PUBLICITY FOR "MESSIAH" BROADCAST

December 23, 10:30-12:00 p.m. CST

Plans are in operation for a nation-wide campaign for the thirteenth "Messiah" network presentation. Our "Christmas Gift to the Nation" will be an hour-and-a-half broadcast on December 23 over the Columbia Broadcasting System and its affiliated stations, originating from the TV Playhouse of Radio Station KMBC in Kansas City, Missouri.

Each year brings many new listeners, according to reports received at church headquarters. This is made possible by the great interest shown in each branch and area where members work. This year an effort is being made to reach all leaders of every branch, district, and stake. Because a complete mailing list is not available so soon after branch elections, some leaders may not receive the Christmas cards, newspaper, and radio publicity for the branch. Those who do not receive a supply for their branch by December 1 should write the Radio Department, the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, and ask for the publicity material available.

Because only a pro-rated amount of Christmas cards will be sent to each branch, individuals are urged to write headquarters for additional cards. There will be enough for everyone to send to friends who want to listen. A free supply of cards should be ordered early from the publicity office.

Available this year will be newspaper mats and copy for local publicity. This attractive newspaper ad is urged wherever the branches and individuals will make the effort to publicize one of the finest public relations efforts of the church. A poster will be sent for each church bulletin board, and more are available upon request.

The nature of "Messiah" advertising calls for individual help. Every member must be a "committee of one" to invite friends to hear this immortal classic. Arthur J. Rock has been appointed "Messiah" Publicity Director. Requests for this free material, Christmas cards, and all information should be sent to: "Messiah" Publicity Director, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

By F. Henry Edwards

Baurak Ale

By Adolph W. Lundeen

SOME OF OUR PEOPLE have been disturbed when elders of the Mormon Church have attempted to prove that Brigham Young, as president of the Council of Twelve at the time of the death of Joseph Smith II, had the right of presiding because of the wording of Section 104: 11 of the Doctrine and Covenants (107: 24 Utah Doctrine and Covenants).

There is no reference made here to succession to presidents of the church, but only to equality of authority of First Presidency, Twelve, and Seventy under certain conditions when the quorums are all functioning. The law of succession given to the church is found in Sections 43: 2 and 99: 6 of the Doctrine and Covenants (Utah Doctrine and Covenants 43: 3-7 and 102: 9-10). If we examine several revelations given to the church during the time of trouble in Missouri we will discover that the successor to Joseph Smith II was actually named through a code word as early as 1834, ten years before the death of the prophet when his successor was but fifteen and a half months old.

On November 7 and 8, 1833, the Saints were driven from Jackson County, Missouri. On December 16, 1833, Section 98 was received. This revelation gives the reason why the Saints were driven from their homes; it also contains a parable, which many refer to as the parable of the vineyard:

And now, I will show unto you a parable that you may know my will concerning the redemption of Zion. A certain nobleman had a spot of land, very choice; and he said unto his servants, Go ye into my vineyard, even upon this very choice piece of land, and plant twelve olive trees; and set watchmen round about them and build a tower, that one may overlook the land round about, to be a watchman upon the tower; that mine olive trees may not be broken down, when the enemy shall come to spoil and take unto themselves the fruit of my vineyard. Now the servants of the nobleman went and did as their lord commanded them; and planted the olive trees, and built a hedge round about; and set watchmen, and began to build a tower. And while they were yet laying the foundation thereof, they began to say among themselves, And what need hath my lord of this tower? and consulted for a long time, saying among themselves, What need hath my lord of this tower, seeing this is a time of peace? Might not this money be given to the exchangers? for there is no need of these things! And while they were at variance one with another they became very slothful, and they hearkened not unto the commandments of their lord, and the enemy came by night and broke down the hedge, and the servants of the nobleman arose, and were affrighted, and fled; and the enemy destroyed their works and broke down the olive trees.

Now, behold, the nobleman, the lord of the vineyard, called upon his servants, and said unto them, Why! what is the cause of this great evil? ought ye not to have done even as I commanded you? and after ye had planted the vineyard, and built the hedge round about, and set the watchmen upon the walls thereof, built the tower also, and set a watchman upon the tower, and watched for my vineyard, and not have fallen asleep, lest the enemy should come upon you? and, behold, the watchman upon the tower would have seen the enemy while he was yet afar off, and then you could have made ready and kept the enemy from breaking down the hedge thereof, and saved my vineyard from the hands of the destroyer. And the lord of the vineyard said unto one of his servants, Go and gather together the residue of my servants; and take all the strength of mine house, which are my warriors, my young men, and they that are of middle age also, among all my servants, who are the strength of mine house, save those only whom I have appointed to tarry; and go ye straightway unto the land of my vineyard, and redeem my vineyard, for it is mine, I have bought it with money. Therefore, get ye straightway unto my land; break down the walls of mine enemies, throw down their tower, and scatter their watchmen; and inasmuch as they gather together against you, avenge me of mine enemies; that by and by I may come with the residue of mine house and possess the land.

And the servant said unto his lord, When shall these things be? And he said unto his servant, When I will: go ye straightway, and do all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and this shall be my seal and blessing upon you; a faithful and wise steward in the midst of mine house; a ruler in my kingdom. And his servant went straightway, and did all things whatsoever his lord commanded him, and after many days all things were fulfilled.

On February 24, 1834, Joseph received Section 100:

Verily, verily I say unto you, that my servant Baurak Ale is the man to whom I likened the servant to whom the Lord of the vineyard spoke in the parable which I have given unto you.

Therefore, let my servant Baurak Ale say unto the strength of my house, my young men and the middle-aged, Gather yourselves together unto the land of Zion, upon the land which I have bought with moneys that have been consecrated unto me; and let all the churches send up wise men, with their moneys, and purchase lands even as I have commanded them; and inasmuch as mine enemies come against you to drive you from my goodly land, which I have consecrated to be the land of Zion; even from your own lands after these testimonies, which ye have brought before me, against them, ye shall curse them; and whomsoever ye curse, I will curse; and ye shall avenge me of mine enemies; and my presence shall be with you, even in avenging me of mine enemies unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me.

AS A RESULT of the instruction given in paragraph 5, Joseph Smith II, with others named in paragraph 7, went to eastern church groups to recruit young and middle-aged men for the purpose of regathering to Zion. (See Church History, volume 1, pages 440 to 443.) These volunteers left Kirtland on May 1, 1834, for Zion, but were disbanded near Liberty, Missouri, in the midst of a cholera plague on June 25, 1834. This adventure became known as Zion's Camp.

On June 22, 1834, Joseph received Section 102, which is known as the Fishing River revelation. This had more to say about the redemption of Zion. Here is paragraph 5:

Behold, I have commanded my servant Baurak Ale, to say unto the strength of my house, even my warriors, my young men and middle-aged, to gather together for the redemption of my people, and throw down the towers of mine enemies, and scatter their watchmen; but the strength of mine house have not hearkened unto my words; but inasmuch as there are those who have hearkened unto my words, I have prepared a blessing and an endowment for them, if they continue faithful. I have heard their prayers, and will accept their offering; and it is expedient in me, that they should be brought thus far, for a trial of their faith.

So it appears from reading the revelations we have quoted, first, that Section 98: 7, 8 gives a definite promise of the redemption of Zion through a servant, chosen for the task, and all described by the parable; second, in Section 100: 4, that Baurak Ale, who is supposed to represent Joseph Smith, is the name of the servant in the parable; third, that Baurak Ale (Joseph Smith) is commanded to say to young men and those of middle age to gather themselves together to the land of Zion as instructed in paragraphs 5, 6, and 7; fourth, that the Lord declared his commandments were not obeyed by the strength of his house (Section 102: 5), which resulted in failure to redeem Zion, but promised a blessing on those who tried. Joseph Smith never did return to Zion, except as it was reported, that he stood once again upon the goodly land (Church History, volume 1, page 481). So, if Joseph Smith II was the servant of the parable, we could question the revelation in which the parable is mentioned. We will learn later that Baurak Ale of paragraph 5 is not the Baurak Ale of 100: 4. Both the Reorganized Church and the Utah Church believe that Baurak Ale refers to the name, Joseph Smith. The words "Baurak Ale" mean "the Lord blesseth" in Hebrew, a name well suited to those for whom it was intended. Baurak Ale is mentioned five times in the Doctrine and Covenants; sections 100: 4, 5, 6, and 102: 6, 8. The only other place I know where the name is mentioned is in a purported revelation through Granville Hedrick (Church History, volume 3, page 641) in which the Lord was supposed to have accused Joseph Smith of practicing fraud by calling himself Baurak Ale, which resulted in God's withdrawing his Spirit from Joseph and leaving the church without a seer. We will learn, however, that by God's infinite wisdom he would use the words "Baurak Ale" to bring about his divine purposes.

LET US EXAMINE the words of each section. Section 98: "The lord of the vineyard said to one of his servants . . ." (not to twelve) that he was to "go" and gather the "residue." The residue consisted of those who remained in the "regions round about" when the Saints were driven from Zion. He would go with them. He would also take the strength of the Lord's house (the warriors, who consisted of the young and middle-aged men). These are the functioning church members from all branches or groups and could apply to any age of time. "Save those whom I have appointed to tarry"—these are also of the strength of God's house, who would be needed in God's work elsewhere, for all were not to go to Zion. He was to go straightway into the land of Zion. He would have God's seal and blessing upon him—in other words, divine approval. He was to be a faithful and wise steward in the midst of God's house, not betraying God's people by leading them into sin and polygamy. He was a ruler (prophet) in God's kingdom. He was given the promise that after many days all things would be fulfilled.

We refer again to Section 100: 4, 5. Here the Lord gives the name of the man in the parable, which parable was to show his will concerning means and methods of redeeming Zion. He said the servant's name is Baurak Ale. In paragraph 5 we learn that Baurak Ale (Joseph Smith, the prophet) is given a commandment for the gathering to Zion. This commandment came three months and sixteen days after the Saints were driven from Missouri and was never revoked.

IN THIS REVELATION, Joseph Smith II, I who here is called Baurak Ale, is commanded to say to the strength of God's house, "Gather yourselves together unto the land of Zion." The Lord does not say for Baurak Ale (Joseph Smith II) to go with them, neither does he say or refer to the residue as he did in the parable, except in the closing sentence of the revelation, when he says, "and leave the residue in my hands," indicating that this was not the fulfillment of the parable. This commandment is addressed to the strength of God's house, and it is plain to see that God is giving the church an opportunity to redeem Zion through obedience in sending wise men with money donated by all the churches to purchase land.

He also makes it possible for Baurak Ale (Joseph Smith II) to go with them, for he says in paragraph 6:

Pray earnestly that peradventure my servant, Baurak Ale, may go with you and preside in the midst of my people, and organize my kingdom upon the consecrated land; and establish the children of Zion, upon the laws and commandments which have been, and which shall be given, unto you.

The attempt to redeem Zion by Zion's Camp failed, as we have previously mentioned, so it is plain to see that the parable and Zion's Camp are two distinct attempts. God said one would succeed, and the other would fail. Both would have the leadership of men called Baurak Ale.

THE FAILURE of Zion's Camp to redeem Zion is blamed on the church abroad. There were some who said, "Where is their God?" Behold He will deliver in time of trouble, otherwise we will not go up unto Zion and will keep our moneys.—Section 102: 3. Two reasons are given here. The people would not contribute for purchasing lands as commanded, and many of the "strength of God's house" refused to volunteer, saying, "We will not go up unto Zion." We have proof of this in Section 102: 5.

Behold, I have commanded my servant, Baurak Ale, [Joseph Smith II] to say unto the strength of my house, even my warriors, my young men and middle-aged, to gather together for the redemption of my people, and throw down the towers of my enemies, and scatter their watchmen; but the strength of mine house have not hearkened. . . .

Here we see why Zion's Camp failed and why Baurak Ale (Joseph Smith II) could not perform the task that would have been made possible had the church members abroad been obedient to God's commandments. Here also we see why the Lord said, "mine elders" (who are called Baneemy in paragraph 8) would have to wait a little season for the redemption of Zion.

If more than one Joseph Smith had claimed to be the successor of the prophet, we would have a situation worthy of close investigation, but there was only one who made the claim, and he fulfilled the parable: he was Joseph Smith, son of the Palmyra Seer.

The Fishing River revelation states that Baurak Ale (Joseph III) would accomplish the task of redeeming Zion (geographically). Here we read in paragraph 8:

Now behold, I say unto you, my friends, in this way you may find favor in the eyes of the people [referring to statements in paragraphs 6 and 7] until the army of Israel becomes very great; and I will soften the hearts of the people, as I did the heart of Pharaoh, from time to time, until my servant Baurak Ale, and Baneemy [elders] whom I have appointed, shall have time to gather up the strength of my house, and to have sent wise men, to fulfill that which I have commanded concerning the purchasing of all the lands in Jackson County, that can be purchased, and in the adjoining counties round about; for it is my will that these lands should be purchased, and after they are purchased that my saints should possess them according to the laws of consecration [stewardship] which I have given.

The word "until" indicated that the task would be accomplished—Baurak Ale would do it. Land would be purchased and possessed. This paragraph proves that the commandment given to Joseph Smith in Section 100 was never revoked, that the task would be accomplished, and that the strength of God's house—his active, elective, working body consisting of the young and middle aged, who carry the responsibility because of their physical and mental ability—would return under the leadership of a man whose name was represented by the code word "Baurak Ale" (Joseph III).

THE STORY of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is known to all of us. In it the prophecy was fulfilled. The residue of those driven from Missouri did return. The strength of God's house did return to Zion, except those who were appointed to tarry, for they are those of branches, districts, and stakes, who are needed in God's work elsewhere. They did purchase lands and possess them in Jackson County and adjoining counties.

Maybe we can also say there is significance to the statement in Section 100: 3: "The redemption of Zion must needs come by power. Therefore I will raise up unto my people a man who shall lead them as Moses led the children of Israel . . ." The Saints were driven from Independence in 1833. The first branch, after the return, was organized there in 1873, which was forty years. Moses was forty years in the wilderness.

And again, from paragraph 3:

Therefore, let not your hearts faint, for I say not unto you as I said unto your fathers, Mine angel shall go up before you, but not my presence; but I say unto you, Mine angels shall go before you, and also my presence, and in time ye shall possess the goodly land.

The testimony of the missionaries of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is known to all. We can say that this has been fulfilled, for have not Christ and his angels appeared to many and gone before them? God knew the events that would follow the restoration of the church. He knew there would be false leaders, who would claim to be the successor of the prophet. So he named the successor, the man who would return to the land of Zion, by the code word "Baurak Ale." He then reveals the meaning of the code word by calling Joseph Smith, Baurak Ale. So we know that Baurak Ale does not mean Young, Cutler, Strang, Rigdon, or any other of the men who claimed to be leaders. It stands for the man who fulfilled prophecy. The Baurak Ale of Sections 100: 4 and 102: 8 is Joseph Smith III, son of Joseph Smith II. The Baurak Ale of Sections 100: 5, 6 and 102: 5 is Joseph Smith II.

New Church in Berlin, Germany (American Sector)

The new church in Berlin, located at 15 Fontanepromenade, was built from ruins in 1949 by the Saints in that city. It was purchased by the general church when Bishop G. L. DeLapp, F. Henry Edwards of the First Presidency, Apostle D. B. Jensen, and Mission President Eugene A. Theys were in Berlin in October, 1950.

The church has a main auditorium which seats 125 people, a junior church school room for seventy-five children, a large upper room, a full basement, and a central heating system. Attendance averages from 100 to 110 each Sunday. Ninety-five per cent of the members live in the Russian sector of Berlin.

The church stands as a symbol of faith in God, for any building constructed under such circumstances requires the fire of divine incentive.

THE LORD SAID in Section 102: 3: "It is expedient in me that mine elders should wait for a little season for the redemption of Zion. . . ." This "little season" is past, and the prophecy was fulfilled by the return of the Saints to Zion, whose leader was Baurak Ale.

It is not my claim that all has been fulfilled, for we read:

The church has been directed to accede to the rendition of the Bishopric with respect to the temporal law; and until such heed is paid to the word which has been given and which is in accordance with other revelations given to the church, which had been before given, the church cannot receive and enjoy the blessings which have been looked for when Zion should be fully redeemed.—Doctrine and Covenants 129: 8.

This proves that Zion has not been fully redeemed, but it does indicate a partial redemption, which we can at least say is geographical.

The preceding paragraph, no doubt, refers partly to Section 102: 8 where instruction is given that the lands which have been purchased should be possessed by the Saints according to the laws of consecration they had been given: Until we possess Zion by the laws of stewardship, the full redemption cannot come.

Ugliness and Fame

In London, go to that most interesting museum, the National Portrait Gallery. There you will find portraits of all the men who for the last 400 years have been important in every profession in England. You will be struck by their prevailing ugliness—great archbishops, distinguished scholars, statesmen and men of affairs.

Ugliness has positive moral values. First, the man afflicted with it is thereby deprived of a too-easy success in love; this deprivation spurs him all the more eagerly to conquer—he has only the brilliancy of his accomplishments by which to please.

Moreover, ugliness in a man, if it accompanies strength, almost always prejudices one in its favor. His superiors almost never have a feeling of jealousy toward a really ugly man; nor are they indifferent to him, either. One remembers unusual features rather than a handsome but commonplace head.

—ANDRE MAUROIS

By Chris B. Hartshorn

MUCH IS APPEARING in the press and being said by public speakers concerning the breakdown of morals throughout the nation. Many cases are cited among the public servants in positions of responsibility in local, state, and national government which are only indications or symbols of the disease that has fastened itself upon the entire population. It is much easier to point these out and to lament the condition than to take steps personally or in conjunction with others which have any guarantee of improvement.

To say that "the gospel has the remedy for all of the ills of the world" is idle when so few of the one hundred fifty million Americans—to say nothing of the rest of the world—are permitting the gospel to influence their lives. Only those who are made to know the truth have the promise that "the truth shall make you free." This statement should not be interpreted to say that the gospel has not power to remedy the ills of the world, but take cognizance of the fact that it has not been given a chance to build a higher moral standard in this enlightened country.

One of the latest to call our attention to this deplorable situation is former President Herbert Hoover who spoke at the Iowa State Fair in Des Moines on August 30. According to the press accounts of this subject, he feels that "public tolerance of scandalous behavior" can destroy the nation. Mr. Hoover went on to say: "Our greatest danger is not from invasion by foreign armies, for no army on earth can land on our shores. Our dangers are that we may commit suicide from within by complaisance with evil, or by public tolerance of scandalous behavior, or by cynical acceptance of dishonor. These evils have defeated nations many times in human history."

One of the high points in this Des Moines dispatch demands that we face this moral situation without any sedatives. Mr. Hoover declares: "Those are deadly sleeping pills. No public man can be just a little crooked. There is no such thing as a no-man's-land between honesty and dishonesty. Our strength is not in politics, prices, or production, or price controls. Our strength lies in spiritual concepts, in public sensitivity to evil."

Two thousand years ago the Apostle Paul analyzed the evils of our materialistic age when he said, "The love of money is the root of all evil." The only new element in the present situation is the complacency of the majority of our nation who are good people but not sufficiently aroused to demand decency, honesty, and justice of their public servants. Latter Day Saints were challenged over one hundred years ago: "Honest men and wise men should be sought for, diligently, and good and wise men, ye should observe to uphold; otherwise whatsoever is less than these, cometh of evil."—Doctrine and Covenants 95: 2. It would, therefore, seem that it is our business to take an active part individually and with like-minded groups to bring to justice those who are untrue to their public trust.

ATTEND DINNER

Approximately 250 men were present at the second meeting of the Independence Men's Club which was held in the Laurel Club dining room at the Auditorium. Bishop Mark Siegfried lectured on his recent trip. His topic was "Grass Roots Level of the European Countries."

MISSIONARY SERIES HELD

Elder Dan B. Sorden is conducting a missionary series for eight Sunday evenings at the Englewood Branch in Independence, Missouri. Seventy Glen Johnson completed a week's series at the South Chrysler Branch.

LEADERSHIP CLASSES HELD

A series of leadership training classes for Zion's League leaders was held at the Stake youth offices for five consecutive Thursday evenings, ending October 18. The opening session which stressed the relationship of the various commission chairmen in the League program was under the direction of Carl Mesle, General Church Youth Director. Apostle Reed M. Holmes spoke on worship; Fred O. Davies instructed on study; Lee Hart conducted a class on recreation; and Carl Mesle spoke to the group on service. The average attendance was approximately forty-five persons.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS

The Independence Symphony Orchestra presented the first concert of the season in Memorial Hall October 21. Under the direction of Franklyn Weddle, the orchestra presented the Rosamundo Overture of Schubert, a Somerset Rhapsody by Gustav Holst, the Mother Goose Suite of Ravel. Guest soloist was Miss Beverly Phillips of Kansas City. The sixteen-year-old pianist played the Liszt Hungarian Fantasie for piano and orchestra. The "Messiah" Choir held no practice session, but resumed practice October 28.

RECEPTION HELD

A reception for Carl Mesle, who has assumed the duties of General Church Youth Director, was held October 26 in the basement of the Auditorium. Special tribute was paid to Brother Mesle for his outstanding contribution as Center Stake Youth Director, and a gift was presented. Brother Mesle has moved into his new office at the Auditorium in the Department of Religious Education. He is replaced in the stake by Lee Hart.

WHITE MASQUE PLAY GIVEN

"Dear Ruth," a three-act comedy was presented by the White Masque Players October 22, 23, 25, and 26, in the Stone Church Little Theater. The play was presented in the center of the main floor with the audience seated around the stage setting in a circle. Members of the cast included Dan Sorden, Louise Smith, Bruce Reynolds, Barbara Strawhacker, Bob Akers, Retta Desmond, Ruth Hays, Dorothy Ferguson, and Mark Foster. The Eclipse of Christ in Restoration Preaching

By Dan B. Sorden

And now behold, my beloved brethren, this is the way; and there is none other way nor name given under heaven, whereby man can be saved in the kingdom of God. And now behold, this is the doctrine of Christ, and the only and true doctrine of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, which is one God, without end. Amen.—II Nephi 13: 31, 32

And moreover, I say unto you, that there shall be no other name given, nor any other way nor means whereby salvation can come unto the children of men, only in and through the name of Christ, the Lord Omnipotent.—Mosiab 1: 116.

AFTER RADIO BROADCASTING by our church ceased, I was told to report to the managing editor of the Herald for some work. Brother Hartshorn said that reports had come to him about the number of sermons which had been preached recently without any reference to Christ—hence the title of this article.

Due credit should be given to all other agencies than Christ which do have influence for good toward our salvation. We should remember, however, that the love of God in sending his Son and the perfect sacrifice of that Son for us are responsible for all other agencies which influence us heavenward. People often testify of what the church has done for them, and it has been a great thing in the lives of many.

Only recently an article appeared in this publication titled "The Church Can Help in Times of Crisis." The church does help in many ways if people will permit it to do so. If the officers of the church only know about the needs of its members in their times of stress, they can help make the rough places smooth. It is through the church that we are taught in regular classes and from the pulpit of the things of God. There is an atmosphere in most churches that helps us feel and do better. Its purpose is to bring about the salvation of men. Its music, its classes, its preaching, its fellowship, all are aimed toward this end.

But it was Christ who said, "I will build my church." He knew that men needed just such an organization. And he organized it so that it could be of the greatest help in saving them. He put the ordinances and blessings of heaven in his church. He sent an angel to earth to restore the church through the one to whom he had given the keys of the everlasting gospel while he was yet on the earth in person. He continues to watch over the church and, through his Spirit, guides its destinies and inspires its leaders. Therefore it is to Christ that we must continue to look and to return thanks. Paul said that he gloried only in Christ. So must we.

MANY PEOPLE testify to what the gospel has done for them. This is good if they always remember that it was Christ who brought the gospel. Paul knew that the "gospel is the power of God unto salvation unto all who believe," yet returned thanks to God for Christ, his unspeakable gift.

Sometimes we hear people praising Joseph Smith—so much, in fact, that it seems they believe salvation comes through the prophet. Here again, it is good to give due credit to one who gave so much to the world. Paul planted and Apollos watered, but it was God who gave the increase. All honor to Joseph Smith and his heirs who still lead us, but they lead us in the ways of Jesus Christ. Joseph Smith cannot save us, nor can any other man. It is Christ who died for the sins of the world, and it is through him that salvation comes. There should be no eclipse of Christ in Restoration preaching.

Many members of our church look askance at the beliefs and practices, and particularly at the "carrying on" of some religious fraternities whose members talk, preach, and sing so much about the blood of Jesus Christ and about being washed in the blood. These people may have some erroneous beliefs, but believing in and talking about the precious blood of Jesus is not one of them. The church—that is the faithful believers in Christ—has been purchased with his blood. We believe in good works, and we believe that faith without works is dead; but after all is said and done, we are saved by grace. John saw the multitude that had come out of the "great tribulation and who had washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."—Revelation 7: 14.

In Romans 3: 23-25, we find this language, "For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified only by his grace through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ; whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past." Let us not neglect the preaching of the saving grace of Jesus Christ.

OUR CHURCH is built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, but Jesus Christ is the chief cornerstone. We can worship God only through his Son. In addition to the two passages of Scripture at the beginning of this article here is another significant one: "As the Lord God liveth, there is none other name given under heaven, save it be this Jesus Christ of whom I have spoken, whereby man can be saved."—II Nephi 11: 39. These words of Nephi are part of one of the great sermons of the world. In this sermon, Nephi tells of the vision he had of the crucifixion of the Son of God. He saw that after Christ was in the sepulcher for the space of three days he would "rise from the dead, with healing in his wings, and all those who believe on his name, shall be saved in the kingdom of God."

Nephi continues his sermon and says that his people still keep the law because of the commandments, but "we talk of Christ, we rejoice in Christ, we preach of Christ, we prophesy of Christ, that our children may know to what source they may look for a remission of their sins." In the margin of the page on which I find these words in my Book of Mormon, I have written, "Christ, Christ, Christ, Christ." It was and still is distressing that several years ago our church was denied a seat at the International Council of Religious Education because it was said that we were not Christian, that we did not believe in Christ. Jacob, writing in the third chapter of his book, tells us that he could write but little because of the difficulty of inscribing metal plates, but that he must write a little so his children and those who follow them might know "that we knew of Christ, and we had a hope of his glory, many hundred years before his coming, . . . and also all the holy prophets which were before us. Behold, they believed in Christ and worshiped the Father in his name."—Jacob 3: 4, 5. Yes, we are Christians.

WE KNOW of no other being ever born over whom a special star shone at his birth, or for whom there were two days without any night of darkness between them as was true at the birth of Jesus. Neither do we know of any other over whom the God of nature so showed his displeasure as at

A Shepherd's Story

The Autobiography of Marcus H. Cook

VII. A Stronghold in the Scriptures

THE HAWES FAMILY

I spent about two years in different parts of eastern Oregon. Among other things I might mention that when I was holding meetings in Condon, Brother N. E. Austin asked me to go over into the John Day country where he had a son and a daughter living. One of his daughters was married to a man named Dan Hawes, and her brother had married one of the Hawes girls. There were four boys in the Hawes family, grandfather Hawes, and his wife, whose maiden name was Moore. She was a sister of John Moore, an active elder in the church.

I asked Brother Austin about who belonged to the church over there, and he told me that all the Hawes boys were members, but the oldest boy, Amos, was not very active, and his wife was quite bitter against the church. I said I would try to get her interested, but he thought I had better not because she hated the church and would likely order anyone out of the house who attempted to talk to her about it. I went over there and stayed at the home of Dan Hawes, whose wife was Brother Austin's daughter. They received me gladly, and made me feel welcome in their home.

It was Saturday when I arrived, so Sister Hawes got busy on the phone and arranged for me to begin services Sunday at the schoolhouse where Fred Hawes was teaching. The people of the neighborhood had built a small church on a lot adjoining the schoolhouse, but the Methodists had it and would not let us use it. Mrs. Amos Hawes, whom I mentioned as being opposed to our church (a member of the Christian Church), conducted a Sunday school in this little congregation so Mrs.

Dan Hawes phoned and asked her if she would hold Sunday school promptly at ten, as Brother Cook would preach at 11 and those who attended Sunday school could also attend preaching service.

We went to the church expecting to attend Sunday school, but the old man who had the key to the Methodist Church didn't come and unlock the building until 11 o'clock. But the schoolhouse was unlocked and a fire was started, and we all went into the building. The woman who had charge said it was too late to hold Sunday school, so we might just as well go on with the preaching service. She stayed and helped with the singing, and I preached. Boards were laid on the desks, and a bountiful dinner was served at noon.

Again at 3 p.m. I preached another sermon, and Amos Hawes, whose wife was the Sunday school superintendent, asked us to go to their house for supper. I avoided any argument with Mrs. Hawes, as I had been warned. She was very genial, which surprised me, in view of what I had been told regarding her attitude toward the church.

After supper she went with us to the schoolhouse where I preached. Again to my surprise, her husband invited me to come home with them for the night. I had been told that she was bitter against the church and had always been angry with anyone who tried to talk to her about it. I knew that if I refused the invitation, she would feel that I was avoiding her; and that if I accepted, I would have to be extremely careful what I said. I accepted the invitation, was treated very kindly, and given a comfortable room and bed for the night.

Next morning Brother Hawes said he had cattle on the range and would have to ride that day to look after them. So I was left with Mrs. Hawes. We talked about ordinary things, and she was friendly enough, but I didn't say anything about the church. The day passed, she attended evening services. Again I was invited to return home with them, the same thing being repeated on Tuesday and Wednesday.

On Wednesday she started to talk about religion. She surprised me by saying that she could not understand why it is necessary to have apostles in the church now. I told her I thought the Bible was quite clear on that question, and I understood she belonged to the Disciples Church, which has a slogan, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak, and where the Bible is silent, we are silent." If she wanted to know why we believed there should be apostles in the church today, we would see what the Bible said about it.

She got her Bible, and I asked her to read Matthew 28: 18, where Jesus said, "All power is given unto me, in heaven and in earth." I noted the fact that if Jesus had all power or authority in heaven and in earth, no one could set aside what he had decreed. Therefore nothing was left but to comply with what he said. I then asked her to read I Corinthians 12: 27, 28: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." Also in Matthew 16: 18, Jesus says, "And I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." In I Corinthians, 1: 2, we find that the Corinthian letter was addressed to the church of God at Corinth.

These quotations show that Jesus would build his church; that God had set apostles in the church referred to in I Corinthians 12: 27 as the body of Christ. But as to their still being necessary, Paul says:

There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all. But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith, when he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men . . . and he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; that we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive. —Ephesians 4: 4-8, 11-14.

HOW THE BIBLE ANSWERED QUESTIONS

After Mrs. Hawes read these texts, I called her attention to the following facts:

1. Jesus Christ had all power in heaven and on earth.
2. The church is the body of Christ.
3. God set apostles and prophets in the church.
4. Jesus Christ gave gifts to men —apostles, prophets, and other officers.
5. They were given for the perfecting of the saints, for the edifying of the body of Christ.

He gave these offices to men for the purposes stated. Since he had all power (authority) in heaven and earth, no man, angel, or combination could do the work by a different way than he had ordered. And it was to be in force until "We all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

With several hundred different churches that cannot agree as to what the Scriptures teach, we certainly have not come to the unity of the faith. With the various understandings of God, all have not come to the knowledge of God. None of us can truthfully say that we have become perfect. The means that Jesus Christ established are certainly necessary. And since the purpose was "that we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of man, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive," and these gifts were given us to safeguard us from deception, I asked her if it would be safe for His church to dispense with them? She appeared to be deeply touched and answered, "That is what it says."

I made my home with them the rest of the week, and each day we would canvass some feature of the gospel in the same way, I simply asked her to read her answer from the Bible. When I bade them goodbye, she told me that I had brought many things to her attention that she had never seen before, that she was going to study it out, and finally do what she was convinced was right. Some time later I came back to the neighborhood and baptized her and two of their children. At that time I baptized ten people, including a son of the old Methodist gentleman who didn't bring the key to unlock the church in time for Sunday school the first Sunday I was there.

PLEASANT VALLEY

In eastern Oregon I held meetings in two schoolhouses on Burnt River, some distance from Baker. While there, I received a letter from Brother William Ferguson, who lived near Pleasant Valley, requesting me to come over there. I accepted his invitation, and on arrival at his place, I found that there was a little church owned by the neighborhood which might be used by any minister who came there. A few Southern Methodists met there occasionally. Brother Ferguson arranged for me to hold a series of meetings, and I began on a Sunday evening. Monday night the house was filled, and the attention unusually good.

On Wednesday evening the presiding elder of the Southern Methodists had been announced to speak, and I rather expected that he would oppose my meetings, but he said nothing unfavorable, merely announcing that as meetings had been started there, he would speak only the one evening. I continued three weeks, with a full house every night. One woman came seven miles on horseback and missed only three meetings in the three weeks. Later I returned and baptized three people.

At the close of the meetings, an Englishman who was not a member of any church, arose and asked permission to make a few remarks. He stated that the people there were fortunate in having a minister of my ability come and give them the sermons they had heard. He said that he had traveled extensively and heard some of the greatest pulpit orators of the world, but that he had heard more plain Bible truth here than he had ever heard before. He told them that while I had not asked for money, the railroads did not carry me about for nothing, and that I had been to the expense of coming there, and he was going to ask them for a collection for my benefit. He proceeded to take up a collection, and I received enough to pay my expenses. I spent some time in that part of the country, trying to strengthen the scattered Saints, and occasionally baptized a few people.

In 1917 I was appointed to southern Oregon, where I labored for two years. I baptized a few there, including Sylvia Marshall, who later married A. C. Martin. Elder Martin and I worked together for about three years. Our association was pleasant, and I believe resulted in much good.

Question:

Were not the Reformers called of God?
Missouri E.E.J.

Answer:

God uses all kinds of men for the accomplishment of his purposes—not always to the honor and glory of the men however. The Bible says, "God raised up Pharaoh that he might show forth his power in him." Such a self-willed and wicked man was necessary on the throne to make possible the dramatic deliverance of Israel. It cost the lives of Pharaoh and his army.

The Reformers did not bring back the lost faith and the original church. In fact they made little change except in one thing, namely, the repudiating and breaking down of the dictatorial and tyrannical power of the apostate church which for centuries had blocked the world's progress. This the Lord wanted done, and this they did by his help. It was the dawning of a new day of freedom, political as well as religious, even as the tyranny had been both political and religious. The Reformation broke the civil authority of the church which never rightfully belonged to it, and herein lay the greater accomplishment of these men as instruments in the hands of God.

Question:

What should be our attitude toward such practices as:

a. Consecration of olive oil by the elders for use by the members?

b. Anointing self or others with consecrated oil by members?

c. Use of consecrated oil by the quart or gallon for cooking or regular dietary purposes?

d. Blessing of oil for special uses, such as taking a drop on the tongue in the place of tobacco to help break the habit?

e. Blessing of handkerchiefs by the elders to be used by members for healing or general blessings?
Missouri J.D.A.

Answer:

a. The consecration of olive oil by the elders for use by the members of the church has a long history among us, and we know of no reason why this should be discontinued. It should be understood, of course, that such oil has no special healing properties in and of itself. Its use must be attended by the prayer of faith and must not be so frequent as to breed a casual attitude toward what is essentially sacred. It should be remembered, also, that the full scriptural practice is for the prayer of anointing and confirmation to be by the elders of the church (James 5: 14; Doctrine and Covenants 125: 15). Reverent personal use is not a substitute for this ordinance, but the practice of the church permits it, especially when the elders are not available.

b. This is covered in the answer already given.

c. The use of consecrated oil by the quart or gallon for cooking or regular dietary purposes is not in harmony with our fundamental church philosophy and practice.

d. We know of no law or principle which would forbid the blessing of oil for special uses as indicated in the question, but there are some strong arguments against making a general practice of this. For example, such a practice would tend to encourage superstitious reverence for consecrated oil to the detriment of the necessary element of faith in its use.

e. There have been occasions when handkerchiefs and other objects have been blessed by the elders to be used by members for healing or for general blessing. Undoubtedly this has been predicated on the incident reported in Acts 19: 11, 12:

And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul; so that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.

It will be noted that these miracles are called "special," although it is a little difficult to know just what this means. In Father Ronald Knox's recent translation he substitutes for "special" the phrase "beyond all wont," and in the Moffatt translation verse 11 reads: "God also worked no ordinary miracles by means of Paul." Perhaps we should think of "special" in this connection in the sense of unusual or extraordinary. This would hardly mean that the Pauline miracles could not be repeated, but it would mean that the experience of Paul should not be accepted as the basis for an established practice without further and clearer instructions. A roughly parallel situation is recorded in Acts 5: 15, 16 where the sick were laid in the streets so that the shadow of Peter passing by might bring healing.

Question:

"Charity never faileth; but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues they shall cease." In the light of this Scripture how can Latter Day Saints claim to have all the ancient gifts?

Michigan

J.R.G.

Answer:

Very easily! In the first place prophecies, tongues, etc., are gifts of the Spirit which are an essential accompaniment of the gospel and church of Jesus Christ and constitute some of the necessary forms by which the Spirit of Christ expresses itself within the church. They are evidences of Christ's presence within the church, and the working of his Spirit in the interests of the people. Without such evidences of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit the church would be lifeless and dead to Christ.

Second, speaking of these things being done away with or failing, Paul was not referring to this present world. While comparing them with charity he showed that charity or love "never faileth" but continues eternally in the future life, while prophecy, tongues, etc., are temporary as to this world when "now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face; now I know in part, but then I shall know even as also I am known." It is "when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." (See I Corinthians 13). The Scriptures do not so much as intimate that the spiritual gifts would ever be withheld from the church in this world.

Let's Finish the Auditorium

pletion of the story of the Restoration as this building tells it, let us give to it the dignity and beauty that are appropriate to its strength and its capacity for service.

A time comes when we get tired of making excuses for what we have not done, and when other people are tired of hearing them. We think that time has come.

EVERY BUILDING, from the greatest to the least, is a visible and tangible symbol of the purposes and ideals of those who built it. It is a witness of their power to conceive a plan and to complete a project. Are they a people who finish what they start out to do? The building is a testimony to the world about its people.

Until very recent times, our first concern has been the protection of the building and its contents. After every rain, puddles of water stood here and there in the corridors. There are no puddles now. We had an investment to protect. At present that is assured.

Another concern was to make good use of the space that the building afforded. Steady progress has been made in the development of offices for the many workers and the various services they perform. Much has been accomplished in this respect. There is more to be done.

THIS IS MORE than a matter of pride, though a justifiable pride must be considered too. It is a matter of revealing our character, our will, our purpose, and our strength to the world. If we are content to leave such a task incomplete, we are content with failure. If we are not content, there is hope for us. If we finish this, we declare ourselves ready to go on to the completion of other and greater tasks. If we are stopped here, we establish a habit of weakness that may cause disaster for greater things.

In a very few years, we can finish the Auditorium. We can make it a building of dignity and beauty as well as of strength and service. When that time comes, we shall be proud of it as the headquarters of our church.

Now, don't you think we ought to finish the Auditorium? L.J.L.

Years of Progress— Past and Future

just two occasions. But it pointed to a time, in our lives, when a prophet should be set apart in a service attended by many thousands of persons in a structure of potential genuine beauty.

At present-day Conferences it is not unusual for representatives from every state and many foreign countries to be in attendance. What a contrast to the early Conferences when just three or four branches had delegates present. It was a day of marked achievement when, at Galland's Grove, Iowa, in 1862, twenty-eight branches from four states and Canada were represented.

The annals of history tell the story of Conferences held in small rooms, rented halls, the small brick church in Plano, a larger brick structure in Lamoni, tents, the basement of the Stone Church, the unfinished lower room of the Auditorium, and now in the latter building in its present state of completion.

THIS STORY OF PROGRESS is in dire need of another chapter. It is being written now by the Saints who have sensed the need for a structure symbolic of the sacred ideals of our movement. It will be a finished chapter only when we become imbued with the spirit of sacrifice and desire that marked the lives of the pioneers.

We are looking to the day when the condition of our church shall provide even greater contrast than has been described. This will happen as the center of activity of the church gains strength. The Auditorium must be completed! Ours is the generation to grasp the vision and complete the story.

As we recount the events of the early pioneers in the growth of the church, it seems indeed fitting that tribute in some fashion be paid them. It's likewise significant that November 18 is Thanksgiving Sunday. As we take inventory of the blessings we enjoy, high on the list will be the church and its program. And just as we solemnly remember the struggle of the Pilgrims, so will we remember the price paid by the early Saints who pointed the church toward its present state. The normal response will be to assume the responsibility for greater accomplishment toward the end purpose of their efforts. Thus, it becomes logical for each of us to make a tangible gift to the institution most representative of those efforts, aims, and ideals—the Auditorium.

The Eclipse of Christ in Restoration Preaching

the death of Jesus, when on the Eastern Hemisphere there were earthquakes and darkness, which was also true on this continent. It is to this One to whom we must look at all times.

We must continue to preach about the organization of the church, the fundamentals or principles of our doctrine, the divine authority of Joseph Smith, and about stewardship, yet all the while we preach the love of God and our Redeemer interwoven in all that has been done for our salvation. When Jesus came to the people in this land his first words were, "Behold, I am Jesus Christ. I am the light and the life of the world." When the assembled people recognized him the record says that they fell down at his feet and worshiped him. Jesus said, "I will declare unto you my doctrine, and it is the doctrine which the Father hath given unto me; And I bear record of the Father, and the Father beareth record of me, and the Holy Ghost beareth record of the Father and me; . . . whoso believeth in me, and is baptized, the same shall be saved; and they are they who shall inherit the kingdom of God."—III Nephi 5: 32-34.

When Jesus was baptized a voice from heaven said, "This is my beloved Son, hear him."—Mark 9: 5. John knew this before the baptism, for he said, "Behold the Lamb of God." May there be no eclipse of Christ in Restoration preaching.

The Word of Wisdom - Part IX

Meat in the Diet

By Florence Sanford Ourth

FOR MANY YEARS meat has been thought of as a necessary part of our diet and is usually considered the "main dish" around which the rest of the meal is planned. For generations we have been taught that we need meat to make red blood and keep up our strength—particularly in the case of working men. Several years ago Steffanson and a companion completed a year's experiment in the North, subsisting exclusively on meat. Then he came back to New York and went on a meat diet to prove to science that it was entirely adequate, and to this day advocates a heavy meat diet.

There are, however, several groups that abstain from meat entirely and are strictly vegetarian. They are happy, healthy people. They believe according to Isaiah 11:9 that when the kingdom of Christ is set up, "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain," and they are willing to practice that principle now.

In the early days of the church the Shakers abstained from the use of meat and Brother F. Henry Edwards says in A Commentary on the Doctrine and Covenants, page 283:

A number of the brethren had come into the church from the Shakers and had continued to urge that Christian people should abstain from the use of meat. Because of this, the Saints had been instructed as early as March, that "whoso forbiddeth to abstain from meat, that man should not eat the same, is not ordained of God."—Doctrine and Covenants 49:3. Less than a week after the dedication of the land of Zion, and before the elders began their return journey, this instruction was repeated. Now, once again (in Section 86) the Saints are told that "flesh, also, . . . I, the Lord, hath ordained for the use of man, with thanksgiving." A great many food specialists have found that large quantities of meat are not good for the human body. Some have therefore jumped to the conclusion that all flesh food, at all times, is injurious. The Word of Wisdom does not teach this, but on the contrary, says that meat, in common with other foods, has been "ordained for the use of man." The extreme of urging that no meat be eaten at any time is no doubt preferable to the other extreme of over-indulgence, but neither extreme is wise or necessary.

Then this revelation goes on to state:

Nevertheless, they (the flesh of beasts and of the fowls of the air) are to be used sparingly; and it is pleasing unto me that they should not be used only in times of winter, or cold, or famine.*

Here we are given to understand that meat, according to God's plan, should not receive the prominent place which we have given it in our menus. It is to be used sparingly and only in times of winter and cold. Attention is focused on grain as the staff of life and on herbs (vegetables) and fruit, which are particularly ordained for the constitution, nature, and use of man. And during the months of spring, summer, and fall when these fruits and vegetables are abundant and fresh, they should become our "main dishes," for they are full of the vitamins and minerals that build up our resistance to disease and give us health.

We all realize that meat is very satisfying to the appetite, and that when we have meat we do not eat the amount of vegetables we would otherwise. The nutritionist's criticism of the American diet is that too often it consists of "meat, potatoes, and dessert," which excludes those things the Lord has particularly intended for our diet.

J. E. Andes, M.D., says,

One of the chief objections to meat is that we tend to eat too much of it because of its desirable taste. Meat eaters do tend to overeat, and therefore do not eat certain other foods that provide roughage and vitamins not abundant in meats. The heavy meat eater tends to have a sluggish bowel action, and the extractions in meat (juices) tend to produce high blood pressure. In addition, meat produces more body heat than any known food, hence its best use is in the winter time.

*Footnote: Some have been concerned with the wording of this paragraph in Section 86, reading it "they should not be used only in times of winter, or of cold, or famine" but at all times. Sister Mildred Nelson Smith explains this saying, "The English usage of the word 'only' often is the same as our usage of the word 'except.' Brother H. I. Velt was much amazed that any should question that meaning of it, for he uses it that way today."

THE OLD DOCTRINE that meat is peculiarly able to endow men with strength, endurance, and courage was long ago proved to be fallacious. Dr. A. W. Teel, church physician for many years, tells us that meat is not essential to sustain life, and points out that animals noted for their strength—the ox, the camel, and the elephant—are herbivorous and have never been known to eat flesh.

Dr. Chittenden of Yale University conducted experiments in which university students trained in athletics were placed on a diet low in animal protein, in some cases wholly vegetarian. The men remained in good health or improved in health, and showed an increase in physical vigor and strength.

Dr. Fisher, also of Yale, conducted experiments in endurance between flesh eaters and flesh abstainers and reports, "The results would indicate that the users of nonflesh dietaries have a far greater endurance than those accustomed to the ordinary American diet" which is generally quite heavy in meat.

A few years ago we heard a great deal about the master race of Germany. Yet in 1935 the German Army figures were showing that nearly 50 per cent of the men examined were being rejected. Leading physicians and special institutions were set up to study the problem. It was found that 0.4 grams of protein per kilogram of body weight was sufficient for growth or maintenance in human nutrition. Whole rye bread and potatoes were given a major position in the army diet. Vegetables and fruit were used in large quantities, and there was a considerable decrease in the consumption of meat. This swing to a stronger vegetarian diet was thought to be important not only for increased efficiency produced but also for the defense against and cure of diseases. This calls to mind Doctrine and Covenants 42:12: "Whosoever among you are sick, and have not faith to be healed, but believe, shall be nourished with all tenderness with herbs [plants, vegetables] and mild food." Improvement and even cure of neurotic and depressive conditions were reported. This preference for a stronger vegetarian diet was inaugurated as a result of extensive studies of the problem of preventing fatigue. It was found that certain protoplasmic poisons interfere with the capillary circulation and thus interrupt the recovery of fatigued cells. "The daily intake of all protoplasmic poisons has therefore been reduced to a minimum, including the consumption of nicotine, alcohol, tea, and hot spices, as well as excessive metabolic stimulation from protein overfeeding," states Dr. Max Gerson.

During the First World War, Dr. M. Hindhede of Denmark had the opportunity of carrying out the greatest large scale nutrition experiment in the world's history. The Allied war blockade compelled Denmark, which imported cattle and hog feeds, to slaughter and sell four-fifths of its hogs and to reduce the dairy cattle by 34 per cent. A low meat, or protein diet, became necessary. All flour was milled 100 per cent. By governmental order, under Hindhede's advice, each person (from October, 1917) was allowed a daily diet carefully weighed out, of very little meat, small amounts of butter and milk, and substantial quantities of bread, cereals, and potatoes. Alcoholic beverages were forbidden; tea and coffee were unavailable. There had been very little change in the death rate from disease other than contagious diseases in Denmark until the years of this forced dietary change. Then there was a sudden and striking drop of 30 per cent to the lowest figure Denmark has ever had. When in October of that year the influenza epidemic broke out, Denmark was the only noncombatant nation in Europe with a death rate, during the course of the disease, below the prewar mortality records. Abstinence from alcohol, tea, and coffee no doubt was a great factor in bringing about these remarkable results, but careful statistical studies have shown that the simple, natural diet was a prime factor in reducing the normal death rate and in giving the nation resistance against the influenza scourge.

These experiences push meat back into the place the Lord designed for it—a food to be used sparingly and only in times of cold, or winter, or famine.

MEAT IS USED to meet the protein requirements of the body. Vida E. Butterworth in The Voice of Health says:

Proteins are especially for the purpose of building new tissue and repairing worn out tissues. It is therefore more necessary that growing children and older people have a larger percentage of proteins in their diet than adults who are healthy and merely maintaining their own weight. The adult should have about 10 per cent of his diet protein, while the growing child needs 15 per cent of his diet proteins, the extra being made up mostly by extra milk. Proteins are contained in such foods as milk, beans, bread, eggs, peas, and meat.

It is not advisable for a person to eat too large a quantity of protein because an excess is often toxic to the body. No protein is stored in the body in the form of protein. That which is not used right after absorption from the intestines is broken down by the liver. Each gram of protein (amino acid as it is found in the blood stream) is rebuilt into about 2-3 grams of carbohydrate, its nitrogenous waste products being carried by the blood to the kidneys, from which it is eliminated. An excess amount of nitrogenous waste products that must pass through the kidneys is irritating to the kidney cells placing such a heavy burden upon the kidneys that they frequently become diseased.

The question is frequently asked, "What can we serve as meat substitutes in summer?" We asked the women of Nauvoo Branch each to bring a meat substitute dish to a meeting. We sampled these at refreshment time and exchanged recipes. We found there were many egg and cheese dishes that could be served, and fish, which is not classed with meat and poultry. Split green peas with a salad makes an inexpensive meal; and there are lentils, which history claims were used to make the mess of pottage for which Esau sold his birthright. There are many varieties of beans often spoken of as "rich man's medicine and poor man's food." Baked beans are the traditional Saturday night supper for Boston. Soy beans, rich in calcium as well as protein, have been made into meat loaves and choplets and canned by Worthington Foods, Worthington, Ohio. They are handy to have on the emergency shelf for unexpected guests.

THE TESTING TIME comes when one makes plans for company. Traditionally, perhaps dating back to the time the fatted calf was killed for the prodigal son, we have felt that it was a gesture of hospitality to serve meat to our guests, and perhaps wondered what they would think if we did not serve it. But the decision will not be hard to make if we remember the words "it is pleasing unto me that they should not be used only in times of winter or of cold or famine." It should be more important to please God than please our friends. At one time the Lord said to Joseph Smith, "For behold, you should not have feared man more than God."—Doctrine and Covenants 2: 3.

In the May-June Guidelines will be found a set of menus by Mildred Nelson Smith planned as a suggestion for those responsible for camp and reunion foods, but this can well serve as a pattern for family meals. They have been designed primarily for summer usage with large quantities of fresh fruits and vegetables, no meat or poultry being necessary for complete meals. They were also planned to provide nutritious, well-balanced meals at a minimum cost in terms of labor and money. High caloric main dishes and rich desserts are lacking. "It is expected that generous amounts of milk and 100 per cent whole-wheat bread will provide extra energy for those who need it," says Sister Smith.

These menus were followed quite closely by the Nauvoo Reunion Commissary. The women of the district baked the whole-wheat bread ahead of time and stored it in frozen-food lockers.

If we get a sufficient amount of whole wheat and milk we need not be too concerned about other protein dishes. Dr. Sherman, of Columbia University, has fed a colony of white rats through fifty generations on a diet of whole wheat, milk, and a little salt, and noted increased strength resulting in each generation.

Dr. Stare of Harvard University Medical School says: "It appears evident from the available studies that the protein of these [wheat and corn] germs must be considered as essentially the equivalent of first class animal proteins, both when used as a sole source of protein or as protein supplements in the diet."

In the bulletin, Using Whole Grains in Family Meals, by Carl and Jopling (published by the University of Missouri) is this statement:

Milk and whole-grain cereals or whole-grain bread supplement each other so effectively that they may well be used as a basis upon which to build one's meals. Add to these some fruit or vegetable, as strawberries, cantaloupe, tomatoes, or raw salad greens and practically all the food elements actually needed for health and growth are provided. For this reason whole-wheat bread and milk with fruit or a green salad make an excellent supper or luncheon.

There is a small amount of protein in all fruits and vegetables.

SUCH DIETS as these are easy to prepare. We are told that the American housewife spends an average of half of her day in the preparation and serving of food; but Christ has said, "My yoke is easy and my burden is light."

These diets are inexpensive. It is an admitted fact that meat is about the biggest item of expense in the average family's food bill, averaging about one third of the food budget. But God has always been mindful of the poor, and in the preface to the Word of Wisdom we are told that this is his will in our temporal salvation, which includes the economic side of life. Diminishing the meat quantity and discarding it altogether except in times of winter and cold, will often turn the tide for those "hardly able to get along." Isaiah 29: 30 says, "And in that day . . . the poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel."

These diets are plain and simple. Historians all agree that there is a decided relationship between the food of nations and the character and stability of the people. It has been said that Rome literally ate, drank, and "pleasured" herself to death. All history may be cited as evidence to prove that no nation has preserved its vigor unless its people lived temperately, frugally, and simply.

Truly the Word of Wisdom contains the plan for our temporal salvation.

At Home in White Mountain

By Maxine Evans, R.N.

as told to Naomi Russell

FOR FIFTEEN MONTHS my husband, young son, and I made our home in White Mountain, Alaska. Here, only forty minutes flying time from Russia, we lived in a snowy Shangri-La where fur coats are worn inside out, whale blubber is considered a delicacy, and nobody worries about automobile accidents. Here the sun shines twenty-four hours a day for four months during the year, while January and February are one monotonously long night. Here the mercury frequently drops to 40° below in winter and rises to over 80° in summer. Here people with large families give children away to childless couples without the formalities of adoption. To them it's as logical as sharing vegetables from a big garden with neighbors who have none.

There were ten other white people besides us, 150 natives, and ninety boarding school students in the village. My husband taught the three upper grades—seventh, eighth, and ninth—at the school and served as boy's adviser and recreational director. As adviser he was responsible for maintaining good behavior in the dormitory and for keeping the sticky fingers out of the meat locker. Eskimos have an inordinate appetite for raw meat. As coach he taught the boys to play basketball, although games frequently had to be called off before the last half because the ball would get so cold it wouldn't bounce. Many sports enjoyed in the States are out of the question, of course, and despite the fact we had a beautiful river at our front door-stop, no one ever went swimming. By winter it was a highway for husky sleds and a landing field for ski planes. In summer it provided fish and seal—two main items in the Eskimo diet.

AS PUBLIC HEALTH NURSE I was responsible for keeping down epidemics, conducting prenatal class-is a graduate of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing, class of 1942. Her husband Jack is a veteran of World War II, a graduate of Graceland College and Houston University, and a member of the priesthood.

They were married in 1943 at Stone Church in Independence soon after his return from service. Before going to Alaska they lived in Missouri, California, and Texas. Now that they have two sons, Dan and Don, they've decided to make their home in Ventura, California, where Jack is an insurance claim adjuster. Maxine has been supervising the maternity floor in an Oxnard hospital. Despite their full schedules they both find time to be active workers in the Santa Paula Branch.

es, delivering babies when no midwife was available, stitching up cuts, and treating anything from croup to stomach-aches until the company doctor came from headquarters 300 miles away for biannual checkups. In emergencies I resorted to short-wave radio, and if a plane were available, critical cases were flown to the hospital.

The major health problem was—and probably still is—tuberculosis. In spite of the subzero temperatures, the disease spreads rapidly and takes more lives than any other illness. Lack of education, especially among the older people, is largely responsible for this menace. Like Indians, Eskimos respect age, and no young person ever disagrees with what his elders choose to do, even when health is at stake. A middle-aged woman with active tuberculosis was public enemy number one in White Mountain. She insisted on going to church and kissing the babies. When I advised bed rest, her husband protested. Like most native men, he left the hunting, fishing, tanning, cooking, and wood-cutting up to mamma. When spring came and the ice on the river melted, he took her along to fish camp explaining, "She would not be happy if she had to stay home." She died soon after camp was over.

Hers was the first Eskimo funeral I attended. I could understand little of the service since both songs and sermon were in the native language. I was even more unprepared for the procession which followed. After the coffin was loaded on the school tractor, half a dozen youngsters climbed up on top, and as many others as could hang on the tractor, laughing and singing lustily as it chugged up the hill to the cemetery. Fortunately the ground had thawed sufficiently for a grave to be dug. In many places in Alaska the bodies of those who die in winter must be "saved" (usually on top of the house where huskies can't get to them) until spring for burial.

New Horizons

Margaret and Isaac Oksaktaruk and children—a typical young Eskimo family.

MEASLES ARE AS MUCH FEARED as tuberculosis since Eskimos have little natural resistance to the disease. The first case I was called to investigate proved to be more of a psychological than physical disturbance. The woman insisted she had eaten poison fish which caused the rash. I looked at her and then at her daughter, who also had a rash, and reported them both as measles cases. All the neighbors protested, "Not measles—fish poison!" But at the risk of ruining my professional reputation I stuck to my story. It was something of a relief when, several weeks later, I discovered another case of measles in camp. There were no fatalities from the disease during my stay in White Mountain.

While huskies are indispensable to transportation in the Arctic, they are a menace if not kept under control. Since they run best when hungry, their owners usually keep them half-starved—a nice arrangement unless the driver happens to lose his balance and falls off the sled. Almost unfailingly the dogs will attack him, and many an Eskimo has lost an arm or leg in an attempt to free himself from these second cousins to a wolf.

I thought I was getting a victim of such an attack one night when a man came limping into the clinic with a blood-stained mukluk. I found, instead, that he had fallen on an ax and cut his foot. After washing the wound I noticed a large lump just beneath the skin. I had never seen anything quite like it, so I applied cold packs and awaited further developments. Soon the lump grew smaller, and then came to the surface. A blood clot had frozen in the 30° below blizzard and remained solid until the warmth of the room melted it. For once I said a little prayer of thanks for the frigid tem-

In three days he was back on his feet. My steadiest customer was Albert, a thirteen-year-old boarding school student. Whether he deliberately got hurt to get attention or was the unfortunate victim of some strange fate I never was able to decide. The first time he came with a good-sized knot on his head—he had run into a building. The next time he bumped his head on the bedstead. Then he fell in a well and cut his leg—forty-seven stitches worth. If he hadn't been so well-padded this could easily have been his last fall.

FIVE WEEKS before our second son was born we left White Mountain for California. Fresh vegetables and milk were so scarce I decided against making the Arctic our home while we reared our family. Yet even though we were eager to get back to "civilization," we felt a kind of nostalgia as we boarded the plane that would take us away from this primitive little village with its frozen river, and Northern Lights, and naive, brown-skinned citizens. They had welcomed us as unquestioningly as children; they had come to us often for help; now they stood waving awkward good-bys in their wrong-side-out coats and high-peaked parkas. There was a lump in my throat as we circled over White Mountain and headed south. I wondered, as a mother does about her offspring when she goes on a long vacation, how they would manage after we were gone.

He was married on September 3, 1933, to Ruth Evelyn Rice; three children were born to them. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since August 17, 1919, and had held the office of teacher since November 2, 1934.

He is survived by his wife; three children; his stepmother; a brother; and a sister.

KALER.—Mary Salvina, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ira Babbitt, was born February 11, 1863, at Troy, Kansas, and died September 4, 1951, at the Independence Sanitarium. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on October 7, 1890, at Knobnoster, Missouri, and was married on June 13, 1893, to Elder John Kaler at Denver, Colorado. Soon after their marriage they were assigned a mission in Australia, where they served for ten years; their three children were born there. Upon returning to the States they settled for a time at Knobnoster, and in 1907 were sent under General Conference appointment to Portland, Oregon. Due to Sister Kaler's health, they returned to the Middle West and made their home in Independence where Elder Kaler died in 1912. While in Australia, she began to have trouble with her eyes, and in later years she had to spend much of her time in darkened rooms. Several months before her death she was cared for at Resthaven.

Gazette

The Graceland congregation gathered around the fireplace of the Student Center for a campfire service on a recent Wednesday evening. Dr. F. M. McDowell, one of the pioneers in youth camping in the church, told of significant experiences he had had in campfire fellowships and many students then described some of their outstanding campfire experiences at reunion, youth camps, and at Graceland.

Graceland's 1951-52 enrollment has dropped less than 5 per cent under last year's, although the national trend in college enrollment, due to the lowered birth rate during the depression, has been toward a much sharper drop. The combined Iowa public junior colleges have suffered losses of 20 per cent in student body membership. This would indicate that church young people are becoming increasingly conscious of the importance of Christian higher education and of the job that Graceland is doing in that field.

The college has purchased additional football bleachers which will accommodate 315 people. The bleachers, which will be in place in time for homecoming, were purchased with five hundred dollars donated by the crowd at last year's homecoming game plus a contribution from the alumni association.

Workmen are fast bringing to completion the first two floors of Gunsolley Hall, the new dormitory for men. Students are living on these floors while workmen put up woodwork and hang doors. The college administration hopes to be able to move men now living in Lamoni homes to the third and fourth floors of Gunsolley in a short time.

Graceland students gathered on September 27 for the traditional "States Assembly." Students from each state and foreign country sat together, each group indicated by a sign, and a representative from each group gave a thirty second description of the virtues of his home area. Students achieved a greater feeling of unity through this graphic presentation of their classmates' geographical backgrounds.

The Graceland College Concert Choir, a select singing ensemble of about forty voices, has been organized and will begin making public appearances in a few weeks. In addition to providing church music for the campus congregation and presenting concerts on and off the campus, the choir plans to produce an operetta during the second semester. The members of the choir come from as far separated places as Florida and Canada, England and Hawaii.

Graceland's new students were divided into four groups for orientation and registration activities this year. Each group was given a fictitious college name such as Injun Institute, Attaboy Academy, or Siwash Seminary, and was headed by two sophomore leaders who encouraged rivalry between the colleges. Each group presented a skit at a general assembly in competition with the other three groups. Some of these skits showed a great deal of leadership.

This division into registration groups not only provides for handling new students with maximum efficiency, but also helps them to make a number of acquaintances in their first few days on the campus and gives new students a chance to display their talents and qualities of talent and ingenuity.

Time flies—moments go rushing by like telegraph poles when you are riding the train and have no control of the speed.

Our nice neighbors across the street bought the cutest little puppy for their children, a fluffy little bit of a thing with gentle eyes, staggering about on his baby feet, the curl on his tummy barely clearing the ground. He would be such a nice little pet.

Then we went on a short trip. When we came back the puppy was gone, and in his place—vaguely resembling him—was a tall gangling growing creature in dog adolescence, if there is such a thing, eager, friendly, and just too big for himself. The children are as amazed as their parents, and are tentatively trying to adjust themselves to the transformation that has taken place.

The same thing happens to people. You go to church, and sometimes you wonder, where are the beautiful children of yesteryear? Where is the dainty baby girl with eyes cerulean blue, the small quiet lad with curly brown hair and eyes limpid pools of thought?

Look around and you'll see them—home from college a couple of times—then married and bringing their own children to church.

Check your thatch, Brother—Time is doing things to you, too!

* M. T. SHORT

We asked Bishop Mark H. Siegfried to let us publish an interesting statement he made in a recent talk to the Men's Club at the Auditorium, Independence:

"I am reminded by the presence of June Short here tonight of what happened fifty-three years ago on the second of this month in a little church at Rock Creek, Illinois, while I was sitting in the back seat of the church.

"June's father, M. T. Short, had been introduced to speak that afternoon. He read his text. He had a distinctive habit of putting both arms under his coat tail and giving it a couple of flops, which he did on this occasion. While doing this he said, 'What I have to say will take just about one hour. If any of you think you do not want to stay that long, I would rather that you would leave now.'

"He stood still, but no one got up to leave. He went ahead and preached his sermon. I do not remember a single thing he said, but somehow it convinced me, and I went forward to give my name for baptism to the district president, Frank M. Weld. This sermon was the last one I heard before being baptized the next day, October 3, 1898."

M. T. Short was a big man, both tall and broad. This is but one of many anecdotes that survive concerning him. Those were days when individualism was strong, and there was more freedom of expression and less formality than at present. Probably he made his amusing yet serious statement as a kind of shock-treatment, since audiences, too, were less formal in those days.

We'd Like You to Know . . .

Dalmer Avery Blankenship

When one understands this formidable looking machine and the blessing it has proved both to doctors and patients, he can pet it and smile as Dalmer does. A registered X-ray technician, he works in the "deep therapy room" with X-ray equipment used in treating cancer, enlarged thymus, and nonmalignant growths.

He was born on the Kansas side, but baptized and educated on the Missouri side of Kansas City. He was graduated from Westport High in 1930, and has since taken specialized courses at the University of Kansas City in bacteriology and chemistry. Following his graduation he worked in the drug business four years and for a surgical supply company two years, then did industrial work as an analyst and bacteriologist until he went into the army in 1945. He took his training for X-ray technician at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital where he now is senior instructor in the school for X-ray technicians.

He married Audene Graves in 1939. Their son Charles Gary is nine. Sister Blankenship is a registered nurse in the office of Dr. R. D. Etzenhouser. She formerly served two years in the surgical department at the Sanitarium and as night supervisor.

Dalmer is a member of the American Society of X-ray Technicians, of the Missouri Society of X-ray Technicians, and of the Kansas City Society of X-ray Technicians (he is currently serving as president of this organization). He is also a committeeman for the Boy Scouts of America. While living in Kansas City, he and his wife and son attended Central Church; now they are making their home in Independence and are in the Englewood congregation.

The Thankful Heart

"Thanks be to God."—I Corinthians 15:57.

A MONTH AGO it was October. Those were days when one felt glad—thankful—to be alive. There was a smell of autumn in the air, of fields freshly washed by the rain, of the woods bedding themselves down for winter. Day after balmy day was wreathed in golden glory. Small clouds floated like feathers on the bright blue surface of the sky. Beautiful as the burning bush that Moses saw were the hard maples, all flame and scarlet in the honey-colored sunlight. The whole country was like something out of the fairy tales, extravaganzas of miraculous loveliness.

One couldn't look at such beauty without wishing to say "Thank you," to somebody.

This beauty was no human creation. There was no one to thank but God.

Whether you look up and say, "Thank You, Sir," because you know nothing better, or, "I thank Thee, Lord," it is a prayer. And probably the best prayer anybody could make.

WE SAT DOWN to the table at home, and the fragrance of good food tempted our appetites.

As we bowed our heads for the blessing, our hearts suddenly filled up, and it was difficult to speak. We had more than food to return thanks for: the dear companion; the home itself, so comfortable and attractive to the eyes, so filled with memories; the good friends and family who were with us there. These blessings called for the deepest of all gratitude, and it could be expressed only in prayer.

CHECK UP your experience with prayer meetings. You have attended many. Perhaps you have been in charge of some of them. You know with what hope and anxiety you begin and try to guide the thoughts of the people into constructive channels. Sometimes you succeed; sometimes you fail. Once you think you have found the key to divine grace; another time you appear to have lost it.

One thing you will observe. The best meetings are those in which people give thanks to God for his love and goodness. The poorest are those in which people talk about themselves, or try to give little sermonettes. These do well enough on other occasions, but if they do not witness or bear testimony they kill the meeting.

We are at our best when we give thanks to God.

AS YOU PASS people on the street, you see the difference between those who are thankful and those who are not. The thankful ones are the happy ones.

The face is a mirror where every passing mood and fancy casts its shadow, however fleeting it may be. There is hardly anything in this world that will make a face more beautiful to behold than a thankful heart; for all beauty depends more on spiritual than on physical conditions. No matter what cosmetics a woman may buy—let the name be the most famous in the world—they will all be futile, as dull as mud and dead as withered roses, if she lacks the one indispensable beautifier of the spirit.

ONE of our good businessmen had the privilege of going abroad and visiting a number of different countries. What he saw and learned made him sympathize with the people. He observed their trials and problems. He learned the value of their contributions to the world. Sometimes he saw hard conditions, (Continued on page 15)

Defenders of the Faith

IT is reassuring that from time to time members of the church challenge erroneous statements in press and pulpit about the church and its founder.

Recently the Vancouver, British Columbia, Daily Province published an article about the church in which the writer implicated Joseph Smith with the doctrine of polygamy. Elder Edwin Spargo at once wrote the editor of this paper, and his letter was published.

Brother Spargo's vigorous protest was succinct and to the point, and he spoke as "one having authority." We commend him heartily for his prompt and successful defense.

The Mormon Church has recently stated in an official publication that

Joseph Smith did not present the alleged revelation on polygamy to the church. And a prominent Mormon official not long ago admitted that it was never submitted to the church for acceptance or rejection, and said it was not necessary to do so. How, in the name of reason, could anyone ever claim it was a law unto or binding in any way on the church, even the Mormon Church, in the absence of its approval by a General Conference? Where was man's agency or the law of "common consent"? What became of the procedure of 1835 and the law by which revelations were approved? ISRAEL A. SMITH

Official

Immigration of Saints From European Mission

In the recent session of the Joint Council of the First Presidency, Quorum of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, consideration was given to the need for co-operating with those who are qualified and desirous of migrating to the United States. General Church officials have been helpful in a number of instances in the last year in assisting those who have come to this country from abroad. There are some few others who are eligible and who are, in our opinion, worthy of receiving the help needed to make their immigration possible.

The church does not act directly as a sponsor, but there have been individuals who have been co-operating with the church in assuming sponsorship responsibilities. Each sponsor must fill out forms which contain the following information:

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE OF SUPPORT

No alien who is likely to become a public charge may be admitted to the United States. Each applicant must present clear and convincing evidence that he will have adequate means of support for an indefinite period after arrival in the United States. Evidence of applicant's own financial resources should be in the form of letters or statements from his bankers or solicitors.

An applicant proceeding to the United States to join relatives or friends in the United States, upon whom he will be dependent, must present affidavits executed by them guaranteeing his support.

Affidavits of support from sponsors in the United States should cover the following points:

1) The name and address of the sponsor, and a statement of his relationship to the applicant.

2) The citizenship of sponsor, and if he is an alien, the place and date of legal admission to the United States and name of the ship which bore him to that port (see note). If the sponsor is an American citizen, he should state how the citizenship was acquired. A naturalized American citizen should state the time and place of naturalization, the name of the court that naturalized him, and the number of his naturalization certificate.

3) The yearly income of the sponsor (which may be required to be supported by corroborative evidence).

4) Amount of present bank deposit and average balance during the past five years.

5) Market value of other property including stocks, bonds, or real estate. If there is an encumbrance on the real estate, the amount should be stated.

6) A list of sponsor's dependents, showing the age and sex of each.

7) An assurance that the sponsor is able and willing to support the applicant for as long a time as necessary and solemn guarantee that he will not permit the applicant to become a public charge if admitted to the United States.

8) If the sponsor and the applicant are engaged, the affidavit should contain a solemn declaration of intent to wed upon the applicant's arrival in the United States.

9) A person in the United States sponsoring an applicant to whom he is under no moral or legal obligation to support, should outline the plans being made for the applicant's economic assistance upon his arrival in the United States. The sponsor should also touch upon the reasons to undertake the burden of the applicant's support in the absence of a legal or moral obligation to do so. Moreover, the sponsor should give the names and addresses and economic condition of any other applicants he has agreed to assist.

Note: An alien resident of the United States sponsoring the immigration of relatives or friends must prove that he was legally admitted to the United States. In order to do so, he should complete form I-475 verifying his legal admission to the United States. Form I-475 may be obtained from the office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service nearest his home. The completed form should be returned to the Immigration and Naturalization Service in accordance with the instructions on the form.

This was previously printed in the Herald of May 21, 1951. The foregoing is more formidable in appearance than is actually the case when it is completed.

We would appreciate having any who are interested in serving as sponsors to contact the Presiding Bishopric.

Information will be given relative to those that will be recommended by the committee appointed by the Joint Council.

Our Hope
Our Need
Our Task

A Completed Auditorium

THE WORLD HEADQUARTERS BUILDING of the church is to be completed! The first part of the effort to raise funds for this project will be staged Sunday, November 18. It is anticipated that on that day, and during the remainder of 1951, $100,000 will be offered by members and friends. During each of the next two ensuing years, $200,000 will be raised from the same sources.

The decision to work toward the completion of the Auditorium at this time has world-wide implications. In fact, the verdict was handed down by the vote of the General Conference, the legislative power of which was composed of official representatives from nearly every region where the program of the church has function.

The enthusiastic acceptance of the proposal, approved by the leading quorums of the church and presented by the Presiding Bishopric at the 1950 Conference, is indication of the sincere conviction in the hearts of the membership that this task is extremely important and should maintain prominence in our steadfast program of growth.

The picture above is the fruit of such conviction. It is the result of lengthy and arduous consideration by the persons charged with the responsibility assigned to them. Interpretation of the needs and desires of the church in this regard, as stipulated by the Bishopric and other General Church officers, has been set down in blueprint by specialists who are proclaimed outstanding in the field of architecture.

No stones have purposely been left unturned in the effort to build a sound plan of action in this great task. We have now reached the place where the membership must support its decision. Let us face the responsibility with the same degree of enthusiasm that prompted our action in April, 1950! If we do, the job will be completed with a minimum of sacrifice. But if greater sacrifice is demanded, may it be exercised in the same spirit that has marked the church down through the years. In that spirit there shall be complete absence of doubt or hesitation. The task will be accomplished.

We will finish the Auditorium!

The Obligation General

I RECALL VIVIDLY the General Conference of 1920 when the delegates and ex-officios rose with great enthusiasm in response to the suggestion of President Frederick M. Smith that a building be authorized to adequately house such general church meetings as our General Conferences. The action of the church then taken was decisive, and today, though much remains to be done to complete it, we have a structure that not only meets many important needs of the church but also provides facilities for many necessary community activities.

If we needed such a building in 1920, we need it much more in 1951. Today we hold many more institutes and interim conference gatherings than were held thirty years ago, and this trend will not be reversed.

The Auditorium—our Auditorium—is an object of great interest to all who visit Independence. Recently a journalist who came to write up the home town of our Chief Executive referred to the Auditorium as “breath-taking.” Gradually this edifice is becoming inseparably associated with our city in the public mind.

How necessary, then—indeed how profitable it will prove—to bring it to a permanent completion!

Our members are as loyal—it has been demonstrated—as any in the world, and we are confident that their response to our appeal will be wholehearted support, and all together we will “get the job done.”

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

November 18 —!

NOVEMBER 18 is an important date. The last two decades have been marked with great changes—deflation, depression, inflation, abnormal prosperity, war. Through it all the church has gradually girded itself for its great task of preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ and establishing Zion. While our missionary force is being increased, there is also need for strengthening the Center Place.

