and truth will I send forth out of the earth, to bear testimony of mine Only Begotten." . . . And "I shall prepare . . . an holy city, that my people may gird up their loins, and be looking forth for the time of my coming; for there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion; a New Jerusalem." This seems most conclusive proof that Zion shall be established and flourishing on the earth when Christ returns. Note that this shall be before the return of Christ. A holy city, called Zion, a New Jerusalem, was to be prepared.

Revelation 12: 1-3, 5, 7 relates the story of the woman, which was the church of God, who gave birth to the man child, who was the kingdom of God and his Christ. Certainly the church of God and the kingdom of God are associated as one as an instrument of God in the salvation of man. Christ said (John 3: 3, 5) that one cannot see or enter the kingdom of God without being born of water and the Spirit. Baptism in water and the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Spirit are prerogatives of the church. Those unto whom these sacramental ordinances have been authoritatively administered may both see the kingdom and enter into it. The church of God was to return at the end of the twelve hundred sixty years. To prove that the church is not the kingdom of God and his Christ is to indict the church as an imposter, and not the church of God. We would, as a people, need to look elsewhere for the preparation that is being made, that must indeed be made, even a holy city, called Zion, a New Jerusalem.

Doctrine and Covenants 102: 9, says in part, "Firstly, let my army become very great (great in numbers and quality of individual and collective righteousness) . . . that her banners may be terrible unto all nations; that the kingdoms of this world may be constrained to acknowledge that the kingdom of Zion is in very deed the kingdom of our God and his Christ . . ." When Christ returns the present world order of things will be broken up. (See II Thessalonians 1: 7-10; Revelation 19: 11-21.) Thus we have proof that Zion shall be very much in evidence to the nations of the world before the coming of Christ in the flesh. God could not justly bring judgment upon the world and destruction of the wicked unless such acts of witnessing as a flourishing Zion were in evidence to the nations. Noah must do more than preach a hundred twenty years; he must do the works of witnessing by building the Ark of safety. We cannot escape our own kingdom-building responsibility. God never especially honors an individual or a people to the exclusion of others. Those so blessed must share the blessings of God with all who desire to share qualifiedly in them; or the blessings will be turned into condemnation.

The second part of the question asks why the Zionite kingdom plan was not mentioned in Christ's conversation with the disciples on the Mount of Olives.

There were many things not mentioned, but this does not exclude them from the realm of final happenings. Happily, we discover that the kingdom was the very center of their conversation. Both the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of Matthew are of the Olivet discourse. "And then, at that day, Before the Son of Man comes, the kingdom of heaven shall be likened unto ten virgins . . ."—25: 1. Unfortunately there shall be five foolish with the five wise virgins, but this shall be statistically true of those within the confines of the kingdom of heaven. Verses 14-30 illustrate kingdom responsibility of the talents by the Lord's stewards. Verses 32-47 tell of the truly Zionite responsibility of all who are sheep of the kingdom. They exercised loving kindness to their brethren, which the Lord accepted as faithful service to him as the king. The goats were those who were not faithful in their relationship to those of their kingdom brethren, and consequently, unfaithful to the king. The sheep are certainly to be thus active "before the Son of Man shall come."

Question:

Is the Holy Spirit something to be physically or mentally felt, or does it work when we are not conscious of it?

Kansas

A.D.T

Answer:

Both. Much of the work of the Holy Spirit is performed silently, without visible display, and unconsciously to the person in whom it works. The Spirit often plants thoughts in the mind and desires in the heart without revealing its presence. In healings of body the sick one is often unaware of the healing until it is done, and so in many other things. Yet at other times its ministrations are accompanied by sensible manifestations of power, perhaps in the giving of a particular message spoken in words within one's soul or from without; by the healing of body when the power of God has been felt passing through the body as a fire, healing as it went; by the minister who is so filled with the Spirit in preaching that he trembles under its power. It is not necessary that we should seek altogether for the outward manifestations of divine power in our lives; it is more important to discover by its effects what the Spirit is doing for us every day and every hour. In that we may have joy and development.

—A Mother's Day service was held with Elder Andrew Beaudin of Providence Bay as guest speaker. Brother Beaudin also assisted Elder Vernon Charlton in the blessing of Donald Charles, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCulloch; Valerie Grace, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alex Brown; and Wellington James and Wesley John, twin sons of Mr. and Mrs. Leland Parkinson. The mothers in the congregation were presented with carnation corsages.

Elder W. A. Bushilla of Sault Ste Marie visited February 4. He assisted Elder V. W. Charlton in the blessing of Harry Garnet, son of Mr. and Mrs. Roy Rozell.

PLEASANTON, KANSAS.—Services are held in a small schoolhouse three miles east of Pleasanton. Church school meets on Sunday as well as the morning preaching service. Speakers come from Butler, Rich Hill, Mapleton, or Fort Scott.

Forty-four attended the service June 10. Elder Ralph Murdock and Teacher Homer McAlister were in charge. Brother McAlister was the speaker. Elder Donald Kyser conducted a baptismal service in the afternoon. A confirmation service was also held. The candidates were Bobby Snow, Eddie Lee Springer, Darlene and Jerry Lee Baucom, and Mrs. Ross Demoth. —Reported by ELMER MCALISTER

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA DISTRICT.—The Melchisedec and Aaronic priesthoods of the Southern California District held a joint retreat May 19 and 20 in the San Bernardino mountains. There were sixty-three members present, representing nearly all the branches and missions in the district.

Saturday's program included classes for both priesthoods, a general discussion of priesthood problems, a short sermon by Elder Herold Wixom, and as the climax of the activities of the day, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The tables were placed in the form of a cross with an empty chair at the head as an invitation to Christ to join in the fellowship of his priesthood. The district officers and pastors were seated around the arms and neck of the cross with the balance of the priesthood taking their places at the stem of the cross. The service was held by candlelight. Patriarch L. J. Oster-tag and District President John Davis spoke to the group under the influence of the Spirit.

Early Sunday morning the men arose and went into the surrounding forest where each one enjoyed a period of private prayer and meditation before all joined together in the seven o'clock devotional service.

The morning sermon was given by Brother Davis. A dedicatory prayer and testimony service concluded the retreat. Bishop Stanley Kelley of Temple City attended the retreat as a guest of the Southern California District. The physical work of the camp was under the able direction of Brother Warren Best of Santa Ana with Sister Ann Jasper and Brother and Sister J. L. Williams serving all meals.—Reported by A. LATTER DAY SAINTS not only believe in "the gathering" to the Center Place, but have the distinct characteristics of "gathering" good material to be used later when they have need of it. Whenever they assemble in special meetings most of them have notebooks and pencils ready to take down the good thoughts of the speaker. Assembling gems for a scrapbook is a good habit. Here are a few choice ones.

Sayings From Church Leaders

The late President F. M. Smith: "Every woman belongs to the women's department whether she is active or not."

Apostle George Lewis: "It is a weak branch where there is no women's department. It is also weak where it takes most of the pastor's time to keep the women in a harmonious attitude."

President Israel A. Smith: "The objectives of the church are well known. They are to make better citizens out of us, and members of the church out of citizens by offering them salvation. . . . We won't have enduring world peace unless the principals of the Sermon on the Mount are put in practice. . . . Women have the greatest stake in peace. . . . World civilization must be helped. . . . How can women help? By promoting the church. They are the trustees of the gospel. . . . Crusading spirit is needed and devotion. . . . One woman spoken of as great in the Bible (II Kings) perceived that there was a man of God who needed a room, so she fixed one up. Each woman makes her own opportunity. We need the spirit of good women to engage in a good cause."

Apostle George Mesley: "Our church has so much more of the revelation of Christ to give and bring to others. It has the traditions that bind, truth that frees. Our work challenges us to maximums, not minimums."

Elder Glaude A. Smith: "Nothing is bigger than the work of God. This must be implanted in the very heart and soul of our youth. They must be fired with enthusiasm."

Interesting Thoughts

"A good taste and tastes take time to acquire."

"A diamond is a piece of coal that stayed on the job."

"The Dead Sea is dead because it gives out nothing. The Sea of Galilee, not far away, lives because that which it receives continually, is constantly given out."

Collaboration

"The development and use of sulfanilamide was one of the most beneficial gifts of science to mankind. It came from collaboration in which national boundary lines were so disregarded as to seem nonexistent. Similarly, great contributions to spiritual progress come not from a single nation. The human race is lifted by the combined results of thinking and experimenting in life by God's people in many lands."

Excerpt From the Book, "You Can Change the World"

by James Keller

"Why were the saints saints? Because they were cheerful when it was difficult to be cheerful, patient when it was difficult to be patient; and because they pushed on when they wanted to stand still, and kept silent when they wanted to talk, and were agreeable when they wanted to be disagreeable. That was all. It is quite simple and always will be."

Distinctive Customs

A question by a young friend of mine, who has been a member of this church but a few years, started my train of thought along these lines. The question was: "Which Joseph is buried in the Mound Grove Cemetery?" It had never occurred to me or at least I had never thought that there would be anyone who didn't know which Joseph was buried in our own cemetery at Mound Grove in Independence. Her question was a very natural one, however. No one had ever thought to tell her that Brother Joseph—the Prophet of the Reorganization, the young man who was designated by his father to be his successor and who came with his mother, Emma, to the Conference at Amboy to lead the church which was to be reorganized—was this Brother Joseph whose remains now repose in the church cemetery in the Center Place.

Many interesting facts are told in our Church History which new members can read, and many are the times that these things are talked over by friends and among friends and in the church papers. Most of us are familiar with these stories and traditions but perhaps we are not letting the children and new members have the benefit of the rich heritage that is ours by passing on to them all of the interesting things which make the gospel story so wonderful to us.

Latter Day Saints have some distinctive customs too, and it is our privilege to pass these on to our family members. It is the custom in my family and in many others to fast the breakfast meal on each Communion day. There may have been a suggestion made officially about this particular custom—I do not know—but it seems to me that it is an act of devotion to fast and pray on the Lord's day for this particular service which means so much to Saints. Unless this is passed on to the members of our family, they will not know that it is the custom. Let us observe that all suggestions for fasting and prayer are made with the thought that those who are not physically able are not required to do so. Even in the Herald before last Conference the church was called to a day of fasting and prayer, but this sentence was included: "We feel it is well to request the Saints throughout the world to pray and join in fasting from the morning and noon meals on Sunday, March 5, or such part of that period as is consistent with duties and health."

Do you know that it is the custom of many Latter Day Saint families to take a flower and place it on the grave of Brother Joseph every Memorial Day? The family, and often the church, place beautiful wreaths and individual offerings on the grave, but how wonderful it is to respect the leaders of the church and honor the men who have worked so well that they have made lasting impressions upon the membership.

Do you know that it is the custom in our church, as well as in others, that when we attend Sunday services we should wear a hat and gloves? Now this is not a mandate, but when we go to the House of the Lord, it is our privilege to dress in a way that shows respect for the One we expect to meet there. Of course, there are lots of informal meetings and gatherings when women often remove their hats and do not carry gloves, but even then, the dress should be more formal than the one usually worn on an errand to the grocery store.

In the minds of Latter Day Saints, Wednesday night is reserved for prayer service. I think it is a very fine custom for us to encourage respect for that night. We may not be able to attend, but we can reserve the night to stay in our homes. There are exceptions to all rules, of course, and Latter Day Saints should use wisdom. If something happens to occur on that night which cannot be taken care of on any other night, it would only be sensible to attend to it, but it is a mark of respect not to plan affairs of a social nature which could be held on other nights.

Sometimes it is necessary for us to restate and relive the things we already know and have forgotten. Surely it is our privilege to indoctrinate our children with our Latter Day Saint ideals and convictions. We teach respect, good manners, and good conduct. Why should we not share our most precious treasures with our children, as well as with new members?

Picked From the Periodicals

By Aarona Booker Kohlman

JUNE MAGAZINES divide their material between timely topics and summer ideas in fashion, food, and home decoration. Following recent trends, there are several good articles dealing with the world situation and how it is affecting our lives and our homes.

All of us have been shocked by the partial exposure by recent investigating committees of the rottenness that exists in high places. In the Reader's Digest, three distinguished and qualified Americans appraise the facts and suggest specific remedial action in three articles, "The Moral Threat to America," "We Need a Code of Official Conduct," and "More Dangerous Than Spies."

For those families facing the departure of a son to war, "If Your Boy Is Drafted," Parents' Magazine, is excellent, non-sentimental advice, yet it is sympathetic, for it was written by a mother who has faced this situation herself.

If you hesitate to let your children take over occasionally in the kitchen, "Junior Chefs," Parents' Magazine, will give you some good ideas on how to encourage this activity.

For some very practical as well as pretty ideas for all types of needlework, from sewing to needlepoint, don't miss the "Needlework How-To-Do Book," Good Housekeeping. Included are directions for making a number of pieces of clothing by "straight-piece sewing," for which no patterns are needed.

If you rather dread automobile trips with small children, you'll find a great deal of help in "When the Children Go Along," Good Housekeeping.

Poison ivy being the troublemaker it is, most readers will be interested in "Good-bye to Poison Ivy," Woman's Home Companion. It contains what seems to be the best news yet about overcoming this summer menace to comfort and health.

"Miracle Drug in Your Own Kitchen," Woman's Home Companion, tells of a new use for a familiar kitchen standby, and knowledge of this may some day mean the difference between life and death for someone near you whom you can help.

"Homemade Cake and Cookie Mix," Woman's Day, is just what is needed for those who like to use mixes but feel they cannot afford the commercial products.

We hope you are already a reader of National Parent-Teacher; if not, do get acquainted, for every month it contains excellent material. This month there are two outstanding articles, "The Color of Her Courage," and "Crosscurrents of Asia." This last one clarifies the issues in Asia which concern us all.

"For Your Child," American Home, pictures two rooms, one for a girl, one for a boy, that are practical and not too expensive. There are many other ideas in this magazine, also, to suit one's tastes and finances.

Lela

THE TWO GIRLS stood on the green hilltop of the campus. It was spring at Graceland, and the year would soon be over. The sophomore was eager to tell the secret—the freshman was unaware that there was a secret. The two chatted about the beauties of the campus, the joys of Graceland, until finally the secret could be kept no longer. Now the girls were Crescent sisters, and after the usual laughter and tears that accompany such outstanding occasions, Lela, the freshman, spoke, “I wanted so much to be a part of Graceland. It wasn’t easy at first, and I didn’t feel as though I fitted in at all. Now I think I’ve found my place.”

Gone were the memories of the unhappy days when Lela, a widow of less than a year, had come to Graceland. Overcoming loneliness was no easy adjustment, but Lela had gone about it in the logical manner. She participated in extra-curricular activities; she accepted dormitory responsibility. Her philosophy was to “get in and pitch.” It was several months before she felt that she was getting in the swing of things, and even then moments would come when she doubted the wisdom of her decision to attend college. Now at the close of her freshman year, she realized that she had found her place.

She Lived in Faith

By Barbara Peavy

The following year at the close of school when the class of '50 graduated, there wasn't a student who was not touched when Lela received her diploma. The chain of events that led to the outstanding experiences of the students who knew Lela and loved her were dramatic and unforgettable. She had returned to Graceland her sophomore year and assumed responsibilities. Only her family and closest friends know when Lela became aware of the disease that had taken hold of her body, but after Christmas the students discovered that Lela was given only a short while to live. These facts are the tragic ones that are seldom mentioned when people speak of Lela. They are not mentioned, because Lela is associated with living—abundant living. Her vibrant personality seemed to sing, “I love life.” Most important of all, Lela knew how to live.

SHE WAS BORN Lela Jean Kendrick in 1925 in Ontario, Canada. She loved sports and activity. As a youngster she played ball with her brothers, rode the horses on the farm, and became known as “her dad’s girl” because of her love for the outdoors and the way she was always with him. A member of the softball team, the basketball team, and the track team, Lela’s high school days were full of memories of teamwork and good sportsmanship. Her love for music led her to study piano, voice, and saxophone. The family quartet always made the ride to church enjoyable. Lela found pleasure in the simple things that made life worth living, and her spontaneous laughter was contagious.

On October 23, 1946, she married Charles Warren Lee of Essex, Ontario. One year later, October 30, 1947, he was killed by lightning. She immediately made up her mind to finish her education, and graduated from Holden high school in the spring of 1948. She enrolled in Graceland the fall of that same year.

High lights of her life at Graceland were her activities with the band, a cappella choir, the basketball team, the fellowships in the dorm, the Crescents, and her social club. Lela was an all-round Graceland. She had a concern for and befriended the lonely student who was having trouble fitting in. She had a set of values that included attendance and participation in church services and fellowship. She possessed enthusiasm that was evidenced when she was an observer as well as a participant in sports activities.

EVERY GRACELAND ALUMNUS spends a certain amount of time in retrospect. It is a wonderful experience to relive the memorable days on the hill, and many people fit into the pattern of the moments of memory. Those of the three classes who came in contact with Lela have graduated now, and still she is finding a place in the hearts of students-yet-to-be. Her unique faith, her deep understanding, her capacity to love everyone made her an outstanding personality long before she was a Graceland.

One student summed up Lela’s personality by simply saying, “She lived in faith.” It is doubtful if any of the students who knew Lela will ever forget her warm smile or her sparkling eyes. It is doubtful, too, if any of the students who were present at the fellowship meeting when Lela was spoken to under the influence of the Spirit will ever forget the comfort that was given her. "Your life has been pleasing in my sight . . . have faith and be not afraid . . . continue to be an example to Graceland students."

No one could believe that God would afflict Lela with cancer. But she felt blessed that God could use her as an instrument despite a handicap. Her influence was felt on the basketball floor as well as in the classroom—in the dormitory as well as in the midweek fellowship service. Students who had never prayed before prayed for Lela. Students who had known very little about faith found in her the example of a life of faith.

No greater tribute could be paid Lela than the influence her life had on others. Friends who knew her and talked to her will always be affected by the spirit that was with her when she spoke. These things were noted when Lela had been at Graceland for only a short while.

SOME OF THE OUTSTANDING MEMORIES I have of Lela include her first Sunday evening on the campus. The freshman women were being welcomed while they unpacked in their rooms. Lela was standing by her dressing table looking at a picture of a young man in a navy uniform. Someone told us before we went in that she was a young widow. We stood in the door of her room, talked for a moment, impressed by her friendliness, and then as we started to leave, said, "We know you'll like Graceland."

Lela smiled and said very confidently, "Yes, I know I will."

I remember a fellowship service on Easter Sunday morning of Lela's freshman year. We had been talking about "the new life," and Lela stood up and spoke of the significance of life at Graceland and how much she appreciated it because she was now aware of the many things she still had to accomplish. This was before she knew about the disease.

I remember the Freshman-Sophomore basketball game and Lela's team winning by one point. As a sophomore I was naturally disappointed, but the teamwork of the freshmen was so outstanding that every sophomore felt only admiration for the winners.

I remember Lela's humility when she accepted her Crescent invitation. She was touched by the honor, and uppermost in her mind was her responsibility to Graceland.

I remember returning to Graceland as an alumna in April for a visit. News of Lela's illness had traveled, and yet when I saw her it was the same smile, the same effervescence, the same Lela. We went into her room and talked that evening quite frankly about what was happening to her. In our conversation she said, "You know, my greatest regret is that there is so much I want to do, and so little time. I've found out that it isn't how long you live, but how much you live."

This was a courageous young woman speaking from her heart. There were months of suffering ahead for Lela, and she knew it. Despite any pain that she might have known, she had faith in life—on earth and eternally. She understood the meaning of purposeful living. She attached importance to life, and because it was important to her, she lived each moment to its fullest measure.

THIS WAS LELA—who lived so much. Everything about her was vibrant and alive. The infectious smile, the sparkling eyes, the voice that held a song—these were as much a part of her as her Scandinavian coloring and her rosy cheeks. On September 1, 1950, she died. The lives that she has touched and will continue to touch are a tribute to her memory. The beauty of her life lies in its influence that will always be felt, for Lela knew the secret of life itself—she lived in faith.

Let Us Share the Joy

By RUBY STRAND

THE SCRIPTURES tell us that one day there drew near unto Jesus many publicans and sinners. The Pharisees and scribes murmured, "This man receives sinners and even eats with them." Jesus knew their attitude was ungodly and sought to teach them an important truth by relating three parables with a central theme. The first was the story of the lost sheep, the second the one about the lost coin, and the third had to do with the lost soul. In each case something which had been lost had been restored. He tried to share with them some of the joy that is felt in heaven when a repentant person returns to his Father's arms. He even mentioned that there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner who repents.

We who repent are the lost who have been found. The Pharisees and the scribes are those of our day who have no mercy for the sinning ones even when they do repent. In the story of the prodigal son they are represented by the elder brother. The father, of course, is the ever compassionate, forgiving, and loving Heavenly Parent. Jesus tried to help these self-righteous Pharisees and scribes to see themselves, but their formal religion was the ugliest thing about them. They were blinded by their own sin. He was endeavoring to point out to them that they should have felt joy when the publicans and sinners were wanting to return to God; but instead, just as the elder brother, they were sitting in judgment. Even today when this issue is discussed, it is surprising to find that many do not catch the purpose of the story. The elder son should have been sharing in this happy occasion. If he had really loved his younger brother and had prayed for his return, would he have childishly remained outside pouting? We all fall short of the high standard set by Christ, but when the Spirit of God takes hold of our lives and we are transformed by this cleansing power, wonderful things can take place. How happy we should be when we see others becoming a part of this family circle. We sense some of that same joy felt in heaven as we open our arms to them in welcome. Let us be slow to criticize and try to be understanding and charitable, ever hating sin but never the sinner. Let us not emulate the stiff-necked Pharisees and scribes but rather pattern our lives after the Master Teacher.

the kind of experience necessary in practical Zionite enterprise. This information is not complete, but it is full enough to indicate some very interesting areas of specialization. In it I note eighty-six students in the field of education, fifty-eight in the social sciences, fifty-one in engineering, forty-three in business, thirty-four in the liberal arts, thirty-three in fine arts, twenty-eight in agriculture, twenty-seven in medicine and health, with a good representation in the physical sciences, home economics, the biological sciences, law, journalism, and the industrial arts.

NOT ALL OF US can attend college. Not all the good learning is done in college anyway. There is a wisdom of the hand as well as of the head. But it is encouraging to know that such fine progress is being made by those who have college privileges. Their success is but part of the commendable work being done wherever men and women of faith and devotion seek earnestly to serve God with heart and might and mind and strength, and so to stand blameless now and in the days to come.

* RECOVERY

"In January of 1892 my dear grandfather departed this life. . . . Grandmother, who for more than sixty-two years had been his inseparable companion, could hardly make up her mind to be left behind. She took to her bed quite determinedly, but finally had to give up and recover."—Christiana Salyards in her Autobiography.

* DUCKS

The domestic duck is the unintentional comic of the bird world. His cousins, the wild ducks, are creatures of grace and beauty, but he was meant for a clown. No matter what he does, he looks funny. His figure is like a meal sack—heavy at the wrong end. When he tries to walk, he waddles. When he tries to sing, he quacks. His beady-bright eyes see everything, comprehend nothing. You can always depend on a duck to get the wrong idea.

Why consider the duck now? Because, as we grow older, so many of us look more and more like him. We stuff ourselves with food and grow fat until we acquire his grain-bag figure. We lose the graceful walk of youth and develop a comic waddle. And as shortness of breath takes away the clear tones of our voices, we squawk. The next time you see people on the street, count the ducks among them. The next time you pass a big mirror, ask yourself, "Do I look like a duck?"

* THE CANNIBAL

It was evening, and I was waiting for a bus at a malodorous transfer point in the stockyards district. Across the street was a large packing house where I could hear, but not see, hundreds of cattle bawling dismally, probably for the last time. Did they know that tomorrow they must give up their sleek bodies for men to eat their flesh? Perhaps the smell of death had reached their nostrils—some premonition of doom had entered their minds. I felt guilty, as one of the cannibal race that would buy them pound by pound. Then an enormous trailer truck raced by, its double decks loaded with pigs, all squealing in protest. Did they, too, sense something of their fate?

That night I had a dream, of no significance or consequence, except a guilty conscience. . . . I dreamed of the judgment day, and I stood before one of the lesser tribunals. I was charged with murder, and the witnesses were there to testify against me—all the cattle, sheep, pigs, ducks, chickens, and fish I had eaten in my life. I had no defense, and I could not escape. Some words I did not hear were spoken, and a white light shone down on me with unbearable intensity. I could feel myself begin to simmer at the edges. The outer portions of me went up in vapor, and finally I just disappeared in a small puff of steam. There wasn't anything left of me at all!

Ordinarily it isn't too hard to dismiss a dream. But this one hangs around. I'll be regretting it today, for I would like a hamburger for lunch. But I am afraid that I will see, out of the corner of my eye, one of those spectral cows staring at me! . . . Oh, waiter! A stalk of celery, a radish, and a bowl of lentil soup, please!

MEMORIAL SERVICE

President F. Henry Edwards went to Nauvoo on the week end of June 23-24 for the commemorative services at the graves of the Martyrs.

PRIESTHOOD CONFERENCE

Two hundred one priesthood members from twenty-two states and Ontario enrolled for the Priesthood Conference conducted at Graceland College June 10 to 17. The staff consisted of members of the First Presidency; Dr. F. M. McDowell, executive director; general church officers, appointees, and several Graceland faculty members. All ranks of priesthood and nearly all vocations were represented. Of the conference Dr. McDowell says, "It was a cross section of the standing ministry. Eagerness of the priesthood for practical helps was marked, and the high quality of fellowship outstanding. Demands for the experiment to be repeated were heard on every hand. Plans are underway to share the profits of this project by putting some of the ideas in text form and in 'Guideline' articles."

THE JOHNSONS RETURN

Seventy and Mrs. Glen Johnson and their daughter, Glenda Fern, have returned to the United States after nearly four years in Europe. Leaving Rotterdam May 29 on the "New Amsterdam," they arrived in New York on June 6 and in Independence on June 9, where Elder Johnson will serve in Center Stake.

Sylvia Woods of Manchester, England, arrived a few days later and will attend Graceland this fall. Miss Woods, her parents, and her sister were baptized recently by Elder Johnson.

NEW BRANCH AT JONESBORO

The organization of the Jonesboro, Arkansas, Branch took place May 13. Special services were held including the organization meeting on Sunday afternoon under the direction of Apostle P. E. Farrow. Saints from various points of the Arkansas-Louisiana District were in attendance. The place of meeting in Jonesboro is the Ben Hur Hall, 410 West Monroe Street. Elder Giles H. Turner was elected pastor with Clarence Marmack of Caraway as counselor.

CAMPUS SERIES

Approximately three thousand persons attended the first service of the summer campus series in Independence on Sunday evening, June 17. Elder Fred O. Davies, pastor of Walnut Park Church, was the speaker, and the Stone Church Choir provided special music. Preceding the main service Mrs. Ruth Draper and Mrs. Annabelle Prell played several violin selections.

YOUTH CAMP AT GARDNER LAKE

Carl Mesle, Center Stake youth leader, and C. V. Graham, stake president, represented the General Church at the youth camp held at Gardner Lake June 17 to 24. Thirty-nine girls and forty-two boys attended the camp. Forty-eight were from Independence and the rest from adjoining stakes. Barbara Peavy of the "Herald" staff served as editor of the camp log.

We'd like you to know

Goldie Graham Zion

IF YOU NEED TO CALL the Department of Statistics some day to be sure of your wife's birthday, the first voice you hear will likely be Goldie Zion's saying, "Auditorium." When someone calls to find out "Why the church doesn't do something about . . . ?" the voice, still clear, sweet, well modulated, and distinct, will give some assurance that "the church" will try to do something without taking up the time of the President or Presiding Bishop needlessly, nor yet obligating the General Conference to a course of action.

Goldie Graham grew up in Kansas City, attending the Second Branch; and after it was razed to accommodate a street building project, she went to Fourth Branch. She was the oldest girl in a family of five, and because of her mother's illness did not finish the last two years of high school. Instead she finished a two-year course at business college. In 1930 she was married to Glen H. Helverson. They have three children: Juanita, 19, a Graceland student; Glen, 17, and Donald E., 15.

In 1939 she moved to Independence and has since worked with the Liberty Street congregation. She has written children's plays and poems for special occasions and for publication. In 1941 she married Elder Ralph Zion. Their son, Robert Ralph, is now seven. His father died in 1944. Sister Zion did clerical work for a year and a half before starting her work as telephone operator in October, 1949. She says, "I am especially happy in my present work as it serves a twofold purpose: to serve my fellow men, and to provide for my family."

An Open Door to International Education

The United States Exchanges Students With the World

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT has recently issued a pamphlet entitled International Exchange Opportunities that should be of interest to everyone connected in any way with higher education. This document is Department of State Publication 4198 and is available at a cost of ten cents. It describes "Opportunities for United States Citizens" to study in other countries and "Opportunities for Foreign Nationals" to study here. It should be helpful to any who wish to consider service abroad as a career, as well as to those who would like to enrich their background for teaching in this country.

From the pamphlet we quote the following:

From a modest beginning in the Western Hemisphere in 1938, U. S. Government educational-exchange activities have expanded until they are now on a world-wide basis. This year nearly 10,000 persons are being exchanged with more than 60 foreign countries for study, teaching, lecturing, research, and other educational activities under the various grant-in-aid programs conducted by the Department of State. In addition, some 3,000 stranded Chinese students in the United States are being assisted, and several hundred other foreign nationals are being enabled to attend American schools in their home countries.

FOR MANY YEARS groups of foreign students at our colleges and universities have been a familiar experience to American students. Many have become friends; good will and understanding have been promoted between nations. It is significant that young men and women who were students at our universities a short while ago are now serving in high and responsible positions among their own people.

The graduates of British and European universities have often found positions and careers as teachers at our universities.

Thus the university and college communities of the United States have been the most truly international part of our society. Since the early part of the nineteenth century, young Americans have studied music, art, and all branches of learning in England, France, and Germany.

As a result of these many contacts, leadership has been developed for ourselves and for other nations, and international friendship and good will have been promoted.

WE ARE NOT actually doing anything new. The only new part of the contribution is giving government support to the project. Young people for centuries have traveled to other countries to study: music, art, science, medicine, philosophy, and a host of other subjects. Student exchange goes back to the very beginning of university life.

The University of Paris was probably the first of the great modern universities, and it attracted foreign students from its early years until the present time. Legend says that it was founded in the year A. D. 780 when Charlemagne called the scholar Alcuin to establish a center of learning at Notre Dame on an island in the River Seine in Paris. The authentic annals of that university began with Pierre Abelard in 1107. In the following centuries the university expanded from the island to the left bank of the Seine, and large communities of German and English students gathered there as rivals to the French. Students came from every part of the civilized world.

In the year 1164, when Henry II of England became engaged in a dispute, he informed the English students at Paris that they must return home if they wished to continue collecting their annuities. From that time there was a gathering of students and an increase of learning at Oxford that resulted in the growth of that great university. From then until the British Empire spread around the world, students of many nations studied at Oxford. Young people from the colonies studied at British universities and later returned home to lead their people.

In 1636, not many years after the first of the Pilgrims had landed in America, Harvard College was established, and later grew into a great university.

IN OUR PRESENT troubled world conditions, it is America's turn to invite the students of the world to come here and learn. Fortunately we have the resources to take care of them and help finance them without prejudice to our own people. Fortunately, too, we have the means to send our own young people abroad for similar studies. This is one of the most effective means of breaking down our isolationism, of overcoming our ignorance and misunderstanding of other people, of helping them to have a better understanding of us.

In celebrating our own freedom this July 4, one of our best contributions to the freedom of the world is to open the avenues of truth to the young people of other lands. And for the preservation of our own liberty in the world, we will do well to send our young people to learn from others.

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

The following letter was received by the Presidency from Elder F. Carl Mesle, Director of Young People's Work:

This year the Stake League has a new project which I thought would be of interest to you.

As one of the service projects this year, the Stake Leaguers are donating blood to those in need at the Sanitarium. Each Leaguer has been given the opportunity to become a donor as the local Leagues presented programs concerning the project and donor cards were available to all.

We feel that it has been a very worthy project. We have received many favorable comments from those receiving, those giving, and those hearing of it. One nonmember lady from western Kansas was injured during a visit with relatives near by. When she heard how she obtained her three needed pints of blood, she wanted very much to do something in return. The League did not want anything in return for the blood, but the lady wanted so much to express her appreciation in a gift that the League agreed to accept it, thinking it would be a small amount. A few days later the League received a check for $62.50. Because of the good will of this lady, the cabinet voted to send her a Book of Mormon. When the lady heard of this, she was indeed happy and said she would prize it very highly always, that she had come to be interested in the church during her visit at the Sanitarium, and that this is due to the fact that the members of our church appear to live their religion.

With such experiences as this, we feel that this is one project which should be continued.

From W. J. Breshears, president of the Gulf States District:

The series at Birmingham was more successful as we baptized seven persons. Elder Marvin L. Salter, who serves as a representative of the District Presidency in that area, and Elder J. Henry Porter, pastor of the Birmingham Mission, have been conducting cottage meetings on a year-around basis which contributed to the success of our series there. They are both consecrated, give of their time without reserve, and have a missionary vision. In addition to his work in Birmingham Brother Salter oversees the work at

The Popol Vuh

Sacred Book of the Ancient Quiche Mayas

By Paul M. Hanson

THE Popol Vuh is "the Sacred Book of the Quiché Indians, a branch of the ancient Maya race, and contains an account of the cosmogony, mythology, traditions, and history of this native American people, who were the most powerful nation of the Guatemala highlands in pre-Conquest times. It is written in an exalted and elegant style, and is an epic of the most distinguished literary quality." It is "beyond any shadow of doubt, the most distinguished example of native American literature that has survived the passing centuries."¹

Hubert H. Bancroft says of this work:

Of all American peoples, the Quiché of Guatemala have left us the richest mythological legacy. Their description of the Creation as given in the Popol Vuh, which may be called the national book of the Quichés, is, in its rude strange eloquence and poetic originality, one of the rarest relics of aboriginal thought.²

A European traveler, Carl Scherzer, in 1854 or 1855 found the manuscript of the Popol Vuh in the library of the University of San Carlos in the city of Guatemala. It was copied at the end of the seventeenth century in the Quiché language by "Father Francisco Ximénez, the parish priest of the village of Santo Tomás Chichicastenango in the highlands of Guatemala, directly from the original sixteenth-century manuscript, which he had borrowed for the purpose from one of his Indian parishioners."³

The Indians guarded their writings with great secrecy, which accounts for a lack of information about their ancient history. Father Ximénez was an accomplished linguist able to communicate with the Indians directly in their own language, was wise, and took a lively interest in their welfare. He appears to have won the confidence of the Indians, and finally the book they jealously guarded came into his hands.