The end purpose of the gospel is not only for the personal salvation of the individual, but also for the gathering of God's people in harmony with his divine law. The true missionary relates these together as one common cause. Thus a focal and vital point to which the attention of all is called is Independence, the Center Place of the gathering. “Behold, the place which is now called Independence is the center place. . . .” In Independence is to be found the most outstanding building project to which the church has committed itself. It is the Auditorium. It must be finished to give continued evidence of the vitality of our movement; what the church is, it can and will reflect.

Our financial policy during these two decades has been premised upon sound principle, “Keep the Law.” Continued compliance with the law will enable us to maintain our financial solidarity. The law makes provision for offerings and surplus, and from these the work of completing the Auditorium can be realized.

November 18 therefore becomes the date of moving forward into a new era, an era of progressive and sound expansion. It is the day we have been waiting for. Let us contribute. Let us build.

At the Crossroads

OF INESTIMABLE WORTH is the light of God in one's life and purposes. With the restoration of the gospel of Jesus Christ this blessing is our privilege to enjoy today. In the coming forth of the work of God in the last days, some were honored in laying the foundation of Zion; now we are being equally honored in having a part in erecting some of its walls.

In moving toward the completion of our Auditorium, adding to its beauty and utility, the church will have an edifice to which all its members and friends can turn with special pride and appreciation. The unity, sacrificial devotion, and joy present in the church will cause it to move forward noticeably in attainment of its goals.

Many people already are visiting the Auditorium. Guides are present to inform them of its unique architectural features, and through available literature, visitors learn of the church, its doctrine and mission. This notable structure of the church is destined to play a growing part in meeting administrative and missionary needs. Time will increase its missionary import. As the redemption of Zion progresses, the Auditorium, situated at the crossroads of the United States and serving as headquarters of our world-wide church, will be visited by many people.

On behalf of the Council of Twelve we urge members and friends of the church to give their generous support to the fund-raising campaign designed to finance the completion of the structure.

COUNCIL OF TWELVE

Meet the Architects

A DETAILED ARTICLE is being prepared which will provide an objective account of the training and experience of the staff of architects that are at work on the Auditorium completion project. In lieu of such a presentation, the following is a brief synopsis which may serve as an introduction to each man.

JOSEPH D. MURPHY has been retained as a consulting architect for this project. He is dean of the School of Architecture at Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri. He has been a member of the architectural staff at the university since 1935, as well as serving in various private and civic capacities related to his field. Mr. Murphy spent two years at Rockhurst College in Kansas City, after which he was graduated from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. While at the latter school he won scholarships which awarded him opportunities for travel and study in Europe. He comes highly recommended and has given enthusiastic evidence of his desire to render excellent service to this phase of the church.

BLOOMGARTEN AND FROHWERK, a firm of architects in Kansas City, have charge of the architectural work on the Auditorium. This reputable business organization has a wide background of experience in planning and building. Its professional history lists more than 150 projects, including factories, office buildings, banks, retail and department stores, hotels, hospitals, funeral homes, houses, theaters, schools, and churches.

Robert Bloomgarten, a graduate architect from the University of Kansas, is the holder of various awards for outstanding performance in the field of architecture and has commendable experience background as a designer and draftsman.

D. Kent Frohwerk has had more than thirty years experience as a draftsman and designer with various architectural firms. He has degrees in architecture and architectural engineering from the University of Kansas, has done post graduate work in his professional field at Columbia University, is widely traveled in his studies, and has a splendid record of awards and achievements for ability in the architectural profession.

HENRY C. SMITH is the appointed church architect. Thus he has the interests of the church directly in mind and is closely associated with any architectural work being done on church properties. In addition, he is a general engineer in charge of architectural design for the treasury department—which means he is in charge of federal building projects in a district which includes seven states. The Auditorium has been a prime concern of Brother Smith's since the time of its conception. Of course, his experience includes work on many of the church buildings in addition to the Auditorium. Included are the Hospital and Sanitarium, Graceland College buildings, and various houses of worship. His educational background includes graduation from Graceland College and a degree from Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Your Offering Is Needed

THE THANKSGIVING SEASON, perhaps above all others, is a time for soul-searching. It is a time of inventory of the bountiful blessings we enjoy. In that spirit, there invariably comes a heartfelt appreciation of God's love for us, and a broader vision of the work of his church. The normal response of a grateful people is to present a gift to that which is representative of the Lord's work. The Auditorium best encompasses the broad purpose of Christ's church. This year as grateful people we should find it possible to contribute toward its completion.

Here are a number of ways you can do it—take your choice:

1. If your branch uses the envelope system, and a special one is not provided, use the envelope for November 18, put your offering inside it, mark "Auditorium" in the blank space, and put it in the collection.
2. Give your contribution directly to a solicitor, bishop's agent, or bishop. You will be given a receipt.
3. Mail your contribution to The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.
4. If you wish to participate according to the principle of consecration of surplus, contact the Presiding Bishopric.
5. Although November 18 is a day of special emphasis, an offering from you for the Auditorium will be welcomed at any time.

A Shepherd's Story

The Autobiography of Marcus H. Cook

VIII. Reaching the Hearts of Men

SEATTLE AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

In 1925 I was appointed to work in the Seattle and British Columbia District, where I found many devoted people and enjoyed my association with them. Brother D. S. McDole was a man of unusual ability, both in the church and in the business world. He and his good wife did much in helping me get acquainted.

At district conference, I was elected district president, and made a trip over the district in order to meet and know all the people. I visited British Columbia for the first time in my life and shall always remember the loyalty with which the members there stood by me in the work. Brother S. Pope was an outstanding man who did a fine work as pastor in New Westminster. I have often said that his wife was one of the most saintly women I have ever met. I never heard her speak an unkind word about anyone; she seemed to see some good in everybody, and was loved by all. The New Westminster Branch was getting along nicely. I preached a few sermons there, and then went to Vancouver and got acquainted with the Saints. Old Brother Spargo was pastor, but as he lived about thirty miles out in the country, he could come only to the Sunday services. The former pastor had resigned because of some difficulties in the branch. After giving the matter prayerful thought, I decided the work should be taken over by an elder who belonged to the New Westminster Branch. His name was Robins. I consulted Brother Pope, and he agreed to my plan. I had a talk with Brother Spargo, who said that if anyone else could take over the work, he would like to be relieved. I called a meeting of the Vancouver Branch and explained that Brother Spargo felt that the work of serving as pastor, while living so far from the church, was too heavy for him; and the further fact that whenever possible, it should be an elder who presides over a branch. Therefore, I nominated Brother Robins as pastor, and he was unanimously elected. It proved to be a wise move.

A CHURCH AT VANCOUVER, B. C.

The Saints at Vancouver met in a hall until the year that General Conference was held in the fall. I went to Conference, and when I returned a letter awaited me, asking that I come to Vancouver the next Sunday. The letter offered no explanation, and I was rather worried lest something had caused trouble. But when I arrived I was surprised and pleased to find that the congregation had bought a nice little church building, had paid cash for it, and wanted me to be there to open the new building. The church is at the corner of Slocan and Dundas Streets about three blocks from the Hastings street car line. This congregation has continued to grow, and at the present time is in a healthy condition.

A COURSE OF BIBLE STUDIES

While I was in this district, I arranged a course of Bible studies, starting with the elements of worship. Here is a definition of the word:

Worship—The state of worth, or worthiness. The act of paying divine homage to the Supreme Being. Religious homage, reverence, adoration paid to God.

The Douay version never uses the word "worship," instead it uses the word "adore."

In order to worship God it is imperative that we understand something of his character and infinite perfection. The word "infinite" means unlimited.

1. God is infinite in power (Matthew 22: 29; Luke 9: 43; Acts 17: 24, 25. All Scriptures are from the Authorized Version).

2. He is infinite in knowledge (I Samuel 2: 3; Isaiah 41: 21, 22, 26; 42:5).

3. He is infinite in resources (Psalm 24: 1, 2; Psalm 50: 11, 12; Isaiah 40: 12, 13).

4. He is infinite in justice (Genesis 18: 25; Psalm 89: 14; Isaiah 45: 21; 9: 7; Jeremiah 31: 23).

5. He is infinite in mercy (Psalm 136; Psalm 103: 17).

6. He is infinite in love (John 3: 16; John 16: 27; Romans 8: 37).

7. He is infinite in his unchangeableness (Malachi 3: 6; Hebrews 13: 8; James 1: 17; Psalm 102: 24-27; Hebrews 1: 11, 12; Psalm 33: 11).

I used these quotations to illustrate the different subjects, and I asked all attending the class to bring their Bibles. I would call a text and give the privilege of reading it to the one who found it first. Many times children ten or twelve found the texts sooner than the older people. The next subject was man's limitations, showing how he is subject to misunderstanding, necessitating God's revelation to him of what he must do to be saved.

The next lesson was "The God we worship is a God of the present tense." Then: "God Manifest in the Flesh, Dwelling Among Us"; "Future Possibilities, such as Salvation and the Different Glories"; "The Church—Why Necessary, a Part of the Divine Plan" (Matthew 16: 18; I Corinthians 1: 10; John 1: 20-23; Ephesians 4: 4-6; I Corinthians 12: 13-27); "For Mutual Co-operation" (I Corinthians 3: 9; II Corinthians 6: 1); "It Gives System to Religious Work"; "It Is a Safeguard Against Deceptions" (Ephesians 4: 11-13); and "Authority" (Matthew 28: 18-20; II Corinthians 5: 18-20; John 20: 23).

These were followed up with lessons on the principles of the gospel: faith, repentance, baptism, laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment; then the Book of Mormon.

SUPERANNUATION

I continued my work in the Seattle and British Columbia District until 1930 when I was superannuated. At that time I was past seventy years old but for a time I served wherever I could.

The next winter, after I became seventy, I preached one Sunday in Silverton, Oregon. Some Saints who lived in Salem came over to the morning service, and an old German couple by the name of Zilke came with them. After the service Mr. Zilke asked me why I didn't come to Salem to preach. I assured him I would be very glad to do so if we could arrange a place to meet. I told him a private house with a room large enough for a crowd to meet in would be all right. Turning to his wife he said, "We have a large front room." Others were speaking to me, and nothing more was said at that time, but after the people left I began to think that perhaps there might be an opportunity to open up the work in Salem. At the evening service I told the people what Mr. Zilke had said and added that if they would find out if we could use their front room, I would go to Salem and preach there.

The "Present Look" - Then and Now

By Israel A. Smith

SOON AFTER THE TURN of the century a "symposium of views" by certain of the elders expressed at the late (then) General Conference was published in Autumn Leaves. Sometimes it is extremely interesting to hear voices out of the past. We note again the similarity of experiences and the identity of purpose, just as we find them today.

The men who spoke at that General Conference, whose words were preserved for use in Autumn Leaves, were President Joseph Smith, Apostle John W. Rushton, High Priest Frederick G. Pitt, Bishop Charles J. Hunt, Patriarch Alexander H. Smith, and Seventy Thomas W. Chatburn. Of these only Bishop Hunt survives, a grand veteran, whose mind at ninety years seems as bright and as alert as ever.

Just a paragraph or two from each will be given space.

President Joseph Smith:

The fight, so far, has been a long and a tedious one. It has taken us a long while to secure an open arena in which we have been recognized; but our experience now teaches us that those things through which we have passed have been productive of good to us as individuals. And while it has taught us this, it has also taught us that there is no one of us so peculiarly essential to God's work that the work must necessarily come to a standstill if he drops out of it.

I should be very loath to think . . . that if I should be taken out of the work that it would necessarily go to pieces and become a prey to ambitious men or ambitious spirits. If it has been properly grounded this can not possibly occur. . . .

And I can not think of the work, so far as I myself am personally concerned, without feeling a restful assurance that no matter what may be my fate, if I keep the faith, the work will be cared for by him who instituted it, and my place will be amply supplied so far as human agency may supply it, and the work will still go on.

I called to the attention of people some years ago, and stated prophetically, that the time would come when it would require that the representatives of the Reorganization should be qualified men for exalted positions, to stand between the church and the world.

Apostle John W. Rushton:

Our church, in my opinion, has reached a crisis—a period of transition. In every way things are different to what they were when our venerable President took his place, which has been so nobly and ably maintained. He was the man for the times. The work he has done his father could not have done, nor could he have filled his father's place. The crisis that came upon the church sixty years ago seems to very sharply mark off the difference between the two periods. But today even more so than before, we are made to realize that we are rapidly merging out of one condition into another, and there exists an urgent need for a change in methods by which our work is to be accomplished.

It is common experience that the methods which were adequate twenty-five or thirty years ago are altogether obsolete now. Many times has it been said that our ministers do not preach like they used to years ago! Yet, we tell the same entrancing story of the love of God that found favor with our parents and our grandparents. May we not suggest that the difference is not that we present a different picture, but that we see the same picture from different points of elevation? We preach the same gospel, but the demand of the present is drawing to our view some new perspective. The changes grow more radical as the years come and go; almost every day there needs to be some new adjustment—a refocusing, so to speak—to keep the image sharp and rectilinear. Unless we so adjust we get out of touch and have only an aberrated vision. . . .

The church is proving herself equal to the occasion. . . . And as long as she will continue to enshrine the truth, so long will she prove her right to survive as a force for the amelioration of the evils and sorrows which are afflicting the world, and a power for uplifting fallen humanity. Hence the attempt [is made] to place a means of education which will conduce to increased efficiency in the coming generation.

High Priest F. G. Pitt:

The college problem being solved is a great relief. The law concerning church finances is being better understood, resulting in greater unity along that line, as evidenced by the late action of the body.

The earnestness and zeal, together with the kindly spirit manifest by the great body of ministers present at Conference, speak well for the future of the church. The number of bright young men among the ministry is another encouraging feature. The indications of growth and development, also a degree of prosperity, are everywhere manifest.

Right here, however, is where we shall need to exercise care. . . . While it is our duty to educate ourselves by study, observation, and every other means within our power, we need to remember Christ's words, "Without me ye can do nothing." Our greatest effort, then, should be to live in close touch with our great Head, that we may enjoy in fullness the influence and power of God's Holy Spirit.

Bishop C. J. Hunt:

Let us go out from this Conference knowing that none will be able to present a more beautiful gospel than this which we preach. The Lord made no mistake when he told us we were sent out to teach, not to be taught.

Every minister in this church should be the very embodiment of hope and assurance, giving light and instruction to all. The Lord said to the church, "Be of good cheer"; and every elder ought to study and exercise faith so as to give full evidence of that heavenly blessing.

When someone says the whole church is going wrong and can see no light, it reminds me of the man who sat on the ground, covered himself with an umbrella, shutting out the sun's rays; then said to one passing by, "The sun has ceased to shine."

Saints, do not let the soul-destroying clouds of skepticism separate your love from the Master's glorious gospel work, but with love for him and his words, which will not fail, be of good cheer; raise the artificial cloud, the umbrella, and sing the words, "There is sunshine in my soul today"—and there can be in yours.

Patriarch Alexander H. Smith:

Something like forty years ago the Reorganization met in conference in Brother Israel Rogers' barn in Northern Illinois. At that time there was not a house of worship in all the United States that the Reorganization could call its own—not one.

Now, while we stand upon the foundation, our feet fixed, and the building has been going on, the superstructure has been spreading abroad until from Maine to Florida, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, over all this broad land, aye, and across the deep waters on each side have sprung up houses of worship that belong to the Reorganization, the people of God.

Almost every one of the representatives of this church, . . . (and I have had my hands on the heads of a good many of them) are positive. . . . And one of the peculiar reasons of their success (I say one of them) is the fact that every man of them, when he is out representing this work, stands, feeling that the weight of the work rests upon him, and he is ready to defend it under all circumstances and against all forces that are brought against him. . . .

I like the work because it is progressive. I like . . . the thought that church buildings are springing up, being built over all the land, because it is an evidence to the world that we have come, and that we are here to stay. We are here to stay till Christ comes, and we are building for that purpose.

Seventy T. W. Chatburn:

We had thought years ago that the Lord would hasten his work more than he has; but we are growing more patient as we get older, and we believe that God will perform his work in his own time, and that the final culmination will come. I feel grateful that God has been so merciful to me as he has; and I am thankful that this work ever saluted my ears. I am satisfied that it has done me good and made me what I am, and though we are sinking into the sear and yellow leaf and soon the last sunset gun will be fired, yet we hope that, come what may—whether it be the palsied hand or the tottering limb—through all the changes that go to make up the last great change . . . I hope to live and die a Latter Day Saint. And I am satisfied that the work has come to stay.

I have seen the time in my early life when I thought perhaps it was a bubble or a splinter off of the old church, but I have grown out of that, and I can bear testimony that so long as the rivers flow, so long as the hills remain and have been worn out or washed down, so long as those angry clouds shall give their gushing rains to enliven the babbling springs by the mountainsides this work will remain and will yet cheer thousands unborn. And as we grow older and see the final culmination coming on, I feel to thank God that we have been so well grounded and so well fastened upon the eternal rocks that it shall remain.

Sustaining Prayers for Missionary Endeavor

By Arthur F. Gibbs

THE SAINTS IN MICHIGAN, Chicago, Washington, and Oregon said, "We will pray that the Lord will bless your work up there in Alaska." The letters I received from members in Kansas City and Oklahoma said, "We will be praying that the Lord will prosper you in your work in the territory." I was grateful for the well wishes, but I did not imagine the power of guidance, strength, and help these prayers were to bring us as we went on our mission. Where I might have been down-hearted and travel-worn from the death of my father, I felt the assuring presence of God's spirit and strength for the task. And it did appear to be a task. I felt that a year would have been more of a reasonable time to complete the work that was seemingly assigned to us to try to carry out in two months.

Arriving at Anchorage where we hoped to meet with the many isolated Saints and effect an organization, we found the Lord had gone before us to open doors and bring about circumstances that would help us. Through friends and the contacts of our people, fine public meeting places were made available. We started out to find the lost sheep of the fold, (we have quite a large list) some of whom were very hard to locate, but we found them all without losing any time. Through them we located other members of whom we had no record. The Lord had preceded us and most of these were reinterested to the extent of being willing to participate.

When it came to winning new members, the Lord worked with us also. Ten people were baptized at Anchorage—six adults and four children. Three families were completed and a new family won to the church. Numerous other things happened to give us the assurance that the Lord was with us.

At Fairbanks it was the same. The public meeting places were available, the Saints responded, the directing spirit helped us to find people, and in the short time we were there three were baptized—one complete family and a young lady.

We felt the directing power and inspiration of the Lord in calling men to the ministry and organizing the missions at Anchorage and Fairbanks, as well as in our contacts at Whitehorse and Juneau. It seems that the Lord had directed a man and his wife in St. Louis to move to Alaska to provide priesthood leadership for the mission at Anchorage.

All this gave us the assurance of the power of sustaining prayers for missionary endeavor. These prayers should not be just for new endeavors, but for the work in Hawaii, Tahiti, Australia, Europe, everywhere. We are neglecting one of the great sources of missionary power if we do not offer many fervent prayers to the Lord in behalf of missionary endeavors.

These prayers were not without works. The small group of Saints in Anchorage who had been meeting regularly raised approximately $500 to bring a missionary to Alaska. The letters of information sent about Saints and friends in Alaska helped to find many people and the consecrated efforts of men and women like Pershing Tousley, Ted Fowler, Ruth Briggs, Georgia Harrison, and other members in Alaska laid the foundation for the work there.

Church Tracts in Greek

Brother Stylianos Pouloupoulos, 3 Garden Court, Haverhill, Massachusetts, has undertaken a difficult and worthy task—the translation of three church tracts into the Greek language, and their publication. The tracts are "Prophecies of the Restoration," by Evan A. Fry; "The Latter-Day Glory," by Elbert A. Smith; and "The Church of Jesus Christ," by William Lewis. Copies of these tracts have been received by the First Presidency.

A Living Church

Part II

A LIVING WORLD needs a living religion. Science, to the extent it has been more fluid and truth-seeking, and therefore more alive, has stolen the thunder from much of what has been called religion. But science too has its creeds, its petrifications of concept. Neither religion nor science can be wholly honest where the human heart itself is not wholly honest. A living religion, which acts upon the basic materials of the heart, is the world's foremost necessity.

Modern science, in its intense study of minutiae, has divided its knowledge into convenient subspecies. It has dissected man, divorcing his anatomy into fields of various specialties, sometimes forgetting that an odd assortment of organs and attributes adds up to one entity. It has carried the idea also into the field of mind, trusting reason, distrusting emotion, and often denying the existence of spiritual perception. Yet it is doubtful that, trusting and using only a specified part of what man is, an open avenue can be found to all there is to explore. The language of the heart, its longings for love and immortality, speaks eloquently above and through reasoned theories. What the heart knows can never be gainsaid.

Yet modern science, bound to its province of reasoned materiality, has categorized men's parts and potentials. It has walled itself securely inside its material walls, and walled itself so thick and high that it cannot see the immortal landscape. By its methods alone it can never prove God, for the spirit of God cannot be perceived by the divorced elements of man. It is something that must be experienced by the whole man. A quiet faith, the wisdom to "be still and know that I am God," may be more scientific for discovering certain facets of truth than the strictest scientific method of today.

BUT REGARDLESS of any criticisms which are due modern science, it is, even at its worst, a challenge. Religion can no longer make a claim with no burden of proof. Men are now recognizing that if religion is to survive it must meet the challenge of modern minds. A living religion will be more than a groove for mental hibernation. A living religion will be open to the weather. It will breathe and move in a living world and face the problems of contemporary living.

Science—operating by force of experiment and reason, repulsed by antiquated concepts of moral law, and confused by varying concepts among different peoples—seemingly attempts to throw the whole idea of moral law overboard. Hence much of the turmoil of contemporary values. Yet while science apparently seeks to deny the existence of moral law, psychologists are delving into the laws of the mind, determining by experiment and analysis what responses to life are constructive, what destructive. Thus while science at one breath may appear to deny moral law, at the next it dabbles in the very substance of moral law—the laws of man's being. Probably much of the confusion in regard to moral law comes from failure to understand that life is spiritual, and that "right" and "wrong" are spiritual values rather than specific physical acts. What is right in one case may be wrong in another. A living concept of moral law comes of the difference between the spirit and the letter of the law.

WITHOUT A LIVING CONCEPT of God we have no focus to perceive spiritual values. The modern mind, outgrown from the lettered laws of old moral codes, needs more than ever an understanding of the spirit behind the law. Such a concept of God cannot be inherited. It cannot be embodied in any ritualistic form. It cannot be conveyed by terminology. God must be felt. He cannot be merely thought. Yet a personal perception of God lies within the right and power of every man; but like physical sight, it is something that must be learned, and it is limited by the degree of spiritual and mental maturation.

God must be felt. The foundations of human thought lie in the realm of feeling, or hedonic tone, and it is impossible to build a thought structure which does not lie upon the foundation of our senses. But our senses are by no means limited to a few elementary neural responses. We are spiritual. We are emotional. We are capable of responding to spiritual and emotional values with a sight that lies beyond the lens of our physical eye, in the exaltation of worship, in reverence for the beautiful and true, in the sense of ethics that burns forever in the crucible of social reform. No man can think truly in realms where he cannot feel, and where Love is not felt a God who is Love can scarcely be perceived. "What is hell?"² Father Zossima challenges us. "I maintain that it is the suffering of a being unable to love." It may be that the depths or shallows of our emotional responses, as products of an eternal agency, determine the limits of our heaven or hell, on earth and in all time to come.

God must be felt. Without a sense perception of divine love we have no emotional resting place—no sure foundation on which to build a superstructure of character and thought. Our moral concepts waver and fail before the forces of change, for without God-consciousness we have no inward spiritual measure for good and evil, no scales to weigh between the pseudo and the real. Yet for every reality there is a pseudo reality, and no religion and no science is safe on the basis of creed or thought without the deeper reality of divine feeling. The letter of the law is but the coffined corpse of what some beating heart once felt. It brings no inner enlightenment. And the purely mental view of science, relying on experiment and reason untouched by emotion, is often confused, not being able to distinguish—by limitation of the means to which it restricts itself—between an oasis and a mirage. But the mirage does not disprove, in any sense, the oasis, nor pseudo-Christianity nor a pseudo-Christian disprove revealed religion. Yet the oasis and the mirage may appear as one to the physical eye. It takes a living perception of divine Spirit to be able to differentiate, in the psychic realm, the pseudo from the real. Such a living perception is called, in religious terminology, the discernment of spirits. A spiritual awareness, a divine sensitivity of soul, it is a primary requisite to Christian experience. Spiritual discernment is an elemental attribute of a living religion. So too, a people can die, not from any lack of organization, but merely through separation from the vital breath

Question:

Why are Reorganized Latter Day Saints close communionists?
Missouri

E.E.J.

Answer:

One of the main purposes of the Sacrament of the Lord's supper is to seal and preserve the unity and integrity of the church, the maintaining of oneness among its members, each with the others, and all with Christ. This is impossible of accomplishment with a divided Christianity, especially with many different organizations, holding conflicting doctrines and having various methods and aims. Such divisions of Christianity can not by any possible means constitute the church of Jesus Christ as he designed it, neither can they all eat at the same table under the unity that belongs to family life, particularly the family of Christ.

In setting up his own church in the Restoration of 1830, the Lord Jesus Christ expressed his attitude toward this state of Christianity: "They have strayed from mine ordinances, and have broken mine everlasting covenant; they seek not the Lord to establish his righteousness, but every man walketh in his own way, and after the image of his own God, whose image is in the likeness of the world." Of the church which he established he declares he had given commandments and power to the men chosen, and that "those to whom these commandments were given might have power to lay the foundation of this church, and to bring it forth out of obscurity, and out of darkness, the only true and living church upon the face of the whole earth, with which I the Lord am well pleased." To this church the Lord calls all men, promising the ancient blessings in this life, and eternal life in the world to come.

Some of the conditions attaching to the observance of the Lord's supper are these:

1. The administrator must be one called, ordained, and commissioned under the authority of Christ.

2. The emblems are to be administered only "to the people of my church."

3. They are to be received only by those who repent, believe, and are baptized by his authority.

4. Partaking of the bread and wine is a certification of the partaker's willingness to keep all the commandments of Christ.

5. Members of the church under unrepented sin, or with unreconciled estrangements with others, are not to receive the emblems until reconciliation has taken place.

6. Persons not of the church, who evidently have not complied with the church's laws and ordinances, are not to partake, and this for their own sakes, for to eat and drink unworthily is condemnatory (I Corinthians 11: 29). However, the church is to minister to such in other ways and pray for them in all charity and good will, seeking their salvation.

In the light of all these things the church could not with consistency, or in righteousness, invite to the table of the Lord any and all people who might choose to come in their own way, and with differing motives. The Lord has commanded regarding newly baptized members, that "The elders and priests are to have sufficient time to expound all things concerning the church of Christ to their understanding, previous to their partaking of the sacrament." Visiting nonmembers would not have the essential information regarding this sacrament, and consequently could not act understandingly. The communion is of the Lord's founding; the rules and regulations governing its observance are his; and the church to be true to its trust must abide by those rules.

Question:

Is it possible in any local branch to have a storehouse where provisions of canned foods, potatoes, and the like can be stored for immediate use in emergencies of our people or in feeding and caring for the poor?
Indiana

Answer:

It is commendable that a branch of the church, located in an area where fruits and vegetables or other food stuffs are plentiful, should preserve them for emergency use by our people and in caring for the poor. Any group of people who do this are prudent, which means that they practice economy, thrift, and frugality. A branch which follows this plan should not think of it, however, in terms of the storehouse. The storehouse of the church is definitely located by commandment in Independence, Missouri, and is to be presided over by the Bishopric. A local branch in California or in Maine might gather food stuffs for emergency use, but such practice should not be confused with the law of the church for the functioning of the storehouse.

Question:

When a gift of prophecy is manifested in the church how can we know it is of God?
Michigan

J.R.G.

Answer:

There are several ways. The Lord has provided another gift which is a check on some of the others, the gift of discernment, which belongs to the presiding officers. This gift in a presiding elder is a safeguard to the membership against spurious manifestations which the adversary may seek to interject among the Saints. It is not designed that this gift should be had by all the members. The manner of the person giving the prophecy may create or destroy confidence in his message. The message itself also is a basis of judgment, but a member's ability to judge safely upon such a matter is largely determined by his familiarity with the Scriptures and the ways of the church. Personally, where doubt has existed we have patiently waited the proof of time in harmony with Deuteronomy 18: 22. Judgment should always be tempered with charity and patience.

Miraculous Experiences

The Lord has been very good to me. Once before I got into a wagon I felt a great urge to pray for protection, so I did. Later I struck my head and became unconscious, but I recovered. I don't know what would have happened to me if I hadn't prayed. I have also been healed in time of sickness.

My father, who was doing some stripping in a quarry, felt led to work alone rather than with the other men. The bank caved in, killing one man and injuring others. As he started to fall, some unseen power seemed to pull Father back. In his later years he developed what the doctor said was a cancer on his face. He rubbed oil on it every day, and it came out.

I would like to hear from all the Saints who have written to me before.

In renewing my subscription I want to express my sincere appreciation for the blessings I receive from reading the Herald. I wish it were possible for me to thank each contributor individually. I am not able to attend church as I have done in years past, but I receive comfort and inspiration from the church paper. Why I Joined the Reorganized Church

When I was a young girl I joined a popular Protestant church and was a regular attendant at all the services. After Sunday school it gave me great pleasure to watch the people assemble for church service. With dignity and reverence they filed in and took their seats; and then with profound respect and adoration they sat quietly, waiting for the service.

When it was time for the service to begin, the organist took her place at the big pipe organ, and the melodious strains of sacred music gradually filled the room. The solemnity and majesty of the occasion was inspiring.

Years passed, and instead of a school girl attending one of the very best educational institutions, I was a farmer's wife and the proud mother of a girl two-and-a-half-years old and a boy six months old. Our pastor had visited us and told us that whatever we did, not to neglect to have our children christened, "For," said he, "just think of the awfulness of these two wonderful children having to suffer eternal damnation because of your neglect to do your duty." This statement caused me a great deal of anxiety, but not because I feared that our kind, loving Heavenly Father would be guilty of perpetrating such a cruel and dreadful deed, for I knew the Bible says that Jesus called the children unto him and said to his disciples, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein."—Luke 16, 17.

The thing that caused me great distress of mind and perplexity of spirit was that my church was teaching those things contrary to the Bible. I began to wonder if it could possibly be that it was not the true church of God. Then my mind was filled with curiosity and a desire to understand why there are so many Christian churches all teaching differently and all more or less at variance with each other. Why didn't the reformers agree on one church which corresponded with the pattern laid down in the Holy Bible?

I was at a loss to know what to do; but decided to read my Bible three times each day. One day when I picked it up, it automatically opened to the first chapter of James. The fifth verse seemed to stand out as though a magnifying glass had been placed over it. This surprised me at first; then I read: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." Why, I thought, that means I should pray about this matter! Why hadn't I thought of that?

From then on, I did not allow a day to pass that I did not offer an earnest prayer that the Heavenly Father would give me light and truth and let me know what to do.

Later an elder of the Reorganized Church began a series of meetings in our schoolhouse. The whole neighborhood turned out to hear him. The service had begun. The elder was explaining Scriptures as none of us had ever heard them expounded before. He interpreted them as one who knew—as one having authority. A voice, other than that of the elder's, spoke out clearly and distinctly to me. It said: "This is the true gospel for which you have been praying this long time." I thought, Why, no one in the world knew that I was praying for light and truth. Then I began to realize that God had, indeed, heard my prayers and was answering them. I had lacked wisdom; I had asked him for light and truth; and by the time that elder had finished his series of meetings, I realized that God had indeed been very liberal in giving me the information which I needed.

When it had been made known to me that this was God's true church, I began to wonder if I would be misunderstood when I joined it, for I knew that my relatives and acquaintances were prejudiced against it. One day while I was thinking about this, a voice said very plainly and distinctly to me: "You have prayed this long time that you might be shown which of all the churches is God's true church. It has been shown to you; and now it is up to you to either accept or reject." Needless to say, I accepted. This was over forty-five years ago, and I rejoice more and more that I was shown light and truth.

Is Helped by Keeping Word of Wisdom

I was suffering from malnutrition to such an extent that little children on the street commented on how I staggered as I walked. Then I read the wonderful testimonies about the benefits received from eating whole wheat that appeared in a Herald article last year. I bought a small mill and began grinding my own wheat. Now I feel so much better and look so much healthier that a little boy of nine told his grandmother: "I believe Mr. Rockwood will live to be a hundred and fifty years old."

I encourage everyone to read the warning in the first verse of the Word of Wisdom and also the beautiful promises God has made to those who observe his instruction. I believe that when all members are converted to the Word of Wisdom and the financial law of the church Zion will be well on the road to completion.

Finds Restored Gospel in America

I was born in Sweden, near the Baltic Sea, in 1875. As a baby I was sprinkled in the Lutheran Church. When I was eighteen years old I came to Detroit, Michigan, and found the true church. I was baptized by Elder George Shippy on a cold winter morning about forty years ago. The people standing around said, "He will surely die." But Elder Shippy and I walked a block in our wet clothes and did not catch cold. Now I am seventy-six years old, and I still enjoy the gospel. I attend the Buffalo, New York, church.

Healed Through Administration

Some years ago I married a man who had belonged to the Reorganized Church since childhood. He had four children to whom he had taught the gospel, although they had not been baptized. I belonged to another church and was very opposed to the ordinances involving the laying on of hands. To me administration was like children playing doctor.

One day I began to feel ill. Months passed, and I became no better. The doctor, thinking I had appendicitis, arranged for me to enter the hospital for an operation. I had never been in a hospital and was very fearful, but I prepared to go anyway. Then the desire for administration came to me, and I asked my husband to send for the elders. They came, and during the ordinance I felt like a little child who is repentant for his wrongdoing. I wept, and then went soundly to sleep—something I had not done in many nights. When I awoke I dressed and went about my work. I never did have the operation.

When I saw how wrong I had been, I asked for baptism. The four children and I were baptized together. I have always been grateful for this experience.

Wants to Contact Members in Northeastern Kansas

My husband and I would like to find a church near us—nearer than Topeka. There may be other members in this vicinity, but we have not been able to find them. The Seed of Faith

We need to plant the seed of faith and then cultivate it every day. We should let this faith grow in us until it is visible on our faces. Life is very short, and we should not waste a minute of it. We must have faith and learn to study diligently if we would grow as God wants us to. We must be kind and considerate in our approach to those who do not believe as we do.

I am thankful to those who brought the gospel message to me when I needed it so much. I can truly say it has been my anchor in the storms of life. I only hope my life will give courage to someone else.

Returns From Tour of British Isles

I have returned from visiting Great Britain where I have friends and relatives. I took my youngest sister with me to the mission at Skewen, and she was very interested in the gospel. I heard Frank Fry speak the first Sunday I was in Llanelly. I also listened to sermons by Tom Worth and Apostle Blair Jensen in Birmingham. Apostle Jensen took me sight-seeing around Birmingham while I was staying there. I attended a Zion's League institute and had the privilege of delivering a gift of Young People's Hymnals from the students at Graceland to the young people in Llanelly.

While in Wales I told the gospel story to many and passed out books and tracts—some even to ministers of other faiths. On board ship I gave a Navy man and his wife the Call at Evening to read, and they seemed to appreciate it. I also met a young colored man en route to London, and he said he would find our church there. In Llandilo I met a man whose brother had recently been baptized in Colorado. Another I met had heard R. C. Evans preach in Toronto years ago.

I had not been in the British Isles for forty-eight years, but people were very friendly to me, taking me into their homes, feeding me well, and making me feel welcome. The farms there are modern; most of them have water piped to the houses and barns from springs in the hills. In Birmingham I attended an exhibition of products manufactured in Britain. The country produced many wonderful things.

The church in England has grown too, and a man in Wales said, "This church is growing in leaps and bounds." This is encouraging and promises much for the future.

He Makes Our Burdens Lighter

Every time I think of this theme, I remember an experience which happened during our last Far West Stake Reunion. A storm hit with sudden fury. A sharp clap of lightning, a strong gust of wind, and out of this confusion a limb from a tree above came through our tent, ripping a hole about one foot long and landing in the middle of our bed. Immediately the rain began to pour through on me.

My wife jumped out of bed, pushed the limb back through the hole in the tent, got me out of bed, dressed, and in my wheel chair. I remember the sinking feeling I experienced as I wondered what we should do.

My wife rolled the bed clothing up over the foot of the bed to keep it from getting wet, then stationed herself at one end of the tent to hold the flaps, while our young son held the others.

During the next few minutes the storm raged. The wind, lightning, thunder, and rain seemed determined to destroy us. The water began to run under our feet. My wife was still holding down the tent, and in the meantime trying to soothe two children who were frightened almost to the point of hysterics.

While all this was going on, I was fascinated with something else. There was no water coming through the hole in the tent. Yet, how could this be? Finally I asked my wife to hold her hand under the opening to see if it was leaking. She answered "no." After a few more minutes I asked, "Are you sure it is not leaking?" She held her hand under the opening, and again assured me, "It is not leaking."

I called the attention of the children to this phenomenon that was taking place. We tried to point out what we thought was significant and impress it on their minds so they would always remember it. Then very calmly I asked that the tent be returned to its place since the tent was not going to leak.

The first storm had now subsided. Although the rest of the family went back to sleep, I could do nothing but look at the opening above in our tent. Every time there was lightning I could see it through the hole.

I continued to stay awake until the second storm came up, bringing a downpour of rain that would be hard to describe. My wife and children were again awakened by the noise, but there was no further need for concern.

After witnessing such a manifestation of the power of God, I know the Heavenly Father lives, and his Spirit was available to those on the reunion grounds that night.

Blessed Through Service

I have received many blessings through administration. Since there was not money enough for me to go to the doctor, I came to consider divine help as natural as the help I received from my mother and father. I know God has given me strength to assist in his work. For two years I had had a severe pain in my leg and back. Administration brought some relief, but always the pain returned. One day I was asked to take care of cleaning the church, since the person who had been doing it was having heart trouble. At first I thought that I couldn't possibly do it because I felt so bad, but then I reasoned that if I used what strength I had in doing God's work, I had nothing to lose. Now, after taking care of the church cleaning for three months, I am hardly bothered at all. Service, in this case, has brought a blessing that administration didn't. I believe that if we use our time, energy, and money for God's work we will never want for anything.

Meetings Held in Home

I love to read the articles and letters of testimony in the Herald. I am deeply interested in all who request prayers too. As I read of what the Lord can do for others, I know his promises are sure.

We have an active group of members meeting in our home every Sunday. We have Sunday school at 2:00 p.m., preaching at 3:00, and Communion every first Sunday of the month. The Lord has been with us in our meetings.

of God. The idea of organizational perfection, like the Roman Catholic claim of direct descent, proves nothing one way or another concerning the life of a body or a church. While the democratic idea behind the church as it was organized by Jesus is admirable, organizational perfection as an argument for the divinity of a church is inconclusive.

IF NOT BY PHYSICAL OUTLINES, how can we tell a living church? How can we measure the pulse beats of its life? How can we weigh it against the dead ash of the old orthodoxy which creeps, in every age, like fate across the living flame? Granted, a complete and well-integrated body can operate better than one handicapped by crippling impediments; yet spiritually as well as physically we are capable of a wide variety of vicarious functions, and the test of the life of a body is in its functioning. Life, moreover, is not the physical organism itself, but a spiritual condition, the end which the physical organism is meant to serve. A living church will therefore gauge its life, not by its ritual, nor by its nominal orders of priesthood, but by its living breath of the Divine Essence in a living experience sought anew by each new generation and by each new hour.

A living church. The terminology sticks in the throat, vital, real—and hackneyed. It is an actuating ideal, yet so long as there is an element of life which is still spiritually unawakened, there is a breach between the ideal and the real still to be spanned. We ourselves are workmen architects, bungling, inept, yet wondering at the blueprints of a great Design.

The Thankful Heart

and he wished it could be possible to share the blessings of his homeland with those in need. What we consider commonplace would be luxuries in other lands.

When he came home he was even more thankful than when he went away.

ALL TRUE GRATITUDE finds expression in action. It is not worthy of the best that is in us to be content with words. If people are kind to us, we try to show our gratitude in practical, visible ways.

But when God is kind to us, we may forget. We are sometimes content to express our thanks with words.

Who is richer: one who has abundance and is discontented with it, or one who has a thankful heart?

The real treasure, the real source of happiness, is the thankful heart.

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

We have had some inquiries concerning the initials C.D.N. in recent issues of the Herald following articles concerning the completion of the Auditorium. No one intended to be mysterious about this. It is just that C.D.N. is a temporary addition to our editorial staff and used his initials rather than have his name appear too frequently.

Charles Daniel Neff was born March 24, 1922, at Hardin, Missouri. He was baptized November 3, 1946, at St. Louis, Missouri, and ordained a priest a little less than a year later. He has been an elder since November 21, 1948, and his ordination to the High Priesthood is to take place at Omaha, where he is appointee pastor, on November 18, 1951. His wife was Frances L. Dillon. She is a charming lady and a devoted church worker. They have three children: Robert, who is four; Nancy, who is two; and Susan, who arrived quite recently.

After his return from the Navy (lieutenant junior grade) Brother Neff completed his work for his degree in economics, with a major in journalism. Between the time of his graduation and his appointment he was employed in the field of industrial journalism.

Since the members of the editorial staff of the Herald are always quite busy, the Presidency and Bishopric called Brother Neff into consultation in connection with the "Complete the Auditorium" campaign, and his fine contribution is already fulfilling expectations. Herald readers may expect to see "C.D.N." as long as the campaign lasts. F.H.E.

From Apostle D. O. Chesworth:

I feel that you will be interested in the achievement registered in the Spring River and Rich Hill Districts, which are united on many projects such as the Ozarks Reunion, priesthood retreats, Zion's League activities, and occasionally women's department gatherings.

The ten-year baptisms for the Spring River District totaled 683. During the years of 1950 and 1951 (to date—October 21) we have secured 276 baptisms, or 40 per cent of the ten-year period. In 1950 we secured 145 baptisms, and this year up to the present time we have 131, with nine missionary series scheduled for the remainder of the year.

In the Rich Hill District for ten years there were 298 baptisms recorded. In 1950 and 1951 we have secured 119, or 40 per cent likewise of all that was gained in the previous ten years. In 1950 there were 58 decisions, and (to date) we have received 61, including 12 baptized at Osceola—one of our new missions—last Sunday. We have four good prospects before us and, with the two two-weeks missionary series to be conducted by Calvin French during the remainder of this year, we hope our year's total will be 75.

Since this area is so close to the Center Place, we feel that this news will be of particular interest to you. The accomplishment of these two districts is the best of the ten districts to which I have been assigned. Although Southeast Illinois, with a total of 311 decisions in ten years, has recorded 156 for 1950 and 1951, or 50 per cent of that which was gained during the ten years previously.

From Evangelist John R. Grice:

I want you to know that I am still on the job and finding a lot of pleasure in my labors for the Master. I just finished a two weeks' series at Fort Madison, Iowa, where we had splendid services and quite regular attenders from Nauvoo, Montrose, and Burlington. The largest attendance was 175 and the smallest seventy-five (on Monday night). The last Sunday night, following the preaching service, we baptized seven, and on Monday night had a prayer and confirmation service. We left the Saints feeling happy over the results of the meetings. I was able to do a lot of visiting and gave nine patriarchal blessings.

Elder W. S. Shea, pastor at Rochester, New York, recently sent a letter to the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle concerning differences between this church and the Mormon church. This was published in the issue of September 16. As usual, some local publicity concerning Mormon pageantry at Cumorah failed to discriminate between the churches.

We congratulate Brother Shea on his success in getting a comprehensive statement before the public.

A letter from Miss Nelle Morgan, who is taking some additional university work in Ann Arbor in further preparation for her responsibilities as Director of the Sanitarium School of Nursing, indicates that in addition to her college work she is active in the Ann Arbor church school. She lists discussion topics drawn up by the council of one of the church school classes. This is so commendable that we pass it along for others who may be interested.

Centering Our Children's Lives in the Church

PART I

By Mrs. Walter N. Johnson

An address given at the Women's Institute.

WE HAVE ALL HEARD SERMONS which began with great promise, and the reason appeared to lie in the reading of some beautiful selection of Scripture. You can rest assured I am not going to preach a sermon, but to assure my talk of a good beginning I am reading a portion of Scripture which is very meaningful to Latter Day Saints.

And again, inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance; faith in Christ the Son of the living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands when eight years old, the sin be upon the head of the parents; for this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized; and their children shall be baptized for the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of the hands; and they shall also teach their children to pray, and to walk uprightly before the Lord.—Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4.

We live in a time when many varied activities compete for our children's attention. It is so easy today for the lives of children to be centered on the things of the world, and as we see the breakdown of morality in high places, we are concerned about the strengthening and maintaining of character in our own children and those with whom they associate.

I recently heard a sermon in which the speaker told of the breakdown of morals and of religious training in the country today. He expressed deep concern for the future because our society fails so often in developing men and women of integrity and high principles. Religion is no longer taught in the public schools, and too large a proportion of young people are growing up without vital religious experiences. Many good, conscientious leaders are perplexed by these problems and unable to find the answers.

We believe the answers to these problems are to be found in our Scripture reading. The responsibility for teaching the distinctive doctrines of the church is here placed directly upon the parents. They are charged specifically with the task of preparing their children for baptism at the age of eight. They are further charged with the responsibility of teaching their children to pray and to walk uprightly before the Lord. With all due respect being paid the church school, reunion, youth camp, Zion's League, and other church activities, the major portion of religious training must be obtained in the home. There are no substitutes for the influence of the good home in the religious development of the child.

IT IS INTERESTING to note that in the earliest days of our church the Lord placed the responsibility for religious education directly upon the parents. Many times this responsibility for the children's religious training rests on the mother, particularly in homes where the father is engaged in pastoral or missionary duties, or must be away from home much of the time. Sometimes otherwise competent fathers are almost totally inadequate in providing any religious instruction or a religious atmosphere in the home. Despite the problems involved in properly instructing our children, our recognition of the spiritual qualities of life which they will need most in the uncertain future should make it easy for us to accept this admonition of the Lord and put it into effect in our lives.

WHEN WE CONSIDER seriously the spiritual needs of our children, we quickly begin to look at ourselves. How shall we center our children's lives in the church? We can be assured it will not be done unless our own lives are first centered in the church. We shall not find the deeper values of life for our children unless we have first found them for ourselves. At best we can only give guidance and direction—we can never transfer our religious convictions in neatly wrapped and labeled packages to our offspring.

First and most important (and perhaps the only way) to effectively center our children's lives in the church is by the examples we set in our lives. Many times we have heard the old saying, "What we do shouts so loudly that what we say cannot be heard." We can never preach one code and practice another. The ten-year-old boy who breaks the ordinance prohibiting the shooting of firecrackers in the city limits is not likely to be greatly impressed by father's lecture if he knows that dad ignores stop signs when driving his automobile and has his speeding tickets "fixed." Children are not readily fooled—they have an uncanny perception of the insincere. It is tremendously important that parents' lives shall be genuinely centered in the church, that they maintain good Christian attitudes at all times, that they believe in and live the good life to the fullest extent possible.

We begin to center our children's lives in the church by establishing the habit of attendance of all the activities of the church. Of course, mere church attendance is not enough. We must also set an example of participation in the activities of the entire church program. We show our love for the church when we work for it, when we spend time and energy in its cause, when we expect and encourage our children to participate in its program. Children need the association of others of their own age and should therefore be encouraged to take an active part in girl and boy organizations, church school, Zion's League, and vacation church school. They should be encouraged to attend youth camps, retreats, group family nights, and reunions. They will have experiences at these activities which will serve to tie them to the church in a way not easily achieved by routine church services from Sunday to Sunday. These "mountaintop" experiences need to be renewed from time to time. Those who attend them feel the value of close associations, of oneness, unity, and power to achieve which are difficult to capture in a small struggling group, or even in large, conservative branches. In this close fellowship of living together children get a glimpse of Zion and feel the nearness of the Holy Spirit as they pray and work and share together in this thing which is so close to their hearts.

This habit of church attendance needs to be established early in family life so that the child never remembers a time when the church was not an important part of the home life. Families need to establish a pattern or way of life in which some things are habits, or an accepted part of life and about which no recurring decisions are necessary.

Sunday morning we go to church school and church; Wednesday evening we go to prayer meeting. These things are part of our lives, and there is no decision to be made when the time for church approaches. Moreover we take our children to church.

Unless there is some very good reason for it, the child should never be sent to church; he should go with the family as a group. Here example plays a vital part in establishing the habit of church attendance. The child should feel early that his attendance is necessary, not only for his own benefit and religious growth but also that he might help the church and those who are members of the church with him. Many activities of life today tend to take the children away from the family activities. This one great bond of family unity should be conscientiously maintained.

WE CENTER OUR CHILDREN'S LIVES in the church by teaching them to pray and by making prayer a fundamental and vital part of their lives. Here again our example plays an important part. When the disciples asked Jesus about prayer, he didn't give them a lecture about praying, but showed them how to pray by saying for them the beautiful Lord's Prayer. He first of all set them an example to follow.

We must be as aware of the spiritual needs of our children as we are of their physical needs, and we can be sure that the child who does not know how to pray will never mature spiritually. We must not wait until a child is five or six years old before beginning to teach him to pray. Long before a child understands what we are saying we begin teaching him to pray by saying our own prayers. I have gained much strength in praying with my children by their cribs long before they knew what I was doing, that I might be directed in training them and in establishing a Zion home in which they could live and grow in such a way as to be prepared to take an active part in the program of the church. I did not want them ever to remember a time when prayer was not a powerful influence in our home.

Very early in life the child will follow his parents' example and will want to pray too. Teaching him how to pray becomes a perfectly natural process, because he has been prepared for this experience from early infancy.

The tone for the prayer period should be set by a story time or some quiet form of activity just before bedtime. Perhaps we talk over the day's activities and introduce the things for which we should give thanks. At first the children may not know what to pray for, and we help them by letting them repeat a few sentences after us. It is surprising how soon they will take it away from us and finish a sentence or the entire prayer for themselves. Memorized or rote prayers should be used with caution, for they tend to become meaningless and a mere mouthing of words.

Many parents do not seem to realize how important it is that they pray each evening and not merely hear the child say his prayers. He learns how to pray and what things to pray for as he listens to his mother and father. He comes to realize how everyone, great or small, is dependent on the Father in heaven for strength and direction.

He Walked Alone

By Ione Sartwell

THE ROAD WAS LONG and filled with travelers—travelers on foot, of course, for no vehicles or animals were allowed here. Nor was the road paved. It was laid, instead, with loose gravel which tended to roll under the feet. That was why the wayfarers traveled in small bands—to hold each other up and to steady each other's steps.

But Duter traveled alone. He was strong, and his step was sure, so he swung along lightly, freely, without need of help. Sometimes he had to step off the road to pass a group of three or four with their arms entwined; he cast scornful glances as he did so. Sometimes he had to squirm between two groups as they all but blocked his way, and he complained as he did so.

Duter was proud that he traveled alone. He had strength and confidence. Besides, he had faith in his God.

* * *

The road was long and filled with loose pebbles. Duter's foot slipped. He stumbled and would have fallen, but the traveler behind caught and steadied him.

"The stones are slippery," he said to Duter. "Catch hold of my arm and walk with us."

But Duter waved him away. "No," he mumbled to himself. "Soon I would be holding up all of them." Besides, he did not need them, for he had faith in his God.

The road was long, and the pebbles were slippery, and the furrows grew deeper and deeper. Duter's foot slipped on a pebble and caught in a rut, and he fell to the ground.

A fellow-traveler jumped to his side and lifted him to his feet.

"Are you hurt?" he asked.

"No," muttered Duter.

"The road is getting much worse. Link arms with me, and we will steady one another."

"No," replied Duter as he turned aside. "He could not help me," he said, complainingly, to himself. "He is not nearly so strong as I. Besides, I do not need him, for I have faith in my God."

* * *

The road was long, the pebbles were slippery, the furrows grew deeper and deeper, and daylight was almost gone.

Duter stepped gingerly for he could no longer see the holes in the road in the darkness. He was losing time now; more and more groups of travelers passed him as he struggled to find the smoothest part of the road.

A fellow-traveler swung his flashlight toward him. "Here," he called, "come close and walk in my light. There is plenty for both."

But Duter stepped out of the circle of light and groped onward. "I have no light to offer in return," he grumbled to himself. "Besides, I do not need it, for I have faith in my God."

* * *

The road was long and slippery and dark. Duter was stiff and worn from the tenseness with which he had to walk to avoid the ruts, and his feet were bruised from the ever-slipping stones. His foot caught in a crevice and threw him headlong to the road. He felt a sharp pain through his head as his face struck the ground, and his ankle seemed to twist in its socket. He tried to raise himself, but the stones cut his arms, and a pain shot through his ankle as his foot twisted in the hole.

Two other travelers bent over him. "Put your arms around our shoulders," they encouraged. "We will help. . . ."

"No," answered Duter sharply, and his arms remained limp. "I cannot accept—"

Suddenly his speech faltered, for he felt someone talking to him.

The voice was kind, for it belonged to his God. "Why seek ye me alone, my son?" it questioned. "Thy faith is little to me without thy love for these, thy fellow-men."

"But I love . . ." Duter began.

"Then why dost thou scorn their service to thee? They seek me too through faith—and love of their fellow-men."

Duter raised his arms and let himself be lifted to his feet. Then he placed his arms firmly around the waists of his companions and added what strength he had to theirs. Suddenly daylight broke through. Duter felt strong and light and free once more, and he knew the road was shorter now.

A "Messiah" chorus has been organized and began rehearsals on October 21. This large choral group is open to all Graceland students, faculty, and staff and to singers in the Lamoni Stake area. The group will present Handel's popular oratorio, The Messiah, on December 16. If possible the service of music will be in the new Lamoni church.

Mr. and Mrs. Harold Smith of Nauvoo, Illinois, recently completed photographing Graceland students for The Acacia, Graceland yearbook. It is compiled and edited by a student staff under supervision of the Student Publications Board. The book provides students with a tangible reminder of their year at Graceland and gives others a student's-eye view of life at Graceland. This year's editor is Carol Freeman, Independence, Missouri, and the business manager is Jim Christenson of Holden, Missouri.

F. Henry Edwards spoke to the campus congregation at a recent Sunday morning worship service. He based his sermon on the scripture, "Bear ye one another's burdens."

Henry Anderson, Graceland voice instructor well known for his cartooning, has designed a "Go Graceland" button to be worn by spectators at Graceland athletic contests. The design features a yellow and blue striped yellow jacket holding a dagger in the position of a wasp's stinger and, over it, the words, "Go Graceland." The buttons were first sold at the '51 homecoming.

An estimated one thousand people attended the 1951 Graceland College homecoming. The theme was "Community Comradeship." Five hundred homecomers registered during the three-day celebration, and as many are estimated to have attended without registering. This, the largest crowd ever to attend a Graceland homecoming, consisted partly of the many women who concluded their week at the Church Women's Institute in Independence by coming to the homecoming festivities in Lamoni.

The Graceland Players presented Heaven Can Wait, directed by Roscoe Faunce, for the homecomers on Friday evening, after having done it on Thursday for the students. Featured in the cast were Dick Dunlap of the Graceland staff; Les Gardner, Wallsend, Australia; Daryl McKee, Rock Island, Illinois; Mary Midgorden, Osceola, Iowa; Bill Bruch, Cameron, Missouri; Charles Hield, Independence, Missouri; and Jeanne Slasor, Detroit, Michigan.

Graceland's Yellow Jackets held the team of Wentworth Military Academy to a 13-13 tie Saturday afternoon. Jim Kirkendall of Cameron, Missouri, and George Ku of Honolulu, Hawaii, did the scoring for the Yellow Jackets. The game was unusual in that all the scoring for both sides was done in the first half.

The homecoming fellowship service was held at 8:45 Sunday morning. Almer Sheehy, Chaplain of the Independence Hospital and Sanitarium, spoke at the 10:30 worship service, which closed the homecoming week end, on "The Expanding Community in 1951." Zimmermann Hall was filled to capacity for these services.

Between events on the homecoming schedule, alums renewed old acquaintances, reviewed familiar scenes, and grew nostalgic thinking of their student days. Those who had been gone for a few years noticed the changes on the campus that are inevitable to a growing institution—among them, the Memorial Student Center, Gunsolley Hall, the newly redecorated lounge in Walker Hall, and the innumerable smaller changes that only someone who has been away from a place and at length returns ever sees.

Dick Cheville, a Graceland sophomore recently returned from a tour of Europe, described his experiences to an attentive assembly audience on October 4. Dick and two Graceland friends, Jim Allingham of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and Don Olmsted of Des Moines, Iowa, bicycled through eight countries staying in youth hostels or, when necessary, sleeping in the fields. They visited European branches of the church and met families of Graceland students from abroad. Dick encourages everyone to duplicate their experience and says, "If you want to do it, you just have to get up and go."

KGRA, Graceland's student radio station, began a period of trial broadcasting on Monday, October 8. The rapid turnover of the staff, unavoidable in a two-year college, makes a few weeks of organization necessary each year before broadcasting can begin. This year's staff includes Manager Russell Walsh, Long Lake, Minnesota; Program Director Harold Keairnes, Kansas City, Missouri; Business Manager Perry Mair, Hammond, Indiana; and Chief Engineer Bob Creviston, Indianapolis, Indiana.

The station, which broadcasts three evenings a week to the college community, presents programs of news, music, interviews, and drama. Erleta Covalt from Los Angeles, California, in charge of radio drama, is producing and directing a series, In the Shelter of the Little Brown Cottage, dramatized by Lea Black from Estella Wight's novel of the same name and presented a few years ago over KMBC in Independence.

Centering Our Children's Lives in the Church—Part I

AS A CHILD IS LEARNING to pray we need to be informal and not be too much concerned about the mechanics of prayer or the posture he assumes. Whether he is kneeling or has his hands folded is not of vital importance. The enjoyment of the prayer may be greatly increased for a child if the prayer is said when he is warmly tucked in bed with father or mother kneeling beside him. He will watch his parents and gradually come to do as they do. The physical contortions a youngster may go through when he first begins to kneel can be most amusing, but the important thing is that the prayer goes on, and he is developing the attitude of thankfulness for blessings received and evidencing concern for the welfare of others.

Children should never be forced to pray. Sometimes they are tired and don't feel like praying. On such occasions, it may be well for the parents to ask, "Would you like me to say a prayer for you tonight?" Occasionally my children have said, "Mother, may I pray silently tonight?" This is as it should be as a child grows and develops spiritually.

Parents should never laugh at a child's prayers or repeat them to others in his presence, no matter how amusing they may be. Sometimes it is necessary to humor a childish whim. When our little girl was very young she was frightened by the unusual appearance of an elderly man who wore a beard. That night she refused to pray and announced that she didn't like Jesus anymore. When we questioned her further she said, "I don't like Jesus because he has a beard, and I'm not going to say my prayers to him ever again until he shaves every morning like my daddy does." I tried to tell her that all the men who lived with Jesus wore beards as it was the custom of that day. The more I talked the more determined she became in her stand that she was not going to pray to Jesus as long as he wore a beard. I went ahead, said my prayer, kissed her, and tucked her in bed. This fixation of hers continued for nearly a month, and each night I continued to say my prayer by her bed. One night she slipped out of bed by me and said a prayer of her own. I feel sure I could have done much harm if I had forced her in any way, or told her how foolish she was. She forgot unpleasant memories of beards as I continued to pray each night and once again found herself loving Jesus and wanting to pray to him.

I have often heard it said and have come to believe that the family that prays together stays together. In the ideal situation prayer should always be a shared experience. In some homes the blessing at the table is always said by the children—in other homes the praying is reserved for adults. Neither situation is desirable. It is a good thing for all members of the family to participate in prayer, for children learn to improve their own prayers if adults give thought to the blessings asked on the food and the other prayers they say. It is a good thing if the father shares in the evening storytelling when the youngsters are little and hears their prayers and says his own with them as he tucks them into bed.

No Complaints

A wise clergyman kept on his desk a special notebook labeled "Complaints of Members." Whenever one of his people began to criticize another's doings, he would say, "I'll just write it out so I can take it up with the board."

The sight of the complaint book and the ready pen had its effect. The clergyman kept the book for 40 years, opened it hundreds of times, and never had occasion to write a line in it.

P.S.

* MORE ON GRANDMA DAVISON

In the issue of October 8, P.S. carried a note about "Grandma Davison" and her great-great-grandchildren in the church. Brother George D. Gates, 4402 St. Paul Avenue, Lincoln, Nebraska, president of the Graceland Class of 1926, himself a great grandson of Grandma Davison, sends further information on the group of great-great-grandchildren attending Graceland this year. His own daughter, Bonita Gates, is attending Graceland as one of the four great-great-grandchildren. Nova Cox, a cousin of Bonita's, daughter of a sister of Brother Gates, plans to attend Graceland next year, making a group of five, if all the others return.

* THE TEST OF TRUTH

We can't believe everything our friends tell us, although they may be perfectly honest and sincere; but we do not stop taking with them. They may be mistaken or misinformed.

We can't believe everything we hear on the radio, even though commentators and advertisers may intend to tell the truth. The newscaster's obligation to deliver a good story, the prejudices and blind spots that flourish in the fertile soil of the advertiser's desire to sell something, all result in certain diminutions of accuracy and elasticities of judgment. But we do not stop listening to the radio.

We cannot believe everything we read in the papers, books, and magazines. All the normal human fallacies and limitations are represented in them. But we do not stop reading them.

We cannot even believe everything that comes to us purporting to be the word of God or the will of the Lord. False prophets can and do walk in the paths where true prophets have gone. But we do not refuse to listen, nor do we quit going to church.

Paul wrote to Timothy (II, 2:7), "Consider what I say; and the Lord give thee understanding in all things."

For our own good we ought to consider. We are not obliged to accept.

The literary apostle also gave this good advice, "Quench not the Spirit. Despise not prophesyings. Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."—I Thessalonians 5:10-21.

In more modern language we would use the word "test" instead of "prove." Good-speed translates the passage, "Do not stifle the Spirit. Do not disregard the utterances it inspires, but test them all, retaining what is good and avoiding every kind of evil."

Driving through a large city at night, one must learn to disregard the many brilliantly illuminated commercial signs, and concentrate on the small traffic lights. It isn't easy, but safety depends on it. In intellectual and spiritual affairs, we must learn to identify the traffic signals of truth.

Faye Franklin, R.N.

The nursing supervisor on third floor is shown here resting her hand on a gom-coaction pump—a handy gadget to have around when there is a wound or a stomach to clean out. Miss Faye was a schoolteacher before she started her nursing career. Her great-grandfather, Van Ausdale, was the first district president of the Gallands Grove (Iowa) District. She was only eleven when her parents moved to Kidder, Missouri. Here she was graduated from high school and then attended Kidder Institute at Denison, Iowa. She received her R.N. pin from the Sanitarium in 1921 and became the Visiting Nurse in Independence and outlying districts for the Metropolitan Insurance Company and the outpatient department of the Sanitarium. In 1930 she went to Missouri University Hospitals where she was in charge of student clinic and free clinic. Later she became night supervisor of Missouri University Hospitals and the crippled children division of the state of Missouri. She then went to the Ellis Fiscal Cancer Hospital where she was night supervisor for nearly three years. Her hobbies include cooking, handwork, and farming. She owns a farm of 120 acres north of Columbia. Each summer for many years she has taken a month's vacation and traveled. These trips have taken her to Alaska, Canada, Mexico, four times to California, and to every state in the union except the southeastern states.

Since 1948 Miss Franklin has been a member of the supervisory staff of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. She is a member of the American Nurses Association, and a past president of the Professional Nursing Association of Missouri, District No. 7. She has been a regular church attender all her life, and is a member of the West College Street congregation. Her sister, Eva, also has been a nursing supervisor at the San for many years. Though her training gives her a professional bearing, Faye likes people and finds it easy to mingle with the group.

News and Notes

PRESIDENT RETURNS

President Israel A. Smith has returned from Washington, D.C., where he attended a conference with State Department officials.

ATTENDS INSTITUTE

Elder Don Lents, assistant to the First Presidency, was in Midland, Michigan, November 3 and 4 for an institute for the South Central Michigan District.

WORK IN SOUTH

A branch was organized at Birmingham, Alabama, with Elder J. Henry Porter as pastor. Apostle Percy Farrow and District President W. J. Breshears were present at the organization meeting. Apostle Farrow was also present at the organization of a branch at DeKalb, Texas. Arvil Wilson is pastor there.

Brother Farrow also reports that Bishop Joseph E. Baldwin has taken up his responsibilities in the southern mission. He mentions that a missionary rally was held in Pensacola, Florida, October 14 which had an attendance of 500.

PROGRESS IN THE WEST

Apostles Charles R. Hield and D. T. Williams traveled in the west from October 23-November 2. They were in Phoenix, Arizona, for the ordination of Keith Rogers to the office of evangelist. While in Tucson, Arizona, both apostles preached. They also preached at El Paso, Texas. The men contacted some church friends in Nogales, Sonora, Mexico.

They reported that Elder Wayne Simmons is working in the Rio Grande Valley with Brownsville, Texas, as his objective. He is contacting Spanish-speaking people while there. His work in this area will continue until around Christmas.

COUNCIL MEETS IN KANSAS

The General Council of Women met at the home of Mrs. Frank Hoecker at Lawrence, Kansas, on November 13. Mrs. Pauline Arnsen who is director of the council reports that the women are making a scrapbook from the Women's Institute to aid future workers in the department.

WILDERMUTH FIRE

A letter from Lester Wildermuth advises us that the report published in this column in the issue of November 5 was incorrect in some particulars. The fire damaged some goods stored in the basement and the front rooms of the house. There was not much damage to the furniture, much of which was removed. Brother Wildermuth had been in Aurora with his son, Richard, who lives in Plano and is pastor of the branch. He returned to his home about 9:00 p.m. while the house was still burning. The insurance seems adequate to cover the loss.

COLLEGE GROUP MEETS

Nine colleges and universities were represented at the conference of college students held at the assembly room of the Sanitarium November 3 and 4. Speakers who addressed the group were Miss Gertrude Copeland, superintendent of the hospital, and Apostle Charles R. Hield. Among those present at the meeting were F. Carl Mesle, A. Neal Deaver, Harley Morris, Ray Zinser, Mrs. Luella Krahl, Mrs. Dutton, and Dr. L. O. Brockway, who directed the meeting.

How the Auditorium Serves all the Church

Our world-wide organization has its administrative headquarters and conducts its many lines of leadership and service in this building.

CONVERSATIONS with visitors reveal the fact that many people do not realize the number of ways in which the Auditorium serves all the church through the various departments and activities within its walls.

The Auditorium is a large office building, as well as a meeting place for the General Conference, and is in use for church work throughout the year. If members know the extensive service that the Auditorium renders, they will understand better why it should be completed.

FOR the sake of brevity, the various offices and departments housed by the Auditorium are simply listed, with no description. In spite of the care taken, it is possible that the list is not complete.

1. World headquarters of the church
2. Home of the General Conference
3. The First Presidency
4. Council of Twelve
5. Presiding Bishopric
6. Joint Council
7. Seventies
8. Order of Bishops
9. Standing High Council
10. Presiding Evangelist
11. Department of Religious Education
12. Department of Priesthood Education
13. Department of Music
14. Department of Radio and Transcriptions
15. Department of Women
16. Legal Department
17. General Office
18. Administration of Church Institutions
19. Department of Statistics
20. Agricultural Service
21. Historian
22. Library
23. Information Service

24. Guide Service
25. Museum
26. Special institutes and conferences of a church-wide nature
27. Laurel Club dining room

IN ADDITION to these, there are special council rooms and offices that are used occasionally, and are in great demand during General Conferences and institutes.

Sometimes a man under appointment, who is especially qualified for certain work, is called in to work for a limited time and needs office space. It is usually available. Such an instance occurred when Charles Neff was called from Omaha to plan this present campaign for the Auditorium. At the committee meeting Bishop DeLapp said to him, "We can give you an office and some furniture. Will you want a typewriter?" Brother Neff accepted. "We can also give you stenographic help if you want it," Bishop DeLapp continued. At the Auditorium the church is able to meet such special needs.

IT WOULD NOT DO to give the impression that the Auditorium is like the Pentagon building in Washington. However, for this part of the country, it is quite large. There are parts of it where numbers of office workers have never been, simply because it would involve a long walk around corridors and up ramps to places they have no reason to visit.

Every department serves the General Church in some way. The smallest branch and the farthest district are served by this building and its people. The Auditorium is the crossroads of the church. One meets people from all parts of the world there.

It is probable that not one casual visitor or Conference registrant in a hundred visits all of the offices in the building. Guides say that the total length of the corridors, ramps, and approaches to the offices is one and a fourth miles. At Conference time, it is not unusual for a few visitors, without benefit of chart or compass, and deficient in that personal quality known as "sense of direction," to become lost, wander about for a while, and then have to ask the way out. However, the building plan is easily learned, and visitors find their way about with no difficulty by the second day. A little attention to the markers by the ramps will enable anybody to find his way.

AS THE CHURCH GROWS—and it will grow—the increase in membership will call for an increase in the number of services by the General Church to the branches and the membership. That is natural. This will increase the usefulness and the demands made upon the Auditorium. It is another reason why the building should be finished.

You wouldn't want to live for many years in an unpainted house, with the walls unfinished, no rugs on the floors, and makeshift furniture in the living room to receive your company. For cultural and spiritual reasons you want your home to be bright and pretty.

The Auditorium is the home of the church. It is unfinished. For our own sake, as well as for good public relations, we ought to get it done.

We remember what a very good woman, who has given years of loyal service to the church in its organizations, said at a prayer meeting: "Why don't we finish the Auditorium? Why don't we get busy and raise the money for it? It seems to me that our sense of pride, our respect for the church, and our love of God would not let us rest until we have completed this work!"

tinues to be favorable. As indicated in previous reports, however, there is also a substantial increase in expenditures for the same period, leaving a reasonable margin, however, of gain in income over gain in expenses. Continued response on the part of our members in compliance with the financial law will assure us of maintaining this favorable position, and we trust will also enable us to reach our goal in raising funds for work on the Auditorium.

Washington, D.C., Church Building Project

The Herald for August 13, 1951, presented an official announcement and invitation as follows:

Erection of the Washington, D. C., church is undoubtedly one of the most important projects now being undertaken by the Washington Branch and the General Church. A beautiful lot has already been purchased in a very fine area, and it is highly important that the building to be placed on this site shall be representative of the church and provide for the functional needs of the branch, and at the same time serve as a point to which interested inquirers can go for information concerning the Restoration.

In designing this Capital City building the following points must be considered:

A sanctuary to seat not less than 150 and not to exceed 225

An assembly room for overflow crowds which could be used for other general meetings

A kitchen adjacent to this assembly room

Classrooms to provide for church school for the congregation

The pastor's study, serving also as a library

Baptismal font

No decision has been made up to the present time as to whether the design of the church shall be contemporary or traditional or modified traditional. A Colonial tone would blend with the surrounding buildings. It is a requisite that the building shall look like a church from the outside, as well as the interior. Landscaping should be tied into the total design. The amount of money available for this project will be approximately $100,000.00.

Faith of Our Fathers

By W. J. Haworth

ONE OF THE MOST EXALTED spiritual moments of my life was when, for the first time, I sang the hymn "Faith of Our Fathers." It was in the Auditorium at Independence. That hymn, sung from the heart by about 8,000 of God's people, seemed to link me with all the spiritual joys of the Restoration Movement and with the sacrifices and great sufferings of its pioneers.

I rejoiced that I was a humble unit in the grand army of the King of Kings, triumphantly marching forward to the accomplishment of the divine purposes—the deathless army of God's servants in which generation succeeds generation. When I sing this hymn with my brothers and sisters in smaller congregations it is accompanied with the same soul-exaltation.

To my regret I am not able to bring all of my own physical forebears into the background of my faith. If they could be assembled I cannot vision the pagans, Roman Catholics, Anglicans, and nonconformists among them standing together in any church and singing "Faith of Our Fathers."

But I am not worried about that, for I remember Paul's statement: "We have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence; shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits, and live?"—Hebrews 12: 9. And do not all Christians pray: "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name"?

THE TRUE FAITH OF OUR FATHERS is that which originated with the great All-Father. He sent Jesus to earth as the Author of eternal salvation to all those who accept this faith. Though the Savior was the Captain of our salvation by divine appointment, he said: "I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is life everlasting."—John 12: 49, 50.

Your fathers and mine gave their allegiance to the Restoration Movement because they believed it originated with God. That it embraced the truths of the faith which Jude indicated was "once delivered to the saints forever."—Jude 9, Basic English Version.

Christ was the one who "delivered" the true faith to the saints. He did not tamper with its provisions though it is recorded that he "thought it not robbery to be called equal with God." Hence our fathers cast off the faiths of men and gave their loyalty to what they termed "the Old Jerusalem Gospel" and the church organized according to the plan of Jesus.

There is a oneness about the faith that originated in heaven which makes it most distinctive. Paul wrote the saints of Ephesus: "Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, in one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all."—Ephesians 4: 3-6.

The faith which we and our fathers accepted is one in which the participants are members of the "one body" and in which they endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace, recognizing the hope of their calling in One Lord, the Author of salvation through the one faith.

Under the influence of the "one Spirit" our fathers were "baptized into Christ" and thus shared in the worship of the "one God and Father of all who is above all" and to those who obey becomes the One who is "through all and in you all."

THERE IS NO DIVERSITY in God the Father, no other saving name than the one Lord, our Savior. Nor can there be any authorized divergence in the one faith. Doubtless it was comprehension of this fact that caused Paul to declare: "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."—Galatians 1: 8. The apostle was so sure on this point that he repeated the anathema against any person or angel who would pervert the truth. Since Jesus, the equal of God, who brought the divine commandments to earth, declared them without change, why should any man or men assume the responsibility of making changes? We know that changes have been made, but not with the authority of God or his Son Jesus Christ.

In the sixth chapter of the Hebrew letter the author writes of the "principles of the doctrine of Christ" and enumerates them as being "faith in God," "repentance from dead works," "the doctrine of baptisms," "the laying on of hands," "resurrection," and "eternal judgment." Now the dictionaries define a "principle" as "a fundamental truth on which others are founded and from which they spring." From these fundamental truths or laws, Paul adjures us to "go on unto perfection," building a perfect man in Christ thereon.

These basic principles appealed to our fathers because Jesus brought them direct from his Father in heaven. They recognized Christ as their Savior and these fundamentals as the first steps in their salvation. There were scoffers who said it was folly to be baptized by immersion. It was just a command and few Christians believed it essential. It could be honored either in the breach or the observance. People do not worry much about obeying laws now. There may be fines for disobedience of state ordinances, but nearly everybody breaks them, and few are fined. So why worry? A strange philosophy, this; but it is pretty general. But our fathers had been taught to pray, "Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven." They prayed that way because they wished the divine will to prevail among men.

They were obedient because Christ said: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." They reasoned, "How can we pray for the kingdom of God to come and his will to be done on earth as it is in heaven if we neglect the simple ordinances without which we cannot even enter that kingdom? When the kingdom of God comes we want to be in it." They remembered also that Paul had said: "By one Spirit are ye all baptized into one body"—the dual baptism of water and the Spirit. They thus became members of the "one body."