It is not known how the Popol Vuh, which was transcribed by Ximénez, was composed. Brasseur de Bourbourg expresses this opinion:

The Popol Vuh appears to have been written, in part, from memory, following ancient originals, and in part, copied from the sacred books of the Quichés, to which the name of Popol Vuh, or Book of the Princes was given. . . . This manuscript, the most valuable about the origins of Central America, is written in a Quiché of great elegance, and the author must have been one of the princes of the royal family, who composed it a few years after the arrival of the Spaniards, when all of their ancient books were disappearing.⁴

The Quiché chronicler knew that in olden times there was a book which contained the traditions and accounts of his people, and, knowing them perfectly, he had the happy inspiration of recording them.

Genet and Chelbatz believe that it is a translation of a manuscript written in hieroglyphs, and declare that no other Maya-Quiché document can be compared with it. Bancroft also believed that the Popol Vuh was the translation of a literal copy of a truly original book written by one or more Indians of that race in the Quiché language, using Latin letters, after the occupation of Guatemala by the Christians; and that this copy had been made to replace the original book after the latter's loss or destruction.⁵

The fate of the book generally known as the Popol Vuh; the Sacred

Book, or National Book of the Quiché, from which Ximénez made his copy, is unknown. The purpose of its author appears to have been to supply a lack of the ancient lost book.

The copy of the Popol Vuh in Quiché in the handwriting of Ximénez accompanied by his translation of it in Spanish is now in the Newberry Library in Chicago.

There have been several Spanish, French, and German translations of the Popol Vuh, and now for the first time a complete English translation of this work is available, published in 1950 by the University of Oklahoma Press, Norman, Oklahoma.

The preparation of this English version was undertaken by Delia Goetz, author and translator, and the late Sylvanus G. Morley, an authority on things pertaining to the Mayas, from the Spanish translation by Adrián Recinos from the original Ximénez manuscript in Quiché, published in Mexico in 1947. Adrián Recinos, of Guatemala City, is a distinguished linguist, archaeologist, and ethnologist, and for sixteen years (1928-44) served as minister and ambassador to the United States from his native Guatemala.

In the opening and third paragraphs of the Popol Vuh we learn of the book's nature and contents:

This is the beginning of the old traditions of this place called Quiché. Here we shall write and we shall begin the old stories, the beginning and the origin of all that was done in the town of the Quiché, by the tribes of the Quiche nation.

We shall bring it to light because now the Popol Vuh, as it is called, cannot be seen any more, in which was clearly seen the coming from the other side of the sea and the narration of our obscurity, and our life was clearly seen. The original book, written long ago, existed, but its sight is hidden to the searcher and to the thinker.⁶

The book was one of prophecies, for the rulers "knew if there would be war, and everything was clear before their eyes; they saw if there would be death and hunger, if there would be strife. They well knew that there was a place where it could be seen, that there was a book which they called the Popol Vuh."⁷

In next to the last paragraph of the Popol Vuh, the author explains that what he wrote was "because no longer can be seen [the book of the Popol Vuh] which the kings had in olden times, for it has disappeared."⁸ Referring to this is a footnote on the same page which reads: "The author ends his work by explaining again that he had to write it because the ancient book no longer exists in which the kings read the past and the future of their people."

There are many evidences of a relationship between the Toltecs of Mexico and the Quichés of Guatemala. The Popol Vuh speaks of the Toltecs, some of whom migrated from Tula, Mexico, to the south to Guatemala. Tula was the capital of the Toltec empire, the ending of which is generally placed in the eleventh century.

It appears possible that the book referred to in the Popol Vuh which was had "in olden times" and had disappeared was the sacred book of the Toltecs, described by Bancroft as follows:

In its pages were inscribed the Nahua annals from the time of the deluge, or even from the creation; together with all their religious rites, governmental system, laws and social customs; their knowledge respecting agriculture and all the arts and sciences, particular attention being given to astrology; and a complete explanation of their modes of reckoning time and interpreting the hieroglyphics. To the divine book was added a chapter of prophecies respecting future events and the signs by which it should be known when the time of their fulfillment was drawing near.⁹

According to Ixtlilxochitl [the native Mexican historian, whose information was derived from documents which survived the destruction by the Spanish priests] Huematzin, the king of Tezcuco [in Mexico], had gathered together all the chronicles of the Tolteca in the Teoamoxtli, or Divine Book, which contained the legends of the creation of the world, the emigration from Asia of those peoples, the stops on the journey, the dynasty of their kings, their social and religious institutions, their sciences, arts, and so on.¹⁰

A remarkable feature of the Popol Vuh is the similarity of some of its parts with the Bible. This has been commented upon by various scholars. A few examples follow.

Creation

The Popol Vuh account of creation is similar to the record in the Old Testament:

This is the account of how all was in suspense, all calm, in silence, all motionless, still, and the expanse of the sky was empty.

There was nothing brought together, nothing which could make a noise, nor anything which might move, or tremble, or could make noise in the sky.

There was nothing standing; only the calm water, the placid sea, alone and tranquil. Nothing existed.

There was only immobility and silence in the darkness, in the night. Only the Creator, the Maker, Tepeu, Gucumat, the Forefathers, were in the water surrounded with light. They were hidden under green and blue feathers, and were therefore called Gucumat. By nature they were great sages and great thinkers. In this manner the sky existed and also the Heart of Heaven, which is the name of God and thus he is called.

Then came the word. Tepeu and Gucumat came together in the darkness in the night, and Tepeu and Gucumat talked together. They talked then, discussing and deliberating; they agreed, they united their words and their thoughts.

Then while they meditated, it became clear to them that when dawn would break, man must appear. Then they planned the creation, and the growth of the trees and the thickets and the birth of life and the creation of man. Thus it was arranged in the darkness and in the night by the Heart of Heaven who is called Huracán.

Then Tepeu and Gucumat came together; then they conferred about life and light, what they would do so that there would be light and dawn, who it would be who would provide food and sustenance.

"Thus let it be done! Let the emptiness be filled! Let the water recede and make a void, let the earth appear and become solid; let it be done." Thus they spoke. "Let there be light, let there be dawn in the sky and on the earth! There shall be neither glory nor grandeur in our creation and formation until the human being is made, man is formed." So they spoke.

Then the earth was created by them. So it was, in truth, that they created the earth. "Earth!" they said, and instantly it was made.

Like the mist, like a cloud, and like a cloud of dust was the creation, when the mountains appeared from the water; and instantly the mountains grew.

Only by a miracle, only by magic art were the mountains and valleys formed; and instantly the groves of cypresses and pines put forth shoots together on the surface of the earth.

And thus Gucumat was filled with joy, and exclaimed: "Your coming has been fruitful, Heart of Heaven; and you, Huracán, and you, Chipi—Caculhá, Raxa—Caculhá."

"Our work, our creation shall be finished," they answered.

So it was that they made perfect the work, when they did it after thinking and meditating upon it.¹¹

It is interesting to note Gucumat listed here as having to do with the creation. In a footnote on page 78 of the Popol Vuh, this appears:

Gucumat, a serpent covered with green feathers, from the Quiché word guc (kuk in Maya), "green feathers," particularly those of the quetzal, and cumat, serpent; it is the Quiché version of Kukulcan, the Maya name for Quetzalcoatl.

Gucumat is thus identified with Quetzalcoatl, the most beloved of the gods of Mexico, who was identified with the Supreme Deity and the Creator of the world. He is described as a bearded white personage who visited his people in America. Numerous temples were erected to his worship in Mexico, including a large and sumptuous one in the city of Tula.

Remarkable, indeed, is the concordance of certain features of the Popol Vuh with the Bible.

Lucifer

The following description is of a personage in whom Ximénez believed he saw "a kind of Lucifer":

It was cloudy and twilight then on the face of the earth. There was no sun yet. Nevertheless, there was a being called Vucub-Caquix who was very proud of himself.

And he [Vucub-Caquix] said:

"I shall now be great above all the beings created and formed. I am the sun, the light, the moon," he exclaimed. "Great is my splendor. Because of me men shall walk and conquer. For my eyes are of silver, bright, resplendent as precious stones, as emeralds; my teeth shine like perfect stones, like the face of the sky. My nose shines afar like the moon, my throne is of silver, and the face of the earth is lighted when I pass before my throne.

"So, then, I am the sun, I am the moon, for all mankind. So shall it be, because I can see very far."¹²

A Great Flood

The following record in the Popol Vuh of a flood is surprisingly similar to the account of the biblical flood:

A flood was brought about by the Heart of Heaven; a great flood was formed which fell on the heads of the wooden creatures.

But those that they had made, that they had created, did not think, did not speak with their Creator, their Maker. And for this reason they were killed, they were deluged. A heavy resin fell from the sky.

This was to punish them because they had not thought of their mother, nor their father, the Heart of Heaven, called Huracán. And for this reason the face of the earth was darkened and a black rain began to fall, by day and by night.

The desperate ones ran as quickly as they could; they wanted to climb to the tops of the houses, and the houses fell down and threw them to the ground; they wanted to climb to the treetops, and the trees cast them far away; they wanted to enter the caverns, and the caverns repelled them.¹³

Because of the close resemblance of certain features of the Popol Vuh with the Old Testament, certain writers have theorized that such might be the result of biblical influence, a sort of transcriptions from the book of Genesis, after the coming of the Spaniards.

In a convincing argument in favor of the genuineness of the Popol Vuh, Lewis Spence declares:

The very fact that it was composed in the Quiché tongue is almost sufficient proof of its genuine character. The scholarship of the nineteenth century was unequal to the adequate translation of the Popol Vuh; the twentieth century has as yet (1908) shown no signs of being able to accomplish the task. It is therefore not difficult to credit that if modern scholarship is unable to properly translate the work, that of the eighteenth century was unable to create it.¹⁴

What is the explanation of such incidents and events in the Popol Vuh paralleling those in the Bible? The similarities can readily be recognized.

An explanation is to be found in the Book of Mormon, containing a record of God's dealings with three colonies divinely led from Asia to America—the first from the Tower of Babel at the time of the confusion of tongues, and the others from Palestine about 600 B.C. One of the colonies from Palestine brought with them to America the Scriptures possessed by the Jews. Therefore, in ancient America there was possessed a record of Creation, the Deluge, the fall of man, and prophecies relating to the coming of Christ into the world.

The Book of Mormon makes known that the colonies developed into great nations, worshiped God, looked upon Christ as the source of their civilization, experienced his personal appearance and ministrations in America soon after he rose from the dead, and finally after exiling God from their lives were destroyed in war. A record of the rise and fall of these nations, engraved by the ancient prophets and historians on metallic plates, was deposited in the earth, and after being obtained through divine revelation by Joseph Smith, the young prophet of the nineteenth century, was translated by him by the gift and power of God. The evidences are multitudinous in support of the book's divine authenticity.

Missionary Vigor

LITERATURE has an importance in evangelism which is second only to personal contacts. Indeed, the distribution of literature is really an extension of personal contacts. The early Reorganization issued sermon tracts which made up in vigor what they lacked in polish. These were a means of missionary education among our own people and of missionary contact with non-members. Such literature is effective in direct proportion as the Saints are missionary minded. It is impossible to place too high a value on vigorously written tracts and books (particularly stories such as The Call at Evening) in the hands of an alert group of Saints who correlate the distribution of literature with the maintenance of an interesting and spiritually stimulating branch program. The promise of the visual materials already widely used among alert missionaries is beyond any tools previously available.

So tiny it can be confined to one small word

Yet in the mind of man it knows no limits.

Consecration of Sherman Oaks California Church

By Leonore Minghini

THE TRAGIC DEATH of a toddling child from burns as a result of overturning a bottle of acid in the year 1947 started a chain of events that lead to the consecration of a new church at Sherman Oaks, California, on December 10, 1950.

Contacts with the family of the child by Elder Garland E. Tickemyer, then pastor of the Central Los Angeles congregation, led to a series of cottage meetings and to the baptism of the mother, Betty Slaght. Noting the hundreds of new homes that were being erected in the San Fernando Valley, Brother Tickemyer decided, as he drove some twenty-five miles to and from this cottage series, that a church should be established in the valley. He consulted the forecasts of the City Planning Commission and learned that this valley was expected to absorb a population growth of a million people in the next ten years.

In June, 1948, Central Church sponsored a series of Sunday evening services with Elder Martin Ahlstrom in charge. Services were continued until December, 1948, in the ceramics plant owned by the Gerald Resch family. Guest speakers were relied upon for most of the preaching; these included John W. Rushton, Glen L. Davis, Albert Knowlton, Vernon Webb, and others.

In January, 1949, Elder Glen Davis moved to Reseda. The San Fernando Valley was now a part of the newly formed Metropolitan Los Angeles District. Elder Tickemyer, president, called a meeting of the members in the valley and formed a mission of the church under the leadership of Brother Davis. A club room on Sepulveda Boulevard was leased for $40.00 per month, and the mission was off to a good start with opening services held February 6, 1949. Attendance then ranged from fifty to seventy-five.

THE LODGE BUILDING was not too satisfactory for church meetings, and in June, 1949, enthusiasm reached a high pitch when Joseph N. Chase, a nonmember, offered his eighteen-room home to the Saints if they would move it to make way for a housing project.

This remodeled dwelling, now the church home of the Sherman Oaks Mission, does not satisfy the highest standards of what a church ought to be, but it does symbolize the spirit of people who are not unaccustomed to making the best of the means at hand. A people traditioned in recognition of the dignity of labor have once again demonstrated that the descendants of men and women who could carve cities out of the wilderness can in this day build a place of worship even when the obstacles seem insurmountable.

I know of no local situation in which the spirit of a people has been more sorely tested than in the preparation of this building, nor any undertaking in which more has been accomplished by so few.

Inability to foresee the magnitude of the task and costs that have tripled original estimates have been more than offset by the capacity of the people of this congregation for sustained effort over an extended period of nearly eighteen months.

The Saints of Sherman Oaks Mission have not only built a house of worship, they have built a congregation, tried and proven in the crucible of a difficult undertaking in which they steadfastly resisted the divisive influences of frustration and discouragement.

The ground has been prepared; the seed is being sown. May God grant an abundant harvest to this worthy people to the glory of his name and to their eternal reward.

—Excerpts from address of Stake President Garland E. Tickemyer at the service of consecration of the Sherman Oaks Mission.

After considerable financial difficulty, the group arranged for the building to be set on a lot at 4516 Woodman Avenue in Sherman Oaks. The real work had just begun, and the members were without any resources for remodeling. In addition to this problem they had been given a fairly short time limit in which to complete it.

A nonmember, Floyd Minghini, was converted to the church one week, took the next week off from his work, borrowed his company's bulldozer, skip loader, and other equipment and began the task; other men took turns working days and evenings digging the basement. The women supplied them with food. Brother Jack Davis, a building contractor, was general supervisor of construction; he was ably assisted by Brother Martin Ahlstrom. Workers came from other congregations too.

City requirements were much more demanding than had been expected; doors had to be changed because they were a few inches too narrow; good walls had to be torn out and replaced with fireproof materials; costs multiplied from an anticipated few thousand to almost fifteen thousand for the completed building. The women sponsored one fund-raising project after another. Sister Goldie Slaght appeared on television and asked for the donation of a popcorn machine to be used at local fairs. Weeks dragged into months with the men working three and four nights a week and all day Saturday. There were times of discouragement but the group persisted, and in those difficult times men and women came to know each other better. They built not only a church but a congregation which, having sailed successfully through the hurricane, is not likely ever to be seriously disturbed by any minor flurry.

ON DECEMBER 10, 1950, the long awaited day of consecration arrived. Presiding Evangelist Elbert A. Smith spoke to a full church in the morning. The formal consecration service began at 3:00 p.m. The former pastor, Glen L. Davis, who had been succeeded by Elder Douglas Clark, was present and spoke words of greeting.

Mrs. Michael Giccotti welcomed the new congregation to the neighborhood on behalf of the Parent Teacher's Association. John Sloan, editor of the Sherman Oaks Sun spoke words of encouragement and praise. The Reverend Charles W. Hesselback, pastor of the neighboring Lutheran church, welcomed the Saints and wished them Godspeed in their new home. James G. Moran, secretary-manager of the Van Nuys Chambers for their splendid achievement.

Stake Bishop J. Stanley Kelley complimented the group for its accomplishments. Fern Winegar and Ruth Westberg sang a duet and fourteen-year-old Patricia Ann Guy played the piano. The donor of the building, Mr. Chase, gave a very touching talk on memories of his old home. Pastor Douglas Clark was the presiding officer and introduced the principal speaker, Stake President Garland Tickemyer, who delivered the dedicatory address. The service lasted until nearly six o'clock. Those in attendance had been in continuous session for almost three hours but had scarcely been aware of the passing of the time.

Over three hundred people attended this meeting, and the building was filled to overflowing. At the close they were invited to inspect the three floors and appeared to be pleased with the new church.

On March 4, 1951, the mission was formally organized into the Sherman Oaks Branch with Thomas R. Beil, J. Stanley Kelley, and G. E. Tickemyer giving short talks.

Membership has now reached a total of 147, and twelve baptisms for the first four months of the year have been reported. This represents an 8 per cent increase from baptisms alone.

In addition to creating a beautiful place to worship, the Sherman Oaks Saints have achieved a wonderful spirit of unity and, most important, are blessed with the Spirit of God.

Democracy

Civilization can flourish only if man is free. The artist can produce what is of value to the world only if he can develop his personality to the utmost; and he can do that only if he is allowed to think and say what he likes within the broad limits of a democracy. The cardinal principle of democracy is that the nation should be governed not for the benefit of the state but for the benefit of the individuals that compose it.

About houses and homes, trees, flowers and people

THE MASTER'S WORDS, "In my Father's house are many mansions," have occasioned me some thought. I fear I might stand in awe of a mansion. However his further statement, "I go to prepare a place for you," is amply reassuring. We may trust him to prepare a place suited to our needs and our ability to enjoy.

Not long ago I was intrigued by a picture of one of those modern miracle houses that has everything—or at least promises everything that is up to the minute. Even the "house of tomorrow" is advertised. This particular house, as pictured, stood on a hillside among trees and rocks, facing an expanse of water. It was designed to fit the landscape, conforming to the slope of the hill, fitting among the rocks and trees. It was one of those low rambling ranch type houses. It rambled in every direction at, I should guess, eight or ten thousand dollars per ramble.

It looked like a magnificent place in which to live, or at least stay temporarily, after one had learned his way about without the aid of a map. It might be an ideal abode for a man and wife who do not care to meet each other often. But obviously it is not for the proletariat. One would need the income of a big league baseball player or a movie star, or perhaps one of our moderately successful gamblers, to purchase and maintain such an establishment and estate. Such dream houses are for a relatively small percentage of the people.

After describing this house and its setting, the writer then turned his satire on the rest of us who he thinks live in stuffy houses of conservative lines built on small city lots having four square corners. Still there is something to say for the small house on a city lot. The family therein may be happier than some families living on estates in old style mansions or in more modernistic miracle houses. So much depends on the family. Architects, landscape gardeners, interior decorators, can do little in redesigning lives to fit houses.

THE CLOSELY KNIT FAMILY in a modest house can do a great deal to transform the house into a home. With some study and much work with their own hands, they may create simplicity and beauty in the interior decorations and furnishings—and be drawn closer together by the project.

Outside the small house the small lot may come to nurture flowers and trees of beauty that in time are intimately known and loved. Each year I look forward to the blooming of the lilacs in my back yard. They are not Persian or French—just old-fashioned, fragrant lilacs such as grew in the yard of the old Mansion House in Nauvoo a hundred years ago and delighted Joseph and Alexander and David and their wives (one wife to each, mark you) and their children. This lilac of mine now has bloomed for me more than thirty springtimes and stands as tall as the eaves of the house.

First of all, however, I welcome the little crocuses that spring up under the very heels of departing winter—and sometimes are snowed under for their impertinence. Then come the tulips, my pet project. They stand straight and tall and in a flaming variety of colors. And then the bed of iris. This was my wife's pet project. She knew each lovely pastel colored flower by its first name. By and by the peach trees bloom, and the pear tree—not to mention the Hopa tree.

BUT I HAVE PASSED BY my favorite, the redbud in my front yard. The redbud seems typically Missourian. My tree we transplanted from the forest, Lynn and I, when it was very small. Now it is more tree than shrub. The redbud may stand naked and unashamed one day and the next day, or so it seems, it is arrayed in a dress fit for a queen, if a queen be found fit for such a dress.

Before ever a leaf is on the tree, suddenly all up and down every limb, the red buds break forth through the bare bark until the whole tree is a great bouquet of exquisite peach blossom tints. When the blossoms are gone the leaves appear. When full grown each leaf is heart shaped—a tree of valentines addressed to the owner of a humble abode on a small lot and to every passer-by.

By the way, two years ago in southern California, in the park in San Bernardino, I was amazed to find a redbud tree as tall and wide-spread as a big apple tree, and all aflame with flowers. It was like a bit of old Missouri. Sister Minnie Aldridge solved the riddle for me when she told me that some man brought the tree from Missouri thirty years ago. Of course all things become extraordinary in California. I would dearly love to see what Texas could do for a redbud tree.

THIS SERMON on houses, trees, flowers, and people must have a conclusion and a moral. A wealthy family might live in a stately mansion on a vast estate or in a modernistic miracle domicile on the mountainside and yet be most unhappy—all house, no home. It need not be that way, but often it is, just that way.

Of course it is true that a tenement in a slum district may be so sordid that little can be expected from it as a home. Or a mansion may be magnificent and do even worse by its tenants. The wise man prayed, "Give me neither riches nor poverty." Where there is love and loyalty in a family, and thrift and industry, and the good spirit, beauty and joy may be found. Even that which may prepare its tenants for those heavenly mansions on high.

If we learn love and loyalty and come to prize truth and beauty here below, and to obey the gospel,

SEVEN STONE CHURCH GIRLS RECEIVE RELIGIOUS AWARDS

WHEN "LIGHT OF LIFE" pins were presented to seven girls of the Towasi Oriole circle of the Stone Church at a recent eleven o'clock service, a new record was set. This was the first time as many as seven girls from any one circle or unit were presented pins in one service. Too, this circle has the honor of having the greatest number of girls completing the "Light of Life" requirements. The girls receiving awards were Norma Jean White, Muriel Lee McPherson, Barbara Melchert, Carol Dawn Bishoff, Daisy Lu Budd, Connie Burnham, and Louise Hibbard. The girls are fourteen and fifteen years of age. (One other girl from this circle, Wanda Johnstone, and the monitor, Mrs. E. A. Wilcox, received their "Light of Life" pins in earlier services.)

Each of these girls has completed First Rank Builder, the highest rank award of the Oriole program. In addition to the 150 hours of service to the church which is required in the program, each of the girls has worked from 100 hours to over 300 hours as page at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. Still they have had time to earn a total of 190 honor badges in the Oriole program, and each is a member of one or more of the organizations of junior high school—the mixed chorus, glee club, or pep club. All participate in Zion's League work at Stone Church.

Church service hours were earned in a variety of ways: folding sheets and "stuffing" inserts in the weekly Stone Church program bulletins, helping with the Christmas Messiah publicity for the General Church Music Department; ushering at church services other than the preaching services; assisting with miscellaneous work in several of the general church and city-wide offices. Their biggest task, and the hardest and the dirtiest, was assisting the church historian with sorting, boxing, unpacking, and putting on shelves books of the general church library in its new location.

The "Light of Life" pin is the highest religious award of the church to girls who are participating in an activity program such as the Oriole Girls, Girl Scouts, and Camp Fire Girls. The requirements, centered in religious knowledge and study, worship, stewardship and the financial program, take a minimum of one year to complete. Six awards must be completed, the final entitling the girl to the "Light of Life" pin.

Since the religious award program was inaugurated in April, 1946, Stone Church has had the honor of presenting these awards to fourteen girls, including the first presentation made to any girl of the church.

How "Young Joseph" Came to Amboy

Selections from the "Autobiographical Sketches"
of Edmund C. Briggs of the Council of Twelve

Part Eight: A Historic Prayer Meeting

"AT THE HOME OF BROTHER STONE"

Sunday, April 1, 1860: The Saints observed the day in fasting and prayer to our heavenly Father for his special blessings to attend our General Conference. There was a social service at Brother Stone's residence, and in the evening at the same place Elder Blair spoke a short time on the first principles of the gospel, then the meeting turned into a general social service. All are in good spirits, the weather is beautiful, and the roads are good.

Tuesday, April 3: Elder Samuel Powers of the Twelve, Elders John Gaylord and William Aldredge of Wisconsin, George Mory, and Oliver Dunham have arrived in good health and spirits.

Wednesday, April 4: Quite a number of the brethren are here and a meeting was held in the Cadwell Schoolhouse, Elders Z. H. Gurley and William Marks presiding. General council met, nominating quite a number of the elders for officers in the several quorums of the church and doing general preparatory work and business for the conference. The elders are in good spirits and hope, gladdened by the news that Joseph will soon be with us. Only a few of them had learned he had said he would attend our Conference or of the visit of the brethren to see him.

Amboy, Lee County, Illinois, April 5, 1860: I accompanied several of the brethren who were anticipating friends to arrive on the next train which is now due. While we were waiting at the depot, Brother Joseph Smith came up the street to meet us. I happened to be the only one who knew him. I soon introduced him to the Saints. He informed me that he came up on the night train before, and that his mother, who came with him, was at her sister's, Mrs. Wasson's, an old resident of the place. I then invited him to attend our social prayer-meeting to be held at Brother Stone's in the evening. He replied, "I would like to attend, but also would like to have my mother go if I had any conveyance so she could." I informed him I would see that he was provided with conveyance for himself and his mother. This evening Brother Stone's son, Lardner, took his open double-seated spring carriage and we went after them. They were cheerful, unassuming, and social in conversation, yet reserved in manner. They casually referred to the stormy time crossing the river on their way, but made no expression in relation to the church. Just as we reached the door of Brother Stone's residence (the house is a very neat one story and a half cottage in L form), the congregation knelt in prayer. The parlor was closely seated and packed, but the front room had no seats and the audience was standing; two alcoves or bedrooms, veiled in front by curtains which were drawn to one side, were where hats and caps had been placed.

SEATED "ON THE EDGE OF A BED"

Brother Joseph and his mother sat on the edge of one of the beds while Elder Gurley offered the invocation to our heavenly Father for his blessing. The audience arose and sang a hymn. Just as the closing lines of praise were sung, the Holy Spirit said to me, "Introduce Brother Joseph as the son of the Prophet Joseph, and Sister Emma as the wife of the deceased." I instantly said to Joseph, "Allow me to introduce you to this audience," and took him by the hand and led him to the door of the sitting-room and introduced him as commanded of God, and in the same manner introduced Sister Emma. Our hope as based upon prophecy is now being realized. A joyous influence of the Holy Spirit solemnized every heart in divine presence, and Elder Gurley said, "Welcome, welcome." Brother Joseph said, "I am pleased to meet with you, and in coming I propose to say tomorrow to you, if the same Spirit that prompts my coming prompts my reception, I am with you." He did say other words, but I do not remember them so I can repeat them. I do not think Sister Emma made any response to the glad voice of Elder Gurley to her, "Welcome, welcome, to the elect Lady."

I am truly glad to record these events, as they will ever serve as a link in the history of the great latter-day work, and they are true as God can not lie. The meeting was a spiritual feast. Many of the Saints spoke and rejoiced in the Holy Ghost. Several spoke in the spirit of prophecy, which must have been very comforting to Joseph and Sister Emma. All the Saints were lit up with great hope, comfort, and peace of the Holy Ghost. As the hour of service advanced I was impressed to offer prayer and thanksgiving to our heavenly Father and was led in supplication to ask Almighty God to bless the church in its effort to gather into his sheepfold the honest in heart everywhere in all the earth, that Israel might be gathered from its long dispersion and that Joseph, the son of the Martyr, might be kept from the besetting sin of the ancient kings and prophets of Israel. I had the assurance by the Holy Spirit that my prayer would be answered and that Joseph would never be led into the gross crime of polygamy. The meeting was a happy one, long to be remembered, and will be handed down in church history as an epoch never to be forgotten. As it was getting late, Joseph said to me, "I wish you would excuse us and allow us to return." As we took them back to Mrs. Wasson's they expressed themselves pleased with the spirit of the meeting and appreciative of the Saints, but they did not shake hands with any of them, as we left before the close of the services.

I have been quite particular in the record of events as I believe it will be of interest to the rising generation that will follow us; also because it is a fulfillment of the prophecy that I would come to the church with the Prophet Joseph. Before I took my mission in 1856 it was revealed to me that I should not return to Zarahemla, Wisconsin, until Joseph would be called to take his father's place and that I was directed in Western Iowa to attend this conference. I was also told means would be supplied to bear my expenses. All this shows unmistakable evidence that a divine power had been guiding in these matters. It was not a studied plan of mine even to meet Joseph at Amboy, but it seemed to come about as a natural happening so far as I was concerned. But now that it has come about, as current events in history, I can see how an overruling Providence has been in it all.—SH 50: 602-604. July 1, 1903.

The Cost of a White Robe

By Donna Weddle

LAST WEEK, SON, you drew yourself up as straight and tall as any four-year-old could, and suddenly, but sincerely, announced, "When I grow up, I'm going to be an angel!" Before I could think of a suitable reply, you added, "How much do white robes cost?" My first reaction was to laugh at your question, pat you on the head, and send you on your way; but the earnestness of your expression stopped me from treating it lightly. I told you that if you lived a good life, always doing the things which would please God, you wouldn't have to worry about buying a robe. God would no doubt have one for you.

As you grow from four to five years, from five to six, and so on, perhaps I can help you—and in so doing help myself—to understand how white robes are earned. It can't be on the popular installment plan, you know. You pay for it little by little, all right—but in advance.

You realize even now that part of the joy of life comes from worship experiences. You can't remember when you haven't prayed daily. I hope you will never cease. You will learn that prayer is not only a means of asking and thanking your Heavenly Father for blessings, but that by it you can develop a companionship with God. Yes, if you want to be by God's side in the future you had better plan toward that end, cultivating his presence today and every day.

As I look around the neighborhood each Sunday, I am made to realize how many people spend the day watering the lawn, planting garden, or relaxing in a lawn chair with the Sunday paper and a cigarette. You will find great strength if you will always be an active church member; if you will not only attend church, but take part—sing the songs, hear and feel the prayers, be prepared for lesson discussions, seek to understand the Word of God as presented by his priesthood. You remember we've talked many times about the "Sabbath day"—the "Lord's day"—and about keeping it holy. Perhaps this hasn't been too much of a task so far in your young life; but as you grow older, you may be tempted by a Sunday ball game, a morning fishing trip, or the desire to sleep late—especially if you've worked the Saturday night before. If you will always remember the Sabbath—to keep it holy—you will be putting a little down on that white robe.

YOU ALREADY KNOW all the Bible stories that children usually learn. (Some adults never get beyond the Daniel-in-the-Lion's-Den or the David-and-Goliath stage.) You also know Book of Mormon stories and delight in the modern experiences related in Zion's Hope and the church school quarterlies. If these remain but entertaining stories, you will not have received full value. Seek ever to apply that which you learn in the Scriptures to your own life. Never stop studying. We are advised to "study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." That is a lifetime job. Try always to understand and use that which you read from The Three Books. "Seek not for riches but for wisdom" and you will come nearer and nearer to that robe.

I know not whether you will be a doctor, a plumber, a carpenter, or an engineer—but regardless of the means you choose of earning your living, do a good job. Always take Christ with you. There will be times when you may be considered a little "queer" and even ridiculed because you try to be a true Christian. Be strong, my son—pray for the offenders and seek to help them. You may even have to be scoffed at before you can become of such a stature that the white robe will fit.

LIKE MOST PEOPLE you will probably marry and have a home of your own. Be a good husband. Be a good father. Make your home a place of great joy—a place where Christ is always the unseen guest. Teach your children to walk in the ways of the Lord. Remember that parents are God's most privileged ministers.

Endeavor to obey all the laws of God; slight none. I would like to ask you especially to make an honest effort to keep the financial law. Be a faithful and dependable steward in every way. Last week I had nothing to give you for the church offering, so you opened your savings bank to get some money. I was pleased that you chose to give your only quarter in preference to the most numerous pennies and nickels. Always give as generously as you are able to support God's work, my son; you will not be sorry. If you have neglected the law of tithes and offerings, I'm afraid you might not be comfortable in the heavenly robe.

Perhaps, if you prepare sufficiently and it is God's will, you may be called to serve in his priesthood. If so, you will have great responsibilities; but I'm sure that you will feel the effort you are called upon to make will be worth while. Even if you are not called to serve in such a capacity, you should not be idle. If you are anxious to serve, you will have no difficulty finding things to do. If there would be any one thing I would stress, Son, it would be to seek always to serve others, for in so doing you serve God.

If ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work, for, behold the field is white already to harvest, and lo, he that thrusteth in his sickle with his might, the same layeth up store that he perish not, but bringeth salvation to his soul; and faith, hope, charity, and love, with an eye single to the glory of God qualifies him for the work.

Question:

What are the church's teachings about salvation? Friends say that we can't "work out" our salvation and that it is instantaneous. They quote Ephesians 2: 8-9. What verses may I show to them to prove what I believe?

Missouri

J. B.

Answer:

See Philippians 2: 12: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling."

Salvation is a processive work aiming for the deliverance of man from sin and all its consequences and the attaining of perfect righteousness and unity in Christ under a new life that shall be everlasting.