A BODY OF PEOPLE is defined as "a number of members united by a common tie." Discussing the "one body," Paul says, "As the body is one and hath many members, and all the members of that one body being many, are one body; so also is Christ."—I Corinthians 12: 12.

Again, he says,

The body is not one member but many. If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing where were the smelling?—I Corinthians 12: 14-17.

All this leads on to the statement: "That there be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another. . . . Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversity of tongues."—Verses 25-28.

God "set" these officers and operations of the Spirit in the one body, just as he also "set" the nose on a man's face, and gave the eyes, ears, and all other functionaries their places in the human body. No human body functions perfectly without them. Reasoning from these premises, our fathers accepted the belief that apostles, prophets, teachers, priests, high priests, evangelists, bishops, and all the gifts of the Spirit were "set" in the church as permanencies.

Discussing the "one body" further Paul gives us three reasons why apostles and their helpers were "set" in the church:

1. For the perfecting of the saints.
2. For the work of the ministry.
3. For the edifying of the body of Christ.

Without doubt these three objectives remain unfulfilled, and can be properly performed only in the God-appointed way.

Further, the apostle states their tenure of office: "Till we in the unity of the faith all come to the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."—Ephesians 4: 13. The Christian world has spurned these officers and gifts of the Spirit, and their disunity is apparent.

OUR FATHERS accepted this type of ministry on the recommendation of Paul:

That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; but speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ; from whom the whole body fitly joined together and *compact*ed by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body to the edifying of itself in love.—Verses 14-16.

We are as cognizant today as were the men and women of the past that a God-directed effort is needed to prevent people from being tossed about by the variable winds of the doctrines of men. Our fathers wished to attain the "unity of the faith," to obey the will of God, the originator of the "one faith." It was not enough for them to pray "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven" without doing something to bring it about.

They had been taught to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread," but they had learned also that Christ is the "bread sent down from heaven." They yearned for the true bread, for it is written, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God." Christ had assured them that words which proceeded from that source were "life everlasting."

They had failed to find the "one faith" and the distinguishing features of the "one body" among the popular churches. They were told, "It is foolish to look for Pentecost today; nor for any of the spiritual gifts of the first century. It would be sacrilegious to set up apostles and prophets now." These all had been "done away," because "that which is perfect has come"—prophecies had failed, tongues had ceased, and the other spiritual gifts with them.

But the fathers of this church had read early Christian history and learned that these links with Deity had been broken because of apostasy—that the "one body" had suffered the fate Jesus foretold it would when he said, "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force."—Matthew 11: 12. I might quote at length from ecclesiastical historians which convinced them of this, but space is limited. It will suffice to quote from John Wesley, father of Methodism, with regard to these matters:

It does not appear that these extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were common in the church for more than two or three centuries. We seldom hear of them after that fatal period when the Emperor Constantine called himself a Christian; and, from a vain imagination of promoting the Christian cause thereby, heaped riches, power and honor upon the Christians in general, but in particular upon the Christian clergy. From this time they almost totally ceased; very few instances of the kind were found. The cause of this was not (as has been vulgarly supposed) "because there was no occasion for them," because all the world had become Christians. This is a miserable mistake; not a twentieth part of it was then nominally Christian. The real cause was "the love of many," almost all Christians, "waxed cold." The Christians had no more of the Spirit than the other heathens. The Son of Man, when he came to examine his church, could scarcely "find faith on the earth." This was the real cause why the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were no longer to be found in the Christian church; because the Christians had turned heathens again, and had only a dead form left.—Eighty-ninth Sermon, Beacham's Edition.

THROUGH TWELVE AND A HALF CENTURIES Catholics and Protestants were satisfied with the loss of the divine touch and ministry which graced the church of the first century. True, the reformers altered some of the practices of the Roman Catholic Church, but they adopted others, such as infant baptism, sprinkling instead of immersion, and the general adoption of the title "reverend" for their ministers—a title which in the Bible is ascribed to God only (Psalm 111: 9).

With the exception of a percentage of honest souls who sincerely desire to do the will of God, these churches are full of nominal Christians whose moral practices are identical with those of the non-religious with whom they associate. It was because of the prevalence of such a condition in the last days that the Lord spoke through Isaiah:

Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precepts of men, therefore I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, yea, a marvelous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise and learned shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent shall be hid.—Isaiah 29: 26, I.V.

This marvelous work was to be commenced in the time of the fathers of this church, for the word of the Lord continued: "Is it not yet a very little while and Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field." Lebanon is part of the Holy Land which lay barren for eighteen centuries and was miraculously returned to fertility about 1853, separated only "a little while" from the commencement of the marvelous "work."

In his fortieth chapter, Isaiah again takes up the "work" that was to precede the second advent of the Savior. Further, in chapter 62: 11, 12 he indicates that the "work" would be one of seeking out a people who should be the redeemed of the Lord, sought out, a city not forsaken.

Malachi takes up the story of this seeking out of honest souls: "Behold, I shall send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me; and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple."—Malachi 3: 1. Just as John the Baptist was the forerunner of the Lord in his first appearing, this and other scriptural evidences forecasted the appearance of a divine messenger to prepare the way for the Second Advent:

And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue and people, saying, with a loud voice, fear God, and give glory to him for the hour of his judgment is come.—Revelation 14: 6, 7.

This is one of the things which John said "must be hereafter."

This angel message surely qualifies as the commencement of the "marvelous work and a wonder" which God said, through Isaiah, he would proceed to do among a people who gave him only lip service while their hearts were turned from him.

THE "MARVELOUS WORK and a wonder" has started. It was ushered in when the angel came to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery in May, 1829. As a result of that and other angel visits, together with the restoration of divine revelation, the Church of Jesus Christ was organized on April 6, 1830, "a very little while" before the restoration of the fertility of Lebanon. The missionaries of the Restored Church presented two pictures for the consideration of our fathers.

The first is a word picture of the true church, "the one body" found in Revelation 12—a beautiful woman clothed with the sun, standing on the moon, and having her head adorned with an apostolic diadem of twelve stars. She represented the kingdom of God about to suffer violence. John saw her driven into a waste land for 1,260 years, at the end of which time she would come again to bear the remnant of her seed.

Here is the other scriptural word picture (I quote the Basic English Version):

And he took me away in the Spirit into a waste land; and I saw a woman seated on a bright red beast, full of evil names . . . And the woman was clothed in purple and bright red, with ornaments of gold and stones of great price and jewels; and in her hand was a gold cup full of evil things . . . And on her brow was a name SECRET, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF EVIL WOMEN AND OF THE UNCLEAN THINGS OF THE EARTH. And I saw the woman overcome as with the wine of the blood of the saints and of those put to death because of Jesus.—Revelation 17: 3-6.

As I have already pointed out, history records the wholesale entry of worldliness into the church under Constantine. Pagan temples became the cathedrals of the perverted Christian church, which became the State Church under the Roman Emperors—while they lasted. Gradually that Empire declined, and there were no more emperors after the invasion of the Lombards in 568 A. D. and the crowning of their first king in 570.

THE PERVERTED CHURCH then became the Roman Catholic Church, with its popes striving for temporal power over all the earth. It flouted divine laws and substituted laws of the church's own making. It discarded apostles, prophets, and all priesthood offices except the popes, cardinals, archbishops, et cetera of their own making. The priests, for a fee, granted indulgences to those followers who wished to embark on some special sin; they gave absolution to all who confessed. The majority of nominal Christians in either Catholic or Protestant churches simply continued in their sinning without the approval of the priests.

The fact stands out clearly that the practice of the churches in disobeying God with regard to his plain gospel requirements has had much to do with opening the floodgates of evil doing until there is little difference between the pagans and the nominal Christians. Our fathers were shown word pictures of the bride of Christ versus the usurper who fraternizes with the workers of iniquity. She promises worldly advantages to her membership—and so do her daughters.

Our fathers read the biblical warning:

Do you not see that your bodies are part of the body of Christ? How then may I take what is part of the body of Christ and make it part of the body of a loose woman? Such a thing can not be. Or do you not see that he who is joined to a loose woman is one body with her? . . . But he that is joined to the Lord is one spirit.—I Corinthians 6: 15-17 B. E. V.

ON THE OTHER HAND, the true church, the bride of Christ, back from the "waste land" into which the powers of evil drove her, demands of her members obedience to God's laws. She promises them no worldly reward. But, organized in 1830, after being in retreat for 1,260 years from A. D. 570, her challenge to all men is "Fear God and keep his commandments." The rewards she offers are spiritual ones—all that goes with the "at-one-ment" wrought by Jesus Christ—all that makes a person one with God and an heir to the spiritual good that flows through the "one body."

The church invites all to partake of these great joys: "The Spirit and the bride say, come. . . . And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."—Revelation 22: 17.

Fifty years and more ago our fathers decided for the Christ-bride and the "one faith." We have made the same choice. The issue is plainly before all who have not yet so decided—the woman typifying evil on the one hand; on the other, the bride of Christ, symbolizing all that is good. No one should delay in making the choice.

The Savior spoke a warning parable about ten virgins; five of whom were wise and five foolish. Some were prepared, and some not. While they awaited the coming of the bridegroom to claim them, they all slept. "And at midnight was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh. Go ye out to meet him."

Jesus is coming again. Then the choice will be for him to make. He will know his bride. In her the "one faith" will be maintained, for she will be the "one body." With joy he will claim her. Then it will have been too late for those who hung back to unite with the body of the Christ-bride, his church. Here is his promise of return:

"Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last."—Revelation 22: 12, 13.

Finally, John comments: "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."—Revelation 22: 14.

A Living Church

Part III

GOD IS LOVE. A church alive to God will reflect the love of God. Its prayers will be not only for its own, but for all men. For the gospel of the Man who died for the sins of the world is for the world. Truth is not the restricted property of a "chosen few." The light of God, like the light of the sun, cannot be enclosed in the hollow of the hand as property, for the very closing of the hand shuts out the light from the hand which claims it. The gospel of Jesus cannot be owned. Only by assimilation and reflection can it be possessed.

A living church will be concerned with life. It will not be primarily concerned with the problems of its treasury department. Jesus taught his disciples:

Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the gentiles seek;) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.

This counsel of Jesus is more than an idealist's dream. It is practical economically and psychologically, for although he focuses attention on souls and not on gold, yet sufficient intelligent concern for souls makes full churches, and full churches make full treasuries; but concern for the church coffers, so that the church activities are centered there, is a thread that grows thinner and thinner with the spinning. Temples of stone are not the objective of a living church. The real objective is the temple of God in the living man. Adjust the human heart, and all the complex problems of economics and sociology and government will fall into line. Improvement of social problems by any other means is only superficial. Poverty, by a living evaluation, is to be found in the spirit and not in the purse. A living church will be rich in living values.

A CHURCH will be as rich in its brotherhood as it is in its Fatherhood. A living church will be socially rich, because it will be brotherhood conscious toward all humanity, not simply toward its own denominational "brethren," drawing a line of caste between the member and the nonmember. Jesus said, "If ye love only them that love you, what thanks have ye? For sinners also love those that love them. . . . But love your enemies." A church alive to the gospel of Jesus will rise above a me-and-thee attitude among its members to extend a mighty friendship. For a living concept of universal Fatherhood cannot exist without a simultaneous living concept of universal brotherhood, regardless of the nearer affinity of the like-minded. Terms of address which distinguish members from nonmembers may express genuine sentiment, and they may be convenient and effective for certain purposes, but they probably had their origin in the Medieval Orders and are not necessarily inherent in the Christian religion itself. The important thing about brotherhood lies deeper than the superficialities of address. The important thing about brotherhood is that it be felt.

A living church will be God-centered. Mere church-centeredness is a kind of self-centeredness—a flaw as fatal to an organization as to an individual, and one which produces the same kind of warped personality. The quality of life owes its first loyalty to the living God in its own heart. A lesser loyalty can defeat the very purpose of a living church, for the divine ceases to be the divine when it becomes institutionalized in a frozen pattern of human interpretation. Above all things, all ideas, all interpretations, in a living church, stands God; and the examples which inspiration has used most often to attempt a description of its God—water, light, breath, life—have the quality of flow. The inspiration of a God-centered church, therefore, is a moving inspiration in living hearts, and not a mere static shadow of the interpretations of other men. He who will accept principles of creed which are opposed to the sense of justice in his own heart is not wholly honest with his heart. He is not alive to God.

A GOD-CENTERED CHURCH will be engaged not merely in church service, but in God service. The Good Samaritan did not inquire the affiliations of the man he served. He accepted him as a human being, as his neighbor. On the other hand, church service which is not God-centered can be a frustrating experience. Until a man's first loyalty is to God, he cannot be true either to himself or to an ideal. A church which is alive to God will give its first loyalty to the eternal values, not to personal or denominational concepts of those values.

A God-centered church will not rely for its salvation upon mere tokens of church membership. For the promises of God are not made on condition of a certified baptismal "pass." They depend not on superficialities of creed or name, but on actual qualities of soul. "Blessed are the merciful. Blessed are the pure in heart. Blessed are the peacemakers." The laws men comply with bring their blessing, regardless of denomination. The value of the principles of faith, repentance, baptism and so on, as taught by Jesus, is that they provide a favorable breeding ground for the development of virtuous qualities of soul. As naturally as the sun gives light, they open to the human heart the divine help it needs to build virtuous qualities of character. The need of the heart for this divine help is one reason why it has been said that man is saved through grace. But there is no place for artificiality in the doctrine of Jesus. There is no room for seeming. Doctrinal smugness and denominational astigmatism are not properties of a living religion.

IN ONE OF THE PARABLES, two sons were asked to labor in their father's vineyard. One agreed, but did not work. The other made no agreement, but he did the work. The unpromised son of God who did the work of God was a truer son than the son of the unfulfilled promise. Baptism, among other things, is a promise. But it is only a first step toward fulfillment. It is not the work. A God-centered church will do the work of God in the vineyard of the world.

Yet righteousness is more than works. It reaches into the basic spiritual materials of motives and attitudes, of which thoughts and acts are only the fruits. Men cannot purchase God by virtue, for the blessings of God are without price. The light and power of God cannot be bought by a simony of works any more than it can be bought by a simony of gold. We are not righteous because we do good. We do good because we are righteous. The Pharisee who kept the law was still a sinner because his acts were not righteously motivated; while the publican, who did not keep the law, was accounted righteous because of the greater purity of his motivation. The righteousness of a living religion lies deeper than a superficial righteousness of works. It begins in the elemental substance of what men are. For the living gospel which Jesus taught is more than an exterior adhesive plaster for broken lives. It generates new life. It re-creates. It makes a man whole.

Yet the fruits of the spirit are sure, whatever the spirit men harbor. The convictions which find summation in the language of the heart express a man. What a man's heart is, the man is. Therefore faith without works is dead.

THUS THE AUTHORITY of God bears the image and superscription of God. A child of God will show the traits of God. There are no artificial by-ways to truth—no easy correspondence courses in ten lessons. Out of the elements of heart a Way of Life is to be wrought by work. Salvation is something to be achieved. Only bullbilly or hypocrisy will seek to cloak itself under the guise of religion in an artificial and effortless attempt to achieve life's goals. For anyone to suppose himself to have a special benefit of Providence merely for physical compliance with a few rites which establish him as a member of a church is to classify himself as a thief and a robber, seeking to take for his own that for which he is unwilling to pay the price in daily living. Jesus said, "I am the door." That "I" includes the whole Jesus—every elevation of his character, not merely the dead Jesus on a Cross, his empty name, or a few choice tenets of his doctrine. There is no hocus-pocus of empty ritual which exempts a man from the effects of broken law. God is not mocked. There is no way of being but by becoming, through the tedious and arduous processes of growth. Rites and ordinances have value as covenants to be fulfilled, but it is in fulfillment that salvation lies. Baptism, confirmation, ordination—all the ritual of the church—can be either a desert wilderness in which men's souls are lost, or a fertile valley wherein they are sheltered and fed, for ritual is watered by the Spirit of God only through the channel of the heart's desires. A living church will be a positive expression of elevated desires.

NOR ARE THE PRINCIPLES of Jesus' gospel an authoritarian pronouncement of an arbitrary taskmaster. Such a concept comes of failure to understand the nature of the divine. Baptism, for instance, is not designed as a trap for nonbelievers. It is rather a loving invitation to a new birth, a new life, with an infinite heritage unlimited by the social traditions of family and community, where the bitter mistakes of the past are sloughed off with the past itself, being all the while not an impediment to the mercy of an all-loving God, but an impediment to the mind, a barrier to the spirit, a restriction to man's faith in himself to do something constructive about his life. Nothing hinders the future like the past, and the very essence of the gospel of Jesus is that it is focused upon a better future. The gospel of Jesus is not something apart from life. The laws of his gospel are actual laws of the mind. Out of forms which existed in the Hebrew world he chose certain acts to dramatize to the human mind, according to the laws of the human mind, the steps inherent in its spiritual growth.

Closely associated with baptism is the sacrament of the Communion. Various views of Communion exist in Christian churches, but in practice neither open nor close Communion insures against a light and thoughtless participation, for physical membership carries no guarantee of spiritual membership in the "body of Christ." In addition, the argument of close communionists that the blood of Jesus does not flow outside his body is subject to questioning, for if the blood of Jesus means anything at all, its significance lies in the fact that it did flow outside his body. If there is an argument for close communion it must lie in a view of communion as a renewal of the original covenant of baptism, and that until the original covenant is made it cannot plausibly be renewed.

Yet Communion, as a covenant of the continual extension of God's helping hand through the processes of growth, is more than renewal. For both life and death are continuing processes, and growth is a grander and grander repetition of being born again. Spiritual death is the continuous exercise of the destructive choices of evil, causing the life to grow less and less, narrowing the borders of being. Eternal life is also the exercise of repeated choices, but of good, expanding the borders of being, enlarging the spiritual faculties, reaching out to higher and better things. Thus new forces of life, as long as we live and grow, are continually being born in us. Hence the utility of a covenant of continual rebirth. In the processes of bodily growth and repair, and of decline and death, men acquire a complete new body periodically. Communion, as a covenant for spiritual growth and repair, can create a new mind, a new spirit, a new life, according to the processes which are inherent in nature. For spiritual growth, like physical growth, requires not only that we are born again, but that we are born again and again forever.

ALIVING CHURCH is, above all other things, a home for the Spirit of the Divine. And spirit, regardless of modern scientific materialism, is a living fact. Forever flowing, it is found everywhere, operating at every level at which life thinks and feels. It moves in a mob, at a football game, in a song. In men this subtle spiritual emanation is labeled personality; in place, atmosphere; in worship, God.

Spirit is the great transformer. Meek men can turn lynching beasts under the influence of a violent mob spirit. Similarly, the Spirit of the Divine, operating through groups of men, can transform them into the spiritual likeness of God. It is only through the spread of such a spirit through the world that an age of the Golden Rule will ever come to supplant the Rule of Gold—an age when the soul of a man shall be esteemed of more value than the gold of Ophir. The fostering and spreading of such a Spirit, by the conception and rearing of spiritual children of God, is the work of the church as bride of the Divine.

A THOUGHT IS A REALITY. It exists in matter. Actual electrical impulses are sent out from the head of a man as he thinks. These impulses may eventually be differentiated to a degree where his very thoughts may be read. As actual material impulses generated in the world, thoughts take on a new significance and importance. It may be possible that they have an effect even on nature. It may verily be that faith, as a positive thought process, can move mountains. The very miracles of Jesus may have been accomplished by the operation of thought functioning at a divine level. The scientific discovery of the material reality of thought brings close the focal point of the materiality of mind and the spirituality of matter. Here spirit comes out of its misty realm of nothingness and takes on reality, and God, at once the Thinker and the Thought behind the material universe, becomes the deepest reality of all.

In the mind of man is a divine receptacle for light which is still in process of development. Psychologists refer to its functioning as insight or intuition, or merely as a hunch. Some people possess this gift in a far greater degree than others. It lies outside the field of reason—above it and beyond it—yet reason itself cannot exist without it, for the hunch is the living nucleus of every sound syllogism. Intuition underlies and pervades all things. Intelligence cannot exist without it.

We see. But the mechanism of the eye cannot explain sight. Sight, for all the physical phenomena involved, is a spiritual concept, with the same relationship to the physical mechanism as life has to the body, and God to the world. This relationship is true of every faculty and sense.

A Shepherd's Story

The Autobiography of Marcus H. Cook

IX. The Sunset Years

LAST MISSIONARY SERIES

A few days later I received word that arrangements had been made. When I arrived in Salem, I found that Mr. and Mrs. Zilke had asked that I make my home with them while conducting the meetings. One of the brethren rented an organ and some of the singers came from Portland part of the time to help with the music. I preached two weeks to congregations of from twenty to forty, and the interest was all a minister could hope for.

Brother Boatwright invited a man who was working with him to attend the services, but the man told him he was not interested; he considered religion a lot of emotion and didn't care for it. Brother Boatwright asked him to come and hear the man who was preaching and he would hear something different. He consented, and on the night he came I had announced that I would speak that evening on the financial law. I saw this man and his wife in the audience, and as it was the first sermon he had ever heard by one of our ministers, I wondered how he would react to it. He was interested. He came the next night and gave very close attention.

The next night closed the series, so I gave a special talk for the benefit of those who had decided to be baptized. When the people began to arrive, this man's wife said she wanted to be baptized and asked me what was required of people who desired membership. I was somewhat surprised and feared that she did not understand sufficiently what it meant. She and her husband had come early, so she could have a talk with me, and I explained as clearly as I could the seriousness of making a covenant, or contract, with God, the high ideals of the church, and the importance of being adopted as a child of God. When I finished, she again said she wanted to be baptized. At the close of the service ten people had given their names for baptism. When I bade them good-by after the service, her husband asked me if he should also decide to be baptized, would it be all right? He said he had not yet fully decided. I told him that he had heard what I had said to his wife, and that if he decided he was willing to accept, I would gladly baptize him.

The baptismal service was held in Portland, and this man came prepared. Eleven were baptized and confirmed. The man I have been writing about was soon called to the priesthood and has done excellent work. Most of the time he has acted as pastor in Salem. A mission was organized, which later became a branch. The branch has grown until now the congregation has a nice church building, all paid for.

This was the last missionary series I preached. I have sometimes visited branches where I labored in the past and have received a warm welcome. I have tried to encourage people to faithfulness and to strengthen the Saints. I have helped wherever I had the opportunity. I try to do as St. Peter says (I Peter 3: 15): "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an answer with meekness and fear to every man that asketh of you a reason for the hope that is in you."

Occasionally, while riding on a train I meet someone who wants to know something about the church. Sometimes when I least expect it I meet people who want to know what we believe. Therefore I try to keep myself informed so that I may be ready to teach the gospel whenever opportunity offers. Sometimes it requires tact and care to create sufficient interest that people want to know what we stand for. I have studied human nature carefully that I might be able to know where and when and how to interest people. I believe I have done some good and hope that as long as I remain in the flesh, I may be a help to the work.

I love the Saints. I love the old people, who, by their faithfulness, have made possible the advantages we enjoy. I love the middle-aged, who are bearing the brunt of the battle, and pray that God may give them strength to do better work than I was able to do. I love the young people, who have their lives before them, and pray that they may qualify for the great work that may yet be possible to accomplish.

REFLECTIONS AT EIGHTY-SEVEN

Since old age has disqualified me to be a leader as I once was, I want to get behind and push and do all I can that the work may go forward. I hope that when the returns are all in, I may be one who has made a little contribution to its success. I have been successful in winning the love and esteem of many, both old and young, and the confidence they have in me is a challenge that makes me tremble lest I fail to measure up to the standard they have set for me. Above all, I love my Savior, whose life and example I have tried to follow and whose teachings and wisdom surpass every other life lived on this earth.

I share the hope expressed by John:

Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God: Therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure.—I John 3: 1-3.

I am now past eighty-seven years of age. There is not much I can do because of physical weakness resulting from advancing age, but I hope that my life will be an inspiration to those who must continue the work until Zion shall be established, and the pure in heart shall be gathered from all over the earth.

(The End.)

Graceland Man Goes to Washington

A recent announcement from John Dale Russell, Assistant Commissioner for Higher Education, tells of the appointment of Granville K. Thompson as specialist for College Business Management in the Office of Education at Washington, D.C. The announcement, among other things, contains these items:

Mr. Thompson comes to the Office of Education from Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa, where for the past four years he has been business manager and treasurer. During World War II he served in the Communications Branch of the Office of Strategic Services, spending thirty months in the European Theatre.

In his capacity as specialist for college business management Mr. Thompson will conduct studies on the problems of college accounting, procurement, and maintenance, and will act as consultant to state and regional groups of college business officers.

Question Time

Question:

1. Since all sin is spiritual, please explain how Christ's blood, which was physical and also dead when shed by the spear thrust into his side, can atone for a spiritual sin. F.W. Iowa

Answer:

All scriptural references to the atoning blood of Jesus should be understood as typical of his entire sacrifice of love that sinners might be saved through obedience to his teaching. Jesus, the Creator of the world (John 1: 3, Colossians 1: 17) willingly and humbly submitted to the worst that Satan and sinful man could do to him in human flesh that God's way of life and its power of love over sin and death might be made manifest. Unselfish obedience, even unto death, was a necessary part of the atonement.

For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.—Romans 5: 19.

Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience through the things which he suffered; and being made perfect he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him.—Hebrews 5: 8, 9.

Question:

2. In what sense was the shedding of Christ's blood for the remission of sin?

Answer:

The cleansing power of the Holy Spirit emanating from Jesus, whose blood was shed, brings remission of sin and regeneration of life to all who accept his way of salvation. That way is faith in God, repentance and baptism for the remission of sins (Acts 2: 38; 22: 16), the laying on of hands by authorized ministers for the gift of the Holy Ghost (Acts 8: 13-18; 19: 2-6, Moroni 2: 1-4; Doctrine and Covenants 32: 3; 34: 2), and a continuance in obedience to the end (Matthew 24: 13, Authorized Version).

But if we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.—I John 1: 7.

Question:

Do not all Christian churches taken together constitute the universal church of God? Missouri E.E.J.

Answer:

Were it possible that in the course of time the United States government should divide and subdivide into a number of distinct governments, each outwardly cherishing the early constitution yet greatly varying in form of organization inasmuch that none followed the original pattern; and if all groups adopted different and conflicting principles, some holding to democratic, some to monarchical, some to socialist, and some to communist principles, each one following its own independent policy, their differences becoming so great that contentions entered, leading at times to devastating wars; would you say that such a group could be called "the United States of America"?

The parallel with modern Christianity in relation to the constitutional system left by Christ is not overdrawn. The differences here described are not in the least less than those that exist in modern Christianity. For Christ to accept all, he must accept a multitude of irreconcilable doctrines, antagonistic forms of organization, and discordant policies. Instead of leading the Christian world in his own appointed way, he would find it necessary to follow in devious and diverse paths where erring men lead. Can he do it? If so, what becomes of his leadership? What becomes of the immovable and unchangeable rock upon which he said he would build his church? What becomes of his church when it has moved over to other shifting foundations?

The church's constitution is for one church, for which there is but one foundation, one Head, one unchanging form and doctrine. Great as that foundation may be it is not great enough for two or more churches. In that one church only can Christ find perfect expression and the opportunity for the full and complete accomplishment of his eternal purposes; and only in it can the children of men find unlimited salvation and eternal life. Any and all other organizations the world might provide could not add one whit beyond what the church of Christ offers. CHARLES FRY

Question:

Is it possible to interpret the Word of Wisdom to mean we should not can, freeze, or otherwise process fruits and vegetables so we may have them 'out of season'? Mrs. L.H. Iowa

Answer:

I believe it would be contrary to the mind and will of God to interpret that part of the Word of Wisdom relative to fruits and vegetables in season as to mean that we could use them at no other time. Section 86: 2 reads in part as follows: "All wholesome herbs God hath ordained for the constitution, nature, and use of man, every herb in the season thereof, and every fruit in the season thereof. All these to be used with prudence and thanksgiving."

Intelligent reasoning teaches us to use fruits when they are ripe and vegetables when they are mature. When fruit is ripe and vegetables have grown to maturity they are "in their season." If these fruits and vegetables are taken in season and preserved by present-day methods, then we may use them in their preserved or "in season" form to satisfy our constitution and nature. We need to be reminded that God has stated in Section 86 that all these are to be used with prudence. Prudence implies economy, frugality, thrift, wise and saving practices.

It would be contrary to intelligence, light, and truth, or the glory of God, to think that our present-day methods of canning and freezing fruits and vegetables are at variance with the Word of Wisdom. Canned, preserved, and frozen foods lose very little or none of their power to nourish and strengthen the physical man. Furthermore, when they are taken in their ripened state, preserved by canning or freezing, their goodness and value as food is sealed for future use. MYRON REED SCHALL

Designs Against Health

By Chris B. Hartshorn

PLEASE PASS the emulsified bread. It's soft like newly baked bread." The "bread softener" product has been in use among bakers since 1947. By adding a chemical called polyoxyethylene monostearate a softer bread can be produced with a 50 per cent saving in shortening according to House Committee Report No. 3254. This report says that the findings do "not permit a conclusion that bread containing [these] compounds was safe for continuous use." Evidently it is not immediately dangerous to health, but also it is not desirable.

"In consequence of the evils and designs which do and will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last days," said the Lord in the revelation of 1833, "I have warned you, and forewarn you, by giving unto you this word of wisdom by revelation. . . ." The bakers who use this commercial emulsifier may be innocent of any design to injure the health of their customers. They are assured by the suppliers that their product is good and will save them money. Nevertheless, they are guilty with the manufacturer who spawns the concoction for the harm done. Ignorance cannot be plead as an excuse when health and life are at stake.

This government report tells of the flour-milling industry using nitrogen trichloride (Agene) to artificially age certain types of flour for nearly thirty years before any harmful effects were observed. Through the research of Sir Edward Mellanby in 1946 it was learned that bread made with flour which had been treated with Agene would produce "running fits" in dogs eating it. Although they were not able to establish any evidence of harm to human beings from the use of the chemical, the Food and Drug Administration prohibited its further use.

Foods Not Protected

Experiments with the use of the chemical known as thiourea to prevent mold on citrus fruits in 1946 produced much more positive results. It was evident that its poison penetrated the skins of the fruit and got into the juice. Its use was therefore banned. Then some manufacturer came up with the discovery that thiourea did wonders to frozen fruits in keeping their fresh appearance and color. A packer sent out a shipment of fresh peaches. About the same time a second packer who tried it called in the Food and Drug Administration and learned that the food was poisonous. The word went back to the first packer, and an exciting and dramatic chase was on. Fortunately the goods were located before the population of any cemeteries was enlarged. The most distressing comment in the report on the episode is this: "Under the present provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act a person wishing to use a chemical in food is not required to consult with the Food and Drug Administration."

A sweetening substitute in use for diabetics and others for over fifty years came under study by the FDA three years ago. This chemical, para-phenetyl urea, was found to be poisonous. However, one firm continued to use the product "even after being repeatedly warned of its toxicity."

A salt substitute, lithium chloride, was put on the market about two years ago. Subsequently it was discovered that after a person has been on a saltless diet for some time that lithium chloride "is extremely poisonous." Action was taken and it was removed from the market, but only after "several deaths had occurred."

Soft Drinks and Meat

By the extravagant advertising campaigns in America we have become a nation of soft drink users. Many do not realize, however, that these carbonated drinks, which contain phosphoric acid, are quite harmful to the enamel of the teeth. Experiments at the Naval Medical Research Institute showed that a human tooth put in soft drinks containing this chemical lost its enamel and became soft in twenty-four hours. In experiments on rats it was shown that their molars were dissolved down to the gum line after being given nothing to drink except these beverages for a period of six months. Dr. Clive McCay, Cornell University nutritionist, stated that the acid, not the sugar, in the drink is responsible for this harmful result.

There has been much discussion about the harmful effects of meat, usually based upon interpretations of the Word of Wisdom. However, these discussions have centered upon the climate and scarcity of other foods, more than on the point raised in this House Committee Report. Its investigations show that some of the new chemicals reach our food indirectly through the use of insecticides and fungicides. For instance, DDT which has been used in dusting crops is hailed as a wonder chemical in keeping the insect army under control. Although investigations have gone on for years and no immediate toxic effect on humans was shown to be discernible, it was not realized until recently that DDT will store itself in the body fat and can have a serious and cumulative effect on the liver.

The Texas Research Foundation, an independent, nonprofit organization, recently analyzed ordinary meat products bought at random in local meat stores, and found that the degree of DDT contamination in fat meat ran as high as 69 parts per million. The Food and Drug Administration has set 5 parts only as a safe maximum.

Mineral Oil and Chemicals

For years the druggists have recommended mineral oil as a bowel regulator. It was regarded as nonfattening and harmless. It was also used in a variety of special dietary foods such as salad dressing, as a substitute for food oils. As a result of some studies which began some ten years ago, it has been proved that mineral oil taken into the body with foods interferes with the absorption of various vitamins. It was also found that when mineral oil was given to infants they sometimes developed lipoid pneumonia. As a result of this evidence mineral oil is no longer permitted as a food ingredient.

A witness for the Food and Drug Administration testified before the House Committee that over 800 chemicals are used, or have been used, or have been suggested for use in foods. Of this total, it has been estimated that 704 are in use today, and of this number now in use only 428 are "definitely known to be safe as used. . . ." Thus there are approximately 276 chemicals being used in food today, the safety of which has not been established to the satisfaction of the Food and Drug Administration and many other groups concerned with the health and safety of the public."

Under the present setup FDA cannot act legally before the food product has been put on the market. In contrast to this situation, the Food and Drug Act of 1938, with regard to drugs, requires that all manufacturers submit evidence to show that a new chemical is non-injurious before they introduce it—even if the tests take ten years to be completed.

All the testimony given before the committee leads to one obvious question: What can the average housewife do to protect herself against the ever-increasing use of chemicals which eminent nutritionists have called "alarming"? In the opinion of most of those who are discussing the subject, the solution is not for the housewife to become an amateur chemist, but to insist that Congress give the Food and Drug Administration adequate legislation to handle the problem before the product gets on the market.

We will be very happy to receive suggestions which may be sent to the office of the Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, incorporating the features herein enumerated. These suggestions should be in the form of sketches and detailed drawings, to give both idea and perspective and functional arrangement. We will welcome these especially from our church architects, who we are sure will have a deep interest in this project. These suggestions and ideas will be of material assistance in final decision as to plans and the selection of an architect. We would like to receive all such by September 1. Lot sketch showing topography can be obtained from the Presiding Bishopric on request.

If any who are interested in this important project have materials in course of preparation, they should be sent to the Presiding Bishopric without delay or—if this is not now possible—word should be sent to the Bishopric as to when they will be available.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

By F. Henry Edwards

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Russell F. Ralston:

As I look back over the reunion season of this past summer I am conscious of the fact that God certainly blessed the people in the reunions held in this area. The degree of the spirit that accompanied these meetings was truly outstanding. In each reunion the spirit of prophecy was present, and the people were encouraged, admonished, and instructed. It is not possible for me to relate all that was given, but I do desire to tell you of some of the things that came to us in the reunion at Hagerman, Idaho. From the beginning it was evident that the people of the Utah and Idaho Districts had made spiritual preparation for their week together.

During the week God spoke to us in many ways. The sweet peace of his Spirit pervaded our services, and many felt the beauty of its presence. His voice was heard in the testimonies of his people, in the classes, in the preached word, and in many other ways as we sought to attune ourselves to him. In the latter part of the reunion God spoke directly to us, giving us words of counsel. Throughout the messages that came was the assurance that if we would but be true to the Christ he would always be with us to strengthen and to bless. We were challenged to show our thanks to him in all things.

In the matter of spiritual blessings we were admonished as he reminded us that all too frequently we look forward to the spiritual feast we might have in meetings such as this, and then when they are over we leave the Spirit where we found it rather than taking it with us in our lives permitting it to lead us, teach us, and mold us into godlike people.

Our attention was called to the awfulness of petty contentions that so often rule our lives and thus restrain us from accomplishing God's purposes. We were admonished that we should spend our time in self-examination and in any effort to correct our own faults rather than wasting ourselves in criticism of our brothers.

Finally we were challenged with the reassurance that God is leading his people and that if we will but put our trust in the leadership of those whom he has called to positions of responsibility that he would bless them beyond their human abilities. Not only did this mean the men of full-time work, but as well their associates of the local ministry. We were admonished to support them in faith and prayer and promised that if we would do so God would bless them with sufficient strength to accomplish their work.

From Eugene Theys, Rotterdam, Holland:

More and more of our men and women are coming to Germany in the American uniform. Often we learn of their whereabouts long after they have contacted some of our German members. Brother Louis Zonker and I are doing our best to keep in contact with them, but this isn't always easy. We would appreciate your putting a statement in the Herald asking all those who are known to be in Germany or Europe to get in contact with our mission office in Rotterdam (Annastraat 2, Rotterdam, Holland). I believe we have at least eighteen of our young people in Germany at the present time. We have contacted many of those who are here and we hope to continue this ministry in the future.

We had the privilege of having Captain Floyd H. Engstrom, our church Army chaplain, at our last mission conference in Hannover. Brother Engstrom was our morning speaker at the conference. Sister Engstrom came with him. We also had Cpl. Ralph Ruckman, a teacher in the priesthood. The German Saints enjoyed our American guests, and I am sure that everyone had a good time. We have recently received word that Lt. Barbara E. Metcalf is stationed in Frankfurt, and she has already contacted our members in Offenbach. Brother Ruckman has been to Holland twice, several times to our group in Offenbach, and once to Hannover, so you can see that our men and women in service are interested in our work here.

Brother Zonker and I have made two trips into Germany since his arrival, and we leave for Germany again in November. After this coming trip, I will be occupied in the building of our mission house in Hannover, but Brother Zonker is fitting into his work very well, so my hands will be free for this new task.

A New Church Building for the German Mission

The surveys made by representatives of the Joint Council in 1947 and in 1950 pointed to the necessity of establishing a Mission Headquarters in Germany. The first survey in 1947, made by President F. Henry Edwards, Apostle M. A. McConley, and Bishop G. L. DeLapp, showed the advisability of this, but conditions at that time were most unfavorable, and the matter was held in abeyance until the fall of 1950 when Brethren Edwards and DeLapp again visited Europe. In company with Apostle Blair Jensen and Seventy Eugene Theys they covered the German Mission, meeting with all the congregations. This survey and study confirmed the need for a church building to provide headquarters facilities for the Mission.

A lot was selected and purchased in a fine, central location in the city of Hannover. Plans have been drawn up and a contract entered into for this building. It will provide a small chapel for the Saints in Hannover, and living quarters for the missionary to Germany. We know that this forward move in further establishing our work in Germany will be noted with a great deal of satisfaction on the part of the church members everywhere.

The Disposition of Sin

By Bessie Taylor

SIN IS AN UGLY WORD. Openly, we hate it and avoid it, but inwardly we are infested with it in some measure. To eradicate sin from our lives is a big problem, not only for the new convert, but also for the seasoned Christian as well. The difficulty is that old habits and patterns refuse to be uprooted. The consequence is we find ourselves in two environments. No man can serve two masters, yet we attempt to commune with sin and purity, light and darkness, time and eternity, God and the Devil. How can we triumph over sin?

To die would be one solution, for this would arrest all physical environment; but happily or unhappily we continue to live. The spiritual man having been born in us in baptism comes into life, and this necessitates that the natural man must pass from life into death. Regeneration for the new is degeneration for the old. The method by which this withdrawal is accomplished may be achieved in three ways: (1) by quick extraction, (2) by gradual process, (3) by limitation.

Paul says, "If the Christian is to live unto God, he must die unto sin." If he does not kill sin, sin will kill him. A large class of sins can be met only by a quick method. Sins of the appetite and flesh must be discontinued outright. Paul says if anything offends thee, cut it off. Alcohol and tobacco are best stopped with one slashing operation. Thievery, too, can not be slowly reduced. Neither can wife-beating nor lying. An uncompromising rupture with the past will not dissipate the soul's vitality, for the wound will heal quickly.

THE SECOND METHOD of eliminating sin is again expressed by Paul in Romans 8: 13: "If ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Colossians 3: 5: "Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth: fornication, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry."

In contrast with the quick eradication, this mortification Paul refers to is a gradual process. To break suddenly at every point with the past would be impossible. Power over some temptations is to be won only by degrees. The difference between the sin of drunkenness and the sins of temper and covetousness is that with the first, the convert is dealing with his environment, but in the second case, it is a matter of adaptation. The drunkard's temptation is a known and definite quantity. His safety lies in avoiding some external and material substance.

Northern California District Reunion Grounds

FOR A NUMBER OF YEARS the presidency and bishopric of Northern California District have been attempting to locate suitable grounds for reunions and other district gatherings. This was finally consummated with the purchase of the property known as "Happy Valley Resort," three miles northeast of Santa Cruz and seventy miles south of San Francisco. There are twenty acres with groves of redwood trees, a small stream, a frontage of two and a half acres of beautiful lawn, a large swimming pool, numerous cottages, a house, and a dining room. A recreational hall is now being used for church services. Plans are under way to add additional cottages, dormitories, assembly hall, and a class hall. An addition to the dining hall has already been begun. It is said by general church officers that this is one of the finest properties owned by the church for reunion purposes.

The first district conference was held the week end of July 14 on these grounds with representatives from all over the district. Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Seventy George A. Njeim, and High Priest Alma C. Andrews of the general ministry were associated with the district presidency and bishopric in conducting the conference, classes, and preaching services. The Saints will long remember the fine spirit present throughout the entire session.

On Memorial Day and the Fourth of July about two hundred members gathered on the grounds in work clothes to prepare the property for church purposes. The same spirit of mutual helpfulness was in evidence in this recent gathering, and it is planned that as much labor as possible be contributed in the erection of additional buildings.

During the Saturday session of the conference it was pointed out by District President L. A. MacDonald that this venture should be financed so as not to interfere with the income of the local branches or the general church. The Saints responded readily to a request that they pledge 1 per cent of their income for a five-year period.

Arrangements have been made for the management of the property through a Board of Stewards with Brother Irvin Petz of Tracy as chairman.

The ill-tempered grouch on the other hand can make very little of his environment. What he has to deal with is temper and attitude itself. His case is not a surgical one, nor a medical one; here the knife is of no more use than in a fever. His remedy lies in the gradual sweetening of the inward spirit. The man whose blood is pure has no disease to fear, and likewise, he whose spirit is purified becomes proof against the sins of anger, malice, jealousy, etc.

These two methods of dealing with sin depend upon two different principles. The first may be compared to horticultural pruning—the useless organs are removed so that the vital processes may be more active in the more fruitful parts. The second method is based on the law of degeneration. The useless members are not cut off but are denied exercise. This encourages the gradual decay and as temper, etc., are less exercised they cease to become a part of life. What we don't use, we lose.

THE THIRD METHOD—that of limitation, treats those correspondences which cannot be cut off, or reduced by mortification. We have many correspondences that are not wrong in themselves, but only in their extremes. Up to a certain point they are lawful and useful. They are closely related to the vital parts, and the organism cannot afford to lose them. The proper treatment in this case is that of limitation. There is no set rule where the limit may be. It is up to the individual to determine, but here the economical law of the "diminishing good" comes into play. "In all things there is that marginal unit where added units diminish rather than improve."

It is an art to know just how much we should eat, and how much to love money and be saving. Up to a point it is necessary, beyond that it becomes one of the worst sins. Another thing to keep in balance is pleasure. Recreation and leisure are vital, yet when carried too far they take us away from God. Where is the marginal unit of "legitimate pleasure"? Limitation demands self-denial. It is natural to resent self-denial, yet no one is called to a life of self-denial for its own sake. Self-denial is giving up correspondence, in which there is a little life, to enjoy a correspondence in which there is an abundant life. To concentrate upon a few great correspondences means we must deny our time and effort on the less vital, temporal things. It is only limitation that can secure the illimitable, the infinite. The penalty of evading self-denial also is that we get the lesser instead of the larger good. To re-

Cornerstone for New Council Bluffs Church

On Sunday, September 30, 1951, at 2:30 p.m., the Council Bluffs, Iowa, Branch had the happy experience of laying the cornerstone of the new church that is under construction.

The weather was fine, and about 500 people were in attendance. W. Wallace Smith, of the First Presidency, and Sister Smith were present representing the General Church. Mayor Marion L. Shugart made a statement of appreciation for the city officials. The hymn, "The Church's One Foundation," was sung as an opening number. After a call to worship by Pastor V. D. Ruch, the congregation sang, "How Firm a Foundation," and Elder Arthur E. Dempsey, Jr., gave the invocation. Mayor Shugart's talk was followed with a Scripture reading by Elder L. M. Spence from I Chronicles 29: 10-18. President W. Wallace Smith then brought greetings from the General Church, and Pastor Ruch spoke briefly on "The Joy and Meaning of the Occasion."

The cornerstone was laid by Arnold Ranch, general contractor, and Ray Jensen, mason. The cornerstone of the old church, which had been laid when that building was last remodeled in 1913, had previously been opened and the little copper box and its contents removed to be placed in the cornerstone of the new church. That stone contained the Three Books and a brief typewritten history of the branch from its organization in 1862 until 1913, the time of the laying of that stone.

For the new church a much larger copper box had been provided and the following articles were placed in it by various individuals: The copper box and its contents from the old church, an up-to-date typewritten history of the branch, the Three Standard Books of the church in leather binding, a complete membership list of the branch at present, the names of the priesthood now living in Council Bluffs, a list of the twenty-five pastors who have served this branch during its eighty-nine years of existence, the names of all the officers serving at present, the 1951 yearbook of the women's department, names of the officers and committees of the Men's Fellowship Club, a list of the four choirs with directors and accompanists, names of the building committee and trustees, names of the people who served on the planning committee for the new church, names of the architect and contractor, a copy of the program of the ground-breaking ceremony, a copy of the program used at the laying of the cornerstone, and four copies of the Council Bluffs Nonpareil which carried important items about events in connection with the building fund dinners, etc. Whoever may open this cornerstone a hundred or two hundred years from now will get a good deal of information about the Saints who built the church.

After the articles were put in the copper box an appropriate responsive reading was given by the pastor and the congregation. The pastor then consecrated the cornerstone. When the congregation had finished singing, "We're Marching to Zion," Elder O. A. Currie pronounced the benediction.

By the time the building is completely furnished, counting the lot, the building, and the furnishings, the entire project will probably cost two hundred twenty-five thousand dollars. The membership of the branch is about thirteen hundred.—Reported by V. D. RUCH

Part II

By Mrs. Walter N. Johnson

An address given at the Women's Institute

WE CENTER OUR CHILDREN'S LIVES in the church by our financial support of the church. They follow the example of accounting and giving we set. The attitudes of stewardship can be instilled in them at an early age. If we are good stewards of our possessions, complying with the financial law and giving willingly and generously to the church, our children will want to participate also. It is easy for us to teach the financial law at home, to assist our children in filing their tithing statements and keeping their records so that they know the amount of tithing they should pay. They will come to love the church and to think highly of it as we encourage them to contribute to it.

This matter of generous giving is important. We teach a powerful lesson when we give a child a quarter for popcorn and a show on Saturday afternoon, and a penny or two for church school on Sunday morning. He quickly arrives at a logical deduction concerning the value to be placed on the church. I do not like to see a child given a penny for church. This is not because the church isn't interested in small contributions, but because the child is impressed by the fact that we give the least we have, the smallest coin made, to the work of God. If the youngster's allowance must be counted in pennies, then pennies are adequate because they are in keeping with his pocketbook. If he is spending nickels and dimes for candy, ice cream and comics, he should give to the church accordingly. If we are a little hard pressed on the Sunday before pay day, and the offering has to be reduced, it is better for us parents to ignore the collection plate as it goes by and let the child give more generously.

Children should be taught to give regularly. Our children saw us using the duplex envelopes for our contributions and wanted them for their own use. Each month they look forward to getting their receipts from the bishop's office; these receipts are kept among their best treasures. If the church is to fulfill its mission it must win increasing numbers to the financial law. In our homes we are laying the foundations for the financial stability of the church and missionary expansion in the next generation. We can and must do better than we have done in the past. We must remember that we have the responsibility and the opportunity to develop good stewards for the church of tomorrow. This admonition goes beyond teaching the child to pray and charges us to teach our children to walk uprightly before the Lord. We are required to build into their lives the old-fashioned virtues of truthfulness, honesty, industriousness, and trustworthiness. This is all important in the moral confusion in which we find ourselves living today. With all the good agencies available in the public schools, church school, Boy and Girl Scouts, and other youth organizations the major responsibility for building integrity into the lives of our children still rests with us. The Lord told the church that this was true in 1831. It is just as true in 1951. If the lives of our children are successfully centered in the church, our chances of developing church members of unquestioned integrity and stout moral fiber are increased tremendously.

WE CENTER OUR CHILDREN'S LIVES in the church by providing education, understanding, and knowledge of what the church teaches as basic doctrine. Many of us are vitally interested in the secular education of our children. We rejoice in the fact that we have compulsory public education, but there is a need for educating the heart and emotions as well as the mind. This education in the church must be more than a rote learning of beliefs. It must reach out constantly toward an appreciation of the real meaning and over-all view of the church, and it must always be concerned with making the knowledge gained effective in our own lives. We are never truly educated, no matter how many degrees we are awarded, if we have not also matured spiritually. Sometimes we see men and women who are brilliant and well educated in their special field of interest yet cling to a child's faith and belief. Then there are those who have turned away from the church because their spiritual experiences and religious understanding have not kept pace with their intellectual development.

WE CENTER OUR CHILDREN'S LIVES in the church from a very early age by looking toward the experience of baptism. Children will anticipate the experience of baptism if they are properly prepared for it. Occasionally children who are afraid of the water may have some fear of the actual rite of baptism, but if taken to see their friends baptized, confirmed and partaking of the Lord's Supper, they can usually overcome this without much difficulty. A little girl witnessed her first baptismal service when she was four years old, and as each candidate was baptized she clutched her daddy's fingers more firmly. She was very quiet on the way home, and sometime later said, "Mother, when I'm eight years old I want you to tell my daddy 'Here's a little girl eight years old who wants to be baptized when she is nine.'" Baptism didn't look inviting to her at four, but months before she was eight she was eagerly awaiting the day when she would be old enough to become a member of the church. Preparation for baptism is only the beginning and after children become members the work of tying them into the life of the church must continue.

We should encourage our children from early in childhood to train and develop their talents for service in the church and community. It is a wonderful experience for our young people to continue their education at Graceland or the Sanitarium School of Nursing, for here many are tied into the church picture more fully than ever before and at a time in their lives when they have quite an adjustment to make in their thinking. As their religious understanding changes and develops they may be greatly helped by association with others of like faith and by the ministry of priesthood and faculty available in these church institutions.

WE CENTER OUR CHILDREN'S LIVES in the church by giving moral support to the church program. We need to be constructive in our expressions, and general conversations, watching carefully our criticisms of the church, and its leaders and members in the presence of our children. It is in these formative years that the seeds of doubt, suspicion, and discord are planted. A church appointee found his child repeating his own words of criticism about the church and different men in official positions. He and his wife promised each other never to say anything in the presence of the children that might cause them to doubt the call of these men or to feel that the work of the church was not proceeding satisfactorily. We need to teach respect for our church leaders and to make opportunities for our children to really know them. We must never repeat rumors and the stories of misinformation about the church that are always circulating. If we wholeheartedly support the church leaders and the activities of the church it is bound to make a difference in the way our children feel about the church.

We need to provide books, tracts, and all the church literature that breathes the spirit of the Restoration Movement for those who can read. Much earlier when the child is small we can tell the thrilling stories from the history of the church and of the lives of the outstanding characters of this movement. A young child will thoroughly enjoy stories from the Book of Mormon or Bible right along with the familiar nursery characters, and thus grow up with this rich knowledge long before he can read for himself. We can make these stories meaningful to them in our daily activities and conversations.

All these activities should be shared with children at the earliest possible age. A friend took her little girl to see a play depicting the life of Christ, and the child learned for the first time of the Crucifixion. She was much disturbed by this, and her mother, trying to help her understand, told her that everyone did not know Jesus and did not appreciate the great gift he had brought to the world. She said to her little girl, "Aren't you glad that Mother told you about Jesus so you can love him and want to be like him?" The little girl looked up in surprise and said, "Why, Mother, you didn't tell me about Jesus, I have always known about him." Jesus had been with them in their home and his story had been told so many times that the little girl couldn't remember when she had first learned of him!

IT IS THE SAME with the knowledge of the Restoration Movement. If we find opportunities to tell our children the basic beliefs of the church and its history, these things become a part of them. We need to talk of our own personal experiences and the experiences of others. It is our responsibility and ours alone to teach our children the fundamental beliefs of the church. We need to teach that this is not just another church but the church of Jesus Christ restored in these latter days; that God is a God who reveals himself to us today; that the priesthood is divinely called. God is unchangeable, the same yesterday and forever, and his purposes are being worked out through us. We need to teach our children to live a life of faith and not to fear the things in the world but to do the best they can, living uprightly. If they do, life should work out well for them. The future may look discouraging to young people of today, and they need the assurance that sometime God's way will triumph and evil will indeed be driven from the earth.

The responsibility for centering our children's lives in the church rests squarely on us because of the admonition of the Lord and because we are the ones who can most effectively pass on the values of the Restoration to our children. Before we can have children with their lives deeply rooted in the church we must first have church-centered homes.

I am a fifth generation Reorganized Latter Day Saint. The parents in the generations preceding me preserved this rich heritage for me, and I feel very keenly my responsibility of guarding it well and of passing it on to my children that the values to be gained from this movement might enrich their lives and the homes they will establish for themselves. We really can't be sure how much of a success we have been as parents until we have seen the kind of homes our children establish. If they are to be church-centered we must heed well the admonition of Section 68 and be engaged in centering our own homes strongly in the Restoration Movement.

On Giving Thanks

By Josephine Montgomery

THANKSGIVING has become as commercialized as Christmas, and Christmas has become as commercialized as bargain day in Macy's basement. Oh, we go to church and we sing a few hymns about "Thank you, Lord, for the beautiful skies and the fields of grain," and we pray a few prayers, but many times in our hearts we are not grateful—we are smug.

If we have plenty to eat at every meal and we pray, "Thank you, God, for giving me food," while millions of people starve in India, China, Europe, and right here on our own doorsteps in the slums of every town and city in America—then we are selfish and not really grateful. If we put on our warm clothes and bundle up in blankets to watch a football game and pray, "Thank you, God, for giving me warmth and entertainment," while millions of people shiver in rags as they go out to try to earn a meager living—then we are selfish and not really grateful. If we have our loved ones around us in the reasonable security of life, and we pray, "Thank you, God, for giving us safety," while millions of people live out shadow lives in fear and hopelessness—then we are selfish and not really grateful.

We, who live in plenty, must walk a narrow line between smugness and gratitude. It is not enough merely to say "Thank you, God." It is not enough merely to realize that we have a great deal to be thankful for. To recognize our blessings is only the first step in giving thanks. We may realize that we are richly blessed and still go on with a murmured word of thanks to God and a smug feeling in our hearts that somehow we ourselves have had a hand in earning that blessing. We may have a smug feeling of self-satisfaction that we have somehow earned our blessings by our own hard work, or by belonging to the right church, or by having had the luck to be born in the right country. To think that we deserve better food, better clothing, easier lives than other peoples of the world, to think that we have earned a favored place in the sun is not part of the true spirit of thanksgiving.

TO BE TRULY GRATEFUL implies action. If we are really thankful for the food we have on our tables, then we will be so aware of the millions who are starving that we won't really enjoy our food until we have seen to it that everyone in the world is as well fed as we are. If we are really grateful for our warm clothes and comfortable standard of living, then we will not rest until we have seen to it that everyone in the world is as warmly dressed and as comfortable as we are. If we are really grateful to have our loved ones around us in the reasonable security of life, then we will not be satisfied until we have seen to it that the world has been made safe for all people.

So often when we think about Thanksgiving, we think of it in a very superficial way. We go back to the story of the Pilgrims and retell how they gathered their crops and gave thanks to God for the blessings of the harvest. And we stop there, thinking that thanksgiving means to thank God for a harvest.

But we're not the Pilgrims thanking God for a few fields of wheat and some pumpkins. We're people living in the year 1951, and for us the idea of thanksgiving must have a deeper meaning.

First, we must recognize our blessings, and realize that they are not simply the result of our own efforts, but have been made possible for us through the goodness of God. Second, we must not accept our blessings complacently—too often we have the idea that God owes us special favors. Instead, we must work earnestly to see that all people everywhere share in happiness and well-being, in safety and warmth, in shelter and in food.

To say, "Thank you, God," isn't enough. To be truly grateful implies action.

New Horizons

For Thanksgiving

The following was written especially for the Thanksgiving service of song on the Graceland Campus for November 19, 1950. The Graceland Concert Choir, led by Henry Anderson, presented the music; Ray Zinser prepared the intermission manuscript and acted as commentator.

Praise

Our hearts are filled with praise as the Thanksgiving season approaches. Thanksgiving time is a time for giving thanks, for praising the Almighty. . . .

O Lord, open thou my lips, and my mouth shall show forth thy praise.

Yes, the Thanksgiving season is symbolical in nature, expressing gratitude to the Creator for all that is good in life, for all that is dear, and for all that means so much.

We choose to set aside a season of giving thanks, especially in times when food, clothing, and shelter are more than bounteously given, for in bounty there often comes negligence and complacency.

In crisis situations, in times of dire stress, in illness, in catastrophic days we are easily sensitive to the goodness of God and his living attention. But in the days of plenty, in the days of bounty, in the days of overflowing of material benefits, men tend to assume these things as rights rather than privileges.

Today, we take time to show forth our praise, to express openly in the midst of our congregation of friends our praise for God and his Majesty.

Oh give thanks to the Lord of Lords; for his mercy endureth forever. Praise the Lord, for the Lord is good; sing praises unto his name.

Blessings

We are thankful for the untold number of blessings which are ours.

For life itself and the possibilities of becoming,

For health,

For comradeship and friendships with those who mean much to us,

For a cause that challenges the best there is in us.

For a nation democratic in spirit and purpose,

For a promised land which portends Zionitic communities,

For a reason for existence found in the eternal laws of God,

For the Love of God and its tangible symbol in the love of one person for another,

For creativity possible in the life pattern of each person,

For all the joy, warmth, and happiness of day by day living,

For the possibility of doing something in one lifetime which can contribute to the welfare and happiness of others about us.

Unity

Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!

The diverse personalities of human beings, the diverse interests, the diverse temperaments, the diverse endowments, the diverse abilities and talents . . . all these diversities are joined in eternal union by the Spirit of the Living God and by the unction of the Holy Spirit working with men as they make themselves accessible to that force. As men yield and respond to the leadings of the Holy Spirit, diverse characteristics of man—which often find themselves in direct conflict—become as one. This is unity through diversity.

The infinite variety of all creation gives depth, breadth, distinctiveness, and endless challenge to man and his society. However, the ultimate of all living, the release of creative power, can reach its highest fruition only when all join together in common comradeship—where all share their talents, their capacities, their possibilities with each other.

Men are not born equal, but are born to share equally the good things of life, to share equally the possibilities of "becoming." To become means to release the ultimate in the possibilities which each person holds in his lifetime, or to release the optimum of creativity.

Sharing implies, yes, even necessitates unity.

Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.

Prayer

Then let our prayer be that of St. Francis of Assisi:

Lord, make me a channel of thy peace. . . . That where there is hatred—I may bring love,

That where there is wrong, I may bring the spirit of forgiveness

That where there is discord—I may bring harmony,

That where there is error—I may bring truth,

That where there is doubt—I may bring faith,

That where there is despair—I may bring hope,

That where there are shadows—I may bring thy light,

That where there is sadness—I may bring joy.

Lord, grant that I may seek rather To comfort, than to be comforted; To understand, than to be understood To love than to be loved.

For—

It is by giving that one receives;

It is by self-forgetting that one finds;

It is by forgiving that one is forgiven;

It is by dying that one awakens to eternal life.

Surviving are three sons: George; Earl of St. Louis, Missouri; and Charles of Kansas City, Missouri. Four other sons preceded her in death. Funeral services were held at the George Carson Chapel in Independence, Elders W. F. Bolinger and Winfred Albright officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

The Disposition of Sin

fuse to deny self is to refuse a discipline in which our soul must suffer, for self will still be present. Christ explained this when he said, "He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal."

He who lives the spiritual life has a distinct kind of life added to all the other phases of life. When the natural man becomes the spiritual man, the great change is described by Christ as a passing from death unto life. Perfection is ultimately possible for all who want to pay the price.

■ The fourteen pastoral groups into which the campus congregation is divided met in pairs for seven simultaneous fellowship services on a recent Wednesday night. Led by the student pastors of the respective groups, students considered "Covenants of Significance." These services give more students a chance to participate than when the entire student body meets.

■ Ten Graceland students from abroad attended the Far West Stake Zion's League Rally on "Missions Around the World" in Cameron, Missouri. The ten were Helen Mitsuda, Gilberta Paoa, and Lily Kaloa from Hawaii; Klaas Kaat from Holland; Les Gardner and Valda Poole from Australia; Sylvia Woods and Bill Muldoon from England; and Peter Harder from Canada. They were accompanied by Dr. Wm. Gould, Director of Public Relations and Counselor to Students from Abroad, and Dick Cheville, a sophomore student from Lamoni, who spent last summer touring Europe on a bicycle. The rally served to inform the Far West Leaguers about the church in other countries and to broaden their League fellowship.

■ Twelve of the pastoral groups met in pairs once again for Wednesday evening fellowship. The theme of the fellowship services was "Sharing."

■ Lucille Moore, Liberty, Missouri, was recently elected president of the Graceland Art Guild. George Knotts, Langley, Oklahoma, is vice-president, and Don Gamet, Lamoni, is secretary-treasurer. The Art Guild, under the sponsorship of Henry Anderson, plans to teach the principles and techniques of creative pictorial art and develop its members' artistic appreciation and abilities. It hopes to lay the foundation for a better art program at Graceland. Its program will include instructive films on various phases of art work.

■ Dressed in western style, students recently attended the annual chuck wagon dinner. Forced from outside into the student center by rainy weather, they ate a western "chuck wagon" style dinner served by staff members and student members of the social activities committee. Afterward they were entertained by a short program.

■ The Graceland congregation has begun a series of four services in commemoration of the events of 1851 that led to the reorganization of the church. The first, on Wednesday, October 31, was termed a "Find-Out-About-It" meeting. Ten major questions that people ask about the reorganization were answered.

■ The Graceland College day service was held on October 28. The college congregation turned its attention to the home branches of its students since those branches were focusing their attention on the college. Six students from different branches in different states described their branches and their members. The six were Jack Carlson from Humboldt, Iowa; Pat Crayne from Kansas City, Kansas; Phyllis Humphrey from Birmingham, Alabama; Carol Crum from Seattle, Washington; Jack Waddell from East Moline, Illinois; and Scott Fisher from Somerville, Massachusetts.

Many students and faculty members traveled to near-by branches of the church on college day to represent the college to them.

* PREVENTING VANDALISM

Newspapers have reported some unpleasant acts of vandalism at Halloween time, except in those communities where wise citizens have made some effort to provide organized entertainment and activity for children and young people. Amid diverse kinds of reports, we'd like to tell of a happy experience.

Years ago we discovered that most of the noise and damage committed in our neighborhood were not done by local children. The worst trouble came from youths marauding from poor and depressed sections of the city, indicating a deeper social problem. A little resolute patrolling and resistance to these young ruffians discouraged them and left our neighborhood in peace during recent years.

However, we wanted something better than peace. We would like to be friendly to the children on this festival which belongs to them. This year we asked the early "trick or treaters" to come back on Halloween night and we would have something for them. A table was set up in the sun parlor with popcorn, cookies, candy, paper cups, and hot chocolate. When the visiting witches, goblins, and demons were invited in, they dropped their "tough" poses and became the good little neighbors we know. They had to take off their masks to drink the chocolate! Some of the "little bitsies" were accompanied by mothers in cars from house to house to see that everything was all right.

It was a pleasure to welcome these young neighbors and friends into our home during their celebration, and we think we had as much fun as the children did. There was no trouble with soaped windows, tin cans, or garbage pails.

Experts say that vandalism comes from children who have unhappy home life—drunkenness, divorce, and lack of love; they take this way of showing their resentment. Parents are largely responsible for what their offspring do.

Kindness and friendliness will go a long way, once the children come to know what to expect.

* LANGUAGES

As one goes through life, there are many languages to learn: many more than the English of speech and print, many more than the thousands of tongues used around the world. There is the language of nature in field and forest, the language of the sky from dawn to sunset, the languages of dogs and cats and canary birds, the languages of all things wild and free; and even the little goldfish swimming in his aquarium has a way of expressing himself. God has written chapters in the soil, the rocks, and the sea wherein we may read what he has done through ages of time, and he often speaks to us in wind and sun. The faces of your fellow-men, too, have a language of their own, independent of the deception of speech. If you learn to read all these languages, you will never be without something strange and interesting to observe and learn.

News and Notes

APOSTLES IN THE NORTH

Apostle C. George Mesley and Apostle Paul M. Hanson spent a month visiting in the Michigan and Ontario area recently, attending district conferences and the Ontario-wide youth convention held in Orilla, Ontario. They also attended a three-day clinic of all church appointees in the area. The clinic was held in Port Huron, Michigan. Apostle Hanson gave illustrated slide lectures.

INSTITUTE IN CHICAGO

Apostle Reed M. Holmes and Carl Mesle were in Chicago, Illinois, November 9-11 for the first in a series of institutes. Problems taken up in the discussions at Chicago concerned church school and youth work. Future institutes will also include material for priesthood. The method of approaching the problems, according to Brother Holmes, is new, and was successful at the meetings in Chicago. The branch states its problems, the General Church workers offer helps and suggestions, and together solutions are found. Brother Mesle preached while at Chicago, and Brother Holmes conducted a class on worship.

TOUR CENTRAL MISSOURI STAKE

Apostles Charles R. Hield and D. T. Williams, two of the apostles in charge of missionary work in the stakes, visited various points in the Central Missouri Stake. They were accompanied by Stake President Harry Simons, Stake Bishop Willard Becker, and Stake Missionary Clair Weldon. The men made a survey of missionary possibilities in the area and found that there was considerable opportunity for church expansion, particularly in the county seat towns.

CHURCH SCHOOL INSTITUTES

John R. Darling, Associate Director of the Department of Religious Education, recently returned from a five week's trip. He spent one week in the Detroit International Stake at a church school institute. Major stops on his trip were Dixfield, Stonington, and Jonesport, Maine; Newark, New Jersey; Norwald, Connecticut; Baltimore, Maryland; Portsmouth, Virginia; Allentown, Pennsylvania; Bloomsburg, Scranton, Archibald, and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Buffalo and New York, New York. Brother Darling expressed the appreciation of the department for the support given by the following people and many others: W. Blair McClain, president of the Detroit International Stake; Ray Ashenurst, president of the New England District; John T. Conway, president of the New York-Philadelphia District, and Stanley Johnson, president of the New York District. This extensive church school institute field is under the direction of Apostles C. G. Mesley and Maurice L. Draper.

GRACELAND MOTHERS MEET

About ninety mothers of past and present Graceland students attended a tea given by the Kansas City Chapter of the Graceland Mother's Club November 12 at the South Crysler church. Music was furnished by a string ensemble composed of Mrs. Ruth Draper, Mrs. Annabelle Prell, and Mrs. Vivian Sheehy. Mrs. Jeannette Nichols, and Herbert Lively were soloists. Brother Lively was accompanied by Mrs. Dorothy Higgins. President Israel A. Smith and A. Neal Deaver spoke to the group. Mrs. Benjamin F. Moats, president of the Kansas City Chapter, welcomed the guests.

Herman W. Johnson

When your subscriptions to periodicals or orders for tracts, books, and supplies reach Independence they are picked up at the post office. Then each order is entered and processed with a number and label by workers in Mr. Johnson's department. He carries the title of office manager and accountant. Many of the visitors who want to see Herald House in operation are taken around by Herman, who explains each detail. He has been in charge of Herald Book Store sales at the California reunions the past three years and at the Stewartville Reunion many more years.

Born in Clarksdale, Missouri, in 1912, he moved with his parents to St. Joseph, Missouri, when he was three. Here he was baptized in 1922 and graduated from Central High School in 1931. He got his start in business by carrying papers during his first two years in high school and delivering, shipping, and working at the fountain in a drug store his last two years. During the next three years he worked for the Marshall Auto Store in St. Joseph and Kansas City, selling and handling the stock. His career with the Herald House began in 1934 as shipping clerk. He next worked as order clerk before being put in charge of the department.

Herman smiles easily, has a friendly approach, and a keen sense of humor. On March 4, 1937, he married Marian Alma Hale. They have two children: Carolyn Rae, 13, and Royce Welton, 11. Herman was ordained a deacon in 1933 and a priest in 1946. He and his family are active workers in the Slover Park congregation.

Keep Thy Heart

"Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life."—Proverbs 4: 23.

This story has a lesson in it. A friend sent it, hoping that some good might be done with it. In condensed form, this is it:

"An incident at General Conferences comes to mind. A man came to one of the many doors of the Auditorium and for some reason turned back. As he did so a boy stepped on his foot, scuffing the shoe and perhaps hurting the toes. He gave the boy a 'bawling out' both in looks and words. I was, of course, very much surprised. Doubtless he could have preached a lengthy and wordy sermon, perhaps a spiritual one, but I could not have enjoyed it after seeing him treat that boy as he did. . . . This shows how our actions can undo what our sermons, prayers, and testimonies say."

Let's remember that the witness's toes were not hurt. His feelings might have been different if his toes had been stepped on.

In this instance, a man who was probably otherwise very good, failed to "keep his heart," and out of it issued something that will affect the life of that boy, and perhaps even change his attitude toward the church.

It would be easy to be content to be indignant toward the man. It is much harder for us to remember that we too fail to keep our hearts in many ways, and that out of them come issues that affect the lives of other people more critically than we know.

One thing for us to remember is that children are important people, that they have long memories, and that they soon grow up to manhood and womanhood. Do not insult a boy. In a few years he will be so big and strong that you would not dare insult him. And he remembers, often for many years.

If we have room in our hearts to love a child, God will send us happiness to furnish them and make them beautiful for both us and him.

While there are children in the world, our hearts need not be empty. If we have none of our own, we can always love our neighbor's children, and nobody will be jealous.

As we grow older, let's try to keep our hearts so that we will always love children. It's very important.

Let me tell you about my friend Diane. She is almost blonde, definitely beautiful, and very charming. Our friendship began when we shook hands at the close of a church service. She sat all through my sermon, listening attentively. Afterward she asked if her folks could give me a ride home. We like each other very much. This is no ordinary triangle. . . . She knows my wife and likes her too. . . . Well, if you must know, Diane is about ten years old.

Just one thing makes me afraid. I'm not very good on pedestals. I fall off so easily. As an idol, I have been broken many times. I don't want to disappoint Diane, and all of the fine children like her. I'd like to keep my heart right.

I have noticed this at church. We stand at the door shaking hands with the people. The little children are surrounded by adults, as tiny saplings lost in a forest. Nobody pays any attention to them. They do not expect it.

I lean down to shake hands with one little fellow, and surprise shows all over his face. But he shakes. Next Sunday, all smiles, he is expecting to be greeted, and enjoys it. All the children are that way. Some are shy at first, but they respond to love. Isn't it important for the children to know that somebody at the church loves them? They all come to cherish the greetings, even more than their parents do.

It is very important for us to keep our hearts in regard to the children. For they also belong to God, and he loves them. We ought to love them too.

It is necessary for older people to keep their hearts in regard to each other, too. Some are not always kind. Some hurt each other. Some hate each other. It is disheartening to see someone trying to destroy another's character, his reputation, or his ministry. It hurts to see people trying to break up the homes of others. It hurts to see the evil and cruelty of the world at times infiltrating the church.

It is all because our hearts are not right. We have not kept them as we should. We have not shown the love and mercy that ought to fill our souls.

Our real need is not only to control the tongue, but to control the heart. If we control our hearts, we will not have to worry about our tongues. We will find the right things to say at the right time.

Only a people who keep their hearts right with God and with their fellow-members can help to build the kingdom. L.J.L.

Baptisms

With the three-quarter mark past, the baptismal rate for the church is holding up nicely. The 510 baptisms reported in September is the highest total reported in that month since 1921. For the nine months there have been 3,799 reported, which, again, is the highest for the same period since 1921.

The first five branches in number of baptisms reported in September are Fanshawe, Oklahoma, 17; Berrydale, Florida, 14; New Philadelphia, Ohio, 11; Seattle, Washington, Second Branch, 11; and Woodbine, Iowa, 9.

The first five stakes and districts in number of baptisms reported in September are Lamoni Stake, 36; Central Oklahoma District, 23; Gulf States District, 22; Southeastern Illinois District, 19; and Owen Sound District, 18.

New Graceland College Trustee

The pressure of other responsibilities has required Dr. Charles F. Grabske of Independence, Missouri, to resign as a member of the Board of Trustees of Graceland College, and this resignation has been accepted by the board. Dr. Grabske has served ably and faithfully since his selection at the General Conference of April, 1932, and the church, as well as the board, appreciates his fine contribution and extends thanks for his services.

As is provided in the Article of Incorporation of the college, the board is empowered to fill vacancies in its membership subject to the approval of the next succeeding General Conference. Brother Frank Parsons of Minneapolis was unanimously elected a member of the board at a board meeting held at Independence, November 4, 1951, and will serve, subject to the approval of Conference already mentioned. We welcome Brother Parsons to the board, and appreciate his willingness to accept the somewhat demanding responsibilities involved in board membership.

From Apostle D. O. Chesworth, Xenia, Illinois:

The Brush Creek Branch has taken as a project the building of a basement under the church. The men's class rented thirty acres of ground and planted soya beans. On the morning work began there were fifteen tractors in the field and twenty-five men, including some nonmembers. The harvest netted $487.19. The men plan to repeat this project next year with a possible increase in acreage. The branch now has $1,500 in the fund. Pastor Lewis DeSelms baptized one of the nonmembers who helped with the planting, so the harvest brought spiritual as well as financial gain.

We Advertise the "Messiah" Broadcast

This is the newspaper mat available for local advertising of the Messiah broadcast. Because of simplicity of design it will "stand out" in any newspaper. Space is left for the call letters of the nearest CBS station and the time of broadcast in each area.

Every pastor may order this mat from headquarters by returning the card sent him. This advertising is available to those not directly associated with a branch who may want to notify their community of this coast to coast Christmas broadcast on December 23.

It is suggested that the newspaper be checked for the price of a one column by six inch ad. If the price is prohibitive, then other suggested copy will be sent.