In this plan of salvation, designed by Christ and adapted to all men from the beginning of the world to the end, Christ and man are under the necessity of working together in correlation. Neither one can do it all. The part which belongs to Christ man cannot do, and the part which belongs to man Christ cannot do for him. Believing and repenting, which is a continuous work, is man's task, and Christ cannot do it for him.

The text in Ephesians says, "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; but it is the gift of God." Grace and salvation are God's gift, but they come to no man without preparation by faith (which is a work), and by repentance.

Belief means much more than mere assent, and involves the learning of divine truth by which one may know the law of God in order that he might believe. It is a progressive work. Man's work of salvation, too, is more than just keeping out of sin. A man discovering he is on the wrong road will not reach his destination by merely stopping and standing still. Salvation as a goal can be reached only by progressive works of righteousness. Paul couples the work of God and man in the reference to Ephesians, "We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." John points out that salvation comes "to him that overcometh" (Revelation 3: 21).

Question:

What is the Spirit baptism? Is it merely a ritualistic ceremony, or is there an actual baptism?

Kansas

A. D. T.

Answer:

The baptism of the Spirit is a real, definite, conscious ministration of the Holy Spirit, whereby one is immersed in and filled by it as an ordinance of the gospel, this ministration being associated with, and following the laying on of hands—an essential part of the ordinance. The full baptism of the Spirit may attend the laying on of hands, though often the Spirit is given at that time in limited degree under which the person makes a more complete preparation for the full blessing which comes later. This is in accordance with the Scripture which says, "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God."

Ceremonialism in gospel ordinances is partly designed to give visual recognition to the otherwise unseen operations of the Spirit of God. The real thing in all of them is the operation of the Spirit which is indiscernible, though none the less real. Without the actual ministration of the Spirit the ceremony would mean nothing.

Question:

Does the Bible teach that tithing should be one tenth of the increase, rather than one tenth of the income?

Kansas

A. D. T.

Answer:

The general principle of the tithe seems to be one tenth of the increase. This was apparently the proportions paid by Abram as recorded in Genesis 14:20; and it was the proportion Jacob promised to give to the Lord (Genesis 28: 22). The rule of the tenth of the increase is clearly set forth in Leviticus 27: 30-32; though the use of the word "tithes" in Genesis 14: 39 is thought by some to refer to surplus property. God's laws are always just, and it is readily recognized that to require one tenth of the total income of a man in mercantile business would be confiscatory, often disastrous to the business, and consequently unjust. One tenth of the increase is just in proportion to a man's ability, and of the man who has no increase nothing is required. The law works no ill.

Question:

What is the Holy Spirit? How can we recognize it?

Kansas

A. D. T.

Answer:

The Holy Spirit is the pervasive power of God, bearing light, life, intelligence, and power to the children of God throughout the church; ministering the gifts and blessings according to his will and purpose. It functions in many different ways, revealing God, Christ, the truth and righteousness of the gospel, and interpreting and making plain the Scriptures. It adds cleansing to those who conform to the will of God, leading to sanctification. It is the power by which men are born again through an enveloping and pervading of the Spirit, performed, like the immersion of water, as an ordinance of the gospel, making them sons of God. It ministers to the whole world, but in lesser degree because of different status.

The Holy Spirit may be recognized in contradistinction to the spirit of Satan which often attempts to deceitfully counterfeit its works:

1. When its ministrations conform wholly to the truth and promises of God.
2. When it ministers in response to our acts of obedience, especially in relation to the ordinances of the gospel.
3. By its harmony with previous operations as recorded in the sacred Scriptures.
4. When all of its leadings point to Christ and his law.
5. By results of good growing out of its ministrations.

Parental Responsibility to the Prebaptismal Child

By Mrs. Kenneth Piepergerdes

WE SHOULD PLACE more emphasis on preparing our children for baptism. Deep in our hearts should be the desire to teach in such a way that our children's greatest desire will be to merit eternal life.

Will our sons and daughters acquire a vivid picture of how wonderful Zion can be? Will they want to be among the chosen when they hear the Scripture: "Two shall be in the field; the one shall be taken and the other left. Two shall be grinding at the mill; the one taken and the other left"?

We should strive to create in our children the desire to overcome, to be strong and stand whatever comes, to be steadfast, and to stand up for the right even though they may have to stand alone. We hear much in these times about being broad-minded, but we need to teach our children to differentiate so that they are not broad-minded in sin. God does not look upon sin with the least degree of allowance.

WE ARE FORTUNATE to have definite instruction given us as to our responsibility to the prebaptismal child:

Inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance, faith in Christ the Son of the living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands when eight years old, the sin be upon the head of the parents; for this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized; and their children shall be baptized for the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of hands; and they shall also teach their children to pray and to walk uprightly before the Lord.—Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4.

Frequently there are those who question whether they should have their children baptized at the age of eight, even though the Doctrine and Covenants is explicit regarding this. It isn't necessary that a child know all there is to know before he is baptized, however section 68 does state what should be taught. Margaret Gibson in an article, "Baptism for the Eight Year Old," (Saints' Herald, June 13, 1949) gives many good thoughts along this line.

Sometimes there are those who do not feel satisfied because the instruction given in Doctrine and Covenants is not found in the Bible also, yet when they were converted to this church they were taught to believe that many truths were taken from the Bible. How they should rejoice that some of these truths have been restored in the Doctrine and Covenants and the Book of Mormon. Nephi said:

These last records which thou hast seen among the Gentiles shall establish the truth of the first, which are of the twelve apostles of the Lamb, and shall make known the plain and precious things which have been taken away from them.—1 Nephi 3: 192.

TWO OF OUR GREATEST HELPS in teaching young children effectively are prayer and example. It is important that prayer be a natural part of the child's life, and the better the example, the more effective the teaching will be. The last two phrases of Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4 confirm the importance of prayer and example: "... and they shall also teach their children to pray and to walk uprightly before the Lord."

On our oldest daughter's seventh birthday we realized that in just a year she would be baptized. I wondered how much yet she should be taught and how specifically. How could I choose from the church books those fundamentals she could grasp? Then I found that others had already selected and compiled this information in the prebaptismal manual, This Is Jesus' Church. It is often used by pastors as a prebaptismal course, but it should be used by parents previous to the pastor's approach, since they are closest to the child's needs. They know how much he has been taught and can dwell more on that with which he is not so familiar.

WE SHOULD GIVE SERIOUS CONSIDERATION to teaching our children in the home and preparing them for baptism. This responsibility bothered me because even though I had tried, I never felt I had done all that I should. Then the thought came to me that, if I asked forgiveness for my lack or failure, I could expect the Holy Spirit to take up and teach where I left off. This is the more perfect teacher. These words stood out in my mind.

If we have provided the opportunity and tried to bring the child to the place where he can be baptized, then he will receive the Holy Spirit. The Lord wants this chance to teach the child by his Spirit, so the imperfect parent need not take full responsibility.

In homes where only one parent is a member of the church the responsibility to prepare the child for baptism may fall upon that one alone. Probably this parent has always felt a great desire to teach the child to be ready for baptism, yet has not been able to do all that could be done. If there is no objection from the nonmember parent, and if the child expresses his wish to be baptized, the ordinance should not be denied.

Every child should be permitted to have this more perfect teacher, the Holy Spirit, in addition to his parents' efforts. This Spirit will begin to function in his life following baptism, even though it may start in a small way.

I am thankful that God makes this compensation for parents' deficits. It is comforting to think that if we allow the Holy Spirit to teach us, we can become new creatures—whole, perfect beings—regardless of the difference in our lack of opportunities or heritage.

THE LIFE OF OUR LORD

by Charles Dickens

Charles Dickens wrote The Life of Our Lord for his own children. He set it down in his own hand, for their eyes—and their eyes alone—during the years from 1846 to 1849, at about the time he was completing David Copperfield. This is an answer to his children's questions about religion and faith, told as a simple narrative of the life of Christ.

A Lesson in Faith

I have never felt so unworthy of being a Latter Day Saint, or a follower of Christ, as I do at this minute. I am still shaking inside, and my nerves are quivering.

Several hours ago I sent my oldest child, a boy of eleven, to get my little girl, who is four years old. We have lived on our present street six weeks, and in this time she has never before attempted to leave the street, or even go over a few houses away. However, she disappeared today, and after going to all the houses on the street to look for her, I became alarmed. No Carol was to be found. I became quite panicky and immediately called my husband to come home.

I have never known such fright and fear, due, I suppose, to the recent articles in the newspapers of men who carry off small girls. My mind gave me no reassurance. The fact that I thought Carol wouldn't leave the street made it much more alarming. I had forgotten how the mind of a four-year-old works.

Robert, showing much better judgment than I, took it upon himself to go to the street adjoining ours. There, five houses down, he saw her shoes in the yard. Upon inquiry, he found her playing barefoot, and promptly brought her home. I can never find words which would do justice to the relief and gratitude I felt when I saw her. I said, "Thank God," and meant it from the bottom of my heart. Shortly after she was found, her father speeded to a stop in front of the house, white and shaking. His eyes filled with tears when he saw her. He had narrowly missed having an accident on his way home. So I, in my fright and unthinking stupidity, had nearly caused a real tragedy.

This is why I am so ashamed. I am reminded of when Christ said, "O ye of little faith." It is easy to talk religion, and even to write about it, yet all our sermonizing can be swept away in one stroke unless we actually live what we believe. I have always had faith in God. Healing has never been denied when I or my family have gone in faith to God and asked for a blessing. I have always believed that "all things work together for good to them that love God." Yet, in a moment of panic, I lost all perspective and gave way momentarily to the doubt and fear within me.

I have learned a lesson today—one I should like to share with others. Many times I have stood in church and sung "the Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want." I believe I meant it. Yet I have failed the test, because when tried, I lost all sense of the nearness of God, but he was there. It was I who was lost. I now have a new realization of the value of human life and the immortal soul of man. I shall wonder for many a day where my faith was. Why did it fail me at such a crucial moment? What was it that caused me to turn from being a person who trusted in God completely to one who had lost all faith and cried aloud in fear?

I hereby resolve that this shall never happen again. Whatever is necessary for me to do to overcome this, I shall. I shall cease to worry. I shall spend more time daily in prayer and meditation. Upon awakening each morning, I shall seek God's guidance and protection for my family. My husband, an elder in the church, also felt fear and panic, but only because I conveyed it to him instead of assuring him that God would care for Carol wherever she was.

In the future, when I am tested with this knowledge, I humbly pray that I shall not fail again; that my faith shall come through to lift me up to God; that I shall live what I know and believe. My prayer is, as was David's, "In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust; let me never be put to confusion."

A Convincing Experience

Before joining the Reorganization thirty years ago, I was a member of the Utah church. About a year after I was baptized Patriarch Ammon White came to preach and give blessings at our branch in Dallas, Texas. My friends urged me to receive my blessing, but I declined as it seemed like fortune-telling to me, and I had been taught that such was of Satan. A wonderful experience changed my opinion, however. One Sunday morning as Brother White was speaking, a shaft of light descended from heaven and enveloped his entire being. Then a hand was placed on his shoulder, and the spirit bore witness to me that the hand of God was upon him. I no longer doubted and two days later, after fasting and prayer, I received my patriarchal blessing. I have had many spiritual experiences since that time.

A TRIBUTE TO TWO CANADIAN SAINTS

WITHIN THE LAST FEW WEEKS Toronto, and hence all Ontario, lost by death two good church members. We in the States who knew them—and many of us had that pleasure—will also miss them.

WILLIAM JOHN HUGHES was the first to die. "Jack," as everyone knew him, came home from work one night and lay down for a little rest. He died almost as soon as he stretched out on the chesterfield. Every missionary for the last thirty or more years who visited Toronto enjoyed his generosity and hospitality.

Brother Hughes was well known throughout all Canada for his beautiful "Corn Flower" cut glass. His customers reached from Prince Edward Island in the east to Vancouver Island in the west. A piece or more of his artistic handiwork on all kinds of crystal will be found in the home of almost every minister of the church who has visited Toronto.

He was interested in people. His interest and concern for them was not just a Christmas-time affair; it lasted throughout the year—especially if he heard of a family of children in need. Many acts of kindness were done by Jack, hence many rewards await him in that place where there "are many mansions." We extend, in behalf of his many American friends, our sympathy to his wife Hazel and their three children.

"MARY WILSON IS DEAD!" Just a few words came to us over the telephone. Her heart did not just stop, so that she went quickly to sleep. All last year and more she suffered.

Seek ever to have humility; but move forward with all faith and diligence toward your goal of eternal life—not only for yourself, but for others. You will make mistakes; but remember, "he that repents and does the commandments of the Lord shall be forgiven."

As you mature, you will discover in your home, school, church, Zion's League, and other places that there are many things you can do to help you earn your white robe. No doubt you will outgrow the robe as a symbol of your goal; but may you ever keep your eyes Christward that some day, after keeping his commandments with diligence, you may dwell with him and have eternal life.

Sister Wilson was another person who was well known and loved in the Toronto District and by many of the Saints in the States. She was leader of the women's department in Toronto for over fifteen years. She could always be found in the kitchen not only directing, but working with a will and spreading good cheer with a very contagious smile. She too did not confine her talents to her church circle of friends, but was active in city welfare work. Indeed she was a Dorcas—or perhaps modern Martha who felt the need to serve. Maybe she was a combination of both. She worked, she gave, and she taught! Her smile will never be forgotten. She was a woman of few words, but known for many kind deeds. Early in her married life she became acquainted with deep sorrow in the loss of two children a few hours apart.

She leaves a devoted husband, James Wilson, a high priest of the church. His ministry reached into many homes in the Toronto District, because Mary loved the church as he did and helped him in all his ministry as district president. God bless you, Brother Wilson!

* * * * *

The death of these two good Canadian Saints leaves us with many memories that shall be cherished while life shall last. We salute them from across the border! I know I can also say I pen these few words in behalf of the church.

New Levels of Health in the Home

Part 1

WILSON MIZNER SAID, "I respect faith, but doubt is what gets you an education." If we doubt that the way we have been directing our households is the perfect way, if we doubt that we used wisdom in handling any given situation, if we doubt that we are always right, we'll begin to think, to reason, to change. Then, and only then, are we starting our education in the conducting of the business of building new levels of health in the home.

Mental poise—intellectual balance and Physical poise—corporeal balance equal mental and physical power in the home.

Now a knowledge of properly supplying the physical needs of our families may be obtained from almost every printed publication on the market today; vitamins, minerals, everything we need in suitable proportions according to our weight. But after the members of our family have been appropriately supplied here, their minds and spirits must be fittingly fed or the physical foods go on a rampage and aren't properly distributed over the body. We then have old levels in health and no poise in the home. We become unsettled. Things don't click, and all three qualities become unbalanced. Physical food, mental food, and spiritual food become indigestible.

Frank Lindhorst says whether for church, home, play, or other situation, these qualities must be possessed and made part of our daily living, and we must grow in their possession:

1. A sense of worth—worthiness.
2. Social sensitivity—respect for ourselves and for others.
3. Appreciation of the universe and its glories—the stars, other worlds—many mansions.
4. Discrimination of values. We learn by experience—our tastes become refined, our behavior more adult, our impulses curbed, our choices more intelligent, our spiritual growth more substantial.

5. Responsibility and accountability—our understanding of God's will, our judgment, our duty and our conscience mature.
6. Co-operative fellowship—a more mature concept of family, community, nation, and church.
7. Quest of truth—and the recognition of it when we find it, even if it goes against the grain.
8. The integration of experience into our philosophy of life—learning in living. A working philosophy of this is the right and just course to pursue—the enlightened wise course—and we shall follow it. If we stray off this course for any reason, we shall return to it again and again in face of daily good or evil, joy or suffering, justice or injustice, vitality or death, as the responsible human arbiter of the mental and physical growth and life of our family. We shall not cling to old ways if new are better, and we shall not clutch at the new just because they are new.
9. Language—symbols and records: Each generation contributes its record of beliefs, attitudes, practices. It is our high privilege as parents to make our background of religious ideals and practices wise, just, and good. Then our children will have no reasonable cause for resentment and shame and will in turn hand on to their children that priceless heritage.
10. Group participation. We have an obligation to keep the family a close unite with integrated interests, ambitions—a one-for-all-for-oneness.

By Mrs. L. F. P. Curry

IN ENDEAVORING to prepare a reference formula for an approach to a home of sane, even, well-tempered living; in order that health, happiness, wisdom, and peace may be felt in the very atmosphere by all who enter there, we must start with ourselves—the parents. On our shoulders rests the responsibility, as stated in Doctrine and Covenants, section 30: 3, to "govern your house in meekness, and be steadfast." We must be steadfast in the little things that daily make our lives worth while if we keep doing them—or refrain from doing them, if that is indicated. We must be valiant in our responsibilities, modest and stanch in the governing of our homes, for this is our stewardship. We must be steadfast ourselves if we expect our children to be. So in every step toward a new level in morals and manners, of health in our homes, the parents must take each step first.

IN AN ESSAY on the subject, "What I think of my family," a seven-year-old wrote, "I don't like my family, because they come at me." Too many of us "come at" our families with the result that the members are startled, then outraged at being startled, and the atmosphere becomes charged with hostility. This happens every day, so we have disturbance instead of peace.

I realize that mothers, like clocks, need to be "rewound" regularly to receive fresh impetus, momentum, energy, force, power for the daily tasks. Some of us need daily winding; some of us are eight-day clocks; some of us are run by electricity and stop only when the power is cut off; but we must each be renewed. The key is prayer; the power is prayer.

We sometimes have mistaken ideas concerning the establishing of a home of peace, tolerance, and wisdom, and thereby lose many opportunities of enriching our lives. We are like the man from Maine who had wanted for years to see New York City and finally made the trip down on the Fall River line boat. When he returned home, he was asked questions about the city by his family and friends. "I didn't see it," he said. They were astonished. "After that long trip, you didn't see New York City?" they exclaimed. "Nope. When I got there it was rainin', and I'd forgot my rubbers."

A gradual, happy, devoted development of our family life is the patient, happy, devoted development—the mental, physical, spiritual maturing—of us parents. Only when we have reached these levels, may we expect our children and their children to grow into happy maturity. And we must start now, here, with what we have.

Harold Kessinger says one trouble with today's children is indulgent mothers and indifferent fathers. We receive from our children while they are young their love and loyal admiration. They think we are perfect, that we know all there is to know about everything. There are overtones of pride in their voices when they say, "my father," or "my mother." Too often we permit them to become disillusioned about us as they grow older. A little at a time we chip away their feeling of security in our wisdom, understanding, self-control, justice, fairness, honesty, and consideration.

LET US BECOME ADULT in our thoughts, in our words, in our actions. Somebody has said that an adult is one who has stopped growing vertically, but not horizontally. If we can increase our adult mental horizons to equal our physical proportions, more power to us. Understanding is such a precious quality to possess. Have you seen the cartoon of the tiny boy dressed in his pajamas, looking earnestly up into his mother's frowning, preoccupied, disapproving face and saying, "I'm not going to sleep until that 'figment of my imagination' gets out from under my bed"?

If we are going to reach new levels of health in our homes, we will have to set them in order first. We cannot build a higher step, a higher level, on loose, unsure materials. The foundation of the first step must be firm and sure, and each step strongly built. This means beginning with the parents. And we'd better plan for longer than tomorrow if we wish to make any progress. It may be true that we cannot tell whether we have been a success or failure until we find out what happens to our grandchildren. Too often we so over-stress the methods of teaching our families that we entirely overlook those basic qualities which we are obligated to instill in their lives, thereby missing our own goal.

I think our methods of rearing children these days are changing, reverting to the old-fashioned way of instilling definite principles of right and wrong, rather than being so reluctant and detached about presenting the moral attitudes which must be developed to guide life. The obligation to continually hold before our families—adults, young people, and children—the first principles of right thinking, right living, and right behavior rests continually on the parents' shoulders. This applies especially to the mother, if the father is absent from home continuously. Then, no matter what happens, families retain their equilibrium.

One writer has said it is no problem nowadays for us to keep close to our children and know what they are thinking, because they'll tell us. They have no inhibitions. That, of course, is not altogether true, as any parent knows. They are too frank and outspoken sometimes. It is not necessary to call a spade a spade to the point of vulgarity. Some children are articulate, some are not, as has always been the case; some secretive, some not. Some are the kind we are pretty sure of and can generally tell where they are, what they are doing, and what they are thinking. Some are not. Parents are the responsible guardians, and we don't change our children until we change ourselves. We cannot properly discipline our families until we learn to discipline ourselves. If we haven't come from homes where we were taught to live balanced lives while we were young, we have to learn to live balanced lives as adults. And if we do not set an example for, and do not teach our children, they in turn wait until they have grown into maturity, into physical adulthood, to start their process of learning to be mental and spiritual adults. This may go on indefinitely, and does, with the result that many homes are all too slowly being developed into healthy dwelling places. Now is the time to remedy it.

EVERY DAY IS A FRESH BEGINNING. Every morn is the world made new." If we remember this and take a step every morn to a higher level toward a healthy, well-regulated home, no matter how small our yesterday's step, we shall have gained strength and made that much progress toward our goal. If we miss a step and stumble back, it is just one step; and the next day, if we persist, we shall gain headway. These are not just vague endeavors. They are actual accomplished steps toward a new level of attainment. We should look back on yesterday and say to ourselves, "This thing I did, which I should have done, and this thing I did not do, which I should not have done. This thing I said, which I should have said, and this thing I consciously refrained from saying, because I should not say it."

One successful business firm has this for a slogan: "The vision to see, the faith to believe, and the courage

It's Your Church

By Mary Cooper

IS THE CHURCH you attend really your church? Does "belonging" mean only that your name and date of baptism are recorded neatly in the dusty records of the branch you attend? Are you a supporter of the activities sponsored by your congregation? Or are you a mere spectator at services, one who condescendingly places a quarter on the collection plate once a week?

Religion involves giving as well as receiving. Consider the organist or pianist who faithfully brings talent to each service, and your pastor whose life is devoted physically, mentally, and spiritually to building better people. Consider also the women who serve, the Zion's League leaders, the church school teachers, the caretaker—all who give freely of time and ability, and usually without thought of remuneration. Yet the success of their work depends largely on the support given by other members.

You don't have to be a "big wheel" to help, but you must have the desire and willingness to serve. How else, other than by serving and being an integral part of your branch, can you hope to call the church your church? Your livelihood is the work or job you do in return for certain benefits. Likewise your church deserves a part of your time, energy, and money in return for certain benefits you receive from it.

TOO OFTEN more time is taken for thinking up excuses for not serving than the actual job would take. There is the case of Mrs. B., a capable woman with leisure time. Vacation church school was coming, and helpers and leaders were needed desperately. Mrs. B. was asked to help in the primary department. Her answer was "No." Why? Because her daughter was getting ready to go on a vacation, and she just wouldn't have time. Yet she expects to send her two younger children, and she also expects someone to be there to teach them effectively.

Or take the case of Tom, just home for the summer from the state university. Tom has the best of intentions for serving later—after he has graduated. At present the local church Boy Scout troop is without a Scoutmaster. Tom is qualified by having been a Boy Scout, attending Scout camp, and by having been an assistant Scoutmaster. But his answer is, "Sorry, don't think I can do it. But I intend to come back after college and really go to work." Now Tom would be very much upset if a League party had to be called off because some League leader apologized, "Sorry, we'll just have to disband League until after I get back from a two-month vacation, and then we'll really go to town!" Giving must be in the present tense as well as the future tense if receiving is expected all the time.

BROTHER JONES has always been eager to serve and has been very willing to participate in any activity concerned with his calling. But his feelings are very much injured if he is asked to do anything beneath the special duties of a priest. Several times when the head deacon was busy he called Brother Jones at the last minute to serve as an usher for the Sunday evening service. His excuse each time was a trifling one. It must be remembered that every job and every act of service in the church of Jesus Christ is an important one. No one job has more status in the eyes of God than any other. It is the attitude of doing, giving, and serving that counts.

Then there is Miss Tompkins who wants to serve—to do something for the church, but feels as if she isn't needed because no one ever asks her to do something special. Perhaps her biggest gift of giving, right now, would be seeing her pastor and offering her services.

Each can give something, no matter how small or how big. It isn't the "honor" of the job, but the good feeling and fellowship which come as a result of serving that makes working in the church so satisfying. Remember the story of the two little boys whose only gift to the Christ child was a penny? It seemed so small, yet when all the other expensive, elaborate gifts had failed to make the chimes ring, the penny laid on the altar set them ringing. Remember the Littlest Angel and his humble gift to the Christ child, which became the star over Bethlehem? It isn't the size, the importance, or the magnitude of your service which counts. It is your attitude which is important.

Only by giving liberally for the amount you receive can you make the church you attend really your church—your church in the sense of support, participation, love, devotion, and belonging.

New Horizons

Young People Meet at New York's Oldest Branch

By Barbara Peavy

Greenwood, New York, one of seven branches in New York District, was host to a district-wide delegation of young people June 8 to 10. This occasion celebrated the golden anniversary of the branch. The group of Saints at Greenwood represents the oldest congregation in New York, the home of the Restoration.

The only man living today who helped in the building of the church is Jess Osmine, a nonmember, grandfather of the present pastor. Located 140 miles southwest of Palmyra and Hill Cumorah, the congregation first met in homes and churches of other denominations. The schoolhouse was used at various times until a nonmember, Mr. Blair, donated the property for the Saints to build on. Mr. Blair wanted to see a church erected in the little community.

The church is a medium sized, white frame building typical of the time in which it was built. Native hemlock logs were dragged from the forests by horse and wagon, and many of the local men who were not members of the church assisted in the construction of the building. The nails in the church are hand-forged square ones made near the site of the church. The church is lighted with natural gas in old-type swinging fixtures and serves as a landmark of the "old days" to the people in the community.

The only pastors the branch had from 1901, the time of its organization, until 1937 were men who had to travel some distance to serve. Three of the early men who ministered in this capacity were F. M. Sheehy, John Lentz, and Alma Booker. Brother Thomas Sheldon was one of the first elders to preach in the church. Other pioneer missionaries were Brothers I. M. Smith, U. W. Greene, Ward Christy, J. E. Vanderwood, W. Fligg, W. W. Blair, B. B. Hollands, R. C. Evans, and Alexander Smith.

The present pastor, Carol Bassett, is the first local man to become pastor of the branch. He was ordained a priest in 1937 and an elder in 1949. He has served as pastor since 1937 and is the only priesthood member in the branch.

The little congregation, despite the obvious drawbacks of being isolated and having only one priesthood member, is very active. The district holds a youth retreat at Greenwood twice a year. The golden anniversary program included a brief re-enactment by the young people of the district of the founding of the movement in this area.

A Cafeteria of Thoughts

By C. J. Lant

WE HEAR A GREAT DEAL today about "Our Heritage" and the fear which grips the hearts of men and women that we may lose some of the things we have always held most dear. . . . The old-time peace and contentment we once knew, when home was a patriarchal haven, when God's will was the rule and guide for daily life, are gone.

On every side we find philosophies and religions offering ways of thinking and ways of life, each heralding its own brand of "glad tidings" and hope to humanity. We have a veritable cafeteria for the mind and spirit.

Among all the thronging millions of the world, each one is looking for something that will meet his own need and satisfy his hunger. Many choose food for the body, or for the mind, when what they need is food for the soul.

As we have advanced through life, we have learned how important it is to "try the spirits" of what the cafeteria of life offers, to see whether they be of God or of man. There are times when we must take a definite stand for or against certain things.

Love is fundamental to human happiness and peace. It is basic in the gospel. And love is lost many times because it is not expressed in appreciation. When love is lost, people are lost, and hope is lost.

In every life plan there should be a place for God. Only in a complete return to a deeper appreciation of fundamental things—the companionship of good friends, the inspiration of the great books, the way of life that Christ taught—can we find the peace and happiness that apparently have been lost.

New Levels of Health in the Home

to do." These qualities are necessary for poise in our homes. Too often we lack discernment. We do not try to understand the reactions of the various members of our family unit. Our own reactions take the bit in their teeth and start running off at a tangent instead, and we have confusion rather than understanding; we have quarrels instead of agreement; we have intolerance instead of tolerance. Discernment is a priceless possession. If we cherish it, it will expand. I once heard a woman say of a married couple, "They have educated hearts."

We do not always know what is going on in the minds of our families and associates, and sometimes their words do not in the remotest sense convey their thoughts. Our little grandsons and granddaughter at Christmas time were hearing the usual Christmas songs on the radio. Their mother said, "Do you know what they are saying, Cappy?" Cappy said, "Of course I do. They are singing 'Noel, Noel.'" David spoke up and said, "Mummy, why did the poor shepherds have no well?" I remember when small, that I thought "You who unto Jesus for refuge have fled," in the hymn, "How Firm a Foundation," was "Yoo-hoo unto Jesus, for refuge has fled." I yoo-hooed to my brothers when in need of help and saw no reason why I shouldn't yoo-hoo unto Jesus who was my elder brother, according to the teachings of my father. No one knew what I was thinking then, and by the same token we do not always know what is going on in the minds of our families. We'd better find out what they are thinking if we expect to understand them—also our friends and acquaintances. If we take the time and trouble to do this it will be a good high step toward a new level of happiness both in and outside our homes.

Introducing

VERNELL POWELL (Mrs. Kenneth) PIEPERGERDES, DeKalb, Missouri, (page 14) felt strongly impressed last March to write up a talk she had given about a year before. In obedience to this motivation she offered her article on "Parental Responsibility" for publication. She was born and baptized at Stewartville, Missouri, and was graduated from high school there in 1932. There also she met her husband. They were married in 1937 and for the past fourteen years have lived near St. Joseph. With their two daughters, Cheryl J. (10) and Marla K. (7) they attend the First St. Joseph congregation.

Her hobbies are music, reading, and writing poetry. She says, "If this article will cause one soul to find the more abundant life I shall feel fully repaid for my efforts."

* A BOOST FOR PLODDERS

"Perhaps one of my qualifications was the ability to plod. I have said sometimes that, if I could write a set of beatitudes, one of them would read, 'Blessed are the plodders, for they shall get there.'—Christiana Salyards in her Autobiography.

* TESTIMONY

"When a Latter Day Saint gives out his testimony to the work of the Restoration, he should be careful that his words and acts sustain the testimony."—Christiana Salyards in her Autobiography.

MOVIES

We are among those who ordinarily have a tepid enthusiasm for movies; but when something great comes along, we can be persuaded to go. We heard loud praises of "The Great Caruso," with that splendid young man, Mario Lanza, who should hereafter be called "The Voice." He has a pair of vocal cords such as may not be given to the world again in your time and mine. This show has great music, beautiful singing, fine technicolor, and a good story. You will not regret going.

We didn't see "Francis" as a show, but are getting acquainted via David Stern's book. Everybody seems so amazed that Francis the mule should talk like a man. That shouldn't surprise anybody. What should astound us is the fact that so many men talk like mules.

* CONVEYOR

You have probably noticed that the Lord has sent you some of his loveliest blessings through his other children. Have you ever thought that he has some blessings for you to deliver? It is your privilege to be his conveyor. And remember that God's messengers never go unrewarded.

* CO-OPERATION

A letter from C. J. Smith, treasurer of the Quorum of High Priests, Sioux City, Iowa, contains this thoughtful statement: "We get still more out of our classwork by co-operative thought and expression."

Co-operation means more than working together. It must begin with the mind and spirit. No one person in a group can have all the good ideas. The Lord distributes his gifts around among his children. A good idea here, a good thought there, everybody contributes a little, and all share in the benefits. Those who give are not made poorer. Those who receive are richer. The whole group has more than it had before.

The first step in dealing with people, is to recognize their good qualities, and to like them.

It is so easy to see another person's faults; it is so hard to see our own.

Jesus gave the world one lesson as no other living being ever did: the law of love is the foundation of all law.

News and Notes

We'd like you to know

Norman Edward Hield

The Hebrews felt oppressed when they had to make bricks in Egypt without straw. That's nothing compared to operating a project the size of our present Social Service Center with donated labor. In fact it can't be done without paying the living needs of most of those who devote full time to it since it has gone on a six-day working basis. Norman is a big man—vertically and horizontally (side view)—but he can't cover the 26,710 feet of floor space used at the Center. That faraway look caught by the photographer, Win Wheeler, was in all probability due to the thought of some work he should then be doing in the basement while he was sitting at his desk on the second floor.

Brother Hield was born in Janesville, Wisconsin, on December 1, 1892. He is the oldest son of Norman E. and Effie Hield; the elder brother of Evangelist Willard and Apostle Charles Hield. He was baptized in 1900 at the reunion held on the J. O. Dutton farm. He was graduated from the Janesville High School in 1911, from Graceland in 1931, received his B. S. in Commerce at the University of Iowa in 1933, and his M. A. in economics at the University of Michigan in 1934.

Norman worked as a wholesale shoe salesman for twenty-five years. He served as an appliance heating and air-conditioning engineer for seven years before coming to his present work with the church.

In 1922 he married Mabel Marine Salter. They have two children: Wayne and Carol.

Brother Hield was ordained an elder in 1917 and served once as president of the Rockford, Illinois, Branch. He is deeply devoted to his task and very anxious to prove that the church can succeed in this type of social project. He walks many miles each day around the big building at 310 North Liberty Street. He smiles easily and laughs as he talks, but his concern over getting enough sales and processing help to service the project each day gives him that serious look.

SERVICES AT BUTLER

The first service was held in the new church building in Butler, Missouri, June 24. President Israel Smith spoke at the afternoon service, and Bishop Walter N. Johnson spoke at the morning service. Victor Witte, former pastor at Butler under whom the building fund was started, spoke Sunday evening.

MEMORIAL SERVICE AT NAUVOO

President F. Henry Edwards spoke at the memorial service for the Martyrs at Nauvoo, Illinois, June 24. Bishop Leslie Kohlman took a group of singers up for the service, and preached at the Nauvoo Branch Sunday morning. The singers were May Jorgensen, Burt and Shirley Johnson, and Gladys Omohundro, accompanist.

G. ARTHUR COOK DIES

President Israel A. Smith received a telegram on Saturday, June 30, telling of the death of G. Arthur Cook of Hot Springs, Arkansas. Elder Cook has been pastor of the Hot Springs congregation for several years.

KANSAS DISTRICT REUNION

A successful reunion was held at Camp Fellowship, about twenty miles from Wichita, for the Kansas District. The reunion was held from June 16-24. The attendance of campers on the grounds was double that of last year. Members of the staff included Evangelist Roy A. Cheville, who also instructed a class for young people; Seventy James A. Daugherty, Apostle D. T. Williams who attended several days; Elder Don Lents who was present the first week end; and Bishop G. L. DeLapp who attended the last week end of the reunion.

MUSIC WORKSHOPS HELD

Franklyn S. Weddle, general church director of music, has returned from a series of music and worship workshops which he directed in California. Accompanying Brother Weddle on the trip were Aleta Runkle, director of music for the Center Stake; and Bethel Davis Knoche, organist and member of the staff of the General Church Radio Department. Workshops were held in Los Angeles Stake, Fresno, Berkeley, and Sacramento. Approximately thirteen people from the Southern California District attended the workshop held at the Los Angeles Stake. A highlight of the activity in the Los Angeles Stake was the presentation of Faure's "Requiem," by the stake choir and directed by Colin Ferret. Franklyn Lysinger was organist, Edna Stone, soprano; and Albert Brackenbury, baritone.

YOUTH SERVICES

Youth services are being held following the regular campus services in Independence on Sunday evenings. Dr. A. R. Gilbert was the speaker June 17. His topic was "What Latter Day Saints Believe About God." A discussion period follows the short address by the speakers. Bob Flanders, new appointee, spoke June 24 on "What Latter Day Saints Believe About Free Agency." Interest has been shown in the services by the young people of the stake. The Stake-Wide Zion's League is sponsoring the series.

Lord, Is It I ?

"And as they did eat, he said, Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me.

"And they were exceedingly sorrowful, and began every one of them to say unto him, Lord, is it I?"
—Matthew 26: 21, 22 (Authorized Version)

As Jesus sat with the twelve to celebrate the Passover, he made a terrible, startling charge and accusation. In a way, it was a prophecy.

From Matthew's account, it would seem that Jesus opened the meeting with that statement: "One of you shall betray me!" He didn't "lead up" to it. He shot it at them point blank, with a devastating effect.

Only a selected few of his disciples—the twelve—were there. As head of the church, he was presiding over a meeting of his most trusted officers and friends. But even among them he found one who was guilty of treachery—of making a proposition to the enemy.

The men were disturbed and upset. They were "exceedingly sorrowful."

To their everlasting credit, eleven of those men immediately turned suspicion upon themselves rather than upon their neighbors. They were sure of themselves at the moment, but no one could know what he might do in the future, under force of changing circumstances.

It was in a state of genuine alarm that each one of the eleven asked, "Lord, is it I?"

Every man there knew the general human weakness. He knew the power of temptation and the danger of evil. And he knew himself. It was possible that conditions might cause any one of them to fall.

One of the twelve held back. Judas must have been the most surprised man there. He thought he had conducted his negotiations with the high priests in secret. And they, if they wanted the plot to succeed, had every reason to keep quiet about it. Judas tried to keep up all the appearance of loyalty. He had come to the meeting just as if nothing were wrong. It was a necessary part of the plot. In that time of danger, to be absent would be to fall under suspicion.

Judas thought none of them knew what he had already done—that he had gone to the high priests and contracted for a price to deliver Jesus into their hands. Judas had reckoned without the divine power that lay in Jesus to search the human heart and mind. "He knew what was in man."

Judas might have preferred to say nothing. But eleven men had spoken. Only he had remained silent. Then Jesus pointed him out with the statement: "He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me."

It was too late to cover up, but Judas knew nothing else to say, "Master, is it I?" And Jesus replied, "Thou hast said." A modern version interprets this, "You are right!"

How many of us sit in the church listening to a sermon and thinking how the preacher's remarks fit somebody else.

If we had been there at that memorable meeting, we might have asked, "Lord, is it James?" or "Lord, is it Peter?"

It is very easy to point the finger of suspicion at others. It takes more nerve and honesty to look into the mirror of conscience and ask, "Am I guilty?"

erring to correct their faults. They help average people to be better. One man, for example, frankly admits that he is sensitive and has a poor disposition. He makes mistakes easily and naturally. If he does right, it takes a struggle.

Yet he wants to be a good man, a good husband, a good church member. So he reads the personality magazine and the Dorothy Dix column, and constantly checks himself. He says, "Only by constant effort and vigilance can I remain civilized. It may come easily to some people. I have to work hard at it."

At Graceland chapel years ago a pedagogical classic entitled "The Blue Vase" was often read. It was supposed to inspire the students to increased effort. Why anybody would want that blue vase, I can't remember now. It seemed tremendously important at the time. On alternate years "Bossing Johnson" was read. I liked Johnson much better. He seemed so human. The vase hunters were too, too "super."

Johnson was ambitious. He wanted to be promoted until he was a boss. In callow youthfulness, he confided his ambitions to his employer. "So you want to be a boss?" the man said. "All right, I'll let you be a boss. Your job is bossing Johnson. If you can make him work and produce, I'll give you a raise."

Look under your hat. Perhaps there is a chap named Johnson wearing it. Give him a boss. When criticism is in the air, you can ask, "Lord, is it Johnson?"

It takes a touch of greatness for us to have an objective view of ourselves, and see ourselves as others see us. We can begin with the question, "Lord, is it I?"

Women's Institute

A very important week for the women of the church will be coming this fall. Plan now to take advantage of the opportunity; it will help you to better prepare yourself for service in the church.

The women's institute will open on Monday evening, October 8, and continue through Friday noon, October 13. This time of closing was chosen so that those who wish may reach Lamoni in time for the first gathering of the Graceland Homecoming.

The Women's Council hopes that you are already making plans to attend. If you cannot by any means attend yourself, perhaps as part of a group you are assuring the attendance of one or more representatives.

The full program and list of speakers will be announced soon. Among those who will conduct the institute are Mrs. S. S. Arnsion, Mrs. George Mesley, Mrs. S. A. Burgess, Mrs. H. I. Velt, Mrs. Walter Johnson, Mrs. M. A. McConley, and many other well-known church women.

In order to make the cost as low as possible, the women of Independence are providing lodging. The noon meal will be served by the Laurel Club at a reasonable cost. Perhaps several women living in the same area can make arrangements to come together by car.

This institute was organized at the invitation of the First Presidency and is the first event of its kind to be held in many years. It is felt that it will fulfill a need in the lives of many church women. Please plan to attend.

THEME: Academic Integration for Our Times

The third annual conference of college men and women is being planned by Elder Roy A. Cheville, representing the Committee on Ministry to College Students. At our request Dr. Cheville has submitted the following "prospectus statement."

The key word is integration. Educators are observing that modern college education tends to be atomistic. It is compartmentalized. It does not hang together. It needs integration with some spiritual motif to blend it together with meaning. Each phase of specialization is to be interpreted in the light of a total overview of life. Latter Day Saints have an opportunity to move into frontiers of educational interpretation and organization, with spiritual insights to unify. The Kirtland Conference tackles this urgent modern problem in a setting in which this was attempted a century ago.

Representatives of the presiding councils of the church and of the Committee will lead the discussion as before, but the emphasis will be on shared experience. As many as can arrange to do so are cordially invited to be present and to participate.

A Philosophy for These Times

It may seem to you conceited to suppose that you can do anything important toward improving the lot of mankind. But this is a fallacy. You must believe that you can help bring about a better world. . . . Everybody can do something toward creating in his own environment kindly feelings rather than anger, reasonableness rather than hysteria, happiness rather than misery. The sum of such actions makes the difference between a good and a bad world.—BERTRAND RUSSELL

From John W. Banks, missionary assigned to Eastern Colorado District:

I spent one week in missionary work at Cheyenne, Wyoming, and had the opportunity of baptizing two very fine men on the closing Sunday, June 10. These, with other baptisms in the district, should bring the record to somewhere between eighty and ninety new members during the first nine months of the church year.

From Apostle D. O. Chesworth, associate editor of The Reminder, a news sheet published every three months for isolated members of the church:

From a reader in Grand Manan, New Brunswick: "I want to thank you for the Reminders. When I get mine (two copies) I keep them a while and then send them on to another member. It is hard to tell just how much good they do."

From Harry Doty in Northern Michigan: "The Reminder is a good piece of mailing ministry. The last edition was by far the best yet."

From Evalena Blankenship, Washburn, Missouri: "I enjoy reading the Reminder. We are especially glad to get it because we live so far from church we don't get to attend."

There are now over 11,000 on the subscription list.

From a recent letter to us from Elder John T. Conway, president of the New York-Philadelphia District, we are advised that as a result of a series conducted by Seventy W. T. Guthrie, sixteen were united with the church at Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, on Sunday, June 17. He also indicates that at the present time the Bloomsburg Saints are considering the possibility of an addition to their building. If they have many baptismal services such as this we can see why the addition would be needed.

Living Waters

Versus

Broken Cisterns

A sermon by Frank C. Mesle, guest speaker at a union service held in the Park Methodist Church, Sherrill, New York.

Scripture Reading: John 4: 1-31.

There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water: Jesus saith unto her, Give me to drink.

(For his disciples were gone away unto the city to buy meat.)

Then saith the woman of Samaria unto him, How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans.

Jesus answered and said unto her, If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water.—John 4: 7-10, Authorized Version.

TWO THINGS stand out in this Scripture: first, Jesus is the source of living water that springs up into everlasting life; second, it is not where man worships his God, but how he worships that is important, for it is commanded that he “worship in spirit and in truth” (that is, in sincerity and according to the truth).

The woman of Samaria worshiped but she knew not what she worshiped. She failed to recognize Jesus as the Messiah. To understand the truth about Jesus and the truth of Jesus is vital to true worship. The Samaritan woman may not have rejected Jesus by saying, “no,” to his message, but her failure to recognize him had the same result. The fact that the Samaritans had no dealings with the Jews because of racial and religious prejudice could have provided the barrier.

God, through Jeremiah says, “My people have committed two evils; they have rejected me the fountain of living waters, and have hewed them cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water.”—Jeremiah 2: 13.

THIS TEXT reminds one of a story by Henry van Dyke called “The Source” in which he described a beautiful, fertile city found in otherwise desolate and barren surroundings. The fertility of the city was dependent upon a stream of water that had its source in the nearby hills. The abundance of water flowing from the source was dependent upon the faithful visitation of the people to the source. When the flow of water became small because they were not faithful, men began to dig cisterns, and for some persons cistern digging became a profitable business. These cistern diggers sought to discourage anyone from visiting the source in the hills, with the result that the main stream went nearly dry, and the cisterns were inadequate to supply the needed water.

There were those who advocated a return to the practice of visiting the source, which, of course, was opposed by the entrenched cistern diggers. A brave soul went to the source for meditation and prayer and the supply of living water increased, but the cistern diggers slew him. This beloved martyr, however, showed others the way to keep the life-giving water flowing, and as the number of people who visited the source increased, the flow of water became more abundant. As the flow of water increased, the people irrigated more of the land, and all enjoyed the life-giving water. This did not please the cistern diggers who still argued that cisterns were more important than the source. But the people were happy, and the land was fertile when they went often to the source of worship and rededicated their lives to the ideals of their beloved martyr who had shown them the way to keep the life-giving water flowing.

THIS STORY fits the text and the story of the Christian religion with Jesus Christ as the source of living water illustrated by the experience of Jesus and the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well. “He that drinketh of the water that I shall give shall never thirst and it shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.” This text is applicable today. That Jesus is the source—the way to the more abundant life, to eternal life, no believer in Jesus Christ will question, but many may question that the text could be applied to them.

Jesus went to the source of spiritual power, of living water, and was made strong for the task that confronted him. He resisted Satan's temptations. People today may also find the way to richer spiritual experiences and power to meet the temptations of the adversary.

The Prophet Jeremiah tells of the first evil: “They have rejected me, the fountain of living water.” Faith in Jesus Christ involves a belief in him and an acceptance of his entire program. People who profess faith in Jesus often say that some points of doctrine, some ordinances he established, the form of church organization he set up, and church attendance or even membership in his church are not essential. This is a common way for men to reject Jesus. This is much like an amateur telling an expert structural engineer that the specifications given in his blueprints are not essential. If the specifications are not followed, the structure probably will not fulfill its purpose but will be as a house built upon sand. Jesus' specifications call for a solid foundation, such as "hear these sayings of mine and do them."

A second way Jesus is rejected is by men's failure to do the things they profess to believe and know they should do.

A third way he is rejected is when those who profess faith in him fail to become acquainted with the blueprint he has given to govern their faith and practice. This lack of acquaintance is indicated in an article "Sunday Schools Don't Teach," which appeared in the December Atlantic Monthly. It was written by Hampton M. Jarrell, Professor of English at Winthrop College. Professor Jarrell asked the young women in one of his classes what they knew about ten Bible characters. All these students were American Protestants with average Sunday school and church training, yet most of their comments were vague, confused, or wrong. Seeking an explanation for this condition, he examined the church school material of his own denomination and commented: "The very foundation of our ethical and religious thinking as it evolved through the Old and New Testaments was virtually ignored." Is not Christ rejected by failure to become acquainted with him and his message? Further indication of this appears in a Reader's Digest article, July, 1950, which refers to "The Perfect Blueprint for Happiness."

The author, T. E. Murphy, calls Jesus' Sermon on the Mount the Magna Carta of the Christian Faith. He says: "Not one out of seventy persons questioned—most of them churchgoers—could quote a line of it . . . now I am sure comparatively few people have any clear memory of either the words or their meaning." Is it not a rejection of Jesus when people fail to acquaint themselves with the deepest truths Jesus taught?

THE NEED FOR KNOWING is basic to doing. This is illustrated by another story. Roger, a high school student, seriously injured his hip, and the doctors said he would never be able to participate in sports again. One doctor, however, told him he thought he could be helped if he would have faith enough in him to do exactly as he was directed. To this Roger agreed and did do just what the doctor told him to do. When the doctor told him he could put the weight of five pounds on his injured hip as he took a step, he did just that, by using a scale to measure this weight, then ten pounds, then more. He did just what he was instructed to do—no more, no less. The result was restoration to a normal condition, much to the astonishment of many in the medical profession. The attending physician said, "Roger deserves more of the credit for his recovery than I do, because he co-operated perfectly with me. Together we accomplished the impossible." How could Roger have shown faith in his doctor if he had not familiarized himself with his doctor's instruction? Neither can people who are not familiar with his total program have effective faith in Jesus. How many really study to show themselves approved unto God, workmen that need not be ashamed? How many are guilty of rejecting Christ, the fountain of living water, through lack of understanding the basic requirements of Christian faith and conduct?

THE TRUTH OF JESUS and the truth about Jesus are vital to true worship. The truth of Jesus was best expressed by Peter, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The truth about Jesus is the record of what he said and did during his earthly ministry. What he said or taught was his witnessing to the truth, his specification for the attainment of salvation. His blueprints—acceptable worship—must be in spirit and in truth, or according to the truth specified in the blueprints. To do more or less than this is to fail in acceptable worship and is one way of rejecting Jesus by lack of faith in what he taught. "To this end was I born and for this cause came I into the world, that I might bear witness to the truth."

Who has the right to say that this part of what Jesus bore witness to is essential to salvation, and that part is not essential? "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." Can we truly believe in Jesus and reject any part of his teaching? We reject him when we reject any part of his message, any part of the truth that he taught.

The cistern diggers in Van Dyke's story were interested in their work from a commercial standpoint; therefore they sought to prove the merits of their activities in providing a good supply of water as compared with those who visited the source in an effort to keep an abundant flow of water. Visiting the source was an act of faith, and digging the irrigating ditches and laying the pipe lines was the work necessary to make effective use of the gift of water from the source. Thus faith and works together accomplished the needed task.

THERE ARE BROKEN CISTERNS which we may be digging for ourselves. Tradition may be one form of cistern that holds no water. Jesus said to some devout people of his day, "Full well ye reject the counsel of God that ye may keep your own traditions." The woman of Samaria had some traditions; "our fathers worshiped in this mountain," therefore she concluded that was the only place where God could be worshiped. Traditions may be right or wrong, thus there is the need of going to the source to check on them. Man's opinion and doctrine may be another broken cistern. Jesus said to a religious group of his time, "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men." Unless tradition and doctrine are in accord with the truth, they become broken cisterns.

Man-made creeds are broken cisterns. A review of the creeds men have developed and once thought so important but now have abandoned because they proved false is another illustration of broken cisterns.

Freedom to worship and do as we please may be another cistern of our own digging. The right to worship as we please, to do as we please—how often are we reminded of this freedom? It is true that we are free to choose what we will believe, though even this freedom is limited by how it may interfere with the freedom of others. How long are we free to believe and do as we like? Only until we have made a decision. When we decide that we will accept Jesus Christ as our Savior, as the way, the truth, and the life, and his gospel as the power of God unto salvation, then we are no longer free to believe or to do as we like. Our decision to accept Christ places upon us the obligation of believing what he taught and bringing our conduct and behavior within the framework of his teaching. We must follow the specification given by the master builder, Jesus Christ. Any ordinance established by Jesus, any doctrine taught by him, any institution he has set up, we must believe in and accept as part of his plan of salvation.

WE NEED TO STOP DIGGING the freedom-to-do-as-we-like cistern. It holds no living water. This point of view may be called narrow, and many put great emphasis on being broad-minded and applaud the broad-minded person as a good Christian.

Is broad-mindedness another broken cistern? How broad-minded can a Christian be? There is a broad-mindedness that grants to all others the right to their convictions up to the point where unsound convictions made operative may endanger the life, limb, security, happiness, or morals of others. Such broad-mindedness may be expressed in the language of the philosopher who said, "I may disagree with what you say, but I will defend with my life your right to say it." With this we can agree. But when the broad-mindedness means approval of or even tolerance of the faith and convictions of others regardless of how false or how dangerous to society, that kind of broad-mindedness is decidedly un-Christian. Let us look to the source. What was the teaching of Jesus on this point?—"Wide the gate and broad the way that leadeth to destruction"; "straight the gate and narrow the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." Christians are limited by the teachings of Jesus. They cannot let their broad-mindedness take in just anything. "Call me anything but broad-minded," says a writer in the January Reader's Digest. As we get too broad-minded we lose the strong convictions we have, and without strong convictions we cannot build the kingdom of God or assist in establishing his righteousness in the earth.

I WONDER WHAT JESUS WOULD SAY to us regarding our attitude toward other religions? Would he agree that it doesn't matter to what church we belong? Would he approve of our building a Jewish altar in a Christian temple of worship? The four chaplains who gave their life jackets to four soldiers and went down with their ship in the last war did a noble thing manifesting the great love they had for their fellow men. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." But can a man find salvation at the Jewish altar? If he can, then Jesus need not have come. Jesus taught, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." Paul understood this when he said, "Neither is there salvation in any other for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Was Jesus or Paul broad-minded? Did Jesus and Paul believe they had a "corner on the truth"? I think they did. "If ye continue in my Word, then are ye my disciples indeed and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Let us stop digging broad-mindedness cisterns; let us return to the source and draw our convictions from Jesus who said, "I am the way, the truth and the light." If we believe in Jesus and in what he taught, we shall feel that we do have a corner on truth. Jesus said, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." I think a disciple of Jesus may rightly feel he has a corner on truth; otherwise what is the advantage of having faith in Jesus as a witness to the truth?

We often hear the expression, "It doesn't matter what you believe so long as you are sincere." This is one of the great heresies of our day. What we believe regulates our conscience; our conscience determines our conduct; and our conduct fixes our destiny. Let's not dig this cistern either. Let us go back to the Source; let the teachings of Jesus fix our conscience and determine our convictions. We shall find that what we believe is very important. Let us resolve that we will take the program of Jesus seriously and make its realization the chief concern of our lives.

The patters of rain are the footsteps of tears.

We may like our friends to say what they think, but we often dislike them to think what they say.

A Tour Through the Social Service Center

310 North Liberty Street, Independence, Missouri

By Leonard J. Lea

AS A VISITOR first approaches the Social Service Center at 310 North Liberty Street, Independence, he sees large display windows opening into the principal salesrooms of the building, offering a wide variety of reconditioned wearing apparel and household items at prices that families on limited budgets can afford to pay. Garments for the entire family, from the youngest and tiniest member to the mother and father, can be obtained—sturdy and attractive things that will give long wear and good satisfaction. Many pieces of essential household furniture and equipment can also be obtained there.

Inside the entrance, visitors are generally greeted by Pauline Murphy, who serves the Center as receptionist and accountant. On Tuesdays, when the larger crowds are present, volunteer workers assist.

Multi-Purpose Room. Chapel, dining room, pricing, and special jobs are accommodated in this large room in the northwestern part of the main floor.

UP THE STAIRS we go, and turn left into the main offices where we meet Norman Hield, manager of the entire plant. We have arrived early Monday morning, it is raining outside, and the pressure of the day's responsibility has not yet been fully applied. Brother Hield has time to show us about the plant.

"This is a church institution," he explains. "It is owned and operated by the church as a service to the people of the church and of the city. It is not operated primarily for profit, although it is self-sustaining. In time it is expected to pay back the original investment, though that was not the purpose for establishing it. It is operated under the Presiding Bishopric of the church, under the immediate supervision of Bishop Harold W. Cackler of Independence. I work under his supervision."

The salesrooms are not the largest areas in the Center. Brother Hield takes us downstairs to the main floor, and we go to the rear to visit the big production areas.

Down below this floor is the basement where the Center's truck can drive in out of the weather with its loads of materials donated by church members and citizens of Independence.

"There has been a wonderful response to our call for the donation of materials. Church members and citizens alike have been remarkably generous. Many of the things they give us are in good condition, or can be easily prepared for use by our workers for those who need them." We look at great stacks of material waiting to be sorted, processed, prepared, and classified before they can be taken upstairs. The amount of work to be done is amazing.

"You can see that the supply of materials is not one of our problems," Brother Hield observes. "Our problem is to find enough qualified help to get the work done. It is not as easy to obtain and organize volunteer personnel as it is paid employees, but most of our work must be done by volunteers. In a service institution, run on a nonprofit basis as this is, it cannot be otherwise."

A small new structure houses a steam plant for heating water for the laundry and providing steam for the dry-cleaning plant. . . . It is here in the basement that the Center has one of its principal needs of help.

In this area, large quantities of scrap metal, cloth, paper, and materials that cannot be reclaimed are sold to be converted into industrial supplies.

BACK UP THE STAIRS to the main floor we go to visit the areas where most of the women volunteers are to be found at work on Tuesdays. Then there will be an average of 150 persons present and helping in the various departments.

"When we moved here from the Campus [where the Campus Shop carried on the same work for some years] we thought that it would take five years to fill up this large building. We have been amazed to see it fill up in about a year," explains Brother Hield, opening the door of large cabinets and closets where stacks of winter clothing, cleaned, repaired, and ready for fall sale are waiting.

We followed the hall until we came to the long open corridor beside the workrooms on the south side of the building.

"This is a quilting sewing machine," Brother Hield informed me. "It is much faster than the old hand method. Of course, beautiful work is done by hand; but it takes many people, and younger women do not learn this art so readily as their mothers and grandmothers did. In the future there may not be many who know how. Besides, the handwork is very tiring on eyes, hands, and backs. . . . Now here is how the machine works. It is rolled on those two long, revolving poles, which are suspended from above on trolleys. Thus any part of the quilt can be brought under the sewing machine, and the position of the work can be rather freely changed. The machine gives us good quantity production."

Then we passed the many tables where the fine handwork is still done by skilled workers.

In the sewing department nearly all of the machines (many originally were operated by foot power on a treadle) have been converted to electric power. They are so much easier and faster to operate and get greater production. The machines and workers' tables occupy wide areas.

The next department contains a rather complicated machine—it looks as if it could play havoc with fingers unless they are kept in the right places—which makes buttonholes. Those who have tried to fix a buttonhole by hand know how much better it is to leave it to a machine.

We round the corner as the aisle turns northward and look over the rail at another impressive piece of equipment—the hemstitching machine. Some worker left a nice piece of material on it partly finished, as she departed for her home tasks the last work day.

In the neighboring department we see where the millinery work is done. Here we find a blocker, a steaming iron, and Upholstering Class. Volunteers learn how to rebuild and recover old furniture for new attractiveness and usefulness.

Hats! A trained milliner teaches how to remodel and decorate pretty chapeaus for "Woman's crowning glory."

many things understood only by women. Under a professional leader, women recondition hats for one of the salesrooms. A woman's confidence and good feeling depend so much upon the quality of her chapeau. Even when she hasn't much to spend, the hat is very important.

THE NEW KITCHEN at the northwest corner of the main floor is now under construction. This will be used to serve meals to the many workers serving in the various departments. As we enter we see a table for the used dishes, a scraping place for removal of uneaten food, a prerinsing unit, a modern Hobart dishwasher, a drying and stacking counter, and a hotel stove with twelve gas plates. A canopy and exhaust will be installed over the stove. There are built-in cupboards that hold many dishes, a big steam table, a dessert table, and a water and beverage service.

It would be hard to name the next room on the north side of the building. Its tables will serve the needs of those who will eat there. The racks along the wall hold garments waiting for the pricing committee to set the prices before they go to the salesroom. The seats in the center accommodate the 150 workers who assemble here for chapel service on Tuesday morning. At the east end of the room is the piano and the platform for those in charge of the worship service.

The chapel service serves a number of purposes. The workers meet for prayer and worship and to hear a short talk by some visiting minister. Brother Hield is always present to give financial and statistical report of achievements. Sister Russell Rowland, who directed the Campus Shop so many years (and directed it before that when it was in the Auditorium and in Bartholomew Hall) is still with the organization giving encouragement and inspiration to the workers. Her zeal and enthusiasm are infectious, and the visitor sees that the workers get a real lift out of her words and good will.

Gifts of needlework and handcraft that have come in the mail or have been produced locally are presented for all to see and admire. It is clear that this part of the program is a morale builder for the many good women who have come to help in the work. Many of the gifts are exquisitely made—beautiful lace, crochet and embroidery work are presented. There are useful things made from reclaimed materials, and dolls for children who might not otherwise have any.

The bedding and household furnishings department reveals fine mattresses with new ticking, filled with materials that have been cleansed, sterilized, and fluffed by a commercial firm in the city. Where necessary, new innersprings are installed. Beds, tables, stoves, chairs, davenport, day beds, and pictures are in this department. When it is realized that new cotton costs thirty-five cents a pound, the importance of reconditioning used materials is apparent.

Hobby Department. Ladies make these beautiful dolls at low prices, so that little girls who could not afford them otherwise may have them.

IN THE SALESROOMS Brother Field tells us, "Our method depends upon self-service. The customer takes his leisure to make selections. There is no pressure or effort to sell. We just try to make it easy and pleasant for people to buy. They are welcome to look, and it is all right if they depart without buying if they do not find what they want.

"Our sales average about $125 a day," he continues. "The week ending May 26 brought us sales of $890. There has been a splendid response from the buying public, as well as from those who donate materials."

Naturally, there are expenses to meet in so large an institution, and the modest profits are used for this purpose. Heat and light are substantial items in the budget. There is a paid staff of twelve persons. The custodian man lives in an apartment on the upper floor.

The Center has its educational aspects too, and these seem bound to develop. There is a class in upholstering and furniture finishing and repair. As they learn, these people put used furniture into salable condition.

The largest attendance is on Tuesday as that has been the main meeting day for many years. Many of the women are responsible homemakers, and they donate their work on this day to the good cause. Tuesday attendance brings out about 150 persons. Friday is now building up as a second day for service, and there are often as many as fifty present. All who come stay for the day and work. Brother George Bullard has been coming every day and donating his services for a considerable time. He has arranged the bargain basement where hundreds of items are disposed of at economy prices.

In the future, it is expected that the kitchen will can a large amount of foods for the use of workers and for sale to customers.

It would not be possible to describe in one article all the activities and services of this growing and expanding institution. No one can predict now what it might become in the future. All we know is that those in charge face the future, waiting to see how it may grow and ready to respond to new needs as they appear. Their policy is to keep flexible and ready to adapt the work to the requirements.

A Triangular Illustration

By Charles J. Hunt

SEVERAL YEARS AGO I held a series of meetings in Mallard, Iowa. At the home of Branch President Joseph Fish, where I was staying, a young man who had spent four years in a Protestant Theological college called. He was an agent for Bibles; profits from sales were to assist in defraying expenses of his fifth and graduating year. Our conversation soon led to religious questions.

While talking, I drew and exhibited an isosceles triangle on a writing tablet, quoting the words of Jesus (Luke 17: 26): "And as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man"—referring to his second personal coming. I asked my friend if, in his study classes, the words of the Savior I quoted were ever used; and if so to what extent. His reply was, "We discussed the verse, concluding that in Noah's time the people suffered great wickedness. They also had righteousness preached, but with little success." To his statement I agreed, saying, "That is the belief of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints which I represent."

At the lower left point of the triangle I wrote "extreme wickedness"; at the opposite point, "righteousness preached." Still holding the writing tablet before him, I designated the third and upper point. He asked, "What application, if any, can be made to the third point as pertains to the Bible verse quoted?"

My answer was, "Extreme wickedness, and righteousness preached (points 1 and 2) have been mutually agreed upon in Noah's and our day, leaving the top point (3) to be considered." Then I wrote as the third sign in Noah's and our day, "God's appointed prophet," adding that our acquaintance would be either closer or more widely separated on church beliefs when we considered the great importance to the world of the third sign of living prophets today.

Thus, I reassured him that the Reorganized Church fully qualifies in every and all Christian requirements, including the third positive sign of living, active prophets now. My friend stated that his church did not have nor believe in having that third sign or office of prophet in this age. However, I tried to make plain that in order to fulfill Christ's requirements now, and be organically as it was in Noah's day, God's church must have living prophets to preside and receive divine revelations until the earth is cleansed by fire and the promised millennium is a reality, being personally presided over by the Master. This is a glorious event to contemplate.

A Lady Pharisee

By Jennie Z. Elliott

WHEN I WAS A LITTLE GIRL I had a Sunday school teacher who must have been a lady Pharisee. Like the Pharisees of old, she was so busy remembering the Sabbath day, to keep it holy, she had no time for remembering to love her neighbors. Those were the "good old days" when people who had cows sold milk to those who didn't. And, since Mrs. Pharisee was cow-wealthy, she sold milk to her cow-poor neighbors. But not on Sunday! Oh, no! That would be breaking the Sabbath. So, unless they had ways of keeping the milk cool, Mrs. Pharisee's customers observed milkless Sundays, which wasn't such a hardship as long as things went all right. But they didn't. When the Clemens' baby got sick, Mrs. Pharisee wouldn't break the Sabbath, not even the least little bit, long enough to sell milk for a sick baby. It never once occurred to her to give the baby the milk. With all her piety, Mrs. Pharisee was just about the stingiest woman in town.

This little incident out of my childhood bears out the fact that usually the self-righteous people aren't the Christlike people.

How "Young Joseph" Came to Amboy

of Edmund C. Briggs of the Council of Twelve

Part Nine: A President and Prophet for the Church

JOSEPH SMITH
AT THE
GENERAL CONFERENCE
AMBOY, ILLINOIS

April 6, 1860: It is ever a memorable day in the cycle of days when God commands a work to be done! We accompanied Joseph and his mother to the Conference. He was cheerful and easy in his manner, unassuming without the least expression of affectation; reserved and yet not distant in his way. He greeted us with, "Good morning," as he and his mother took seats in the carriage. On the way to the hall he asked, "What do you think in relation to new revelations?" I replied, "We believe the general law of God is given to the church as recorded in the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Book of Doctrine and Covenants; but as has been in the ages past, so it will be in the future, as circumstances and new events demand there will be new revelations from God, but always in harmony with what has been given, and never conflicting with the law of God already given." He then said, "I wish the conference to organize and conduct its business this forenoon just the same as if I were not there." As I led the way into the hall I gave them seats and then informed Elder Z. H. Gurley of Joseph's request. The Conference was organized in the usual manner with Elder Gurley being chosen president; Elder William Marks, assistant; Elders Andrew G. Jackson and Isaac Sheen, clerks.

After invocation by one of the elders, President Gurley in an eloquent and impassioned address took a retrospective view of the great latter-day work. . . . He called on Elder Samuel Powers of the Twelve, who addressed the Saints upon the general principles of the gospel of Christ. . . . He has such a breadth of thought, and is such a sacred historian and biblical scholar, it is an intellectual feast to hear his oratory. . . . I followed upon the same subject.

The Saints were in the best of spirits and hope, and at the adjournment Brother Joseph and his mother were introduced to many of the Saints.

At half past one Conference convened, and after the singing Elder Archibald

Wilsey offered invocation and President Gurley made a few remarks and invited those who wished to unite with the church. Horace Bartlett, Frederick Squires, and Joseph Robinson arose to their feet and expressed their faith in Christ and desired to unite with the Reorganization; they were received by unanimous vote.

Brother Joseph Smith then came forth and was introduced by the president in the following words, "I am pleased to introduce to you, my brethren, Joseph Smith, the son of the Choice Seer." He then made an address after which a motion was made that he be received and chosen to the office of president of the high priesthood. The vote was unanimous, and he was ordained under the hands of Elders Z. H. Gurley, Samuel Powers, and W. W. Blair of the Twelve, and William Marks and George Morey of the high priesthood. The quiet, peaceful Spirit of God brooded over the entire audience when the solemn ordination took place, and the Saints were happy and comforted in the faith. I could realize that as his father had been ordained at Amherst, Ohio, on the twenty-fifth of January, 1832, to the office of president of the high priesthood, so now he had been ordained at Amboy, Illinois, on the sixth day of April, 1860, in harmony with the precedent in his father's case, and the law of God, which says "Every president of the high priesthood (or presiding elder) is to be ordained by the direction of a high council, or General Conference."

SH 50:622-623. July 8, 1903.

THE FIRST ADDRESS OF
JOSEPH SMITH III
TO THE GENERAL CONFERENCE
APRIL 6, 1860

I would say to you, brethren, (as I hope you may be, and in faith I trust you are,) as a people that God has promised his blessings upon, I came not here of myself, but by the influence of the Spirit. For some time past I have received manifestations pointing to the position which I am about to assume.