This prepared mat, other newspaper copy, radio spot announcements, Christmas cards, and posters, may be obtained from the Messiah publicity director, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Rules of Order

At the General Conference business session of Saturday, April 8, 1950, the following communication from the First Presidency was considered:

To the General Conference,
Greetings:

At the General Conference of 1876, the church authorized the issuance of the BOOK OF RULES OF ORDER AND DEBATE. This was revised and reissued from time to time, but in 1922 the church published a book of parliamentary procedure which bore the original title but did not deal with certain matters of organization and procedure covered in the early issues.

The statements not included in the 1922 publications are of administrative importance but do not properly reflect our current practice. The First Presidency have therefore prepared substitute statements in which they have retained the phrasing of the BOOK OF RULES OF ORDER AND DEBATE wherever possible. These statements have been published in the issues of the Saints' Herald for January 23, January 30, February 6, February 13, February 20, February 27, and March 27, 1950, and have been accompanied by a request that administrative officers and others furnish the Presidency with any comments or criticisms which are regarded as being helpful. Several letters have been received in response to this invitation.

We now recommend that a committee consisting of a member of the First Presidency, and a member of the Council of Twelve, a member of the Presiding Bishopric, the President of the High Priests' Quorum, and the Senior President of Seventy be authorized to consider these published statements of procedure, making such changes as they shall deem wise, and submitting them to the First Presidency for publication at an early date.

Very sincerely yours,
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

By Israel A. Smith

It was asked "if the effect of the motion would grant the committee authorization to produce a work that would become final and binding on the body." The Chair stated: "That is the intent of the resolution." The recommendation of the Presidency in this matter was approved unanimously.

The committee thus authorized was constituted by action of the Presidency, the Council of Twelve, and the Presiding Bishopric, so as to include Elders C. G. Mesley, H. L. Livingston, Ward A. Hougas, E. Y. Hunker, and the undersigned.

Since the close of Conference a number of meetings of this committee have been held, and a number of suggestions have been given careful consideration. The committee is now ready to submit its work to the Presidency, but—knowing the importance of the Book of Rules—has decided to ask for the recommended contents to be printed in the Herald so that further comments and suggestions can be received before final committee action is taken. Accordingly, the tentative recommendations of the committee appear here. The committee will be happy to receive any comments or recommendations persons interested care to send. These should be addressed to the undersigned at the Auditorium.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

By F. Henry Edwards

I. Church, Organization, Purpose, and Membership

THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST was "regularly organized and established agreeably to the laws of our country, by the will and commandment of God," April 6, 1830. This was in fulfillment of commandments "given to Joseph Smith, Jr., who was called of God and ordained an apostle of Jesus Christ, to be the first elder of this church; and to Oliver Cowdery, who was also called of God an apostle of Jesus Christ, to be the second elder of this church, and ordained under his hand: and this according to the grace of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, to whom be all glory both now and for ever."¹

THE RESTORATION OF THE GOSPEL was heralded in these terms:

A marvelous work is about to come forth among the children of men, therefore, O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind, and strength; that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day; therefore if ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work, for, behold, the field is white already to harvest, and lo, he that thrusteth in his sickle with his might the same layeth up in store that he perish not, but bringeth salvation to his soul; and faith, hope, charity, and love, with an eye single to the glory of God, qualifies him for the work.²

and

Keep my commandments and seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion; seek not for riches but for wisdom; and, behold, the mysteries of God shall be unfolded unto you, and then shall you be made rich. Behold, he that hath eternal life is rich.³

THE EARLY ELDERS BORE TESTIMONY TO THE WORLD:

That the Holy Scriptures are true, and that God does inspire men and call them to his holy work in this age and generation, as well as in generations of old, thereby showing that he is the same God yesterday, today, and forever.⁴

And we know that all men must repent and believe on the name of Jesus Christ and worship the Father in his name, and endure in faith on his name to the end, or they cannot be saved in the kingdom of God.⁵

THOSE WHO RECEIVED THIS TESTIMONY were received into the church in harmony with the following instructions:

No one can be received into the church of Christ unless he has arrived unto the years of accountability before God, and is capable of repentance.⁶

and

All those who humble themselves before God and desire to be baptized, and come forth with broken hearts and contrite spirits, and witness before the church that they have truly repented of all their sins, and are willing to take upon them the name of Jesus Christ, having a determination to serve him to the end, and truly manifest by their works that they have received of the Spirit of Christ unto the remission of their sins, shall be received by baptism into his church.⁷

THE CHURCH CONTINUES TO FUNCTION in harmony with these principles:

All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.⁸

3. Doctrine and Covenants 6: 3
4. Doctrine and Covenants 17: 2

II. A Theocratic Democracy

THE CHURCH, AS DEFINED by the late President Joseph Smith, is a theocratic democracy—not man-made, but of divine appointment and origin.¹ It was brought into being by command of God, is guided and administered by his authority, is sustained by the light of his Spirit, and exists for his purposes; but notwithstanding the primary rights of Divinity in his church, our Heavenly Father has committed to the Saints an important share in the responsibility of governing his church.

Neither shall anything be appointed unto any of this church contrary to the church covenants, for all things must be done in order and by common consent in the church, by the prayer of faith.²

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH is by divine authority through priesthood.³ It should be noted that the government of the church is through priesthood, not by priesthood. The distinction is important. Ministers must first of all be disciples. They must learn the will of God and make this their own. In no other way can their claim to divine authority become rich and meaningful. This is clearly written into the law of the church. For example, an important revelation concerning the functions of the presiding quorums is followed by this instruction:

The decisions of these quorums, or either of them, are to be made in all righteousness, in holiness and lowliness of heart, meekness and long-suffering, and in faith and virtue and knowledge; temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity because the promise is, if these things abound in them they shall not be unfruitful in the knowledge of the Lord. And in case that any decision of these quorums is made in unrighteousness, it may be brought before a general assembly of the several quorums which constitute the spiritual authorities of the church.⁴

THE REALITY AND EXTENT of priesthood authority are indicated in such statements as the following:

Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.⁵ Whatever God commands man to do the command carries with it the authority to do the thing commanded to be done. When the church was instituted . . . the Melchisedec priesthood was conferred for the last time before the second and final coming of Christ. . . . This priesthood so conferred was endowed with all the rights, privileges, and authority to bring forth the church of Christ, conduct its expansion and watch over its development and welfare until the coming of Christ should bring its work to a triumphant and glorious consummation.⁶

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH includes administrative, legislative, and judicial functions. There are also other ministerial functions such as those of the evangelist and other members of the standing ministry. For the sake of convenience these may be regarded as contributory ministries within the administrative field.

Administrative Functions

Administration is through members of the priesthood, acting according to their several callings and with the consent of the church. These may be grouped as follows:

THE PRESIDENCY, who administer the affairs of the entire church.⁷

THE TWELVE, who direct the missionary work of the church with the members of the Seventy as their chief assistants, and who represent the Presidency in organized fields.⁸

STAKE, DISTRICT, AND BRANCH PRESIDENTS, who direct the work in their respective areas.⁹

BISHOPS, who administer the temporal affairs of the church.¹⁰

In church administration the rights of the body are safeguarded under the law as follows:

By the guidance of the Holy Spirit in calling members to the priesthood.

Every elder, priest, teacher, or deacon is to be ordained according to the gifts and callings of God unto him; and he is to be ordained by the power of the Holy Ghost which is in the one who ordains him.¹¹

By the requirement that "no person is to be ordained to any office in this church, where there is a regularly organized branch of the same, without the vote of that church."¹²

By the right of approval and recall which rests with the people who are asked to sustain General Church leaders at General Conference, and local leaders at local conferences and business meetings.¹³

By the requirement that all things shall be done with due regard for the duties and privileges of other ministers and members and in harmony with the legislative enactments of the body.¹⁴

By the special provisions of the law. For example, that General Conference approves the budget according to which General Church funds are expended.

By the provisions for correcting disorder.¹⁵

By the growing understanding that—for the good of all—properly selected administrative officers must be allowed to do their work without undue interference, subject always to the provisions made to cover special situations.¹⁶

Legislative Functions

Legislation is considered and enacted in General Conference, mission, stake, and district conferences, and branch business meetings. These assemblies meet at the call of the responsible administrative officers, at times and places determined by the bodies concerned, or in emergencies at times and places set by these responsible administrative officers.

Every such assembly has authority to legislate for those it represents as long as it does not usurp rights lawfully centered elsewhere. For example, no branch business meeting can legislate for the district, such as requiring certain acts on the part of district officers; no branch or district can enact binding legislation on matters of General Church importance, such as setting up the conditions of church membership; and no branch business meeting or district, stake, or General Conference can change the basic law of the church, such as the law concerning the mode of baptism.

No legislative body can rightfully take to itself administrative or judicial functions such as initiating calls to the priesthood or trying a church member accused of transgression. These matters are specifically placed elsewhere, as is required by the necessities of good organization.

Judicial Procedure

All members of the church have right of access to the courts of the church for protection or redress.

Elders' courts are convened as courts of original jurisdiction where no bishop's courts can be had conveniently.

Bishops' courts are standing courts and have original jurisdiction or hear appeals from elders' courts.

High councils exist in stakes and in the General Church. These have original jurisdiction in some matters and may hear appeals from bishops' courts.¹⁷ However, the First Presidency or stake presidencies "have power to determine whether any such case, as may be appealed is justly entitled to a rehearing, after examining the application for appeal and the evidences and statements accompanying it."¹⁸

In branches or districts where a branch or district bishop is available, and in stakes, all initial court actions should be referred to the bishops' court.

Where no branch, district, or stake bishop, or competent high priests or elders are available, inquiry should be sent to the First Presidency requesting information concerning competent ministers from elsewhere who may be made available to compose a court. Where charges are such as might involve expulsion from the church, the Presidency will do their utmost to make a bishop available.

III. Conferences and Assemblies

CONFERENCES ARE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES of the church. They may be regular or special. Regular conferences may be held annually, semi-annually, or otherwise, as agreed upon by those who constitute their membership. They may represent the church at large, missions, stakes, or districts, and bear names accordingly, as General Conferences, mission conferences, stake conferences, or district conferences. They are subject to the jurisdiction of the First Presidency, ministers in charge, stake presidents, and district presidents.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE is constituted according to the provisions of the rules of representation and is empowered to act for the entire church. Delegates may present such questions as they have been especially instructed to offer, or only request them, and ask consideration and decision thereon.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY is a convocation of the priesthood organized as quorums. This is the highest and only authoritative body known to the church as an assembly.¹

WHO PRESIDES. In the General Conference and in a general assembly, the First Presidency should preside. In case of the absence or disqualification of the First Presidency, the Council of Twelve should so function.

STAKE AND DISTRICT CONFERENCES are regular gatherings authorized by the general authorities concerned or by stakes or districts or their presiding officers. They have to do with the common interests of the branches and church members within the specified areas.

SPECIAL CONFERENCES may be called by the First Presidency for the General Conference; by ministers in charge for missions; by stake or district presidents for stakes or districts, or by the bodies concerned. In emergencies special conferences may also be called by general authorities having jurisdiction. The call for special mission, stake, or district conferences should specify the purpose of the conference.

WHERE NO PREVIOUS ORGANIZATION HAS BEEN EFFECTED, members of the Presidency, Twelve, and Seventy take precedence in that order, or in harmony with their specific assignments.²

2. Doctrine and Covenants 122: 9

IV. Rules of Representation

EX OFFICIO MEMBERS OF GENERAL CONFERENCE. All members of the Melchisedec priesthood are ex officio members of General Conference and are entitled to voice and vote in General Conference when present.

DELEGATES TO GENERAL CONFERENCE. Stakes and districts are authorized to appoint, at their conference or business meeting next preceding the sitting of General Conference, delegates to General Conference who shall be entitled to represent said stake or district. Delegates are members of the General Conference to which they are appointed and are entitled to voice and vote at its sessions.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION. Each stake and district shall be entitled to one delegate for every one hundred members of said stake or district, and one vote in Conference for each delegate.

Regularly organized branches of the church not included in a district shall be entitled to at least one delegate, who shall have the same privileges as other delegates. When the membership of such a branch exceeds 100, that branch shall be entitled to one delegate for each 100 members. The selection of these branch delegates shall be made in regular branch business meetings or in special business meetings of which due notice shall have been given as to time, place, and purpose.

The enrollment in stakes and districts and branches in unorganized territory, upon which representation at General Conference shall be determined, shall be the total membership thereof on record in the Department of Statistics at the close of the month preceding the local conference at which delegates are elected.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR DELEGATES. The only qualification for eligibility as a delegate to the General Conference shall be membership in good standing in the church.

CERTIFICATION OF DELEGATES. Delegates shall be entitled to act upon registering with the Credentials Committee. This Committee should be supplied with a certified list of delegates, bearing the signatures of stake or district president and secretary; or bearing the signatures of the branch president and secretary if they represent branches in unorganized territory.

The Credentials Committee shall certify delegates to General Conference, up to the number to which the stake, district, or branch is entitled, in the order in which delegates are registered with the Credentials Committee.

RULES AND RESTRICTIONS OF DELEGATE VOTING. The delegates present at General Conference shall be entitled to cast the full vote of the areas which they represent.

In case of divergence of views among the members of any delegation, the vote of the area shall be divided in the same proportion as the members of the delegation are divided.

No delegate shall be entitled to cast more than twenty delegate votes in the same Conference.

ALTERNATE DELEGATES. The selection of alternate delegates by stakes, districts, or by branches in unorganized areas is disallowed by General Conference action.¹

ORGANIZATION AND MEMBERSHIP OF DELEGATE DISTRICT CONFERENCE. Districts may organize their conferences in harmony with these rules, by providing for delegate conferences, in which the basis of representation shall be determined by the district.

1. General Conference Resolution 821

V. General Church Missions

General Church missions are administrative units of the General Church. The First Presidency appoint members of the Council of Twelve, or other members of the Melchisedec priesthood, to preside over these administrative areas. The designation of mission presidents other than members of the Council of Twelve is subject to the approval of the Joint Council of Presidency and Twelve.

Where it is desirable or necessary to facilitate the work of the church, missions may be organized for legislative and educational functions. But no such organization invalidates or supersedes branch, district, or stake organization already existing. It is a permissive organization designed to promote the common interests of the area concerned.

All districts, and branches not in districts, together with members in unorganized territory in the area designated for mission organization, are integral parts of the mission.

The minister in charge of the mission should be elected president of the mission conference unless there are good reasons to the contrary. Other mission officers may be appointed or elected as may be found necessary.

The legislation of mission conferences is confined to matters of mission concern and must be in harmony with and subject to General Conference action. Reports should be made to such mission conferences by the mission officers and by the districts and the branches not in districts which comprise the mission and by General Church appointees laboring in the mission.¹

1. General Conference Resolution 687.

Note.—The insertion of this section has been felt necessary to the completion of the Book of Rules. It was prepared by the committee and amended and approved by the Joint Council of Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric.

VI. Stakes

THE NATURE OF STAKE ORGANIZATION: Stakes are the most highly co-ordinated units of church organization. Ideally, a stake is not an association of branches, but a well-integrated organization of related congregations. For this reason it is desirable that all the congregations and missions in the stake shall be under the supervision, direct or indirect, of the stake presidency; the presiding officers of these congregations or missions being assistants to the stake presidency and being appointed by them, subject to the approval called for by the principle of common consent. The value of the high priestly ministry in stake organization cannot be fully enjoyed except when these high priests and their associate ministers operate freely throughout the stake under the direction of the stake presidency.

STAKES ARE FORMED in major centers of gathering for more complete systematizing and honoring of the law of Christ in both spiritual and temporal affairs than is possible in branches and districts. They are "for the curtains, or the strength of Zion."¹ They are not necessarily contiguous.

STAKES ARE ORGANIZED on recommendation of the First Presidency approved by the Joint Council of the First Presidency, the Council of Twelve, and the Presiding Bishopric, then by General Conference and by the members of the proposed stakes.

In approaching the organization of stakes the following factors are considered: There should be available a sufficient number of members of mature experience in the church, who live in close proximity to a given center; with a sufficient number of ministers of high priestly caliber to provide personnel for the presiding councils. There should also be a sufficiently stable economy to assure permanence, and the possibility of definitely relating the contribution to be made in the area to the advancement of our Zion program.

A FULLY ORGANIZED STAKE includes a stake presidency, a stake high council, and a stake bishopric. The stake presidency consists of a president and two counselors, all of whom are high priests. The stake high council is composed of twelve high priests presided over by the stake presidency. The stake bishopric consists of the stake bishop and his two counselors. The latter may be high priests or elders. All of these are ordained and set apart to their respective ministries by the imposition of hands.²

THE STAKE PRESIDENCY presides over the stake and so has immediate charge and oversight of all spiritual activities within the stake and is responsible for the welfare and spiritual discipline of all church members within the confines of the stake, subject to the advice and direction of the general spiritual authorities of the church.

THE STAKE HIGH COUNCIL serves under the direction of the stake presidency as an advisory board in both spiritual and temporal matters within the stake. This high council is also the highest judicial body in the stake. It has both original and appellate jurisdiction. Appeals are taken to the stake high council from the stake bishop's court in cases which have not been settled by that court to the satisfaction of the parties. Ordinations to the high priesthood within the stake must receive the prior approval of the stake high council.³

THE STAKE BISHOP is the chief financial officer within the stake, having immediate charge and oversight of General Church finances and properties, and is responsible to the Presiding Bishopric as trustees. The stake bishop should also be chosen to have charge of stake finances, and in this relationship he is responsible to the stake presidency and to the Stake Conference for the administration of such finances as trustee in accordance with budgetary appropriations. The stake bishop is also a judicial officer, the stake bishop's court having original jurisdiction in cases of a local character within the stake. Appeals from the decision of the stake bishop's court may be made to the high council of the stake.

IF FROM ANY CAUSE A VACANCY OCCURS in the office of stake president or stake bishop, the First Presidency present to the Joint Council of the First Presidency, Council of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric their recommendation concerning the filling of such vacancy and, upon approval by the council, this recommendation is presented to the stake conference for consideration and approval. If such approval is obtained, the necessary ordination or ordinations are authorized.

STAKE CONFERENCES are authorized to transact business relating to the maintenance and spread of the work within the stake boundaries, but subject always to the resolutions of General Conference and to the advice of the general authorities in matters committed to these authorities under the law. They may also consider legislation relating to General Church affairs and recommend its enactment by General Conference. Notices of date conferences should be sent to general officers having jurisdiction.

3. Doctrine and Covenants 17: 17; 104: 14

VII. Districts

DISTRICT ORGANIZATION: Districts are organized by the First Presidency or the member of the Council of Twelve concerned after approval of the organization by the Joint Council of First Presidency, the Council of Twelve, and the Presiding Bishopric.¹ Reasonable notice of the organization meeting must be made available to all who are concerned, stating purpose, time, and place of meeting.

DISTRICT CONFERENCES are authorized to transact business relating to the maintenance and spread of the work within the district boundaries, but subject always to the resolutions of General Conference and to the advice of the general authorities in matters committed to these authorities under the law. Notice of such conferences should be sent to the First Presidency, the apostle in the field, and to such other general officers as might be concerned with the business to be transacted.

WHO SHALL PRESIDE. The district president presides over the district conference. At his request, or in his absence, his counselors may preside. Members of the First Presidency or Council of Twelve, or their authorized representative, may be asked to preside as a courtesy or in view of special circumstances.

DUTY OF THE PRESIDING OFFICERS. It is the duty of the presiding officers to bring to the attention of the conference such matters as require the consideration or action of the body; to require observance of the rules of order with decorum and propriety; and to secure, as far as he is able, a due respect and regard for the laws governing the church as contained in the Bible, the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants and General Conference enactments.

AN APPROPRIATE ORDER OF PROCEEDINGS for a district conference is as follows:

- Opening worship
- Reading and approval of the minutes

Reports, communications, and suggestions from the presiding officer.

Communications or reports from the First Presidency, the minister in charge or his assistant, the Presiding Bishopric, or other General Church officers (with precedence in the order named)

Reports of the officers of the district, other than the presiding officer

Reports of standing committees

Reports of special committees

Business made the special order of the meeting

Unfinished business

New business

Business deferred subject to call

Election of officers

Action concerning the time and place of the next meeting

Adjournment

VIII. Branches

ORGANIZATION OF BRANCHES.

Branches are the primary congregational organizations of the church, and may be formed by the authority of the First Presidency or of any member of the Council of Twelve having jurisdiction, or by their direction when circumstances prevent them from being present.

BRANCH OFFICERS. All persons who are to have official status in organized branches should be chosen by vote at a regular meeting of such branch, or at one specially called for that purpose, of which due notice shall have been given.

WHAT MAY BE DISCUSSED IN BRANCH BUSINESS MEETINGS.

Branches may consider legislation relating to branch affairs. They may also consider legislation relating to district affairs and recommend its enactment by district conference.

WHO SHALL PRESIDE. The branch president presides over the branch business meeting. At his request, or in his absence, his counselors may preside. Members of the First Presidency, Council of Twelve, ministers in charge, or members of the district presidency, may be asked to preside as a courtesy or in view of special circumstances.

DUTIES OF THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the presiding officer to bring to the attention of the body such matters as may require consideration or action; to enforce observance of the rules of order with decorum and propriety; to secure, as far as he is able, a due respect and regard for the laws governing the church as contained in the Bible, the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and General Conference enactments.

BUSINESS MEETING — WHEN HELD. Branch business meetings should be held annually or at such other times as are determined by action of the body. Notice of branch business meetings should be sent to the district president and the district bishop or bishop's agent, and to any other general or district officers concerned.

NUMBER CONSTITUTING A QUORUM. For the transacting of all branch business, unless otherwise provided, six or more members present at any properly called meeting shall constitute a quorum.

DUTY OF MEMBERS TO ATTEND. It is the duty of every member of the branch to attend branch business meetings, both regular and special.

A SUGGESTED ORDER OF PROCEEDINGS for the branch business meeting is as follows:

Opening worship

Reading and approval of the minutes

Reports, communications, and suggestions from the presiding officers

Communications or reports from the First Presidency, the minister in charge or his assistant, the Presiding Bishopric, or other General Church officers, and the president or secretary of the district (with precedence in this order)

Reports of officers of the branch other than the presiding officer

Reports of standing committees

Reports of special committees

Business made the special order of the meetings

Unfinished business

Business deferred subject to call

New business

Election of officers

Adjournment to a given date other than the regular time of meeting

Adjournment

RIGHT TO NOMINATE: It is the right of all members of the branch to make nominations in filling elective officers in the branch, but this action in no sense denies the right of presiding officers to present concurrent nominations for the filling of such elective offices.

ARE WE READY TO BUILD?

By Mary M. Mottashed

FILING AN ANNUAL TITHING STATEMENT is a matter in which most of us must show meekness and humility, since it is the door through which many hearts are either opened or closed by understanding and wisdom. It is doubtful that any member of this church is deliberately rebellious on this point. Had it not been for a series of sermons and the very patient explanations of my husband, I too would unwittingly be among those who fail to understand the reasons for the written statement.

For some time my husband and I had been attending a church school class taught by a missionary's wife. During this time a series of sermons were being preached on tithing and annual statements. While my husband and I were discussing one of the sermons, I asked him where the tithing money went. He told me that a portion of it went to the missionaries' families for their support. For the first time since hearing about tithing, I had a personal reason for paying it.

Having worked in a state agency where the purchase of farms and homes was carried on, I realized that we were always required to take a personal interview to determine the financial status of the applicant. We also had an architectural section where plans and specifications on proposed dwellings were brought for consideration. In this section were several competent employees, each specializing in his own field. One of the men worked for hours at computing the cost of material and suitability of the proposed structure, making notes as to compliance with FHA and state requirements. There was the cost per square foot of the material and the labor to be figured. Another man made a survey of the lot and checked the legal description and right of way on the property. One of the most important factors to be considered was the solvency of the applicant. Although all specifications and other details were in agreement with the provisions offered, unless the applicant was able to give a complete and satisfactory accounting of his financial status, it was impossible to give him a letter of commitment whereby the state could finance his property in compliance with the terms set forth in this letter.

All personal interviews were kept in the strictest confidence and were never discussed outside the office. Even in the office they were referred to only when the case justified such consideration. If a state agency could exercise this much integrity, the church of Jesus Christ certainly has a right to know its prospects for building the kingdom of God.

There have been many times when church contributions have fallen short of the goal we set. We have never received a reminder of an overdue payment as we do from creditors to whom we give full financial statements to purchase material possessions. Instead, we receive each year, a "thank-you" note along with a convenient statement of contributions made for the past year.

Is there really a just cause for withholding our statements in the investment of the kingdom of God?

A Living Church

Part IV

By Ruth McNickle Kirby

Note: In the Herald of November 12, page eleven, column three, part of a paragraph was omitted. The sentence, "Spiritual discernment is an elemental attribute of a living religion," (five lines from the bottom of the page) should be followed by:

A living church! Such a church needs no argument. But for the sake of argument the idea of bodily completeness has sometimes been stressed, and physical form has been made the criterion of virtue and truth. Yet men may be minus legs, arms, eyes, or certain other organs, and still fulfill the whole aims of their lives. On the other hand, a body may be physically complete—perfect in form—and yet be dead. The asphyxiated are not dead because of any lack of parts, but because of separation from the breath of life. So too, a people can die, not from any lack of organization, but merely through separation from the vital breath of God. The idea of organizational perfection, like the Roman Catholic claim of direct descent, proves nothing one way or another concerning the life of a body or a church. While the democratic idea behind the church is admirable, organizational perfection as an argument for the divinity of a church is inconclusive.

IN RELIGION the development of this sense of sight or intuition is known as revelation. Revelation is insight functioning at its highest level. On every level as electricity flows, thought also flows. Why else the Renaissance, America, the Crusades, the Elizabethan era, nationalism, communism, mobs, gangs, or the Hebrew Bible? Where else the power of ritual or the beauty of worship? Through the channels of nature the spirit of truth, flowing to the receptive mind, extends its potentialities beyond its personal boundaries into the Eternal Mind.

Revelation is sometimes thought of as a communication of a prophet to his followers, but revelation to one individual is not revelation to another any more than sight to one is sight to another. Unless with a communicated revelation there is a personal conviction to the auditor as well as to the speaker—a ring of truth that bears the impress of the Spirit of God—the revelation is limited to the one who actually sees and feels. The function of a living religion is the development in the individual of his own mental and spiritual powers to perceive the Divine, in an intimate relationship between God and man. It is that power which will bring a time to come when orally communicated prophecies shall cease, being no more of use—when the mind of man, perceiving truth, shall at last be free. A living church will therefore be a church of personal revelation.

A LIVING CHURCH will synchronize the old and new. With a modern interpretation of the world it will not throw away the gems of earlier wisdom. No age is all white or all black. Even the Bible, any honest reader of it must admit, has its tinges of gray. A living church will not throw an undue halo around antiquity. It will understand that the Bible writers were human, and that as humans they were partial and fallible in their concepts; but this knowledge does not reject the body of truth they have left. For truth does not lie whole and immutable by any human vehicle or process. A certain eclecticism is necessary to every truth seeker. From the vast miscellany of thought must be selected, even in the Bible, the true thought, the sound judgment. And to select, one must consider and weigh evidence—not the mere limited evidence of reason, but the profound evidences of the heart as well. Truth has a way of "ringing true." "My sheep," Jesus said, "shall know my voice." A living church will be sensitive to the voice of the Divine. It will be a receptive treasury for all that is good.

God walks the libraries of the world and its open fields. He is not confined within a Hebrew Bible. A living church will therefore be a learning church. It will be life aware. The very quality of life within it presupposes an enlargement and even at times a change of concept—for life is never static. The Roman Church claims for itself infallibility and indefectibility. It denies thereby the power of growth and walls itself from the inspiration of a new day. Crystallization of concept, for anyone, is the end of growth and the beginning of death. A living church will possess the democratic greatness of constructive self-criticism, the vitality of new vision, the urge of new experience. The doctrine of infallibility is a defense mechanism for fossil religions.

A LIVING CHURCH will be wholehearted. It will not be divided between light and dark. There is no room in a living religion for the lukewarmness of a twilight gray, for that negative ennui of soul which struggles merely for enough light and warmth to insure against death. Intensity and spread are qualities of divine light as well as of physical. The Apostle Paul said, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation." A living church will carry such a living conviction, intense enough and broad enough to reach into every crevice of a man's experience. The religious impulse, like the neural impulse, operates on an all-or-nothing basis. If a neuron is touched at all it must fire completely.

Because this is so, a living church will be like a city set on a hill. It will be seen of men. Expression is a quality of lights (light, to be light, must shine), and where there is no shining there is no light. A monotone of spiritual twilight, moreover, will never be sufficient argument to convince a world, and all the words in the world can never outweigh such a physical fact. Except its expression of light exceed the light of the Pharisees, a church will never be unique as a light-giver.

A corporeal organization is not defunct so long as it exists, but the spiritual church is not so easily measured. It is a matter, not of absolutes, but of degrees—how much alive; what nerves are fire; how intense, how widespread its light. Its light is measured, not by the limits of an autocratic hierarchy, in the supposition of the spiritual vision of the few and the blind faith of many, but by direct enlightenment of the individual conscience in a mutual sharing of the verities of God. A living church is a living body, not merely a living head.

NEVERTHELESS, as long as there are one-candle-power people, and one-hundred-candle-power people, leadership, and degrees of leadership, will be necessary to social organization. A living church requires a living leadership, fired by the Spirit of God. Such a leadership, unlike the leadership of force which is prevalent in the world, will in no sense be used for the exploitation or suppression of the spiritual potentials of others, and the total lumination which a living church will shed will depend on the cherished light from each individual unit of candle-power.

Hence the leadership of a living church will be more than a badge of office. Men are activated by inner drives which spring from the heart's desires—vital urges that will not be denied. A call to the work of God, if it is ever to find expression, must come first from such an urge, from the inside out. The call to be a musician impels a person thus called to practice and study the art of music until he is at last able to express himself musically; but no matter how great his call may be, or how truly he may be called, he is actually a musician only to the extent he applies himself to become skilled in the art of music. The same conditions are true of any other ministry. A call to service, to a God who is not a respecter of persons, can come only through sincere desire for God's will on earth, plus an earnest effort at qualification to help bring it about.

A LIVING CHURCH will understand the meaning of qualification to serve. For, if the glory of God is intelligence, as we have been told, it cannot adequately be conveyed to man by an inferior vehicle. Jesus said we do not put new wine in old bottles; neither can men profitably couch the divine truths of God in ineloquent language, half-hearted endeavor, or inadequate knowledge. An elevated subject demands an elevated medium. A ministry which is spiritually alive will try to perfect its medium of expression, whether that medium be in preaching, in teaching, in music, in social work, or in any other avenue of service.

But grant the perfect medium. There must still be the inner substance. There must be not only the new bottles but the new wine. For this reason the apostles of the New Testament were told to tarry in Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. The power-generating love of God is the all-important requirement for true ministry. It is the first and final answer to a living church. It need not be professed. It speaks a conviction inherent in itself. For the very personality of God is the token of his authority. There is no other authority which is of God.

When John the Baptist sent to Jesus to ask if he were really the Christ, Jesus made no claims. He merely told him of his work: "The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them." The work of Jesus Christ spoke for itself.

Man loves the tangible. The physical presence of Jesus momentarily meant more to John, in his anxiety, than the spiritual presence of his work. Similarly Peter, the tangible, the visible, was later interpreted by the material-minded hierarchy of the medieval church as the rock upon which Jesus said he would build his church. The significance of the spiritual revelation which had identified Jesus to Peter was passed up altogether. The intangible divine contact between God and man, the rock of revelation, was so much less easily seen than Peter!

So men still tend to interpret their spiritual values, seeking their salvation in the tangible, the corporeal. Instead of elevating the soul to catch the divine meaning, they tend to lower the Divine to an approximate level with themselves. The flow of inspiration becomes petrified only that they may touch it. The spirit crystallizes that they may perceive its form. Yet in the petrification, in the crystallization, all is lost.

Yet form has its place, and it is beautiful there. Terminology and ritual and money and organization and finite concepts of infinities are necessary physical and psychic attributes of a functioning church body. But form must always be the servant of spirit and not its master. A living church will never confuse the candle with the flame.

COME, ALL YE that are heavy laden!" The call is apt today. In its affliction, the world needs more than doctrinal patent medicine advertisements. It needs more than sellers' claims, more than chemists' (Continued on page 23.)

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF

J. A. Gunsolley

PART I

Parentage

I WAS BORN on July 9, 1862, in Delaware County, Iowa, near Strawberry Point. My parents were farmers and hard working people. They married young; mother was sixteen, and father had not reached the legal age for voting. Their education was meager, neither of them going beyond what would now be considered the fifth or sixth grade. They continued their studies to some extent after their marriage, and could read and write as well as the average persons of their station in life.

According to my earliest recollection they were members of the Methodist Church. I can remember going to church with them when I was two or three years old.

Westward Move

It must have been in 1866 or 1867 that father caught the "Go West" fever. Many people were leaving their east-of-the-Mississippi homes to take advantage of the cheaper lands farther west. Father had two brothers, Benjamin and Rufus, living in southwestern Iowa. He decided to take the family and move there. Accordingly he disposed of his property, fitted out two covered wagons and two good teams of horses, loaded the family and the small amount of household goods that were to be taken along, and found his way to Mills and Fremont Counties in Iowa.

Our family at that time consisted of (in the order of their ages) George Hyrum, Jacob Lincoln, James Edgar, Jerome Willis, Jeremiah (myself) Ad-den, and Julius Franklin, besides our parents. Their first child, a daughter Caroline, had died in infancy. Other children later born to them were Jerusha Aletha, born about the time of the change of residence, Alice Ophelia, Victor William, Effie May (who died in infancy) and Stella May.

This trip overland from the north-eastern to the southwestern part of the state was full of interest. The three older boys drove the horses and occupied one wagon, while the second team was driven by father. Mother and we younger children rode with him.

Our journey which to us was to the "land of promise"—lasted a number of days, and our arrival at our destination was a distinct relief. We were cordially received by the family of Uncle Rufus and Aunt Mary and their four children. They lived on a farm in Fremont County in a community called Egypt; this was near the small town and railroad station of Bartlett. Uncle Rufus and Aunt Mary were members of the Latter Day Saint Church; he held the office of elder.

Farming in Western Iowa

Father soon bought a farm and moved the family to it. It was located not far from the home of Uncle Ben who had a large family.

Our next home was on a small farm belonging to a man by the name of Chancey Williams; we occupied a part of the same house the owner's family lived in. It was a large house for the time and well built—almost a mansion compared to other houses in the neighborhood. The family consisted of Mr. Williams and his wife, a son, Willie, about fifteen or sixteen, and a younger daughter Vivian. Mrs. Williams had been a schoolteacher in her earlier life and liked very much to read. She often would read aloud to her family and to as many of our family as cared to listen. We would gather about her as she held her book or magazine or newspaper in one hand and a tallow candle in the other and read for hours at a time. Tallow candles were the best light she had, and she made her own. I remember seeing the process of candlemaking from start to finish. It was before the days of kerosene lamps.

We enjoyed those evenings very much, though I was too young—about seven—to appreciate to any great extent what was read.

First Impressions of Joseph Smith

I recall listening in on a conversation between Mr. Williams and my father upon one occasion when they were discussing religion. Mr. Williams, as I gathered it, had lived at Nauvoo, Illinois, when Joseph and Hyrum Smith were assassinated, and he had joined with Brigham Young and his followers. He was one of the twelve men sent to the west to select a location outside the jurisdiction of the United States. He became dissatisfied with Brigham Young's leadership and broke off relations with him.

Homemade Clothes

Factory made clothes, especially for children, were not so plentiful in my childhood. Mother made our clothes without the help of a sewing machine. Wool was taken by farmers to the weaver who wove it into cloth. The farmer washed the sheep, sometimes in the river or flowing stream, taking them one by one into the water and scrubbing them, much to the consternation of the sheep. The wool was then sheared from the sheep and carded or shaped into rolls and then made into yarn by the farmer's wife by the use of a spinning wheel. It was then colored by using various coloring materials, sometimes hulls from butter-nuts or black walnuts or other dyes. Much of the weaving into cloth was done in the homes by the women; the cloth was sold to the farmers or exchanged for more yarn. We boys wore this kind of clothing with the addition of aprons large enough to cover us from neck to ankles until we grew to the age when we became ashamed to be wearing aprons, which belonged among girls' apparel. Homemade clothes were not worn only by small children, but by grown-up boys and men. I'm quite certain father wore coats and trousers made by mother. My first suit of store clothes came from Montgomery Ward, ordered by our local merchant when I was entering my teens. I truly felt I was emerging from childhood into youth then.

Fever and Ague

Our home in Mills County was in the low lands of the Missouri River bottoms. New farms were being opened up. The land was not well-drained, and as a consequence there was much fever and ague—or "aguer" as we called it. This sickness was peculiar in that it only worked half-time, giving chills and fever one day and the next permitting one to be able to work and be around as usual. I can remember a time when five or six of our family had the "shakes" the same day. One might feel pretty well in the morning, be chilling by the middle of the forenoon, have a high fever until midafternoon, and feel pretty well again by bedtime. I remember well that on one afternoon of my sick days when the fever had left, I decided to take a short walk out of doors in the spring sunshine. I went through the backyard to the barn where a number of calves were penned. I went into the barn, and presently it began to grow dark; objects about me seemed to be in a whirl, and soon all was blank. When consciousness returned I was lying prone upon the ground. The first thing I recognized was the calves standing about gazing as if wondering what had happened, and I realized that I had fainted. That is the only time I ever entirely passed out that I can remember.

First School Attendance

The teacher of the school was spoken of as a Mormon preacher. He was Riley W. Briggs, father of George N. Briggs, president emeritus of Graceland College. With my brother, Jerome, and some of the other boys, I trudged across the fields to shorten the distance to the school house.

While we lived on the Williams farm, with a number of other children I attended school in one of the rooms in the big house. A young woman by the name of Emma Fish was hired as our teacher. Hers was a task indeed, for the equipment consisted only of household chairs, crude benches, and the like. Even books were scarce, but she managed very well. The school was carried on for only a short time. Miss Fish not only made a success of the school, but gained the admiration and affections of a young lawyer who also boarded with the Williams family.

Bethlehem

Father bought forty acres of land not far from the Williams farm and erected a small, four-room house. It was located about five or six miles from Glenwood and about twenty-one miles south of Council Bluffs. When we moved to this farm we attended school in a small community west of us called Bethlehem. Across the river directly west lay the town of Plattsmouth, Nebraska, thus named because of its being a short distance from where the Platte empties into the Missouri River. In winter we crossed the river on the ice, and in summer on a ferryboat.

I recall father's hauling cordwood across the river on the ice and selling it or trading it for groceries. Our first clock was bought in Plattsmouth. It was a good-sized clock run by weights, and it remained in our home as long as my parents were able to keep up a house of their own. It was a Seth Thomas clock—a trade name common in those years.

Pacific Junction

Soon after we moved to this new farm the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Company extended its line from Chicago westward to Council Bluffs and Omaha. This new road crossed the Council Bluffs and St. Joseph Railroad about one and a half miles northeast of our place. A station was established at this intersection and named Pacific Junction. The road going on west from Pacific Junction passed within a mile of our farm and crossed the Missouri River on a new bridge to the town of Plattsmouth. A number of the men working on this new line boarded with our family, and those with teams of horses or mules purchased hay and corn from father.

The first school established in Pacific Junction was taught by Fanny Watkins, a young woman from Glenwood. We six boys attended that school the first term. It was a disagreeable walk of a mile and a half from our home to the school, but we younger ones were helped along by our older brothers. We saw the town grow up from the very first buildings into a nice little village. Our folks often drove to Glenwood, county seat of Mills County, to do their trading.

Harrison County

Our little farm proved to be too small for our growing family, which, with the birth of Victor in 1870, numbered nine children—seven boys and two girls. Father rented a farm in Harrison County near Mondamin, thirty-six miles north of Council Bluffs, and sixteen miles north of Missouri Valley, and sold our Mills County farm. It was in March that our household goods and farm implements and all the members of the family were loaded into wagons and transported to our new home, a distance of about sixty miles. We reached our destination and moved into a small five-room cottage about forty rods from the banks of Burcham's Lake.

Our family moved to a larger farm with a larger house when I was about twelve or thirteen. One part of this one-story dwelling was constructed of logs, and the other part of lumber—wide boards placed vertically with cracks covered by narrow bats. It had four rooms in all. We were living on this place in 1876. I remember distinctly the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia was held that year. It was then that we learned of the first telephones being successfully operated. All we knew of telephones was from newspaper accounts, for none were in operation in our part of the country until several years later.

Trip to Lincoln, Nebraska

By some deal my father came into possession of eighty acres of land that he had never seen, so he decided he would drive one of his farm teams and take one of us boys for company to find out about the land. I happened to be the one chosen to go with him, and it proved to be an interesting and memorable trip. The land lay within a few miles of Lincoln, the capital of Nebraska. It was "grasshopper year" and a hot, dry summer. We had difficulty at times obtaining water for the horses and even for ourselves. On one occasion we drew some water from a well and had to skim off the hoppers before we could drink the water. It was not appetizing, but in spite of floating grasshoppers' legs and wings it slaked our thirst. It was late summer, and we saw many fields of corn entirely stripped of foliage and other vegetation entirely eaten away. We made our beds on the ground under the wagon, spreading the quilts or blankets we had brought. The horses were tied to the wagon and ate from the wagon box over our heads; but after riding all day in the hot sun it was not difficult to sleep at night—at least not for me and if father had any trouble he did not mention it.

At that time Lincoln was little more than a town in population, but it grew quite rapidly into a city of many thousands, covering a large area and becoming the home of the Nebraska University and other educational institutions. Today it has one of the most beautiful capitol buildings in the country.

The trip was not particularly important, but was educational to me in many respects. Not long after that Father sold the land, which in the course of years was included within the limits of the city.

Question Time

Question:

Does our church disapprove of its isolated members attending other churches and enrolling their children in other Sunday schools? L.L. Ohio

Answer:

Almost all clubs, fraternal organizations, and churches are beneficial to their participating members. In certain important ways the world is a better place in which to live because of them. Where fraternal organizations take the place of the church, or where "church-anity" takes the place of true Christianity, great harm is done. True Christianity must have the proper organism to produce it. The ordinances of the gospel are that we may go on to perfection (Hebrews 6: 1, 2). The New Testament organization of the church is for the perfecting of the saints (Ephesians 4: 8-16; I Corinthians 12: 12-28). The precise doctrine of the church is that we may have God as our Father and Christ as our Savior (II John 7-11). To ignore the exact doctrine of Christ, the precise ordinances of the gospel, or the prescribed organization of the body of Christ—his church—is to imperil the soul. In the light of these scripturally supported facts, one should never accept a substitute for the true way of the church of Jesus Christ.

Your question as to the advisability of attending other churches when one is isolated from one's own church suggests the necessity of a well-balanced home plan. For cultural reasons it is better to attend any church than none at all. Where this is necessary the parents should see that the Holy Scriptures, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants are in the home and used systematically. Several other books of the church should be available, some dealing with the doctrines of the church and some for development and stability of the members of the church. The current church school quarterlies, suited to the various ages of the members of the family, should be used consistently and regularly. The Herald should be subscribed for and used to keep one abreast of the growing church. The "family altar" should be a daily practice. Of great value to worship in the home is Daily Bread, a monthly publication of the church. You should make sure that the General Church Statistician knows your latest address, and that the district president and the pastor of the nearest congregation of the church knows your address. You should request that the district president send information about such district activities as conferences, reunions, young people's institutes and camps. You and your family should attend conferences and reunions provided by the district so that you may keep growing in the faith, spirit, work, and movement of the church.

Families which are out of touch with the church for several years are usually lost to the church and the church to them. Therefore, isolated members should plan to move to within easy traveling distance to a good congregation of the church as soon as practical.

Plan with Christ and his church in your lives for your present and eternal life's sake. ALMA C. ANDREWS

Question:

Explain the meaning of the term "fire" in the Scripture, especially in Doctrine and covenants, Section 32: 2.

Missouri

A.M.A.

Answer:

This statement concerns the need to cry "repentance" and the need to be baptized in water, "then cometh the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost." Fire, as here used, is a cleansing and purifying agent. Fire destroys the dross or undesirable materials in the furnace or smelting plant. It separates the good from the bad.

After a person has truly repented of his sins and is baptized in water, the laying on of hands is experienced for the conferring of the Holy Ghost which tells one the difference between that which is good and that which is harmful. As with the refiner's fire, the dross is eliminated and the good is retained.

John the Baptist said, "I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire; he will gather the wheat into his garner; but the chaff he will burn with fire unquenchable."—Luke 3: 24. This is the same process mentioned in Doctrine and Covenants 32: 2. The Scriptures mention, too, that every man's work shall be tried with fire as to what sort it is, whether good or bad. The purpose then of the "fire" mentioned in the Scripture reference is to cleanse and perfect men.

Question:

I know that I am saved because I gave my heart to Jesus. What occasion is there for my joining your church?

Michigan

J.R.G.

Answer:

Giving one's heart to Jesus is a mystical idea developed under Protestantism and is used to express various forms and degrees of conversion. It is not found in the Scriptures. The gospel "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth"; so Paul states. We also find this concerning Christ: "He became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him." Salvation is gained not by casual consent to throw one's self upon the mercies of Christ, but in a thorough belief of and obedience to his teachings.

Christ's gospel of salvation is a system of truth, harmonious throughout all its parts, and is associated by divinely appointed ordinances, which truth and ordinances are administered by Christ's own church with his authority and confirmation. Truth or law, ordinances and ceremonies of Christ's appointment, and the church organization wherein and by which the law and ordinances function are all one system, and to be effectual to salvation must be accepted in entirety. James taught the necessity of keeping the whole law, and he who disregards one point "is guilty of all" (James 2: 10). No man can receive the gospel without receiving Christ, and no man can receive Christ without becoming part of his body, the church.

The Home Potential

By Geraldine Wyatt

LAST MOTHER'S DAY a father, mother and their son came to visit me at the Independence Sanitarium. I was particularly pleased to see this young man, as he had just won an honored position because of his fine training and ability. After I had congratulated him, he said, "I owe my success to my parents. They are the ones who inspired me to study and work for it."

His parents certainly merited the praise. Not only had they maintained a fine Latter Day Saint home, but they had sent their seven children to college. At the present time one has earned his master's degree, and two are working toward this goal. Surely this is a fine group of citizens to turn out for the church and for the country.

The home is the inspirational center for members of the family, and rarely will a matured person be found at variance with the training of his youth. In fact, it is amazing how accurately a home can be judged by the individuals produced from it, for the pace of religious thinking, community responsibility, and the cultural achievements to be attained is set by the parents.

A FEW YEARS AGO, in my research, I read a statement concerning the Comanche Indians who were always considered by our pioneers to be the fiercest of all Indian tribes. The author, an authority on human relations, compared the supposedly savage state of the Comanches with our own cultural achievements and added: "With all our progress, with all our intellectual attainments, this tribe of Indians surpassed us in social responsibility."

Could a primitive group of people have more concern over their fellow-men than citizens of a highly developed, cultured, progressive nation? Always interested in the Indians, and believing that some of the Zionite traits were still inherent in their living, I delved into this tribe's history. Through generations of cultural degeneration, even as they lived a nomadic existence, these Indians still taught their children the principles of working together for the benefit of all.

In analyzing the expansion of our own country across the continent, historians always give credit to the pioneer women for this successful movement. The Spaniards tried to conquer this land, and the French tried it, but only the Americans were able to withstand the rigors imposed in wresting a settlement out of the wilderness. Historians say the American women carried the stability of the home with them into this new land, giving the men the support necessary to achieve where other men had failed. The women of other countries were unwilling or ill-equipped to endure the hardships of pioneer life, and without the home to sustain them, the men finally broke down under the grueling hardships.

I think the reason goes even deeper than that. The Spaniards and the French sought personal wealth and power. America was first settled by people who felt the need—the longing—to establish a land where not only they but coming generations could have freedom of religious worship, freedom of individual development, et cetera. The goal they set to achieve was beyond self-aggrandizement; it was for the betterment of social conditions for all. Though selfish interests crept into this expansion movement, yet primarily the goal of building a better country for others predominated. This was the heritage given these pioneers by their parents.

OUR CHURCH has the goal, too, of a better way of living. And as back in the pioneer times, this influence for development must come from the home. The church school and other church-promoted projects have children for so short a time, the teachings have not enough impact to carry the training into actual living. But the home has that necessary influence, and in the home lies the latent power to achieve this Zionite way of living.

Just before the second World War, I read a thought-provoking book by a European author, who wrote of walking through a crowded continental train. Slumbering children lay in the aisles, and as he very carefully stepped over them, his reflections ran something like this: "I must take care. Who knows what this child may become. Why, this lad may mature into another Mozart; this girl become another Marie Curie; and this child here, who sobs in his sleep, may be another Michelangelo. Who knows what latent power lies in their brains and in their hearts?"

And one does not know the possibilities of any child, nor what slight deed or word of encouragement may be his guiding beacon. As psychiatrists have learned that some incident of childhood quite often blights the matured person, so is it true that inspiration also springs from one's youth.

When I see children neglected—and I'm thinking of well-fed, well-clad, and quite often well-educated youngsters who are neglected as to being taught the real values of living—it makes me heartsick. What a loss to mankind, to the community, and to the church these children will be, because they were not taught that service to one's fellow-man is the greatest goal for which anyone can labor.

Regardless of the field a youngster qualifies himself for, he will never fulfill the promises latent within him unless he is taught that by aligning himself with his Creator, nourishing the desire in his heart to really help others, he strives for a goal beyond personal desire to that perfection Christ meant when he said: "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

Virtues of Domesticity

OF ALL modern notions, the worst is this: that domesticity is dull. Inside the home, they say, is dead decorum and routine; outside is adventure and variety. But the truth is that the home is the only place of liberty, the only spot on earth where a man can alter arrangements suddenly, make an experiment or indulge in a whim. The home is not the one tame place in a world of adventure; it is the one wild place in a world of rules and set tasks.—G. K. CHESTERTON

The Art of Wrapping Gifts, by Drucella Lowrie. Studio Publications, Inc., in association with Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.00.

THIS IS THE BOOK everyone's been waiting for. At least once a year, everyone becomes a gift-giver, and over and over, two nerve-knotting problems arise: (a) how to choose exactly the right gift for a specific person, and (b) how to wrap it so provocatively that the "Oh's!" and the "Ah's!" begin at first sight of the package.

This slender, idea-packed volume will help to make gift-giving an entirely pleasurable activity for both giver and recipient. The author says that the reader can develop the finger dexterity necessary, and then, after learning a few rules, can become proficient in thinking up ways to wrap gifts that are "little works of art of one's own."

On the first page the author sets up specifications for neatness and beauty of gift packages and then proceeds by way of clearly worded instructions, line drawings, and photographs to teach the reader how to wrap them. A ten-year-old child could follow the easy step-by-step directions with success.

As in all well-planned "how-to" books, this one, also, lists and describes the equipment, supplies, and materials one must have on hand if the work in question is to be accomplished easily, happily, and as inexpensively as possible. Helpful suggestions on choosing unusual and interesting color combinations for paper and ribbon are included.

THE AUTHOR INSTRUCTS, first, in the general procedure to follow in wrapping gift packages, covering the following subjects: preparing the gift and boxing it; selecting the paper and wrapping it around different kinds of boxes; selecting the ribbon and tying it around the package; making various kinds of bows (glamour, loop, pinwheel, poinsettia, hair, wreath, corsage, Greek, pussy cat, figure-8, basket, tied) and how and where to place them on the package; adding decorative trimmings.

After these general instructions come the specific helps. Christmas packages are well discussed. The selection and decoration of gifts for special occasions, such as Mother's Day, graduation, weddings, Valentine's Day, and so on, open up new vistas of pleasure for the one who likes to give presents; the suggestions for making the package individual and amusing will aid in fitting the gift into the giftee's vocational and avocational interests for which it will be happily remembered. Children's gifts should be wrapped distinctively, too, the author believes and shows how to do it. She guides the reader through other difficulties: gifts that are hard to show, such as money, gift certificates, magazine subscriptions, and plants; gifts that are too large to wrap; the wrapping requirements of food and candy gifts; decorating baskets in which the gifts are sent.

Further help in selecting the right gift is given by the list of stores and departments which stock the items for the different types of gifts. The directions for packing and wrapping gifts for mailing will, if followed, save them from, or insure them against, loss or damage while in transit. Eye-opening is the section on the etiquette of giving and receiving gifts. It is most valuable advice—another way to make friends and keep them.

From gift-wrapping for personal pleasure, the author proceeds to the subject of gift-wrapping for profit, either as a part-time or full-time business.

At the end of the book is a list of college colors (for package color schemes), with room on the end paper for writing one's own list.

Make Your Own Merry Christmas, by Anne Wertsner. M. Barrows and Company, Inc. $2.00.

ANYTHING SO NICE as Christmas deserves to be anticipated a long time in advance, and remembered a long time afterwards," says the author of this book in the first chapter. And in the last chapter she adds to that pleasant thought: "It is the purpose of this book to make the decoration of the home for the happiest season of the year a real labor of love."

The book is an exposition of the author's belief that the celebration of Christmas should be the climax to a year's leisurely planning and preparation.

She is field secretary and flower show director of the Pennsylvania Horticultural Society and has had years of experience in lecturing, demonstrating, teaching, and consulting on the subject of gardens.

Naturally, she is most enthusiastic about the use of live materials in decorating for Christmas. Two whole chapters are devoted to the descriptions of the various kinds of evergreens, "the background," and fruits, "the accents" of this style of decorating. Help in selecting the right decorating materials for one's purpose and way of living is given.

The tools and supplies needed are listed, with general techniques for using them. The amateur decorator is thus put on a firm foundation, ready to follow directions for specific decorations or to devise her own with facility. Diagrams and sketches illuminate the text.

In quick succession the reader learns how to trim a Christmas tree and lessen fire hazards; to make wreaths and other hanging decorations for indoor and outdoor use; to construct artificial Christmas trees to supplement the real one; to decorate with candles; to carry the Christmas theme throughout the whole house; to decorate Christmas tables and make favors suitable to the season.

A chapter of selected and tested recipes for preparing Christmas dishes will be of much help to the busy homemaker.

Picked From the Periodicals

By Aarona Booker Kohman

At first glance November magazines seem to be chiefly concerned with food, as the first winter holiday approaches. By the time you read this, however, it will be too late for you to look up these specials in time for Thanksgiving. Some ideas are worth saving for Christmas use and may be mentioned.

If you like to indulge in a little righteous indignation occasionally, one current article will provide exactly the right stimulus. It is "Your Wife Has an Easy Racket!" American Magazine. We hope the author wasn't too serious!

"Why Pick on the British?" American Magazine, is an interesting article, whether you agree with the views advanced by the author or not. It is, at least, good sportsmanship to give the other fellow a chance to be heard.

"Are Women Different?" Ladies' Home Journal, is stimulating reading for any woman who is interested in her place in today's scheme of things. It can be read and reread with profit.

Good Housekeeping offers a food feature that is timely, but also will retain its value all year long—the "Cookie Cook Book," with recipes ranging from the simple and plain to the fanciest.

It Can Be Done

By Barbara Peavy

THE FRIENDLY HUM of voices carried backstage at the Campus, but the gaily costumed group was unaware of any sound other than the voice praying: "These young people have worked with a great desire to serve thee, Father. And now just before they start their performance they have come to ask that thy Spirit bless them. May they speak their lines with ease, and may the ministry of music bring happiness to those who listen. They have felt thy spirit on previous occasions, and have been inspired by thy power. Bless their efforts again this night, we pray in Jesus' name. Amen."

A few final words of instruction were given to the chorus. The orchestra started the overture, the lights dimmed, the group for first scene assembled, and the performance began!

Last year's successful production, The Mikado, created interest throughout the year in another operetta. The young people of Independence had proved to themselves and to the public that they could produce a musicale of high quality. When the New Moon by Sigmund Romberg was selected, many people felt that perhaps the group was getting over-enthusiastic and that the wisest thing would have been to select a more simple production. The Starlight Theater in Kansas City was giving nightly performances of musicales of this type. Perhaps the young people didn't realize how difficult a large production was.

With determination, enthusiasm, and devotion the leaders of the project began making plans. Several goals were set up:

1. A city-wide project for young people interested in music that would help them develop their talents and have a rich experience in fellowship together.
2. A contribution to community culture planned to interest the entire family.
3. Enough funds to contribute to a project for recreational development for young people in Independence.

In the living room of a Louisiana mansion

REHEARSALS BEGAN IN MARCH. A chorus of over fifty young people met each week in the choir room of the Auditorium for practice. Four months of practice polished the young voices, and the contribution the chorus made to the production was notable. The music was, however, just one of the many phases of preparation. While the chorus and cast practiced, the scenery was planned, and the artists were painting backdrops several months before the performance. Three large backdrops were needed: one of the interior of a home, one aboard ship, and one of a tropical island. The artist who planned and painted for many hours is a young mother who gave freely of her time. This was an example of the outstanding feature of the production—co-operation. Everyone involved was concerned that the operetta be the finest production ever given by a group of young people in Independence.

Leaguers were responsible for ticket sales, as were members of White Masque Players, the Men's Club, and many other organizations. Publicity was handled by several Leaguers. Willing parents sewed on the costumes under the direction of a busy young mother who found time to give to young people. The stage equipment was handled by fathers and young men. Every phase of the operetta was integrated into an active program of community endeavor.

The dramatic director, also a young mother, worked closely with the music director, a member of one of the Zion's Leagues. Her husband, who is the League leader at one of the branches, spent many hours working with various committees as co-ordinator for the operetta. Many persons willingly gave time for the success of the production. But any who participated in the activity were richly rewarded by the response of the community to the New Moon.

YOUNG PEOPLE IN INDEPENDENCE have contributed to the cultural as well as spiritual development of their city. To know that young people are concerned enough to work on a project for the good of their community builds good relations.

The Zion's League responsible for the production of The Mikado served as the nucleus for the chorus. Other Leaguers from the sixteen branches in Independence joined the chorus, and the cast was carefully selected. The ability of those who assumed the lead roles was outstanding. The makeup director, the hairdresser, the orchestra members, even those of the cleanup committee found an experience rich in fellowship as they shared responsibilities.

From March until the last of June, Zion's Leaguers in Independence were busy on a project that strengthened friendships as well as developed talent. "I never realized what potential the young people have" was not an uncommon remark after the first evening's performance. Blessed by fair weather and the support of their community, the young people gave their best for they also had the knowledge that God was with them.

THE OPERETTA IS OVER NOW—only the memories of a successful endeavor and work well worth the effort remain. The monetary profits exceeded the expectations of any of the committee chairmen. But the outstanding contribution the New Moon made was in the lives of the young people who participated in its planning and production.

What was accomplished by the young people of Independence can be experienced, perhaps not on such a large scale, by any Zion's League that is enthusiastic and concerned enough to attempt such a project. There are many light operettas that small Leagues could plan and, with enlisted help from the branch, could present. The essential factor in the success of any League is that it be active.

Not only will the branch and the young people benefit from such an experience, but a project of this type is of value to any community.

After hearing about the activities of young people in Independence, a youth leader from another denomination said,

Aboard the Ship, "The New Moon"

"Your church is certainly fortunate to have young people so enthusiastic, so willing, and above all so active. Nothing can keep a church more alive and growing than young people who are spending their time in its service. That's the best selling card for other young people. I think your New Moon was a worthwhile missionary endeavor."

The missionary effect was noted when it was reported that one young man who attended, a nonmember, was a friend to another young man in the chorus, and after he saw the performance his statement to his friend was, "I'd like to know more about a church that produces young people like I saw last night. There was a spirit I've never felt before at the operetta last night. I think your church must have something."

After The Mikado last year, young people were challenged with the statement, "Your League is what you make it." The challenge is still there, but after the success of this year Independence young people can say, "It doesn't just happen, but it can be done." Any Zion's League that is concerned with its members will be active. No matter how small the group, with the help of the branch some activity can be planned that will interest the community. It's a never-to-be-forgotten experience, and is worth the effort and time.

Emerson said, "The reward of a thing well done is to have done it." No greater reward can come to a group of young people. The requirements are simple, and with enthusiasm and devotion any League can know the satisfaction of success and can join with the young people of Independence in their testimony—It Can Be Done!

■ Three services have concluded the unit of religious life commemorating the events of 1851 that led to the reorganization of the church. The anniversary service, "Forerunners and Founders of the Reorganization," was held on Sunday, November 4. Students attended a testimonial fellowship, "Fundamentals of the Reorganization," on the following Wednesday. In it they tried to clarify what fundamentals the founding fathers had sought to retain and revive, and what the distinguishing fundamentals of the church are today. The service of the Lord's Supper was held on the next Sunday with the theme, "Fruits of the Reorganization."

■ Graceland students attended an all-school Halloween party on Saturday evening before the holiday. After traversing a chamber of horrors in the basement of Zimmermann Hall, they entered the Student Center through the mouth of a huge paper face. There members of the social clubs had set up carnival concession booths for the amusement of the party-goers. A program of entertainment in Halloween mood climaxed the evening.

■ The Town and Country Quiz, a regular feature of radio station WHO in Des Moines, Iowa, was presented from Graceland's Student Center on November 16. The quiz program proper, preceded by an hour long variety show, featured a team of Lamoni residents competing with a team from the rural area outside Lamoni and was tape recorded for broadcast later. The program was sponsored by the Lamoni Zion's League and the Graceland chapter of Alpha Phi Omega, national service fraternity for college men who have been Boy Scouts, as part of the Lamoni Branch's drive for funds for the completion of the new church. A five-dollar contribution to the building fund assured a reserved seat at the variety show and quiz.

Mothers of high school boys wanting to play football will be interested in "Should Your Boy Play Football?" McCall's Magazine, whose author is the wife of a famous player and coach, and the mother of four sons.

"60 Working Days Until Christmas," American Home, says now is the time to start if you want to plan a Christmas costume for your house. Several ideas are pictured, and the patterns may be ordered.

Woman's Home Companion offers some easy-to-make clothes ideas for those who sew in "Ponchos Through the Day," and "Whip Up a Gift Belt."

"The Smut Peddler Is After Your Child," Woman's Home Companion, is far from pleasant reading, but it exposes another bold new turn in organized evil.

"Learn to Relax," Today's Health, stresses the fact that the ability to relax is more important today than ever before because of the high speed and high pressure of modern living. It also tells how one may learn to relax.

"The Rh Factor," Today's Health, is a simple, authoritative and reassuring statement of what it is and what it means to prospective parents.

Woman's Day is filled with ideas and directions for gifts to make and ways to utilize old articles. "Gifts to Make From Seven Countries" and "A Cinderella Story With Old Sweaters" are two good features.

"Growth Toward the World," National Parent-Teacher, must be read carefully and thoughtfully. It is a discussion of the biblical passage, "Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it."

FIRST CLASS ENDED

The first six week's class for the priesthood of the Center Stake of Zion was climaxed November 12 with a special worship service held at the Stone Church. The group of 375 priesthood members sang hymns, and worshiped as eight men representatives of the different priesthood quorums bore testimonies. The challenge was presented by Stake President Charles Graham, and the prayer of blessing by Glaude A. Smith.

STORY HOUR HELD

A song and story hour was held for the Skylarks of Independence, November 17, at the Kansas Street Chapel. Stories were told by Mrs. Eva Cook, Mrs. Verda Bryant, Mrs. Arline Cackler, and Miss Helen Propst. Mrs. Mildred Turner gave a reading, and Mrs. LaVon French directed the songs. Mrs. Thelma Kester directed a Thanksgiving skit. Featured on the program were Seventy Glen Johnson, his wife, and daughter. Brother Johnson told the girls of many experiences his family had while living with the Dutch people. Mrs. Johnson and Glenda Fern wore Dutch costumes and sang in the Dutch language. The program was under the direction of Lee Hart, Stake-wide youth director.

A daughter, Barbara Kae, was born September 28 in Springfield, Missouri, to Mr. and Mrs. William Bayless of Marionville, Missouri. Mrs. Bayless is the former Barbara Berridge. Mr. Bayless is coach at Marionville. Both are graduates of Graceland College.

DEATHS

SPERRY.—Nelson Charles, son of Roy M. and Margaret Farley Sperry, was born May 25, 1951, near Lancaster, California, and died November 2, 1951, at Greenwood, Missouri. He was blessed at the Reorganized Church in Lee's Summit, Missouri, on September 2 by Elders A. L. Loving and Darwin Bozarth. He is survived by his parents; two brothers: David and Lauren; a sister, Diana; and his paternal grandfather, Nelson Sperry. Interment was in Greenwood cemetery.

BROWN.—Miles, son of William Wesley and Elizabeth Brown, was born July 23, 1869, in Wayne County, Illinois, and died at Johnsonville, Illinois (date of death not given). On April 18, 1897, he was married to Lucy Pottorff; three daughters were born to them. He was a member of the Reorganized Church.

He is survived by his wife; two daughters: Mrs. Flossie Morris of Xenia, Illinois, and Mrs. Elizabeth Shelton of Dayton, Kentucky; seven grandchildren; and five great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Johnsonville Methodist Church, Elder Harry Henson officiating. Burial was in Johnsonville cemetery.

CONDIT.—James Silas, son of Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Condit, was born December 18, 1875, at Dunlap, Iowa, and died October 22, 1951, at his home in North Hollywood, California. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church at the age of ten. On August 28, 1901, he was married to Edna Rice; in 1923 they and their children moved to California where they made their permanent home. He was a charter member of the Burbank congregation, and for many years served as treasurer and bishop's solicitor. He was a devoted member of the priesthood and a faithful worker in the church. In August he and his wife celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary.

Besides his wife he leaves four daughters: Elma Green of Billings, Montana; Nellie Frey, Erna Bebee, and Lulu Peterson of California; a son, J. Curtis Condit, of California; two brothers: Leon Condit of Coolidge, Arizona, and Fred Condit of Lamoni, Iowa; a sister, Rena Jackson of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; and nine grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Utter-McKinley Chapel in North Hollywood, Elders Edward E. Spencer and Robert J. Wilms officiating. Interment was in Oakwood Cemetery.

jection of a better financial and social scheme. The greatest obligation of the church to the world is that it make the presence of God felt. Without that Presence, doctrine or financial and social improvements, or anything else, will fall flat. But with it, men will voluntarily rise and say: "Men and brethren, what must we do to be saved?" A living church is more than a fact of being. It is a condition of being.

GOD IS OUR LIGHT, our life, our breath, our bread, our living water. He is our utmost spiritual necessity. A living church, because it partakes of him, will be able to diffuse the substance of God to a needy world. "A little leaven," the Apostle Paul said, "leaveneth the whole lump." Even a little leaven. The unleavened lump of the world is a reflection against and a challenge toward all men who profess the name of Jesus Christ.

Yet the light of God shines out eternally and impartially. Innate and transcendent, God is both within us and beyond us. The flow of light surrounds us and engulfs us. We need but to lift up our eyes.

Jesus said, "And I, if I be lifted up . . . will draw all men unto me." His followers, too, if they are lifted up, will draw men to God. A living church, generating divine thought and feeling, can light the world. It cannot be kept obscure. "A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid."

* A TRACT IN BRAILLE

Sister Jennie Z. Elliott, a resident of the Catherine Hale Home for the blind in Kansas City, is known to church people for her writings in our publications. She wrote recently of her appreciation of the tract put into Braille by the Denver Red Cross for our people there:

"How thrilled I was when Brother Al Scherer came one afternoon with one of the tracts the Denver folks had Brailled. It is the one entitled, 'You Should Read the Book of Mormon.' It is beautifully done—a lovely piece of work. But he was not bringing the book just for me to see. He wants me to make an extra copy or two of it. I was a little hesitant because I am a better Braille reader than writer. If I do this job satisfactorily, I'll do as many more as they want me to."

Sister Elliott plans to do this work in spite of the fact that she has recently been through a discomfiting operation.

Putting tracts into Braille is a slow task requiring accuracy, patience, and devotion. But the knowledge that it is helping worthy blind people is a sufficient reward. It occurs to us that there are people—women especially—who have spare time that could be filled happily in such a service. It would be worth the task of learning Braille to participate in such a work. Information could be secured from the Red Cross in Denver, Colorado.

Imagine the situation of the blind. They sit there in the dark, even when the sun is shining, unable to find consolation in reading any ordinary books or magazines. Then someone brings a book in Braille. Sensitive finger tips race across the pattern of dots, translating a message out of them. The book has turned the light on for another blind person.

* THE RIGHT BEGINNING

If you are a little brighter than average, try this one. For thirty-five cents (it would have been a dime before the New Order of Everlasting Prosperity was imposed on us) you can buy at any world's greatest something-or-other store a small plastic puzzle with fifteen movable numbered doodads and sixteen spaces in which to mix them. You can play the game any way you wish, trying to arrange the doodads in any kind of numerical order.

We weren't quite so bright. All but the last two doodads behaved, and they refused to go in the right places. For days we struggled (during all odd spare moments) in vain. Then we made a momentous discovery. We had started in the wrong corner! Begun in the right corner, the puzzle was solved easily.

There is nothing more important than the beginning, if you are interested in the final result.

So it is with life. If you begin to solve your life's problem with money, you'll come out wrong. So it is with pleasure, or power, or sin, or drink, or fame. Look at the people who are trying them, and you will see.

The Authorized Version of the Bible says, "In the beginning God." That is a good beginning, the only right one. You know that if you begin with God and keep in his ways you have a good chance to come out in the right place at the end.

News and Notes

PRESIDENT IN MICHIGAN

President Israel A. Smith returned to Independence November 19 from northern Michigan where he attended the dedication of a church at Mikado. This district is presided over by John Blackstock of Prudenville. Brother Smith spoke at West Branch, Michigan, November 18. He attended a district conference at Coldwater, Michigan, December 1 and 2, of the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana Districts. Luther S. Troyer is the district president in this area.

IN OMAHA

President F. Henry Edwards, Apostle Reed M. Holmes, and Elder Carl Mesle were in Omaha, Nebraska, November 16 and 17 for a meeting with the leaders of the Northwest and Southwest Iowa and Northeast and Central Nebraska. The program was to help meet problems of the church school leaders, priesthood, and young people's leaders. On Sunday, November 18, Brother Edwards was in Omaha with Apostle D. T. Williams for the ordination of Brother Charles Neff to the office of high priest. Brother Williams delivered the ordination address and assisted Brother Edwards who performed the ordination.

VISIT COUNCIL BLUFFS

Following an institute in Omaha, November 16 and 17, Apostle Reed M. Holmes went to Council Bluffs for the Sunday service November 18. While in Council Bluffs, he visited the church school. Elder F. Carl Mesle accompanied Brother Holmes on his trip, and spoke to the young people from Omaha and Fremont during the church school hour. Brother Holmes spoke twice on Sunday morning at the church. In the afternoon the two men went with Charles Neff, Charles Putnam, and V. D. Ruch through the new uncompleted church building.

TOUR THE EAST

Apostle Maurice L. Draper and President W. Wallace Smith returned to Independence Friday, November 16, from an extended tour of the East. They attended an institute of district presidents, counselors, and bishop's agents at Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania. Then while Brother Smith visited several branches, Apostle Draper conducted a series in Jonesport, Maine. Both men also participated in a district conference at Stonington, Maine. Brother Smith spent several days in southern New England visiting the branches, after which they were together in the greater New York area discussing missionary and building plans with local officers. Both men attended the fifteenth anniversary banquet of the Washington, D. C., Branch, where Brother Smith remained for services on the week end, and Brother Draper traveled to Dayton, Ohio, for an Aaronic priesthood institute. Bishop Willard C. Becker of the Central Missouri Stake was also at the institute.

Brothers Smith and Draper went to Buffalo, New York, for the ordination service of Dr. P. L. Weegar to the office of evangelist. Brother Draper reports that the service was beautiful and dignified, and that several representatives of the local press were present at the service to report it to the papers in the area. Missionary S. W. Johnson conducted the service.

WORK IN TEXAS AREA

Apostle Percy Farrow and Bishop Joseph Baldwin were in the Central Texas District. They made contacts at Houston, Marlin, and

Raymond D. Zinser

RAY TEACHES sociology, religion, and camping at Graceland College and has been assisting in the psychology department. In addition, he is Director of Religious Activities on the campus this year.

His progenitors came from England about the time Nauvoo was breaking up and walked all the way from Council Bluffs to Utah. Many of his relatives are still with the Utah Mormon Church. His mother, a devoted member of the Reorganized Church, taught her children the doctrines of her religion, although for many years she was isolated from other members. His father is a Catholic. From this background, Ray has been motivated to active participation in the Zionics process.

When he was a young man, Ray's family moved to Kansas City, Missouri, where he graduated from Southeast High School in 1939. He worked for a year at the Commerce Trust Company in Kansas City and enrolled at Graceland College in the fall of 1940. He was president of the student body and active in campus life. During his sophomore year he was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church. After his graduation from Graceland in 1942 he joined the Navy Air Corps and served until January, 1946. He then enrolled at the University of Chicago, and in August, 1947, received his Master's degree with honors.

In September, 1947, he joined the Graceland faculty. During the summer of 1948 he taught in the Department of Sociology at Wayne University in Detroit, Michigan. In the summers of 1949 and 1951 he studied toward his doctorate at the University of Chicago.

On Easter Sunday, 1951, he was married to Celia Rae Stageman of Council Bluffs, Iowa. They have a beautiful home in Lamoni of contemporary architectural design.

In October, 1950, Ray was ordained an elder and is active in church work both on the campus and in Lamoni Stake. He is a member of the American Sociological Society and is in an organized reserve unit of the United States Navy.

More Power to You

ONE OF THE MARKS of progress during the last half century has been the increasing use of motorized equipment commonly called "labor saving machinery." Not only does it save the fatigue of human labor, it increases the products of labor and makes the worker more important.

Nowhere has this become more noticeable than in the home. Vast sums are being spent to lighten the load and shorten the time required for housekeeping duties, freeing the wife for social and industrial activities outside the home. Much is being written and spoken about the harmful effects on home life and the social consequences of this trend, but it has not slackened in the least. Mothers will leave small children in the care of nurseries and hired servants in order that they may maintain a standard of living which increases their dignity and gives ego satisfaction. Regardless of individual and social injuries to health and morals, this trend will not be stopped in the foreseeable future. Therefore, we must prepare to live with it.

Another factor which is fast changing our mode of domestic life is the forty-hour week in industry. This has become widespread by the simple device of compelling industry to pay time and a half for any labor performed within the seven-day period in excess of forty hours through the "Wage and Hour Law." Banks, retail stores, printers, miners, and manufacturers have given universal response; farmers and service organizations are adapting themselves gradually to the economic pressure of the law.

Having an extra day of leisure available to great masses of people is changing our economic and social life so fast and so radically that it is hard to assay its blessings and its liabilities. Just now we are certain of only one thing: a widespread change is upon us. This change in our lives has enormous potential. If, as Theophrastus declared, "Time is the most valuable thing a man can spend," then these workers have suddenly become rich. Experience has taught us that few men handle well riches which are suddenly acquired. As one recently reminded us, "A word to the sufficient is wise."