I wish to say that I have come here not to be dictated by any men or set of men. I have come in obedience to a power not my own, and shall be dictated by the power that sent me.

God works by means best known to himself, and I feel that for some time past he has been pointing out a work for me to do.

For two or three years past deputations have been waiting on me, urging me to assume the responsibilities of the leadership of the church, but I have answered each and every one of them that I did not wish to trifle with the faith of the people.

I do not propose to assume this position in order to amass wealth out of it, neither have I sought it as a profit.

I know opinions are various in relation to these matters. I have conversed with those who told me they would not hesitate one moment in assuming the high and powerful position as the leader of this people. But I have been well aware of the motives which might be ascribed to me—motives of various kinds, at the foundation of all of which is selfishness, should I come forth to stand in the place where my father stood.

I have believed that should I come without the guarantee of the people, I should be received in blindness and would be liable to be accused of false motives. Neither would I come to you without receiving favor from my Heavenly Father.

I have endeavored, as far as possible, to keep myself unbiased. I have never conversed with J. J. Strang, for in those days I was but a boy, and in fact am now but a boy. I had not acquired a sufficient knowledge of men to be capable of leading myself, setting aside the leading of others.

There is but one principle taught by the leaders of any faction of this people that I hold in utter abhorrence. That is a principle taught by Brigham Young and those believing in him. I have been told that my father taught such doctrines. I have never believed it and never can believe it. If such things were done, then I believe they never were done by divine authority. I believe my father was a good man, and a good man never could have promulgated such doctrines.

I believe in the doctrines of honesty and truth. The Bible contains such doctrines, and so does the Book of Mormon and the Book of Covenants, which are auxiliaries to the Bible.

I have my peculiar notions in regard to revelations, but am happy to say that they accord with those I am to associate with, at least those of them with whom I have conversed. I am not very conversant with those books [pointing to a volume before him], not so conversant as I should be and will be. The time has been when the thought that I should assume the leadership of this people was so repulsive to me that it seemed as if the thing could never be possible.

The change in my feelings came slowly, and I did not suffer myself to be influenced by any extraneous circumstances, and have never read the numerous works sent me which had a bearing on this subject, for fear they might entice me into wrongdoing. It is my determination to do right and let heaven take care of the result. Thus I come to you free from any taint of sectarianism, taints from thoughts of the varied minds I have come in contact with; and thus the hope to be able to build up my own reputation as a man.

It has been said that a Mormon elder, though but a stripling, possessed a power unequalled by almost any other preacher. This arises from a depth of feeling, and the earnestness with which they believe the doctrines they teach; and it is this feeling that I do not wish to trifle with.

I know that Brigham Young is considered a man of talent, by some a bold and fortunate man, and by others an unscrupulous and bad man, according as circumstances differ.

Should you take me as a leader, I propose that all should be dealt with in mercy, open as to Gentile or Jew, but I ask not to be received except as by the ordinances of the church.

Some, who had ought to know the proprieties of the church, have told me that no certain form was necessary in order for me to assume the leadership—that the position came by right of lineage, yet I know that if I attempted to lead as a prophet by these considerations, and not by a call from heaven, men would not be led to believe who do not believe now. And so I have not come of my own dictation to this sacred office.

I believe that we owe duties to our country and to society, and are amenable to the laws of the land, and have always considered it my duty to act upon this principle; and I do say that among the people where I live I have as many good and true friends as I could desire among those of any society.

The people of Hancock County have been strongly anti-Mormon, and there I know of no enemies. I have been engaged in business with anti-Mormons, I have mingled with them, and have not only been obliged not to make any remarks which might give offense, but also to smother my own feelings, if I had any. I hold no enmity to any man living who has fought this doctrine, nor do I know any who have enmity towards me. I hope there are none.

In conclusion, I will come to you if you will receive me, give my ability, and the influence which my name may bring, together with what little power I possess; and I trust by your prayers and faith to be sustained. I pledge myself to promulgate no doctrine that shall not be approved by you, or the code of good morals.

I have my own short-comings, but I trust as a leader I shall do nothing to lead astray. If I do so, I shall expect condemnation, for I am satisfied that this people, governed by the same policy, would serve me worse than they have Brigham Young before, for I would be wholly deserted.

A gentleman from Utah informs me that a majority of Brigham Young's people were restive—not satisfied with their condition—but dared say nothing. That those who preached and those who practiced his teachings were, in reality, the old fogies of the institution, the younger taking a different view of matters.

I do not care to say any more at present, but will simply add that if the same Spirit which prompts my coming, prompts also my reception, I am with you.

CONCLUSION OF THE CONFERENCE

(Adapted from report of the Amboy Times.)

At the conclusion of the address by Brother Joseph, "it was moved that he be received as a prophet—the successor of his father." This carried by a unanimous vote.

Elder Gurley then said, "Brother Joseph, I present the church to you in the name of Jesus Christ."

Brother Joseph responded: "May God grant in his infinite mercy that I may never do anything to forfeit the high trust confided in me. I pray that he may grant to us power to recall the scattered ones of Israel, and I ask your prayers."

Isaac Sheen then led in prayer.

Then followed the ordination of Joseph Smith as president of the high priesthood.

These ceremonies were earnest and impressive, and when they were completed most of the people in the congregation were in tears.

Emma Bidamon, mother of Joseph, was then proposed and united with the church.

CLOSING STATEMENT OF E. C. BRIGGS

April 7: On the convening of conference this morning I was requested by the president to offer prayer. While in supplication I had a vision and saw the words before me as I spoke them, "Let my servant Israel L. Rogers be ordained to the office of bishop in my church, for this is his calling saith the Lord your God, Amen." The Holy Spirit in power rested on the entire audience so all confidence without a doubt was given to the Saints by the gifts of the Holy Ghost.

I now feel, let the results be what they may, the reorganization of the church of God is established on the true foundation in harmony with the will of our heavenly Father, Jesus Christ being the head of the body which is his church on earth as in ancient apostolic times. The burden is now lifted from me as the especial witness crying in the wilderness of scattered latter-day Israel, the source to which to look for deliverance from the false shepherds who have sought to lead the Latter Day Saints. The church is now organized in a formidable manner, like a standard to which all who are desirous to know the truth may flock when seeking the kingdom of God, with all the elements as constituent parts of the government of God, as clearly described in the Bible and witnessed in the great things of God's law written to Ephraim and in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. I am now happy and contented in the peace of the Holy Ghost, and will by the grace of God endeavor to build up and strengthen the church of God wherever my lot may be cast among my fellow men and return to my mission with renewed hope.

SH 50: 624-625. July 8, 1903.

(Conclusion)

Secret of Greatness

A nation is made great, not by its fruitful acres, but by the men who cultivate them; not by its mines, but by the men who work in them; not by its railways, but by the men who build and run them. America was a great land when Columbus discovered it; Americans have made of it a great nation.—DR. LYMAN ABBOTT

Catholic Dogma and Action

FROM TIME TO TIME public attention is attracted to the age-old Protestant controversy with the Roman Catholic Church. If it is not a quarrel much publicized between Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and Cardinal Spellman, thrust upon the public mind by the participants themselves, it is perhaps ex cathedra a papal dogma direct from St. Peter's. The mere fact that we are classified by the ecclesiastical world as neither Protestant nor Catholic does not lessen the significance of what is fundamental in our movement, authoritative restoration of the gospel of Jesus Christ on the theory that neither Catholics nor Protestants have the truth. The result is that both Catholics and Protestants say, "How audacious!"

But on the humble theory that "a cat may look at a king," we appear to have the right, which we assert and proceed to practice, to observe what is going on around us, even that which occupies the spotlight of public attention—yes, even in the two realms denied to us by popular acclaim, both Catholic and Protestant.

In view of the deep-seated convictions and antipathies of the Protestants (which we need not necessarily share beyond the point of reason and good judgment), I often marvel at the restraint of the Protestant pulpit and press in dealing with Catholic beliefs and dogmas. There are a few notable exceptions where certain periodicals sponsored by small religious groups apparently believe that the welfare of the world depends on the absolute, complete, and final destruction of Rome and all "her satellites."

THE MORE IMPORTANT RELIGIOUS MAGAZINES sponsored by Protestant groups limit their attention to Catholic Church matters and deal, when they do speak, with major issues, and then in a dignified manner, though the weight and influence of the Christian Century has lately been thrust into the controversial arena by a discussion of the Paul Blanshard book, American Freedom and Catholic Power.

Three questions have recently been publicized which we have noted with interest, involving the Catholic Church and its policies and dogmas. With one of them we perhaps should not be at all concerned, since it is primarily a matter of Catholic belief, except for its historical and theological aspects.

The second and third are matters in which we Americans are directly involved and which it seems we are very appropriately concerned. We take them up in order.

THE FIRST is the recent papal pronouncement of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, which means that henceforth Mary, the Mother of Jesus, must be considered as having been bodily translated. The Catholic Herald says:

Even if the Protestant claims that the Scriptures are more than human documents—that they are the inspired word of God, one has a right to ask on what grounds he holds that they are thus inspired?

The Catholic position is altogether stronger and more convincing, because it depends on an internally consistent system, involving the birth of a living church, infallibly guided by the Holy Spirit, which preceded [italics theirs] the actual Scriptures whose own authenticity and inspiration are guaranteed by the Church of Christ thus infallibly guided. It is the tradition of the living infallible church which is the first and all-important guarantor—not historical documents subject to the serious historian's critical studies.

Hence when that living church proclaims the dogma of the Assumption, it is doing so with precisely the same authority, infallibility, and force which rest behind the Virgin Birth, the Ascension, and the Resurrection, as well as the Canon of the Scriptures: the authority of the Holy Spirit in the Church of Christ.

Of course all of us who deny that Peter ever received the special commission from Christ to pass such "plenary authority on to his successors in Rome" will question the right of the present wearer of the fisherman's ring to create by mere fiat such a new doctrine. The question naturally arises: Did Christ advise Peter about such a doctrine? If he did, why the delict on Peter's part to say nothing about it? If he did not, was Jesus at fault?

THE SECOND raises a question of Americanism under the Constitution of the United States, and is as follows: Is an appointment of an ambassador or envoy or a representative of this country to the Vatican lawful, or is it a violation of the letter and the spirit of our Constitution? President Roosevelt, in pursuance to war emergency powers, appointed Mr. Myron C. Taylor as an envoy to Rome. His successor, President Truman, did not remove Mr. Taylor, but soon after his own induction into office, suggested that when a treaty of peace would be entered into with certain European powers, there would be a change. In the meantime Mr. Taylor has resigned. What will Mr. Truman do? The Christian Century of January 31, 1951, says:

The Washington correspondent of Religious News Service said flatly on January 18 that "the prospect of a personal envoy to the Vatican . . . is very much alive." Speaking with the greatest assurance, this correspondent said the President has given up the idea of nominating an ambassador to the Vatican, that the department of state has recommended after a four months' study that it would be unwise at this time to name an envoy who would require Senate confirmation, but that an "influential senator" thinks a personal representative with the rank of ambassador is likely to be appointed soon. We cannot understand how it can be argued that a repetition of the Myron C. Taylor embassy is justifiable. The reasons which cause the administration to avoid presentation of the matter to the Senate ought to weigh with honest and conscientious men against the subterfuge of another "personal representative with the rank of ambassador." The protests which were registered year after year during the entire decade of the forties by nearly every Protestant church in the country were lodged against the very arrangement which it is said the President intends to renew. That arrangement, which was launched as a "temporary" expedient, lasted almost ten years. The protests were at first mild because churchmen accepted at face value President Roosevelt's assurance that it was "temporary." If it is now renewed, they will know that President Truman is no longer capable of standing against Roman Catholic pressure. They will have final proof that he is ready to undermine the integrity of the American Constitution for votes. With that knowledge, they may be counted on to use all their influence to get the Senate of the United States to challenge the President's effort to circumvent the Senate's constitutional right to approve presidential appointments of ambassadors. That would bring on the heated debate that the R.N.S. senator says would be certain to "rock the ship of state at a time when there are waves enough on the seas." Letters of protest may avert this debate.*

Thus this issue, indeed a very lively one, remains unsolved. What will President Truman's answer be?

THE THIRD has to do with the use of public funds for parochial school purposes. There is not a complete unanimity in the state courts on the question of constitutional law involved, and I will not impose on the readers of the Herald by discussing the legal issues involved.

However, a very pertinent question has been raised, and I here offer an article written from Madrid, Spain, by Sam P. Brewer. This was published in the New York Times on February 25 last and reprinted in Public Digest, with introductory comments.

While Roman Catholics in the United States are demanding public funds for the support of parochial schools in the name of democracy and freedom of religion, their actions elsewhere are in startling contrast.

Sam P. Brewer, in a special article written in Madrid and published in The New York Times of February 25, reports that three Cuban Protestants who had been working in Spain, one of them for seventeen years, have been ordered expelled from the country. Mr. Brewer reports that this action is ascribed "to pressure from Roman Catholic authorities of the Madrid Diocese. In general the civil authorities have tended to let Protestant churchmen alone except when the Catholic clergy have demanded action against them." Some interesting excerpts from the balance of the article follow:

"Proselytizing is almost certainly the accusation behind this expulsion order. A small number of Protestant clergy is tolerated in Spain but they are strictly forbidden to make any move to convert Catholics to their belief and are watched closely to make sure they do not do so.

"Freedom of worship in Spain is guaranteed by the Charter of the Spaniards, but it is by no means what would be considered full freedom in the United States. Article 6 of the Charter says the Catholic religion shall 'enjoy official protection.' It adds that nobody shall be molested for his religious beliefs but that 'ceremonies or external manifestations other than those of the Catholic religion shall not be permitted.'

"Late in 1947 there was a sudden campaign against Protestants by certain churchmen, and from September, 1947, to April, 1949, there were at least seven authenticated cases of raids with violence on Protestant churches and chapels. There have been no recent incidents.

"Protestants may not have their own schools here. Their children are required to take Catholic religious instruction. No Protestant may hold a chair in a university or be an officer in the army. He may not even be buried in the rites of his own religion without a police permit. No Protestant religious publication may be printed in Spain or imported into the country."

There can be no doubt that the policy followed by Catholics in Spain and the policy followed by Catholics in the United States are both made in Rome. They see no wrong in supporting two such opposite positions, for the end justifies the means. The parallel with Communism, while not new, is always startling. We should never close our eyes to it.

Question:

What do you mean when you say that your ministers are called by the Spirit of wisdom and revelation?

Australia

F.P.

Answer:

We are not aware of any official statement to this effect ever having been put out by the church as applying to the original call of men to the ministry, neither is such a statement found in the revelations in our Scriptures, though it is the general rule that priesthood calls should come by the Spirit of revelation.

Among the ministers who have already been called and ordained, constant changes are necessary whereby they are transferred from one office to another, from one quorum or council to another, or from one line of service to another, according to the necessities of the work. It is in relation to such changes that the revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants several times mention their being made "in the Spirit of wisdom and revelation." Such changes are usually made by the executive officers of the church, who under the law are entitled to inspirational direction in their work. It is proper and necessary that they should seek such inspiration in accordance with the divine provision to "make these selections according to the Spirit of wisdom and revelation that shall be given unto them."—120:9. Their long experience, and previous gifts of inspiration and revelation, make possible a wisdom that is more than human, and this they are to use in connection with whatever revelation of the Spirit they may receive.

Wisdom is included as one of the spiritual gifts, and the administrative work just mentioned is a fitting place for its application. Such wisdom is of God and springs from the long-continued ministrations of the Holy Spirit in his ministers. It is akin to revelation.

Question:

Why must the righteous suffer?

Kansas

A.D.T.

Answer:

Man begins life in innocence. The newborn babe knows neither right nor wrong, good nor bad. He must gain that knowledge by experience involving errors in the process. God designs for man to reach perfection, but the way is marked by mistakes, failures, and sins (even to walk is learned only with repeated falls and bruises). If these shortcomings left no ill effects, no pain, no sickness, no remorse of conscience, and no suffering of any kind, we should never learn to distinguish between good and evil and would remain without progress.

Suffering is the warning of wrong conditions and of the danger of those conditions being extended until our state of suffering becomes fixed and absolute. Broadly, suffering is the divine cry for repentance (not that all suffering is for one's own faults and sins—far from it). Much of it comes from others' wrongs, but the lesson is the same (see Luke 13: 1-3). Even Christ suffered while in the flesh for the sins of the world, and as a man he progressed, or "learned he obedience by the things which he suffered." Through these he became perfect (Hebrews 5: 8).

Lehi taught that without the opposition which sin sets up there would have been no development, no rising to perfection, but a state of passivity like being dead. He says if Adam had not fallen, he would have remained in Eden forever in the same state in which he then was. Men rise to the heights of human perfection through struggle, sacrifice, and suffering. It is the inevitable way to perfection. Herein is salvation and glory.

CHARLES FRY

Question:

What conditions must be complied with to receive the Holy Spirit?

Australia

F.P.

Answer:

"The Spirit giveth light to every man that cometh into the world; and the Spirit enlighteneth every man through the world, that hearkeneth to the voice of the Spirit, and every one that hearkeneth to the voice of the Spirit cometh unto God."—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 7. This Spirit given to all men performs a different ministry from that performed for those who are within the church; it aims to bring men to God where they may receive the greater blessings. To such as respond by obedience, the Lord has designed to give the gift of his Spirit in greater measure and for a broader purpose, which greater ministration, Jesus says, "the world can not receive." The question refers to this greater ministration.

The leading requirements for the reception and retention of this greater gift of the Holy Spirit are acceptance of Christ through belief in his teachings, faith in him, repentance from sin and dead works, humility and contrition of heart, baptism in water at the hands of a servant commissioned by him, and a willing observance of the laying on of hands by which the gift is given as promised. Prayer with determination to keep the commandments, and an "eye single to God," or a sincere motive, are also mentioned. All these require thoughtful and diligent effort to observe.

CHARLES FRY

Question:

Is conversion instantaneous, followed by immediate sanctification, or is it a process of growth?

Missouri

F.E.

Answer:

A change of mind or policy may occur quickly as in the case of Saul upon the highway, but invariably time is required to make the change complete. Even Saul spent three days under blindness in fasting and prayer before Ananias was sent to instruct him further and point him on the way to full conversion (Acts 9: 8-11). Conversion, as applying to human nature, cannot be other than gradual, though God's part may be done quickly when man is prepared for it. The whole process of conversion is the process of sanctification.

New Levels of Health in the Home

Part Two

IT IS SOMETIMES HARD to remember as far back as the days when we were "trailing laboriously all through Gaul after Julius Caesar," but if our children are at the age when they are doing that trailing now, we'd better backtrack and trek along with them if we wish to keep up with them. They travel in jeeps today and will out-distance us if we don't exercise our hearts and heads. Julius Caesar is air-borne in 1951.

In our homes, over the last generation, we have become imbued with the idea that our children are such separate entities from the parents, that we have hesitated to take a firm stand with them on anything. We do not say any more, "You do this. You must not do that," for fear we shall give them complexes or deflate their egos; consequently children's egos become so inflated that they do as they please and worse, tell us what to do. It happens everywhere, and the results are appalling in the young's disregard for other people's rights and property. They are destructive and often unmoral. We have recent evidence of this right in our own town, in our own schools. And it is the responsibility of the parents, not the schools.

We are confused in our adult thinking—which reminds me of a story my brother tells about a private in the Army who went around wearing an arm band with the letters BAIK on it. When his superior officer asked him what the letters stood for he answered, "Boy Am I Confused!" "But you don't spell confused with a K," remonstrated the officer. "That just shows how confused I am," replied the private. We cannot allow ourselves to be confused in our thinking. "Govern your house in meekness and be steadfast."

These "musts" and "must nots" will have to be practiced every day as examples, and we will have to teach them to our children and to our children's children—a biblical phrase indeed—if we are going to develop higher levels of health in the home:

- To have faith.
 - To pray for wisdom.
 - To study and seek learning.
 - To be orderly.
 - To foster love in our hearts—not hate, indifference, or superiority.
 - To be uncovetous—not try to keep up with the Joneses or foster that attitude in our children.
 - To be independent in our opinions and attitudes, but not force our ideas on others.
 - To be industrious—keep busy minding our own business.
 - To be clean in our minds.
 - To stop finding fault with other people.
 - To stop being selfish and self-conscious—always thinking about ourselves.
 - To be peaceful and peaceable. A contentious person casts a blight on himself and family and friends.
- While our friends may be tolerant and make excuses for us, and our families have to put up with us, we still make them uncomfortable and unhappy. A nervous, irritable, touchy, unself-disciplined mother can set the teeth of at least two generations on edge, and sometimes three if she lives that long and does not change.

ANY INSTITUTION is only as good as its governing board. An industry, a labor union, a school system, a college, a church, a home. No institution is any better than its board of directors. The governing board in the home is the parents.

The attitude of the father and mother toward marriage and married life affects the children. If the parents are happily married and understand each other, the children will have that ideal of marriage and home building. If, on the other hand, parents quarrel, criticize each other, and complain, the children will not be able to protect themselves from unconsciously judging all marriage by their parents' measurement.

"The obligation to establish character in our families," Spencer said, "is man's greatest need and greatest safeguard." Integrity, from childhood through old age, will establish us in life as a family in whom confidence may safely be placed.

It is our duty to instill in our children's lives the verities of good living—veracity, wisdom, dependability—and present to the Lord children familiar with these qualities. Sometimes we are like the man who has a "good" hunting dog—a retriever that so far has retrieved "four onions, one mole, one frozen rabbit, and one small boy's fur cap." What is our Master going to think of us as character-retrievers? Henry Drummond in The Greatest Thing in the World says that the spectrum of love has nine ingredients.

"The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her. She will do him good. Strength and honor are her clothing. She opens her mouth in wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household. Her children rise up and call her blessed and her husband also."

I think this text should be read at weddings.

If we love life and meet it without fear, our days will blossom. That little line from Second Timothy 1: 7, "For God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and of love and of a sound mind" is my credo, and I always add "and a cheerful and thankful heart." I say it to myself when I am afraid, or feel I cannot perform the tasks required of me, or solve the problems presented. or become disillusioned at someone's actions or words, or need to exercise my brains more than I am in the habit of doing; it always helps.

Every family has the seeds of its own integration and growth. Every individual has the seeds of his own development. It is the cultivation of these seeds that brings forth fruit.

NOW FOR THE BUDGET—that source of so much worry. I can give no specific advice in keeping a budget because my experience has been to live within what income we may have without portioning it out into Peter and Paul sections, from which poor Peter seems eternally doomed to be robbed, and Paul eternally paid. This I can say, however; I know, even though the income be very limited, we can live within it and save, if we use our heads. This of course, may involve a certain amount of wear and tear on our gray matter—and we are usually reluctant to do any more thinking than we absolutely have to for fear it will become a habit, but gray matter strengthens with use, and worry is lots harder on it than exercise.

We must give to our children, by our daily living and loving, the solid assurance that their home, with their parents in it following the example of the Son of Man, is a place of serenity and peace, a haven, a refuge economically sound on which they may rely. By our example we can inspire them to establish their own homes on the same foundation and ideals. And we must so stabilize their characters that if their home, their parents, their security is suddenly taken away from them, they will still be able to live sturdy, well-balanced lives.

This alone is wise building. Without it we could spend all our lives trying to establish a security that does not exist. Nobody is secure until he is dead—and who wants to be dead? Anyhow, we don't know how secure we will be even after we are dead, according to the Apostle Paul.

DR. CLIFFORD R. ADAMS of Pennsylvania State College Department of Psychology summarized an address by Dr. Abraham Stone, President of the American Association of Marriage Counselors, in these ten commandments:

1. Prepare for marriage. A child who has grown up in an atmosphere of love, confidence, and understanding will instinctively seek to create the same atmosphere in his own home.
2. Choose a mate wisely. Marked differences in tastes, motives, needs, moral codes, and religion must be adjusted or they will destroy the union.
3. Achieve a self-sufficient marriage. This constitutes a new family unit.
4. Cultivate your marriage. Only thus shall it flourish. Water it. Feed it.
5. Be patient. Climb one step at a time and keep your eyes on the goal. Do not allow yourself to be engulfed by unimportant things. Just say, "Is it necessary?"
6. Be a devout follower of the Golden Rule—put yourself in the other fellow's place.
7. Foster the arts of love—tenderness, affection, understanding.
8. Prepare for parenthood. Work at preparing for it, and work hard to deserve it.
9. Budget your income and prepare for your family.
10. Seek counsel from those who are wiser than you, and not only learn these principles but live by them.

THERE IS ANOTHER OBLIGATION we owe to ourselves and families, and that is our obligation to take our share of responsibility for our neighbors. We also need to keep in mind the best interests of our city, state, and country. We have a heavy responsibility as voters to put into office in our city, state, and nation people who will not gradually undermine the liberties of our democracy. Daniel Webster said, "God grants liberty only to those who love it and are always ready to guard and defend it."

If we wish to retain the right to teach our families the eternal verities, we'd better teach them, as a part of religion, the religion of being good citizens; teach them the duty, the high privilege and obligation of work for a sane life; teach them thrift—to work with their hands as well as with their heads; teach them to grow in civic wisdom and responsibility. In order to do this we must be informed parents. Someone has pointed out that "Atlas was the last person to support the world before Uncle Sam!"

As church members we have the obligation of taking steps to teach our children and ourselves that it is honorable to work for what we receive. If the welfare state becomes established in this country it will be our fault, if we continue to permit our children to believe that the world owes us a living. We are under obligation to be active in civic and community movements to encourage wholesome character-building activities conducive to good citizenship and the preservation of the American home and way of life. It is our duty and high pleasure.

ONE NOON at a Kansas City Club, the woman who presented the prayer said: "O God, from whom there is no escape." I was so startled that my head jerked up to get a good look at the lady whose God was pursuing her. When the table hostess leaned closer and asked, "You scared?" I whispered back, "No, I wasn't trying to escape." I doubt if anyone in the whole assembly was but the petitioner. But I have thought about it a number of times since. To what kind of a God do we pray? Our concept of Divinity will definitely affect the health of our homes. If our religion could so convert our families to daily striving for healthier levels of spiritual and intellectual possibilities, then prejudices, dislikes, and acid stomachs would be converted to patience, understanding, helpfulness, and good health. These are the qualities of gracious living, the mark of the aristocracy of true home builders and church members.

Webster said he was born in Massachusetts just to be near his mother. So many of us are reborn to be near our mother church and still fail to learn from her teachings. What does going to church mean to us? Our churches are still noisy, though they have improved some. Our church is not a sanctuary to many of us. We live in a very pedestrian world unless we can grow spiritual wings. Wings are formed by the intangibles of life. We miss enriching our lives by our own lack of perception. Do we fill our own and our families lives with religious vacuity? We must learn to think—to reason and teach our families to do likewise. We need to foster a feeling of reverence in our church home, the house of the Lord. The slogan of one of the western churches is "Come to church and have your faith lifted."

We should start now to build each day toward new levels of health, mental and physical poise in our homes, with these good principles:

1. Integrity.
2. Intelligence.
3. Tolerance.
4. Industry—a love of work.
5. Temperate habits, actions, work.
6. Tact and diplomacy.
7. Civic responsibilities.
8. Understanding, effective discipline of ourselves and our families.
9. Wisdom and fair-mindedness.

When these virtues are firmly established in our homes, then and then only shall it be said once more, "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined."

Approval was had by the apostle in charge and the district presidency. Bishop Adams gave a report on the matter of tithes and offerings, stating that there was an increase of approximately $7,000 for the first five months of this year over the same of last year, and sixty new filers of inventories.

The conference was largely attended, many coming long distances to be present. Every branch in the district was represented, and many young people attended.

Young People and Wednesday Night

By Gladys Omohundro

WHY DON'T YOUNG PEOPLE come to prayer meeting?" is a question frequently asked in many branches. I have discussed this with a number of young people and would like to present the following thoughts as typical of their feelings.

Prayer meeting is supposed to be the "spiritual powerhouse" of the church. It is there that we should enrich our fellowship and rededicate our lives to the church in the presence of those who have a sympathetic understanding. Prayer meeting should be a spiritual "shot in the arm" to fortify us against discouragement and temptation. Certainly if anyone needs to share in the rich experiences of a good prayer service, young people do, for the very life of tomorrow's church depends on them.

Most young people would like to attend Wednesday evening prayer services and feel the need of doing so, both for their own good and for the reciprocal benefits involving other members of the branch. However, there are a number of reasons why many young people aren't enthusiastic about attending. Maybe they are justified . . . maybe they are not.

Most young folks think progressively and don't feel inclined to participate in prayer and testimony unless they are presented with a challenge, intellectually and spiritually, and if the other prayers and testimonies are of a thought-provoking nature. If the other people taking part in the service habitually give the same testimonies in the same words week after week, it becomes discouraging to the younger members. Perhaps this isn't as it should be, but too often it is the case.

Then, too, some of the members are prone to offer advice publicly to young people during prayer service. There is no question as to whether or not such things are needed. If approached at the proper time and place, and with a reasonable amount of tact, most young people would appreciate such counsel.

YOUNG PEOPLE are usually hesitant to respond in prayer and testimony, and they resent being called upon to do so without any advance preparation. They don't like to be put on the spot. Rather, they are of the opinion that prayer and testimony should be spontaneous, and for various reasons might not feel like participating in a particular capacity.

On occasions I have seen the effectiveness, which a prayer service might have had, become almost completely ruined when one in charge has announced, "Well, we've had nearly 100 per cent participation, except for just a few. Let's move out and take advantage of the remaining time." This will kill any desire to participate, especially when there are only a few young people present who haven't taken part. If they do have a contribution to offer, they'll make it without any coaching.

At Graceland College the students do not go to prayer meeting—they go to fellowship. This may seem to be superficial, but it has more than a psychological effect. A fellowship service sounds much more appealing to young people than prayer meeting, and it has come to mean more too. Through this worship experience they learn to share their thoughts and ideals and grow together daily in Christian fellowship. We have streamlined our cars, our homes, our way of life—why not streamline our spiritual lives too? Fellowships held at youth camps, retreats, and reunions are of a high spiritual caliber and contribute much to young lives. These experiences tie them more closely to the church than any other type of ministry.

THIS PAST APRIL in Independence the city-wide Zion's Leagues sponsored a youth rally at Stone Church, primarily for the purpose of reconverting young people who have lost an interest in the church. A door-to-door visiting campaign was carried out by all of the Leagues, as well as personal preparation and individual League fellowship services. Any young person who didn't have a testimony before this rally certainly had one afterwards. The city-wide cabinet members, who had been promoting the youth rally, had a beautiful fellowship service the Sunday morning following the rally. Working together on such a project brought a splendid feeling of unity, fellowship, and a deep con-

The Stewardship of Time

THE STEWARDSHIP OF TIME is a modern problem waiting for solution.

Long after the common names of the world are forgotten, there will be remembered those who took time to share life with their fellow men.

Time is a precious element in our modern way of life, but life itself and the way it is lived is even more important. I have often wondered about the story of Zaccheus. What would have happened if Jesus had not taken time out to talk to him? As a district tax collector Zaccheus must have had little companionship with his neighbors, but Jesus took time out to talk to him, to raise him in esteem among his fellows and help him to see a more abundant life.

We little realize how great a part we play in the life of a child when we take time to listen to him as he comes in after school to tell of his day's activities or when we sit quietly by his bed at night to say prayers with him and talk over the day together.

Riding down town on the bus the other day, I was humming very quietly to myself. A sour-faced woman came in and sat next to me. I paid little attention to her as I was absorbed in my own thoughts, trying to relax before I got to a meeting I was to attend. Finally she leaned completely toward me and listened. Then I felt a little embarrassed and said, "I guess I didn't realize I had been humming." Then a smile crossed her face, and she said, "I liked it, don't let me disturb you. It was what I needed this morning," and we both laughed.

SO MUCH OF A LIFETIME is spent in the task of accumulating the goods of the world in preparation for a day when we will be old that much of each day's living can escape us. Many a life is empty at its ending because its most productive years were spent only in laying aside for a pleasant day that never came. In the process of gaining and laying away, people often forget to live.

Christ must have felt the hurry even in his day, for Palestine was a bustling countryside in the day of the Caesars, but he was aware of his mission in life, and for thirty years he took time to prepare for three years of intense leadership. The time which Jesus spent in meditation and prayer was real preparation for everyday events. It provided him the courage and stamina which he needed when he stood before Pilate unjustly accused and scourged by those who misunderstood. It gave him the confidence he needed when even his neighbors said of him, "Can anything good come out of Nazareth?"

A close friend of mine is a clever conversationalist and an able speaker on many current topics and books. I asked her how she ever had time to do so much reading. She replied that she read only a few minutes at a time, but at every odd moment she found—while eating lunch at a counter, waiting for the bus, or sitting under the dryer at the beauty parlor—no alibis, just planned timing. Don't say, "Someday when I have time, I'm going to read and study." Make all your time count now.

WE PLAY LEADING ROLES in the lives of many people we meet over the span of a lifetime. Next-door neighbors form their opinion of Latter Day Saints from our across-the-clothesline conversations with them. Children feel the importance of the church and its part in their lives in proportion to the time adults take for it. If parents are slipshod about getting to church school on time and drag into the preaching service late, can a child think that it is something important—something he must not miss? The time alibi is so easy, yet so deadly in the attitudes it forms in the minds of children.

The day we took time to clip and save some pictures for a church school lesson study wasn't missed, nor the days we spent helping the Zion's League work on a play. It may not have seemed worth-while at the time, yet what we did and said then may have played an important part in some youngster's thinking.

Jesus spent much time with his disciples, not reading long passages of Scripture to them, not just telling them how to live—he took time to live with them. He ate, slept, and fished with them; yet he, too, must often have felt the urgency of his mission and the shortness of time. They wouldn't have remembered long what he told them, but they couldn't forget the experiences they had with him. He could have told them to be patient in teaching and ministering to the crowds of people following them, but when he himself took time out to bless little children they were able not only to see but to experience the richness of a ministry of patience.

"This do in remembrance of me," was a plea for us to take time to meditate and reminisce—a time to review the past and plan ahead for the future.