THE HUMAN MIND as well as nature hates a vacuum. This is illustrated by the adage, "An idle mind is the Devil's workshop." No mind is content with emptiness. Either keep it busy with constructive and wholesome thoughts or the negative and destructive are likely to find entrance and encouragement.

Soon after we get a raise in salary we find that it has been absorbed in our regular ways of living, and it seems just as hard to save as it was before the raise came. In a similar way we can squander the time made available to us through labor-saving machinery and the forty-hour week. We soon become involved in new projects and interests and feel just as rushed and busy as ever. This is not true of all people but is a trend which is frequently noticed.

Every age and every person must decide what shall be done with the wealth of time which inventions and economics have given. The history of Greece, Carthage, Rome, and many modern nations shows that the general pattern has been to use leisure for self-indulgence which ultimately leads to decay and subjugation. Will we Reorganized Latter Day Saints drift with the tide, or discipline ourselves? We are quite likely to drift; however, it is at this point that we can show we are different from the world. We can determine to rise up and prove worthy of our calling to be Saints. It is so easy to criticize, "Why don't they redeem Zion?" It is difficult to accept the challenge and realize that this is our opportunity. "It is yet day when all can work."

WHEN YOU CONVERSE with a friend about the gospel it makes you wish you could get others to listen. When you take part in a good prayer and testimony meeting, you may wish more had been present to hear your testimony. The spoken word seems so feeble and perishable even to the preacher. Job was trying to impress the same idea when his soul cried out, "Oh that my words were now written! oh that they were printed in a book! That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever." —Job 19: 23, 24.

True, only a few are capable of writing a book which has reader appeal. You may not be physically equipped nor temperamentally suited to the drudgery of writing a book, but that is not the worst thing which can happen to you nor the world. You creep or walk before you run.

Centuries ago Solomon wrote: "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." Orators have been rolling that sweet morsel over their lips ever since. Yet spoken words of wisdom and beauty are like the "wind that bloweth where it listeth . . . but thou canst not tell whence it cometh nor whither it goeth." The printed word, however, has vastly extended powers. When Job voiced the wish "that mine adversary had written a book," he was paying tribute to the power of the printed word.

Of course, there are many channels of extending our personality and influence besides the printing press. There is the platform, the radio, and correspondence. The personal letter is too limited, while the others may not be readily available. The editor of your community paper or of your church publications is always glad to hear from you, but only on the conditions that you have something to say that is worth while, and that you say it well. He does not merely want to fill his pages; he wants people to read what he prints. Reader appeal is the deciding factor.

Many Herald readers may not have heard of "deadlines." In trade parlance it is the hour at which the form must be locked up and put on the press in order that the publication will be ready for mailing on time. "Deadline phobia" is a disease peculiar to editors and is apt to be acute with those who depend almost entirely on volunteer writers.

A letter critical of a recent Herald article contained this sentence, "I know you have a hard job, and you have my sympathy." It is not that bad, in fact it has been an enjoyable service to the church we love. It's only when we see the small amount of material for future issues and begin to wonder if more will come in on time that we get "deadline phobia." Peter could walk on the water to meet the Master as long as he kept his faith and his eyes on Jesus. When he became troubled about the boisterous winds and waves he began to sink. The editors do not want sympathy, but contributions.

Money will not buy articles of spiritual value. They come from the overflow of the heart filled with love and the desire to serve. The best work will not be done while trying to please the masses, nor to win praise from friends. It comes when you feel deeply the need to help, to say something which needs to be said. Write sincerely, not because the editor is depending on you to meet a deadline, but because it is the way of growth and fulfillment for you. Write in the field of your greatest interest—church school story papers, Daily Bread, or Herald, but write, and more power to you. —C.B.H.

New "Herald" Cover

The Herald covers beginning with the issue of January 7 will carry a photograph. We are inviting our members who are interested in photography to send us gloss prints suitable for cover cuts. The picture should have general interest such as beautiful scenery or something of historic importance. Included in the latter we will be glad to use photographs of church buildings. A 4" x 6" gloss print is large enough, though a size smaller or larger is still acceptable if the photograph is sharp and the objects well defined.

"Listening Groups" for "Messiah" Broadcast

An opportunity for fellowship has been afforded those interested groups in branches where regular and attentive listening to the Messiah broadcast is an experience of the Christmas season. This gathering has often been the one fellowship meeting during the month.

From letters and newspaper articles received at headquarters it has been learned that branches from coast to coast use this performance as the center of gathering for one evening. From Everett, Washington, where the branch "awaited the yuletide broadcast of Handel's oratorio," to Texas, where Miss Sybil Wright of the Waco mission listened with "the girls" of her professional sorority; on to Springfield, Missouri, and the "open house" at the F. M. Bishop home; to the East, where listening is much later, from 11:30 p.m. until 1:00 a.m., the joy is the same when church people and their friends gather in homes and churches to listen to OUR CHRISTMAS GIFT TO THE NATION.

According to Brother A. Compier of Rosemarybstr, 44, Rotterdam, Holland, "Our people express the desire to be able to listen in to this program. . . . It would do them a lot of good, if they could hear our own church choir sing the Messiah."

Word is received at the Messiah publicity office that more CBS stations this year will carry the hour-and-a-half broadcast in all parts of the country. The facilities are available in every area. Listening groups are being planned for an evening of fellowship, cultural opportunities, and spirituality.

"MESSIAH" SOLOISTS ANNOUNCED FOR CBS BROADCAST

For the thirteenth Columbia network broadcast of Handel's "Messiah" the Independence Messiah Choir committee announces the soloists for the December twenty-third performance in the TV Playhouse of Radio Station KMBC in Kansas City, Missouri.

Singing the solo portions of the "Messiah" will be Virginia McClelland Ehwa, contralto, of Kansas City, Missouri; Josephine Crinklaw Mader, soprano, Kansas City, Kansas; Garland E. Tickemyer, tenor, Los Angeles, California; and Glenn Darwin, bass, New York City.

Franklyn S. Weddle is directing the 280 voice choir and the members of the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra. This year for the first time there will be a "live" audience of 2,600 people at the broadcast.

Conference Date

For the benefit of those who have not seen previous announcements or have forgot them, the editors again call attention to the fact that General Conference meets the earliest of any time on record, March 30 to April 6 inclusive. The present policy is to hold bi-annual Conferences at such a time as to include April 6, the organization date of the church; therefore this Conference could begin on that date or end on that date. According to the action of the 1950 Conference it was decided the Conference should end on April 6. We anticipate that this will be a large and important gathering.

New Presentation of a Tract

Elders Vernon E. Lundeen and C. Leslie Lynch of the Minneapolis Branch, 431 Queen Avenue, North, have made an effective presentation of a church tract, the "Official Statement of Belief, and Epitome of Faith and Doctrine" (Busy Man's Series—No. 1). They have addressed a message "To Our Friends and Neighbors of Forty Years," saying, "We present the Gospel of the Restoration." This message is printed on an 8½x11 inch sheet, tri-folded and slotted in the center to hold the small tract. The statement contains an invitation to read the tract, and a post card is enclosed for the addressee to request further information or literature from either of the elders, whose names and addresses are included.

Such a treatment, with signature, personalizes the tract and gives the message of the General Church a local appeal.

Church officers interested may write to Vernon Lundeen, 4337 West Broadway, Robbinsdale, Minnesota, or C. L. Lynch, 2416 North Byrd, Golden Valley, Minnesota, for a copy.

Australian Memorials

According to the October issue of The Standard just received, we notice that the "Rodger Training Institute" was held last spring with outstanding success. Students came from many parts of the continent. The same issue carries an announcement of the Charles Wandell College session of 1952 to be held next January 8 to 20.

Frequently we will hear of buildings and institutions which carry the name of some philanthropist or one who has donated lavishly to the needs of the institution. Neither Glauud Rodger nor Charles Wandell had money to give, but both gave richly from consecrated lives. These soldiers in the army of the Lord are being thus remembered by a grateful people in a way which should prove of lasting benefit to the church.

Mission to Spanish-speaking Peoples

We are happy to bring this report of Apostle Charles R. Hield to those interested in our mission to Spanish-speaking peoples. This is a General Church missionary project approved by the General Conference and carried forward under the leadership of Brother Hield.—THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

GOD COVENANTED with the Nephites that, should their descendants depart from the truths Christ and their leaders had taught them, in the latter days the gospel would again be taken to them by his Restored Church. Almost all of the Spanish-speaking peoples of the Americas have in their veins some of the blood of the Nephites and Lamanites. Our church members—leaders as well as membership—have felt the power of the Holy Spirit as they have now again embarked on the project of taking the message of the Christ to these people so rich in heritage. Several methods are being used, and every member of the church can assist in one or more of them:

1. Tracts are being prepared. The first one, José Smith Relata su Propia Historia, is just off the press and can be obtained from the Herald Publishing House. (The English version of this tract, "Joseph Smith Tells His Own Story," has been available for some time.) Four other tracts are in preparation and should be out within a year. The Book of Mormon translation progresses very slowly, because of the exacting nature of the task and the press of other duties, but it is hoped it will be finished in two more years.

2. Cottage meetings are being held by devoted members in many branches at the homes of Spanish-speaking friends. Interest has been manifest by a number, and baptisms have resulted. Most branches can find some good quality Latin Americans in their own city. One only has to look in the telephone directory to find a large list of Spanish names: Valles, Villa, Torres, Velazquez, Oliveres, Cárdenas, Diaz, Castro, Reyes, Perez, Ramos, Fernandez, Salazar, Calderon, et cetera. Many of them are professional people and live on almost any block; others prefer to have their homes near the Spanish-speaking business areas. The method of converting these people to the truths of the Restoration is about the same as that used with any other nonmember friend.

3. The law in Mexico requires the deed to all land and buildings used for religious purposes to be held by the federal government. All chapels, schools, hospitals, industrial, or agricultural projects sponsored by a church organization must be administered by native-born (not naturalized) citizens. For Mexico this is a good regulation, and churches which observe carefully the intent of the law have little difficulty. It does, however, place our church under the necessity of converting some citizens of this neighboring country and nourishing them spiritually until God calls some of their leaders to the priesthood.

4. We have hundreds of devoted and intelligent Reorganized Latter Day Saint college students at the various university centers in the United States and Canada. On each campus these students are forming organizations and making it their project for this school year to contact, make friends, and tell the gospel message to good Latin Americans. Our group at Ames did an outstanding missionary contact job last year, and many friends were won for the church. Some of these have returned to their homes in Mexico or other South American countries and have proven most friendly as contact is being maintained with them. We hope later to have several converts from this group.

5. We now have church members in Mexico, Argentina, Guatemala, Cuba, Brazil, and Colombia. There no doubt are others about whom we do not know. Priest George Young and his devoted wife Biloine (Whiting) have taken teaching positions in Guatemala and are winning new friends and continuing contact with some students who learned the truths of the Reorganized Church at our U. S. college centers. If other church members move south we would like to have their names and addresses. We hope they will be missionary-minded wherever they go.

6. We had expected to have three students from south of the border attending Graceland this fall, one from Equador and two from Mexico. Only one was able to come. The other two found the expense of transportation (most costly with devaluated money and the high rate of international exchange) so high that at the last minute, with great sorrow, they had to give up coming. (Continued on page 15)

THE CHURCH IS GROWING OUR NEEDS ARE GROWING

The Auditorium project is another strong assertion that the church is on the move. It challenges each member to give tangible expression of his desire to participate in the program of progress.

Unbelievable as it may seem, the annual conference of 1859 was held in the above pictured structure—a grain barn owned by Israel Rogers and located on his farm in Kendall County, Illinois. According to the history, Brother and Sister Rogers fed and housed the entire conference. Although this structure was lacking in attractiveness, apparently it was adequate to serve the needs of the church at that time. The Reorganization was in the formative stages, and the conference of 1859 was attended largely by members in the immediate area.

1865

The stone church in Plano, Illinois, was the scene of momentous decisions which were to have important bearing on the future of the Reorganization. The first conference held there was in 1865. Because of the vision of steady growth which was to stem from the activities of that and other conferences held in Plano, it was undoubtedly obvious even in those days that the little church would not long be adequate.

1882

The old Brick Church in Lamoni was the scene of the General Conference in 1882 and many others during ensuing years, all of which were of inestimable importance in church progress. While still a vivid memory in the minds of many members, it was not long able to fulfill the requirements for meetings of conference proportions.

1948

An assembly room capable of seating 7,000 persons seemed almost incredible to many members in 1920, when conference action started the building program which resulted in this degree of Auditorium completion. But our members then, as in 1859, 1865, 1882, and now, had vision of continued growth. This building, first considered to fulfill chiefly a Conference need, has expanded in purpose. Its function now includes such important services as housing of general offices, providing an institution characteristic of the industrious, progressive nature of our people, and establishing in the Center Place of the Gathering an edifice symbolic of the strength of purpose of our church.

1977

The expanded purpose of the Auditorium can be achieved, in large part, through the accomplishment of our present effort to raise $500,000. If this effort is successful, we can have reasonable expectation of having the Auditorium as here pictured. This important step in our progress depends entirely on the desire of our people to keep the law—tithing, offering, sacrifice. "Keep in step—keep the law."

Old Testament Salvation

By A. J. Corbett

THE REDEMPTION OF MAN has always been the concern of God, ever since father Adam and mother Eve were banished from Eden and his presence there. Since that time God has declared that his "work" and "glory" is to bring to pass our immortality and eternal life (Doctrine and Covenants 22: 23). His purpose is to reinstate us all if we are willing. It is universally agreed that the gospel of Christ is the written bylaws of that redemption. There was a period of time, however, when the gospel was not operating. The Mosaic Law had been substituted for it.

When the Israelites emerged from Egypt they were saturated with paganism and idolatry, and they probably knew more about Isis and Osiris, Ra the Sun God and the 101 other divinities of the Egyptians than they knew of Jehovah. The long forty years pilgrimage in the wilderness had decimated them and the scriptural record is:

Say unto them, As truly as I live, saith the Lord, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you; your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness, and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me. Doubtless ye shall not come into the land concerning which I swear to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun.—Numbers 14: 28-30.

Only two, with the younger generation, survived the long march. Moses himself did not enter. Joshua headed the long and arduous procession as it crossed the Jordan into Canaan.

God gave those of this newer generation of the Israelites his law which was to govern their lives in the new land. In Egypt they had no day of rest and worship, but God sought to change that condition in Canaan. He said:

Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath, to observe the sabbath throughout their generations for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever, for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested and was refreshed. And he gave unto Moses, when he had made an end of communing with him upon mount Sinai, two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God.—Exodus 31: 16-18.

God with his own finger wrote on these first two stones. When Moses came down from the mount he found that the waiting Israelites, doubting him and thinking he had deserted them, had set up the golden calf. "Make us gods which shall go before us," they said. It was a golden reproduction of the Sacred Bull Apis that annually paraded the streets of Memphis. The Egyptians believed it to be an incarnation of Osiris. It had a retinue of priests to tend it and its every attitude and movement was construed to be some manifestation from the god above. It is small wonder that Moses shattered the Jehovah-given directions. These people were still pagan and idolatrous.

THE SECOND TABLES OF STONE were then given. Moses manufactured them himself and wrote with his hand the Mosaic Law upon them. The Inspired Version reads:

And Moses hewed two tables of stone like unto the first; and he rose up early in the morning and went up unto mount Sinai, as the Lord had commanded him, and took in his hand the two tables of stone. . . . And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words, for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel.—Exodus 34: 4, 27.

The stones were like the ones that God had made, but the writings upon them were different:

Hew thee two other tables of stone, like unto the first, and I will write upon them also, the words of the law, according as they were written at the first on the tables that thou breakest, BUT IT SHALL NOT BE ACCORDING TO THE FIRST, for I will take away the priesthood out of their midst; therefore my holy order, and the ordinances thereof, shall not go before them; for my presence shall not go up in their midst, lest I destroy them. But I will give unto them the law as at first, but it shall be after the law of a carnal commandment.—Exodus 34: 1, 2.

Although God said, "I will write upon them also," he only quoted the law to Moses who did the writing. "And he [Moses] was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights, he did neither eat bread nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments."—Exodus 34: 28. In another place God said, "I have written to him [Ephraim] the great things of my law," but it was the prophet who did the writing.

The writings upon the second stones were ministered to the people by the Levitical priesthood. With the passing of Moses God removed from their midst, as he said, the holy order of his priesthood and the ordinances thereof. The priesthood of Levi was the lesser order. It operated the lesser or Mosaic Law. Perfection could not come by the Levitical order.

"If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood (for under it the people received the law) what further need was there that another priest should arise after the order of Melchisedec and not be called after the order of Aaron?"—Hebrews 7: 11. It is only "the law of the Lord that is perfect, converting the soul." The Law of Moses was imperfect, and the imperfect priesthood could operate it, but when the gospel was restored by John and Jesus, the latter came forth as a priest after the order of Melchisedec. The law and the prophets were until John after which the gospel was again preached. James called the gospel "the perfect law of liberty." The Mosaic Law is called the covenant or law of bondage (see Galatians 4: 3, 9).

THE QUESTION IS: "Could anyone be saved by the lesser law?" God removed the first writing for he must have agreed with the shattering of those stones or he never would have substituted the lesser law instead of them. Would God give them something that was to govern their spiritual and moral lives and attach no eternal reward to it, or those who observed the Mosaic code? Paul said of the law: "Wherefore I found the law to be holy, and the commandment to be holy, and just, and good."—Romans 7: 12. God gave the Law of Moses, and he never at anytime gave an evil gift to mankind. Hear what Jesus said of the law and its consequence:

Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, heaven and earth must pass away, but one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, until all be fulfilled. Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so to do, he shall in no wise be saved in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach these commandments of the law until it be fulfilled, the same shall be called great, and shall be saved in the kingdom of heaven.—Matthew 5: 19-21.

Herein Jesus teaches that a faithful observance of every "jot" and "tittle" of the law while it was in operation could earn greatness for the observer.

Much light is reflected upon this lesser ministry by reading Doctrine and Covenants:

Now, this Moses plainly taught to the children of Israel in the wilderness, and sought diligently to sanctify his people that they might behold the face of God; but they hardened their hearts, and could not endure his presence, therefore, the Lord in his wrath (for his anger was kindled against them), swore that they should not enter into his rest, while in the wilderness, which rest is the fullness of his glory. Therefore he took Moses out of their midst and the holy priesthood also; and the lesser priesthood continued, which priesthood holdeth the key of the ministering of angels, and the preparatory gospel, which gospel is the gospel of repentance and of baptism, and the remission of sins, and the law of carnal commandments.—Section 83: 4.

The statement is that this priesthood of Aaron ministered repentance, baptism, the remission of sins, and the law of carnal commandments. This ministry faithfully performed and faithfully observed would bring salvation to Israel during the long years between Moses and the Messiah. In the Book of Mormon record these two "laws" ran together. The strict observance of the Law of Moses and the beginning principles of the gospel were taught.

And it came to pass that Nephi went forth among the people, and also many others, baptizing unto repentance, in the which there was a great remission of sins. And thus the people began again to have peace in the land; and there were no contentions, save it were a few that began to preach, endeavoring to prove by the scriptures, that it was no more expedient to observe the law of Moses. Now in this thing they did err, having not understood the scriptures. But it came to pass that they soon became converted, and convinced of the error which they were in, for it was made known unto them that the law was not yet fulfilled, and that it must be fulfilled in every whit.—III Nephi 1: 27-30.

IT IS LOGICAL that a ministry including the basic principles of the gospel and the observance of the entire Law of Moses would make salvation possible. Jesus said in the last quotation that salvation in the kingdom of heaven would result from observance of this ministry. Even when the law was fulfilled with the coming of John the Baptist, the only part detached from that complete "lesser law" was the Mosaic section of it. The Nephites had long since been observing the combined portions of Moses and John the Baptist. They were the prerogatives of the lesser priesthood. Jesus expressed surprise to Nicodemus who, when told of birth of water and the Spirit, said, "How can these things be?" Jesus said to him: "Art thou a ruler in Israel and knowest not these things?" He should have known them for they were an integral part of the fundamentals of the ministry of the Levitical priesthood which had ministered in Jewry for centuries. That these two teachings were inseparably connected is in evidence when the Nephites thought to discard Moses after their repentance and baptism, but when they "studied the Scriptures" they found they were in error. The salvation of the Old Testament was based upon Moses and Jesus also when viewed from the Doctrine and Covenants statement, the lesser priesthood had the "keys of the preparatory gospel, which gospel included repentance, remission, baptism and the law of carnal commandments." Even if these Old Testament people refrained from blaspheming, killing, stealing, coveting, adultery, and all other immoral things forbidden by the law, yet their "imperfection" would still exist and the "preparatory" portion of the ministry would still be needed to give them their "cleansing."

God the law-giver supplies no inoperative laws. Jesus declares that greatness can be obtained by a full observance of that which has been given, but where and when more light is given, greater deeds and results are expected. He could look with love upon a young man who declared he had kept "all the law from his youth up," but how would he regard that same man when he went away sorrowing because the greater light had been turned on him. John saw the "small" and the "great" stand before God at last and their "size" was determined by what they had done by the things written in the "books." The ancient Israelites had their "books," and their redemption will be measured thereby.

Our Need of Each Other

By Ruby Strand

WHEN WE TAKE UPON OURSELVES the name of Saints we are making a great assumption. We are going to need each other to give meaning to this title. Naturally we expect to form our most intimate and helpful associations among those who have like interests and ideals, but at the same time we need to maintain friendly and cordial relations with those with whom we have association outside the "household of faith." It is important, however, to make very sure that we do not lower our standards in these associations.

If we find that we cannot realize good results from these contacts it would be better for us to break off relationships. But since this is not always possible—nor would it be wise if we are to be a witnessing people—we must build up our spiritual strength to the extent that we can hold high our banner of righteousness and invite others to join in the march Zionward. We need the fortitude derived from each other as well as from God to do this.

A YOUNG WOMAN whose church had always taken first place in her life was employed with other young people whose ideals were not on a par with hers. They chided her for her priggishness when she refused to join them in their worldliness. It was difficult for her, so when one of the group defended her and appeared friendly she responded gratefully, and they became close friends. She invited this new friend to attend church with her. Although the friend's background made it hard for her to understand all that she experienced, she did appear interested. And then Satan threw his dart. "I have gone to church with you," she said. "Now you share in some of the things I find entertaining." Not wanting to hurt her friend's feelings, the young woman agreed. Gradually she began to participate in the worldly things which occupied her friend's spare time. As she did, her zeal for God's work decreased. She excused herself from this responsibility and that. At first her conscience bothered her as she absented herself from church and the other influences which would keep her spiritually fit. She was criticized by some who should have given her saintly counsel. Soon her conscience did not trouble her.

It is a strange thing about conscience. While it may trouble us at first when we go counter to its commands, it troubles us less and less if neglected, and its earlier warnings in time cease to have effect. It becomes hardened and is not disturbed when it is abused. A conscience must be trained to the Christ standard of living and constantly nurtured along these lines in order to be trusted.

In time, this young woman's face took on a hard look. The sweetness and freshness of youth were gone. Her chances for happiness were slight unless she recharted her course and went back to the teachings of her church. In time she became so ensnared that she did not even see the folly of her ways.

Now it happened that an older person—one who loved her very dearly and had often prayed for her—asked God how she might assist Him in helping this young woman to find her way back. A plan was revealed to her in answer to her earnest petitions and fasting. The change did not come all at once but the story does have a happy ending, for both these girls in time became actively engaged in the work of the Master. The friend was baptized and is now helping others to find the better way of life. This all took place because someone cared enough.

ANOTHER ILLUSTRATION MAY BE found in the experience of a young mother who came in contact with the Restoration Movement through a neighbor. Eventually her interests changed, and her entire perspective became motivated by this new force which had taken hold of her life. Her husband—a good man but not in harmony with this new line of thinking—was antagonistic at first. He made it very difficult for her, but without much talking or arguing, and with a great deal of Christlike living and sincere praying, she was able to help him catch the warmth of God's Spirit too. The happiest day of their lives came when they and their little son were baptized into the church of Jesus Christ, and they became a part of the kingdom-building adventure.

A Saint is a holy, godly, sanctified person; one who has the interests of others at heart; one who is reaching out in love and compassion. Many of us are shocked to think of what might have been our status had not others felt this desire to help us. We all have our weaknesses. In other ways we are strong. By living and learning together we see these tendencies in each other, and in charity we grow into the stature of sainthood. We can never do this alone. We can never realize Zion without this awareness that we are our brother's keeper and putting into practice the words of Jesus: "A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." —John 13: 34.

A Career in Church Education

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF

J. A. Gunsolley

PART II

Shelby County

Again our growing family came to need more room, so father made a trip to Shelby County which was the next county east of Harrison. Upon his return he reported conditions favorable for making another move. Accordingly everything was put aboard farm wagons, and we traveled the fifty miles to our new home. It consisted of a four-room cottage hastily constructed, and a small wooden building in which the former occupant had lived. Two more rooms were added later.

This farm had 160 acres and was part of a tract the title to which was in dispute between the railroad company and the state over a grant of land to the railroad in consideration of its building a line through the county. The land finally cost us nine dollars an acre. Notwithstanding the low price, it was not so easy as one might think to pay for it because of the extremely low price of farm products. Father contracted to sell two hundred bushels of shelled corn to be delivered at Dow City, twelve miles distant, for thirteen cents a bushel. We boys shelled the corn with a hand sheller, and it was hauled by team and farm wagon. Another time fat hogs were hauled to Harlan, a distance of ten miles, and sold for one dollar and eighty cents per hundred-weight. Butter sold for eight to ten cents a pound, and eggs for five or six cents a dozen. Wheat, other grain, and vegetables were correspondingly low in price. On the other hand clothing and household necessities were correspondingly inexpensive. Calico and prints could be bought for five or six cents a yard. I think my first suit of store clothes cost five to seven dollars, and a pair of boots cost about a dollar and a half.

Sunday School Secretary

When I was thirteen or fourteen a union Sunday school was organized in our schoolhouse, and I was chosen secretary. I knew nothing about what a Sunday school secretary was supposed to do, but the superintendent was a kind man, and he instructed me in what I was to do. For a record book I was furnished a small book advertising Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, that had an advertisement on one page and the next page was blank for memoranda; I kept record on the blank pages. This was my first active participation in religious service.

The schoolhouse was a real community center. It was used as a place for church services, for elections, for debating societies, spelling school, music classes, and other purposes calling for community gatherings. I remember with gratitude the names of some of the teachers who not only did good work in teaching us the rudiments of secular education, but also did what they could to point us to the way of honorable citizenship and Christian character. It was one of those teachers who first suggested to me the idea of becoming a schoolteacher. I remember my response to her suggestion, which was that we had too many teachers who were not sufficiently qualified for their work.

But her suggestion that I become a teacher was not forgotten, and it grew in my mind until becoming a country school teacher was the height of my ambition.

Important Decision

As soon as a school building could be erected in town the little country schoolhouse was abandoned and a graded school established. This provided a more extended course of study including the ninth grade and part of the tenth.

It was while attending school there that I made one of the vital decisions of my life. It turned my course from what would likely have been waste so far as rendering service to my fellow-man is concerned into channels where I could do more for humanity. Jim and Frank spent the winter visiting among kinsfolk in Illinois and came back with such glowing reports of the wonderful times they had getting acquainted with the relatives and attending parties that Jerome and I decided we would go to Illinois the following winter instead of going to school. We boys all worked on the farm in summer and went to school only in winter.

We had the time for our departure set on Monday, but I thought I would visit our school on the Friday preceding. I had great regard for the teacher—a man much interested in the boys in his school. I desired to tell him, as well as others, farewell, for it was quite likely to be the end of my school days. During our conversation he asked, "Jerry, what are you going to do this winter?"

"O, Jerome and I are going visiting."
"Going visiting? What do you mean?"

"We have a lot of relatives in Illinois we've never seen," I told him, "and we are going to spend the winter visiting them."

"Now look here," he said, "why don't you go to school this winter? If you would go to school this winter and next spring and then attend the county teachers' institute next summer you could pass an examination for a teacher's certificate. Then next winter you could teach school. Don't waste your time visiting."

What he said struck home, for I still had a lingering ambition to be a country school teacher. As I turned to leave he said, "Better think it over." I did think it over, and I was not long in making a decision. I'll always continue to believe that decision the turning point that decided my life's work. "Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide," wrote someone.

I went home and told Jerome that I was not going to Illinois. Much surprised he asked, "What's the matter?"

"I've decided to go to school this winter," I said.

He did not like the idea of giving up the visit, but I had made up my mind, so we unpacked our suitcases and reconciled ourselves to the idea of staying at home.

I attended the winter and spring terms—about six months—and studied very hard. I was not required to work on the farm that spring but allowed to attend school and practically completed the ninth grade.

Teachers' Institute

The teachers' institute was an important event in my life. I was a bashful farm boy lacking in confidence when it came to associating with the kind of people assembled upon such an occasion, many of whom were women teachers. What I would know would be small in comparison. I soon learned, however, that there was no cause for my being embarrassed when I was asked for reports on the various subjects making up our courses of study. I seemed to make a favorable impression upon my instructors, and I also gained confidence in myself. I received a second grade teacher's certificate and at once applied for a school.

Introduction to Latter Day Saintism

Soon after moving to the farm at Defiance we became acquainted with a family by the name of Snyder who lived about six miles from our home. They were members of the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church and were interested in telling their friends of their religion. We children were quite regular attendants at the Protestant churches in Defiance. We were not particularly partial to any one church but attended the Methodist perhaps more than the others because more of our friends were there. We knew the Latter Day Saint Church by the name of "Mormon Church," and my impressions of Mormonism were that Joseph Smith was an impostor and the instigator of polygamy.

The Snyders invited us to go to church with them at Galland's Grove, six miles west from our home. They lived about six miles east, so it was twelve miles from their home to the church, and our house was a convenient stopping place when they were going to and from church.

It was at the Galland's Grove church that I heard my first sermon by a Reorganized Latter Day Saint, Elder Davis H. Bayes. He later held some services at the little schoolhouse in Defiance.

An interesting incident occurred at one of the meetings. An old gentleman who had been a minister in a popular church challenged Elder Bayes to perform a miracle. Elder Bayes said to him, "If you could see a miracle, would you believe?" The old gentleman said, "Yes, if you'll perform a miracle, I'll believe." Elder Bayes replied, "I know of two instances where demand was made for a miracle as a basis for belief; one was the Devil upon the mountain; the other is that old gentleman back there in the corner." Needless to say most of those present thought Elder Bayes was pretty hard on the old gentleman; but I thought he deserved it.

Growing Interest

My brother Jake worked as a farm hand for David Gamet during the time we lived at Defiance and married Sadie, one of the Gamet daughters. Another of the daughters, Pem, married a man named George S. Hyde. This man and Jake were close friends. George was converted, baptized, and ordained an elder. His wife also joined the church. They were much interested in Jake's learning of the gospel, and, of course did what they could, as did Sadie, to convert him. He was baptized and soon after ordained. Through Jake's efforts arrangements were made for Elder Hyde to preach a series of sermons at Defiance in the little schoolhouse. One evening during the series Elder Hyde was preaching on the Book of Mormon and presenting evidences of its divinity; among other things he spoke of the testimony of the witnesses that is printed in every edition of the book. It happened that he did not have his copy of the book with him and was using a copy belonging to our family. In this edition the testimony of the witnesses was at the back of the book instead of being in the front as in other editions. When he turned to the front of the book to read it and could not find it, he was most embarrassed. Seeing his discomfort I was prompted to call out, "You'll find it in the back of the book." It came upon me with such an impulse I could not seem to restrain myself. He was greatly relieved. I had been reading the book and remembered the testimony was in the back but only the prompting that I received could have given me the courage to thus call out from my position in the audience, giving the assistance he needed.

Testimony of the Book of Mormon

Here I will give my experience in receiving evidence of the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. Uncle Rufus was an elder in the church but inactive because of domestic conditions. He left his Book of Mormon at our house. Being eager for something to read, I casually picked up the book and began reading it. It was an old, well-worn volume from which the title had become almost entirely obliterated. I had not the slightest idea of the character of it nor of the claims made for it. But it was something to read. I had not read many pages until I began to be interested, and soon I was more interested in it than I had ever been in any novel. The more I read the greater became my interest, and the conviction that divinity was connected with it took hold of me and increased as I continued to read. On rainy days when we could not work in the field I would take the book to the barn and lie upon the hay in the hayloft and read it. At times the Holy Spirit bore testimony of the truthfulness of it until I would be moved so I could not read through my tears. Especially was this true when I read of Christ's visit to this continent and of his establishing his church here. I was convinced that truly, "God is no respecter of persons, but that in every nation he that worketh righteousness is accepted of him." I understood that the inhabitants of this continent were objects of his care as well as those on the eastern continent. My heart was filled with gratitude, for I could easily love a God who ministered to Jews, Nephites, and the whole world. Many times the Spirit of God has borne testimony of the divine authenticity of the book, not only as I read it when a youth but down through the more than fifty years of my ministry. I heartily recommend that everyone who will read it—sincerely, honestly, humbly seeking God for the testimony—will receive it to his entire satisfaction.

Family Baptisms

Brother Jake, realizing he had found such a good thing in the restored gospel, desired that his parents and brothers and sisters might share with him in the joy he experienced in becoming a member of the body of Christ. He was zealous and lost no opportunity to do what he could to have the gospel brought to our attention by making church literature available to us and arranging for preaching from time to time in our locality. Father and mother were next to follow his example and were baptized by Elder George S. Hyde. Not long after that my two sisters, Jerusha and Alice, and a cousin, Hattie, daughter of Uncle Rufus were baptized.

The gospel and the church came to be a common topic of conversation among us, even when at work in the field, and in the course of only a few years every one of our family old enough for membership was baptized.

A Youthful Fallacy

It so happened that I was more closely associated with Frank than with any of my other brothers. He and I talked about the church and our duties and desires concerning it. I remember that in one of our conversations the thought was advanced that we should unite with the church sometime, but not until we were older—that we should have a good time while we were young, and when we became too old to enjoy ourselves we should then join the church. The idea seemed to be that the church was for women and old men, not for children and youth. Apparently this fallacy is entertained still by many young people, and they are kept out of the church, not being aware that real joy, genuine satisfaction, and lasting happiness come in the largest measure from the presence of the Holy Spirit in the soul of those who serve God. Fortunately the preposterous idea did not long prevail with us, and we accepted the gospel in our youth.

Question:

Doesn't the blood of Jesus Christ cleanse me from all sin?

Missouri

E.E.J.

Answer:

Yes! But perhaps not in the manner which some think. The work of Christ in saving men from their sins is a process rather than a momentary change, for his cleansing can proceed only so fast and as far as the voluntary efforts of the individual will allow. Like other phases of gospel development, sanctification comes by man's repentance and obedience on the one hand, and the Lord's intervening work through the Spirit, extending forgiveness, grace, and cleansing on the other, both working in correlation throughout life. Christ himself overcame by a life-long struggle, the climax being reached only at the end. He said to John, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne."—Revelation 3: 21. Of his people he also said, "That by keeping the commandments they might be washed and cleansed from all their sins, and receive the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands, . . . and who overcome by faith, and are sealed by that Holy Spirit of promise."—Doctrine and Covenants 76: 5. It is a co-operative work.

CHARLES FRY

Question:

1. Is Israel A. Smith a seer and revelator as well as a prophet?

2. What determines a seer in the terms of the gospel of Jesus Christ?

3. Does one have to use the Urim and Thummim to be called a seer?

Missouri

H.J.S.

Answer:

These three questions are all related and therefore may be answered together. The term "seer" in its broad usage is not limited to one who may have in his possession mechanical interpreters or the Urim and Thummim. The dictionary gives three definitions:

1. One who sees.
2. One who foresees events.
3. One gifted with second sight—a crystal-gazer.

We would not suggest that the gift to use the Urim and Thummim is in the same category as a "crystal-gazer," but it comes within the scope of the dictionary meaning of the term. The term may be used in any of these above mentioned categories.

OLD TESTAMENT SEERS

The term "seer" was in early Israel applied to prophets who could foretell the future. In I Samuel 9: 9, Samuel is called a "seer." In II Chronicles 16: 7-10 Hanani is called a "seer." It may be argued that these may have possessed the interpreters or Urim and Thummim. However, Amos (7: 12), who was not of the priestly class, and who we are sure did not possess the Urim and Thummim, was called a "seer." In Micah 3: 7 we find the word used in the plural, "Then shall the seers be ashamed." These references answer number two of the questions.

LATTER DAY REVELATION

Doctrine and Covenants 104: 42 states:

And again, the duty of the president of the high priesthood is to preside over the whole church, and to be like unto Moses, Behold, here is wisdom, yea, to be a seer, a revelator, a translator, and a prophet; having all the gifts of God which he bestows upon the head of the church.

Note, this paragraph of Section 104 is set in a group of instructions regarding the duties of various offices in the church. It does not deal with officers (personalities) but offices as positions of responsibility and the prerogatives and duties involved.

In section 107: 29 of Doctrine and Covenants Hyrum is appointed as a "prophet and a seer, and a revelator" to the church. The Urim and Thummim was not in the possession of Hyrum Smith, nor available to him at any time. He did not translate through the Urim and Thummim. This answers number three of the questions.

ISRAEL A. SMITH AS SEER AND REVELATOR

Question one may be answered by referring to the ordination prayer spoken by the president of the Council of Twelve, Apostle Paul M. Hanson, at the ordination of Israel A. Smith as president of the High Priesthood of the church from which we quote:

Brother Israel, as servants of Jesus Christ, we lay our hands upon your head and ordain you to the office of president of the high priesthood and the church of Jesus Christ. . . .

. . . Heavenly Father, may the gifts from heaven, belonging to the office of president of the high priesthood be our brother's, thy servant's, richly to enjoy, even that he may as a prophet and seer and translator perform his work in presiding over the whole church.

. . . Brother Israel, in the moving of the providential hand of God in your life, may there come to you all needed physical strength. We ordain and set you apart to the office that has been designated, through Jesus Christ, our Lord, Amen.

JOHN BLACKMORE

Question:

Why do you differ from all other churches in claiming that angels have participated in the founding of your church and that their ministrations continue?

Michigan

J.R.G.

Answer:

From the beginning of the world angels have participated in every work of God. They began at the gates of Eden and continued to minister to the patriarchs and prophets. They attended the birth of Christ and were at his tomb and place of ascension. The last inspired apostle to write—John the Revelator—tells of their ministrations to him. Take out of the Bible all that was given mankind by the mouth of angels and the world would be impoverished. Jesus, Paul, and John taught of angels coming in the last days in connection with the great culminating works of the last dispensation spoken of by the prophets, and whoever teaches that angels no more minister to men contradicts Christ and the Scriptures.

Angels performed a very active part in the founding of this church and in revealing divine truth. Angels came to men bringing the long lost priesthood and authority to enable them to minister for Christ. To deny the coming of angels would be for us to deny Christ and the messengers he sent with their message. It is Christ's way.

Am I My Brother's Keeper?

By Hubert Case

AM I MY BROTHER'S KEEPER?" That was the question asked by one who broke a covenant commandment of the Lord.

We of the latter days have received a covenant commandment: "Keep my commandments and seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion."—Doctrine and Covenants 6: 3.

Also:

Nevertheless, my work shall go forth . . . even so shall the knowledge of a Savior come unto my people . . . the Nephites, and the Jacobites, and the Josephites, and the Zoramites, through the testimony of their fathers and this testimony shall come to the knowledge of the Lamanites, and the Lemuelites, and the Ishmaelites . . . and for this very purpose are these plates preserved which contain these records, that the promises of the Lord might be fulfilled . . . and that the Lamanites might come to the knowledge of their fathers, . . . that through their repentance they might be saved.—Doctrine and Covenants 2: 6.

In the Book of Mormon we find:

When I heard these words I began to feel a desire for the welfare of my brethren, the Nephites, wherefore I did pour out my whole soul unto God for them. . . . The voice of the Lord came into my mind again saying, I will visit thy brethren, according to their diligence in keeping my commandments. I have given unto them this land; and it is a holy land; and I curse it not, save it be for the cause of iniquity; . . . and I prayed unto him with many long strugglings for my brethren, the Lamanites . . . and I did cry unto God that he would preserve the records; And he covenanted with me that he would bring them forth unto the Lamanites, in his own due time.—Enos 1: 12-26.

Enos felt the challenge of being his brother's keeper, and cried mightily to God. He had faith and made it manifest in works of prayer.

The covenanted time of the Lord has been fulfilled in that the records have come forth having been preserved, and in our dispensation of time. We are the instruments in God's hands to complete the covenant by our works. In the Book of Mormon we are told:

Then shall this covenant . . . be fulfilled . . . and then shall Jerusalem be inhabited again with my people, and it shall be the land of their inheritance . . . that I shall gather in from their long dispersion, my people, O house of Israel, and shall establish again among them my Zion. . . . Behold this is the thing I shall give unto you for a sign . . . and by the power of the Holy Ghost, which shall be given unto you of the Father, shall be made known unto the Gentiles, That they may know concerning this people who are a remnant of the house of Jacob, and concerning this my people who shall be scattered by them; . . . that these things might come forth from them unto a remnant of your seed, that the covenant of the Father may be fulfilled which he hath covenanted with his people, O house of Israel. . . . And when these things come to pass, that thy seed shall begin to know these things. . . . And my people who are a remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles . . . wo be unto the Gentiles, except they repent.—III Nephi 9: 85-101

In III Nephi, chapter 10, we read:

But if they will repent . . . I will establish my church among them, and they shall come in unto the covenant, and be numbered among this the remnant of Jacob, unto whom I have given this land for their inheritance; and they shall assist my people, the remnant of Jacob; And also as many of the house of Israel as shall come, that they may build a city, which shall be called the New Jerusalem; . . . And I also will be in the midst, and then shall the work of the Father commence, at that day even when this gospel shall be preached among the remnant of this people.—Verses 1-4.

OUR LAST TWO CONFERENCE resolutions pertaining to the work going forth among the Indians and Jews would signify that day is now. Are we holding back this most vital work? It is plain all through the Book of Mormon that we, together with our Indian brethren—the remnant of the house of Jacob, shall build the New Jerusalem, our place of inheritance. In a letter written to W. W. Phelps in November of 1832

TAPU AND FARANETA

Since returning from Tahiti general officers have been successful in helping plan what now appears to be a satisfactory journey for a Tahitian brother, Tapu Viriura Pahoia, to Hawaii for a much needed operation.

While in Honolulu, Tapu was taken by Elder A. Orlin Crownover to meet Brother Frank B. Almond, a former missionary to Tahiti. It will be of interest to Independence readers to learn that a Doctor Strode, formerly of Independence, now the superintendent of a clinic bearing his name, was the surgeon who performed the operation.

From the Honolulu Star-Bulletin we glean the following story about Tapu and "Faraneta."

ISRAEL A. SMITH

Tahitian Here for Operation Finds Friend at "Star-Bulletin"

A man who left Tahiti thirty years ago with a fluent knowledge of its language has found he hasn't lost much of his ability to speak it.

He got the opportunity to use it on two occasions in the past several months. Frank B. Almond, Star-Bulletin linotype operator, got a pleasant surprise last week when the Reverend A. Orlin Crownover of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints brought a Tahitian to see him.

In talking to Tapu Viriura Pahoia, who flew here to undergo a goiter operation, Mr. Almond found that he had known Tapu as a lad of eleven in Tahiti thirty years ago.

Tapu speaks no English, and few here speak Tahitian. So the Reverend Mr. Crownover, knowing Mr. Almond's linguistic ability, brought the man to the Star-Bulletin to seek Mr. Almond's help.

Serves As Interpreter

Since that day, Mr. Almond has served as interpreter for him, as he did last June for another Tahitian, Tautu Moo a Samuela, who does not speak English.

Mr. Almond visited Tapu daily at the hospital after the operation, and is visiting him during his convalescence.

The Tahitian is very happy to have someone to converse with in his native tongue and is especially grateful to him for straightening out the "tough" food situation he had to go through at the hospital.

One day while visiting with the patient, Mr. Almond said the nurse came in and asked: "What's the matter with the food? Why don't you eat it?"

Language Barrier

She talked to him several minutes without a word of reply until Mr. Almond explained the patient did not understand what she was saying.

So with Mr. Almond interpreting, the nurse found out the food was too hard for Tapu's teeth. "Anything soft would be fine," he said.

"Would you care for some poi?" the nurse asked him.

His reply was a firm "no." He wouldn't eat Hawaiian poi; he couldn't stand it.

Of course, if the hospital had some Tahitian poi—there's nothing like Tahitian poi, he continued.

(Hawaiian poi is made from taro, while Tahitian poi has a banana base.)

Tapu didn't get his poi, but was very satisfied with the soft food he finally received, Mr. Almond reports.

Tapu, well known in Tahiti, was chauffeur to the former governor, Chasteni de Cherie.

He will return to Tahiti next month.

And probably the story of the friendship that Faraneta (the name Mr. Almond is known by in Tahiti) has shown Tahitians in Hawaii will spread far and wide on the island.

Observe Sixtieth Wedding Anniversary

Elder and Mrs. J. W. McKnight were honored guests at the church in Galien, Michigan, on September 9, at the observance of their sixtieth wedding anniversary. They were married September 5, 1891, at Oscado, Michigan. Elder McKnight, born March 18, 1867, was ordained in 1900 and, except for five years in Wisconsin, Florida, and Alabama, has served the church in Michigan throughout the years of his ministry. Mrs. McKnight, the former Agness McConnell, was born in Canada on July 15, 1867. For the past forty-two years they have made their home in Galien.

About two hundred guests, some from out of the state, were present for the celebration. Hostesses for the occasion were the women of Northern Indiana District.

Lawrence (Kansas) Pastor Acknowledges a Favor

Many Herald readers will be interested in the exchange of letters printed below. All pastors try to express thanks for courtesies, but sometimes when burdened with the cares of carrying on pastoral duties while working for a living, they forget to voice their gratitude.—Editor.

Chancellor Deane W. Malott
Lilac Lane
Lawrence, Kansas

Dear Chancellor Malott,

On behalf of the members of my congregation I wish to express appreciation for the contribution you and members of your family have made to our community during the years you have been in our midst. One phase of man's immortality is the imprint he makes on the lives of those around him, for this influence lives and expands in an ever-widening circle even after he has gone elsewhere. We are aware that your influence has been constructive and helpful and will continue to make you one of us in spirit after you have gone from Lawrence.

Also, I am deeply grateful to you for permitting my church group to worship in Danforth Chapel during the two years our building was used as a dormitory by the University of Kansas. Danforth Chapel, with its dignity and simplicity, was an inspirational setting for our worship as we know it must be for many who come to "The Hill."

As you go to your new assignment, may you continue to lead with wisdom and love the young people of our nation who are striving to understand the problems of our day and work out solutions which are in line with the purposes of our Divine Creator.

Most sincerely yours,
G. R. Norris

My dear Mr. Norris:

I cannot tell you how much I appreciate your nice letter to me. I certainly have never had a nicer one and I appreciate the sentiments which prompted it. We have been very happy at the University of Kansas to be of service to your church and to your people whom I have come to know as being of particularly strong character and strong citizens.

If I can ever be of any help to you in any way or at any time, please do let me know.

We need a fund to assist these students from abroad with transportation, tuition, and other expenses. Graceland itself has helped with a tuition scholarship from its International Scholarship Fund. Some money for this purpose has been sent in by a few devoted Saints, but much more is needed. A youth organization in California has volunteered to "sponsor" a student and assist with expenses. Winter clothing is a big item for students from tropical countries. This type of sponsorship could be done by individuals or groups such as Zion's Leagues, men's clubs, a branch, women's organizations, or young married couples' clubs, etc. Another year we hope to have from six to ten Spanish-speaking students at Graceland; some from abroad, and some from Spanish families in the United States or Canada.

7. Elder Wayne Simmons will conduct missionary meetings on this project in the Rio Grande Valley this fall, and in southern California the first part of 1952. He has been working with Spanish families in Kansas City and Independence, Missouri; Lawrence and Topeka, Kansas; and St. Joseph, Missouri. Quite a number of priesthood members and their wives are interested and helping with this missionary effort. We need more. The call is for any and all to find a way to "win a member." We are not exploiting these prospects—we wish to give them the greatest gift in the world, a knowledge of the Christ and his church!

8. "Pen-pal" students at Graceland are writing letters to Spanish students in Latin America. Any Zion's League could do likewise. (Information is available from Wayne Simmons, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.)

Those who have made the effort to contact these fine people testify that the Spirit of God has been with them in a marked degree and they have found a new joy in the effort, gaining friendships which they prize as one of their best possessions. It is excellent for our people to win the friendship of a person of another race or nation. It brings rich rewards that those who do not try have not experienced.

For more information, write the undersigned, care of the Mission to Spanish-speaking People, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

One Day of Rest

HAVE YOU EVER STOPPED TO THINK how many things clamor for our attention every weekday? We turn on the radio while we eat breakfast. We read the billboards while on our way to school or to work. We bear the strain of our daily task, and then come back home to find the problems of home life all lined up and demanding attention.

What a blessed thing it is to have one day in seven set apart for rest and quietness—one day in which we can shut out the noise of trivial things and cultivate our souls as we listen to God.

Thousands of people are actually going insane for lack of this peace. Day after day they carry the burdens of life without relief.

It is small wonder that in a recent magazine article Phillip Curtis wrote: "Sooner or later the world may be brought to realize that the old-fashioned Sunday was not a mere survival of Calvinism, but the best device ever evolved for restoring poise and judgment to a fidgety world."

I Don't Believe in Santa Claus

AS A CHILD I was never taught there was an actual person who entered by way of the chimney, packed the hanging stocking to the brim, whistled to his eight reindeer, and bounded off to the next sleeping child's house. In spite of my disbelief in Santa, I doubt that my enjoyment of the yuletide season was surpassed by the throng of little believers. But until I became grown and a mother of two small girls, I had never fully realized or appreciated the true Christmas story.

This year finds me even more convinced that the birthday of the Christ child deserves a more important place in our family festivities than is usually the case. Last year I was happy to find in McCall's magazine an article entitled, "A Birthday Cake for the Christ Child." The author told of her family's tradition of celebrating a real "Happy Birthday for Jesus" with cake, candles, and singing. Gradually I believe we are "catching on" to the principle reason for Christmas, but in general I feel we still deny ourselves and our families the perfect peace of the Christmas season by becoming too involved in the worldly customs of celebration.

We so often condemn the poor innkeeper who turned aside the pleas of Joseph and Mary for a room in which to spend the night. But he didn't know of the impending birth of our Savior. On the other hand, we do know what Christmas should mean, yet if a record were kept, no doubt we speak the name Santa about one hundred to one above that of Jesus. What right have we to condemn?

To my way of thinking there are many arguments against teaching the reality of a Santa Claus. In the first place, it isn't true—it's as simple as that! Yet I've had many people tell me, "But it's such a nice fairy tale and so much fun for the children." Granted, but Cinderella, Goldilocks, Red Riding Hood, and Peter Rabbit are lovely fairy tales too. Better yet, they aren't seasonal. Why not tell our children they are actual characters and let them be enjoyed the year around? Sounds silly, doesn't it? Yet these fairy tale characters aren't designed to crowd out anyone else. People, by custom and sometimes even by choice, let Santa outrank Christ in popularity. In fact, Saint Nicholas holds such an upper hand it's difficult, even in church school classes, to get the minds of the children off "what Santa is going to bring me" long enough to tell them the birthday story of Christ.

MY SECOND ARGUMENT perhaps stems from a selfish motive. When I sweat over a Christmas list, get my feet trampled in the throng of shoppers, catch a head cold through exposure, and get tangled up in wrapping paper, ribbons, and stickers, I don't want the credit going to some remote old fellow up at the North Pole! If I feel like this for the small effort I've made, consider how Christ must feel when year after year, in family after family, his blessings are by-passed by us while we acclaim Santa the hero of the season! Isn't it better for children and parents to sit down together and talk over the desires of each member of the family? Daddy and Mother celebrate Christmas too! It isn't just a matter of writing a letter to Santa Claus. Children should be taught early in life that their gifts are given to them by people who love them

By Mrs. Melvin E. Hougas

... often as a result of sacrifice on the part of the giver. How much nicer for them to know this than to think Santa automatically left the gifts as a result of a letter, which we know landed in the dead letter office or wasn't even mailed!

In my opinion selfishness can be developed or lessened to a large extent in a child by his idea of Christmas. So often Santa is a give-me mechanism which automatically grants a child his every desire, without so much as a thought of gifts to other members of the family. "It is more blessed to give than to receive" is very often forgotten when a child is making up his Christmas list. As long as Santa is responsible and has an inexhaustible supply, as the story goes, why not go the limit? On the other hand, if a child realizes his gifts come from the same source as his food, clothing, shelter, education, etc., he can be taught sharing simply in learning to choose between an electric train or a chemistry set in order for baby sister to get the sleepy doll she has her heart set on. A child could easily acquire the attitude of "What's the use?" if, for instance, his little neighbor, whose parents are more financially adequate to the occasion, received both the electric train and chemistry set. Does Santa play favorites? Explain that one satisfactorily if you can.

MY NEXT ARGUMENT revolves around bribes, threats and promises. Children should learn to obey through love and respect for their parents, and not from the fear that "If you don't, Santa won't stop at your house." The idea that Saint Nick has the all-pervading eye tends to set him up to the equal of Jesus. His is the ever-present spirit which sees in private and awards openly. It is Christ whom we should strive to please throughout the year, not

The Christmas Story

A Pantomime in Four Scenes

By Pat Gardner

Scene 1. Hello there, little man, I couldn't sleep tonight, and now I find you also have two eyes wide open. Would you mind if we three had a talk, just you and God and I? Your tiny hands reach up to me as if to ask for help and guidance. Yet you make me feel so unable to mold your life. I wish your father were here to share the loving look your face reveals to me—and someday he will be. Someday he shall meet his son. He'll walk and talk with you . . . but now he is away. We're lonely, but there was a time when God was lonely too. It started a long, long time ago in a land far away. (Fade.)

Scene 2. Shepherds were tending their sheep in the fields that night, all gathered near the fire (angel appears with spotlight illumination). And lo! the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Savior which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you, ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. (Exit angel)

Then the angel left their sight, but not their hearts, for they talked with one another and decided they should go and see this marvelous child. They prepared themselves quickly for the journey. And to guide them to this place was a star greater than any you or I have ever seen. It was the most beautiful star that had ever shone in the hemisphere. Yes, little man, that is how the shepherds knew that Christ was born. That was how God let the world know. (Fade.)

Scene 3. See that picture, the one above your bed. This great man was Christ. His love for man was so great

Scene 3

J—Joseph (standing)

O—Shepherds (one in back standing, rest kneeling)

W—Wise Men (optional, kneeling)

A—Singing Angel (standing)

a—Manger Angel (kneeling)

(—)—Manger

Singing angel sings as directed in reader's script, "There's a Song in the Air" or other effective carol. As angel finishes song, soft music should come from the background, increasing in volume to complete the climax as scene ends.

Reader's voice is heard from behind scenes. At no time is the reader visible.

that he gave his life in payment for our sins. (Fade.)

Scene 4. Oh, what a glorious night it was! In Bethlehem in a humble stable the baby was found wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger, just as the angel had said. His bed wasn't like yours, and he had no soft blankets, but God took care of that too. (Curtain opens here.) The hay was his mattress, and it was warm—just as warm as the love from his mother who was constantly near his bed. The stable seemed transformed into a cathedral of holiness. Each ray of light was a spire reaching skyward as far as the human eye could see. Bethlehem became the light of the world that night, and music filled the air. Heavenly multitudes sang songs that had never been sung before . . . even a lullaby to bring sleep to the child. (Angel sings lullaby to child.)

People came from near and far to look upon this wondrous babe . . . the old and young, the rich and poor, kings and shepherds alike, bringing gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Standing or kneeling at the foot of the manger, those who looked upon the child beheld a small precious figure surrounded by a spirit of holiness, and everyone who knelt there felt that Spirit to the very depths of his heart.

There was no doubt that this child had been sent by a great God. Not all knew his destiny, but every human mind was certain that a great work was about to be done, and that man had received a miraculous blessing, for this tiny babe with outstretched arms was radiant with the love of his Heavenly Father.

Here was a king wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger, not for the elite to know but for all who would find themselves in humble consecration ready to follow the greatest life ever lived. A ruler had come with a gentleness unsurpassed and with a love greater than any other human.

God had smiled graciously upon his people and had sent his son to rule the world. . . . Yes, to rule the world with love and love alone. (The End)

We Live in Guatemala

By Biloine Young

LIFE IS PACED to a different tempo in Guatemala. People live more slowly, more quietly, than in the United States, and with little of the regularity that spells order and efficiency to the Anglo-Saxon. Guatemalans are not only slow about doing things, but tardy as well. A good example of this is the typical dinner invitation. If one is invited to dinner at 7:00 he will be guilty of a social error if he puts in an appearance a minute before 8:30. A visiting American, unaware of this unwritten law of tardiness, made the mistake of arriving on time. He found his hostess in a house dress, the maids still cleaning the living room, and no one in a position to entertain him. The opening ceremony of the Guatemalan Independence Day, September 15, was listed in the program to start at 8:30 a.m. Those who arrived on time had a long wait in the hot sun, for the ceremony did not begin until after 11:00 a.m.

Life is easier in Guatemala because all members of the "middle" and "upper" classes have maids. Our household here consists of five adults and one child. We have three maids to look after us. One cooks, another cleans, and the third runs errands and serves the meals. Maids are always Indians who wear their own beautiful hand-loomed fabrics and speak a mixture of Indian dialect and Spanish. Many do not wear shoes but go padding about the house in their bare feet, showing no concern even when they walk across the cold wet tiles of the patio.

Our favorite maid is Juana. She is fifteen years old and comes from a village about twenty miles from Guatemala City. She has light brown skin, black hair and the straight nose and slanting forehead of the Maya Indians. She is short, like most Indians, but very strong and cheerful. She wears a long blue skirt woven in the traditional pattern of her village and braids bright red ribbons into her hair. Her thick braids hang far below her waist, weighted down by a Christmas bow of wide red ribbon. When she hurries around a corner her braids swing out behind her so that often all we see of Juana are her black and red braids swishing into a room. Maids here are paid from twelve to twenty dollars a month, depending upon their duties. Juana is probably paid less as she is still young.

OUR HOUSEHOLD, like most households in Guatemala, is matriarchial. The senora has complete control over the maids, determining when they go out of the house, what men they receive attentions from, and how often they receive them. The maids never go out alone. Their only "time off" is from 2:30 until 6:00 on Sunday afternoons. As they leave, they always stop to say good-bye to us, and we always make it a point to admire their gaily embroidered blouses and the yards of fresh red ribbon in Juana's hair.

Our room is one of the most spacious in the house, perhaps because we are Americans. Even then most of the space is above us, as our ceiling is twenty feet high. Our room has a red and black tile floor which is cold in the mornings and two windows overlooking the street. We share this room with a baby raccoon named Hans. He was given to us by the nephew of the war minister. There may be something significant in that, for despite all our efforts, Hans shows little respect for civilization. He eats bread and scrambled eggs; this, plus what he manages to bite off our shoes and fingers in unguarded moments, keeps him active. One of our students, hearing about Hans, offered us a baby leopard which he had caught on his farm. We thought about it for awhile and then decided against the swap. Our room is enough of a zoo already.

OUR DAY begins at 6:30 a.m. when we are awakened by Hans who in turn was awakened by the church bells. We eat breakfast, tie Hans in the patio, and try to get outside in time to catch the school bus for the Colegio Belmont. The driver of the bus, a Guatemalan named Jorge, used to stop and wait for us if we weren't quite ready, but ever since we refused to lend him the money for a trip to El Salvador, he has speeded up when he comes near our house. Now we have to be outside early or walk to school.

While George teaches an eight and a nine o'clock class in physics and geometry, I meet my first private student in the Plazuela Espana. The Plazuela is like a small park with a fountain composed of four life-sized stone horses with thin streams of water running from their mouths. We sit on a tile bench in the shade and talk in English about history and grammar. For this I am paid $1.25 an hour!

Ten o'clock is recess time at Belmont, and as the children file out of the school building, the maids file onto the grounds with trays of sandwiches and milk to feed their charges. For fifteen minutes the children eat, then the maids pad silently out with the dirty dishes, and the teachers resume their classes.

At 10:15 I teach English grammar to twelve-year-old children who are bi- and even tri-lingual. If one student fails to understand my explanation in English, a fellow-student will turn around and explain it to him in Spanish. I wait patiently through the explanation, knowing only vaguely what is going on, and when it is finished, the class continues. Four of my pupils put the more difficult concepts into German, reserving Spanish for use on the playground and English for the Senores Young.

NOT ALL OF OUR STUDENTS at Belmont are Guatemalan. The children of the various diplomatic corps are attracted to the school as are the two daughters of the President of Guatemala, Colonel Arbenz.

Our students include such children as Bunny Craggs, fifteen, the blonde daughter of an American mother and British father who met in Panama. Her best friend is Ava Maria Kong, whose name and eyes are Chinese but whose father came from Berne, Switzerland, to amass a fortune in Guatemala making soap. Two sisters who always sit together are the Nottebohm girls whose tenacity contrasts vividly with the excitable Latins.

Classes are formal and students stand to recite. They leap to their feet, scattering pencils and books when the teacher enters the room. Classes are also small. I have two of thirteen students each and three with only six. Children enter Belmont through the nursery and leave from the junior college. The total enrollment is near 250.

The owner and director of all this is Dona Linda de Reyes-Guerra, a blonde general of a woman from Washington, D. C. Her husband was the ambassador at large from El Salvador to all of Europe. However, when the Salvadorian government changed, friendships did also, with the result that the Reyes-Guerra home was burned to the cellar and Senor Reyes-Guerra decided it would be prudent to practice law in New York for a time.

SUCH INCIDENTS are shocking to Americans but commonplace in Central America. A year ago a border war broke out between Guatemala and El Salvador over the score of a football game played between teams of the two countries.

The election to the presidency of Colonel Arbenz last year was assured when his competitor met with a fatal "accident." The "accident" was an ambush of machine gun bullets just outside the capital. There are no longer generals in the Guatemalan army. Colonel Arbenz is the highest ranking officer. Such is the state of politics here that some men are taking bets that Arbenz will not live to finish his six-year term of office.

Despite the extraordinary precautions that are taken to protect the president's life, it is absurdly easy to get near him. During the Independence Day celebrations George and I marched up on the platform where the president and his aides were seated, knelt about three feet from him, and calmly snapped all the pictures we wanted.

President Arbenz is a small, fair-skinned man with thinning brown hair, who looks to be about thirty-four years old. My main impression of him was that he was extremely neat. In his black formal suit and wide Ascot tie he had the well-scrubbed look of a German army officer.

Everyone in Guatemala is terribly conscious of the Communists. Time magazine calls Guatemala the most communistic country on the continent. We don't know. Some of our friends here say the government is completely controlled by Russia while others say that there aren't more than a hundred active Communists in all of Guatemala. Probably the best indication of the strength of subversive forces is the amount of anticommunist activity. Almost daily we read in the papers of new anticommunist leagues being formed in villages around Guatemala City. More and more booths in the market are displaying signs proclaiming No somos Comunistas (We are not Communists). Last week signs appeared in most of the buses proclaiming that Communists were anti-Christ. Incidentally the only argument we have seen against communism is that the doctrine is antireligious. Although it is impossible to determine the amount of communist activity in Guatemala, the amount of anticommunist propaganda seems to indicate that something is going on.

OUR EVENINGS, from 5:00 to 8:00, are spent in teaching English at the Institue Guatemalteco-Americano. The Institute is an unofficial propaganda agency of the United States State Department. It operates a free public library of English and Spanish books (the first in Guatemala to allow patrons to take books home with them); a fine record library; numerous activities such as square dances, photography contests, and movies; and classes in English from the beginner level through advanced conversation. Classes meet three nights a week and draw more than five hundred students.

Our students come from all walks of life. We have judges, doctors, lawyers, manufacturers, and teachers rubbing shoulders with young girls whose fiances are Americans and Guatemalan tourists who want to be able to order dinner in an American restaurant. The desire to learn English is very great. Almost anyone who can teach the language with facility and without accent can have at least a part-time job.

Industry in Guatemala is looking for Americans with technical ability. Management here has a tremendous respect for the American ability to get things done and on time. Skilled workmen who can get a visa to stay in the country can generally be assured of jobs at close to American salaries.

The church needs a nucleus of Saints here. Those who can fit into the economy of Guatemala should find a place. The climate is ideal for active North Americans, the country is becoming industrialized at a rapid rate, and there is a lifetime of church work to be done. Besides—there are two isolated Saints who would like some company in Guatemala!

Joseph Smith says: "It is contrary to the will and commandment of God that those who receive not their inheritance by consecration . . . should have their names enrolled with the people of God."—Church History, Volume I, chapter 2.

God's method of answering prayer is usually through human beings. If my church is praying for greater resources so that it can carry forth the building of God's kingdom here on earth, it is my privilege to dig deep into my resources to help that the gospel might be carried forth.

Yes, I am my brother's keeper, and the way and manner in which I fulfill my obligation assures me of my home in celestial glory.

Faith without works is dead. Let us live by our works and our faith in God's kingdom. Our Lamanite brethren await our going forth. Are we going to be like Cain and not keep our covenant commandment?

some mythical person just before stocking-hanging time.

Personally, I like the story of Santa Claus. I tell it to my two little girls on the average of three times a day between Thanksgiving and December 25, but I see to it they meet the old gentleman squarely on the level of fiction. They love to visit Santa in the leading department stores, sit on his lap, and pull his whiskers, like any other four- and five-year-olds. But after such an experience last year I overheard my older daughter explaining to her sister, who was a bit undecided, in the following manner; "Now, Avis, if I had a red coat and a red hat on, and a basket of cookies over my arm, I'd look like Red Riding Hood, but I'd still be Ann!" That convinced me. My little girls hadn't been denied any fun at Christmas time. The mysteries had been explained, accepted, and enjoyed, and they still knew that first and uppermost Christmas is the birthday of our Savior—a celebration far greater than any human could devise.

"As for me and my house" . . . we let Santa root for himself. We don't believe!

A Christmas Play

Editor's Note: Doubtless some of our readers are looking for a good religious play to be used in their branch at Christmas time. The following article was prepared at our request by the author of a play written and successfully used for church audiences. It is now available in Zion's League Annual No. 5, page 68.

HOW I CAME TO WRITE "THE WONDROUS BIRTH"

A number of years ago the Stone Church school sponsored a contest for a suitable pageant for a Children's Day entertainment. I had had some experience in working with children along this line, so confidently set to work and wrote "Summer Messenger," which depicted flowers, birds, bees, butterflies, etc., bringing a message of their Father's loving care.

To my chagrin it did not even place, and my husband, seeing my disappointment, and knowing the work that had gone into it, suggested that I send it to Tullar-Meredith Company of New York.

I did so. That company promptly sent a check for ten dollars and offered me twenty-five dollars to write another. This marked the beginning of my career as a pageant writer.

My pageant, "The Coming of Our King," I considered my masterpiece. It was a Christmas entertainment written for our church school here in Nauvoo. It depicts the Christmas story as told in the Bible.

We had a fine group of young people who performed their parts well. They are all married and many have moved away now, but they have never forgotten the part they played that night. It was repeated the following year to a crowded house, and the suggestion was made that it be an annual performance, for it was accompanied by a Spirit that no Santa Claus entertainment could possibly have created.

"The Coming of Our King" was published by the Hope Publishing Company of Chicago for a number of years, and when the copyright ran out, I sent it to the Herald Publishing House, changing the name to "The Wondrous Birth." It has been included in Zion's League Annual No. 5.

We hope that Latter Day Saints everywhere will use it this year, for it is a Latter Day Saint production, written for the church school in old Nauvoo.—MABEL SANFORD ATKINSON

* NEW PRESS AND EQUIPMENT

Visitors to Herald House have noticed work going on incidental to the removal of one of our old Miehle presses, a veteran that began service in Lamoni after the destructive 1907 fire. The press was moved with other equipment to Independence in 1921. E. H. McKean, production manager, who has the longest record of service among present employees, says it has given all the service that can be expected in the life of a press.

Cliff Gaston, pressman, who has operated the press in recent years, writes an "Elegie" for it: "Here's good-by to you, old Nineteen Hundred Seven. For forty-four years you have shown the way to heaven. And many a Saint have you helped to be saintlier still, on life's rugged way over the hill. The 'Herald,' 'Steps,' 'Zion's Hope,' and many more, have been printed by you and brought to my door. As you finish your run, we hope we can, like you, be a blessing to man."

Mr. McKean informs us that the new press being brought in is a No. 56 Miehle, Model 00, with Dexter feeder and chain delivery. Miehle is one of the finest makes of press machinery. "It should be good for fifty years," says Mr. McKean. "During the last two years we have been adding up-to-date equipment to our shop. The new Miller Simplex press is giving excellent service. We have the new Model C-4 Intertype, a casting machine, and a Hammond glider saw, the best of its kind. This machinery will assure fine service for the future operation of the shop." Other new machinery includes the Christensen gang stitcher, and complete Addressograph equipment in the mailing division. All of these represent carefully considered investments.

* FREEDOM

In a speech at a political convention in Springfield, Illinois, in the year 1858, Abraham Lincoln said, "I believe this government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free."

Now we are faced with a greater situation than our country faced at that time. We are wondering if our world can "endure permanently half slave and half free."

Our freedom will never be secure until it can be shared with all of the human race. As long as the black cloud of slavery casts its shadow anywhere in the world, all of us are affected by it.

* YOUR ETERNITY

I started out recently on a week-end jaunt to visit some of the family who live near Philadelphia. The day was a glorious one—a golden day—warm sun and hazy blue sky. Instead of following the main highway, I took the back roads across the mountains to another way leading through the Poconos. I climbed and twisted around the hills, each turn bringing another breath-taking view. At the foot of a long hill on the next highway, there was a huge sign, "Where Will You Spend Eternity?"

It was rather startling, and set me off on a serious trend of thought. I wondered: Are we taking as much time to plan for a place in eternity as we do for a summer vacation? —Minnetta Isaacks.

WICHITA BRANCH DEDICATED

President W. Wallace Smith and Apostle D. T. Williams with Seventy James Daugherty were in Wichita, Kansas, for the opening of the new church, November 23-25. Elder Myron LaPointe is the pastor of the branch. Brother Williams reports that the people of Wichita were able to complete a $150,000 church building for $75,000 by doing practically all of the labor themselves. Brother Williams preached the first sermon in the upper auditorium on Friday night, and Brother Smith preached on Sunday morning.

ATTEND INSTITUTE

Elder John Darling and Apostle Reed M. Holmes were in Tulsa, Oklahoma, December 1 and 2 for a church school workers institute of the Central Oklahoma District. The next week, Brother Holmes was joined by Elder F. Carl Mesle and President F. Henry Edwards for a two weeks' tour of different branches conducting institutes for church school, youth, and priesthood leaders.

Apostle Holmes was the speaker at the Mt. Washington Branch in the Center Stake on the evening of November 25. The Mt. Washington Zion's League conducted the service.

Melvin was born in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1913, baptized at the age of nine in Independence, and attended Beaumont High School in St. Louis. He attended Graceland 1941-44, transferred to St. Louis University in 1944-45. Later he took extension courses with the Universities of Colorado and Kansas. Interspersed with all these efforts in higher education were several jobs to help carry the freight charges, and a two-year General Conference appointment (1939-41). He was employed at janitor work and in library duties while at Graceland. He also had experience in working for a can manufacturer, an electrical corporation, a laundry, a creamery and a bank.

Just before coming to the Sanitarium he taught school (1946-47). He was graduated from the Sanitarium X-ray school in 1948, passed his examination for "national registry" in 1949 and became an "R.T." receiving his certificate as a Registered X-ray Technician. He holds membership in the Kansas City Society, the Missouri Society, American Registry, and the American Society of X-ray Technicians. He is unmarried.

Melvin was ordained a deacon in 1931, a priest in 1936, and an elder in 1938. He has acted as pastor of the Stone Church junior church for the past four years.

The Healing Faith

"Be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole."—Matthew 9: 28, I.V.

THE GREAT VARIETY of human ills calls for diverse kinds of remedies. Antiseptic medicine must be used to kill infection. Stimulants must be used for a failing heart. Soothing talk is needed for the nervous patient. Trained physicians and psychiatrists have a great many healing agents and techniques at their command.

In the many instances of healing related in the New Testament, different healing agents are recognized. In the story of the Good Samaritan, oil (an unguent) and wine (an antiseptic) are mentioned. Prayer was often used for the sick. The laying on of hands is commended to the elders.

In this case, where a woman had suffered from a hemorrhage for years, Jesus indicated another healing power. "Thy faith hath made thee whole," he said.

Is it surprising that Jesus should tell the woman that the power to be healed lay within herself?

Doctors have sometimes talked to lay audiences about the remarkable powers within the body to heal itself. Cut the skin, and nature immediately begins to make repairs. When there is a bruise, the blood flows through the injured part and washes the congestion away. If infection invades the body, the leucocytes (white blood corpuscles) immediately come to battle the invader.

Mind and spirit, too, have marvelous powers to heal themselves of the hurts inflicted by the world. Our misfortune is that we do not know that we have these powers and thus cannot use them. But we can learn.

It is not only in the Bible that we find this statement of a healing faith within us. It is found in the Book of Mormon also—Enos 1: 11.

A church man who carried heavy responsibility and worried about his problems felt ill and went to his doctor. After giving him a careful examination, making X-ray photographs and blood tests, the doctor could find nothing organically wrong with the man. Yet he was sick and suffering. His nerves bothered him. He had difficulty in sleeping and often lay awake for hours at night, though he was tired. He could not relax.

One day when he called at the office the doctor gave him a strange prescription. It was not to be filled at the drugstore, but at the bookstore. It was to buy two books and read them carefully.

The man read the books and followed the directions. He learned to relax. He slept at night and obtained rest. The doctor knew he had power in his own mind to be healed, if it could be directed properly.

Some people seem to be endowed with a gift of helping others in counsel, giving them comfort and courage in times of distress.

A young man who was having trouble with his work and his nerves came for a visit and received help. After several visits he remarked, "I always feel better after I talk with you." He had come in a tense and worried condition. After talking a while he forgot himself and his troubles, relaxed, and felt better.

He will find better health in seeking help from God, from his friends, from books, and from within himself.

The healing faith—the faith that can make one whole—must rest in God, the Heavenly Father.

We need a kind of faith in life, because it is the life that God has given us. It should not be the blind faith that life will take care of us, but the sensible faith that life will give us a chance.

We need a kind of faith in people, because God has placed us among them as friends, companions, and fellow laborers. It should not be a blind, naïve faith that they are all good, for they are not. It should be a rational, practical attitude that our welfare depends in part upon other people, and that we must get along with them.

We need a kind of faith in the world, because God has given it to us as our human home. There is even a place for faith in a world that lies under the shadow of the atomic bomb. Though it may not spare the individual life, it gives everyone a chance to live.

When we are weak, we turn to God in prayer for strength. If we break a leg or get pneumonia, we call for the doctor. But there are certain ills for which we may find a healing power in our own faith. We take no credit for the fact that it is there. The same God who made us put it there. Jesus recognized that faith in the woman who touched his robe as people thronged and pressed about him, hoping to be healed and to escape unnoticed. But he could not fail to observe the movement of power when the miracle occurred. What we need to recognize is the fact that the healing power that was in her is in us too.

For that woman, faith was exercised when she reached out to touch the edge of Jesus' garment. Our faith is expressed when we lift our hands and hearts up in prayer to reach God.

Early Reports on Auditorium Offerings

While it is yet too early to have extensive information regarding the Auditorium offering, the few reports received are encouraging. We are hopeful that these will represent the general pattern of giving in other places of the church.

A wire from Bishop Stephen Robinson of the Des Moines District stated, "Mason City has exceeded Auditorium quota. Other branches in district will do likewise. Completing Auditorium has our hearty approval."

Brother Calvin French, president of the Rich Hill District, has advised us that the Rich Hill District has raised its quota for the Auditorium drive for 1951. He indicated that members there had previously planned to meet their goal by December 15, but the emphasis on the drive along with personal sacrifice has resulted in the quota being more than reached ahead of schedule.

Bishop Harold I. Cackler of the Center Stake indicates good response by the congregations of the Stake. The Blue Ridge congregation reached over 81 per cent of its quota, and the Stone Church over 72 per cent of its quota. The present offering from the entire stake was nearly 43 per cent. Bishop Cackler is hopeful that the entire quota for 1951 will be raised by the stake by December 31.

Brother Irby Mundy of Colorado Springs gives an unofficial report stating that the branch there has exceeded its quota.

Bishop Howard Miller, who is in charge of the finances for Kaw River Valley District, reported that the Olathe mission, one of the new groups of the church, has exceeded its quota toward the Auditorium drive. Bishop Miller says that this is indicative of the interest and devotion of this new group toward the work of the church.

It will take some time for the reports of the various branches to clear in the usual way, but we are sure that the offering in many of these branches will result in the same fine response. We are anticipating that the December offering will result in our reaching the quota for 1951.

Youth Institute on Hispanic America

Graceland College is conducting a week-end institute on Hispanic America, February 23-24, 1952. It will be open to selected delegations from the territory adjacent to the college. Delegations may be selected and sent by districts and stakes or by large branches. The invitation does not seek numbers but qualified youth leaders who will contribute to and profit from this conference. The registration fee of $1.00 will include the evening and morning meals. Housing will be provided by the college. The conference opens at one o'clock Saturday afternoon and closes at 11:45 Sunday morning. Applications may be sent to W. S. Gould, Graceland College. A delegation will consist of six members, normally five young people and their youth leader or pastor.

The institute aims to develop insight into life and culture in Mexico, Central America, and South America in relation to our church's development of missionary operations. The staff will include leaders of the General Church. ROY A. CHEVILLE

From Stake President G. E. Tickemyer, Los Angeles:

We had the pleasure of entertaining Brother Tapu Virioura for the period of approximately four days during his layover here in Los Angeles awaiting departure of the "Weitemata."

In providing for Brother Tapu's entertainment, we were well aware that the infrequency of contact with natives from the islands makes it doubly important that they be capably taken care of when the opportunity does present itself. We went all out to make his stay an enjoyable one. He was housed in the home of Brother and Sister Evan Inslee and was so happy there that he did not want to stay anywhere else, although other homes were open to him. I met him at the airport early on the morning of his arrival, took him past one of our movie studios, showed him through Central Church, contacted the French Consulate, and attended to his transportation, about which he was very much concerned. He was extremely homesick and said, "My heart aches for my wife and eleven-year-old daughter." Presiding as guest-of-honor at a men's club meeting at Temple City, he made a speech with the aid of a French boy interpreter. He spoke of President Smith's kindness in assisting him to make the trip to Hawaii.

The following day Brother Inslee took him over to Santa Ana where he had a nice visit with Brother Louis Ostertag, who speaks French. Tapu retired early that night. I spent the entire day with him on Wednesday, taking him through Forest Lawn Cemetery and, by arrangement with the office there, showing him the casket room. He was amazed at the quality of the boxes in which we bury our dead, explaining that in his country they are made of rude planks. I was able to show him a body lying in state, with which he was much impressed. We entertained him at our home in the afternoon and evening, and my wife gave him one of our finest painted plates to take to his wife. He was very appreciative of this gift. He attended prayer service at Pasadena in the evening.

He was anxious to get to the ship immediately when it docked, so Bishop and Mrs. Kelley took him to Long Beach on Thursday. They snapped a few pictures which are to be sent to him soon.

Since his business is that of making ice cream, I took him through an ice cream plant, and he was greatly impressed and picked up a quantity of literature to take with him. I believe that he will return to his native islands with a favorable impression of the church and with many interesting stories to tell to his friends and relatives who, he says, will come in from miles around to hear him tell of his trip.

Handel and the "Messiah"

By Arthur H. Mills

1870 - 1943

Arthur Mills

Arthur H. Mills, one of the well-known church musicians and an advocate of good music in the days when there were sharp differences of opinion about the use of music in the church, wrote this article in the mature years of his life.

Brother Mills was the first instructor in music at Graceland College, serving from 1898 to 1900. Our present hymnal is enriched by two hymns for which he wrote the music. They are "With Thankful Hearts" and "How Gentle God's Command." He helped in the effort to get a good organ for the Stone Church, the best in Independence in that day.

An advocate of good choir and orchestral work and a leader of both, he presented the church this background of the Messiah and the composer, George Frederick Handel.—Editor.

GEORGE FREDERICK HANDEL was born February 23, 1865, at Halle, Saxony, one of the provinces of Germany. His father was a surgeon and regarded music as a degrading art; when he discovered that his son was amazingly gifted he did his utmost to stifle the growth of his genius. But Providence willed otherwise; a dumb spinet was smuggled into the garret of the Handel home, and the child succeeded in surreptitiously practicing and gaining a high degree of skill on the instrument. While on a visit to the capital of the province, young George succeeded in attracting the attention of the Duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, who persuaded his father that such unmistakable genius should be allowed full expression. So the boy Handel was placed under the tutelage of the celebrated organist Zachau, whom he succeeded in surpassing in the space of three years.

Although born a German, Handel voluntarily left his native land in 1712 and chose to live in England, becoming in time a naturalized citizen; he continued to live in his adopted country until his death.

ALTHOUGH A PROLIFIC COMPOSER of such skill as to surpass all others of his period, he did not come to the full fruition of his divine powers until more than a half century of years had flown over him. Then he produced two oratorios, Saul and Israel in Egypt, which stamped him as a genius of the highest rank. While on a visit to Dublin in 1742, he composed his masterpiece, The Messiah, for the benefit of a charitable organization, and upon his return to London it was again given the following year for a like purpose, the benefit of the Foundling Hospital.

His last oratorio was Jephthah, produced at the time when the first symptoms of blindness came upon him. But his indomitable spirit refused to yield to this affliction, and he rose above it and continued his work, giving his energies to the conducting of his works and to performances on the organ, on which he was a marvelous virtuoso.

On April 6, 1759, he accomplished what was his last effort, by attending and playing the organ at a performance of his Messiah at Covent Garden, but the exertion was too great for him, and he went to his bed, from which he did not again rise, dying eight days later. England has honored him by giving him a place among the illustrious dead in the south transept of Westminster Abbey.

Grandeur and simplicity, majesty and breadth of scale, pathetic feeling with grave sincerity, equally removed from the sensuous and the abstract, are the chief characteristics of Handel's works.

Honor, integrity, and uncompromising independence of character were part of Handel's nature. In an age when artists used to live in a sort of dependency on the rich and powerful, he refused to be the dependent of anyone and preserved his dignity at all times.

He never married but lived wholly for and in his art. His tastes were simple, and he was constantly faithful to his family tradition. His liberality toward charitable enterprises was unbounded, and at his death he left large sums to worthy causes.

The rapidity with which he composed was as wonderful as his industry, but his manuscripts evidence the fact that he never failed to take the greatest care in the preparation and correction of his scores.

It was as a writer of choral effects that Handel was supreme. No one ever developed the resources of the chorus as he did, and his choruses remain to this day as unapproachable. No one, before or since, has so well understood how to produce from a body of voices such grand results by such artfully simple means as Handel used. The name of Handel is immortal, one that lives never to die.

WHEN WE CONSIDER the great honor and sterling integrity of the man Handel, his immortal masterpiece can truly be said to bear the unmistakable marks of great genius, and real inspiration. No oratorio of its time has equaled it in beauty and majesty. Since it was composed for the purposes of charity and relieving distress what but the spirit of the Christ should dictate the spirit in which it was penned? More, while Handel was alive, it continued to be given, year after year, for the alleviation of distress and poverty.

The story of the Savior of the world is told in this great tone creation, and the account is given entirely in the words of the Holy Writ. The various moods of the different scriptural accounts are even mirrored in the musical settings accompanying them.

THE ORATORIO is divided into three grand divisions. Part one presents to us the prophecies foretelling the coming of the Savior. The mind of the hearer is prepared for the portent of these by a magnificent overture of greatest solemnity, in its spirit depicting the dejection of Israel in their yoke of bondage. But the voice of consolation is heard in the opening recitative and aria, "Comfort ye my people," "Every valley shall be exalted." Then comes the magnificent chorus, promising "The glory of the Lord shall be revealed." But a note of fear enters in the bass aria, "But who shall abide the day of his coming?" Then we are told the manner in which the Savior of men shall come to us, in the tender contralto recitative, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son." The joyous tidings are further proclaimed in the contralto aria and chorus, "O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion." The bass takes the mind to wander in the gloomy warnings, "For behold, darkness shall cover the earth," followed by an aria in the same voice, breathing a promise of relief, "The people that walked in darkness shall see a great light." In this wonderful solo number, the voice and the accompaniment seem to grope in unguided confusion until the triumphant close is reached, "Upon them hath the light shined." Then is heard the grand chorus telling of the majesty of the Messiah's reign, "For unto us a child is born."

Next we have the account of the Advent, and the tale of the shepherds in the fields is given by the soprano in the recitative, "And there were shepherds abiding in the field," followed by the aria, "And lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them"; then two recitatives, "And the angel said unto them" and "And suddenly there was with the angel." The magnificent chorus, "Glory to God," voices the rejoicing of the heavenly host at the Messiah's birth. The gentle, loving mercies of the Savior are told in the solos, "Then shall the eyes of the blind be opened," "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd," and the pleading one, "Come unto him, all ye that labor and are heavy laden."

THE GREAT MISSION of the Christ is next told. An indescribable solemnity pervades the opening numbers of this part that describes the Savior's atonement. In the chorus, "Behold the Lamb of God," the voice of creation seems to be aghast, unable to comprehend the tragedy to be enacted. The pitiful story is carried by the contralto in that saddest of songs, "He was despised and rejected," and the chorus takes up the burden of sorrow in "Surely he hath borne our griefs" and in the measure of self-accusation, "All we like sheep have gone astray." The griefs of the Man of Sorrows are portrayed in the tenor numbers, "Thy rebuke hath broken his heart," and "Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto his sorrow." The triumphant end of the Savior's mission is now the theme in the chorus, "Lift up your heads," and in this section is heard the wonderful soprano aria, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

The final strains of the oratorio voice the great theme of thanksgiving that the atonement has been achieved.

A MOST INTERESTING INCIDENT of the first performance of The Messiah in London is told. The "Hallelujah Chorus" was being presented, and the great audience in Covent Garden, in which the king and queen were present, became so enthralled that with one accord they arose to their feet and remained standing during the rest of the chorus. To this is attributed the present custom of standing during the rendition of this wonderful chorus.

A BIT OF CHURCH HISTORY

An interesting program comes to us presenting the Belfry Players of Williams Bay, Wisconsin. This is in the region where the Reorganization was cradled in 1852-59. On page 6 of the program is a descriptive article entitled, "History of the Little Mormon Church." While we regret the use of the term "Mormon" throughout, we are presenting the article for its historical interest to our readers.—Editor

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints, which was founded at Beloit, Wisconsin, in 1852 by refugees from the Mormon colony at Nauvoo, Illinois, has been twice declared in the United States courts to be the only legal successor to the original Mormon church founded by Joseph Smith. They had broken away from Brigham Young, who declared himself leader of the Mormons after the assassination of Joseph Smith and his brother, Hyrum, and in 1860 formally declared Joseph Smith III their leader. When the membership in the Delavan-Lake Geneva area reached 100, in the year 1886, they built their house of worship on a corner of the farm of Henry Southwick, and the quaintly divided pews and original oil lamps are reminders of those early Mormon worshippers. Many descendants of the early Mormons lived near by, but when the church disbanded in 1932, title to the property reverted to the Mother Church in Independence, Missouri. From them the Belfry Players leased the building in 1934, purchasing it two years later. Since then eighty-seven three-act plays, as well as a number of one-acts for special occasions, have been presented in the Belfry Theatre, and the little Mormon Church with the vivid history has become famous for another sort of drama.

WILL THERE BE

A Gift for Your Church

UNDER YOUR TREE?

THE THREE WISE MEN have become a tradition of Christianity everywhere. We do not know if these men of old actually realized the significance of their discovery, but it is sufficient for us to know that when they found the Christ child, they fell down and worshiped him. And when they had opened their treasures, "they offered him gifts, gold, and frankincense, and myrrh." It is said the gold denoted the value of their gifts; the frankincense the liberality of their giving; and myrrh, the genuineness of their sincerity.

TRADITION INDICATES that our custom of giving Christmas gifts is a symbol of what the Wise Men did when they went to Bethlehem. If that is true—and regardless of whether or not it is—it seems of utmost importance that we pay tribute in a tangible manner to Christ at this season. Like the Wise Men of old, we should put Christ on our Christmas list.

A GIFT TO CHRIST can most logically be made by presenting a gift to his church. Undoubtedly the most representative part of his church on earth today is the Auditorium in Independence, the Center Place. A gift to the Auditorium Fund will help give visible expression to us and our friends that his church is firmly established on the earth.

SEVERAL BRANCHES of the church have reported that, at their Christmas programs, members—including children—will bring a sacrifice offering and put it under the tree. Such offering will be directed to the Auditorium Fund. If you can't participate in such a branch program, certainly you'll want to put such a gift under your tree at home for your church—for Christ.

WHEN THE GIFTS are removed from under the tree, they should be sent to your bishop, bishop's agent, or solicitor, or mailed directly to the Auditorium Fund, The Presiding Bishopric, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

WISE MEN STILL GIVE GIFTS TO CHRIST

FAVORS COMPLETING THE AUDITORIUM

If the Saints of the intermountain area are any indication, members throughout the world are rejoicing over the announcement by the Presiding Bishopric that the Auditorium, in the Center Place, is to be completed.

Although it is by no means an end in itself, this majestic building holds a very warm spot in the lives of all the Saints, especially those who have had the privilege of worshipping there, of participating in the business of the church, of meeting friends there, or just looking around. If just for the sentiments alone, this move to complete the building is well worth all the effort that can be put forth.

But there is much more in it than mere sentiments. It is a recognition of the determination to move forward. Though we are to be in the world but not of the world, it is essential to administration and to human relations that the world headquarters of the church of Jesus Christ be in a surrounding conducive to efficiency, comfort, service, and richer spiritual experiences. . . . It is a recognition that there are greater things to come. We have been admonished many times in the past few years that the hastening time is upon us. There is much to be done yet, but there are so few to do it, and so short a time to do it in. Thus it becomes important that the Auditorium be finished so that our material resources and our attention may be directed to yet more important matters in building Zion.

Temple on the Hill

Most Herald readers will be interested in the story entitled, "Temple on the Hill" from The Living Museum for September, 1951. Virginia S. Eifert is the editor. It is "printed by authority of the State of Illinois."

The cover of this little magazine carries a picture of the Sunstone from the Nauvoo Temple. While we regret the use of the term "Mormon" throughout, we think the interesting historical data justifies reprinting the article in full.—EDITOR

HIGHER and higher the leaping flames soared into the black sky, and now with a roar that was heard by the watchers across the river in Iowa, the limestone walls of the Mormon temple fell in a calcined heap. The flames went down, finally, and the stones, still hot after several days had passed, were all that remained of what had been the most magnificent edifice in Illinois.

It was October, 1848, and the Mormons, sent away from Illinois and forced to abandon their city called Nauvoo beside the Mississippi, were on their way to lands outside the United States—to Utah—when word came that the Temple had been destroyed. Hatred and lack of understanding of the Mormon people and their beliefs had culminated in a willful firing of a Temple which had cost almost a million dollars and uncounted hours of cheerful labor given as a tithe by men of the Nauvoo community.

In 1839 the Mormons had come into Illinois in search of a place in which to build their city and live in peace. The Prophet, Joseph Smith, had heard about Galland's bog, up along the Mississippi north of Quincy and Keokuk, where the river flowed in a great crescent past a broad point of swampy land. Back of it rose a majestic hill, wild and wooded; in the bottoms was a small trading post and village called Commerce. There once had been an Indian village here, but now the Indians were gone. Land which no one else wanted was Joseph Smith's goal. He and his people bought Galland's bog and proceeded to drain it, lay out streets, build houses. There were epidemics of malaria, but finally the new city of Nauvoo rose along well-planned city blocks. In the days when Chicago was small and Springfield, the new capital, was a muddy village on the prairie, the city of Nauvoo had a population of 20,000 people who knew a higher standard of living than the majority of those who had come out to populate the raw state of Illinois.

ON THE HILL looking far out over the city and across the beautiful river to the green shores of Iowa, the Temple grew. Limestone for its walls was quarried not far away in the bluffs. Fine timbers were hand hewn. There were three floors with many windows, a basement housing the baptismal font held by stone oxen, and a tall cupola holding a statue of the angel Moroni. Extending two stories high were thirty stone pilasters. The base of each was a stone bearing the figure of a crescent moon of great size. The capstone of each pilaster was a figure of a sun with a cryptic face surrounded by rays and topped with two hands holding trumpets. Above the sunstones were stones bearing stars.

And then the Mormons who erected it, after having used it only for a few months, were compelled to depart into the west, and the Temple was destroyed. A year later there came the French Icarians, a communal society who believed in a town based upon the common division of labor and possessions—"each one according to his ability." Under Etienne Cabet, these French people planned their town on the ruins of the Mormon city, built community buildings for sleeping, eating, and instruction. The Icarians were fascinated by the ruins of the Temple, and with great expense and work they began to build it up again.

ALFRED H. PIQUENARD, who later was to design the Illinois state capitol building, was then a member of the Icarians; he was sent north to arrange for timber to restore the Temple to its old grandeur. But when the Temple was only partially rebuilt, a tornado swept across Iowa and the river and struck the Temple on the hill. And the roar of falling walls could be heard three miles away. Once again the Temple lay in ruins. The Icarians abandoned the project. They used some of the stones to build their community schoolhouse and other buildings, and the spot once occupied by the Temple lay full of weeds and debris. When the Icarian plan would not work and some of the community migrated into Iowa, there came into Nauvoo German immigrants who carried on the culture of wine grapes which the Icarians had bequeathed them. Blue cheese and wines—these are the products of peaceful Nauvoo today. The vineyards spread along the hills where once there was an Indian village, a Mormon city, a French communistic colony, and the present population which is largely descended of all these.

But there were portions of the Temple which remained undestroyed—the capstones and base stones, the stones of the sun and the moon. Still carrying their mysterious symbolism, some of them remained. Records of the whereabouts of most of them are meager, but it is known that in the hotel yard in Nauvoo there is a moonstone, and two more occupy the burial place of Joseph and Hyrum Smith and Joseph's wife, Emma. A well-preserved sunstone stands in Quincy, and another is in Springfield.

IT WAS IN 1870, when the new state capitol was being built, that samples of limestone and sandstone were sent to Springfield from various parts of the state for possible use in the new building. As a sample of Sonora quarry limestone in Hancock county, a sunstone was sent here, and perhaps because of this, much of the

The Lord's Community Chest

By Thomas R. Beil

IT HAS BEEN SOME TIME since the idea first came to Hometown. In fact, the first time the idea was tried it failed! But later, when careful consideration was given to the merits of the idea, a second try was planned which met with success. What was the idea? Community Chest! Yes, the community chest idea has gradually taken hold until most cities of any size use it in the collection of funds to operate many worth-while agencies serving people—agencies which, under former plans, found it necessary to spend much time and effort in fund-raising campaigns that usually netted less than was necessary for the accomplishment of the ideal.

Most community-minded persons can well remember slogans of the early chest campaigns suggesting the value of "placing all appeals in one." Such slogans were "United We Stand," "The Sun Shines Through," limestone used in the capitol building eventually came from that source. For a long time the old sunstone, still with its strange half-smile, was propped against the north side of the state house. Then it was hauled to the fairgrounds where it was placed at the west end of a small lagoon near the main entrance to the fairgrounds. A few years ago when the lagoon was removed, the sunstone was placed upon a concrete block and there it stands today, alone and without a marker, with no identification and in imminent danger of being toppled and cracked. During the days of the Illinois State Fair it is submerged in the sideshows and concessions.

Yet it is still a living, vivid reminder of days that are past, days in the story of Illinois which may have gone by with tragic finality, but which, in their vividness, must live forever.

"Give One Day's Wages—Once!" It was not difficult to get the average man or woman to sense the smartness of placing many requests into one—of one campaign serving many agencies—thereby saving heavy expenses incurred by each agency operating its own campaign. Few would care to return to the outmoded system which in many cities, promoted an average of one campaign a week.

Those who originated the idea of the community chest struck upon a sound idea. It is a good idea—worthy of our fullest support.

AS EXCELLENT as the community chest idea is, it is not new. It was introduced long ago. It has been the system used by the Lord throughout all generations during which his work has been among the children of men. The Lord chose to call it the "tithe," and his counsel is "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith . . . if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

It seems the Lord knew the wisdom of uniting forces and of providing a plan which would eliminate duplication of efforts. Here it is—a very simple process—just "bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse."

What would happen in the church of Jesus Christ if all the people gave whole-hearted support and compliance to the Lord's community chest? Since the word of the Lord is sure, blessings should abound under which the church would make progress unforeseen in the life of the organization—even so much that "there shall not be room enough to receive it." Think of it—the missionary force of Christ's church would be free to move into "every nation and place" unhindered by the need for funds. Country after country still awaits the message of the Restoration because those who have received the message thus far have not seen the wisdom of God's community chest.

The departments of the church—Religious Education, women, youth, and the rest—could make strides toward the achievement of high goals which have come to light through present-day studies of its needs of church people. But at present these departments await the "go ahead" signal which fails to be given, partly because the people have not yet desired to take seriously the Lord's wisdom in setting up his community chest. Consider the growth which might be experienced by the church institutions—Graceland College, the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, the Herald House, homes for the aged—if the Saints were to make an all-out effort in the keeping of the law of tithing.

And so it is—on and on. Innumerable ways could be listed in which the church of Jesus Christ would be expanded and increased. There is no limit to its work—none, that is, except the limited vision of the people. When the Saints of God open their eyes to a realization of the power within the plan which God has entrusted to them, then "shall Zion prosper," and then shall the "windows of heaven" be opened and a blessing poured out upon those who promote the righteous will of the Lord.

Call it what you will—the law, the tithe, the storehouse, the financial plan—when all members instead of a mean 25 per cent do as the counsel of the Lord suggests, the powers of Zion shall be liberated, her potentials realized, and her children receive abundantly of the blessings of heaven.

A Career in Church Education

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF

J. A. Gunsolley

PART III

Two Ambitions

A REUNION, or fall conference, was held at Galland's Grove at which I was permitted to see two things I desired very much to witness. One was to see a prophet of God—a living prophet; the other was a sign. Joseph Smith, III, was at this conference. As I entered the assembly he sat among some members of the priesthood upon the platform, and I received the conviction that he was a true prophet. At that time his beard was quite long and black, and his appearance was very impressive.

At a prayer service the Holy Spirit was present in power, moving many to tears of joy and happiness. As the meeting progressed a sister arose, held forth her hand, and said, "Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you, O my people!" This was followed by a most beautiful prophecy that came directly into my heart and consciousness, the Spirit bearing testimony to its divinity.

This satisfied my longing. I knew the church was like the one Jesus built in doctrine and organization; so far as I could understand from my reading of the Bible. I thought it possible for men, from their understanding of the Scriptures, to organize a church after the pattern Jesus gave, but I could not conceive of its being possible for them to put into the church the gifts of the Spirit without divine authority—only God could do that. So, I wanted to see a sign, that I might not be deceived. When I saw it, I was fully convinced.

Baptism and Confirmation

October 7, 1884, my brother Frank and I were baptized at a reunion at Garner's Grove in Harrison County by Elder John S. Roth. It was a beautiful day. It seemed to me that the sun never had shone so bright or the birds sung so sweet. When I was confirmed, the Holy Spirit came upon me from my head to my feet. I was covered by it as literally as I was immersed in water when Elder Roth baptized me. I had never experienced anything like it before. Truly I had been baptized "by the water and the Spirit," and had "risen to walk in newness of life." My other brothers were baptized about this time also.

Newness of Life

To walk in "newness of life" meant something to us. Not long after our baptism we were asked to furnish music for a dance, as we had done a good many times. Four of us played violins, and we also had a cello, which, with organ accompaniment, made a fairly sizable orchestra for a country community. We told them, much to their surprise, that we had joined the church and were neither dancing nor playing for dances any more. We felt that our lives should bear witness to the fact that we had put away things of the world and were truly concerned with building the kingdom of God. This was not an easy thing to do, for our associates were, as a rule, morally good young people. The dances in which we participated usually were small neighborhood gatherings at the farm homes.

A Difficult Task

One time I was put to the test of whether or not my resolution not to dance would stand. Brother Jim and I had gone to western Kansas with another young man to secure land by homesteading. While there Jim and the other young man took a job of building an addition to the hotel where we were boarding. When the job was nearing completion a dance was planned. Community dances were the most common social entertainment on the frontier in those days. All three of us boys played the violin and so were asked to furnish the music. Jim and I were members of the church, but the other young man was not a professing Christian. So we consented, recognizing the unusual circumstances. During the course of the evening I was asked by a fine young lady to join her in a dance. She and I had been classmates back home, and her family had settled on a homestead near the town of Kenneth where we were located. I thought that since we were so far from home the folks would not likely ever hear of it. I would dance just once. Notwithstanding she was a beautiful girl and a good dancer, I did not enjoy it one whit, for my conscience reprimanded me severely, saying, "Here you are, a member of the church, on the ballroom floor in a public dance! What if the home folks and the church should learn of it! And what does the Lord think of it?" I was glad when it was over, and I resolved that would be the last time such a thing should happen. And it was, for never again did I participate either by dancing or furnishing music for a dance. This adventure in homesteading in Kansas was in the spring of 1885. We filed on land but never proved up, and I disposed of my rights by selling out and applying the proceeds on expenses toward attending college.

Our first enrollment of membership in the church was with the branch at Galland's Grove, Shelby County, Iowa. The church building was about eight miles from our home. There were no automobiles in those days, and it was quite a long drive for a farm team of horses to make on Sunday after working hard in the field all the week. Consequently, we did not go so often as we should have liked but we managed to have services in Defiance occasionally when we could secure the use of one of the churches.

Teaching Experiences

Having obtained a certificate for teaching in the public schools of the county, I secured a school near Six Mile Grove east of Logan, Iowa. I went from Defiance, my home, to Portsmouth by train, then hired a horse and saddle and rode four miles to the home of a Mr. Baker, the subdirector who employed teachers. He told me that their school had rather a bad reputation. The boys had driven the teacher out the preceding winter, and they needed a physically strong man, as well as an intelligent one, to handle the big boys who had caused the discipline trouble. After looking me over he concluded I could fill the requirements, for I weighed a hundred eighty pounds. He gave me the contract, and I returned home—a certified country school teacher.

Having recently been baptized, I decided I would open my school session daily with a song and prayer. There were several young ladies enrolled, some nearly as tall as I but not so old. It required some courage to conduct the singing and stand before the penetrating gaze of those big girls and offer a prayer since I had never given a public prayer in my life. But my courage prevailed, and I gained the confidence and respect of my pupils; I had scarcely any difficulty in discipline. Thirty-one students attended this school which was built to accommodate twenty-four. I had classes from beginners through the eight grades. Some of the older girls wanted me to let them have a class in algebra, but I had to deny this as the required subjects took up my entire time.

Other Rural Schools

I did farm work in the summer. The following two winters I taught in Harrison County at the Gamet School, which I attended as a lad, and at the Beaman School near the home of my brother Jake. While teaching here I stayed with Jake's family, looking after his chores when he was away from home on church work. He did missionary work in the northwestern part of the state for a time, but his wife's poor health kept him from giving as much attention to ministerial work as he would have liked. He was presiding elder of the branch at Little Sioux, several miles from his home. He was zealous and eager to serve the church, but his wife's condition gradually grew worse, and after a number of years she died.

Another Important Decision

It was at this time that I made another important decision that gave direction to my future work. This decision was largely the result of a suggestion made by a missionary who had the interest of the boys at heart. One day Elder M. T. Short, who was holding services in Defiance and staying at our house, came out to where I was digging potatoes and began talking to me.

"Jerry, how are you planning to make a living?"

"Oh, I don't know. I have not decided."

"Why don't you go to college?"

"I couldn't."

"Why couldn't you? You have sufficient education to enter college."

"Maybe so, but I don't have the money."

"Couldn't your father help you?"

"No, he has a large family and a large mortgage. He has all he can possibly do without thinking of helping me to go to college."

"Did you know that you could work your way through college?"

"No, I didn't know that."

"Some schools offer opportunity for the student to work while he is attending college to pay for tuition and board."

"Could you give me the name of such a school?"

"You write to the Western Normal College, Shenandoah, Iowa, and ask for a catalog."

"I'll do that. It will be interesting to learn what is offered, but I doubt that I could ever arrange to go there."

"You can't tell until you try. If you want to go badly enough and will do all you can, the way might open. Think it over."

I did think it over. I got the catalog, studied it carefully, and began to plan. From my limited teaching experience I saw clearly the need for more education if I hoped to succeed in life. I saw that I might possibly finance a short business course of three months, which would qualify me as a bookkeeper and enable me to do accounting in a bank or some other business institution.

Upon finishing my third winter's term of school I decided to go to Shenandoah and take a twelve weeks' business course at the Western Normal College and Shenandoah Commercial Institute.

Problem of Tithing

In making preparation to do this I was confronted by a serious problem in regard to finances. I had united with the church and knew that under the gospel I should pay tithing. One tenth of all I possessed belonged to God, and I had no right to spend the Lord's money on myself or in any other way, but should pay it to the bishop of the church as the law provides. After a careful estimate of the value of my earthly possessions I found I owed $45.00 tithing. The problem was whether to use this amount to pay college expenses or my debt to the Lord. Figuring as carefully as I could and by practicing economy as strictly as possible—board at $1.75 a week and room rent at $0.50 a week—I would have scarcely enough to enable me to take the short business course. I decided to pay my debt to the Lord and with what I had left go to college trusting in God to help me through. As a result I not only stayed in college the twelve weeks contemplated, by the unexpected help of a friend who lent me money without interest, and the readiness of the college authorities to accept my note without security for a part of my other, I continued in school two whole years. Those years each consisted of forty-eight weeks of classwork, instead of the usual thirty-eight weeks. I obtained two diplomas, one for the degree of Bachelor of Science, and the other for Bachelor of Accounts. In addition I had taken the main subjects of the teachers' course. I was able to repay those who had extended credit to me without embarrassment—thanks to the Divine Father who is ever a "friend in need."

My decision to go to college was highly important, because as in the case with most young people, my going from home to attend college meant virtually taking final leave, for I never was home but for short visits afterwards. Immediately upon graduating I secured a country school near Shenandoah, where I taught the winter of 1888, followed by being called to Lamoni in March, 1889.

Introduction to the Fisher Family

Many interesting incidents might be related in connection with my two years in college, but I will only tell a few of them. The first Sunday after my arrival in Shenandoah, I went to services at the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church. I had been a member only a short while and, of course, desired to benefit by association with the church people. I felt that being a consistent member of the church and living according to the requirements of the gospel were of paramount importance. Upon leaving the church one Sunday morning to return to my room at the dormitory I had gone but a little way when a young lady overtook me and introduced herself as May Fisher. She said her brother Ed intended to invite me to go with them for dinner, but that he had been detained and asked her to deliver his invitation. Needless to say I was happy to accept, for I was a stranger. Besides I liked very much the appearance of the young lady. I enjoyed my first meeting with the Fisher family. There were the father, Lyman; mother, Sarah; eldest son, Edward; and twins, Myron and May. My first acquaintance with the family soon ripened into friendship, and I was a frequent guest in their home. Ed was near my own age and the twins were eight years younger. My first impressions of the daughter grew more and more favorable culminating within the two years of my continuance in college in an engagement to be married when I should succeed in reaching a point where I could support a wife and family.

Be Ye Temperate

By Lottie Clarke Diggle

PETER ENUMERATES the qualifications for righteousness, giving temperance fourth place (II Peter 1:5, 6). A year previous to the organization of the church a revelation was given which repeats this instruction almost word for word.

Paul urges that every man who strives for mastery be temperate in all things, adding, "But I keep under my body and bring it into subjection."—I Corinthians 9:27.

To the average reader the word "temperance" has a very narrow meaning. Temperance, total abstinence, and prohibition are words misapplied by the general public to mean the curtailment of liberty or criticism of freedom of choice in regard to drinking alcoholic beverages.

To be accounted temperate a person should be moderate, calm, cool, measured, and abstemious, according to Webster. Virtues may become akin to vices, and overdone benevolences may cause grievous bodily harm if carried to excess.

It is possible that even the divine purpose of prayer may be frustrated if carried to excess. A mother told of the daily half-hour prayer of her highland Scot father while his patient wife and their eight children knelt on the hard, cold floor. "We hated it, but we daren't move," she declared bitterly. That entire family grew up with a dislike for prayer and with irreverence for all things religious. One of our ministers tells of the assisting elder who prayed at great length, going into minute detail about things pertaining to the gospel. When he finally gave the scheduled speaker his belated opportunity, the missionary rose to his feet and said, "Brother Blank has preached my sermon for me. There is nothing left for me to say." And he sat down.

Surely the acquisition of knowledge would not lead to intemperance, yet recently I was told of a brilliant young law student whose personality was completely warped. His one interest was in his studies, to the neglect of courtesy, fellowship, culture, and personal appearance.

Occasionally there is a housewife who neglects her home and family to attend lectures and classes, and follow other literary pursuits. There is also the mother whose overcleanliness and general fussiness makes home a place to avoid. Most people know a household where tiny hands must not get dirty and little dresses must be kept spotless, where cushions have never known the dent of a weary head, and where even books must not be thumb marked. Blessed are the husband and children who live in a home where cleanliness, order, and discipline are neither underdone nor overstressed. "Someone might come," or "What will people think?" spurs many a misguided mother to continual effort—"questitis," if I may coin a word.

REAMS COULD BE WRITTEN about individuals who work to excess, who impair health, lose friends, neglect their families, or their service to humanity for no other purpose than a gluttony for work. Man earns his living by the sweat of his brow. He may work overtime for the satisfaction of creating something, do extra chores for love of wife and family, or give countless hours to church and community. All these may be termed legitimate avenues of effort, but the man who has never learned to relax and who labors to the limit of time and strength during all his waking hours, working for work's sake, is guilty of intemperance.

Paul wrote, "The love of money is the root of all evil." The sin is not in earning or acquiring sufficient for one's needs and just wants. The Lord does not expect his people to be undernourished, unbecomingly clad, or uncomfortably housed. He encourages higher education and cultural opportunities. On the other hand, the Saints are admonished to settle their indebtedness by the payment of one tenth of their increase and also to contribute offerings and give surplus. The people of God are not supposed to grind down the poor with a low scale of wages, to put money out to usury, nor to gamble in stocks and commodities. Riches and righteousness seldom walk together.

In "Admonition" the Saints are told, "If you would be rich, be holy." Children of the very rich and very poor are to be pitied because the first are usually overindulged and the latter are apt to become embittered or tempted beyond endurance.

SOME YEARS AGO a survey of delinquency was made in the city of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. The highest percentage of delinquency was found in a district where approximately one third of the children came from wealthy homes and two thirds from underprivileged homes. The lowest delinquency percentage was found to be in a locality where practically all the residents were in the average income bracket.

Why members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union do not delete or change the word "temperance" when they believe in total abstinence is beyond the comprehension of many people. When one considers the large proportion of confirmed alcoholics and the fact that even one drink will slow a driver's reaction and impair his vision, it is small wonder that the children of righteousness scoff at the moderate drinking propaganda of the liquor interests.

There can scarcely be a middle road for Reorganized Latter Day Saints in their attitude toward the tobacco habit since its use not only is condemned in the Word of Wisdom, but is habit forming. It endangers life and property from fire, wastes vast sums of money, and injures the nerves, brain, and organs of the body.

Overeating is another intemperance of the people of Canada and the United States who have the highest standard of living in the world. Added to the iniquitous waste is the danger of obesity, a condition dreaded by both women and men. There is a growing custom in the Prairie Provinces of Canada to serve only one item of food at an afternoon or evening function. It lessens expense, prevents jealousy and competition, and promotes health and good looks.

Again we are told, "Whoso lusteth after pleasure, though he gain the world is poor." There are so many simple joys available to all—hoarfrost on the trees on a sunlit morning, the run and pause of a robin on the lawn, the cozy warmth as one returns home on a bitterly cold day, the happy smile of a little child, the smell of burning leaves or home-baked bread, and the satisfaction of doing a good turn.

One need not drink, dance, play canasta, be a habitual movie-goer, or follow other doubtful and costly pleasures to find happiness. When a Saint considers the aftermath of excesses—physical, moral, social, and spiritual—he must conclude that the game is hardly worth the candle. The struggle between desire and obedience is hard and sometimes long drawn out, but when a decision comes at length to make the sacrifice, one finds that there has been no sacrifice because God's way is, after all, the way to abundant life.

Question Time

Question:

1. When we see seemingly good people suffering, and they are not healed by administration we often wonder why. Does I Corinthians 11: 28-30 have any bearing on this, or does it refer to spiritual experiences? It seems hard for me to believe that the condemnation spoken of as following the partaking of the Lord's Supper unworthily is all to be in the hereafter. Our minds and our attitudes seem to affect our physical well-being far more than we realize.

Missouri

Mrs. W. H.

Answer:

Most of us wonder why seemingly good people are not always healed by administration. But none of us know about the condition of other souls. The words "seemingly good people" cover a great many conditions of which we are not aware. Paul was not healed of a physical handicap. We must list him among the good men.

Only in the last few years have I been able to administer to men and women without thinking to myself anything about their personal worthiness. For many times, had I been the Lord, I would have paid no attention to them. Yet I have seen many of these individuals healed miraculously. Others I thought entirely worthy of immediate blessings have failed to receive these blessings. I have come to the view that it is none of my business whom the Lord heals. My business is to present the goodness of God to the individual and the needs of the individual to God. It is entirely his business as to whom he confers a blessing.

Perhaps many have lost sight of the part in the administration to the sick which talks of the forgiveness of sins. The Scripture indicates that if approached in proper manner, forgiveness of sins accompanies the laying on of hands in this ordinance of the church. This sense of the forgiveness of sins and of the individual's oneness or communion with God has much to do with his recovery. To feel that we are in tune with the powers that created the universe is a healthful and restoring force and has much to do with healing. The sense of our union with God speeds our recovery.

DAN B. SORDEN

Question:

2. Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2 says, "My people must needs be chastened until they learn obedience, if it must needs be, by the things which they suffer." Does this apply to the physical life of individuals or to the spiritual blessings and the church in general?

Missouri

Mrs. W. H.

Answer:

I believe this quotation applies to the physical and the spiritual blessings, both in individual and in the collective life of the church. Each individual must learn of the wonder and glory of the way of Christ. Some learn this with less and some with more suffering. It does seem that no one learns to live the good life without some mistakes. These mistakes invariably bring suffering. This is a physical thing in personal relationships; it is also emotional and spiritual.

Then, too, the realization that we have missed so much of what we might have had brings mental, emotional, and spiritual illness to our souls. We may in time find that, as with Paul, "It is hard for us to kick against the pricks," and thereby learn obedience.

Question:

In the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon, Book of Ether, page 540, paragraph 2, line 7, the Brother of Jared and his families are mentioned. The Utah edition of the Book of Mormon reads the same as the 1830 edition. In the Reorganized Church edition there has been a change made in the wording and the word "family" is substituted for "families." Why should these editions differ?

Missouri

D.V.L.

Answer:

The 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon was printed by a small town printer. Comparatively speaking, it was an excellent piece of work. However, errors in copying from the original manuscript were many. Some of these errors were reprinted in later editions. The Utah editors of the Book of Mormon continue to follow the text of the 1830 edition, which was incorrect in this paragraph. The Reorganized Church has corrected its more recent editions to harmonize with the text of the "original manuscript" of the Book of Mormon which it possesses.

The 1830 edition reads, page 540, Book of Ether:

And it came to pass that the Lord did hear the brother of Jared, and had compassion upon him, and said unto him, Go to and gather together thy flocks, both male and female, of every kind; and also the seed of the earth of every kind, and thy families; and also Jared thy brother and his family . . .

The "original manuscript" which is in the possession of the Reorganized Church reads, "thy family." Therefore, this sentence has been corrected in the more recent editions of the Book of Mormon published by the Reorganized Church, Book of Ether, chapter 1, paragraph 16.

JOHN BLACKMORE

Question:

Since you teach that the gift of tongues belongs to your church, if I become a member will I be able to speak with a new tongue?

Michigan

J.R.G.

Answer:

There are perhaps a dozen or more spiritual gifts, including that of tongues, mentioned as belonging to the church of the New Testament. The Lord again set them in the church he established in 1830. (See Doctrine and Covenants 46: 4-7.) In both ancient and modern Scripture it is definitely stated that these gifts are given of God, being distributed according to his will. They are varied in nature and are adaptable to persons of various qualities or natures. The Lord alone determines what gift, when and how each person is to receive, thus fulfilling his purpose in providing for the whole church the fullest measure of benefit possible according to qualification and need. The church can promise no particular gift to any member, only that the gifts of the Spirit are available and that they are dependent upon the faithfulness, diligence, and spiritual preparation of the members as to their reception of them. The best gifts, like knowledge and wisdom, are the least spectacular.

OUR CHURCH has been divinely favored, having been entrusted with the Inspired Translation of the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants. We believe that other sacred writings (books) will also be committed to us. Are we appreciative of the rich treasures of knowledge the heavens have so graciously bestowed? The books are a precious heritage. Are we prizing, as we should, our membership in the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints? This is the organization which will be entrusted with, and give to the world, the holy writings, messages of truth, that are to be made known in this generation.

PROPHECIES CONSIDERED

Extending over a long period, historically and prophetically, the First Book of Nephi is of unusual interest and profit to all careful readers. Writing of the sacred records yet to be revealed, the prophet Nephi says:

And also others who have been, to them hath he shown all things, and they have written them; and they are sealed up to come forth in their purity according to the truth which is in the Lamb, in the own due time of the Lord, unto the house of Israel.—I Nephi 3: 249, 250.

The paragraphs quoted refer to writings "sealed up," of great importance to future generations. They are to come forth in "their purity" in "the own due time of the Lord, unto the house of Israel." Members of this church become latter-day Israel by obeying its laws of adoption, as well as the many members who are Israel by lineage. We should appreciate the statement, ". . . and also others who have been . . ." referring to prophets who lived and wrote extensively before Nephi's time, and the fact that their wonderful writings will be revealed by the Lord's direction.

Interest in the subject should increase with the reading of the following:

Touch not the things which are sealed, for I will bring them forth in mine own due time; for I will shew unto the children of men, that I am able to do mine own work. Wherefore, when thou hast read the words which I have commanded thee [the published Book of Mormon], and obtained the witnesses which I have promised unto thee, then shalt thou seal up the book again, and hide it up unto me [it was delivered up to Moroni for safekeeping], that I may preserve the words which thou hast not read, until I shall see fit in mine own wisdom to reveal all things unto the children of men. For behold, I am God; and I am a God of miracles; and I will show unto the world that I am the same yesterday, today, and forever; and that I work not among the children of men, save it be according to their faith.—II Nephi 11: 143-145.

Here mention is made of two records or books. We have one of them—the Book of Mormon—but an addition to it, or separate companion volume, is positively promised. Following that event, God will demonstrate his power in a manner not witnessed before in this generation, as well as revealing "all things unto the children of men." The closing sentence, ". . . I work not among the children of men, save it be according to their faith," is expressive as to time and faith of the church. I am pleased to say that after many years of travel and observation, as an officer and minister, I believe the members of this church are growing in faith and favor with God, preparing for greater obligations coming to them when the "all things" are revealed.

This subject was also spoken of by the prophet Mormon centuries after Nephi wrote. He said:

And when they shall have received this [the present Book of Mormon], which is expedient that they should have first, to try their faith, and if it shall so be that they shall believe these things, then shall the greater things be made manifest unto them. And if it so be that they will not believe these things, then shall the greater things be withheld from them, unto their condemnation. Behold I were about to write them all which were engraven upon the plates of Nephi, but the Lord forbid it, saying, I will try the faith of my people; therefore I, Mormon, do write the things which have been commanded me of the Lord.—III Nephi 12: 3-5.

We have "received this," the part we call the Book of Mormon, which we "should have first to try" our faith, and after observing the teachings found therein, "then shall the greater things be made manifest unto" us. Thus and in this way it shall be done.

In support of this I should like to quote all of Ether 1, paragraphs 82-93—but space forbids. Of the divine promises made by the writer, Mormon, the safekeeping and future use of the "two stones" or interpreters which we often call the Urim and Thummim are assured. One statement is "Wherefore I will cause in mine own due time that these stones shall magnify to the eyes of men, these things which ye shall write. And when the Lord had said these words, he showed unto the Brother of Jared . . ." in visions, great events to come upon the earth, even to the end of the world, with instruction to "write these things and seal them up, and I will show them unto the children of men." And now, if repetition of a promise adds interest and significance to a subject, I believe the reader may expect that this church may soon have additional holy writings as an intellectual and spiritual guide in preparation for the promised millennium.

Students of the Book of Mormon will remember that the prophet Moroni did not have many educational privileges, owing to the great wars that he and his father, the prophet Mormon, were forced to take part in during his early life. After Moroni's death the Lord directed Moroni to write historical events, also experiences and spiritual manifestations. In humility Moroni said:

Lord, the Gentiles will mock at these things, because of our weakness in writing; for Lord thou hast made us mighty in word by faith, but thou hast not made us mighty in writing; for thou hast made all this people that they could speak much, because of the Holy Ghost which thou hast given them; and thou hast made us that we could write but little, because of the awkwardness of our hands. Behold, thou hast not made us mighty in writing like unto the Brother of Jared, for thou madest him that the things which he wrote, were mighty even as thou art, unto the overpowering of man to read them.—Ether 5: 23-25.

This language reassures us that of the several ancient prophets' writings we are to have, the contribution of the Brother of Jared will be an especially great and lasting blessing to the church and the world, for his words are "mighty even as thou [the Lord] art, unto the overpowering of man to read them." The reading of his message will revive the faith of members as well as help to convince nonmembers that our claims as a church are true and divine. In the language of an apostle of today, "Happy is the man, happy is the woman that has membership in the Reorganized Church, for great events await them."

WHEN WILL THE BALANCE OF THE PLATES BE REVEALED?

A careful reading of II Nephi 11: 127-130 will help solve the problem of who is to receive the metallic plates for translation. Continuing the investigation, we quote:

Wherefore, because of the things which are sealed up [in the stone box], the things which are sealed [within the stone box] shall not be delivered [for translation] in the day of wickedness and abominations of the people. Wherefore the book [sealed plates] shall be kept from them.

Peradventure there are some still claiming that "wickedness and abominations of the people" refers to any and all transgressors of state and national laws, and that the coveted record will not be returned for translation until the millennium. We answer that if such a position were true, the divine mission of the book would be largely defeated; and no amount of explanation could fully apologize for the writers already quoted who assure us that it will have a large and much needed mission to fill in this present world of sin.

Three college professors, not members of the Reorganized Church, after careful study of II Nephi 11: 127, 128, regarding certain metallic plates, made written replies. The two verses with bracket explanation reads: "Wherefore, because of the things which are sealed up [to be unsealed and translated during present restoration gospel dispensation] shall not be delivered in the day [or time] of wickedness and abomination of the people," which "people," as a religious organization, violated the pure moral teachings of the Book of Mormon. "Wherefore the book [sealed plates] shall be kept from them." These three college men wrote that the word "them" of verse 128 refers to the "people" of the preceding verse—"shall be kept from them," who believed in "the wickedness and abomination" defined in the Book of Mormon. Therefore we have faith that the First Presidency of the Reorganized Church will in due time, under God, be entrusted with the promised "sealed" metallic "plates," most truly a prized heritage in keeping with the divine missions of the angel Moroni and the prophet Joseph Smith.

The Reorganized Church, which is the true church of Latter Day Saints in succession from 1830, has kept inviolate the teachings of the Three Standard Books bequeathed to it by Joseph Smith, the Seer, in 1844, never forfeiting its sacred trust by introducing or sanctioning erroneous doctrines, harmful to the morale of its membership. The church has also recognized and strongly advocated the law of lineage in the chief presiding offices and prophetic leadership. We believe this church to be in direct line for ministration of the angel Moroni, when he is instructed to deliver the sacred plates and the Urim and Thummim.

This is the season of the year to begin thinking about filing your inventory and getting ready to keep your accounts for the next year.

Christmas Candlelighting Service

Soft musical background (organ, piano, or recordings)

First reader: ¹"And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus, that all his empire should be taxed. And all went to be taxed, every one into his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, unto Judea, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem; (because he was of the house and lineage of David) to be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, she being great with child. And so it was, that while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. And she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inns.

"And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over² their flock by night. And lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you; Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us.

"And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger. And when they had seen it, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning the child. And all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds. But Mary kept all these things and pondered them in her heart. And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them."

Solo: "O Holy Night"

³"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east and are come to worship him. When Herod the king had heard these things, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him. And when he had gathered all the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ should be born. And they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judea, for thus it is written by the prophet, And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda; for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel.⁴ Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared. And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go search diligently for the young child, and when ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also.

"When they had heard the king, they departed; and lo, the star, which they saw in the east went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down, and worshipped him; and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh."—Matthew 2: 1-11.

Solo: "Silvery Star," Saints' Hymnal, No. 148.

Second Reader: ⁵"Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love. In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him."—I John 4: 7-9.

First Reader: First and foremost is love. Let this candle represent the pure love of God. (Lights first candle.)

"Second Reader:

O love of God that fills our hearts with joy,

O love that fills our souls with blessed peace,

We seek thy presence now, as ne'er before;

Dwell thou with us 'til strivings all shall cease,

'Til selfishness and hatred are o'ercome, And all men work together, hand in hand.

O heavenly love, abide with us we pray, 'Til peace shall dwell throughout this chosen land.

O love of God that bringeth peace untold,

O love that cheers the weary day by day, Come thou, abide with us forevermore That we may share with others on our way;

That we may lift another's heavy load, Nor feel the weight of it for joy within, That we may righteous be, yet merciful,

That we may see the sinner—not his sin.
O peace of God that casteth out all fear,
O peace that out of chaos order brings,
Reward of righteousness, we cherish thee, Reward that cometh from the King of kings.

O may we serve and love and ready be
To give our lives that other men might live,
To bring God's holy kingdom to the earth,
That peace to all men, freely, he might give.

First Reader: "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you."
The spirit of divine peace and joy are always at hand; give yourself in loving service, and the peace of God is yours. Fill your soul with the love of God, and the spirit of divine joy is yours. Let these candles represent our souls' striving for the peace and joy that surpasseth understanding.
(Lights candles number two and three.)

Second Reader:

If you have a friend worth loving,
Love him. Yes, and let him know
That you love him, ere life's evening
Tinge his brow with sunset glow.
Why should good words ne'er be said
Of a friend—'til he is dead?
If you see the hot tears falling

Second Reader:

From a brother's weeping eyes.
Share them. And by kindly sharing
Own your kinship in the skies.
Why should anyone be glad
When a brother's heart is sad?
Scatter thus your seeds of kindness
All enriching as you go—
Leave them. Trust the harvest giver;
He will make each seed to grow.
So, until the happy end,
Your life shall never lack a friend.

First Reader: Because he loved us, God gave to us the gift of friendship. There are many souls who need a kind word and the smile of a worth-while friend. Let this candle represent the spirit of Friendship.

Second Reader:

Give and thou shalt receive. Give thoughts of cheer,
Of courage, and success, to friend and stranger;
And from a thousand sources, far and near,
Strength will be sent thee in thy hour of danger.
Give words of comfort, of defense and hope,
To mortals crushed by sorrow and by error;
And though thy feet through shadowy paths may grope,
Thou shalt not walk in loneliness or terror.
Give of thy gold, though small thy portion be.
Gold rots and shrivels in the hand that keeps it;
It grows in one that opens wide and free.
Who sows his harvest is the one that reaps it.
Give of thy love, nor wait to know the worth
Of what thou lovest; and ask no returning;
And wheresoe'er thy pathway leads on earth,
There thou shalt find the lamp of love-light burning.

First Reader: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." Let the spirit of giving so fill our beings that we in turn will want to give unreservedly our hearts to him.⁹ Let this candle represent the spirit of giving. (Lights fifth candle.)

Second Reader:

Christian, lo, the star appeareth;
Lo, 'tis yet Messiah's day;
Still with tribute treasure laden
Come the wise men on their way.
Where life is spent in service
Walking where the Master trod,
There is scattered myrrh most fragrant

For the blessed Christ of God,
Whoso bears his brother's burden,
Whoso shares another's woe,
Brings his frankincense to Jesus
With the men of long ago.
'Tis the Lord himself we worship,
Bringing gold to Bethlehem,
Christian, lo, the star appeareth
Leading still the ancient way;
Christian, onward with your treasure;
It is still Messiah's day.

—James A. Blaisdell

10First Reader: Our joy is found in the inner peace we receive from loving service. May this candle symbolize the spirit of loving service.

May the spirits of love, joy, peace, friendship, giving, and loving service permeate the souls of all mankind at this joyous Christmastide.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

Shall We Dance?

By Alice Crossan

WELL, LINDA," smiled Aunt Betty, taking a handful of oatmeal cookies from the red-apple cooky jar on top of the refrigerator and reaching for a plate, "What's new at school today?"

Aunt Betty poured a glass of milk, pulled up the kitchen stool, and sat down beside the hungry girl.

Linda sighed. She took a cooky, reached for her glass of milk, and dropped her eyes. "Oh, nothing much," she said after a minute, "only—I'm a junior this year, Aunt Betty, and the juniors always have a prom in May. I don't know. . . . I'm worried."

She felt relieved the moment the words were out. Aunt Betty was a good listener. She was wonderful—for her age. She must be thirty-five at least. She wasn't really Linda's Aunt Betty, but she was the kind of aunt Linda would have chosen if she could have made a choice. Aunt Betty was married, but she had no children, and not even any nieces or nephews.

"Why don't you tell me all about it?" invited Aunt Betty.

"Well . . . you know what the prom is like," the words rushed out. "It's just lovely. All the girls get new formals and have flowers and everything, and we hire a real orchestra. There's dinner first. We're having it at the Inn. And we'll have the whole place to ourselves all evening. We're going to dance, of course," she added.

"Sounds delightful," smiled Aunt Betty.

"Oh, I'll just die if I can't go," cried Linda, encouraged. "Aunt Betty, you'll have to talk to my mother about it. She'll never let me go. And if I'm the only one not there, what will all the others think? Everyone will go except me. WOULD you talk to mother, Aunt Betty? Please? I'd always love you."

THE AFTERNOON SUN shone through the bright curtains above Aunt Betty's head and made her light hair gleam. She's so pretty, thought Linda, with mild astonishment. I'd think she'd want to go out more herself. She never goes anywhere but to church.

"You've already mentioned it to your mother?" asked Aunt Betty.

"No, I haven't. You know mother. She'd preach to me for hours and hours about why I shouldn't even want to go."

"Well, then," Aunt Betty continued, "We won't need to go into all that. You must know a lot of good reasons for not going."

Linda gave a big sigh. "Oh, sure, I know them all—bad company, you might take a drink, you might learn to smoke, maybe somebody from church would see you and be shocked. Honestly, Aunt Betty, those are the silliest reasons. I'd never do those things—doesn't my mother trust me? She treats me like a child!"

"When I was in college," said Aunt Betty reflectively, "I took one of those basic courses in psychology—we had lots of them, but this one I remember especially because it was my first. You know what, Linda? When people get to be about your age, their mental growth is practically complete. You haven't had as much experience, but you can learn just as much and just as well right now as you'll be able to in ten or twenty years. Isn't that interesting? Nobody should treat you like a child. Agreed?"

Linda took another cooky and nodded. "Agreed," she said. "But look, Aunt Betty, you're getting off the subject. You don't want to talk to mother—that's it. And I thought you were my friend."

Aunt Betty looked serious for a moment. "Yes," she said, "I'll talk to your mother. But I won't try to influence her into letting you go. I'll just suggest to her that she should let you make up your own mind about going."

"Oh, mother won't do that. She'll say no. I just know she will. You're my only hope, Aunt Betty. Mother believes dancing is harmful, and that's that. I have to do whatever my mother believes. I've told her over and over that things are different now. Everyone goes to proms and things like that. Why, dancing is just good exercise . . . and fun."

"That may be so, Linda. You know all the arguments in favor of dancing."

"Well, I can see the other side of it, and mother can't. It just isn't any problem to her. But gee, Aunt Betty, if I can't go, what will I tell the kids? I can't say my church doesn't believe in proms. They'd think I was from the Dark Ages."

AUNT BETTY glanced at the clock and began to peel a pan of apples. She worked silently for a while, and Linda sat looking gloomily at her own dusty green and white saddle shoes.

Finally Aunt Betty looked up, and her face was serious, now. "Linda, that's a good point," she said. "You can't say our church doesn't believe in proms, because we don't have any commandments at all about dancing. Remember what I just said about your intelligence?"

Isn't it wonderful that God has left the whole thing to your own good judgment? He isn't telling you what to do. He's trusting you to find the right answer yourself. Your mother may not trust you, but God does. That's quite a responsibility, isn't it? You know, I've never thought of that before. If I talk to your mother, that's what I'll say. I'll tell her that God has trusted you to make up your own mind, and she should do the same. Would that help?"

"I don't know," Linda said doubtfully. "If you do that, my chances of going still aren't very good."

"I think it's up to you," Aunt Betty repeated. "This is one of the first big decisions of your life. It really is important what you choose. You know both sides of it—think about it, and pray about it."

Linda stood and picked up her books. "History test tomorrow," she grinned ruefully. "I've been so busy with Shakespeare I haven't had time for history."

Aunt Betty smiled over the peelings. "Forgive me," she said, "but there's a parallel there, and I just can't pass it by. I won't explain. I'll bet you see it too."

Linda walked to the door and turned to smile back. "Yes, I see it. You're a regular philosopher today, Mrs. Brooks. Thanks for the cookies, and I'll let you know what develops."

SHE WENT DOWN THE STEPS with a hop, skip, and jump, and crossed the street.

That night Linda decided to follow Aunt Betty's advice. She would pray about the prom, and God would make her decision for her. She would fast and pray—that should bring about a quick heavenly response. She went into the dining room to find her mother. The cake cover was sitting on the dining room table, and she lifted the cover with interest. "Oh, goody," she exclaimed in a little girl voice, "chocolate-coconut cake for dessert. My favorite." Then she remembered that she had planned to fast tonight. Gee, what will I do? she thought. And then she quickly made up her mind to give up the cake tonight—there would be plenty left tomorrow, anyway.

At dinner her father talked about the new tax and how much was being held out of his pay check, and her mother listened quietly, agreeing now and then with these dry remarks her husband made. Linda sat down to eat with the family, but she planned only to drink a little water and push the food around on her plate. But she had not reckoned with her little brother.

"What's the matter with Linda? She's not eatin'," said Joe, looking at her curiously.

Linda's mother glanced at her plate. "Pass her some cauliflower," she said.

"I'm not hungry," Linda protested.

Linda's mother was not one to worry about diet eccentricities. She maintained that no child ever starved himself to death. She accepted the fact, and began to serve the cake.

Gosh, thought Linda, nobody could fast in this house! I'll just have some cake. And she took two pieces. After all, she could pray just as well without fasting.

Climbing into bed later she remembered her prayer, but she was very sleepy. She began it, then her mind wandered, and she went to sleep thinking of the kind of dress she would like to have and how she would look at the prom.

Next morning she again thought of the prayer, and realized guiltily that she had not finished it. Well, she thought, this is a decision for me to make, anyhow. I don't really need help.

IN THE DAYS THAT FOLLOWED, Linda discovered that Aunt Betty had kept her word and had talked to her mother about the prom. She was overjoyed when her mother agreed the decision was up to Linda herself. She might make her own choice in the matter, but only after considering it carefully.

The prom was on Linda's mind every waking minute. For awhile she wavered, but the more she thought about it, the more certain she was that she would go. She did not know how to dance well, but she was not worried about this. Her classmates had promised to help her. Besides, the boys themselves were not good dancers.

"It's so nice you can go," said Sally Marshall, president of the class. "You said you were afraid your mother wouldn't let you go. It must be awful to have stuffy parents. I was afraid you wouldn't get them to see the light."

Linda bought her dress the week before the prom. It was pale blue taffeta with a billowy overskirt, and it was the most beautiful dress she had ever worn. In her own room before bed she put it on every night. It seemed to her that she had never looked so pretty.

What can be wrong with dancing, she thought, when it makes me this happy? I'm sure the whole thing has been exaggerated by a bunch of suspicious old people. I've known Tommy for three years. There can't possibly be anything wrong with going to a dance with him.

The night of the prom Linda could not swallow a mouthful of food. Her heart was fluttering around in her stomach, and her hands were moist with nervousness. She laid out her finery before dinner—the pale blue dress, the thin nylons, the silvery sandals. The moment she was excused from the table she ran upstairs to dress.

While she was getting into her dress, her mother came into the room. Linda was too excited to see the sad lines in her mother's face.

Tommy arrived on schedule with flowers, and her parents watched her as she pinned them to her shoulder before the hall mirror. Then they were running down the steps to Tommy's father's car, which stood gleaming at the end of the walk.

The whole evening was like an adventure in fairyland. Linda found she could dance as well as the other girls, and she always had a different partner. Like Cinderella, she found twelve o'clock had come before she realized it. She was walking toward the car with Tommy, then, and they were on their way home.

"I really enjoyed this evening," Linda said sincerely, settling herself in the seat. "Wasn't it fun? I've never had such a good time!"

Tommy turned carefully into the line of traffic. "Me either, Linda," he said. Then in a puzzled voice he added, "Say, all the fellows thought you were a pretty smooth dancer. How come? You never go to any of the regular Saturday night dances. Sally said your folks were religious and wouldn't let you go to dances."

Linda was embarrassed and angry with Sally for telling. Now everyone in school would know she couldn't go to the regular dances because of her old-fashioned family. She was trying to think of a reply when Tommy spoke again.

"I've heard about your church," he said. "I was reading about Joseph Smith one time . . . about praying in the woods and all that. It was interesting. You'll have to tell me about it sometime."

"I can't tell you much," Linda said lamely. "Brother Wood knows all the details, though. He's our pastor. Say . . ." she was eager to change the topic, "how'd you like those finger bowls we had at our table? George was going to drink from his!" And she laughed merrily at George's expense.

TOMMY DROVE CAREFULLY, and afterward people couldn't believe it. As they turned toward town, a car without lights suddenly loomed up before them in the road. There was no time to stop, and rather than drive head-on into the car, Tommy ducked off the road. Their car turned over and lay with its lights still on, in the deep ditch. When Linda regained consciousness, she was told that Tommy had been killed.

In the weeks that followed, Tommy's school friends recovered from the shock of sudden death and ceased talking about it in whispered awe. But Linda found she could not forget. She could not talk to her mother, who was bitter about the whole thing. She began to feel that Tommy's death had been her own fault, and her feelings of guilt made her dream violent, terrifying dreams, in which the car was turning over and over and Tommy was screaming to her for help which she could not give.

All her friends were talking about other things now, and she was shut off from her parents. There was no one to talk to! She felt, at last, that she could stand the silence and the fears no longer, and in spite of her shame, she stopped in after school one evening to see Aunt Betty.

She had planned what to say—she was going to talk in a nice, calm, adult way, but the moment Aunt Betty opened the kitchen door her plans crumbled and she burst into sobs.

"Oh, Aunt Betty, there's no one to talk to, and I've done such a terrible thing—I've killed Tommy. It was all my fault. Mother blames me for everything, and so does everyone else. What'll I do?"

Aunt Betty let her cry until she was finished. Then she brought a chair, and took out their usual glasses of milk and home-baked cookies. She smiled to see that Linda's grief had not damaged her appetite.

"I wish you would tell me all about it," invited Aunt Betty.

The words poured out—all the glamour of the evening, which she had not been able to tell to anyone, the sudden horror of the accident, the sickness as she herself regained consciousness a day later, the shocked silence of the kids at school whenever she appeared, the frightening dreams that seemed to go on and on, night after night.

"It was God's way of punishing me," Linda said, "I knew I was doing the wrong thing—now it's my fault that Tommy is dead."

"Linda, you can't blame yourself for the accident," Aunt Betty reproved. "Tommy might have been killed whether you were with him or not. He would probably have gone anyhow."

"There was something he said that I keep remembering all the time," Linda confessed. "He said he'd been reading about my church. He wanted to know more about it. He seemed to know I shouldn't be going to dances when I belonged to the church."

Aunt Betty was troubled, but she was thinking how to help Linda. Finally she smiled a little, and looked up again.

"Remember our talk a long time ago—about making decisions?" she asked. Linda nodded.

"Well, you made yours. You did something you didn't feel right about doing. It might not have been a sin, yet if you felt it was wrong, it was wrong for you. But God doesn't punish us by taking away those we love. He has a wiser plan than that. Let's think, instead, that Tommy was needed there more than he was needed here. You weren't to blame for his death, but you were to blame for not doing more for him while you had the chance. You might have done a great deal for Tommy that would have made things easier for him. Instead, you chose fun and frivolity. As a member of the church you can do much for your friends. You can do things that we older people cannot do. That's part of your responsibility, and you know it. You feel guilty because you know you should have been doing better things with your time. But this is the first time you've made a serious mistake. We can't always know the right thing to do—but we can always ask for guidance. God sends us light as we need it. Even our ministers are given more understanding as they go on with God's work."

"I didn't think about it that way," Linda admitted. "I guess I didn't try very hard to get help with my problem. All the time I was really working to get my own way."

Aunt Betty looked thoughtful. "I think I was wrong, too, Linda," she confessed. "I might have told you all this sooner . . . so you see, all of us make these mistakes. But this one will never happen to us again, will it? Next time we'll both be wiser."

"That's right, Aunt Betty," agreed Linda. "I think I see it now. Many of the things we do are not actually harmful or wicked, but there are so many really good things we could be doing with our time that it's a shame to waste what little we have doing unnecessary things."

They drank the last of their milk and finished the cookies on the plate. Then Linda picked up her books.

At the door she paused and looked back. "You can expect me at the next League meeting," she said in a firm voice. And then she smiled broadly. "We'll have to make it special. I'm going to ask Sally Marshall to come with me."

* A TALE OF HEROES

Recently we had an invitation from Apostle George Mesley and Sister Mesley to accompany them to a showing of a British documentary film, "Scott of the Antarctic," starring John Mills. So excellent the artistry, so true the work, one could hardly remember that the people were actors presenting a story. It seemed like the real thing.

The vast frozen wastes, formidable mountain ranges, treacherous glaciers, and the brilliant Aurora Australis are presented in beautiful color photography, forming a mighty background for the tiny human figures that play out their story to its tragic end.

The expedition of Captain Robert F. Scott into the Antarctic in 1911-12 ended in death. There was disappointment, too, in the fact that Amundsen's expedition reached the South Pole first, drawing public attention from the fact that Scott's was a serious scientific expedition, and making it appear as a mere race. With four others, Scott reached the pole on January 18, 1912, only to find Amundsen's flag already planted there. They turned homeward in a storm of terrible intensity. Two died on the way. Finally, only eleven miles from their base, Scott and his two companions perished for lack of food and fuel, shortly after he made the final notes in his diary. A rescue party from the base found them in their little tent.

To Amundsen goes the credit for discovering the Pole and for other brilliant feats of exploration. To Scott and his party will go a different kind of glory for courage and fortitude, self-sacrifice, and devotion.

Not many can stand to see this kind of film. The audience was small. One couldn't say he enjoyed it, because death isn't fun. But this is something one could never forget. To see brave and good men die gives a chill to the soul no fire can warm. There is in raw, primeval nature a relentless ferocity, a kind of malevolence like the heart of evil itself. There is no mercy in the cold or heat of the universe. It is as if they were a sentient power, hating human life.

A tribute to the actors for splendidly sincere work: no mugging, no mock-heroics, no pathos, no "passion torn to tatters," no battering of courage and fear with the eyebrows; no "romantic element" except the love of a good man for his wife, and hers for him, remembered in tenderness to the last breathing moment. Just men—men against the storm—men struggling to their doom in the darkness of antarctic night.

Everywhere in life you will find mixtures of truth and error, and great difficulty to know which is which. And one of your troubles will be that if you reject an error you may also be denying the truth.

Let your words agree with your thoughts, or your thoughts will cry to the world, "This man lies!" It is not enough to change the words. We must improve our thoughts.

There is nothing that people can enjoy in slavery that will not bring greater happiness in freedom.

Velma Ruch

IN September, 1946, Velma Ruch became a member of the English department at Graceland College. This year she is teaching classes in communication and English literature. There are many Graceland alums who can recall the inspiration of her classes in which she correlates the philosophies of the great writers with some of the basic principles of religion.

Velma's mother and father are both active members of the church. Elder Ruch has been under church appointment for about thirty years and has served the church in Norway; Tulsa, Oklahoma; and Council Bluffs, Iowa, where he is at the present time. Velma was born while her father was a student at Graceland. At the age of twenty months she accompanied her parents on a mission to Norway. She was graduated from grade school in Porsgrunn, Norway. After returning to the United States, she enrolled in the ninth grade at Independence, Missouri, and then transferred to high school in Tulsa, Oklahoma, where she received her high school diploma. She can well understand the language difficulty students from abroad have to overcome. In addition to her travels in Norway, she has been in Denmark, Sweden, and England. She still remembers vividly her return to the United States as a teen-ager, and her delight in the discovery of ice cream, as well as the joy of riding in what was, by comparison, a streamlined car.

In September, 1939, Velma enrolled at Graceland. She was a member of the Crescents, a girls' honorary service organization; the Student Council; and Lambda Delta Sigma, a scholastic honorary society. She was an active participant in other phases of campus life. Upon graduation from Graceland in 1941 she received a

Is the Pope a Temporal Ruler?

THE RECENT ACTION of President Truman in appointing General Mark W. Clark to be ambassador to the Vatican has brought about a vigorous protest from all parts of the United States. General Clark's declination has resulted in a suspension of the procedure; meanwhile the controversy provoked by the President grows in intensity.

The legality of such an appointment, put in issue many years ago and from 1868 until World War II apparently resolved definitely in favor of the negative, and the occasional attempts of the Roman Catholic Church to secure a reversal of the decision have been matters of personal interest to me and I believe of tremendous importance to the American Republic. For that reason we have heretofore made mention of the matter in Herald columns, the last time in our issue of July 9 this year.

The Protestant churches, as well as certain other organizations, that from religious conviction or otherwise oppose on principle the Catholic encroachments in state and national governmental affairs, apparently are aroused as never before, and they are very active in opposition to what the President has proposed.

The question involved is, Is the Roman Catholic Church a church, or is it a temporal power or state? Obviously it cannot be both, though the right of temporal control has always been asserted for papal authority by adherents of the Catholic faith.

We recall that not long after Mr. Truman became president, because his predecessor under authority of war-time measures had appointed Myron C. Taylor as his personal representative or envoy to the Pope, much concern was in evidence among many citizens as to what Mr.

Truman would do about it; in 1948 his representatives at the White House on his behalf and by his authority made certain statements from which the conclusion was inescapable that he did not and would not favor such permanent representation at the Vatican and that a temporary arrangement would cease when peace treaties would be entered into with Germany and some other European countries.

THE ASSOCIATED CHURCH PRESS, representing more than a hundred religious publications having a total circulation in excess of five million, has issued a statement and has authorized the release of its letter of October 23, 1951, to Senator Thomas Connally, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, enclosing a copy of a letter from The Associated Church Press by its president, George W. Buckner, Jr., to President Truman.

In the letter to the President, Mr. Buckner quotes in its entirety a letter which Charles G. Ross, press secretary to the President, addressed to Doctor W. P. Lippard (then president of The Associated Church Press) on July 19, 1948, which is as follows:

The President has asked me to acknowledge your letter of July nineteenth. I am glad to inform you that the President's assurance that the mission of Myron C. Taylor, Personal Representative of the President of the United States of America to His Holiness the Pope, would be terminated when peace is made still stands. Moreover, that will remain the President's policy and will be strictly adhered to so long as he is in office.

Notwithstanding this unqualified assurance it now appears that almost immediately upon execution of peace treaties with the countries mentioned, without notice (six hours before the National Congress was to adjourn, when nothing by way of confirmation or otherwise could be done about it) President Truman announced the appointment of General Clark—Myron C. Taylor having resigned some time ago.

This sudden recognition of Rome as a world power has stirred opposition that undoubtedly will survive the coming presidential campaign, and it may be a controlling factor in the selection of another president.

It has been disclosed (as reported in the daily press) that Franklin D. Roosevelt, now a congressman from New York, had lately visited the Holy Father at Rome and had given assurances to His Holiness that it was President Truman's policy to maintain an ambassador at Rome, but he suggested Mr. Truman would not have "the nerve" to make an appointment prior to the coming general election. It is thought that this stimulated Mr. Truman, who resents any imputation of cowardice, to make the appointment when he did.

We do not think it wise or necessary to give the matter more space than we have—at least at this time; but if any readers will address request to Herald editors, with ten cents in postage, copies of "An Analysis of the Issues Involved in the Vatican Ambassadorship" will be mailed to them. These are reprints from The Christian Century and may be obtained in quantities from The Century, 407 South Dearborn Street, Chicago 5, Illinois, for $3.50 per hundred copies.

"Why Not Give a Little More?"