We have grown up in a world pressed for time. We need time to do something—time to go somewhere. We say, "I haven't the time" or "someday when I have time"—alibis, all of them.

Mrs. W. T. Hayworth, 329 South Hickory, Nowata, Oklahoma, would like to obtain copies of the Herald for April 20, 1932.

Note of Thanks

I take this means of thanking all who sent cards and letters and all who remembered my husband in prayer. He is getting better but needs the continued prayers for the Saints.

The Chinese have an expression I have always liked, "Live today, it is later than you think" . . . not that I want it to scare me into doing, but it helps to make me aware that the time is not wasted when I sit and talk to a child or take time to tell a friend what a good job he is doing as a teacher.

Someone has said, "What progress the church could make if each of its members spent even fifteen minutes a day in prayer and study."

The wise handling of our stewardship of time is indeed one of our latter-day problems. The modern world demands more and more of our time, yet always there is time for friendly visiting, for study, and for meditation if we once catch a glimpse of what it can do to enrich our daily lives.

Young People and Wednesday Night

cern for others; this "oneness" was the dominant theme in each person's testimony.

Several young people in Independence, in order to encourage attendance at prayer services, have been meeting one Wednesday night each month at the homes of various members. A general church appointee or prominent member of the priesthood is asked to come and lead the group in a discussion on some point of doctrine or a certain phase of the church that has been set forth as being particularly interesting to young people. The topic for each meeting is announced ahead of time, so that advance preparation can be made. At the end of the meeting, those attending form a circle of fellowship, and prayers are offered by all who desire to pray. The young people look forward to these gatherings each month and always leave with something worth-while to think about. They also get ideas to take back to their group prayer meetings. This might be a good project for other Leaguers.

In many cases it is the fault of young people for not having given prayer services a fair chance. Building the kingdom of God is a fifty-fifty proposition. As the Apostle Paul admonishes in the sixth chapter of his epistle to the Ephesians, "Children, obey your parents in the Lord; for this is right. . . . And ye fathers provoke not your children to wrath. . . ." The important thing is for us to work together.

Certainly, if the message of the Restoration means something to us, we will do everything we can to make it enrich our lives. Prayer meeting can be an effective means to this end if we work constructively to make it such.

Words are free, but some have proved very costly.

Often more time is wasted in trying to erase a blot on an old page than would be spent by starting anew on a clean paper.

Each thought creates a new one
And takes it by the hand to explore the eternity of space.

P.S.

* SPRINGFIELD

It's a long ride from Independence to Springfield, and we decided it would be better to relax and let the bus driver do the work. We worked our way patiently through city traffic southward to Seventy-second Street, and out through the suburbs on U. S. 71. Above the droning of the wheels and the throb of the motor, a woman passenger's voice could be heard in an unbroken conversation that reached from Kansas City to Carthage. No bronchitis, no quinsy, no fatigue of the vocal cords deterred her from the determined accomplishment of her purpose. What a pity that one who talks so much could say such banalities!

At the Nevada (Missouri) lunch stop the friendly driver sat alongside to talk a while; a fine family man with sixteen years experience as a driver, and hoping that his eyes were not going to give him trouble. The rest of the way to Carthage an eighty-year-old man took the other half of the seat and told all about himself. A vegetarian for the past six years, his complexion is pink, his eyes clear, his strength as good as at sixty. He was interested in a religion he called the Nautilus Society.

Late that night, Brother Francis Bishop was at the bus station, and we went to his home where he, his wife, and daughter (home from Syracuse University) provided a friendly welcome.

Up Sunday morning, we found Clifford Browne in charge of a thriving church school, a number of young ordained men teaching classes, women teachers in charge of the little folk, and a good junior church.

Ladies of the Springfield church had arranged the program, under the leadership of Sister O. H. Plumb, for a special observance of "Fathers' Day." This seemed a thoughtful and kindly thing for them to do. Every man was given a flower for his lapel. Springfield, as always, provided that finest of all church hospitality, a large congregation with very few empty seats to be found. There is not a more thoughtful pastor than Brother Bishop, who spends his time seeing that everybody else is happy.

In the afternoon, the Springfield Saints were joined by many neighbors and friends in paying a last tribute to Arthur E. Starks (the older man to bear this name) a veteran volunteer missionary, pastor, and church builder of that part of the state. Brother John Dowker gave a fine inspirational sermon for the occasion. Springfield has lost a splendid leader, but young men are preparing to carry on. . . . Before evening we saw many beautiful places around the city, including the lovely country retreat the Bishops have near Lindenwood, where Sister Bishop has conducted a camp for the Girl Scouts. . . . That evening, another splendid congregation attended to sing and worship and hear a sermon on "Home," the theme for the month.

Quick good-bys were said so that we could make the bus at 9:30. Met a fine young traveling salesman who was on the way home to visit his father, and had a pleasant visit with him on both stages of the journey. . . . Dozed in the seat from Carthage on, and arrived in the quiet beauty of dawn at 4:30 in Kansas City. Said good-by to my friend, and waited a while for the Ford to come. . . . Home at last, a short nap, bath-and-a-shave, breakfast, and to work at eight!

Jeanne Scott Miller

EVERY Herald reader, in fact every member of the church, has been affected by the work of Mrs. Miller. It is a pleasure to help you get better acquainted with her. She has charge of Herald House circulation, shipping, and sales departments. Therefore every subscription comes to her department for setting up a mailing list plate as soon as the order has been processed. Every book, picture, quarterly, or other merchandise which you want is selected, packed, and sent to the post office under her supervision.

In addition to the sales work in your branches through book stewards, she has the active oversight of The Herald Bookshop on Lexington Street. She writes all the advertising and edits the two annual catalogs: Books and Church Supply Catalog. Jeanne is always busy, particularly in the spring and early summer when reunions are to be serviced with stocks for sale and the catalogs are to be prepared. Then, of course, there is the matter of home and housekeeping . . . which leads naturally to another subject.

Mrs. Richard W. Miller was born February 21, 1923, as Jeanne Scott. She says she likes to tell her age because many people think she is older than she really is. She attends Stone Church where she was baptized in 1931. She was graduated from William Chrisman High School in 1940, and from Graceland College in 1942. Since then she has taken extension work with the University of Kansas in Spanish, business management, advertising, and purchasing principles. She was married in 1946. Mr. Miller is a salesman for a Kansas City paper house. Jeanne started work with Herald House in 1942 as a secretary. She now has the title of Assistant to the Manager. Her loyalty to Herald House and to her associates is attested by her willingness to give generously of her services to the public and her co-workers. That engaging smile caught by the photographer is genuine. She knows the art of winning friends and influencing people.

Notes on Gambling

Editorial

"Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?"—Jesus (Matthew 7:16).

LET'S TRY OUT a few thoughts on the subject of gambling.

Gambling plays an important part in the current investigations of crime throughout the nation by Senator Kefauver and his committee. It appears that there is a great nationwide syndicate of crime that is linked with many prominent politicians as well as the obscure ones. Multiple millions of dollars are sunk in it every year.

Is gambling evil?

The late American poet, Edna St. Vincent Millay, wrote a clever and popular volume of verses entitled A Few Figs From Thistles. The idea was piquant and amusing.

So many Americans would like to think that figs can be gathered from thistles, that good can come out of evil, that social benefits can be gathered from gambling.

* * * * *

After all the centuries of human experience, we learn that Jesus is still right. I have looked at a million odd acres of thorns of one kind and another and never found a grape on any of them. I have seen thousands of acres of thistles, and not one of them, not even the superior Scotch kind, ever presented me with a fig. If any good Scot can prove the contrary, let's hear from him.

We have seen sunshine following the rain. The beauty of nature emerges after the destruction of the storm. Blessings have followed misfortunes. But enduring good does not grow as the fruit of planned and deliberate evil.

Of course, experience might bring up some new thing. But it hasn't appeared yet.

Gambling is evil. It takes money without giving an honest value in return. It performs no service that could not be better done in some other way.

Gambling teaches people to reap where they have not sown. It enables some to live by the toil of other men's hands, and the sweat of other men's brows. It gives luxury to a few by robbing many.

Some say that gambling robs the rich—those who can afford it. But it also takes the money of the poor that should go for food, milk, and clothing for mothers and children. It sometimes takes the rent money. It pilfers funds that belong to every legitimate need.

Gambling is evil because it undermines human character.

* * * * *

Some people say that if gambling were legalized and controlled by the government, racketeering and dishonesty would be driven out of it. Now it is revealed that in Nevada, where gambling is legal, a high state official has been corrupted and received a great income to allow abuses to flourish. Gambling is not reformed by being made legal, any more than the liquor business is.

Some people defend lotteries in other countries. All this argument must be checked. What does the whole business do to the hearts and minds of the people who buy the tickets?

In the election of November 7 four states rejected proposals to set up legal gambling. No doubt the link between a national crime syndicate and high politics, revealed by the investigations of Senator Kefauver, has caused many people to see the dark side of this business.

The gambling business itself has developed a characteristic word for its victims. It isn't a pleasant word, but nothing takes its place: "suckers."

The key figure in all the gambling business is the "sucker." Without him, there wouldn't be any gambling problem, or any gambling business. He is the gullible one who thinks he can play against the organized, immoral intelligence of the racket. He thinks he can win against the machine. He never learns—or rarely does.

Suppose that nobody patronized any gambling device for a week. The whole business would fold up and disappear. It's that simple.

Perhaps the churches and the schools can do something to expose the corruption and evil of gambling.

But suckers are a queer race. They don't read much but the racing forms. They have their own fixed, false ideas. Like boobies, they lose, and lose, and never learn. No matter how silly the form of gambling, they will always try anything, not once, but ten thousand times.

Who is primarily responsible for gambling? Not the heads of the syndicate. Not the corrupt politicians. Just the suckers, the bookies. They could stop it if they would.

What is needed, of course, is a long-term program of education in the churches, the papers, and the schools. Gambling can be choked off at the level of the gambler—the foolish public. When they snap their purses shut, walk away, and save their money, gambling will be as forgotten as the sins and follies of ancient Pompeii, buried under the ashes of Mount Vesuvius.

Official

Church History

It is a source of some satisfaction to the Presidency to be able to announce that the four-volume set of Church History will be republished and placed on sale. Volumes 1 and 2 will be ready for mailing about July 15. The other two volumes will be ready this fall. This reprinting is possible at this time only by making use of the original plates. For many years we had entertained the hope that our Histories could be revised and brought on down from 1890 (where Volume 4 ends) to comparatively recent years. It now seems best to publish a limited edition so that many new members and some who did not take advantage of purchasing the last edition may learn in greater detail than is contained in the one-volume Story of the Church.

One of our concerns in the production of these four large volumes is to hold down the price so that it would be within the range of all who need this set. In view of the doubling of the cost of materials and wages, we are pleased to learn that the set will sell for $5.00 per volume. However, advance orders (on or before September 1) will be accepted at $15.00 for the four volumes.

Members of the church have always been historically minded. In the very nature of our existence this could not be otherwise. We can well understand why there has been such a steady demand for these histories and long to see the day when they can be brought up to date. In the meantime we commend the study of these volumes to Herald readers.

Choosing Women's Department Leaders

After receipt of a letter from Sister Pauline Arnson, chairman of the General Council of Women raising certain questions, we pass along this information which will be of interest to Herald readers.

We have given careful thought to your letter concerning the time for selecting the women's department leader and feel that the method prescribed in the Women's Handbook should be adhered to. This keeps the selection under the jurisdiction of the branch president in whose hands such matters should rest. There has been in the past some disposition on the part of certain branches to elect the women's department leader at some time other than the branch business meeting. This should be discouraged and eventually discontinued altogether.

We can see a great deal of advantage in having the pastor and department leaders elected earlier in the year so that their program can be formulated, and in the case of the women's department published in a yearbook.

We see no objection to holding the branch business meetings during the summertime, possibly in June, so that those who will take over in the fall will have an opportunity to get their program under way. There still could be friction between the elected officers and those who will be retiring, but we think the good accomplished will more than offset any detrimental effect that might result.

We do not think that we are making any radical change in suggesting this. We rather think we are merely recognizing what is being done in many instances on an unofficial basis. As far as we know there is no basic law which requires branch business meetings to be held in the fall, and it seems that this has become a practice merely to make the time coincide with the beginning of the church school year.

We trust this will serve to answer some of the questions which you have raised in your recent correspondence with us and also give you a basis for the determination of future policy as far as conducting the women's work is concerned.

From a letter received from D. L. Kyser, president of the Spring River District, we excerpt the following:

I baptized six Sunday, June 10; one at Rich Hill and five at Pleasanton. I do not have the total for the district as yet, but expect to see most of the pastors at Butler Sunday and will find out then.

We are also in receipt of a letter from W. J. Breshears, president of the Gulf States District, reporting as follows:

I am happy to report that thus far we have had forty-five baptisms in the district during the month of June, reported as follows: McKenzie, eleven; Mobile, ten; Birmingham, seven; Brewton, six; Pensacola, five; Escatawpa, three; Pensacola, three. This brings the calendar year to sixty-four.

These are indicative of reports coming to us from throughout the church, showing our baptismal record to be holding up well for this year.

Springs of Truth From the Earth

By Apostle A. A. Oakman

An address delivered at the Book of Mormon
Institute, Stone Church, January 7, 1951

Truth shall spring out of the earth, and righteousness shall look down from heaven—Yea the Lord shall give that which is good and the land shall yield her increase!

Righteousness will I send down out of heaven and truth shall I send forth out of the earth, to bear testimony of mine only begotten—his resurrection from the dead—yea, and also the resurrection of all men.

And righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood to gather out mine own elect from the four quarters of the earth, unto a place which I shall prepare; that my people may gird up their loins and be looking forth for the time of my coming, for there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion, a new Jerusalem.

And I the Lord God caused a river to go out of Eden, to water the garden; and from thence it was parted into four heads. . . .

A RIVER TO GO OUT OF EDEN! A river to water the garden, which without water would be a desert like the Sahara! A great barren waste stretches across a continent; it is unproductive, even murderous. The merciless sun beats down on the barren sand. The wind—hot breath from the wilderness—parches and chokes the traveler. He looks into the distance and sees hope—the springs that he longs for have watered the ground and nourished trees to give shelter from the heat. He summons his strength and quickens his leaden steps, and sheltering his eyes with hand over forehead fixes his gaze upon the mirage. For an instant his burdens are lighter as hope springs up within him. On and on he travels, only to experience the sickening dread which comes with the realization that his sight has tricked him, and the desert has lied. He stumbles and falls, exhausted. He sobs out a prayer for deliverance. Mercifully his senses leave him, and the quiet sand covers his frame.

Where is this traveler? Perhaps in ancient Babylon, Persia, Greece, or Rome. Such men have traversed the sands of time looking for the "river, the streams whereof shall make glad." They died in the wilderness and are seen no more. The powers of heaven beat upon their barren souls and created the mirage of tranquillity and peace, with every thirst slaked, and they fought and killed in turn out there in the desert.

We have come after them and found their remains. But they cannot tell us that the sights we see in our time are deceptive. They cannot speak of their dreams in such a manner as to persuade us to abandon our fruitless chase. But occasionally we realize that we too are in a wilderness. We too traverse the desert. We too are feverish. We too see the illusions they saw and spend our strength for naught. The German people, deluded as no other people anciently were deluded, gathered their strength, hastened their steps, tried to slay others whom they met—others who were hastening toward their delusive goals too. For fear there would not be enough water in the springs they imagined they saw, the people of Germany, of Italy also, of France, and of Spain—the people of the whole earth struggled and fought and bled and died—for peace! And now there dwells in the choice land a people mighty above all others. Blessed above all, have these men not now gathered their strength? Do not they dwell in the promised land, and have they not made of the land of promise a desert? Do they not see across the emptiness of their own lives the mirage of peace without which they know they cannot live? And is there not plainly in view another traveler—mighty in his bearing and vicious in appearance uttering unfriendly words against them?

HERE WE ARE traveling together, yet ready to destroy. For man has made of his soul a desert place in which there is no peace. He is divided within. All his dreams arise from fever. His thirst is not quenched the while he thinks he sees an oasis. His life is ebbing away from him the while he boasts of illimitable strength. Death closes around, unseen. With his eye fixed in the distances he beholds what he thinks is the Aidenn of his ideals. But ever it recedes from him as he hastens toward it. Shall he not soon drop exhausted? Shall modern man be destroyed as he wars within himself? Shall all his continents and isles be laid waste, and shall he die cursing God?

Have we not beheld the bones of Babylon, of Persia, Greece, and Rome?

Yea, we have heard of the people who perished even in the promised land—people who were led here, in whose hearts were planted the springs of living water when they came, of a people who prospered but died in the desert of their own making. Let me tell you about them. Perhaps, by God's grace, we can call upon those who are traversing the desert to redirect their steps and find the River of Life, from which they are steadily diverging. Theirs is a march that soon will turn into a stagger, and as they recede further from the source of life they will drop exhausted to die as others before them have died.

In the hidden recesses of darkest Africa, in regions unknown for generations, are the headwaters of the Nile. There are to be found the springs and inland lakes which well up from a "deep that coucheth beneath." They break through the earth, flow down over rich virgin country carrying in their bosom the nourishment which after a thousand miles of travel, changes the face of the desert and makes possible a mighty civilization. For Egypt without the Nile would be a part of the Sahara. There would have been no monuments, pyramids, or treasures from an ancient culture, no food for famishing Israel in time of need; no hope of redemption for Egypt unless the Israelites had dwelt for a season on the banks of the Nile. Egypt is the Nile which springs out of the earth—springs which pour from the deeps of the life-giving stream, springs which feed the river where a civilization is built, springs which change a desert into Paradise!

Truth shall spring out of the earth! A river shall go forth from Eden! The Eternal Deeps send out a life-giving stream which breaks forth in testimony from the lips of clay of which men are formed and flows down through the course of time to water the garden of man's barren graces. Now, instead of a dead desert, there arise monuments to God's faithfulness; signs and symbols of his life on earth; nations whose achievements, under him, tower above the mean and commonplace; so that there lies hidden in this country a mighty testimony of the grace of God, in buried cities whose glory is unimaginable. This awaits the revelation which comes in confirming power through archaeology, for archaeology is one form of revelation. And by the banks of that river, in time past as even now, are planted the trees whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

FROM WHENCE come these achievements—the testimony of Jared's brother, the fidelity of Ether, the vision of Lehi, the patient trust of Nephi, the record of Zion's power blessing and endowing a whole nation following the testimony of Jesus himself?

Such a Spirit directed the Jaredites (about twenty-four families) from the site and confusion of Babel's tower to the ocean; and they rested by the seashore awaiting further direction. Perhaps it is not possible for us to imagine the situation in which they were placed. Behind them was the wilderness, and behind the wilderness, confusion and idolatry. Around them were the mountains, rugged, perhaps impassable. Before them lay the ocean with its mystery and dread. Their hope and consolation were not in what lay behind or around. Nothing before appeared to aid them. So they looked above, and through the Brother of Jared came the light instructing them to build vessels, which were to be launched upon the bosom of the deep.

Construction went on apace, doubtless with crude instruments. Ore had to be smelted or tools made from flint. And then, when the ships were built, the colony faced the prospect, grim and foreboding, of traversing the vast ocean without the comfort of light. So the prophet went to the mountaintop with sixteen small stones in his hand and a prayer in his heart.

And it came to pass that . . . the Lord stretched forth his hand and touched the stones, one by one, with his finger; and the vail was taken from off the eyes of the brother of Jared, and he saw the finger of the Lord; and it was as the finger of a man, like unto flesh and blood; and the brother of Jared fell down before the Lord, for he was struck with fear.

And the Lord saw that the brother of Jared had fallen to the earth; and the Lord said unto him, Arise, why hast thou fallen?

And he saith unto the Lord, I saw the finger of the Lord, and I feared lest he should smite me; for I knew not that the Lord had flesh and blood.

And the Lord said unto him, Because of thy faith thou hast seen that I shall take upon me flesh and blood; and never has man come before me with such exceeding faith as thou hast; for were it not so, ye could not have seen my finger. Sawest thou more than this?

And he answered, Nay, Lord, shew thyself unto me.

And the Lord said unto him, Believest thou the words which I shall speak?

And he answered, Yea, Lord, I know that thou speakest the truth, for thou art a God of truth, and canst not lie.

And when he had said these words, behold the Lord shewed himself unto him, and said, Because thou knowest these things, ye are redeemed from the fall; therefore ye are brought back into my presence; therefore I shew myself unto you. Behold, I am he who was prepared from the foundation of the world to redeem my people. Behold, I am Jesus Christ. I am the Father and the Son. In me shall all mankind have life, and that eternally, even they who shall believe on my name; and they shall become my sons and my daughters. And never have I shewed myself unto man whom I have created, for never has man believed in me as thou hast. Seest thou that ye are created after mine own image? . . . Behold this body, which ye now behold is the body of my spirit; and man have I created after the body of my spirit; and even as I appear unto thee to be in the spirit, will I appear unto my people in the flesh.

And now, as I Moroni, said I could not make a full account of these things which are written, therefore it sufficeth me to say, that Jesus shewed himself unto this man in the spirit, even after the manner and in the likeness of the same body, even as he shewed himself unto the Nephites; and he ministered unto him even as he ministered unto the Nephites; and all this, that this man knew that he was God, because of the many great works which the Lord had shewed unto him. And because of the knowledge of this man, he could not be kept from beholding within the veil; and he saw the finger of Jesus, which, when he saw, he fell with fear; for he knew that it was the finger of the Lord; and he had faith no longer, for he knew, nothing doubting; wherefore, having this perfect knowledge of God, he could not be kept from within the veil; therefore he saw Jesus, and he did minister unto him.—Ether 1: 68-85.

In this began the spiritual history of the Jaredite nation. As Jared's brother bore record of his experience, conveying as it does the highest conception of the nature and purpose of Deity, truth sprang to light, and the people were blessed as they walked and dwelt by still waters.

THERE IS NOTHING in the Old Testament to compare with this vision, either in glory of conception or in descriptive detail. Occasional hints are given, but there is no outright revelation such as we are faced with here. Moroni explains this by pointing out that the Brother of Jared was a man of mighty faith. In the vision itself word was given to the Brother of Jared that never till then had any man come before the Lord with such great faith. All that transpired is, naturally enough, withheld. We get but a glimpse, yet the glimpse is enough to change and transform our whole conception of the eternal.

But we are impure and unworthy. We are too preoccupied in these busy days to behold and to wonder. We look, but do not see. We glance—we do not gaze. We have ambitions, but no aspirations. Our view is mostly outward. Very seldom is it upward. Consequently we come to the veil which the Brother of Jared encountered, but we do not recognize it as a veil. We view it as an impenetrable barrier and do not stretch forth our hands to part it and step reverently into his presence.

Who can contemplate this sublime account and not desire to stand on the mountaintop and "see and hear unspeakable things"? Here were the fountains of living water. Here truth sprang forth from the soul of the prophet—the soul that is the soil in which is planted the Holy Ghost.

NEW DISPENSATIONS of time for individual men and for nations are consequent upon and made possible alone by the testimony of Jesus. Every land of promise, from ancient Canaan to modern America, is a land of promise because God has purposed the emergence of a people of promise—a people, that is, in whom the testimony of Jesus elicits a promise of the divine life. This the Book of Mormon teaches positively. There is no beating about the bush, no mumbling, no apologetic or temporizing statement. Note this:

Redemption cometh in and through the holy Messiah; for he is full of grace and truth. Behold, he offereth himself a sacrifice for sin, to answer the ends of the law, unto all those who have a broken heart and a contrite spirit; and unto none else can the ends of the law be answered.

Wherefore, how great the importance to make these things known unto the inhabitants of the earth, that they may know that there is no flesh that can dwell in the presence of God, save it be through the merits, and mercy, and grace of the holy Messiah.—II Nephi 1: 71-73.

Contrast this hope in Christ with the despair in our desert of sin and selfishness.

H. G. Wells died without hope as he summed up the results of a lifetime of relentless philosophic and scientific study in the following words:

Our universe is not merely bankrupt; there remains no dividend at all; it has not simply liquidated; it is going clean out of existence, leaving not a wrack behind. The attempt to trace a pattern of any sort is absolutely futile.

To him, as to many others, there remains no destiny for the physical universe. It can be changed into light, radiation, energy, and heat. It may be resolved into primeval states and pass forgotten—as if it had never been. This kind of resolution, they say is inevitable. No other kind of resolution is possible. Thus hope dies out, and cynicism and despair take hold of men, and there is weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. This view calls for the collapse of the moral order which was sustained by a more hopeful view of former days. Man is doomed. The stars in their courses have turned against him—so say the prophets of despair. How man ends his days is therefore of no moment. Wells "would rather our species ended its story in dignity, kindness, and generosity, and not like drunken cowards in a daze or poisoned rats in a sack. But this is a matter of individual predilection for everyone to decide for himself."

This spirit is despair. It is like the hot wind of destruction in the desert. Our species is yielding up its breath in cynical disillusion.

As Dr. Joad says, "The fear of the atom bomb and of what it holds in store for our civilization takes pride of place in any estimate of prospects of the future. Let us eat, drink, and be merry for tomorrow the atom bomb falls is an understandable creed in our situation . . ."

IT IS A LONG WAY from ancient America to a city in modern America, but the rivers of life have reached even to our time. The springs still water the desert. Men and women still are healed through its ministrations.

Not so long ago I was engaged in missionary work in a Canadian city. Gathered in the home was a small company of intelligent men and women—doctors, lawyers, professors, and nurses. Question after question was asked. "Where are the plates now?" "Why were they not left as an evidence of the divinity of the Book of Mormon?" One lady protested that she was free from vicious habits; she attended church and taught the children rightly. "Why," she asked, "do I need repentance"

A WORD about our "home" at Papeete. Two blocks from the Compound is a lovely home recently built by Alexis a Turi and Dede, his wife. She is the eldest daughter of Brother and Sister John Mervin. These good people and their lovely children took up temporary domicile at the Mervin's and Bishop Siegfried and I had the "run" of this place, each with a separate bedroom where we slept and often relaxed, and where we found provisions and fruit for our sustenance.

I generally prepared the breakfast, and Brother Mark reciprocated by keeping the kitchen straight. Our other meals were generally at the Butterworth's or Breckenridge's or Mervin's.

Just before Patriarch Charles May left for Papeete, he handed me a transcript of some remarks made by me on Friday night, July 21, which somebody had sent from Tahiti, in which I said:

I know the Holy Spirit of God is in our midst. Therefore, let us awake. A work has been prepared for us, for each one of us according to the Spirit God has given us for the advancement of his church. May the blessings and peace of God abide in you.

As I recall our experiences in Tahiti, Brother Siegfried's contributions come to mind, and I deem it is due him to say that I found him to be an agreeable traveling companion, always jovial, never complaining. He took his turn when called upon, speaking and preaching with ability and dignity, and his efforts were always appreciated by the Saints. This is equally true of our experiences in Hawaii, New Zealand, and Australia.

Resuming detail, I find that on Friday, July 21, we visited various places in Papeete, including the extensive business establishment of John Mervin and brothers. In the evening the church women put on a play and varied program. Sister Mervin was in charge of the work of the women. This was quite interesting, and all who had a part threw their souls into it without self-consciousness; some of the younger ones showed marked assurance and ability.

I believe the next night was the women's bazaar. They sang many interesting songs while showing their work and displaying for sale pieces of handiwork. We attended and had our pictures taken with the women, all on the platform, among the best of many snapshots and pictures taken on the trip. This is shown in connection with this account.

On Sunday, July 23, a priesthood prayer service was held at 8:00, Sunday school at 9:00, and at 11:00 o'clock Brother Siegfried occupied effectively and convincingly showing the part already taken and now being taken in fulfillment of prophecy by the Reorganization. Brother Butterworth interpreted.

At 7:00 p.m. I preached, and again Elder Butterworth interpreted. My memo failed to indicate my subject.

THERE HAD BEEN prepared a comprehensive program for the Conference—in Tahitian of course—a copy of which enables me better to recall events. I note it began on Wednesday, July 26. To get ready for this there was a general hegira on Monday and Tuesday from Papeete to Taravao.

Taravao is the name of the country estate of Brother Mervin. Some five or six hundred acres on the southernmost tip of the island was originally developed by Zane Grey, novelist, with numerous thatched roof living and sleeping quarters, as well as dining room and kitchen facilities. The tract is a beautiful spot, overlooking a large bay; beyond it is the broad expanse of the southern Pacific.

A half mile from the cottages, further up the slope, adequate—even though temporary—quarters were prepared for the Saints, and a tabernacle of canvas large enough to hold several hundred people had been erected with platform, organ, and seats, though on occasion two or more hundred would have to stand at the sides and end. At one meeting, by count, there were over eight hundred present.

The Saints were still coming, and at several meetings we were greeted by various island groups. Songs were sung for us, and presents were left with us from each one—a procedure which was always followed and which we greatly appreciated.

Beginning at 7 o'clock each morning the hours of each day were well employed: an hour of singing, a sermon, more music, another sermon at 11:00 o'clock, meetings in afternoon, relaxation and play by the younger generation, and preaching at night.

During the week there was preaching by Taruiarii a Tauhiti (Hōrahitu), our missionary elder—now a seventy; Paia, former missionary appointee; Bishop Siegfried; myself; and our missionaries, Elders Butterworth and Breckenridge.

Regular bus service between Papeete and Tauravao was maintained with Samuel, a brother of Pateha, well-known to Independence Saints, in charge.

A general commissary and dining hall were also maintained, and while there Brother Mervin supplied the meat from his farm.

THE SAINTS WERE A HAPPY PEOPLE, enjoying the fellowship with each other and apparently happy to have us with them. They took part freely in the prayer and testimony services, and while we were at a disadvantage because we knew not their tongue (getting what was said by interpreter, who, of course, could not always give a complete statement), yet we readily sensed the presence of God's Spirit, often in much power.

The Saints of Tahiti easily excel in singing. Their congregational singing has the value of a great organ because of their perfect pitch and co-ordination. It is always harmonious and pleasing, and they love to sing. They have the happy felicity of working into their songs personal references, and often I caught the words peresedeni and epititopo, meaning president and bishop, in honor of myself and Brother Siegfried.

The Kon-Tiki incident caught their fancy. The Kon-Tiki (the raft with sails that drifted or was driven four thousand miles by prevailing winds from Peru to Raroia, to one of the Society Islands,) was first hailed by our church members. So they have a song called Kon-Tiki—a ringing song with words, of course, in Tahitian. They frequently sang it, and when we were about to leave the Saints at the dock in Papeete, at my request, they sang it for us.

On Sunday, July 30, we held the business meeting expeditiously and in harmony. At this time I presented to the Saints a message of encouragement which I was led to offer them, and which was received with serious countenances. From recent advices, I learn they are attempting to put it into effect.

A few consecrated leaders can give direction to the Saints of the Society Islands who need organization for the benefit of their economic as well as spiritual growth. This I am sure will follow.

They now have a native seventy missionary. In time they should have a native bishop and eventually a patriarch of their own number. This is in line with my leadings as well as the leadings of the late President Joseph Smith and Patriarch (and President) Alexander Hale Smith, as evidenced by letters from the latter in the Herald in 1901 and 1902 after his visit to these Islands.

THE CONFERENCE was virtually over on Tuesday, August 1, and I was taken back to the Alexis a Turi residence in Tahiti; Brother Siegfried, however, did not leave Tauravao until the second. A great number of the Saints, not being able to get transportation, remained, and services were held until Thursday, the faithful holding himene meetings, singing until, in one instance, 2 a.m., suspending then only because the power plant failed them and the lights went out.

From August 1 until August 9 we spent at Papeete, meeting frequently at the Tarona church for services. On Sunday, August 6, Communion was observed, in which we took part. For the wine, clear-as-crystal coconut water was served, which we were told had been their custom for many years.

While in Papeete we visited the graves of Metuaore, ordained a bishop by Alexander H. Smith in 1901; John Hawkins, early convert and long an elder, great grandfather of Abraham Fatuura, one of our most promising elders in Tahiti; Elder Charles Lake, who died there while on a mission; and Sister Clyde Ellis (first wife) who died while Brother Ellis was there years ago.

Until August 9, we "stood by" at Papeete, being entertained at the home of Elder and Sister Mervin, with their married daughter Dede, and daughters Joan and Phoebe, and at the homes of the Butterworths and Breckenridges.

On one of these days, September 1, by special request of a Sister Clarke, I baptized her daughter Lucie, aged eleven, and a lad of eight by the name of Raihoa. A service was arranged at the church and a fair group of the Saints was present. At my suggestion the confirmations were by Elders Horahitu and Paia, assisted by Bishop Siegfried.

FROM DAY TO DAY we hoped—unavailingly—to get air passage, not that we did not appreciate being with the Saints, but our work was finished, and we were looking forward to responsibilities at home. The Trapas line had discontinued, and

A Builder of the Reorganization

Selections from the Memoirs of William Wallace Blair of the First Presidency

Part One: Introduction to the Church

A STALWART OF ISRAEL An Introduction

President Joseph Smith, in his "Preface" to the published volume of the Memoirs of W. W. Blair, paid this tribute to his deceased friend and associate in church work:

The contents of the following pages are the reproduction in print of the daily record of many years of the ministerial labor of one of the most noble, faithful, benevolent, and self-sacrificing men to be found in the long list of those called into the field during the present occupancy of the restored gospel.

Another splendid tribute was paid to him by a distinguished servant of the church, Mark H. Forscutt:

As an apostle and a traveling minister, he was conscientiously and almost continuously employed. As such he was, perhaps, the most widely known minister of the church in America. Personally he had many friends, and by his kindness of heart and suavity of manner he made friends for the cause wherever he went, as well as for himself, and by implication, for his compeers. . . .

William Wallace Blair was born at Holly, in Oneida County, New York, on October 11, 1828. He became identified with the Reorganized Church on April 7, 1857, at a conference held at Blanchardville, Wisconsin, and on the following day was ordained a high priest. On October 7, 1858, he was ordained an apostle. On April 10, 1873, he was ordained a counselor in the First Presidency. He died on April 18, 1896.—The Editors.