Following is part of a letter received from Apostle George Mesley in regard to the present campaign to raise funds for completion of the Auditorium:

At the recent district conference in Midland, Michigan, Brother Bushnell of Vesterburg, Michigan, bore his testimony concerning the blessing that he had received when the campaign was on to pay off the debt of the Auditorium. He and his wife were not in affluent circumstances and had to pay out their Auditorium pledge in installments. Brother Bushnell walked into town to send his last installment, and on the way home felt the warmth and direction of the Spirit saying to him, "Why not give a little more?" He had sacrificed to pledge what he had done, but he went home and talked the experience through with his wife. They obeyed the leadings of the Spirit to them and gave a little more, and Brother Bushnell's testimony was that they were richly blessed in the giving.

This same attitude has been expressed by many of our people throughout the church in regard to the present effort to complete the structure. It is reflected in a letter received by the First Presidency from Elder Herbert Scott, pastor of the Des Moines Branch, shortly after the announcement of the campaign:

We have received your notice of the plan to raise $500,000 for work to be done on the Auditorium. We as a branch are very happy to see this announcement made, and we will do all within our power to raise the $1,250.00 quota which has been set for our branch.

We have just completed a financial drive here in the branch to raise $3,000.00 for the redecoration of our church building inside and out, and our people complied wholeheartedly with this campaign. We did not know about the Auditorium plan until after we had started, and while we have been working hard on this and our people have made sacrifices for it, yet we want you to know that we are 100 per cent in favor of this great project, and we are going to do all within our power to raise it. We are advertising it and announcing it in all of our services. One sister has committed herself to me today that she is going to give a whole week's salary as her contribution to this work.

Because of this receptive spirit of our people, it is not surprising that letters like the following are arriving daily.

The Northern Nebraska District reports through its president, Charles D. Neff, that its quota has been exceeded. Omaha raised over one thousand dollars alone, and no one gift was over one hundred dollars, indicating a widespread interest.

As this kind of response comes from all sections of the world, it is obvious that we are going to finish the Auditorium.

Concerning Prisoners

A difficult situation is created when a member of the church has been found guilty of crime by the Civil Court and sentenced to imprisonment. Under such circumstances it is desirable that the prisoner shall be labored with in an endeavor to bring him to repentance. Failing this, church court action may be in order. But the prisoner is not free to represent himself. In such circumstances the First Presidency made a ruling on October 19, 1932, as follows:

When a member of the church has been found guilty of crime before the courts of the land and sentenced therefor to imprisonment, the local authorities (branch or district) should suspend such member from church rights and privileges, and he should remain so suspended until his case can be duly heard after his release from imprisonment.

This ruling has been followed in the few instances where such cases have come up during the past twenty years, and is now published for the information of administrative officers. It will be noted that the ruling recognizes the seriousness of the situation, but leaves the way open for ministry and repentance when circumstances permit. Of course, nothing about this ruling should prevent any members of the priesthood or of the church giving such ministry to the prisoner as the circumstances will allow.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Across the Desk

From Seventy L. S. Troyer:

During the past three weeks I have been holding a series in Lansing, Michigan. We had two baptisms as a result of the series. The branch president, numerous members of the priesthood, and laymembers told me that there was a wave of unity among the people, love for one another, and devotion to the church that came as a result of the series. I rejoiced greatly to see the Saints being blessed as a result of the working of the Master of men through me. Truly nothing brings greater peace of mind and joy to me than the knowledge that God is using me to bring comfort and hope and strength to his people.

From Elder Paul M. Hanson, president of the Council of Twelve, November 7, Regina, Canada:

Last Friday I left by train from Omaha for Winnipeg; there was a good deal of snow most of the way, and the temperature 4° below zero at Winnipeg on Saturday night. Brother Renfroe and I are following an intensive schedule in visiting branches and looking after various church interests in his field. We have had large attendance at all of our meetings.

There will be preaching here in Regina tonight and tomorrow night; by request, my pictures from South America bearing on the Book of Mormon will be shown.

We All Need Christmas

F. Henry Edwards

AS I HAVE MINGLED with the crowds of shoppers this Christmas season I have wondered what answers I would get if I should stop some of them to ask, "Why do we celebrate the birthday of Jesus?" If I had the temerity to do such a thing it is altogether likely that many would hurry off without answering, too busy to take time to think what it is all about. Others might stop for a moment, startled into serious thought, but still unable to give a helpful answer. But a few would be likely to say, according to their nature and experience, such things as:

"We keep Christmas because it is a happy family custom," or, "Because everyone else does," or, "Because we are incurably romantic," or perhaps, "Christmas would have been forgotten long ago if businessmen had not kept it alive to exploit us," or maybe, "We remember the birthday of Jesus because the church teaches us to do so."

Thinking along these lines, but from the vantage point of our common spiritual experience, I find three reasons why our joy in Christmas seems especially important to me.

IN THE FIRST PLACE, a major reason why we celebrate the birthday of Jesus, and why we do it in the spirit underlying this season, is because Jesus loves us enough to live among us. Truly this is an amazing thing. The Christian faith is that out of sheer devotion to us, when there is no return we can ever give him except our own heart's love, Jesus chose to live among us—to be our friend and our Savior. Sometimes we speak of the devotion of men like Peter the Great of Russia, who left his royal palace to work in the factories of England and the Continent so that on his return he could teach his own people how to build ships and industries and cities. In the same connection I find myself thinking of Dr. Whitney Williams, outstanding both as an educator and a businessman, who lived for many months as a miner, dock worker, and laborer in order to learn to think, see, and feel as the men of labor think, see, and feel.

But what these men did gives only a faint glimpse of what Jesus did. Jesus left the home of his Father to live among ordinary men as one of them. He began life as we begin life. He grew toward maturity as we grow toward maturity. He gradually took on responsibility as we must take on responsibility. He shared the joys, pains, and sorrows incident to human life. He refused to draw on resources not available to men of faith, but instead made himself dependent on such support as the love of little children, the friendship of good women, and the loyalty of true men. But for Jesus, some might have thought that God does not know what it feels like to be a man—harassed, bewildered, uncertain. But now we know that God does understand, for his Son lived in homes like ours and in cities like ours, with hopes and fears and perplexities like ours.

There is no condescension here, or we would resent it. When Jesus came to live among us, he was not just slumming. He came to us in love. He lived among us in love. Love illumined everything that he was and did. Love shines through his life on every part of our lives. No earnest man or woman can ever get away from that. It is understandable and reasonable and—in its best sense—human, that we should love Him who first loved us with such a passion of devotion.

I THINK A SECOND REASON why we celebrate the birthday of Jesus is because of the complete honesty and impartiality of his affection. If we ever found him closing his heart to anyone for a trivial or unworthy reason, we might reasonably feel that he might close his heart against us. But we never do. Anyone who could be persuaded to be honest about his relations to God and his neighbors and his own inner life was welcome as a friend of Jesus. Such persons still are. One cannot imagine him excluding a man from his circle merely because he was a Roman, or a Negro, or poor, or illiterate, or even of bad reputation. Neither can we imagine him including a man merely because he was rich, or favored, or highborn, or cultured, or influential. Even though we find it hard to live according to the standards set by Jesus, we love him for those standards. And we know in our hearts that we ought to make his standards of value our own; that we ought to consider men in terms of their intrinsic worth—their honesty, devotion, courage, compassion, and cleanliness—not in terms of secondary or accidental characteristics like race or wealth or status.

IN THE THIRD PLACE, I think we join happily to commemorate the birthday of Jesus because those who knew him best honored him as a craftsman—a person whose life purpose was expressed in beautiful workmanship which never lost touch with everyday concerns. We can readily imagine him showing infinite care and patience as he shaped a yoke to fit the neck of the oxen smoothly and comfortably. We see him entering into never-failing human problems as he concerns himself with getting a good rock foundation for a house and calculating his financial resources carefully so that he would not have to leave it half finished for lack of planning. We have a new respect for him when we hear him telling experienced fishermen to cast their nets on the right side of the boat and note the results which followed their obedience.

I was reminded of this the other day when I read the Kansas City Star report of the speech made by Charles A. Lindbergh when he was presented with the Wright Brothers Memorial Trophy. The award was for "significant public service of enduring value to aviation in the United States." Mr. Lindbergh acknowledged the presentation by discussing the probable future of aviation. Then he went on to say:

We must not let science hypnotize us into believing that simply by sitting in front of desks and drawing boards and instruments all day, we are contributing to the character of man.

Personally, I am convinced that man cannot thrive indefinitely in the hothouse atmosphere we are creating. I believe that for permanent survival he must balance science with other qualities of life, qualities of body and spirit as well as those of mind—qualities he cannot develop when he lets mechanics and luxury insulate him too greatly from the earth on which he was born.

I believe this can be done only through a reorientation of our standards, only by placing the character of man above the value of his products. If we are to be finally successful, we must measure scientific accomplishments by their effects on man himself.

I BELIEVE Lindbergh is right. And what is much more important, I believe that our great example in doing what Lindbergh says we must do to save our civilization is Jesus Christ. I believe further it is because we realize this, and know that the gospel which will save us has to save us in the midst of our daily tasks and responsibilities, that we pay such high tribute to Jesus and interpret our love for each other at Christmas time in gifts and service that go far beyond mere good wishes.

Here, then, are three related reasons which explain in some measure why the hold of Jesus upon the hearts of earnest men and women is growing stronger day by day and year by year: we love him because he loved us enough to come to live with us, because he is so honest and impartial in his affection for us, and because his heavenly wisdom, insight, and truth are always geared to our most fundamental human needs.

Let us worship the Lord Jesus by following him happily in the way that he lived out before us.

Christmas 1951

By Lucille Oliver

NINETEEN HUNDRED FIFTY-ONE years ago the Roman empire was the world. The Roman yoke enslaved all peoples, including the Jews—a race chosen of God—who looked for a Messiah to lift them out of their bondage as Moses had led his people out of Egypt to the Promised Land. No other people left so deep an impression on the Hebrews as the Romans who had entrenched themselves in Palestine in the last century before the Christian Era. Driven to despair by the harshness of the Roman rule, the Jews again raised the standard of rebellion. Into such a state of affairs the Savior was born in a manger in Bethlehem.

Here was the one person the Hebrew nation had prayed for and longed to see. Yet when he appeared, only a few knew him for what he really was. As Isaiah wrote:

The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death upon them hath the light shined. . . . For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.

On this wonderful night of nights the angels sang, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace and good will to men." Yet "he came unto his own, and his own received him not." And because his own received him not "he was led as a lamb to the slaughter, he was bruised for our transgressions, he was slain for our iniquities."

The world is ruled today by several empires, but only two stand out in importance. These are the empires of freedom and slavery. Greed, hate, bitterness, want, hunger, loneliness, need, futile searching—these and more stalk the earth. And, like many years ago, into such a world comes the Prince of Peace bringing love, unselfishness, the embodiment of all righteousness, and peace to the souls of those who will recognize him for the Messiah that he is.

CHRISTMAS 1951! War . . . killings . . . brutalities . . . intolerance . . . misunderstanding . . . bigotry . . . the lashing out of one people against another . . . fear of the future . . . fear of the atomic bomb . . . fear of disease and insecurity . . . fear of living . . . fear of dying. This is Christmas 1951!

"Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." How often, how pleadingly, how lovingly He must stand and beg us to come to him and accept his way of life.

Christmas 1951! Hunger strikes in every part of the earth. Children stand in line for a meager portion of powdered milk. Yet He has said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Christmas 1951! The marching of soldiers sounds in the distance. The guns blaze, the tanks roll on, the planes roar, the bombs explode, and men die. Some are so young they haven't really begun to live yet. How long will this useless sacrifice continue?

Again Christ speaks:

Seek and ye shall find; ask and it shall be given unto you; knock and it shall be opened unto you. . . . Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven. . . . Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

In these troubled days shall we stop and consider the plea of the Savior of the world who stands with hands outstretched and pleads for us—who has the power of earth and heaven, who can bring peace to the weary souls of men, who can still the guns of war, who can feed the hungry, clothe the naked, heal the diseased, cheer the lonely and distressed?

Or do we, like the Hebrew nation of old, refuse to recognize the Christ? Do we have eyes and see not, ears and hear not? As Latter Day Saints we have a peculiar and heavy responsibility. We walk in the light, and we must take this light to every nation in the world. We dare not escape if we "neglect so great a salvation." Let us make this Christmas one of giving whatever we have to offer to the needy, to the lonely, to the sorrowful. Unless we do, our religion is of little value.

We should make Christmas 1951 a time of sincere brotherly love for never in all the history of the earth has that love been so needed.

Unto All People

*Yet in thy dark streets shineth
The everlasting Light,
The hopes and fears of all the years
Are met in thee tonight.*

AS THE CONGREGATION finished singing the lovely old carol, Elder Benton arose from his seat behind the pulpit. Opening his Bible he read:

And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night. And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord.

He closed the Bible with a finality that startled the congregation and sat down.

The choir arose and in song reiterated the Scripture he had read. "Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," the tenor soloist sang. "To all people," the basses repeated. The lights on the tall Christmas tree lit up the tinsel ornaments and cast a radiance around the white robed angel that hovered with outstretched wings on the topmost branches. A piney fragrance permeated the church. All was warmth and beauty within, despite the December blast that beat against the doors and windows, driving the swirling snow before it.

The music ceased and Elder Benton stood again. His glance swept the sea of eager faces. They were happy and prosperous—these people he shepherded. There was John Travis, a successful real estate broker. His wife and daughter sat proudly by his side. Across the aisle sat Sam Eaton, manager of the town's largest department store. Both were good Christian gentlemen, but had people like these ever known or felt the dire need of a Savior? Had he, who had been reared in the church, really sensed to the full the redeeming power of Christ?

This was Sunday evening, and Tuesday was Christmas. The children had presented their program that morning, now the pastor and the choir were to furnish the evening entertainment. That's all it had been many times, he felt—mere entertainment with beautiful music and an appropriate pastoral sermon. But tonight he knew he was incapable of following the usual procedure.

THE PEOPLE became restless under his scrutiny, as his glance shifted from one to the other. "Dear Saints," he began, "yesterday afternoon I took a walk." A simple statement in itself, but a wave of anticipation swept the room, as the timbre of his voice struck an emotional chord in their hearts. "I didn't stroll through Wildwood to admire the Christmas decorations of the wealthy," he continued. "I crossed the tracks to the section of the city we call 'Shantytown.' Since then my soul has been harrowed by what I saw. I cannot stand before you and preach the accustomed Christmas message of starlight and a white robed angelic choir singing 'Peace on Earth,' when I feel we have sensed to a negligible degree the words, 'I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.' There are those in our city who have never known joy or realized what the birth of the Savior should mean to them.

"As I strolled through the narrow streets of Shantytown, I saw ragged, unkempt children playing around the tumbledown shacks that they call home. I stopped to talk to a little boy and girl who sat huddled together on the steps of one of the hovels. They informed me that Mom and Dad were sleeping off their drunk and had chased them outside despite the inclement weather. What future have those children?

"I walked through the business section. There I saw young mothers searching for bargains in the meat and grocery departments. Stintingly they counted pennies from the pockets of their shabby coats. I even ventured into a tavern. There I saw the reason for some of the poverty and distress. You may say, 'They themselves are to blame,' but personally I too feel responsible for these conditions. Jesus commissioned us, 'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature.' This is our world—Shantytown is our world." His voice broke with emotion. "What are we doing to bring the Savior to these people? Let us pray."

Many that night sensed for the first time their responsibility as members of the church. Many were in tears when Elder Benton finished praying and sat down. As the soprano soloist arose to sing the closing number, suppressed sobs were heard throughout the church.

After the dismissal Pastor Benton stood at the door shaking hands with his flock who lingered, seemingly loath to venture forth into the storm. When the last had taken his departure, Elder Benton walked to the front of the church and knelt in prayer. That night he had felt the power of the Spirit as never before in his ministry. He remained in prayer for some time; then rising, made his way to the rear of the church. As he opened the door leading to the vestibule, he was startled to see the two little waifs he had met the previous day disappear through the outer door and vanish like wraiths of the storm. Quickly donning his coat and hat he followed, but they rounded a corner and were gone.

That night he lay upon his bed, still thrilled by the power of the message he had delivered. When he finally fell asleep, his dreams were haunted by their wan faces.

THE WIND whistled down the track, driving before it the Twentieth Century Limited, which thundered on to its destination. In a rude shack east of the tracks two children stirred in uneasy slumber as the shrill whistle of the locomotive penetrated their fitful dreams. The vibrations rattled the windows, while through a broken pane a gust of wind threatened to extinguish the flickering light of a smoky lamp on the bare pine table. In an old iron stove the fire burned low for lack of replenishment.

As the atmosphere of the room grew colder, the children huddled closer together beneath the meager bedclothes. Finally a childish voice spoke, "You awake, Joey?"

"Uh-huh, can't sleep, it's too cold," the boy answered. He raised on his elbow and surveyed the room, "Mom and Pop's gone ag'in. They won't be home till late tonight."

"Tonight's Christmas Eve," the little girl sighed wistfully. "Wish we could have a Christmas tree with a beautiful angel on top like the one we saw at the church."

"When I get big I'll buy you a Christmas tree, Tiny," the boy promised, as he snuggled closer in an effort to keep warm.

"But I want one now," the little girl cried, tears coursing down her cheeks. "I want a Christmas tree and a beautiful angel. Come on, Joey, let's go to the church and see the tree ag'in."

"It's too cold, Tiny," the boy answered sensibly. "You're so little you'd freeze in no time. Hear that wind howling?"

"I won't freeze," the little girl replied determinedly. "I'm going to see the Christmas tree. Come on, Joey," she coaxed, jumping out of bed and pulling at the covers in an attempt to persuade him to follow her.

"It's too cold," he argued.

"It's cold here too. It'll be warm at the church." Already Tiny was slipping into her clothing.

"Well, if you're bound to go I suppose I'll have to go with you, but Mom and Pop'll be hoppin' mad if they come home and we're gone. If Pop's drunk, he'll beat us."

"I don't care," Tiny replied. "I want to see the Christmas tree and the angel."

"Here, wrap this around you," Joey said, pulling a thin dirty blanket from the bed. "I'll put on Pop's old sweater."

THEY CLOSED THE DOOR behind them and stepped into the night. Tiny, trailing the grey blanket behind her, looked like a cloistered nun as Joey led her down a side street, where the red and green lights of Mike's Bar cast a sickly gleam upon the snow-covered sidewalk. Together they peered through the window into the dimly lighted room, where they could see men and women sitting at tables or leaning across the bar.

"They're here," Joey whispered, as they turned from the window and continued their journey.

"It's cold," Tiny shivered, as she made a brave attempt to keep up with Joey.

"Maybe the church will be closed and all the people gone home," Joey said, as they trudged through the snow. "It's after nine o'clock."

Tiny began to cry, "I want to see the Christmas tree. Hurry, Joey."

They crossed the tracks and hurried on past homes where lighted trees shone out from windows hung with holly wreaths. The wind stung their faces and penetrated their scanty clothing. As they came in sight of the church, no lights shone out upon the glittering snow; no friendly door opened as they attempted to enter.

"Guess the preacher and his folks ain't here tonight," the boy remarked.

"Oh, Joey, I'm so cold," Tiny cried.

"Let's go round to the back and see if there's a door open," the boy suggested.

As they groped their way to the back of the church, a sickle moon, emerging from behind a cloud, looked coldly down upon them. Tiny shivered as she drew the thin blanket more closely about her. Joey went up the steps that led to the rear door of the church. It, too, was securely locked. They stood there in the wan light of the moon—two forlorn little figures.

Joey clutched Tiny's arm. "What's that over there?" he cried. "Oh, Tiny, it's the Christmas tree."

"Why did they put it out here?" Tiny asked, puzzled.

"Suppose they're through with it," Joey answered, as he and Tiny approached the tree which lay on a heap of rubbish.

"Joey," Tiny cried rapturously, "there's the Christmas angel—see it on the tree?"

"Sure enough," Joey replied in amazement. "Here, I'll get it for you." As he disengaged the paper angel from the branches of the tree, Tiny clasped it to her in an ecstasy of joy.

"Come on, we'll drag the tree home," the boy said, as he exerted all his strength toward the effort.

"Let's just sit here by it, Joey," Tiny answered, as she slipped down into the snow. "I'm so t-i-r-e-d and s-l-e-e-p-y," she whispered.

"Ain't you cold, Tiny?" he questioned.

"Not now," the little girl replied. "I'm all nice and warm inside," and she hugged the paper angel closer to her.

"I'm not cold either. Let's take a nap, then we'll drag the tree home." His voice trailed off to a whisper, as he sank down beside the little girl.

Next morning, when the deacon came to replenish the fire and to carry out the ashes, he found them side by side. In Tiny's rigid fingers was still clasped the Christmas angel.

ONE EVENING a few days later Elder Benton sat in his cozy study trying to concentrate on a text for the next Sunday's sermon. But his mind kept reverting to the scene of the day before when he stood with uncovered head beside two little graves. He recalled the grief stricken parents and the sympathetic friends and neighbors gathered beneath the green tent. A motley crowd they were, some bearing the stamp of sin and dissipation. He thought of the talk he had had later with the father. It was the same old story—loss of employment, discouragement, and then drink. How could he go to these people with the gospel message without something concrete to offer them. The recent experience had sobered them. Perhaps he could reach them in their hour of grief, but how?

Suddenly a thought radiated his mind. He reached for the telephone and dialed a number. "That you, Sam?" he questioned. "Have you any openings in your store for this fellow Jensen? If he could get a job we might be able to help him. All right, I'll see that he comes in tomorrow morning."

Hanging up the receiver he dialed another number. "Hi, John," he spoke into the instrument, "any houses in the low rental bracket available? No," he laughed, "I'm not house hunting. You remember that man Jensen? I thought if we could get him into a different environment we might be able to help him. All right, see you tomorrow," he smiled, as he hung up the receiver.

THE YEARS HAVE PASSED. Shantytown is just a memory now, but in a modest residential section of the city there stands a small white church, erected by loving hands and consecrated hearts. On Sunday morning Elder Jensen stands in the pulpit, facing many of his old friends and neighbors. It is Christmas Eve again. The huge Christmas tree is ablaze with light. On the topmost branches a white robed angel hovers. As the choir rises to sing the anthem, the soloist sings in clear, sweet tones, "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." Elder Benton, the guest speaker, sits upon the rostrum beside Elder Jensen. A look of understanding too deep for words passes between them as he rises to deliver the Christmas message.

She takes a personal interest in her students, enjoys counseling with them, and is very much aware of the challenge and opportunities of her position in guiding the youth of the church in the pathways of God.

Rehearsal Time

YOU KNOW," the lady remarked, adjusting her Messiah book under her arm, "rehearsal is more fun than a three-ring circus. The way Brother Weddle mimics the sopranos and pokes fun at the tenors—why the way he razzes the sections when they are off is just a riot." She was just one of the two hundred and eighty voices who will sing the immortal Handel's Messiah December 23.

The humorous incidents that occur at rehearsals make each Sunday evening's practice lively and entertaining as well as inspirational. The director, upon arriving, takes off his coat and assumes his position, laughing and joking with those on the front rows until four o'clock. When the moment arrives for rehearsals to officially begin, the group stands and a prayer is said. In the spirit of fellowship, rehearsal begins.

Perhaps this Sunday the sopranos will be the victims of extra razzing, but it's all in fun. "I think it's the tactful way he tells us we're flat that is so amusing," a soprano said.

The director's statement, "The sopranos aren't flat, but they remind me of milk just before it turns sour—not sour you understand, but hinting that that's what is coming next," brought on the remark from the soprano.

At one rehearsal Brother Weddle's baton was broken. Smiling, as he picked up the pieces, he remarked, "My batons never last through The Messiah or The New World Symphony."

Norma Smith, accompanist, who is also Mr. Weddle's secretary, receives her share of teasing. One week the books of music were not available to purchase, and the director said, "In case I forget to tell my secretary at work, I'll tell her now in front of two hundred and eighty witnesses, that we need to order books Monday." Mrs. Smith flashes back a good-natured smile, and then begins the accompaniment.

One Sunday a little stray dog wandered into the choir room of the Auditorium where rehearsals are held. If some kind soul had not come to his rescue the basses probably would have signed the dog up for the tenor section.

Even in the ridiculous moments, there is a good spirit present, and each member of the chorus can testify that some rehearsals are rich, outstanding spiritual experiences. As the words of the oratorio carry the message of the Christ and his kingdom, the beauty and quality of the music lend those words wings.

The choir was told in late November that the December rehearsals would stress the message of The Messiah. Previous rehearsals had stressed technique and accuracy, but the last few practices would be devoted to the message and its portrayal. "There is nothing better a member of the chorus could do on the Sunday of the performance than to sit down with his Messiah book and read the text. This is the message of Christ, and we are going to be telling thousands of people." These were the director's closing words at one of the later rehearsals.

Messages from all over the United States which have stated the interest of hundreds of people in the radio performance have been read at rehearsal. Members of the chorus are also men and women whose lives are dedicated to the purposes of Christ's kingdom—priesthood members, church appointees, homemakers, Zion's Leaguers, and dedicated laymembers share in the privilege of this experience.

The "Messiah" Choir is no ordinary choir, the presentation is no ordinary experience. The choir and its performance are exceptional because of the spirit that is felt. Families participate in the chorus—mother, father, and daughter or son. It is a worship experience for all who sing in it. The Messiah brings a new meaning to Christmas for all those who share in it—the performers and the audience.

A Career in Church Education

Thurman Reunion

During my second year in college the church held a camp meeting, or reunion, at Thurman, Iowa. Tom, Emma, May, and I decided we would attend for a day at the week end. Accordingly we hired a team and carriage and spent an enjoyable day at the meeting. The experience of that day was vital in my life, for it decided in a large measure the course I would take. At the nine o'clock prayer meeting Sunday the gift of prophecy rested upon Brother W. W. Blair who said, among other things, that a few years previously he had been shown by the spirit that Heman C. Smith would some day occupy an important place in the work of the church and that a certain young man in the audience (pointing me out and calling me by name) would do the same. I had never met Brother Blair until that day and he knew nothing of me except what he gained by hearing my testimony and through the revelation of the Spirit. One other man, a stranger, spoke to me under the influence of the Spirit, saying that if I were faithful I would be called into the ministry and do an important work in the church. Others confirmed these messages, and the testimony came to me in power that they were true.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF

J. A. Gunsolley

PART IV

Friendship With the Hougas Family

During my second year in Shenandoah, Iowa, I formed the acquaintance of T. A. Hougas and his wife Emma. The Fisher family had moved into a good sized brick house near the college and opened their house to roomers. Being Reorganized Latter Day Saints, their place was a desirable one for students belonging to the church. T. A. (Tom) and I became roommates in the Fisher home, and Emma Gamet became May's roommate. Tom and Emma soon became interested in each other, and May and I were already going together. Emma sang soprano quite well, May was a good alto, Tom had a fine tenor voice, and I sang baritone. We sang together as a quartet upon many occasions, at literary society programs, commencements at the college, and in church services, as well as at home.

The "Three Apostles"

Another young man named Samuel C. Diggle from Kansas City was a member of our class; he too was a Reorganized Latter Day Saint. We three young men were quite regular in attendance at church and active in the services. We were frequently seen together and were sometimes referred to as the "three apostles." Although none of us ever became members of the Quorum of Twelve, we did become ministers holding responsible positions in the church.

Sister Pace

I found some dear friends among the church people other than these I have already mentioned. One of the most outstanding was Sister Pace. Her husband, Colonel Pace, was not a member of the church, but he was a prominent man in the community and enjoyed having us visit in their home. Sister Pace was superintendent of the Sunday school and seemed to have particular interest in the young men. She was ever reminding us what a wonderful privilege it is to work for God and the people, assuring us of our ability and responsibility and calling upon us to perform certain duties as occasion permitted. She had Tom installed as chorister and me as superintendent; we also taught classes from time to time. It was there that I got my first experience as an official in any department of the church. I'll ever remember Sister Pace as being one among many noble women who inspired and encouraged me by making me feel that I could, if I would, do a work for God and humanity.

William Gaylord

One of my friends was Elder William Gaylord whose sound and kindly advice I shall always cherish. More than once he said, "Jerry, go on and get an education; learn all you can. That's something no one can ever take from you. Men may cheat and swindle you and take away your property, but they cannot take away your education." I've always been grateful to "Uncle William" for his wise counsel.

Honesty the Best Policy

The officials of the college were considerate of my financial circumstances and urged me to continue school even if I could not pay as I went, kindly offering to extend credit to any extent necessary, taking my note without security and trusting to my honesty. I was pleased that my short acquaintance with them had convinced them that I was a safe risk. My conviction that "honesty is the best policy" is a true principle was formed in early years. He who orders his life accordingly will lack neither friends nor favors.

Future Course Decided

I realized that if these prophecies were to be fulfilled I might be called upon to do foreign missionary work. I decided to talk with my fiancee immediately. Accordingly we went for a walk through the woods and came to a small wooden bridge where we would not likely be interrupted.

"Well, dear," I began, "I suppose you heard what was said to me at the meeting."

"Yes, I heard it. It was grand."

"Have you thought what it might mean?"

"Yes, I have."

"Have you thought that it might mean I would be sent on a foreign mission?"

"Yes, I have."

"Would you be willing for me to leave home?"

"If the Lord should direct, I would be willing to co-operate in every way that together we might do his will."

True to Promise

From that hour it was definitely understood that we were one in our service to God and the church. Never once did she ask me to neglect my legitimate duties in church work to be at home, though there were many lonely hours for her and the children because of my absence.

Trip to Defiance

Our betrothal having been effected I desired that my family might meet the one I had chosen to be my wife. Accordingly, with the consent of her parents, we went to Defiance to visit my people. As I had anticipated, she was received with a warm welcome, and she was pleased with making their acquaintance.

We had a slightly disconcerting experience on this visit. On our return journey we had to change cars at Council Bluffs, and it was several hours between trains. We decided to spend the time window shopping. Among the things we saw was a dress which May wished very much to take home to her mother; however, she did not have the money to buy it. Naturally I wanted to be of service, so I told her I would let her have the amount, as we already had our tickets. When we reached the station a few minutes before departure time we met one of the members of the faculty of the college at Shenandoah. He asked, "Are you folks going to Shenandoah?" When we told him that we were, he said, "Why, your train has just gone!" Imagine my feelings! We were stranded in a strange city, and I was responsible for a night's lodging and meals for two, but there was not enough money in my pocket to buy even cheese and crackers. We talked the matter over seriously and about concluded we would have to spend twenty-four hours in the station when we heard the train caller announcing that our train would leave in a few minutes. The professor was only having a little fun at our expense. We reached home without further unpleasant happenings, both feeling that we had done a good thing.

Graduation

Graduation took place in July, 1888. I was given a diploma certifying I had received the degree of Bachelor of Science. The previous year the diploma for the degree of Bachelor of Didactics, a teachers' course, was given me. I also acquired the degree of Bachelor of Accounts.

First School After Graduation

Not succeeding in getting a contract to teach in high school, I signed a contract to teach a country school two or three miles from Shenandoah. One reason for accepting this position was that I could easily walk back and forth to town on week ends and visit the Fisher family.

An interesting incident happened during that winter's term of school. One morning the daughter of a farmer handed me a written message telling me that the previous morning his little girl had arrived at school a few minutes late and found a large dog asleep in the doorway. Fearing the dog the girl returned home and reported that she was prevented from entering the schoolhouse because of the presence of the dog. I was accused of being responsible for the dog's presence and hence for the girl's being prevented from entering. The father threatened drastic measures if such a thing should happen again. Of course I was greatly surprised, and perturbed, and resolved I would send an answer home with the girl that evening. I spent the lunch hour writing a message that would set the man straight in his thinking. At dismissal time I decided it would be just as well not to be in too much of a hurry to send my reply, so I put it away in my desk to give me time to think matters through more carefully. There the message rested until the closing day of the school term, when it was taken out with other accumulated rubbish and consigned to the flames. In reviewing the matter I was led to ask myself what would be pleasing to the Lord. I was a member of the church; the father of the little girl was not. To send him the written message would be to descend to his level. Should I not rather set him a proper example of forbearance and self-control? The spirit of light and truth prevailed, as it has in numberless instances in my experience.

Called to Lamoni

Following this winter term of school I signed a contract to teach the spring term, but just shortly before time to begin I received a message from the secretary of the board of education at Lamoni, saying that the principal of the Lamoni schools had asked to be released, and that the board had accepted his resignation and chosen me to fill the vacancy. This was a very great surprise to me, for I had not even thought of going to Lamoni, much less had I ventured to make application for the place. It came about in this way. Brother W. W. Blair had met me at the church reunion in Thurman. He was a member of the board of education and was so favorably impressed by our casual acquaintance and the testimony of the Spirit, that he recommended I be offered the contract. I received a contract and promptly signed and returned it.

My next step was to arrange for an honorable release from my contract with the directors of the country school, for I considered it would be dishonorable to leave without making satisfactory arrangements for my release. Accordingly I hired a team and buggy and took a young woman whom I knew to be looking for a school and drove out and interviewed the directors. They willingly released me and accepted her. I immediately took leave of my many Shenandoah friends and in March, 1889, arrived at Lamoni, the little city where the Saints were in the majority and church influence predominated. I was met at the train by Brother F. M. Weld, secretary of the board of education, and Sister Eva M. Bailey, who took me to her home. I made arrangements to board at the home of Marietta Walker. Within the next few days I was comfortably settled and hard at work as principal.

Lamoni Schools

The school consisted of a three-room frame building two blocks east of the intersection of Main and Linden Streets; three teachers, including the principal, composed the staff. The other two teachers were Miss Eva Bailey, in charge of the intermediate room, and Miss Belle Randall, primary teacher. The total enrollment was approximately one hundred fifty. All subjects usually offered by small high schools were included in the curriculum. One class had been graduated before I took charge, and it was expected the second one would graduate the year I was installed, but I thought it unwise and the board of directors agreed with me. The students who had anticipated graduating were, of course, greatly disappointed. The following year's graduating class had a distinguished member, Frederick Madison Smith, who succeeded his father Joseph Smith as president of the church. I continued in charge, until June, 1894, during which time the school grew very rapidly.

Marriage

By the end of a year's service in Lamoni schools I concluded the position sufficiently permanent and remunerative to justify my undertaking the building of a home. Accordingly, during the week's vacation between the winter and spring terms of 1890, I made a trip to Shenandoah, returning with May Cornelia Fisher to reside over my household to be. My brother Jacob was the officiating clergyman, and the wedding took place on March 19, 1890. Sister Marietta Walker, with whom I had boarded during the year, gave us a reception which was attended by a number of leading ministers of the church, it being only a short time before the convening of General Conference at Lamoni. One of the elders at the reception offered this wholesome advice: "Remember, it takes two to make a quarrel." To May he said, "Now, when he gets angry, remember to keep sweet"; and to me he said, "When she gets angry, hold your peace; be patient and kind." (To Be Continued.)

Far West Stake Zion's League Rally

A UNIQUE AND INTERESTING INTERNATIONAL Zion's League Rally was held at the new Cameron, Missouri, church on Saturday and Sunday, October 20 and 21. Never before in the history of the Zion's League work in Far West Stake were Leaguers gathered together from such far distant points. There were Valda Poole and Les Gardner from Australia; Sylvia Wood and Bill Muldoon from England; Klaas Kaat from Rotterdam, Holland; Helen Mitsudo, Gilberta Paoa, and Lily Kaloa from Hawaii; Peter Harder and Harvey Nicholson from Canada, and Kisuke Sekine from Japan—probably the only native of that country who has accepted the gospel of the Restoration.

Approximately two hundred Leaguers were in attendance. Dr. William S. Gould, Director of Public Relations and counselor to students from abroad at Graceland College, was the guest speaker. The theme for the rally was "Missions Around the World."

Rally activities began Saturday night at 7:30 with Garland Snapp, supervisor of the Zion's League in Far West Stake, giving the message of welcome and outlining the purpose and significance of the rally. Four projects were suggested to be accomplished at the rally and in the year ahead.

1. Each League in the stake was to select either a missionary or a Zion's League leader in missions abroad and write letters of encouragement frequently during the year, with the first letter being written at the rally and read at the "gift service" Sunday afternoon.

2. A committee was to be appointed to raise funds to send Herald subscriptions for one year to branch pastors and leaders in Germany.

3. A scrapbook of League activities in pictures and story was to be sent to a League in one of the missions abroad.

4. A contribution to the Graceland College World Fellowship Fund was to be made, thus enabling young people from other countries to attend Graceland. These projects were enthusiastically received, and all Leaguers pledged their support.

DR. GOULD then introduced and interviewed each of the young people from missions abroad. They told many interesting and humorous stories about their experiences as they made the trip from their country to America to attend college at Graceland.

At 8:30 p.m. the assembly moved to the recreation room where an "international revue" was given with Les Gardner of Australia acting as master of ceremonies. Group songs, skits, and Hawaiian music were presented and much enjoyed. The Leaguers of Far West Stake concluded the program with a comedy drama called "Antics Spring." Refreshments were served to bring the activities for the evening to a conclusion.

"The Golden Thread of Fellowship" was the theme of the 9:30 worship service Sunday morning. Dick Cheville of Lamoni was the speaker at 10:00 o'clock. His subject was "My Experiences in Europe This Summer." Dick had gone to Europe during the summer months with two friends and, using bicycles as their means of transportation, had toured the countries. He visited many of the branches of the church and met many of the church people. Because of his talk, the Leaguers were able to visualize and better appreciate the need that existed in those countries.

The 11:00 o'clock service was a trip around the world and a visit with the Zion's Leagues in each of the countries represented. As a part of the service an "international choir" under the direction of Georgia Trotter of St. Joseph, Missouri, sang. These singers practiced together only once on Saturday night, but their music was beautiful and inspiring. Robert Parker of Centralia, Kansas, was guest soloist. Under the leadership of Brother Gould, each representative from missions abroad gave a word picture of local situations and activities. Each Leaguer present was made to feel the real bond of fellowship that can and will exist between young people of every land. The one thought expressed by each representative was the need of encouragement which the young people and their leaders need most in these missions in other lands. To this task of giving encouragement, the Leaguers at the rally dedicated themselves.

After a satisfying lunch at noon, the young people assembled for a half hour of "songs of fellowship." Song leaders were Georgia Trotter, St. Joseph, Missouri; Marian Hidy, Stewartville, Missouri; and Les Gardner.

THE CLOSING SERVICE began with bringing gifts to the altar. First was the gift of Herald subscriptions. Enough money had been given to send six subscriptions to pastors and leaders in Germany. This was a larger contribution than had been expected. Second was the presentation of a beautiful scrapbook of activities of the city-wide League in St. Joseph, Missouri, to be sent to the Zion's League at Wallsend, Australia, with the request that it be passed on to Leagues in other cities in Australia. Roy Cawley of St. Joseph was chairman of the group that had worked for about five months preparing the scrapbook. After seeing how each representative from several countries wanted his local League to receive this gift, the group decided to duplicate it and send one each to England and Hawaii as soon as possible.

Next, each League in the stake reported the name of the person it had chosen to write to during the year. The letters were read and proved to be very interesting.

An offering for the World Fellowship Fund was taken; a total of $40.50 was received and brought to the altar as a gift.

After a brief period of testimonial service the closing pageant of the rally was presented. This was a beautiful service written and directed by Garland Snapp. The church was depicted as the instrument through which the light of Jesus Christ was to shine forth to the world. In a candlelighting service a representative from each country, and from Graceland College and Far West Stake, symbolized the task which was his as he received his light from the church and took his rightful place in his own country that the light of the gospel might be taken to all the world. All joined together in singing "We've a Story to Tell to the Nations," and Robert Parker sang the prayer of dedication, "Lord Accept the Humble Consecration of Our Lives, Our Talents to Thy Cause."

Thus ended a rally which was far reaching in the lives of young people in Far West Stake.

Question Time

Question:

Must I believe that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, and that the Book of Mormon is divine, in order to become a member of your church?
Michigan J.R.G.

Answer:

The church has never laid down any such requirement. Nevertheless the question of consistency enters here. To accept the church as divine and reject the man chosen of God to bring it forth would be like accepting a gift while spurning and despising the giver. If the church is capable of supplying spiritual life through truth and holiness, what of the man who was instrumental in establishing such a church? Could he be unworthy of confidence? Consistency alone would require that to accept one we must accept the other. The same applies to the Book of Mormon.

Prejudices should not be permitted to interfere with judgment. The fundamental issue in such matters does not rest primarily upon either personal or literary works, but upon Jesus Christ and his truth. Faith in him and a following where he directs may not lead to paths which men would choose for themselves, but to truth and right and eternal life. Such as follow Christ's way will have no difficulty in accepting whomsoever he sends and whatsoever he gives.

CHARLES FRY

Question:

Please state the difference between your idea of Zion and Communism.
Illinois C. E.

Answer:

Communism makes the state supreme. In our Zionist philosophy, God is supreme. God is the Creator, man the steward. In Communism, man is regimented in social action; in Zion, man has the right of choice; his co-operation with his fellowmen is on a voluntary basis. Zion is the very antithesis of Communism. Zion seeks to make man free to exercise his initiative, to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience and to use his resources to the attainment of common social goals—goals which, though not contrary to the state, are nevertheless not state-imposed.

Communism possesses the man, his intellect, his resources; Zion is the product of man's initiative. His resources, both physical and intellectual, are applied to the attainment of spiritual power through voluntary use. Zion is a more perfect society attained through personal self-imposed discipline. It can be achieved only in a state where religious freedom is permitted; Communism does not permit freedom of religious worship.

Question:

1. What does the church teach about playing games with your family at home, such as canasta and checkers and dominoes?

2. Is there any difference because of a game being played with cards?
Michigan E.M.B.

Answer:

The church always encourages wholesome recreation in the family and in the home. There undoubtedly would be less delinquency and attendant evils in our society if parents particularly would find more time for recreation with their families.

The type of recreation should be seriously and carefully considered. I know of no instance where the church has gone on record either for or against games such as checkers or dominoes. These games are apparently harmless if not played to the point of consuming time excessively, and the recreation afforded can be both delightful and desirable.

The church by General Conference Resolution No. 377 has gone on record as disfavoring card playing in the belief that it may be apt to lead people away from the presence of God. Most of us are aware that gambling establishments use the so-called "playing cards" as one of the means for getting people's money. The evils associated with such enterprises are almost incalculable and range from loss of security to murder.

Any game that takes large amounts of time and energy from profitable work and study must be considered an evil.

Any recreation that involves gambling or the exchange of money will be disapproved by serious members of the church and by good citizens. The real evil is not so much in playing cards as it is in the indiscriminate use or misuse of time. There is probably little if any harm in a game of bridge played for purely social reasons with friends.

At least one other point claims consideration here, and that is the stewardship of influence. Attention has already been given to the stewardship of time and its importance, but the stewardship of influence is nonetheless important. If our influence and power for good suffer more by playing a card game, then there is more harm in that than in playing dominoes.

Without attempting to sermonize, we point out that leisure time should be used as constructively as possible. "Make leisure time creative" will always be good counsel. The world needs some first-class examples in the creative use of leisure time.

Question:

I think I am just as good as most Latter Day Saints. Why need I join the church?
Colorado E.C.D.

Answer:

In many instances this may be true. However, the condition of one member has nothing to do with your salvation. Salvation comes only by the gospel and one's complete compliance with it. The member who fails to live as he should may be under greater condemnation than the nonmember; yet the nonmember is still without any chance of salvation. We must each earn our own salvation.

The Christmas Poinsettia and the Easter Lily

By Florence Freberg

THE BRIGHT RED FOLIAGE of the poinsettia was everywhere; in shop windows, on counters, among the glittering Christmas gifts, and high on the top-most shelves with the decorations. Some counters and windows were given over to whole displays of the potted plants for sale. Some were vigorously beautiful and large, others spindly and faded-looking, but each a token of the Christmas season.

Going about my errands among the Christmas shoppers, I was keenly aware of these plants. They seemed to be a breath of fantasy in a season when King Commercialism reigns. I selected gifts for my two daughters, bought the week's groceries, and had enough left to buy one of the poinsettias. I visioned how it would add a beautiful note to our Christmas at home.

Somehow, I did not want to get one from the Christmas counters, choosing instead to go to the florist's for mine. I love growing things, and I knew that if I went directly to the hothouses I'd see many varieties of plants growing together. I contemplated the purchase I was going to make at the florist's. I'd select a three-flowered plant, representative of God, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, for they are all three represented in Christmas.

Through the steaming windows of the hothouse, I could observe the sea of red as I parked my car. Going to the display window I drank in the beauty of the florist's arrangement.

THE SOFT CHIME OF A BELL, as I opened and closed the door, brought a pleasant woman from her flower arranging. I made my selection and soon the woman bearing the plant I had chosen started back to the wrapping room. I tarried a bit, as usual in the presence of plants, and looked about me. Turning to leave, I found a vine had caught at my coat and I stopped to loosen it. Replacing the tendril in proper position my eyes focused on a stretch of large pots containing only the snubbing nose of plants showing through the soil.

"Are these lilies?" I called to the woman who was about to leave the glassed section of the hothouse.

"Yes, lilies for Easter."

Looking at her I thought, "The florist selling the flower of Christmas anticipates Easter. What of the shopper buying for Christmas?"

I turned again toward the potted lilies, meditating the significance of the moment and knew that I'd never again behold a brilliant poinsettia without seeing in the background a potted lily, its green shoot pushing its way through the soil at Christmas time ready to be in full bloom at Easter.

PLACING THE CAREFULLY WRAPPED PLANT on the seat beside me where I could take good care of it, I turned the car into the stream of traffic. I felt that my coming to the florist's was meant to be and considered it my treasure for the day. Had it not been for the little vine reaching out and catching my coat as I brushed by, I might have missed the lesson and I felt I'd like to do for others what the little vine had done for me—to call the attention of heedless shoppers to the fact that in the shadow of Christmas festivities is Easter.

Would it make them more careful in their selection of toys for their children, more mindful of some money that could be put aside for those who might not know joy otherwise at Christmas? Would it make them more conscious, perhaps, of the true significance of the season and help them to observe it reverently and with less artificial gaiety?

I wanted to take mankind by the hand and lead it into the florist shop, and there let it meditate for a brief moment, drinking in the thoughts that had come to me from the display of poinsettia on one side and rows of potted lilies on the other, then go back into the stream of Christmas activity with a more sober and sacred mien.

During the next three months my thoughts often went to the potted Easter lilies that I knew were growing toward their season, long after the beauty of the poinsettia had faded. Thoughts of Christmas must not be put away with the last evidence of its observance but should be growing, even as the lilies continued their growth at the florist's. The warmth and charity of Christmas can be kept growing, and by Easter can bring forth flowers that shed beauty even as the lily.

In the red of the poinsettia we can see God's gift, his Son, Jesus who in turn gave courageously and valiantly. In the white of the Easter lily, now beginning its growth upward, will be witnessed the purity of the supreme sacrifice made for mankind. These two flowers serve a holy mission in life if they bring to our minds these two significant experiences in the life of our Lord. We, in turn, must know the valiancy of giving with courage and sacrificing supremely to the plan of salvation and the achievement of Zion.

Some children from the lower East Side of New York, on their first visit to the country, were watching a terrible hail-storm, and one small girl expressed her disapproval: "God's getting awful fresh, throwing down those big stones! First thing he knows, he'll hit somebody."

"You mustn't talk like that about God!" exclaimed a little comrade, poking her vigorously. "Most everybody on our block likes him."—Lillian D. Wald, Head of the Henry Street Settlement, quoted by W. Orton Tewson.

As a Mother Loves Her Child

By Nellie Mae Lindsay

THERE is a hymn with this phrase in it: "As a mother loves her child. . . ." When I gaze upon my sleeping child and feel the boundless love all mothers must feel as they look upon their little ones, I can better comprehend how great God's love must be for us, his children.

We have but to see a mother care for a sick child night after night without rest or sleep to understand how wonderful mother love is. This understanding deepens our appreciation for God's love. As we forgive our children for things they do that displease us, we comprehend how lenient God is with us and our mistakes. He is a kind Father who forgives us when we ask forgiveness, for we are as little children in his sight. Only after patiently guiding our children through each stage of development and patiently waiting for them to learn how to take care of themselves do we realize how patient our Heavenly Father is with us as we strive to develop spiritually.

My child was several months in learning that he must stay in his own yard and not run away to his friend's house without permission. I patiently forgave him each time he left to play, explaining why it was better for him to ask me before he went away. So it is with God when we "run away" from him; he asks us over and over again to return to him and his teachings.

I am always thrilled, after being away from my son, to have him greet me on my return with "Hello, Mommie," and to feel his chubby arms around my neck. God must be pleased, too, when we reach our arms up to him at the end of a busy day. He welcomes us to his throne of grace and listens to our words of gratitude for blessings we have received through the day.

Often a child will run to his parents and sob out his fears and troubles. Understanding words usually calm his emotional upsets, and he soon forgets what it was that troubled him. God offers such reassurance to us if we ask for his spirit to be with us. We need never be afraid while he is watching over us.

As I grow with my son, I shall be forever grateful to God for sending such a wonderful example in his Son. This is truly the greatest gift of love he could have given each of his earthly children.

How They Are Taught About Santa

By Mrs. Lyle E. Jackson

I grew up with the idea that Santa is just a big fairy tale, that it was very wrong for children to believe in him, and that all who teach their children to believe are liars in no uncertain terms. As I grew older I changed a great many ideas and impressions that I had as a child, and the Santa story is one of them.

As I look back on my childhood I see that I missed a very joyful part of Christmas, and while Santa is not the greatest thing about Christmas, still he is important and entirely harmless in my opinion. If my parents had taught me that "every good and precious gift" came from Santa and that Santa was the only thing I should think about at Christmas, I feel that would have been wrong. Some class Santa as an idol to be worshiped; this, of course, is not what children should believe.

God and his Son and the Christmas story can be as sacred to the children who believe in Santa as to the ones who don't. If we taught them to get and not to give, then I would be apt to agree with the nonbelievers in Santa.

We read good stories every day and derive much from lessons that are not based on actual happenings. Is it wrong? Must we reject a story as a lie because it is based on the author's idea and not actual happenings? Why can't this apply to Santa? We need not lie. The lesson taught by the Santa story is giving to the poor and others and serving without thought of return. Has not the person who has learned that it is more blessed to give than to receive the actual message that the Master of men came to teach? Hasn't he learned the key to happiness and the real Christmas spirit?

I see no harm in believing the Santa story and giving gifts without thought of return. I think that the gifts we give without saying, "I gave it," are greater than those we do label. Santa isn't just a myth—he's a lesson. I have found that the gifts I have given in my life that were unlabeled were the ones which did the most good, and I have been blessed by giving them. I have seen from life and experience that the children and parents of "Santaless" homes have left out something important of the Christmas spirit. If unselfish giving is taught in a better way, well and good—but is it?

I think our children are giving and getting more out of Christmas than I did, because I feel that they know the real Christmas story and give it full importance in their thinking. My children expressed their philosophy pretty well the other day. The oldest said, "Sure, Santa has a lot of wonderful things in his bag, but where do you think they came from?" and the three youngest ones answered together, "God, of course!"

Through her years of membership she has served as a leader in the women's department and has assisted her husband in his work. Many missionaries will remember the kind hospitality of the LeBherz family whose home was always open to traveling ministers.

Brother LeBherz was baptized at Brisbane, Australia, on November 9, 1901, by John Kaler, along with twenty other persons who had formerly belonged to the Mormon Church. He assisted in the organization of Dunedin Branch, the first in New Zealand, and Auckland Branch, the largest in the dominion. He was ordained an elder in 1922. At the present time he is serving as counselor to the pastor in Auckland.

How It Works in Zion

Zion shall flourish, and the glory of God shall be upon her, and she shall be an ensign unto the people.

—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 8.

By Lee Hart

Stake Young People's Leader

THE CENTER STAKE of Zion is expanding in several ways. An intensified program of priesthood education and activity is apparent. A tremendous building program is under way. New missions are mushrooming. Young people are helping to build a vital youth program of no small proportions.

Some have said, "Why be concerned about young people? They are the church of tomorrow." Let me suggest that they are as much the church of today as any other age group.

Center Stake young people are fortunate in that they live in a concentration of church members where there is a superior quality of local leadership and where the services of an appointee are required to serve the youth. The last four years F. Carl Mesle has served in this capacity, and the program I will describe is largely the result of his unstinting efforts, the support of Stake President C. V. Graham and his associates, and a host of volunteer youth leaders.

The activity program in Zion, which they make possible, is designed to meet the needs of each young person eight through twenty-four years old. Every effort is made to assure the smooth transition of young people from the boys' and girls' program to Zion's League and so to young adults.

Girls' Work

The girls' program is amazingly effective in Independence. Two programs which are most effective are the Skylarks for girls eight through eleven years, and the Orioles for girls twelve through fourteen years. Girls of these ages are organized into small homogeneous units of ten to fifteen, and they meet in their own homes or the home of their leader. Their program activities include music, arts and crafts, games, storytelling, service projects, day camps, and summer camps.

The stake-wide summer camping program for girls is growing each year. This past summer the Skylarks had three overnight camping trips supplemented by a week of day-camping in Independence. The Orioles' interest in camping resulted in two different weeks of Oriole camps at Gardner Lake, the church camp near Excelsior Springs, Missouri. Each camp was attended by approximately eighty-five girls and twenty leaders. The value of these experiences can hardly be overestimated.

The administration of the girls' program comes primarily from the Skylark-Oriole Administrative Council. This is composed of a volunteer stake girls' director, two counselors, other officers, with the girls' director from each congregation, and the Stake Youth Director. Both the Skylark and Oriole leaders are organized for orientation of prospective leaders and continuous training and guidance for the unit workers.

Here Is the Writer . . .

Lee Hart was born in Coffeyville, Kansas, but moved with his parents to Independence, Missouri, when he was five years old. Here he was baptized in 1932 and graduated from William Chrisman High School in 1942. From 1943-46 he served in the Air Corps, spending two years in Africa. After he left the service he attended Grace-land College and George Williams College in Chicago. He received his B.S. degree in community recreation in 1950 and his M.S. degree in group work administration the following year. For three years he worked in Chicago YMCA's, returning to Independence in July, 1951, under General Church appointment to serve as stake young people's leader. He is married to the former Margaret Snowden of Evergreen, Alabama. They have one son, Dennis Lee, born November 13, 1951.

As in any youth program the success depends primarily upon the interest and devotion of trained leaders or leaders willing to grow through in-service training. It does not depend upon the number of girls in a branch, although this is a factor. The girls' activity in Independence is an example of what devotion and persistent effort can achieve.

The Center Stake is the laboratory for the church-approved program for Skylarks and Orioles. The success here evidences growing skill and correctness in objectives, techniques, and methods. Across the land there are many girls who need what these programs have to offer; they wait only upon those adults who care enough to organize and administer the program. What more essential work could any woman do than to give leadership to growing girls?

Boys' Work

The congregations in Center Stake are utilizing the national program of the Boy Scouts of America, and this is the primary activity program for boys here. Programming is done in a manner similar to that in any good Scout troop, with perhaps an increased emphasis upon spiritual development of the boy. The institutional representative from each congregation attends bimonthly meetings sponsored by the stake to discuss the problems involved in channeling the Scouting program into its most fruitful service to the boy and the church.

Each year, in addition to the Scouts' usual camping experience, they are offered a week-end retreat at the church camp at which only church-sponsored troops attend. This year 100 Scouts and their leaders attended and there added to the usual camp-out experience that of meaningful worship, classwork, and association with others of like faith. Plans are for a winter holiday at the lake this season which will further stimulate church interest and allegiance.

The Scout activity which brings a boy closest to the church objectives is that which he engages in while working on his God and Country award. This is the award equal in merit to the rank of Eagle and, in my opinion, the most vital element in the program. To achieve this award the Scout must educate himself in church doctrine, history, and law as well as render a great deal of service to the church. It is the "big push" in Center Stake boys' work at present. Further information is available upon request to the Department of Religious Education, in care of the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

The need for leadership and co-operation from parents and pastors is as essential here as in girls' work. Scouting is challenging and worth while to almost any boy if leaders will make it so. In Center Stake the trend is toward recognizing that no greater missionary contribution may be made by a man than to work devotedly in Scouting. It requires the best of any layman or priesthood member.

The Zion's League

There are nineteen Zion's Leagues in Independence, averaging about thirty-five active members each who range from fourteen through twenty-five years old. The Leagues use the commission system of organization, which is designed to involve every Leaguer in planning activities. They meet weekly, usually for a Sunday evening program, and ordinarily have at least two social activities per month.

Long-range planning of programs and activities are done democratically by the cabinet under the watchful eye of the League leader or sponsor. Here again the leader is the key person to the success of the program.

Many co-operative activities are conducted on a stake-wide basis, but always with the objective of developing a more spiritual and cohesive local League. Winter holidays, activity nights at the Auditorium, special programs at Thanksgiving and Christmas, and an annual drama festival are the major winter activities. In summer there are youth camps, reunion, recreation on the campus, and an annual Labor Day retreat as the big attractions. Young people need activities to which they can give their best. These large-scale programs help give inspiration for better small unit operation.

To facilitate these stake-wide activities a city-wide cabinet of ten members functions. To members in the past this experience has proved invaluable.

Young People's Supervisor

A most important person in the local congregation is the young people's supervisor. He is the pastor's right hand man in the promotion and supervision of the youth programs. This office is relatively new in the stake, but experience shows he is making possible support of the youth program by the other departments and better interpretation of what the young people are doing to the congregation. He also attempts to keep the youth programs a "part of" and not "apart from" the rest of the branch activities.

Outlook for the Future

There are many more activities, plans, and problems that have not been mentioned. I hope they will continue, for the young people of the church can never develop into able and stable examples of "Christ in us" unless a dynamic program keeps them active and growing.

Eventually we hope the program will be so organized that all young people may be more adequately served, especially in the Zion's League age range. For only when all can become actively engaged in helping to plan, conduct, and evaluate their activities will they be tied to the church with a really cohesive bond.

Suggestions for Youth Leaders

Good youth leaders aren't born; they are primarily self made. Leadership requires sacrificial service and continual search for unique ideas, techniques, and methods.

Young people need challenging activities in worship, study, service, and recreation. You must live on the growing edge yourself before you can lead them there. Involve all the young people as much as possible and let them know the church needs them. Youth leaders should never plan a program alone, but should lead and guide the young people into planning it themselves. Let democracy rule unless some basic principle is involved.

Always keep in mind your objectives. Activities are a means to an end, not the end themselves. All should contribute to the development of a Christlike personality.

Subscribe to Guidelines from Herald House, Youth Leader's Digest and Program Peps from Youth Service, Inc., Peekskill, New York, or other youth leader's helps.

Catch the vision of Zion's possibility in young people today; keep that continually in your thinking and that of your young people.

Opportunity

Even the humblest person can spend a little of his strength in making his tiny corner of the world a little cleaner and pleasanter. A powerful financial, political and industrial figure would find huge things which had to be done, some part of which he could attack. The act of contribution is the act of assuming a place in the scheme of things. There is no other way in which an individual can become a part of society.—Adolf A. Berle, Jr.

Graceland

Gazette

■ Twenty-five members of Graceland's Engineering Seminar, accompanied by Mr. N. L. Jacobson, head of Graceland's engineering faculty, recently spent two days in Kansas City on the seminar's annual field trip. There they visited a number of industrial concerns where they saw engineers and engineering in action and looked for answers to questions about their field which cannot be answered in the classroom. They also learned of the most recent developments in industrial tools and processes.

■ Three services constituted the Thanksgiving unit in Graceland religious life. A Wednesday evening fellowship, "I Am Thankful for These Things," began the unit. Clifford A. Cole, Dean of Students, spoke at the worship service on Sunday morning before the holiday. On Sunday evening, a student committee presented a series of tableaux interspersed with choral reading and music. The tableaux expressed thanks for the light of the sun; the Light of the World, the Christ; the light of the restored gospel; and the light of revelation. The service was intended to make Thanksgiving significant even to those for whom it is not a national holiday.

■ The music department presented a recent assembly program. Members of the music faculty discussed the singing voice and a number of musical instruments; a student or an instructor demonstrated each one. An octet demonstrated the use of different voice parts in choral work; Russell Walsh, Long Lake, Minnesota, demonstrated the use of piano pedals, the use of the piano as a percussion instrument, and the piano accordion. Harold Keairnes, Kansas City, Missouri, demonstrated the piano as a cantabile instrument; Liana Worthington, New York City, the harp; Florine Cline, Oakland, California, the marimba; and Dianne Stiles, Chariton, Iowa, the timpani. William Graves and Roy Benson of the faculty demonstrated the glockenspiel and the organ.

 ARE YOU WEARING A CORNCOB?

Don't scratch now, but if the new fluorescent yellow sweater you are wearing gives you an itchy spot just under the left shoulder blade where you can't reach, maybe it was made out of a corncob—one of the most abrasive things grown on the farm. For corncobs-into-sweaters is one of the amazing transformations available to the textile industry as a result of research like that now carried on at the Department of Agriculture's Northern Regional Agriculture Research Laboratory at Peoria, Illinois, according to an interesting clipping sent to us by District President Lyle W. Woodstock. The article originally appeared in the "Wall Street Journal."

New uses for the "waste" materials of agriculture—corncobs, cornstalks, straw, peach pits, etc.—may ultimately absorb everything that is grown on the soil. Research has now passed far beyond the stage of merely reprocessing existing materials, and modern technology takes almost any product and makes an entirely new kind of material out of it through chemistry. The time may come when, contradicting the familiar proverb, it may be entirely possible to "make a silk purse out of a sow's ear," if it has not already been done. That, however, is "still in the laboratory," and has not yet reached commercial production.

It is no joke, therefore, to say that there may be a corncob in your pretty new sweater, which will be perfectly smooth and soft. The itch you feel may be an allergy; it can't be caused by a scratch.

And who knows—if modern science can take the scratch out of a corncob, perhaps a way can be found of transforming human nature too, smoothing down our rough spots, making us into new creatures. But this is the task of religion, not of the laboratory.

Time is killing you!

 GROWTH

In one of the larger religious journals, a writer of another denomination has observed (apparently with some apprehension for his own church) that the Southern Baptists have been making a remarkable growth. In the last ten years they have added 4,000 new churches and 4,000,000 new members to their lists. They represent the fastest growing church in the United States today.

Reasons assigned by the minister for that growth are interesting: 1. biological increase and holding the young people; 2. appeal to the underprivileged; 3. appeal to rural types, even those that have gone to the cities; 4. congregational autonomy and freedom; 5. churches that serve as real centers of social life, open every night of the week; 6. emphasis on social service and helpfulness to needy; 7. a simple faith based on Bible preaching.

The general increase of membership in Christian churches of the United States (close to 55 per cent of the population belong to some Christian church) has brought general satisfaction; but in a highly competitive situation it may be said that churches watch each other anxiously when one forges ahead rapidly. It would be beneficial if this watching were motivated by a desire to learn.

Dan Sorden Dies

Daniel B. Sorden, missionary, teacher, and radio minister of the church, passed away on Friday night, December 14, 1951, while visiting relatives at Mesa, Arizona, with his wife. He had undergone a long and threatening illness, and had made a partial recovery.

A biographical sketch of Brother Sorden appeared in this department in the August 20 Herald. Statistical notes will be found in a later issue. Here we are concerned with his personality and contribution to the church.

Genial, warm, friendly, sincere—this is how his many friends will remember him. Another word, "skill," was a keynote of his life. On the tennis courts at Graceland, when he was a young man, he was an able ally, a formidable opponent. In his teaching, he was in full command of his materials and the situation. As a missionary, he represented the church in a pleasant, fine-spirited way. As a radio minister he won friends for the church and its people. During his illness, when suffering was upon him, he was brave and patient and did not complain.

To Sister Sorden—his charming, thoughtful, devoted companion—to his daughter Marilyn, librarian at Graceland College, and to the rest of his family, we express sympathy and sorrow at his passing.

PRESIDENT IN EAST

President Israel A. Smith returned from his trip to the east Tuesday, December 11, and reports very fine meetings, particularly the one held in Parkersburg, West Virginia. Apostle Maurice L. Draper was associated with the President at the particular meeting.

Smith, pastor of the Stone Church and counselor to the stake presidency, presided, associated with W. Wallace Smith of the First Presidency, Stake President Charles V. Graham, Counselor Fred O. Davies, Bishop Harold Cackler, and Elder M. L. Parker. Twelve men from Walnut Park, three from Stone Church, and six from Spring Branch, were approved for ordination.

CAMPAIGN ENDS SUCCESSFULLY

The campaign to raise a $35,000 fund for the Sanitarium by the citizens of Independence was over the top of the set goal with a total of $38,310.75, it was announced at an appreciation dinner for the campaign workers November 29. The dinner was held at the Laurel Club Dining Room of the Auditorium. Among the speakers of the evening were President Israel A. Smith, Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp, and A. Neal Deaver. Special commendation was given employees of the Sanitarium who contributed $1,770.

RALLY HELD

A missionary rally for the Northern Alabama District was held December 8-9, at McKenzie, Alabama. Ministers were Bishop Joseph Baldwin, Evangelist A. D. McCall, High Priests J. A. The Greatest Christmas Gift

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men."—Luke 2:14, A.V.

IF YOU WERE ASKED, "What was the greatest Christmas gift in the world?" what would you say?

You would consider many great Christmas gifts to answer that question. Your search would lead you into the biographies of kings and statesmen, the captains of industry and trade, masters of finance, the great ones of science and education, the philanthropists of the world, the sages and philosophers, the leaders of human thought.

And, inevitably, you would go back to the beginning and your attention would be turned toward the first Christmas gift that was ever made.

In the pages of your Bible you would find these words:

God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.—John 3:16.

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS GIFT was an expression of love—the greatest love that was ever known. Since that gift was made, all good Christmas gifts have been expressions of love, or they were not true Christmas gifts. They may have been "investments," or they may have been mere bait, so to speak, but certainly not Christmas gifts. Love is the indispensable element.

It is also impressive, as one considers the matter, that the first Christmas gift is still the greatest one. There could be no greater gift than the Son of God who became our Savior and brought us eternal life.

THE HOLIDAYS were approaching. In all the shop windows and on the city square, the Christmas decorations were going up. A rubicund Santa Claus, jolly and fat, was seen in a thousand forms riding in a sleigh behind fantastic reindeer over snowy fields and forests, destined to leave his gifts at the fire-sides of picturesque cottages gleaming with light and cheer.

Christmas went to school, too, as children helped their teachers put the decorations on the walls and plan the programs.

In the midst of such exciting preparations, one small boy said to his teacher, quite solemnly and with utter finality, "My Daddy says there isn't any Santa Claus!" A storm of protest arose from the other children. Some were in tears. Would they snatch Christmas away before anyone could enjoy it?

The wise teacher took the little fellow in her arms and said, "Look, Bobby, Santa Claus is the spirit of loving and giving! We like to give things to people because we love them. Does that help?"

It helped Bobby, and it brought peace to the young members of the class. The Christmas preparations went on, and each child understood them in his own way.

THERE IS SOMETHING BIGGER than Santa Claus in that idea. "The spirit of loving and giving."

It is big enough for the Heavenly Father, too. He has a great love for his children. He wants to give what is good for them.

If ye . . . know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?—Matthew 7:11.

Whatever your notions of Christmas may be, if they include that spirit of loving and giving, they will be big enough.

The spirit of loving and giving could do a lot for our troubled world, if we would give it a chance. It can do much for every individual person, too.

AT THIS CHRISTMAS SEASON, it will help all of us who are engaged in the work of the church to remember the first and greatest of all Christmas gifts, and to renew in our minds the "spirit of loving and giving" that was back of it.

We enjoy the gifts we receive. They remain with us for various periods of time as reminders of those who love us. But we do no more than half-live if we only receive. The fullness of life is found in giving.

The beauty and worth of a field of ripe wheat is not in what is taken in at the roots, but in the golden harvest it holds at the top of the tall stems. If we are to love, we must give. Our lives are expressed as our happiness is found in what we give.

Just before the holidays, I visited a new mission of the church in a small city not far away. It is a congregation of families. There are many young people and children, and numbers of new members, just learning about the church. The pastor is a young volunteer, serving without compensation, for love of God and the people. Other volunteers are helping for the same reasons. There were Christmas decorations at the windows of the hall where they meet. One senses a feeling of vibrant hope and expectancy. Something great is beginning to happen in the hearts and souls of those people. They are experiencing the Christmas Gift. The Christ has moved into their lives. They are receiving God's love. L.J.L.

Comparative Report, Ten Months' Income, 1950-1951

We have been making monthly reports of comparative income for the years 1950-1951 and are now submitting unaudited figures covering the ten-month period. Attention is called to the gain of $135,292.33, or a percentage increase of 14.46. While this looks very favorable, we wish to call attention to the necessity for a most substantial income for the month of December if this fine showing is to be maintained.

Our income for the months of November and December last year totaled $313,864.47, of which the December income amounted to $220,491.48. Meeting this figure, together with the amount being requested for Auditorium construction, will indeed present a real challenge to all for this closing month of 1951.

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

We are glad to report information coming from Brother Calvin V. French, president of the Rich Hill District, that at the conclusion of a two weeks' preaching service in Butler there were seven new members added to the church. This brings their total for 1951 to seventy-five, one of the best records we have had in that area. We feel confident that the baptisms for the year will surpass that of previous years if we have this kind of success everywhere.

The following letter has reached us through Elbert A. Smith, Presiding Patriarch:

I have been intending to write to you for some time, but we have been on the go throughout the islands, and have just recently returned from the island of Kaukura, where we spent almost two weeks dedicating a church and attending a mission conference there.

We have been very busy since my arrival here. On all my trips throughout the islands Seventy Horahitu has been with me. These were his first visits to these different islands as a seventy and my first visits as a patriarch. We have enjoyed our work together immensely.

In our work together we preached in all the branches we visited endeavoring to revive the Saints and to do missionary work too. We have baptized about forty and have felt a very fine spirit in all our work.

I have given several blessings, commencing that phase of patriarchal work last month, and during the days of the mission conference I blessed thirty-one persons, among them several district presidents, elders, and others. I have a hundred names in and will give at least one hundred fifty to one hundred seventy-five blessings in addition to my other patriarchal work.

The Lord has blessed me thus far in my work and I consider it a great honor to have been sent here on this new mission among these people where I have spent almost fourteen of my forty-two years of ministry for the church.

I expect to be leaving for America sometime after the middle of February or about the first of March.

May God bless his church throughout all the world.

One Night in Bethlehem

The Story of the First Christmas Eve in History

By Elbert A. Smith

IF I AM PERMITTED to read the lines and between the lines written by Matthew and Luke, and to use my imagination, as so many writers have done, the story unfolds something like this.

Among a considerable number of people converging upon the little town of Bethlehem by order of the great Caesar Augustus, that they might be numbered and taxed, there was one family of two, Joseph and Mary. Upon the morrow they were to be three.

Unwittingly by his order Caesar had set the stage for one to be born in Bethlehem greater than he or any of the Caesars before or after him.

But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.—Micah 5:2.

The First Christmas Candles Are Lighted

It may have been no fault of the innkeeper that when Joseph and Mary arrived that night there was no room for them in the inn. The road had been long and weary, and Mary was not able to travel even at the slow pace then considered rapid. So when they arrived all available space in the inn, and presumably in neighboring homes, had been taken. Perhaps the innkeeper did the best that he could have done for them when he provided room in a stable. We may hope that he cleaned the place a bit and provided fresh straw for the manger and some sort of bed for the tired travelers.

We sing, "O little town of Bethlehem, How still we see thee lie!" But it is not reasonable to imagine that the little town was quiet in the early hours of that evening. It was jam packed with transients seeking shelter as it might be found. Probably many of them lay down in the open. However, the confusion finally subsided; one by one the lights in the little homes went out, and Bethlehem slept under the stars.

Then in the stable where Joseph and Mary had sought rest, the quiet was broken by the cry of a woman in travail. It was not a scream—lest neighbors be disturbed. It was more like the subdued whimpering of a child. Mary was frightened in such a strange place. The thing that Joseph had feared was happening. He sprang from his slumber and with troubled mind, but steady hands, lighted a candle. We may call it the first Christmas Eve candle to be lighted in the Christian Era. Mary's courage returned with the light.

Not much is written about Joseph, but we have enough to know that he was a fine, resourceful, courageous, and kindly person—and he loved his wife Mary. He scarcely would have been caught unprepared. Reassuring Mary, he stepped to the door of the stable and called into the night the name of a friendly, experienced woman, also from Nazareth, who came quickly.

So while Joseph held one of Mary's small hands in one of his big hands, strong from wielding axe and adze, and while with the other hand he tenderly wiped the sweat from Mary's brow, Jesus was born.

In a small, close-packed town in restless slumber even a little disturbance spreads from house to house, and other lights came on—the first lights of the first Christmas Eve in history.

Jesus was born. He was wrapped in swaddling cloths that the foresighted Mary had brought with her.

He was placed in the manger. Mary lay weak and relaxed, and Joseph urged her to sleep. The neighbors went back to their rest, and Bethlehem again lay still under the stars.

The Shepherds Come Running

Not for long was the quiet unbroken. A group of shepherds "came with haste." They came heedless of the sleep of others, careless of their own noise, eager, tremendously excited. They had seen and heard great things. Some of them shouted their tidings as they ran seeking the child of whom they had heard such wonderful things. They declared that as they watched their sleeping flocks by night, suddenly the glory of the Lord shone upon them and they had been dreadfully frightened; but the angel of the Lord that appeared to them said:

Fear not, for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you: Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.—Luke 2:10-12.

Then their astonished ears heard the first Christmas chorus rendered by a great multitude of the heavenly host, singing Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.—Luke 2:14.

It is small wonder that the shepherds came running to Bethlehem, full of their message, careless of the sleep of others. Small wonder that having found Joseph and Mary and having actually seen "the babe in the manger," as promised them, "they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child. And all that heard it wondered at those things told them by the shepherds."

As waves circle out when a rock is thrown into a pool, so news spreads from door to door in a small town. There was no more sleep that night in Bethlehem.

The First Christmas Gifts

It may have happened yet that night, or on another night soon thereafter—who knows? Certainly it was at night and a part of the yuletide story. The people of Bethlehem suddenly became conscious of a new star in the heavens. These people lived much in the open. They knew the stars. They were not blinded by neon signs and all the brilliant lights of great cities that challenge the stars of heaven and drag men's eyes down to earth.

They did not know just when this star first appeared. Suddenly it was there! It "came and stood over the place where the young child was." It was such a star as they had never before seen. Guided by its rays, through the night came "wise men" to the very place where Jesus lay in the manger. Tradition has it that there were three of these men, mounted on camels. Some speculated that they were kings. Some said they were princes. Some said they were priests. Others held them to be inspired men of the East to whom kings came for counsel. Matthew simply wrote that they were "wise men from the east."

They came riding through the night, guided by the star, doubtless attended by servants and guards. They halted at the door and dismounted. They entered and fell down and worshiped the child Jesus.