First Contact With the Church—1851

During the summer and fall of 1851, residing near Amboy, Lee County, Illinois, I became interested in the doctrine of Christ taught by a body of Latter Day Saints, less than twenty in number, located in that vicinity. On the eighth day of October, after thorough conviction of the truth of that doctrine, I was baptized [October 8, 1851] by Elder William B. Smith, brother of Joseph the Seer, and confirmed by him and others; and after four days, in answer to silent, fervent prayer, was as literally baptized with the Holy Spirit as I had previously been of water. Radically changed by these experiences, my hopes, desires, and purposes were directed decidedly and deeply into religious channels closely in harmony with the religion of Christ as set forth in the New Testament. In all this new life I was happily joined by my wife and my mother the day following my own baptism. For weeks and months afterward my highest anticipations in respect to the peace and love and spiritual blessings of the gospel were more than realized. However in less than a year trials of a very distracting character came to me through the doings and teachings of leading officers in the little branch. With a determination not to fellowship nor walk in communion with ministers or members of that kind, at the closing of a morning service in the branch on Sunday, Elder Edwin Cadwell and I stated the leading features of our grievances and the stumbling blocks we had encountered; then we publicly and quietly withdrew. In this we were soon followed, in a quiet manner, by a few others.

During the four years that followed, we maintained our faith in the doctrine of Christ and in the latter-day work as set forth in the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants.

In 1854, removing from my farm near Amboy, I engaged in mercantile pursuits at East Paw Paw, twenty-five miles east of Amboy.

In the latter part of 1855 my mind began to be deeply moved in respect to matters of religion, my former experiences in the church, and my future prospects. This continued on over into 1856. At times my meditations and convictions were of such range and force as to finally lead me to resolve that, whatever others might do, it was my duty to honor God and seek to live in harmony with the light I had received of him.

I became acquainted, personally, with Elders John E. Page, John Gaylor, and William Marks, formerly members and ministers in the church in the times of Joseph the Seer. . . .

Visited by E. C. Briggs and Samuel Gurley—1856

In the latter part of November, 1856, after nightfall, two young men entered my store, and at first sight I was impressed that they were Latter Day Saint ministers, though in those times we never saw or heard of any ministers of that denomination in our vicinity, except the ones before mentioned. I perceived that they watched my movements with manifest interest, and this continuing, I at length concluded that they wished to confer with me on business matters. I therefore stepped forward and accosted them, when the younger of the two, who afterward proved to be Edmund C. Briggs, called me by name and greeted me with "Good evening." He explained who he was and introduced me to his companion, Samuel H. Gurley.

In questioning them I learned they had just come from Amboy and desired to visit with me. I at once took them to my home, and on the way there asked them what called them into that region at that time. They said that they were sent forth of God by prophecy from Zarahemla, Wisconsin, to visit the Latter Day Saints and tell them the Lord was reviving his work, and had begun the reorganization of the church in this region; that the Spirit of the Lord was teaching and guiding the Saints in a great degree; and that it had been revealed to them, at various times, in various places, and through different persons, that the time was near at hand when the Lord would call Joseph, the son of Joseph Smith the Seer, to take the lead of the church. In this they seemed very sanguine, but it all sounded to me as idle tales. However, I was glad to meet them, for in those times we seldom saw anyone who claimed to be a Latter Day Saint.

That evening we engaged, in a room by ourselves, in a spirited discussion of the matters they presented and continued until the next morning near three o'clock. It was now Sunday, and after our morning repast we again repaired to the parlor, and after fervent prayer as before, in which we all joined, we again entered on a critical discussion of the theories advocated by them. This continued until near noon, and it found us no nearer united than at the beginning. They now seemed to abandon the idea of convincing me of their theories by argument, and in order not to appear opinionated or beyond the reach of argument, I said to them if they knew their position to be correct on matters under consideration to go ahead and I might possibly learn by and by.

Brother Gurley, who had been the chief speaker hitherto, seemed reluctant to say anything further, whereupon Brother Briggs rose to his feet, took the Book of Mormon from the table, leafed it over rapidly as if seeking to find some particular passage, and then placing his hand to his mouth and trembling from head to feet, while the tears coursed down his cheeks, seemed to read these words, "I, the Lord, will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy, and I will forgive whom I will forgive." But these words are nowhere to be found in the Book of Mormon. Just as soon as he began speaking, the Holy Spirit, such as had borne witness to me of the doctrine of Christ at the beginning, seemed to fill the room and also the persons of all present with its enlightening, convincing, and heavenly power. Brother Briggs raised his right hand and broke forth with a prophecy directed to me, declaring what had been my desires and intentions, declaring also that I would soon be released from my temporal affairs, would be called to the ministry, would be made "an apostle of the Lamb of God," and would be called to preach the gospel and "thresh the Gentiles by the power of God's spirit." He said that the Lord would soon call Joseph, the son of Joseph the Seer, to be president of the church, and that the standard then erected would never fall, also that the work of the Lord would go forth in power and triumph until its final completion. He pronounced by prophecy the blessing of health upon my household, this, no doubt, referring to my wife and our little daughter, Mary Caroline, both of whom for the sixteen months preceding had been in very poor health. After this they became strong and vigorous. When Brother Briggs sat down, Brother Gurley arose and spoke with great liberty and power in the spirit of prophecy.

The manifestation of the Spirit of God on this occasion was greater, more searching and assuring than anything I had ever before witnessed.

Relating these experiences to my wife, and assuring her that the young men were indeed the servants of God (a matter she had doubted), she replied that she knew they were such, for the Lord, in answer to her secret prayer that morning, had given her witness that they were.

During the brief stay of these two inexperienced young ministers, the Lord gave abundant evidence through the Holy Spirit that they were his servants and that their mission was indeed ordained of him.

Return to Hawaii

After seventeen weeks in the hospital, Henry and I are heading toward Hawaii, our home, once again. While we are happy to be returning to our loved ones, we want to thank everyone in Independence—our friends, the doctors, the Sanitarium, and the priesthood of the church who were instrumental in Henry's progress on the road toward recovery. While he is not at present fully recovered, we are optimistic and are looking forward to a time in the not too distant future when he can return to Graceland.

Our thanks go to all who sent cards and gifts or extended good wishes to us. They will always have a warm place in our hearts.

We are happy to learn that the others who sustained injuries in the same accident are well on the road to recovery too.

We pray for God's continued blessings on us all and for the success of God's kingdom here on earth.

A Week at Reunion

Last year after reading an article in the Herald on why it is better to attend an entire reunion than to go only on week ends, my husband turned to me and asked if I could get away for a whole week. I said I could if he could be gone for that long, so we began making plans. We live on a farm and have chores to do night and morning, and during the summer there is canning to be done. Fortunately, our married daughter and her husband came to take care of the farm and the two older children. We left quite early on Sunday morning and drove about two and a half hours to the reunion grounds where we greeted old friends and made new ones. From day to day we enjoyed the services and the fellowship of other members. At first I felt concerned about the children at home, but then I became so interested in the meetings and all that goes with reunion life, that I lost my anxiety. At the end of the week, while we were driving home, I told my husband that the only words I could think of to express my feeling were, "My cup runneth over." The blessings we had received, the Saints we had learned to love, the spiritual experiences that had come to us during the reunion greatly enriched our lives.

I would urge all who plan to attend a reunion this summer to go for the full week—or whatever length of time it lasts. God is ready to pour out his blessings on those who put themselves in a condition to receive them. We are planning to take our children along this year so that they, too, can partake of the spiritual food. Then they will understand why we came back so enthused last year that we are still talking about it. Some people may feel they cannot afford to attend the full time; I say they can't afford not to.

The Serpent Symbol In America

By Harold I. Velt

IN THE SCRIPTURES we learn that all men should teach the same thing and that there should be "no divisions" among us. To assist in reaching this ideal, the Lord provided for the "stick of Joseph" to be put with the "stick of Judah" to become one in his hand (Ezekiel 37: 15-17).

According to Nephi, a distinguished ancient American prophet, the writings of Judah and the writings of Joseph would "grow together" for laying down of contentions and establishing peace" (II Nephi 2: 21).

Have the Bible and the Book of Mormon any teachings which clarify the presence of the serpent symbol in ancient America? If they have, such should be to us more "official" than any decision that could be made by any group of representative men. The two books were to be one in God's hand in bringing about harmony. We have been divinely admonished to "teach the principles" that are in the Bible and the Book of Mormon (D. and C. 42: 5).

It is noted in the articles in the Herald there is unity of viewpoint that the feathered serpent symbol of ancient America represents Quetzalcoatl, who the church believes was Jesus Christ who came in person to America after his resurrection. The question arises, Is it correct to associate in any manner this symbol with Quetzalcoatl or Jesus Christ, or should we regard it as an apostate development which had its beginning centuries after the coming of Jesus to America?

The answer is so obvious when we use the Bible and the Book of Mormon as the basis of evidence that it is hardly necessary to use the supporting evidences of archaeology and tradition.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Question: Is there anything in the Bible to associate the crucifixion of Jesus with the serpent symbol?

Answer: There is.

And the Lord said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole; and it shall come to pass that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it shall live. And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole; and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass he lived.—Numbers 21: 8-9.

Question: Could that not have had some opposite significance?

Answer: No. We have the words of Jesus:

And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up: That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life.—John 3: 14-15.

Question: Might it not merely have been the "lifting up" that was typical of Jesus' being lifted up?

Answer: In the book of Numbers we are clearly told that God commanded Moses to make a serpent and lift it up. The healing of the people was not because they saw the lifting up, but "if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived." Jesus did not say, "As Moses lifted up in the wilderness." He said "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness."

Question: Does the Book of Mormon clearly show that the ancient people of America knew of the lifting up of the serpent by Moses in the wilderness?

Answer: At least four times in the Book of Mormon we find mention of the event as something of great religious significance. (See I Nephi 5: 134-136; II Nephi 11: 38-40; Alma 16: 190-195; Helaman 3: 47-49.) The serpent symbol was therefore well known to the people of God in ancient America.

Question: Was it after the Nephites had dwindled in unbelief and departed from God that they referred to the serpent lifted up by Moses?

Answer: No. It was during the centuries preceding the coming of Jesus to America. Therefore the idea could not have had its origin in later apostate times.

Question: Does the Book of Mormon teach that the lifting up of the serpent by Moses was a "type" of the crucifixion of Christ?

Answer: Yes.

But behold, this is not all; these are not the only ones who have spoken concerning the Son of God. Behold, he was spoken of by Moses; yea, and behold a type was raised up in the wilderness, that whosoever would look upon it might live. And they did look and live.

But there were many who were so hardened they would not look; therefore they perished.

Now the reason they would not look, was because they did not believe that it would heal them.—Alma 16: 190-194.

Yea, did he not bear record, that the Son of God should come? And as he lifted up the brazen serpent in the wilderness, even so shall he be lifted up who should come.

And as many as did look upon that serpent should live, even so as many as should look upon the Son of God, with faith, having a contrite spirit, might live, even unto that life which is eternal.—Helaman 3: 47-48.

Question: But seeing that the Nephites were finally overpowered by the unbelieving Lamanites, who, according to Moroni's account, were seeking to destroy every believer in Christ, would not all traces of teachings and symbols of Jesus be lost before the later periods to which archaeological ruins belong?

Answer: The knowledge of Moses' lifting up the brazen serpent and the healing of the people who looked upon it was to be handed down from generation to generation as long as the earth should stand.

And as the Lord liveth, that brought Israel up out of the land of Egypt, and gave unto Moses power that he should heal the nations, after they had been bitten by the poisonous serpents, if they would cast their eyes unto the serpent which he did raise up before them, and also gave him power that he should smite the rock, and the water should come forth; . . . Wherefore, for this cause hath the Lord promised unto me that these things which I write, shall be kept and preserved, and handed down unto my seed, from generation unto generation that the promise may be fulfilled unto Joseph, that his seed should never perish as long as the earth should stand.—II Nephi 11: 38-40.

Question: Could it not be that the serpent symbol in America was associated with serpent worship by the ancient people?

Answer: Definitely not. In addition to the foregoing from the Bible and the Book of Mormon, there is the available confirmation of archaeology and Indian tradition that beyond all doubt the serpent symbol was associated with Quetzalcoatl, the Fair God. We would be unwise to allow prejudice against the God-given serpent symbol to blind our eyes to the teachings of the Bible and the Book of Mormon and supporting evidence of archaeology. It is a strong case of the Book of Mormon's being supported by archaeology and Indian traditions. If the serpent were not definitely associated with the person and worship of Quetzalcoatl, it would be different.

Clothing For The Soul

By Roy Weldon

The author writes: "In your editorial, 'Bigger Barns,' you raise this question—'With what kind of garments does a soul go into the presence of God?' I have long had some strong convictions on this subject. I am giving you some of my conclusions on 'Clothing for the Soul' for whatever it might be worth to you."

I BELIEVE CLOTHING for the inner man is just as important as clothing for the outer man, perhaps more so.

Before I was married I had dinner with the young lady who is now my wife. It was on a New Year's Day. While we were eating, a girl and two sailors came into the cafe and sat down. The waitress took their orders.

Presently an argument developed. The young people had apparently been drinking. The girl finally "blew her top," to use a current expression; she tossed her patience and all restraint away. She started tearing her clothes off and had to be forcibly restrained. She didn't get quite all of her material clothes off, but she certainly tore off all the clothing of her soul.

Peter talks (I Peter 3:4) about the "hidden man of the heart" (the inner man) which should be adorned with "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

Not only does the inner man have clothing (humility, charity, diligence, etc.) but these are ornaments or jewels which are "in the sight of God of great price." Patience is one of the priceless jewels of the inner man.

Concerning the second coming of Christ, Revelation 16:15 says, "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame." The secular equivalent for this Scripture is to be found in the common expression, "Keep your shirt on."

I BELIEVE that there is a superabundance of Scripture to indicate that the question of "clothing the inner man" is all-important. Briefly I cite a few:

"Awake, . . . O Zion; . . . put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem."—Isaiah 52:1.

The parable of the man who did not have on the proper wedding garments (Matthew 22:8-14).

The book of Revelation uses again and again the term, "clothed in white linen." Revelation and other Scriptures itemize "spirit" clothing.

Righteousness is white linen (Revelation 19:8, 14). See also Isaiah 61:10.

Charity is a mantle for the inner man (Doctrine and Covenants 85:38).

Humility (I Peter 5:5).

Virtue, strength, honor (Proverbs 31:10, 22-25).

THERE ARE MANY GARMENTS for the outer man. The same is true of the inner man. We are to add to our faith, virtue, and to virtue, temperance, et cetera. We can get clothing for the outer man at the local stores or mail-order houses, but clothing for the inner man comes from God without money and without price.

Fine clothing and priceless jewels for the inner man are obtainable from Jesus Christ through the gospel. When a man leaves this world to return to his Creator, the most important matter is this—Is he properly dressed to have audience with the Great King? Before having audience with King George of the British Empire careful preparation is made. The Book of Mormon tells us, "Therefore this life became a probationary state; a time to prepare to meet God."—Alma 9:41.

The more I study the Scriptures, the more I am impressed with the extreme importance of this matter of "clothing for the inner man."

The great Day of Judgment, toward which both time and eternity are rolling, will classify all men on the basis of the clothes they are wearing.

1. Celestial Glory—Those found wearing white linen whose garments have been washed in the blood of the Lamb. (Revelation 19:5-10, 14; I Nephi 3:116-119; II Cor. 5:3, 4; Doctrine and Covenants 105:13.)

2. Terrestrial Glory—Good and honorable men of the earth have clothing, but it is spotted, not altogether clean, not washed white in the gospel and blood of Christ. (Alma 3:14, 38-40; Revelation 3:3-5; Zechariah 3:3-5; Doctrine and Covenants 113:4, 5; Zephaniah 1:8).

3. Telestial Glory—Nakedness. The Book of Mormon speaks "concerning those who do not believe in Christ." Those who make no pretense of belief in higher or better things and deliberately throw away such fine clothing and jewels as temperance, honesty, virtue, patience, et cetera, will one day be ushered naked into the presence of God. The Scriptures for nakedness of the star glory souls are dramatic and conclusive. Mormon says of these nonbelievers who descend to the animal level of life: "For behold, when ye shall be brought to see your nakedness before God, and also the glory of God, and the holiness of Jesus Christ, it will kindle a flame of unquenchable fire upon you."—Mormon 4:64. See also Nahum 3:15 and John 15:22. Revelation 16:15, already quoted, says, "Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame."

Some men deceive themselves and say there is no God, and Zion is a mental mirage. They throw their garments of faith and charity and kindness and loyalty to the winds, and go all out to satisfy material ambitions for wealth, prestige and pleasure. If they don't keep their garments, in the words of Revelation 16:15, how can they escape nakedness?

Finally, I wonder if it would be sacrilegious to suggest Communion Sunday as "wash day" for the clothing of the inner man?

Peace and Progress

INTERNAL PEACE is a primary condition of missionary effectiveness. Such internal peace does not require the stifling of debate. There have been strong opinions and deep feelings when we have faced the major issues of our history, but these have not been hurtful where regard for the church has been deeper than concern for one's own way. Our greatest percentage of baptismal gains came during the vigorous years of the 1870's, 1880's, and 1890's. But differences have always been disastrous when they have not been held in mutual affection. Disputes over official status, over church buildings, over a multitude of secondary things have ruined many branches. The present wide-spread and deeply felt fraternity of the Saints is a major factor in our growing missionary power.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. The answers are the opinions and interpretations of the panel member signing them, and do not commit the Herald nor the church.

Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Question:

How do you reconcile the claim of apostasy with the statement of Jesus that the gates of hell would not prevail against the church?

Missouri

F.E.

Answer:

The claim of apostasy is a fact readily determinable by a review of the history of the Christian church and of the Reformation. We cannot here add the evidences.

The statement of Jesus regarding the gates of hell not prevailing against the church is usually interpreted as an unequivocal affirmation that regardless of conditions the church would never cease to be Christ's. There is a qualification there, that is, that the church be built upon the rock; moving from that foundation it has no promise. We note the following:

1. For Christ to set an arbitrary wall of protection around his church, making it impossible to fall, would be in violation of the divine law of free agency which applies to the church as well as to individuals.

2. It would be in violation of the general teaching of Scripture making obedience to the gospel that of consent and willing continuance. "Come unto me," and "Abide in me," is the Spirit of Christ.

3. It would be contrary to the facts of history which show a continuing tendency to fall away from Christ's standard, as did the ante-deluvian world, the people of Babel, Israel throughout its long history, the Jaredite nation, the Nephite nation, and even the latter day church.

4. Jesus expressed the qualification we mention in making a similar statement to the Nephites, "If it so be that the church is built upon my gospel," otherwise it would be "hewn down."

5. To the latter day church the Lord said, "If you shall build my church upon the foundation of my gospel and my rock, the gates of hell shall not prevail against you."—Doctrine and Covenants 16: 1.

If or whenever the church shifts to another foundation it is no longer Christ's and it must fall and be swallowed up by the gates of hell. Such was the case of the church of medieval times.

Question:

Is not the Holy Ghost received at the time we accept Christ?

Missouri

E.E.J.

Answer:

The Spirit helps all men in their effort to find the way of life and salvation, giving enlightenment when faith and belief begin and ministering in greater degree as the believer continues until he comes to Christ. But this ministration of the Spirit differs from that which is given after one has obeyed the ordinances and formally become a child of God, at which time the "gift" or baptism of the Holy Spirit is given to the recipient as an "abiding Comforter." Paul teaches that there are "diversities of gifts," "differences of administrations," and "diversities of operations;" all by the same Spirit (I Corinthians 12: 4).

The operation of the Spirit by which men become sons of God can come only after they have formally obeyed the ordinances and entered into covenant with the Lord. Of this ministration Jesus says the "world can not receive." The teaching of Scripture on this point is summed up in this quotation:

Blessed are they who shall believe on your words, and come down into the depths of humility, and be baptized in my name; for they shall be visited with fire and the Holy Ghost, and shall receive remission of their sins.—Matthew 5: 4, Inspired Version.

CHARLES FRY

Question:

How can a person speak in another tongue?

Missouri

E.E.J.

Answer:

Speaking in an unknown tongue is one of the gifts of the Spirit mentioned by Paul in I Corinthians 12: 10 and other places, and reaffirmed as a present gift in the church of latter days by the Lord in Doctrine and Covenants 46: 7 and also in Moroni 10: 11.

The gift does not come by the will of the individual, nor is it within the province of the person to choose his gift. (We don't do it in social life.) The Lord distributes his gifts according to his wisdom. Under the ministration of this gift it is the Spirit of God that gives utterance, and the person speaking may not know what he is saying. Interpretation is another gift, and the person receiving that will understand the tongue and be able to speak the interpretation. Often in practice both gifts attend the same person.

CHARLES FRY

Question:

Why do you claim to have a prophet in your church today?

Missouri

E.E.J.

Answer:

We have a prophet at the head of the church because the Lord so directed and appointed that there should be one through whom he might speak his mind and will to the church, thus preserving his eternal right to be actual and supreme Head. The Lord has said,

The duty of the president of the office of the high priesthood is to preside over the whole church, and to be like unto Moses. Behold, here is wisdom, yea, to be a seer, a revelator, a translator, and a prophet; having all the gifts of God which he bestows upon the head of the church.—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 42.

This office places no arbitrary power in the hands of the president, but he is subject to the law and usages of the church, and in case of transgression is subject to a high court the same as all other ministers. He is the legitimate channel through which revelation comes, and in all things is under divine counsel.

Springs of Truth From the Earth

and baptism?" Finally, for an answer we took up the book itself and read:

And it came to pass that he stretched forth his hand, and spake unto the people, saying, Behold I am Jesus Christ, of whom the prophets testified should come into the world: and behold I am the light and the life of the world, and I have drunk out of that bitter cup which the Father hath given me, and have glorified the Father in taking upon me the sins of the world, in the which I have suffered the will of the Father in all things, from the beginning.

And it came to pass that when Jesus had spoken these words, the whole multitude fell to the earth, for they remembered that it had been prophesied among them that Christ should shew himself unto them after his ascension into heaven.

And it came to pass that the Lord spake unto them, saying, Arise and come forth unto me, that ye may thrust your hands into my side, and also that ye may feel the prints of the nails in my hands, and in my feet, that ye may know that I am the God of Israel, and the God of the whole earth, and have been slain for the sins of the world.

And it came to pass that the multitude went forth, and thrust their hands into his side, and did feel the prints of the nails in his hands, and in his feet;

And this they did do, going forth one by one, until they had all gone forth, and did see with their eyes, and did feel with their hands, and did know of a surety, and did bear record, that it was he, of whom it was written by the prophets, should come.

And when they had all gone forth, and had witnessed for themselves, they did cry out with one accord, saying, Hosanna! Blessed be the name of the Most High God! And they did fall down at the feet of Jesus, and did worship him.—III Nephi 5: 11-17.

Here was something seen and felt. It yielded to the touch and left impressions on the nerve cells. It was a sensible experience. This certitude was placed in the reality as felt by two thousand souls. It bears record of the resurrection of the Son of God. It evidences a destiny for the physical universe.

When the minister had finished reading there was hardly a dry eye in the room, and the lady who had protested her worthiness said, "Maybe Paul is right. I feel my righteousness is as filthy rags."

Springs in the desert! A river flowing out of Eden!

Who is willing to go out into the desert places and take men by the arm and lift them up and speak to them?

"Brother come with me, repent and be baptized and look upwards. Return to the Lord your God. . . .

For 'blessed are they who seek to establish my Zion, for they shall have the gift and power of the Holy Ghost; and if they endure to the end, they shall be lifted up at the last day and shall be saved in the everlasting kingdom of the Lamb.' "

The last day! The everlasting kingdom of the Lamb! Then shall the springs no longer spring in a desert! The desert itself shall be as Eden, and again, as before, the river of God's love shall water the garden of man's heart and all creation sing a new song!

Thank God for the Book of Mormon—the truth which sprang out of the earth!

Letters

Herald Editors:

As a humble member of a church who has sought through the years to inculcate high ideals, to lift our people to greater and sublimer spiritual heights, I am amazed to note that the Mormons, who profess to represent the Latter Day faith, resort to such worldly things as dancing in an attempt to hold their young people.

The Religious News Service has recently sponsored the following news item, taken from the Des Moines (Iowa) Register of June 3, 1950.

Mormons Issue Dance Manual

A special new dance manual, prepared by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints will be released at the annual June conference of the church's mutual improvement youth organization.

Church officials explained that the new manual is in keeping with a long-range program to foster dancing among Mormons. In addition to actual dance instruction, the manual includes hints to Mormon youth leaders in regard to increasing church attendance by emphasis on dancing and youth activities.

We wonder if from now on dancing will be a part of the Mormon epitome of faith.

Wants to Correspond With Members

I am glad that I was reared in a Latter Day Saint home. It has helped me much, even though I am not living near any other members. I would like to hear from those who are in this area, and I would also appreciate receiving tracts and Heralds. I need the prayers of the Saints.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

It will not do to say that the serpent symbol in America proves that serpent worship was practiced among the ancients. Only superficial writers would say that, for "there does not exist the testimony of a single eye-witness whose statements can be regarded as authoritative to the effect that serpent worship was known in Mexico at the time of the Conquest."—"The Serpent Motive in the Ancient Art of Central America and Mexico," by George Byron Gordon, Transactions of the Department of Archaeology, Volume 1, Part 6, pages 131-133, 160.

There is abundant evidence that the feathered-serpent symbol was associated with Quetzalcoatl and not with serpent worship. (See Jesus Christ Among the Ancient Americans, In the Land of the Feathered Serpent and America's Lost Civilizations.)

The name Quetzalcoatl is composed of two words: Quetzal, the name of a very beautiful bird, and coatl, the Aztec meaning of which is serpent. Accordingly, Quetzalcoatl is translated Feathered Serpent, or Plumed Serpent.

Question: Then does not the name Quetzalcoatl itself suggest an association of the serpent symbol with the Fair God of Indian traditions?

Answer: It does. If it be said that "serpent" can have no religious significance other than the personal Devil, then Quetzalcoatl could be translated plumed devil. But who would so represent the beloved God of Mexico? For the people of Mexico looked upon him as their Creator, who was born of a virgin, ministered to their ancestors and taught the ways of righteousness.

Who is going to avoid using the name Quetzalcoatl lest a part of the name meaning serpent cause repugnance and revulsion to hearers? It is not held that the serpent symbol typifies the character of Jesus Christ, except in so far as the brazen serpent lifted up on a pole by Moses was a "type" of his crucifixion. No one should object to the serpent symbol in connection with Jesus Christ when they understand that the serpent typified not the nature of Jesus but his cruel death by crucifixion.

GOD-GIVEN SYMBOL

In using the phrase "God-given serpent symbol" we speak advisedly. It was God who typified the crucifixion of his Son by the serpent on the pole—God who commanded Moses to make the serpent of brass and to cause those who had been bitten to look upon it—and Jesus Christ who accepted its origin as divinely given.

It is inconsistent to say that the use of archaeological evidences of the serpent symbol might cause people to feel revulsion and repugnance. Such an argument carries with it the advocacy of omitting all references to the teaching of Moses, Christ, Nephi, Alma, and Helaman on the subject of the serpent symbol because feelings might be disturbed. The calling of men of God is to direct attention to, interpret, and use the teachings of the prophets of God. Neither should it be regarded as an unsettled question because some have failed to understand its significance. That has always been true of every vital subject.

SOME WOULD NOT LOOK

Regarding the healing that came to those who looked upon the serpent lifted by Moses upon God's command, we read in the Book of Mormon:

And many did look and live. But few understood the meaning of those things, and this because of the hardness of their hearts. But there were many who were so hardened that they would not look; therefore they perished. Now the reason they would not look, was because they did not believe that it would heal them.—Alma 16: 191-194. See also I Nephi 5: 134-136.

These people were probably prejudiced against the symbol. They failed to see in such a symbol any relation to their crucified Lord. They somehow did not understand the association of the powers of evil with the crucifixion of Jesus or that there would be healing power in the Crucified One. They did not sense that their Redeemer would suffer death by the power of Satan as they suffered the poisonous bite of serpents. They did not comprehend that through the conflict between Christ and Satan, and the temporary victory by Satan and the cross, would come eternal victory to Jesus and salvation to all who would look upon him.

THE CROSS AND THE SERPENT

Neither the cross nor the serpent represented the graces and virtues of Jesus, except as they indicated his willingness to suffer the worst that men and Satan could do in order that humanity might be saved. In no way did Christ resemble a cross, nor was he like a serpent. It was the association of Jesus with the cross upon which he was cruelly nailed and his meek submission to the diabolical treatment by Satan in causing him to be nailed to the cross that have perpetuated these symbols of the cross and the serpent. Apart from the resurrection, the cross would have remained an ugly and revolting symbol.

Had Moses been commanded merely to lift up a cross, there would have been represented the cruel treatment of men only, perhaps; but in the serpent and the cross or pole was foreshadowed the fact of Satan in the background of the crucifixion.

The close association of the quetzal bird, cross, and serpent on monuments of ancient America, like on the Tablet of the Cross from Palenque and on the lintel in one of the doorways in the Temple of Quetzalcoatl and Yaxchilan, is very significant. (See plates XIX, and III, Jesus Christ Among the Ancient Americans.)

The quetzal bird symbol was sacred. It stood for what was beautiful and precious. The cross was also an emblem sacred to the Indians. This fact greatly contributed to their conversion to the cross of Catholicism, for the Indians already regarded the cross as a symbol of their Fair God. It would be as proper to say that the quetzal bird and the cross were worshiped as idols as to assert the serpent symbol was an object of idolatry. They are inseparably associated.

FASTING AND PRAYER

A young missionary in Australia prayed and fasted long regarding a problem. He received answer, but not in the way he expected. A spiritual, prophetic message came to him by letter from one five hundred miles distant whom he had not seen. The message was accompanied by power never to be forgotten. Part of it said, "Be still and patient, and I will indeed answer thy prayer in mine own time." The answer did come, not direct from heaven, but through study of the Book of Mormon.

Mere opinions and theories should give way to the more substantial evidence of the Book of Mormon and the Bible. Prayer and fasting often are answered that way.

The reader would do well to place in full the texts cited from the Old and New Testaments and the Book of Mormon on one side of a line, and on the other side list what is offered in opposition to the serpent symbol possessing Christian significance, then prayerfully draw a conclusion.

so we waited for the "Waihemo" to come, Brother Butterworth having reserved passage for us some weeks before. At last, late on the fifth of August as I recall it, this freighter docked at Papeete and we hourly awaited announcement of her departure. It was agreed on Sunday that prior to taking off, the Taronā church bell would ring. So at one o'clock on the ninth notice was received, the bell called the faithful together for farewells, and the Saints grasped our hands in parting, many of them in tears. At three o'clock all went to the harbor. At five o'clock the lines were cast off, and the "Waihemo" slowly turned out into the bay, headed for New Zealand. The Saints waved until we were out of sight, some of them proceeding down shore quite a way by automobile to give us a last salute.

One of the things that will forever remain with me, and I am sure it has been the experience of all of our church men who have visited the Society Islands, is the standard greeting of the people of these islands. We had lately been in Hawaii. There the greetings and the farewells was the well-known Aloha. And wherever Honolulu and Hawaii are remembered by travelers and visitors, this greeting stands out in memory. But in the Society Islands the universal greeting is Aorna. When spoken it sounds much like "your honor," but that does not do it justice, for it means, "May you have life." Here is a prayer on the lips of all in Papeete and the Islands for everybody else they meet. We soon acquired the habit, and as we passed among the natives we greeted them with an Aorna, men and women and children, and always they would make like response evidently pleased to be greeted in their own language.

What more significant greeting could be used, and when speaking in meeting, it was always Aorna to the one addressed, then to others, as, for instance, when Brother Siegfried and I would be spoken to, first it was an Aorna to me, then to him, then to others at the pulpit, and then to the congregation, after which the speaker would proceed. In contrast what does "Hello" mean?

We were on a slow freight steamer, headed due west toward Western Samoa, Apia the harbor, where we dropped anchor on the evening of the fourteenth.

In my next account I will tell about our rather drab existence on the ship, our arrival and welcome at New Zealand, our three days there, our sea flight to Sydney, Australia, our eight days there, and the homeward flight from Australia.

"How to Help Your Child in School," by Mary and Lawrence K. Frank.
Viking Press, $2.95

PARENTS WHO OPEN THIS BOOK expecting to learn how to do Johnny's homework as he is taught to do it in school will, if they read to the last page, close the book in possession of an enlarged and enlightened understanding of the true place of parents in the education of their children.

The authors are equal to the task they set themselves. For years they have been identified with parent guidance work. Mary Frank has a degree in Early Childhood Education from New York University. Lawrence K. Frank was formerly director of the Caroline Zachry Institute of Human Development and for twenty years has studied child growth, development, and family living. In 1947 he received the Lasker Award in mental health, and at present is a member of the Inter-Professional Advisory Committee of the World Federation for Mental Health, and Chairman of the Advisory Committee, Division of World Affairs, National Committee on Mental Hygiene. And, of immense importance to the reader of this book, is the fact that the authors are parents of six children.

THE BOOK WAS WRITTEN, according to the authors' preface, "to express our faith in parents, to assert our belief that, with the knowledge and understanding now becoming available, parents can do more than ever to help their children grow up and become healthy personalities."

It is a comforting, practical, usable book. The accent is on doing. Most of us parents are not teachers, and to us educational principles and practices are a deep, dark mystery. We are inclined to sigh with relief as each child enters first grade. Now, we think, the school can look after his education. Each time we are soon disillusioned. We learn that the school cannot do the whole educational job while we sit on the sidelines and cheer—or complain. We learn that we have to get in and pitch, too.

The writers show how parents can and must help their children at home in the ways that only parents can help. No parent can read this book without increasing his respect for his job, as parent, in the education of his children. He learns that the school takes over from the home,

INTRODUCING

Grace Pennell Tousley, a descendant on her mother's side from members of the early church, was born and baptized at Galland's Grove, Iowa. With her parents, Elmer and Ellen Pennell, she came to Independence to live in 1912. In 1917 she married George H. Tousley whose paternal grandfather united with the Reorganization in 1866. They have three children—two sons: George, Jr., a graduate metallurgical engineer, (University of Arizona) who is at present in Bolivia; and Dirk, a 1951 graduate of the University of Kansas City; and one daughter, Chell, a junior in William Chrisman high school, Independence.

Sister Tousley is a certified medical librarian and writer of informative material with a best seller to her credit. From October, 1943, to August, 1950, she was employed by the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital as its medical librarian. During her seven years of employment she contributed her services as a writer to the Sanitarium's public relations, student nurse recruitment, and San Day activities. She is a member of the Medical Library Association, Special Libraries Association, and All-American Contestars.

At present she is doing editorial and promotional work for a mid-western publisher, free lance magazine writing, co-authoring another book, developing a private medical library for a client, and for sheer luxury, is classifying and cataloging her own library with its emphasis on geography and travel.

The Home Library column which she will conduct for the "Saints' Herald" will carry reviews of books which she thinks are of interest and value to women, whether they are homemakers, careerists, or both.

rather than the reverse; that home is primary in the schooling of children; and that the teacher is the specialist in education called in to build on the foundation being continually laid and reinforced by the home.

The laboratory results of child study have been put into nontechnical language for us parents who have other things to do besides studying and bringing up our children, important as they are. The authors have remembered, too, that parents are people, and that, as people, they resent being shoved aside by anybody, even for their children. In this book, parents have been accorded more than procreative and physical care functions in their children's lives. Parents have been given top billing.

STEP-BY-STEP the book traces the growth and development of the child from nursery school age through the sixth grade, and the relation of scientifically determined educational procedures used in school today to these various stages is clearly shown. Parents are told what to do at each step to co-operate with the school, and the child will profit by the knowledge that home and school are not entirely separate entities, but really two sides of the same coin.

The final chapter deals with parents' relationships with teachers and community and how to make these relationships of most value in the education of children. A bibliography and reading list, and a list of organizations useful to parents are placed at the end of the book; these open doors to parents who wish to go further into the subjects of growth, development, and education of children.

Parents' Magazine awarded this book its 1950 medal. Speaking from the vantage point of a parent of three children, ranging in age from thirty-two to fifteen years, I recommend this book for the home library,

You and Your Child

By Marye Lou Wolfe

DO YOU RECOGNIZE your youngsters emotional needs on the same level as his physical needs? The way in which his emotional needs are satisfied in childhood are more than apt to affect his entire mature life. Too often we overlook the emotional side of our children, but a healthy emotional atmosphere in your home is equally as essential to developing a sound mind as fresh air and nourishing food is to a sound body. Children reared in a relaxed and happy atmosphere will, in turn, become happy, satisfied parents.

Every child needs to feel secure to be a part of the family as a whole and yet an individual in his own right. The thing that frightens a child most is the thought of losing his family ties. Sometimes this is unavoidable when death, prolonged illness, or broken homes dislocate children. But the ever-increasing rate of maladjusted children should spur us on to establish better Christian homes in which to rear our children.

Every child needs love—that is to be loved and have the right to return that love. The most common cause of feeling unwanted can be traced to faulty discipline; especially nagging, threats, and prolonged punishment. Children need love most when they are in trouble; at these times they should feel sure of their parents' love and trust.

Every child wants to feel a part of the social group. Latter Day Saint children have an excellent opportunity to satisfy this desire and need through the extensive youth program offered by the church. Even not to be glanced at briefly and then shelved in its attractive book jacket, but to be used as a handbook by aspiring (too often perspiring!) parents in the joyous work of bringing up their children.

This book may be ordered from Herald House, Independence, Missouri.

the very young can find satisfaction in the nursery school. If we give our children the opportunity of growing up in the church it will do a great deal toward helping them develop emotional stability.

A child needs to feel economically and physically safe. Money matters should be handled by the parents, but as the children grow older they should learn the value of money and the limitations of the family income. However, we should not overestimate our children's power to comprehend the problem; if their ability to understand is overtaxed they are apt to worry, to become fearful and feel insecure. This reaction in itself defeats the purpose.

Every child needs praise. We should notice the things our children do well and minimize their limitations. They need to succeed more often than they fail. This is important to emotional development. Repeated failure in childhood leads to a defeated attitude in an adult life.

A child should learn to face his problems, but not without help at the beginning. Many problems can be more adequately explained in the light of our religious beliefs. We should teach our children to find comfort in their religion, but not to make it a hiding place from their problems. Religion should help them "face" the problem and solve it.

A child should be taught to be independent from the time he is sand-pile age. He should learn in his own way at his own speed. It is not kindness when a parent does everything for his child. Children ought to be taught responsibility in small doses at a young age; once the seed is planted firmly it grows alone.

Our responsibility as parents is great. A Christian home is essential to stable, well-adjusted children. Let us set our goal at taking our family responsibilities more seriously and teaching our children the far-reaching value of a firm foundation in the church.

The Iowa Great Lakes Group

BY MRS. B. T. FISH, Secretary

Two years ago I married and moved to Mallard, Iowa. Among the announcements sent was one to Mrs. Arvid Peterson who lived on a farm three miles from Jackson, Minnesota. I found that our homes were fifty-one miles apart and that she formerly had been a faithful worker at Omaha. Now she was isolated from church privileges and wanted to contact other Saints. One member was located at Superior, Iowa, fourteen miles away, and another at Arnolds Park twenty-five miles away. Still another at Burt, Iowa, had expressed her desire to meet with other members.

At the suggestion of my husband, an elder, we contacted all those we knew and met with Sister Wayne Small at Superior. We enjoyed being together so much that we decided to meet once a month. In two years we have failed to meet only once because of bad weather and illness combined.

In May, 1950, Brother Clifford A. Cole, president of Northwestern Iowa District, and Sister Bessie Shumate, district women's leader, held a day meeting for the area and organized our group officially.

We have sixteen regular members and often have visitors. Some live as near as ten miles from each other, but other families have to drive over fifty miles to attend meetings.

Teammates - Well, maybe . . .

By Emma Phillips

THE TENSION OF HER EMOTIONS showed in Irene Kessell's fingers as she passed the glass of orange juice to her husband. "Will you go to church with me tonight, Hervy?"

"Tonight? What's on?" He hesitated and then a frown crossed his handsome face. "If it's that study class, count me out."

"You enjoyed last Friday evening at church."

"That was different. Those League parties are fun. But when it comes to study classes, you go your way and let me go mine." There was nothing bitter or cruel in his tone. He was merely stating a fact. There was no need to discuss the matter further. She and Hervy agreed on most of the problems of a married couple, but when it came to the serious side of religion there was no agreement, no fellowship. It was like a gazelle and a race horse harnessed together as teammates. Although each was swift of foot there was no harmony in their rhythm.

Hervy studied his wristwatch. "Time for just one cigarette before I dash off to work." He went into the living room and sprawled himself on his favorite chair.

Later, when it was time to leave, Irene followed him to the door. They kissed. She waved good-by as he got into his car and drove off. How strange it seemed that things could be so simple a few years ago and yet so difficult today.

"PENNY FOR YOUR THOUGHTS," called a cheerful voice. Irene turned to see Betty Prenkle, the attractive eighteen-year-old daughter of the family next door, on her way to work. Before Irene could answer, Betty called, "I've got big thoughts this morning." With a sudden swirl of her flared skirt she turned and walked up to the Kessell house. "Carl called me last night. He got his raise. He's coming to talk it over."

"You mean . . . marriage?"

"Yep." A serious expression came suddenly to the eyes of Betty. "Are you and Hervy happy together? I mean about the church. Carl doesn't belong either, you know. Does it make a difference?"

Irene squared her shoulders to add strength to her words. "Not a mite of difference."

Betty pressed her hand against her forehead. "I get all qualmy when I think about it. Mercy, I better get going or I'll be late at the office."

With another sudden swirl she turned and hurried off down the street. Irene turned to the housework, but her mind turned to her lesson for the study class. She had left the Doctrine and Covenants on the end table beside Hervy's chair. She sighed as she saw it. Hervy had set the ash tray on the book. To him it was merely another book.

As Irene went about her housework she continued to think of the answer that she had given Betty Prenkle. She had lied. Although Hervy was a good husband, he did not share the joy of the gospel with her.

At noon she said a blessing over the simple meal she had prepared for herself. As she did so, Hervy's oft-repeated words flashed into her mind: "Go ahead and say what you're gonna say, Honey, 'cause I'm starved."

IRENE PUSHED HER CHAIR BACK from the table and went to the telephone. She must tell Betty immediately. There was still time to alter Betty's pattern of life. She got off work at four. That would give them an hour to talk before Hervy got home.

"Hello," came the voice.

"Betty, will you stop in here on your way home from work today. I have a confession to make to you. Don't ask me to explain now. Please do stop."

After the girl had promised, Irene slowly replaced the receiver. She must start formulating in her mind the things she would say. Carl was the proper sort of a fellow, but he was not a church member.

Shortly after four when Betty came in the front door, Irene was still trying to organize her ideas. "What's the confession?" Betty asked abruptly.

Irene shoved a casserole dish into the oven and went into the front room. "I lied to you this morning. I said it didn't make any difference if you married outside the church. It does make a difference."

"Isn't Hervy good to you?"

"No man could be a better husband than he is. But I can't share my religion with him. We have no fellowship there. Now I realize what the Doctrine and Covenants means when it says those who marry outside of the church will be considered weak in the faith."

Betty marked the place with her finger but did not take time to read. "Get a divorce," she suggested.

"I have no grounds for a divorce. Hervy is a good husband. But we are like a gazelle and a race horse harnessed together. Regardless of how much we want to race side by side, we just can't."

"Pray about it."

"I pray constantly. Miracles are wrought by faith, but I was weak enough in faith to marry a non-member. How can I expect a miracle?"

Betty raised her eyebrows inquisitively, "Why are you telling me all this?"

"I'm warning you. It is too late for me to change the course of my life. It is not too late for you to change the course of yours."

"What do you suggest I do?"

"Attend Graceland College for awhile. Marriage is a lifelong enterprise. Don't go into it too hastily."

"I . . . like . . . that . . . plan," Betty meditated through staccatoed words.

The front door came open with a sudden rush. "I'm home, Irene. What's for supper?" It was Hervy—hungry as usual.

He went to the oven, opened the door, sniffed enthusiastically, and returned to the women. "Are you a good cook like Irene," he teased Betty, "or should I warn Carl?"

"Better warn him," she tossed back as she left. He dropped into his comfortable chair and took out his cigarettes. Irene went to the kitchen to prepare supper.

When she returned he was no longer in the chair. She could hear him in the bathroom upstairs. Good, she thought, that will give me another chance to look at my lesson for tonight. She walked to the end table. The ash tray with its smouldering cigarette butt was again on the sacred book. She picked up the ash tray in one hand and the book in the other. The gazelle and the race horse! What mismatched teammates they were.

The voice of her husband drifted down to her, "There's a good show on at the Regent tonight. If you're not too busy let's go."

Irene laid the book down and set the ash tray beside it.

"All right," she called back. "Let's go. I'll hurry supper."

IN HER TONGUE . . .

The Law of Kindness

By Marie Gosline

PERHAPS "UNCLE JOE" CLAPP, the missionary, was brought closer home to us because living in our little community when we were children was one of his direct descendants who happened to be my mother's best friend. My sister and I enjoyed many afternoons in the home of this friend who had two daughters just slightly older than we. The husband of this good woman operated the one and only drugstore in town, hence my sister and I thought the family extremely wealthy. Didn't Muriel and Vera have wrist watches? And wasn't there always real money—pennies and sometimes nickels—on top of their dresser? Our parents were only schoolteachers, but their mother baked beautiful cakes which sold piece by piece at the fountain. Their father kept chocolate creams—big, luscious ones—in a box in his dresser drawer. I wonder if he knows how many childish fingers pried open that drawer and eyes looked longingly at that candy?

MRS. CLAPP was superintendent of the church school, and this involved much work when it came time for Christmas programs. As is usual in small branches, there were only three or four to do the many tasks a Christmas program entails. On the Thursday afternoon before, members of the ladies' aid would work themselves into a frenzy making bags to hold Christmas treats. On Friday afternoon we would pack the bags, and then on Saturday night came the program.

Sad but true I inherited my father's lack of musical ability, and as I stood on the platform in my organdy dress trying to squeak out "Away in a Manger" I could see the brave twinkle in my mother's eye and a slightly pained expression on the face of mother's best friend, a very talented woman.

But the characteristic of my mother's friend I want most to write about is not her musical ability. She had a rare trait that is lacking in entirely too many people. She never talked maliciously about, nor allowed anyone else to talk about her friends in her presence. A friend meant much to her—a friend was something to cherish. I don't know if she inherited this spark of goodness from her famous "Uncle Joe" or not, but it was there. However much she herself was talked about, she never spoke ill of her friends.

In our little branch, as in so many others, there were talebearers—those who could twist and turn words until they meant something entirely different from what a person originally said. But never a word of gossip was tolerated when my mother's friend was present.

I DREAMED of this good woman the other night. I dreamed that when Saint Peter met her at the gate he remembered this one beautiful characteristic of hers and said to her, just as he must have said to "Uncle Joe," "Come in—the place is yours." Then he reached down in his pocket and pulled out a big key—the key to the city—and, with a generous smile, handed it to my mother's friend.

On April 20, 1913, she was baptized into the Reorganized Church and became a diligent worker. It was in that year that she suffered the amputation of one leg, but this did not keep her from serving; she taught a church school class, sang in the choir, and assisted in other ways. On January 27, 1920, she received a certificate for a normal course in religious education from Graceland College. In 1933 she accompanied her husband, James Walter Adams, whom she married on December 1, 1907, to the island of Aruba. Five years later they returned to the States and made their home on a farm near Thayer, Missouri, where Brother Adams served as pastor of the church. Following his death on February 2, 1947, she made her home at Resthaven in Independence. While there she taught a class of women as long as her health permitted.

He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on September 10, 1939. On August 7, 1948, he enlisted in the Army; after two years at Fort Knox, Kentucky, he was sent to Korea where he served in the heavy tank corps.

WILSON.—Mary Racheal, was born December 11, 1884, at Almonte, Ontario, and died May 19, 1951, at East General Hospital in Toronto, Ontario. On August 26, 1902, she was married to James A. Wilson; two children were born to them but both died in infancy. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since November 16, 1910, and was also active in welfare work. She served for some years at the Boulton Fresh Air Camp, was on the board of directors of the Neighborhood Workers Association, superintendent of the Riverdale District Star Santa Claus Fund, and a board member of the East Toronto Y.W.C.A. House.

She is survived by her husband, James; a brother, Robert J. McIntosh; and a sister, Mrs. John G. Johnston. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Toronto, Elders J. L. Prentice and J. E. Booth officiating. Interment was in Mount Pleasant Cemetery at Toronto.

P.S.

* PARTY LINE

If you have a party line telephone, you know a character like this. You have a fire, and you want to call the fire department, but she won't give up the line, and your house burns to the ground. Or your youngest child is desperately sick, and you want to call the doctor, but Mrs. Gabbler is on the line for several hours, and central can't do anything about it. So the child dies and you feel like poisoning her. . . . Some day fate is going to catch up with that woman. She will be talking on the phone when somebody comes along and drops one of the new H-bombs. The blast will blow the house down around her, but she will go right on talking. Her soul will be separated from her body and take its long flight into eternity, but she will go right on talking. She will be brought up before the judgment bar, but she will still have the phone in her hand; she will ignore the judge and go right on talking. Then he will say, "Send her to Purgatory, and make her keep talking into that phone for the next thousand years. Then tell her that nobody was listening!"

* BUSY

"Sometimes we are so busy getting things done that we forget why we are doing them."
—Retrieved from the newspaper by Lillie Jennings.

* RELIEF

When you have done something that unexpectedly went sour and turned out to be an enormous and troublesome flop . . . and somebody whispers to you that the Big Boss is looking for you . . . and you can't decide whether to jump into the river, or just grab your hat and toothbrush and leave town indefinitely . . . and while you are sneaking out the back way the Boss sees you and calls you back to the office . . . and you send up a little prayer that the execution will be brief and not too hard to bear . . . and then all he has on his mind is some pleasant little task that you, and you alone, can do for him. . . . Oh, Brother, isn't it a great and marvelous feeling?

* MOTTO

"We derive good from everything we do if it is helpful to others, and that alone is enough."—Evalyn Webb.

* WORDS OF HELP

"All through life there is a need for someone to say words of help. Memory brings to mind a small boy on the platform at an Easter concert. He was in distress. He could not recall the first line of his piece, but he was confident that he could go ahead if he were given a start. He looked appealingly at the prompter. She smiled at him to give him encouragement. That did not meet his need for help. So he piped up, 'Won't somebody say those words?' The prompter gave him the words, and he spoke his piece well."—Calvin C. Sears.

Tess Morgan

MISS MORGAN, an instructor of communication, is one of Graceland's outstanding faculty members. She has contributed of her time and talent unreservedly to the development of freshmen through counseling, classwork, and association.

A native of Iowa, Miss Morgan was baptized at the age of ten. She attended Graceland for three years and then transferred to the University of Iowa, receiving her bachelor's degree in 1927 and her master's in 1928. In the fall of 1928 she joined the Graceland faculty and has been there ever since, with the exception of the years 1933 to 1937. In 1933-34 she did additional graduate work at the University of Iowa. From 1934 to 1937 she was a member of the faculty of Webster City Junior College in Iowa, returning to Graceland in the fall of 1937.

In addition to being Dean of Women at Graceland for five years, Miss Morgan has served on many committees, has been chairman of the division of language and literature, and has actively participated in many phases of campus life. She is a member of the National Council of Teachers of English, National Conference on College Composition and Communication, and a federated women's club.

Miss Morgan has a number of interests, but throughout the years her primary concern has been the problems of women's finding their place in the church, not only in the Reorganized Church, but in the whole Christian movement, so that their talents and abilities may be used to the fullest extent.

Nelle Morgan, Director of Nurses at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, is Tess Morgan's sister. Their father, John L. Morgan, wrote the music to the hymns "One Hour With Jesus" and "A Calm and Gentle Quiet Reigns Tonight."

James Whitehead, Competent Witness

In the famous Temple Lot case James Whitehead gave his testimony concerning the selection and designation of Joseph Smith III to be his father's successor. Elder Whitehead served as the Prophet's secretary during a crucial period and qualified as a competent witness, his testimony on the issue was clear and convincing.

I recently found a copy of a brochure published at Lamoni years ago. Among others it contained a sermon preached by Elder Whitehead, then a resident of Alton, Illinois, at Lamoni, Iowa, on May 22, 1887, which was biographical and reminiscent.

In this public address he gave the same testimony that he afterward told under oath before Judge Philips. Among other noteworthy things, he related a conversation in which Joseph Smith predicted a return of the Saints to Jackson County, Missouri:

Now a word about returning to Jackson County. Father Cutler, Father Calhoun, and brother Joseph and myself were together once, and Brother Calhoun said, "Brother Joseph, how long do you think it will be before we shall have the privilege of returning to Jackson County and building that temple, and how long do you think it will be before Jesus comes?" The first question he answered in this way: "Brethren, I firmly believe that in about sixty years from the time of the organization of the church in Kirtland, in about sixty years from that time the Saints will be permitted to go back to Jackson County, and be fully prepared to build it up. In regard to the second question, the coming of Jesus Christ, I do not know. But I will tell you one thing; He never will come until there is a people ready to receive him if it takes a thousand years to prepare them."

It was truly about 1890 that the Saints began their return to Independence, quite a literal fulfillment of what the Prophet said at Nauvoo.

This prophecy was fulfilled by members of the Reorganization—something to remember, and it has value in impeaching the claim, never well established by any means, that the Church was to leave the United States. ISRAEL A. SMITH.

What Bible, if any, Have We Indorsed?

IN FORMULATING a caption for this comment, I do not refer to the Inspired Version of the Scriptures, for that translation has gone forth with our full indorsement—at least so far as corrections from the King James were made in it.

In the "Epitome of Faith" prepared by the Prophet Joseph, published for the first time in the Times and Seasons in 1842, in an open letter to Mayor John Wentworth of Chicago, there was this statement:

"We believe the Bible contains the word of God as far as it is translated correctly."

This was certainly a most conservative and wise commitment, and we must give credit to the church in speaking so ably on the subject at that early date.

I have often thought about this statement. Perhaps I, because of my special training, am too "legalistic"; but I have found myself wondering if it could be properly construed to mean that we have ever put the seal of approval on any special translation, such as the King James (which was the one in general use during the formative years of the Restoration). Or could it be properly applied to any or to all of the numerous translations extant at the time, and can it be applied to the many versions which have been published during the last seventy-five or eighty years?

Certainly the clause, "as far as it has been translated correctly," helps us materially in a consideration of the subject, provided specific readings or versions do not come into conflict with re-editions as changed by the Prophet.

In quoting from Moffatt and other popular translations of the day it will be well, in my opinion, to see what if anything the Inspired Version did to the special portions under consideration.

A Historic Trunk

THE CHURCH, through the generosity and forethought of Brother and Sister James N. Curtis of Kansas City, Missouri, has come into possession of David Whitmer's personal trunk in which for many years he kept the Book of Mormon Manuscript. It will be treasured and carefully kept—eventually, we hope, in a church museum.

With this transfer came the following document, which also will be preserved:

REGARDING DAVID WHITMER'S HORSE-HIDE TRUNK

This trunk was the property of David Whitmer and is the one in which he carried his belongings as he came west from New York State with the Mormon migration.

It was in his room in his home in Richmond, Missouri, during the 1879 cyclone and while most of the house was badly damaged by the storm, his room was left intact and he unharmed.

I am the oldest daughter of Philander A. Page whose mother was David Whitmer's sister. The trunk was given to my father by David Whitmer's daughter, Mrs. Julia Schweich, when she left Richmond to go to Chicago to live with her daughter, Mrs. Josephine Van Cleve.

(Signed) Lillian A. Warinner, Daughter of Peter C. Page, the brother of Philander A. Page.

Ella A. Turner
Grand nieces of David Whitmer.

The trunk was presented to James N. Curtis who presented it to the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

On behalf of the Church we extend thanks to these relatives of David Whitmer and to Brother and Sister Curtis.

III

BEFORE DISMISSING TAHITI from our attention, I must pay tribute to our able missionaries and their excellent wives. These brethren are worthy successors to those who earlier carried the gospel to the Society Islands. It is not my purpose to recount the history of this mission, of course, but my own memory runs back to Thomas W. Smith, Joseph Burton, J. W. Gilbert, Charles Devore, Hubert Case, Charles Lake, Frank B. Almond, Dr. H. A. Merchant, H. W. Savage, A. V. Karlstrom, and Farthing, Ellis, May, Sorensen and others, all of blessed memory, some gone to their reward and some living (and the list is not complete) who with their wives hazarded the dangers of sea travel and the rigors and inconveniences of life and work in those islands.

Elders Butterworth and Breckenridge carry on in the best traditions of the Reorganization and are doing a glorious work.

The church is fortunate indeed in having among its members there such a worthy and outstanding family as Brother John and Sister Emere Mervin and daughters, all fully devoted to the cause. I believe a greater opportunity lies before Brother John.

The second day at sea the radio engineer handed us this thoughtful and much appreciated Marconigram: "Everyone sad because of your departure. Thanks again for coming. May the Lord bless you on your journey. Best wishes to your families and to the Church." Signed, "Mervin Family."

The posterity of John Hawkins are with us notably in Abrahama Fatuura who has excellent standing and who can do much good with our people. It is hoped that one of his daughters, a lovely and talented girl, will soon be enrolled for nurse's training at the Sanitarium.

Brother Horahitu, now a seventy, is an able pulpitier, and presents the gospel in an effective manner. Elder Paia is and has been a spiritual father to the church.

There are others, too, whom I might mention but for fear of transgressing space.

Another Tahitian matter is the work being done by the Mormons. They are active and sometimes attempt to convert our native members. They have built an expensive church and, in their desire to attract and hold the young, have sent to the mission a power yacht. It was quite appropriately named "Fandango"— which means a "wild Spanish dance"; but just before we came away, we noted the name had been changed to "Perata" (in honor of Addison Pratt, the first Latter Day Saint missionary to reach Tahiti in 1842).

An interesting story was told us. When Pratt first came he frowned on polygamous alliances and compelled some remarriages (to first wives) and the turning out of plurals. But after visiting Utah (time not given) he returned to advocate polygamy as a principle of salvation. This it is said was not well received, but was rejected. Three of Addison Pratt's granddaughters were at the Taravao Conference and were introduced to us.

EN ROUTE

The course of the "Waihema" was almost due west, steady, and continuous, but in these days of motor cars and airplanes, it seemed exceedingly slow. Each day our progress was posted by the navigator, and so we were informed that we traveled at a speed of about ten—sometimes eleven knots. The old story of the tortoise came to mind, and so with each round of the sun which kept to the north of us, strangely to us at that, we made about two hundred forty miles or so.

The fifth day we entered the bay at Apia in Samoa. There was no harbor or docking facilities, and the five days we spent there we were anchored quite a distance from shore. Several hundred stevedores, native Samoans, swarmed over the ship like flies, all cargo dropped being taken on "lighters" or barges pulled by motor boats. Cargo taken on was by the same method.

During the five days at Apia, we went ashore almost every day.

One day we were spoken to by some Mormon missionaries, young Americans. Through them we met Elder Golden Hale, in charge, who took us for a car ride about the island, and we had lunch at their mission house, being well-treated indeed. A school of teen-agers entertained us as we sat with Elder Hale and his family on the front porch—first with songs in Samoan language, a short song or two in English, as I recall it. Then some of the girls and boys danced for us, in harmony with their best traditions, we assumed.

Within recent weeks I have learned Elder Hale has been compelled to come home on account of sickness, which I regretted to learn.

We visited the "Governor's Mansion," once the home of Robert Louis Stevenson. It is about four miles toward the mountains from Apia.

Stevenson died there and was buried on the top of a small mountain close by. On Brother Siegfried's birth anniversary, we negotiated Mount Svia and took pictures of ourselves at the tomb, and because of the sentiment expressed on the tomb, Stevenson's words—and no doubt expressive of the heart yearnings of this strange and brilliant author—I took occasion to commit them to memory:

Under the broad and starry sky
Dig my grave and let me lie,
Glad I lived and gladly die,
And I lay me down with a will.
These be the words you grave for me:
Here he lies where he longed to be,
The sailor home from the sea
The hunter home from the hill.

The ashes of his wife, who survived him many years, were also placed in the tomb.

The climb was a very steep one; but we oldsters experienced no ill effects, and it was a bright spot on our otherwise monotonous journey.

And so we slept and read and took sun baths, getting up early to see the sunrise and watching the sun set with the little thrill that another day had passed.

We were, of course, glad when we knew our southerly course for days out of Apia had brought us close to New Zealand. The ship's engines had coasted during the early hours of Saturday, August 26, and at 7:15 we dropped anchor in the beautiful Bay of Islands at Auckland.

I had radioed to Elder A. R. Gunning, missionary appointee at Auckland, before we left Papeete, that we would arrive on the "Waihema," and so we were hoping that we would be met.

Although we anchored early, it was not until after ten o'clock that we cleared customs and put in with our baggage on the captain's launch.

One of my vivid recollections was of what saluted the eye when day broke that morning. The city lies on both sides and around that wonderful bay. The sky was cloudless. The air was crystal clear—not a sign of smoke from chimney or factory. The houses stood out before us in bold relief, in all their various colors, the roofs—almost without exception—being red tile or of red paint. All lay before us in silence as the great city had not yet awakened. Our engines throbbed no more, all was quiet and serene—a picture I shall not soon forget.

On board the launch at last with Captain Smith—a rare gentleman—the steward, and other officers, we left the "Waihema" and rapidly approached the dock at Auckland. Who, if any, would be there? In any event all would be new to us, except by report. We again felt a little strange, in our summer attire and Panama hats, on this the last day almost of their winter. We had sensed the change after leaving Samoa, progressively cooler with occasional showers.

The Salt of the Earth

By Abel Hall

A talk given by request at the Beresford Road Church, Manchester, England, on Sunday evening, January 28, 1951.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, I give unto you to be the salt of the earth; but if the salt shall lose its savor, wherewith shall the earth be salted? the salt shall thenceforth be good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, I give unto you to be the light of the world; a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid.

Behold do men light a candle and put it under a bushel? Nay but on a candle stick; and it giveth light to all that are in the house.—Matthew 5: 15-17 I. V.

SOME OF THE SAINTS here have been very anxious about a statement that has been made on two separate occasions from this stand, as to the condition of the work in the British Isles Mission. We have been told that the work in this Mission is dying. As I have been associated with this work for the past sixty-five years, and believe I can honestly say that I have zealously tried through all those years to add my contribution to the promulgation of the cause, I felt some apprehension when I heard this statement.

THE CLARENDON STREET CHURCH

Looking back through the years to the first branch that was established in a little upper room on Clarendon Street, Hulme, Manchester, I found myself wondering if all the work done by those wonderful pioneers had been in vain. Had the message they brought from out of the dark pit of apostasy in Salt Lake under the brightening banner of the Reorganization been of no avail? Had the "salt" with which they had become impregnated lost its savor? Or was it not true that these men had done a great work, the effects of which are still going on throughout the British Isles?

Let me review the work beginning with the Clarendon Street Branch. Of all the people who formed that pioneer branch there are only five left in the British Isles. There are two in America, Addie and Sarah Hughes. Taking them in the order of their age there are Martha Hughes Bailey of Birmingham, Robert Baty, James Baty, myself, and my brother, Will, all members of this branch.

At the time of the organization of the first branch there were the Dewsnups, Armstrongs, Batys, Halls, Fodens, Foxes, Mathers, Towers, Millses, Paxtons, Bartons, McKews, Greenwoods, and others whose names escape me at the moment.

ESCAPE FROM UTAH

The Dewsnup and Hughes families escaped from the valley of Salt Lake, and as it may be that many of the younger folk may not be acquainted with the details of their need for escape, I shall briefly go over a little of the history relating to the trek into the valley of Salt Lake.

Joseph and Hyrum had been assassinated, and Brigham Young, then the President of the Quorum of Twelve, at once proceeded to assume an authority that he had no title to. Had all of the members remembered the law with regard to the right of succession, Brigham would not have been able to deceive the people into believing that he was the rightful head of the church.

At that time there were about two hundred thousand members in the church, and Brigham succeeded in persuading ten thousand of them to follow him into the valley of Salt Lake. The rest became disorganized, having no leader, and not until Young Joseph, the son of the Martyr came before the church at Amboy, Illinois, in 1860, did the scattered forces of the church become reorganized, hence the name of this church.

We are all more or less familiar with the devilish doctrines that were introduced by Brigham and his elders—doctrines that up to this present day have caused many people to look askance whenever we mention the name of the church. There were those in the valley who woke up to the fact that they had been led into a trap of deceit. Among them were the Dewsnups and Hugheses, and they determined to make good their escape.

As a youth I listened enthralled to the story of the Hughes family and their escape. They had a place of business in the valley, with their shop window and shelves inside stocked with goods. They knew that their plan to escape meant great sacrifice.

Brigham, in order to prevent anyone's escaping from Salt Lake, had organized a band of men known as the Danites. These men, mounted on fleet horses, kept watch on the ridges of the mountains overlooking the valley. The only persons allowed to leave the city were those going out to trade with the Indians.

This fact gave Mr. Hughes an idea, and he carried it into effect successfully. Each member of the family took on his arm a small basket of goods which he was supposed to sell to the Indians, and everyone took a different way out of the city. The shop window was left with all its goods intact, and also the shelves inside. The door was left wide open, giving the impression of "business as usual." By this means all of the Hughes made their escape. It was some long time before they were joined together and eventually made their way to England. Several of the members who composed the Clarendon Street Branch were people who had had similar experiences. These were the men who, when the message of the Reorganization came to their ears, were only too eager to listen and make their contribution to its successful promulgation in this land.

DICKINSON STREET

After some years of Clarendon Street, which to me are filled with many happy memories, the work grew at such a pace that new and larger premises were needed. Eventually the large hall on Dickinson Street adjoining the Manchester Town Hall was acquired. That building is no more, but a new extension of the Town Hall stands upon the ground where the meeting house of the Saints stood for so long. Most appropriately, right over the spot where we used to enter the building there is a niche, and seated in that niche is the figure of Moses, the Lawgiver.

NEW MISSIONS

The work continued to grow under the leadership of the great man we called "Father" Dewsnup. I remember that one day he called together the men of the priesthood and told them of his plan to send them out as missionaries to various parts in the north of England. This plan matured with the result that eventually branches and missions were established in North Manchester, North-east Manchester—now known as James Street, East Manchester, South Manchester, Salford, Eccles, Warrington, Leeds, and through my own humble efforts some years later, at Bradford, Yorks.

An old man enters the story here—a peddler by the name of Brother Clarke. He was a poor man who earned a living by going from door to door selling his goods. He used to have a wooden tray which he carried in front of him, suspended from his neck by means of a strap or piece of string. His wares consisted of needles, pins, cotton tapes, scissors, etc. Besides these things, he always took with him a selection of church tracts and would leave them at various places he called. He always stopped once a week at a little confectionery shop on the Ashton New Road, Bradford, Manchester, right opposite the nurses' home. This shop still stands, though its frontage has been somewhat altered in recent years. He would purchase a glass of milk and some cakes. The owners of the shop—two maiden ladies named Knox—noticed that he never partook of his food until he had closed his eyes and audibly asked the Lord to bless it. These were good-living women, and as the old peddler always left a tract, they eventually got into conversation with him. This gave him the opportunity of introducing the Latter Day work, with the result that these two ladies were baptized into the church.

Their kitchen behind the shop was opened for meetings and here began the work that culminated in the establishing of the congregation known as the James Street Branch of Bradford, Manchester.

After a time this group was strengthened by the addition of two men who became well-known throughout the church—G. W. Leggott and Thomas Taylor. They had been making some inquiries by attending the meeting house on Dickinson Street, and at the time of their death were well respected and highly placed officials of the church, both being high priests.