Great men—worshipping a baby born in a stable! They brought him gifts of gold and frankincense and myrrh. God in a stable! Fragrant perfumes in a stable! It seemed the wonders of that Christmas would never cease. They never have ceased!

When morning came and Joseph went out and stood with bared head facing toward Jerusalem, and the sun came up over the low hills and flooded all the plains and valleys of the Holy Land, it was the first Christmas Day and the beginning of the Christian Era.

Through that night just closing another baby had slept not too far from Bethlehem. He was to grow to manhood and, standing on the banks of the river Jordan and seeing Jesus pass by, he was to proclaim, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." Yes, "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world" was born in Bethlehem—in a stable. He had left the mansions of glory on high to come down to earth and lie in a manger. Some sad day he would die on a cross. Some happy day he would rise again and ascend up on high to sit at the right hand of God.

In this confused and troubled world of today it is the privilege and duty of those who believe in him to take abroad the message that the shepherds heard: "We bring you glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people."

Feliz Navidad

By Nellie Mae Lindsay

AS THE CHRISTMAS SEASON approaches each year, it seems that it is becoming only a time of hustle and bustle—a time of excitement and confusion. I wonder if many of us are not forgetting the reason we celebrate this day—if we are not forgetting to instill into our children's minds that this is a time not of "What are we going to get for Christmas?" but of "What are we going to give to show our appreciation to God for sending us his Son as a gift on that first Christmas night?"

Since living on the Mexican border for several Christmas seasons, I have been made aware of the different feeling the Mexican people have for this celebration. Their name for the holiday signifies the different feeling they have for this season. Feliz Navidad in Spanish means Happy Nativity. The Mexican people truly observe this holiday as a celebration of the Nativity.

It is true that a majority of these people tend to use the Baby Jesus and the Virgin Mary in their religious services all during the year because of their religion, but even if this influence is seen, these people have a more religious attitude toward the whole season. There is greater attendance at all religious services, and they seem to have a more devout feeling for the birth of Christ and its meaning to them. Almost all of their homes, even down to the small adobe huts, have nativity scenes for a week before Christmas. Gifts are given, but since a large majority of these people are in the poorer economical class, these gifts are not seen in great profusion as is the case in many of our American homes.

Let us pattern our Christmas holidays after these descendants of Nephi and truly have a Feliz Navidad as well as a Merry Christmas.

Greetings From the British Isles Mission

WE LIVE TODAY under conditions which seem to mock the message of Christmas. Cessation of actual warfare has not brought peace to Europe nor indeed to the world. The people of Britain anxiously scan the headlines daily and listen to newscasts telling of new disturbances, threats, and outbreaks of violence. Fear seems to be the order of the day. Insecurity and uncertainty lurk in the shadows of speeding events. Many homes are saddened by tragic news of the death of a son or a father on the field of battle in faraway Korea or in the steaming jungles of Malaya. All of these things and many more are a far cry from the message which was sung by the heavenly choir on that holy night so long ago: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men."

Peace, the illusive prize for which millions seek, seems to have escaped us. The cry increases daily for peace, peace—and yet peace is not to be found among the nations of earth. As threatening shadows seem to forecast coming events there is a question daily on the lips of thousands, "Why can't we be left to live our own lives as we choose?" Could it be that the question gives its own answer?

Live our own lives? Ah, that is the crux of our dilemma. Can men live to themselves, disregarding the One who has given life to all? As individuals our lives have not been peaceful. Thousands daily seek the psychiatrist for release from nervous tension and relief from a sense of guilt. Men attempting to live their own lives have become self-centered, selfish, sensual, and devilish. Peace to the multitudes has not meant love of neighbor as one loves self, justice, or righteousness. It has meant living for self, giving full expression to passions and lusts. It has meant using the sacred trusts of material possessions for selfish designs and purposes. Pleasure has been the end of our seeking. These things we have treasured. We have wanted peace without paying the price of peace. Conscience apparently discerns little difference between right and wrong. Sin finds its abode in public and private life and in the homes of rich and poor alike. Man was not designed to live his own life. He was designed to live the life of Christ, to be of the kingdom of God.

PEACE IS NOT A CLOAK to be put on and taken off at will. Peace comes from harmonious relationships with the Creator and fellow-man; it springs from the innermost recesses of the soul. In exceedingly trying times similar to those of today, Jesus spoke to his disciples and said, "Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me. I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."

Peace will come to this troubled world only through the reign of the Prince of Peace. This can be made possible only as men's hearts are cleansed and purified through humble, sincere repentance and a genuine turning to the way of truth. In so doing the Master will again speak in no uncertain tones and say, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you."

TO THE GREAT TASK of making possible the reign of the Prince of Peace the Saints of the British Isles have set their hands. There has been an increased desire on the part of many to witness for Jesus Christ and tell of the way of the kingdom. Baptismal results verify this assertion.

The hearts of many who have named the name of Jesus Christ have turned to the land of Zion with sincere yearning to assist in the work of the Gathering. Some of England's finest families have left these shores and joined in the work of Zion-building. With these migrations the bonds of love and fellowship are strengthened. We become more nearly one in the cause of peace.

Because of the great distances that separate us from the Saints of other lands we cannot come in person to their homes and wish them a Merry Christmas, but when the eve of the anniversary of the birth of the Prince of Peace arrives, we will be thinking of them and praying that the angels shall sing anew in their hearts the song of Peace and Good Will.

Seeing the Star

By Jennie Z. Elliott

Whenever I read about the great telescopes on Mount Wilson and Palomar, and that it is through their "eyes" astronomers are seeing for the first time the glories of a universe far more vast than they had dreamed of, I am awed into breathless silence and into a new realization that, truly, the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament shows forth his handiwork.

It may be that the unfolding of the universe seems even more wonderful to me, who have not seen the stars for almost a lifetime, than it seems to you who, on a clear night, can look up into a star-filled sky.

But although I cannot see the stars, there's one star I can always see. For on Christmas Eve, by faith, I see the star of Bethlehem shining brightly upon the Wise Men's path.

And, just as that star shines for me, even so will it shine into the darkness of the world's confusion and strife if men and nations will but look, by faith, until they see it.

Greetings From Hawaii

THE MEMBERS of the church in the Hawaiian Islands are happy for the opportunity to send Christmas greetings to the church world-wide. These greetings come from representatives of all races of which our cosmopolitan membership is composed.

Many of you have met a few of our members at General Conference and elsewhere. You are meeting an increasing number at Graceland College and the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital where Hawaii has representations of twenty and sixty students respectively. We know that you cannot meet all our people, but we would like to introduce a few of them. We feel you will enjoy getting acquainted with a representative group who send you greetings from Hawaii.

It may be well to begin with Evangelist Charles A. Lee whom some of you met at General Conference in 1946. Brother Lee is Chinese-Hawaiian and spent part of his early life in China. During his life he has spoken and written Chinese, Hawaiian, and English. He is a true father and patriarch to the church. Sister Alice Kanui of Hilo is our oldest member, having spent more than fifty years in the church. She is Hawaiian and may be regarded as the matriarch of Hawaii.

Elder Tsunao Miyamoto is one of our oldest members among the Japanese. He is our district bishop's agent and is a counselor in the Kapalama congregation. Elder Peter Ahuna, the other counselor, a Hawaiian-Chinese, was a Catholic before becoming a part of our fellowship.

Elder Akira Sakima, Japanese, had his ancestral roots in Okinawa. The parents of Elder David Kumata came from Hiroshima in Japan. These men are counselors in the Kalihi congregation. Most of the Japanese members, or their parents, have been Buddhists at one time or another.

Elder Henry Mahi, counselor in the district presidency and in the Makiki congregation, was born of Hawaiian parents in the leper colony at Kalaupapa on the island of Molokai, and was fortunate enough not to contract the disease. Elder Elias Kaawakauo, the other counselor at Makiki, and his wife are among the relatively few full-blood Hawaiians in the Islands.

Elder Elwin R. Vest and family came to Hawaii earlier this year. Brother Vest is the first counselor in the district presidency and is also pastor of the Hilo Branch on the island of Hawaii. His counselors are Miguel de la Cruz, Spanish-Portuguese-Hawaiian, and Charles Aki, Chinese-Hawaiian.

At least two former general church appointees reside and work here in the Islands. They are Elder Frank B. Almond, who was once appointed to Tahiti, and Elder Virgil B. Etzenhauser, who was appointed to Hawaii.

Among others that might be mentioned are John C. Ledo, Portuguese, and Marcelo Pagat, Filipino, converts from Catholicism, who are among the best deacons in the church.

We regret that space does not permit us to include the fine women who are doing no less for the work here than the men. Many times we feel they are doing more.

Those mentioned and many others join in sending you the most sincere greetings at this festive season. May the Spirit of Christ burn in your heart is our earnest desire.

A. ORLIN CROWNOVER
District President

Greetings From Tahiti

WE, THE AMERICAN and Australian missionary force of Tahiti, the native missionary Harahitu Tauhiti, and all the Saints of French Oceania, send to the church our greetings of love at this Christmas season. We want you to know that though we are removed thousands of miles from the Center Place of the church, we still feel a part of the onward movement of the kingdom. We expect the Spirit of Christ to warm our hearts this season the same as yours.

Truly the Tahitians and their Paumotuan brothers of the dangerous lower archipelago are only a couple of hundred years removed from the savagery of their cannibalistic ancestors. Yet they have completely forsaken those ancient and pagan customs under the influence of the gospel of Christ. They do not worship a different God from us, but believe and follow the Messiah whom they call Iesu Mesia te Tamaiti a te Atua—Jesus Christ the Son of God. As with us, he has become for them the very center of all that is good and their hope of eternal redemption.

Together we thank our Heavenly Father for the unbounded love and sacrifice revealed through the birth of Jesus Christ. Such matchless love for us—white, black, brown, and yellow—unites us all as brothers. The divine sacrifice demands from us a return in some degree, small though it may be, a comparable sacrifice of service.

Our final thought of greeting and blessing for you finds its expression in that lovely characteristic Tahitan phrase, Ia ora na pae outou na roto i te aroha o Iesu Tarai, Amene—May you all have life through the love of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Greetings From the German Mission

THIS IS THE SEASON of the year when Christian people everywhere are thinking in terms of gifts. We have many gifts to be thankful for—sight, hearing, and the three other senses or any part of them that we may have. Too often during this season we do not think of these gifts.

Today our minds go back to the time when another gift was given. This gift was not wrapped in red or green paper, but in swaddling cloth and laid in a manger—not under the traditional evergreen tree. This was the greatest gift to all mankind—the birth of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. The birth of Christ marked a new area in kingdom-building. His birth meant to both men and women in that day and ours that “God so loved the world that he gave his only Begotten Son.” He came into the world that we might have life and have it more abundantly; as we recount the years since the time of his birth, can we truly say that the world has not seen his light or found the abundant way? It is true that there are a few who seem to have found the way, but we have much to do in order to bring about the more abundant life.

Those of us who have been called to labor among the people in this part of God’s vineyard have come to see the necessity of living as Christ taught; when we fail to follow Christ, we do not suffer from his neglect but from our own neglect. We have been permitted in these past few years to view the sins of man in their stark reality—suffering, hunger, and death are only a few of the many things that go to make up man’s own punishment. As we see these things about us, we are reminded at this time of year that Christ our Lord and Savior came into the world to save us from all this if we will but follow him. Let us take off the wrapping of this gift; let us come to understand the full meaning of his birth; then let us lay our gifts before him as the Wise Men of that early day—the gift of service and obedience. If every Christian would resolve in his heart to take up Christ’s way and follow him, then the voices in political power would become insignificant, for the voices of the righteous would drown out the voices that we hear today.

The Saints in the German mission join me in wishing the members of the church throughout the world this season’s best. We pledge our hearts and lives together with yours in service to Christ. That his peace and blessings may be with us all on Christmas Day is our earnest prayer.

Greetings From Australia

WE ARE HAPPY for the opportunity to send a word of Christmas greeting to the church of Christ throughout the world.

As the Christmas season approaches, it causes us to stop to take inventory of the happenings and developments of the year that is now drawing to a close. The Lord has been most kind to us here in the “Land Down Under,” and a goodly number of those who have given allegiance to Christ have labored diligently, which has resulted in consistent progress being made throughout the mission.

While in most of the world the Saints have been digging out their red flannels and putting on their overcoats, here in Australia we are looking forward to, and preparing for, Tiona Reunion. The usual greeting now when Saints meet is, “Are you going to Tiona?” or “I’ll be seeing you at Tiona.” Tiona has filled a big place in the life of the church in Australia. After experiencing a Tiona Reunion, one cannot help but feel grateful to Brother J. W. Davis who played such an important part in the selection of this beautiful spot.

Australia now has another fine reunion location that also promises to be outstanding. This is located in the Victoria District, about one hundred miles north of Melbourne. This beautiful place known now as the Mountain Hut Reunion grounds is located in the upper reaches of the Strathbogie Mountains. The Saints held their first reunion here last year after a sensational job of getting the grounds ready in a very short time. They had to start from scratch, as the location is out in what they speak of as “typical bush country.” This year has seen many improvements made, and the present prospects are that an outstanding reunion will be experienced.

We are happy to know that the past year has seen the whole church truly progressing as it gathers its forces more definitely to move to the task of building the kingdom. What a wonderful privilege it is to have the opportunity of belonging to the church of Christ that has such an ideal as can challenge all of the people in all the world.

Our sincere Christmas wishes are that God will hasten the day when, through Zion, the nations of the world will be led to the ways of peace. Our hope, as the angels prophesied at the birth of Christ many years ago, is that the time may speedily come when there shall be “peace on earth and good will to all men.”

The Valiant

By Mabel Williams Crayne

IT WAS THE DAY before Christmas. Snow had been coming down in soft flakes since noon "like bits of down from the angels' wings." At least that was what Anna Harrington said about it, but there was a note of bitterness in her voice. Her husband, John, had teasingly insisted that so much cooking and preparation was foolish since they would have no company the next day on account of the snow.

"You can count on the Carters being here for dinner," she said. "Besides, I've never seen any of my fruit cake or pies go to waste. It's you, Johnny my boy, that gets the biggest share."

"Sure," said John, "my mother taught me to 'waste not and want not.' That turkey is a noble looking bird and your baking smells so good that I wish Christmas was today and I would be saved from this terrible wanting and you wouldn't be wasting."

"Get along with your blarney," said Anna, giving him a forced smile, "and don't be trying to discourage my Christmas spirit because of a little snow. There's not the slightest breeze."

John knew that under this show of having to hurry and get ready for Christmas, Anna was hiding the tears that were in her heart. A letter had come just a few days before from their son Frank saying that he and his family could not be with them for Christmas, as he would soon be on his way to Japan again. The family already had been sent to Montana where his wife would be near her people. If he could arrange his affairs and have a day to spare he would see them on his way to the coast. Frank had spent two and a half years in Japan, and Anna thought that was enough.

When John came in that evening with the milk, he said, "The wind's raising and it's pretty strong already. In an hour it'll whip this loose snow into a fury I'd hate to face on the highway."

Anna stopped her work and stood looking at him for a moment, and then all her pent-up feelings came out in unhappy words. "I'm sick of this place with its snow and its blizzards that spoil everything! I want a Christmas with other people. I don't want to be stuck out here in this God-forgotten valley where we do nothing but work and never have any pleasures. I wish you had sold it to Abner Watson—every foot of it—then we could live in California near my sister and her family and have a real Christmas without all this cold and snow that stays for months. I'm sick of it!"

"I'm afraid it wouldn't seem much like Christmas to either of us without the snow," he answered. "Perhaps the wind'll die down by morning and your day won't be entirely spoiled. I know what's hurting you, Honey, and it's not the weather. I'm just as disappointed as you are, and it's going to be hard for both of us because we had counted so much on having Frank's three kids here to liven up the place. But we have a lot to be thankful for. Our house is snug and warm, and neither of us is alone. I have you, and you have me—that should be enough at our age. There are a lot of good people in this old world living alone in little hotel rooms and climbing three flights of stairs to get to them. This cold and snow of ours won't last. There's always another spring on the farm, and you know how we both enjoy it."

John put his arm about his wife and drew her close to him. His sympathetic understanding softened her rebellion and brought heart-easing tears. "I remember one day last spring," he continued, "when I was coming home from town. I turned off the highway onto our dirt road at the top of the hill and stopped the car. I looked down into this little valley of ours and wished I could paint a picture of it just as it was that day. The road looked like a little cow path through the growing wheat fields, until it came to the river. Our house was clean and white against the green of the hills, and there was the big red barn beside it. I saw Jake bringing the cattle down to the river to drink, and Shep nipping their heels if they lagged behind. The sheep and lambs were grazing on the hillside in the north pasture. I came on down and stopped at the ford. There was plenty of water in the Pipe Stem, and the beavers were building a dam. That little dirt road doesn't stop at our house, Anna—it winds on through the hills and coulees to good neighbors on other farms like ours. I know this is hard to take right now; but spring'll be here soon." He waited for some response but none came. "Well, I guess I'd better separate the milk while you finish supper. Then we'll trim our tree."

THE TREE was not trimmed that night. Just as they finished supper, Shep, lying on his rug in the corner, barked excitedly and ran to the door and then back to John.

"Now what's the matter with that dog?" asked Anna impatiently.

"Whatever it is," said John, "I'd better find out. Shep don't get that excited about nothing." He went to the door and looked out. It was, as he had predicted, a very bad night for man or beast. Then he heard a noise at the barn. "It's that ornery Queen again. She must've got loose," he said. "I forgot and left the buckskin next to her stall. I'd better get out to the barn or she'll kick Dolly and maybe break a leg." He hurried into his fur-lined coat, cap, mittens, and heavy boots. Anna was waiting with the lighted lantern.

"I wish you didn't have to go out," she said anxiously. "I'm worried because you didn't put up that guide wire between the house and the barn."

"I'll be all right," he said, "but I'll admit the guide wire would help tonight." The dog went with him to the door, but he patted the faithful animal and said, "You better stay by the fire, old boy; Queen hasn't any great love for you either." After he went out, the dog whined and scratched at the door. "You'll have to stay with me, Shep," said Anna, "the boss said, 'No.'"

Shep did not go back to his bed in the corner but stretched himself across the doorway with his head between his paws and his ears perked up as though listening for John's returning footsteps. For more than an hour they waited. Anna was almost frantic as she listened to the steady ticking of the wall clock.

She thought of what John had said, "Neither of us is alone . . . I have you, and you have me." Now she felt very much alone as the minutes went slowly by. Finally Shep gave a low throaty growl, barked, and ran to her, then back to the door. Anna opened the door wide but could see no one. The wind made a whistling sound and banked more snow against the porch, then suddenly, the dog shoved her to one side and was out the door like a flash. She saw a faint glimmer of light, and snatching a shawl from a near-by hook she, too, went out into the pitiless storm, leaving the door open as a guiding light back to the house. Following the sound of the dog's constant barking, and fighting to stay on her feet, she made her way to where John was sitting down in a drift. Shep was tugging at his coat sleeve trying to get him up. He had passed the house and was headed for the open stubble beyond. "Come, John," she shouted close to his ear, "you must get up. I'll help you into the house." "I'm so tired," she heard him say, as he leaned his head against her. "My eyes are shut, and I can't open them."

It took all of her strength, but she got him to his feet and with the wind to their backs they made their way toward the precious light that streamed from the open door. Safe once more in the house, Anna wet a cloth in warm water and held it on John's eyes for a few moments, then took off his heavy outdoor garments and led him to a couch in the warm living room. Shep followed close beside her and whined softly to show his concern. She patted his head and said, "Don't worry, old boy, he'll be all right after he has a good rest. He'll appreciate you more than ever when I tell him what you did." She covered John with a wool afghan and then knelt down beside him, a prayer of thanksgiving in her heart. She kissed his face and sobbed, "Oh, John, dear, I almost lost you. I'll never say I'm lonely again so long as I have you."

BY THE NEXT MORNING the wind had died down. It was clear and the temperature twenty degrees below zero.

In spite of John's experience the night before, he was up with the dawn.

He opened up the drafts in the hard coal heater, and soon the living room was filled with a rosy glow and the warmth that came from the dancing flames. The firebox of the big kitchen range had been filled the night before with a generous amount of kindling and soft coal and needed only a match to start it off on its responsibilities for another Christmas Day feast. Anna came into the kitchen while he was out shoveling a path through the drifts to the barn. She scraped a hole in the deep frost that covered the inside of the window and looked out. When she saw him working out there, the old rebellion against the whole white expanse started to fill her being again, but she whispered, "Please, God, forgive me. Let me always be grateful that I have him and not complain. I know it is as he says, all this snow will melt and make good crops next year." She was surprised how quickly the feeling of resentment went away and remembered her mother's admonition when she was first married, "Keep Christ in your heart and home, Anna, my girl, and you will always have a friend to help you." She finished getting breakfast and then went to look out the window again. The sun was shining gloriously, making diamonds in the snow. It had transformed the willows along the river bank into fairy palaces. She looked up toward the highway and was startled by what she saw. Surely that was someone on horseback headed for the old straw stack in the wheat field. She went to get the field glasses, and when she returned, John had come in with the milk. "Here," she said, "take these and look up toward the highway."

John took the glasses and went to the open door. "I see a man on horseback, and he seems in trouble of some kind. He may be sick. I'll get Queen and go to him. Let me have your dark glasses, he may need them. I'll be wearing mine."

It was slow traveling as the horse floundered through the drifts. When John reached the man he was standing near the stack with his hands over his eyes.

GOOD MORNING, STRANGER. Can I help you?" John asked.

"I'm glad you have come," he replied, "I have suddenly become blind and can't see my way."

"Maybe it's not so serious as you may think," said John, "you're probably just snow-blinded. You oughta wear dark glasses on a day like this. Here, let me put these on you. Your eyes may ache for a day or two, but we'll bathe them with boric acid water. That'll help a lot. You'd better get on your horse, and I'll lead him to the house." John noted that he was young, but too thin and frail for such a cold ride. As they rode along the path was too uncertain for conversation, but when they stopped at the barn to stable the horses, the young man explained.

"My name is Norman Ulrey. I live in town with my mother and kid sister, Elaine. I guess I've been away so much that I've forgotten the tricks North Dakota weather can play on a person. A friend of mine lives out this way, and I rode out with him yesterday morning intending to go back last night, but the storm came up so suddenly that I called mother and told her I would stay all night and be home early this morning. It's my first Christmas at home in six years, and I couldn't hurt mother by staying away."

"Why, I remember you," exclaimed John, "I haven't seen you since you were a little shaver, but your father pastured some of his cattle with my herd once, and you came with him. You folks had a mighty nice farm, but I heard that you sold it after you lost your father."

"I hung onto it until I had to go into the Army," replied Norman, "then we sold it, and Mother and Sis moved into town. I've spent six months in an Army hospital, and I'm afraid I'll not make a very good farmer for some time, but I do miss the old home."

"It's been pretty rugged for you, I guess," said John. "Our son was over there for almost three years, and now they're sending him back into this Korea mess."

"It wasn't so hard for me," Norman replied, "as it was for the scared youngsters that had been coddled at home."

The dark glasses had eased the pain in Norman's eyes, and he was able to see fairly well when he entered the subdued light of the house.

HERE'S A SURPRISE for you, my dear," said John to his wife. "We have a Christmas guest after all. Our stranger in distress turned out to be an old friend. He's Norman Ulrey—you remember when his father had cattle here one summer?"

"I do remember," answered Anna, giving the young man a welcoming smile. "I also know his mother—she used to come to the Homemakers Club. You'd better get to the table before this breakfast is ruined. Some hot coffee will warm you up."

Norman explained that he had breakfast before he started out, but would like a glass of warm milk. "I was on a submarine that went aground," he said, "and our food was about gone by the time we got into the water again. On that last day we had just one can of beans between eight of us. My stomach has been rather weak ever since, and sometimes I can't take anything much but milk. I wish we lived where we could have a cow."

After they had finished breakfast John said, "I think I'd better see if our wires are all right, so you can call your mother. You planning on anything special today besides a good dinner?"

"No," replied Norman, "my mother resents the commercializing of Christmas so much that we hung up our stockings night before last and had our gifts yesterday morning. Today we will observe our Savior's birthday as we believe it should be. Mother will take some gifts and food to a family close by where there are several children. The father is not working right now. They have the same religious belief that we have and, since it is not popular, they will not get food baskets from the churches. We have no church there of our own."

"What is your belief?" asked Anna.

"It is called the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," replied Norman. "It is a long name, and we usually refer to it as the L.D.S. Church and don't emphasize the Reorganized as we should."

"Isn't that the same as the Utah Mormons?" asked John.

"No," said Norman, "that is why I say we should emphasize the 'Reorgan-

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF

J. A. Gunsolley

PART V

Property in Lamoni

The first property I bought in Lamoni was an entire block lying one block north of the Coliseum. There were no improvements, but it had a wire fence surrounding it and a growing crop of oats. I sold it and purchased a small cottage on South Linden Street, one block south of the railroad. It was here we started housekeeping, and our first child Lucy Kathaleen was born on September 15, 1891.

While we were living here my sister Stella came to stay with us and attend high school. She had finished the work at the Defiance schools and wanted to continue her studies.

Superintendent of District Sunday School

At a convention of the Decatur District Sunday School Association held in June, 1890, I was elected superintendent. I was also chosen superintendent of the local Sunday school within a comparatively short time.

As district superintendent I had the privilege of visiting the Sunday schools of Decatur District, composed of eight counties in south central Iowa and three in north central Missouri. While thus visiting the schools I was frequently called upon to fill preaching appointments, which I was not authorized to do since I had not been ordained. I could lecture, however, on Sunday school or on the principles of the gospel, which I did as I had opportunity. In many respects the difference between a lecture and a sermon is not apparent to the average person anyhow.

Ordination

Upon various occasions revelations of the Spirit of God had made known to me and to others that I would be called to the priesthood and, if faithful, would be able to do an important work in the church. I have already referred to one particular occasion when Brother W. W. Blair had borne such a testimony. One day while standing in front of the Brick Church at Lamoni, Brother M. M. Turpen, a seventy who exercised the gifts of tongues and prophecy quite often, took me by the hand and said, "The Lord is preparing you for important work in the priesthood of his church." I had the conviction that what he said was true, and that it was for me to choose. Another time when I was saying good-by to Elder George S. Hyde he said to me by the Spirit, "The Lord has given you the ability to do much good." Again I was deeply impressed that it was for me to decide. Then the still small voice came to me often, bearing testimony that the Lord's will was that I should be numbered among his ministers. When my name was proposed for ordination to the office of priest I was not surprised, nor was I unprepared as I had been fairly diligent in studying the Three Standard Books. My wife was in complete harmony. And the people were in favor of accepting me as their minister. Accordingly I was ordained June 5, 1892, along with Amos M. Chase, Alma M. Newberry, and Frank E. Cochran. Confirmations of the divinity of the call continued to come as I endeavored in humility to honor the trust given me.

Interesting Experience

One Sunday after I was ordained I had a remarkable experience in connection with visiting schools. Brother Frank E. Cochran was district secretary, and he and I made visits together a great deal. We had an arrangement with the Burlington Railroad Company permitting us to own and operate a railroad velocipede in traveling about. This particular Sunday morning was a rainy one. We had appointments to visit the school at Leon and preach there morning and evening, as well as the school at Pleasanton. It was fifteen miles to Leon and thirteen miles from Leon to Pleasanton. When the time came to start it was raining only lightly, and we hesitated to go, but in hopes the rain would cease, we started. It was still raining when we reached a covered railroad bridge over the Grand River at Davis City where we took shelter for a short time. The rain continued, and when we had waited as long as possible and yet allow us time to get to Leon for ten o'clock Sunday school, we continued our journey. We reached Leon on time pretty well soaked. We attended Sunday school, rendering what assistance we could, and Frank preached the following hour. We accepted an invitation to dinner, rested for a short time, then continued on to Pleasanton where we attended the Sunday school again. After a brief rest and a lunch we returned to Leon for evening service at which I preached. It had not ceased raining.

While preaching that sermon I had a remarkable experience. It was the fulfillment of a promise made to me at my ordination, that if I were faithful in magnifying my calling I should be blessed with the Spirit in preaching until I would be astonished at the liberty given me. I was lifted up in the Spirit until it seemed my feet did not rest upon the floor, and words and thoughts came in abundance. I was happy, even though my clothes were saturated and it was the end of a tiresome day. On our way home I asked Frank how he liked the sermon, and he replied that he enjoyed it very much. He found himself sitting forward in his seat all attention lest he might miss a single word, that the sermon paid him well for all the exertion of the trip.

When we reached home about eleven o'clock it was still raining. We had propelled our vehicle about fifty miles, much of the distance up quite a steep grade, and nearly half the distance over a narrow gauge road where in some places grass and weeds hung over the rails causing the wheels to slide; several times they slid entirely off. The physical exercise was much more strenuous than either of us had been accustomed to performing, Frank being a proofreader in the Herald office, and I a schoolteacher. We might reasonably have expected our muscles to be sore, but to the contrary, neither of us suffered the least discomfort. The next morning I went to the office where Frank worked and asked, "How are your muscles this morning?"

He replied, "I feel fine. Not a thing wrong."

Then I said, "Frank, I think I understand how it was that the shoes of the children of Israel did not wear out while they were journeying in the wilderness."

Department of Correspondence

While I was assisting Sister Walker with Autumn Leaves, it was decided that a Department of Correspondence should be added to the magazine; I was to be responsible for this feature. The purpose of the department was to encourage young people to cultivate their literary ability by writing pro and con upon various subjects. There was a dearth of original articles by our own people to fill the columns of the Herald as well as this magazine. Growing out of the discussions was the suggestion that a church-wide organization for young people be established to unify the efforts of various youth societies in a number of the larger branches. The idea of a general organization grew rapidly until it was introduced in the General Conference of 1892. A committee of three was appointed to draft a plan of organization and report at the next conference. The committee was composed of C. R. Duncan, J. C. Hitchcock, and me.

We did what we could to gather material and information. We obtained literature from the Christian Endeavor, Baptist young people, YMCA, and YWCA, and various young people's societies throughout the church. A committee meeting was held in February, 1893. Brother Duncan could not be present because of ill health, but Brother Hitchcock and I carefully went over the material in hand, rejecting and selecting until we had formulated a constitution and bylaws and prepared a report for the Conference.

Zion's Religio Literary Society

A special meeting was appointed by the Conference to give consideration to the report of the committee. This meeting was held in the basement of the Old Brick Church at Lamoni and was well attended. The report of the committee was received, its recommendations approved, and the constitution adopted. The next step was to adopt a name for the new organization and elect officers. The name chosen was "Zion's Religio Literary Society," presented by Apostle F. M. Sheehy. The officers were Eli Etzenhouser of Independence, president; Fannie Jones of Lamoni, vice-president; John C. Hitchcock of St. Louis, secretary; and John A. Gardner of Independence, treasurer. At the first annual convention held in Lamoni in April, 1894, President Eli Etzenhouser could not be present, so vice-president Fannie Jones presided. Brother Harry Jarvis of Burlington, Iowa, was elected president; I was elected vice-president; and the other officers were sustained. Brother Jarvis resigned in July, and I assumed the responsibilities of president, which office I continued to hold until April, 1916.

Salem, Massachusetts

I was released from my contract with the Lamoni schools at the end of the spring term in May, 1894, and sought employment elsewhere. I had decided to continue in the profession of teaching, though in earlier years I had thought seriously of trying to get into some line of mercantile accounting. After making a number of applications, I received a telegram one day from a business college at Salem, Massachusetts, offering me a position. M. C. Fisher, my wife's twin brother, and his brother Edmund had been in Massachusetts a number of years engaged in teaching at business colleges. M. C. had been with the people who sent me the telegram, but wanted to be released to accept a position in Boston where his brother E. H. was employed. On his recommendation, the directors offered me the position. After talking to my wife I decided to accept the offer. I was to commence work in a very few days, hence it was necessary to leave May and baby Lucy with Father and Mother Fisher until I could determine if my work in the east would be permanent. The change meant much to me in a number of ways. I had never seen New England, which is so full of historical interest; also I desired to get into business college work rather than to continue in public school work.

I was met at the station in Boston by M. C. who took me to the home where he and E. H. boarded. Spence and Peasley Business College was located in Salem, Massachusetts, about fifteen miles from Boston. It was a small school with about fifty students and four teachers, including the two proprietors. The people of Salem were real New Englanders, proud of their Puritan ancestors and orthodox religion. So far as I knew there were no Latter Day Saints in the city. So after finishing my work by noon on Saturday I boarded the train for Boston and spent Sunday with the Saints, returning to Salem Monday morning in time for my first class.

First View of the Ocean

I got my first view of the ocean at Marblehead, a small town not far from Salem. It was a great thrill to gaze out over the broad expanse eastward realizing that the first land beyond in that direction would be the land from which our forefathers came. Whenever I looked at the Atlantic I had a longing to board ship and go across. I never had quite the same feeling when looking at the Pacific Ocean or the Gulf of Mexico.

First Sermon in Boston

I had not met often with the Boston Branch until the presiding elder requested me to address the congregation. I had been a member of the priesthood only a short time, yet one of the duties of a priest is to preach, so I could not refuse. When the elder introduced me as the speaker he emphasized the fact that I was from Lamoni, as if my being from Lamoni was a sort of guarantee of an unusual sermon. The consciousness that I was from Lamoni did have a stimulating effect upon me. Living at headquarters of the church and associating with leading officers of the church should have made me better qualified than one who had not enjoyed such opportunities.

Other occasions put me to the same test. On one occasion I was introduced by the apostle in charge at a district conference to be the speaker at the next session only a few hours away. I had little opportunity to make preparation. My first impulse was to decline, thinking it was not fair, but upon further reflection I decided I should do my best and trust God. The sermon was a success. The Lord was with me, and I learned that it is safe to leave results with him when I have done all I can.

Birth of Harold Myron

It was while I was in Salem and Boston that my son Harold Myron was born on November 30, 1894. As previously stated my family had remained in Lamoni, as I did not know what the outcome might be of my adventure in New England. I left Lamoni in July, 1894, and Harold was born in November, 1894. I returned to Lamoni in March, 1895, so that I did not have the privilege of seeing my first son until he was four months old. My feelings and concern grew for my family, especially for my wife, during these eight months. A feeling of unrest and a desire to return to Lamoni increased.

Question Time

In the Russo-Greek Church there exist some sects without priests, because in their idea the gift of consecration by laying on of hands, which had continued from the apostle down to Nikon (q.v.), had been lost by the apostasy of Nikon, and of the clergy seduced by him, and thus all genuine priesthood had become impossible.—Volume 4, page 522.

Question:

In a missionary series the speaker explained Daniel 7: 25 concerning "a time and times and the dividing of time." He showed through Scripture, how it figured and came to 1830, the date our church was established. Please give me those Scriptures and the figures.
Georgia Mrs. M.L.

Answer:

The "time" in apocalyptic prophecy means a year. The years of that period were lunar years composed of 360 days each. So in this prophecy we have one year added to two years and then to a half year. The total of days in these three and a half years is 1,260.

Prophetic days also are symbolic of years (Ezekiel 4: 4-6). So the 1,260 days are in actuality 1,260 years.

In this vision Daniel saw four beasts, which are explained in the chapter as four kingdoms, the fourth was the most terrible and took dominion of the preceding three. In their order they were the Babylonian, the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman empires. The fourth kingdom was divided into ten different kingdoms, and the historian, Machiavelli, lists these kingdoms as (1) the Ostrogoths in Moesia, (2) the Visigoths in Pennonia, (3) the Sueves and the Alans in Gasconne and Spain, (4) the Vandals in Africa, (5) the Franks in France, (6) the Burgundians in Burgundy, (7) the Heruli and Turingi in Italy, (8) the Saxons and Angles in Britain, (9) the Huns in Hungary, and (10) the Lombards in Italy. Other historians give different names to these ancient tribes, but they are the same people.

Among these ten kingdoms there arose another which subdued three of them and had a mouth that "spake very great things, and made war with the saints and prevailed against them." This kingdom (horn) is universally understood by Protestants to be the temporal dominion of the papacy. The kingdoms the papacy subdued were the Heruli, the Ostrogoths, and the Lombards. The 1,260 days, which prophetically are 1,260 years, are counted from the time the papacy began to rise as a temporal power, and that was during the decade of A. D. 560 to A. D. 570 wars the Lombards inflicted on Rome and the surrounding provinces, and the abandonment of the city and the adjacent territory by the Empire with its seat of government in Constantinople. At this time a political genius was rising from among the clerics of Rome by the name of Gregory, who later on became known as Pope Gregory the Great. As the Eastern Empire manifested its weakness against the invaders, and as the misery of the Romans increased, the influence of the church began to rise correspondingly. Gregory discovered that the church was possessed of considerable wealth, which he used for the alleviation of suffering. The Romans, nobles, and ordinary citizens became the object of his patrimony. Gradually, the hand that fed became the hand that ruled. Even the Lombards respected him to the point of deification.

Starting from the decade A. D. 560 to A. D. 570 and adding the 1,260 years, we arrive at the decade A. D. 1820 to 1830. During this decade the Lord revealed his will to his servant Joseph Smith, and this revelation gave rise to the church of the Restoration.

Scriptures similar to the above found in Revelation chapters 12 and 13 have a bearing on the rise of the church.

Question:

Is there a record of any people except the Saints who believed that the priesthood was lost by an apostasy?

Answer:

There have been several at least who have held that view. Roger Williams was one. He is represented in Cramp's Baptist History as follows: "He denied that any ministry now exists which is authorized to preach the gospel to the impenitent, or to administer the ordinances."—Page 462.

One of his biographers is quoted in Presidency and Priesthood (W. H. Kelley) as stating:

He conceived that the church of Christ has so fallen into apostasy as to have lost both its right form and the due administration of the ordinances, which could only be restored by some new apostolic or specially commissioned messenger from above.—Page 109.

In discussing the subject of laying on of hands for the giving of the Holy Ghost, as performed by the New Testament apostles, McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia states:

Question:

Don't you believe that only Latter Day Saints are going to heaven?
Missouri E.E.J.

Answer:

No! It is the belief of the church that all who die in their childhood are saved by the atonement of Christ and this without any necessity for baptism or other religious rites (Doctrine and Covenants 28: 13).

It is the teaching of our Scriptures that persons who never have had opportunity of hearing the gospel in this life, such as the so-called heathen, are also redeemed and saved by the atonement of Christ (Doctrine and Covenants 45: 10).

It seems also that many living in lands where Christ and the gospel are known, who are honorable and upright but who have been blinded by the craftiness of false religious leaders so that they have not fully known the way of life, will have opportunity of hearing and obeying in the spirit world after death, according to the Scripture which says the "gospel is preached to them that are dead."—I Peter 4: 6.

What we do not believe is that people who hold to institutions which Christ has not authorized or indorsed, and who build upon "dead works" which are without virtue, can be saved by those institutions or works. The rock of salvation is only that which Jesus himself has laid for men to build upon.

It should be borne in mind the Scriptures teach that salvation is in different degrees, and that all do not go to the same place, neither are all with Christ. Only on this basis could every man be "rewarded according to his works."

Good Will Among Men

By L. W. Newcombe

FROM THE BEGINNING of creation and the first enunciation of the command to be fruitful and multiply, the principle of mating, reproduction, and guarding of the young has been the nucleus around which circulates all the energies of our social, economic, national, and spiritual life. There is nothing so altogether lovely as the offspring to its parents. It is logical, then, that the message of the angels on that first Christmas should be one of "good tidings to all people . . . for unto us a child is born." God chose that particular means to demonstrate the depth, strength, and universal character of his love as a gift to the needy world.

The power of the gospel centers in the Babe of Bethlehem, even as in all children. It may not be called Christmas, but in darkest Africa, the frozen North, and the islands of the sea, the spirit of Christmas is found in the purity of little children.

If we are ever to have a unified world of good will for all men, it will come only because we follow Christ's example and "set a child in the midst," believing that "of such is the kingdom of heaven" on earth.

THE SO-CALLED CHRISTIAN WORLD today is divided into many different sects, largely because we have forgotten the vital, central fact of love, which is at the root of all action. The purpose of the gospel of the kingdom is simply that our normal, natural love be extended to include not only our family and close friends but all mankind. We must love our neighbor as ourselves; we must practice brotherhood. The different creeds, dogmas, or ceremonies which we some times consider essential are but outward helps to assist us toward the true attainment of the abundant life; too often we give them an emphasis or importance never intended. Some of these conceptions have been horrible in the extreme and have largely passed; others persist in milder form and limited extent. They have arisen mostly from the arguments of the Apostle Paul about the Mosaic law and have no basis whatsoever in Christ's own teachings. Christ himself condemned the traditions and burdens the Jewish leaders had added to the Law of Moses (Matthew 23) and cut sharply across to the essentials, saying that we must worship in spirit and in truth.

When today the missionary tells the pagan mother that her child is "born in sin and shapen in iniquity," he is far from the statement of Christ that "except we become as a little child we cannot enter the kingdom of heaven."

AFTER NEARLY 2,000 YEARS "peace on earth, good will to men" seems far away, while the organized church is divided and wasting its vitality in unnecessary activities. Perhaps God is by-passing them all and, holding up a child in the midst, marshaling the forces of earth in a great social revolution. With irresistible power he may be compelling men to come in from the highways and byways to build a world of good will, of security for the home and the child; of universal education and clean community life, in ordered national and international peace.

Can it be that the God of Heaven is cutting out, without hands "a little stone," a new kingdom which shall smite the image, our vaunted civilization, upon the feet and destroy it? "In the last days the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountain and all nations shall flow into it." From it shall go out the law of justice and judgment (Micah 4 and Isaiah 2).

While great knowledge and scientific advancement are sweeping the earth, in the evening time of spreading light, is it reasonable to think that God is allowing his kingdom to wait because of men's petty quarrels?

He has spoken in this Latter Day of the "hastening time." With warning and direction he has cut across the creeds of men which he calls an abomination; he has called for Zion the pure in heart. We as a church have thought we were the chosen people and held a monopoly on Zion; we have thought that God was limiting his work to our small organization.

THE MESSAGE of latter days brought great light to the world and centered the vision on stewardship, consecration, and brotherhood. While we tarry other hands are picking up the torch, and "God will hasten his work in his time," for in his bosom it is decreed that the poor and meek of the earth shall inherit it (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 4). "They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree, and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of Hosts hath spoken it."—Micah 4: 4.

Social security for the families of earth, good will among men, community sharing and service are the great aims behind the laws of the kingdom. Only in such a gospel can universal peace on earth be found, and if the churches fail their supposed master, then the work must be taken up by other hands, for his purpose cannot be frustrated. Today the fear of autocracy is compelling men to consider the needs of their fellows in a worldwide social revolution. Will the spiritual and invisible kingdom of peace and joy in the "Holy Ghost" be ready to enter in and occupy? This is the challenge before the church of God today.

A very, Merry Christmas to all of you.

Christmas Eve Perfect

By Maude D. Anderson

IT WAS CHRISTMAS EVE, and the members of the Crawford family were excitedly preparing the evening meal in anticipation of more interesting activities. That is, all of them except Father—he never got excited. He calmly settled himself an inch or two lower in the old arm chair as he turned to an inner page of the Sacramento Bee, completely oblivious of the excitement around him or the fact that the radio was blasting “White Christmas” almost off the air. Eleven-year-old Danny, youngest of the clan, was doing his best to get the table set just right. Nancy, who was a sophomore in high school and almost a young lady, drew a deep breath but refrained from speaking as she noted the angle of the tablecloth.

“Let’s use the good silver tonight, Danny,” called Mother from the kitchen.

Nancy helped him to get it out and adjusted the crooked tablecloth, then went back to helping her mother. Then Jack, an older brother, came in with some chunks of wood for the fireplace. Mother slipped away from the kitchen for a word aside with him.

“I wish you would climb up and get that package on the top shelf in the hall closet—it’s the one that Mrs. Roberts gave Daddy, and I always have to put it clear out of reach until the last minute. Just as sure as I put it on the tree Rover stands there and sniffs and begs until the children know what’s in the package. He can smell a piece of candy a block away.”

Rover, lying in the corner by the fireplace, snuggled his nose a bit more under one paw at hearing his name mentioned, thumped his tail in appreciation on the floor and rolled his eyes self-consciously at Mother.

“Well, I sorta’ go for Mrs. Roberts’ homemade candy myself,” grinned Jack. “I can’t even remember when she first started giving it to us for Christmas, but it just wouldn’t seem like Christmas without it.”

WITH SO MANY HANDS contributing to the effort, dinner was soon over and the table cleared. While other members of the family were in the kitchen, Father, having been aroused from his lethargy by the rites of eating, quietly retired to the bedroom, opened his clothes closet, and began dragging out packages of various sizes and shapes. He just as quietly slipped back into the living room and put them around the tree without anyone realizing what was taking place. Then he comfortably settled himself in his accustomed chair for the remainder of the evening. After what seemed an endless time to the eager youngsters, Mother finally removed her apron and turned off the kitchen light.

“How soon can we have the tree?” begged Danny.

“Not until eight o’clock,” firmly announced Nancy. “You know we always like to sit and look at the tree after we turn out all of the other lights.”

“Why don’t you play your records of ‘The Littlest Angel?’” suggested Mother. “Then we’ll still have time to sing some Christmas songs.”

“OK,” grinned Danny. He never tired of this favorite record album, always reserved for the Christmas season.

Jack had brought the Christmas tree home in early December, and it was soon the center of interest in the living room. Each year the children added new decorations to those which they had saved from the previous year. For days interesting packages had made their way mysteriously into the house and around the tree. Sometimes it was the postman who brought a large package which was dismantled into smaller ones, and at other times a friend would drop in with something to add to the growing store.

PROMPTLY AT THE STROKE OF EIGHT, Danny announced that they could have the tree.

“May I be Santa Claus and deliver the presents?” he begged.

“Oh, sure,” answered Father.

“I’ll help,” volunteered Nancy.

“I don’t need any help,” said Danny most emphatically.

“But you’re so slow,” was Nancy’s disdainful reply. “Anyway, I’ll just help you a little bit.”

“The first one goes to Daddy,” announced Nancy.

“And here’s one for you, Mom,” said Danny.

Soon there were packages in everyone’s lap, and papers were flying as excited hands undid colorful wrappings.

"Now don't lose your cards," warned mother. "You want to remember which present was from Aunt Kate and which was from Grandma so be careful and don't get the cards mixed." Words were useless with Danny for he was too excited.

An extra large package with Nancy's name on it aroused everyone's curiosity—everyone, that is, except Father. Feverishly Nancy undid the big package, then looked somewhat crestfallen, for there seemed to be only a huge amount of paper.

"It must be something awfully breakable," she commented as she finally extracted a second box from the center of all the paper. Opening the second box, she found it too contained a great deal of paper. There was still another box, and then at last she came up with a small case in which she found a much-wanted wristwatch.

"Oh, Daddy, Daddy," she exclaimed as she hugged and kissed him. "This is the most wonderful Christmas present ever!"

As each found the Christmas present which fulfilled his fondest expectations, there were choruses of enthusiasm. At last everyone could sit back, relax, and enjoy the Christmas candy and other good things to eat.

Mother smiled at the happiness of her family. Then, looking at the clock she said, "It's almost time to get ready for the midnight service at church. It is good that we have this opportunity to thank God for his great gift and offer our gifts of reconsecration."

"We'd better get started," said Nancy. "I want to be there by a quarter of, because it takes a few minutes to get into my choir robe and be sure that my music is arranged just right. Danny has to be there in plenty of time, too, 'cause he's slow getting into his robe."

"Yes, I have to be there early, too," echoed Danny. "I'm going to carry one of the flags."

"We will march in from the rear door," explained Nancy. "It is so much more effective when the choir marches in and down the aisle with the flag-bearers leading while we sing."

Soon everyone was ready, and as Mother entered the living room, Nancy exclaimed, "Oh, Mom, you look beautiful."

Mother laughed her embarrassment as she remarked, "I guess my old coat doesn't look too bad with this lovely new scarf and my Christmas corsage."

"Don't forget to wear yours, Sis," admonished Jack.

"Oh, I won't," replied Nancy. "I can pin it on my coat even if I can't wear it on my robe."

IT WAS SUCH A SHORT DISTANCE to the church that a walk was welcome, especially with all of the beautiful yard displays to be viewed en route. There were "Ohs" and "Ahs" of delight as each new scene was passed.

The quaint little church which was the destination of the Crawfords stood well back among the trees and shrubs. Only the soft glow of the overhead light in the vestibule gave evidence of its being there. The two youngest members of the family made their way to the choir room as the others quietly entered the sanctuary.

Around the walls low candles, set in deep, red glass holders, shed their soft glow on the ancient straight-backed pews. Near the front of the church and partially concealing the choir stall stood the Christmas tree with its tiny lights glistening like stars and its top touching the huge wooden beams of the ceiling. The altar stood out in a blaze of light with all of the candles reflecting their brilliance in the golden vases with their Christmas greens.

The family watched silently as old friends and neighbors entered and quietly took their places in the family pews. How familiar it seemed, and yet each year it was different. Children were becoming adults, and missing were those who had spent their last Christmas in the little church. Mother smiled and nodded her recognition as the Roberts family entered. How proud Mrs. Roberts looked to have all four of her children with her—two of them in uniform—one in the Navy and one in the Army Air Corps. Then she looked silently at one of the pews a few rows ahead where other friends were sitting—one of their number was missing—he would not be home for Christmas. Mother stifled a few tears as she realized that Jack would probably be in uniform before another year had passed, but she would not let that spoil the happiness of this perfect Christmas. It was time for the choir to march in. How proudly Danny carried the flag as he entered. The church was packed to capacity now. At last it was time for Nancy to sing her solo. As her sweet voice rang out, Mother's anxiety turned to pride, and icy shivers ran up and down her spine. As the service ended, extra chairs were quietly removed from the aisle and the crowd departed from the sanctuary. Then groups of friends gathered in the yard to wish each other Merry Christmas. Young people home for the holidays from school or work in distant places greeted each other happily and gaily chatted with their friends.

Yes, it was a perfect Christmas Eve, and no matter what the future might hold, no cloud could dim the brightness of the picture.

Christmas, 1951- Together

By Louise Wrigley

THIS, FOR US, is the culmination of the story begun on a scorching Sunday afternoon in July, 1950, when John was snatched off to Korea, and the waiting began for us, as it has begun for many and ended for some. This period of trying uncertainty has ended happily for us, for once again there are four of us to share our troubles, four of us to rejoice in our good fortune. Since John's safe return to home shores all our thoughts and hopes have been pointing to the celebration of the Christmas holidays together. This season symbolizes to us all that is beautiful and good, the hope of the world.

Perhaps it is not by accident that Christmas is the high light of our family year. Possibly this is partly due to the attitude of cheer and good will we find heightened in others. Certainly it has also come as a result of the appreciation we gained as children growing up, of the true meaning of the beautiful Christmas season and its message. Surely it has been augmented by the family good times, for the four of us make a solid circle of merriment and laughter—of peace shared—and find in our love for each other a serene answer to the insecurity around us. We hold each other close in a spirit of contented companionship.

We would not forget the joy of sharing Christmas with the grandparents. This is a very real part of our Christmas celebration when it is possible to span the miles between us. When we cannot, the warmth and love of the season spreads out all the more to encompass us and them. For Christmas is a family time.

The young family who gathered so humbly in the dark little stable gave us a promise and a blessing that should reassure and inspire us. The presence of the family unit as a basis for Christ's coming attests to the fact that the family is the foundation of God's divine plan.

CHRISTMAS TOGETHER THIS YEAR means a myriad of things to us. There is, as always, the wonderful anticipation which all of us, and especially the children, feel as the span of days grows shorter. There are the secretly thought out plans for gifts—and let those who frown on gift-giving as burdensome remember that giving is the sweetest experience of all. It is what Christ did, and God before him. Giving wisely in a material way is part of our development, and from it we learn that giving in a spiritual way is more to be desired.

The sacred remembrance of Christmas is not to be crowded into one hectic twenty-four hours but rather should be savored through the approaching days so that it may be fully appreciated and observed. So it is that, days ahead of time, as we get out the familiar boxes which hold the old, the new, the beloved traditional appointments of the holiday season, little Kirk's hands lift the tiny Christ child tenderly from his bed of tissue paper. His trembling fingers fit the Infant into his manger with all the adoration of the fervent child heart. Here in the box we find also the little stuffed Santa who has sat under our tree since John Warren was very small. He still smiles his sweet smile. He was the gift of a loving great-grandmother whose nimble fingers expressed her desire to give in this way. This gift continues to be a source of joy to us.

Each year we try to add something of significance to the things which we enjoy as a family. This year we found tiny wax carolers and joyfully brought them home. We feel that the old carols tell the Christmas story with beautiful simplicity—and our little carolers are so obviously singing with all their hearts that we enjoy being reminded in this fashion.

The evenings before Christmas have a beauty all their own as young John Warren finds the red satin bookmark which is reserved exclusively to mark the story of the Nativity as related in Luke. With its musical cadences it expresses an age-old dignity which nothing else can. Oddly enough it is often the children who first discover that. We have found that reading the familiar passages together is one of our special pleasures.

For us, the parents, the preparing of our home and our hearts is part of the joy of the season. We seem more relaxed even as the pressure of the holidays mounts. The greetings which come in from all over the world serve as once-a-year digests of news from many friends who share with us briefly the high lights of their year. It is such fun to see faraway postmarks and get notes from those we have lost track of completely. And we especially enjoy opening our home to the many friends who drop in at this time of year—an old custom which we should encourage more in these modern times—for they seem to bring with them a special part of themselves to leave with us always.

THIS MIGHT BE just any Christmas Day as we have come to know it. However, this year brings an outstanding Christmas for us—outstanding because last Christmas was so different. Then, hemmed in by postal do's and don'ts, we sent pathetic little boxes off to Korea. Food was perishable and valuables were discouraged unless they were very practical. We packed every ounce of cheer we could possibly muster, and yet our offerings seemed so pitiful. How would they measure up against the cold and the misery? How much love could they express in a land where love was almost lost?

The gifts from John to us, purchased by kind strangers in Tokyo, were wrapped in strangely delicate oriental papers which testified mutely that the oriental mind understands little of the friendly heartiness of the American tradition at Christmas. The gifts were exotic and beautiful, and it touched us deeply that in the midst of war John's heart returned to us as he planned for our Christmas, that we might know we were loved and cherished even from afar. Yet these packages could not possibly carry the same loving touch as the packages of years before when John, with a deliberate satisfaction, concealed them from us until his very fine sense of timing indicated the appropriate moment had arrived.

More than anything else it was hard to go to the Christmas Eve midnight service without John, who had been at my side at that particular time almost since our adolescence. Yet it was there in that dim, sweet-spirited sanctuary that peace came into my heart to stay through the months ahead. There I found an abiding, effortless faith which has sustained and supported me beyond belief. The clear girl-voices sang of the little Christ child, such a perfect gift of innocence and purity, come to bring the world love. That great love had been a part of our lives, and I realized that we had only to nurture it, and it would never, never leave us.

The children and I trimmed a tree last year, as any other year, determined that we would not forget those things which we had done together in the past. There is something about trimming the Christmas tree which draws every member of the family into giving something of himself, be it only his opinion of where the last silver ball should hang. In our home little fingers reach with big ones for the delicate, shimmering pieces gathered from here and there to suit all of our tastes. If the bird with the shiny tail hangs a little crooked we believe that his message can be as sweet.

And though Christmas-tree-trimming time is always an extra happy occasion for us, this year I am sure that as we hang each glistening ornament, and each piece of tinsel falls into place, as the little carolers smile and seem to sing in the lamplight, as Mary and Joseph once again bring the Holy Babe into our home—to stay if we will have him—we will thank God in humility that not a single pair of loving hands is missing, that not a heart is wandering or lost, that the head of our house has weathered another combat stint and has come home to us again that we might spend Christmas, 1951, together.

ized' part of the church name. We have no connection with the Mormons. They believe a lot of things that we don't, but we do believe in the same Book of Mormon that they have, as it is a history of the North American Indian. I can't understand why archaeologists outside the church refuse to accept it as an authority on where the American Indian came from. It seems to me that they have found enough evidence in the old ruins they have been exploring for years to remove all doubt."

"I have been led to believe that it takes the place of the Bible and justifies murder," said John. "I have never been much of a Bible reader myself, but I believe in it and wouldn't take up with anything that does away with it."

"And neither would I," replied Norman, as he took a small book from his inner coat pocket. "I have carried this Bible that mother gave me through all my experiences of the last six years; it has been my guide and mascot."

ANNA HAD BEEN LISTENING attentively to what John and Norman were saying. With a new light in her eyes she said, "John, I know that this young man is telling you the truth. There is no connection between the Mormons and the Reorganized Church, and the Book of Mormon does not take the place of the Bible but is, as he says, a history of a people who came from Jerusalem."

John looked in amazement at his wife. "How did you find out about it?" he asked. "You've never mentioned it to me."

John's tone of doubt as he spoke brought a flush to Anna's face, but she explained, "I know, because my grandmother joined the Reorganized Church when she was sixteen years old. Her stepfather told her to leave his house and go live with the Mormons. Grandmother died when mother was quite young. My grandfather married again and left mother to be reared by an aunt who thought she had destroyed all of grandmother's church books, but mother found a Book of Mormon and has kept it all these years. She has told me these things but would never let me read the book because it has been considered a terrible blot on my family history. I have never mentioned it to anyone but have often wished I could know more about this strange doctrine. Grandmother must have believed it very strongly to stay with it when she knew she would be disowned by her friends and family. I am told that I resemble my grandmother, but I doubt if I would have the courage to do as she did."

John sat silently for a moment and looked at his wife as though he couldn't believe he had heard correctly. This was a new Anna to him—a woman with hidden depths of character he had not known she possessed. He turned to Norman and said, "How about having your mother and sister come out here to spend the day with us? The Carters can pick them up when they come through town. I'll call and make the arrangements, then you can call your mother and tell her to bring her church books with her. My wife has a right to know why her grandmother was such a courageous woman. You and your mother can tell us what you know about it. If the Book of Mormon is a history, I think I'll read it myself."

After John had talked to the Carters, Norman rose from his chair and held out his hand. "You're all right, Mr. Harrington. Now I know why I lost my way—the Lord has need of good people like you. I'm sure Mother and Elaine will be delighted to come."

ANNA WENT ABOUT HER WORK with a happier heart than she had thought possible. It was like the old times when Frank was at home after Norman said, "Mrs. Harrington, I'd like to help you with dinner. I was my mother's 'girl' for several years. I can even bake a cake." Anna accepted his help gladly, and soon they were talking together like old friends.

John came in from feeding the stock and sat down in the kitchen so as to have a part in their conversation. He couldn't understand this eagerness he felt to hear more about the Reorganized Church. He told Norman about being lost in the storm and said, "I must have gone around the house a lot of times, but I couldn't find it. I walked until I was exhausted. I've never denied God, but I have ignored him, and I didn't believe I had a right to call on him for help. Yet when I thought of Anna being left alone, perhaps with telephone wires down and no help for days, I asked God to let me find the house for her sake, then I sat down to rest a bit, and she came to me. God seems very real to me today. Tell me, do you think a sincere belief in God and a hereafter makes a person braver in time of danger?"

"The Spirit of God comes to those who seek him," replied Norman. "There is a sustaining power even in death. I know this because I have faced death several times. When I was in school I had a part in a play called The Valiant, and I have never forgotten the lines: 'The valiant taste death but once, the coward, a thousand times.' I think the sincere Christian learns to be valiant by keeping Christ in his heart and mind and every part of his life subjected to the will of God."

"I wonder why God doesn't stop these awful wars," said Anna. "They're taking some of our best men. Soon there won't be anyone but the old and disabled to run the country and bring up the fatherless children. The mothers will have to get out and make the living for their families."

"God has given man his agency," said Norman, "and never forces anyone to come to Him or follow his plan of life. It is the wickedness of man, not God, that causes wars, and he will never be without them until we turn from greed and make every other person our brother. We had a wonderful chaplain with our outfit at the embarkation center before we went over seas. It was heart warming to hear him talk to the fellows and explain these things to them. He encouraged them to have a belief in God, no matter what happened. He said, 'It doesn't matter too much when or where we die. How we have lived is more important.'"

THEY HAD BEEN SO INTERESTED in their discussion that it was almost time for their guests to arrive when Anna said, "John, you'd better pull out the table ends so Norman can get it set before our friends get here."

It was a congenial group that gathered around the table to enjoy the good things Anna had prepared. Norman was asked to say grace and touched their hearts when he prayed so earnestly for Frank who was going so far away.

After dinner was over and they had gathered in the living room, John told the Carters about the religious discussion they had been having earlier, and asked Mrs. Ulerly if she had brought the books.

"Indeed I did," she said. "I'm always ready and happy to talk about the gospel. I'm leaving the books I brought as a little gift for you so you can read them at your leisure."

"That's very kind of you," said Anna. "Will you tell us how you came to join the church?"

Mrs. Ulerly took the Three Books from a handbag and laid them on the table near her. As she talked about her various spiritual experiences, she turned quickly to some passage in the Books. She had a pleasing voice and made the story of the Restoration vivid to her listeners, who would have willingly spent the rest of the evening discussing it. But the clock on the wall chimed the hour reminding the Carters they must start home.

As they were getting ready to leave, Anna stood near looking wistfully at Mrs.

Ulrey. "Could you folks stay over night?" she asked. "We don't have much company during the winter. I'm sure John will be delighted to have Norman to talk with, and Elaine can trim our poor neglected tree. Perhaps you and I can have some music. I don't play the piano anymore, but we have a lot of good records, and some are Christmas carols. We'll take you home tomorrow—or later—if you can stay." She turned to the little girl, "How about it, Elaine, would you like to stay?"

"If mother wouldn't mind, I'd love to," she answered, her eyes sparkling, "She can play the piano for you."

A NNA AND JOHN and their new-found friends enjoyed an ideal Christmas evening. They sang many of the old songs that have weathered time and change and still touch the heart, especially at Christmas time.

Before their visit was over, Norman agreed to come to the farm in the spring and take over the herding. The corral was big enough for him to take in some of the neighbors' cattle if he wished. With the help of Shep and Dolly he could handle quite a herd, and in the sunshine and pure air he would no doubt regain his health and have a farm of his own again. In the meantime, when the weather would permit, they would hold cottage meetings on Sunday afternoons at Mrs. Ulrey's house and ask the Carters to attend.

After John and Anna had returned from taking the Ulreys home, the house seemed awfully quiet. Anna said with a sigh, "I'm sorry they had to go home. They are such good people to be with. I wish we could keep Christ in our hearts and minds as they do. Shall we try it, John?"

"Yes, dear, we'll try," he said. "I did some serious thinking that night when I was lost in the storm. I'll never forget that when I prayed, God sent you and Shep to find me." With his love for her shining in his eyes, he added, "Maybe I can learn to be as courageous as your grandmother—and you."

Corrections

In the issue of December 10, page 5, the first paragraph of "Handel and the Messiah" the date of Handel's birth is given as 1865. This should be 1685.

In the issue of December 17, page 16, the by-line on "The Christmas Poinsettia and the Easter Lily" should read Florence Hughes rather than Florence Freberg.

Grateful for Healing

It has been some time since I have written a letter for the Herald testifying of God's goodness to me. I have been divinely healed when physicians said nothing more could be done for me. Because of this I have rededicated my life to my Heavenly Father. I pray for all I come in contact with. I especially want to help the unfortunates, because I too have gone through testing periods.

I met some very fine colored people while I was hospitalized in Chicago. We Latter Day Saints have a work to do with every kindred, tongue, and people. My prayer is that the pure love of God may ever be in my heart. I want to help by giving tracts to people who are looking for the gospel.

I thank all my friends who wrote to me while I was hospitalized. I would like to hear from them again.

Requests Prayers for Mother

I was baptized into the Reorganized Church on November 24, 1934. I have had many trials, but my Heavenly Father has never forsaken me. All through childhood I was isolated from the church, but my father taught me the gospel story, so I did not lose out.

I ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints for my mother, Cora Roberts, that she may be healed of an illness.

 FRUSTRATION

Put this in your "I'm-mad-at-me" file. . . . You are scheduled to preach at Farawayville, and time is slipping by as you hurry preparations. On the minute you must leave or be late you can't find your car keys. You slap all your pockets—no keys. You search desk top, bureau drawers, overcoat—no keys. Desperately you go through the medicine chest, the kitchen counter, the baby's toys, the bathroom, the waste basket and the radio—still no keys. What happens to a man's mind when he enters the house and tosses his keys down? Surely it goes on an idiot's vacation. . . . Then at last you find them wadded up in a hankie in the pocket of the trousers you are wearing. . . . Wouldn't you like to call in the neighbor's dog and get yourself bitten good and hard?

 FOOD FOR MAN

There are many notes on foods in the Scriptures. Has anybody ever thought of making a cookbook for dishes mentioned in the Bible? We'd still like a good recipe for the cooking of pygargs (Deuteronomy 14:5). You may be comforted to know that you are forbidden (Leviticus 11:29) to eat "the weasel and the mouse." Also such things as the tortoise, ferret, chameleon, snail, and mole.

Probably you wouldn't want to eat them anyway. Yet we may remember that there are places in the world where hunger drives people to eat these things, and others equally revolting to mind and stomach.

John the Baptist made his diet in the wilderness on locusts and wild honey. Did you ever catch a grasshopper and consider the possibility of having to eat him for lunch? He is your locust. A modern commentator, probably suffering from "urps" at the thought, is of the opinion that the "locusts" were merely the carob bean pods so common in Palestine, used as a food for cattle. We remember a printed story that certain Orientals consider dried beetles a delicacy. Under the poetic name "escargots" some of our Gallic friends even manage to eat snails. California Indians, facing a famine in early days because a plague of grasshoppers had eaten every green food, took their revenge and sustained life by eating the grasshoppers.

You may find the foods other people eat offensive. Do you know that your food may be offensive to them? The Hindus consider the cow a sacred creature, and do not eat her. We offend them with our eating of beef. They say it affects the smell of our bodies, making our presence repulsive to them.

For that matter, consider some of our more fragrant cheeses—Limburger, Liederkranz (a native American product), or the French Camembert. Yet there are people who consider them delicious.

A very liberal philosophy of foods is found in Doctrine and Covenants 59:4. It also recognizes the psychological and spiritual significance of food: "to please the eye, to gladden the heart . . . and to enliven the soul."

Solomon knew about these values too: "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith." You had better eat a green salad or a vegetable soup in peace than dine on sirloin steak with anger in your heart.

ON EASTERN TRIP

President F. Henry Edwards has just returned from an eastern trip in which he was associated with Apostle Reed M. Holmes and Elder F. Carl Mesle. The men met with local leaders at Ann Arbor, Michigan; Youngstown and Akron, Ohio; and Boston, Massachusetts. While attendance from distant points was limited at Ann Arbor because of inclement weather, Brother Edwards reports the trip was very profitable. Brother Edwards also stated that it is expected that when other visits of the series have been completed after the first of the year, a report on the findings will be published.

CONDUCT SURVEY

Apostles D. T. Williams and Charles R. Hield made a survey of the Lamoni Stake with Stake President Robert Farnham and Stake Missionary Virgil Billings. The apostles report that progress is noted in the building program and the missionary work in the stake. Four new church buildings are being erected. They will be located at Lamoni, Creston, Albia, and Mt. Ayr. The survey was conducted December 4-10. Brother Hield addressed approximately 100 priesthood members at the Coliseum in Lamoni, and Brother Williams preached the Sunday morning sermon there.

NEW PASTORS ASSIGNED

The new pastors have been assigned to congregations in the Center Stake. They are Blue Ridge, Ernest Rauh; East Independence, L. J. Richards; Gudgeon Park, C. Myron Zerr; Second Church, Herman A. Chelline; South Chrysler, Orville L. Hiles; Sugar Creek, Ralph M. Freeman; West College, Howard C. Timm.

ATTENDS INSTITUTE

John R. Darling of the Department of Religious Education attended a Northeastern Illinois District church school institute December 15 and 16. Mission Branch at Marseilles, with their pastor, Robert H. Anderson, was host to the institute. Activities included a panel presentation Sunday afternoon. The theme was "These things we shall do in defining and improving stewardship, missionary outreach, and teaching in our church schools." Panel members included Sister Ruth Gouty, Brother Arnold Settles, Brother Lloyd Cleveland, district president; Brother William F. Pike, district director of religious education; and Brother Darling.

SERIES HELD

Seventy Glen Johnson preached a series of missionary sermons at the Walnut Park church in the Center Stake of Zion. There were six sermons in the series, and these were given on successive Sunday evenings. Pastor Fred O. Davies reports good attendance and a fine missionary spirit present.

ANNUAL BANQUET GIVEN

Employees of the Herald Publishing House were guests at the annual Christmas banquet which was held at the South Chrysler church on December 14. Featured on the program were Charles Welch, a tap trio by Carol Hodges, Kathleen Butterworth, and Jeanne Antes, a humorous reading by Dolly Budd, a piano solo by Delores Tandy, and a Christmas poem

Evan Walden

Evan Walden is director of physical plant at Graceland College. In addition to the many responsibilities of maintenance, he is also concerned with future planning for a more efficient and effective Graceland campus.

Born in Frazee, Minnesota, he went to school through the eighth grade there and then moved with his family to Lamoni, Iowa, where he completed his secondary education. From 1925 to 1927 he attended Graceland College, and has in more recent years taken specialized short courses at the University of Minnesota and Iowa State College.

After graduating from Graceland he worked on several construction jobs in the Kansas City area, including the Auditorium, returning to Graceland campus in 1928 to help construct Walker Hall. After completion of this job he was asked to join the Graceland staff, and has been there ever since. He has had some hand in the construction of just about every building on the campus.

In 1928, Evan was married to Gertrude White. They have four children, Carolyn, Kenneth, Bill, and John, all Gracelanders with the exception of John who is still in high school. Evan is a member of the Association of Physical Plant Directors of Universities and Colleges and the Lamoni Business Men's Club. He is president of the Lamoni chapter of Rotary International and of the Co-operative Lumber and Supply Board. While in college he was interested in sports and lettered in football, track, and basketball. In addition to his continued interest in sports, he enjoys hunting, fishing, and farming. He lives on an acreage which gives him an outlet for his farming interests.

The Good Desire

"I speak to all who have good desires, and have thrust in their sickles to reap."

—Doctrine and Covenants 10: 11

THERE is an impressive phrase—"all who have good desires." How well it describes some of the people who are found in every congregation of the church. They are generally alert, the first to see when someone is in need, the first to know when something ought to be done.

A new pulpit was made for one of the churches. The wood was beautiful, and excellent workmanship went into its construction. But there was a broad area on the front of it that needed something. Then a brother who has the tools and the necessary skill offered to make a large replica of the church seal to be put there. He did the work and today the pulpit carries a beautifully made symbol of the church.

That man had "good desires."

ONE OF OUR MEN came through the office last week. He held up a package of big paper-shell peccans from somewhere down in Dixie. They were done up in fresh cellophane.

"I'm selling these for Liberty Street Church," he said.

"But don't you attend the Enoch Hill Church?" we asked.

"Yes. I help them too," he replied. "But Liberty Street needs help now, and I'm doing my bit for them. I help any church that needs it."

Last month he did some hauling for a woman who, for some reason, was "slow pay." He went back to see her and said, "When you are able, put two dollars into the church building fund and get a receipt. When you do that I will consider your bill paid."

A good way of encouraging payment of debts and helping the church! That man has "good desires."

WE HAVE BEEN TOLD of a woman who sews baby garments in her spare time. It is an act of love performed for a need that does not yet exist, but that will surely come. When it does, she will be ready. Tomorrow or next week some poor mother will bring a child into the world, and there will be no money to buy clothes for it. Then our lady will hear of it and bring in what is needed. It is her service of the heart to society. She has "good desires."

A man who loves his church makes it his project to care for the lawn and shrubs, keep out the weeds, patch the concrete when it breaks, and do the little painting jobs that others might not notice. Such a man has "good desires."

An elderly man goes out to visit the sick, the lonely, the discouraged, and the isolated. He prays with them, administers to their needs, and gives both physical and spiritual help. He has "good desires."

These people are not satisfied, they do not stop, with the good desire. That is only the beginning. The desire puts them to work.

The text could be paraphrased: "I speak to those who see the need and do something about it."

NEWS IS COMING IN from the branches indicating a generous response from the people in contributing to the fund to finish the Auditorium. Branches are more than subscribing their quotas.

One cannot overlook the fact that church people have an intense desire to see the Auditorium finished. They want it to have the dignity and beauty that was planned for it. They are willing to sacrifice to see it done.

In coming weeks there should be more of this same kind of good news. If it is possible to know the attitude of church people, or to predict what they will do, one might venture the opinion that the funds will be raised for the purpose in the time given for this task.

All these people have the "good desire" and are doing something about it.

THERE IS NO MONOPOLY on the right to work for God. Many times the prophet extended the invitation to the people in the early days of the church:

O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart. . . . The field is white already to harvest.—Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1.

Whosoever will thrust in his sickle and reap, the same is called of God.—6: 2.

Ye [shall] have joy in the fruit of your labors.—6: 14.

Seek to bring forth and establish my Zion.—12: 3.

All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.—119: 8.

These are invitations to men and women who "have good desires" everywhere in the church. Those who will try to qualify themselves, those who will take up the work in a spirit of humility and love, working peacefully with other workers in the church, will find great opportunity for service and great happiness in serving.

Auditorium Report

Encouraging news is being received daily in regard to the campaign for funds to complete the Auditorium. At the time this article is being prepared, the Presiding Bishopric has received reports from forty-three districts and cash totaling $27,573.19. It is noteworthy that these reports are for November only, which means that just two weeks' effort is included.

In spite of the abbreviated period covered by the reports, two districts have exceeded their quotas, and others are well on the way toward that achievement. Here is a list of districts reporting excellent progress:

- Rich Hill — 140% of quota
- Northeast Nebraska — 118%
- Gulf States — 80%
- Nauvoo — 74%
- Northwest Iowa — 70%
- Spokane — 66%
- Western Oklahoma — 61%
- Des Moines — 61%
- Oregon — 60%
- Saskatchewan — 58%
- Idaho — 54%
- Owen Sound — 51%

Across the Desk

BY THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Merle Guthrie of the Department of Statistics:

With the end of the year rapidly approaching it appears that we will have 5,000 baptisms reported for 1951. If we reach this figure, it will be the first time since 1921, and I have no doubt with everyone making sure that all baptisms are reported, that we will achieve it.

The first six stakes and districts in number of baptisms reported in October are Northern Michigan District, 27; Northern California District, 26; South-eastern Illinois District, 21; Center Stake of Zion, 21; Eastern Colorado District, 19; and Far West Stake, 19.

The first five branches in number of baptisms reported for October are Tunnel Hill, Illinois, 17; Genoa, Colorado, 13; Boyne City, Michigan, 12; East Jordan, Michigan, 9; and Wisconsin Rapids, Wisconsin, 9. The Osceola, Missouri, Mission also had 9.

We have a communication from an unnamed district president in which we find this statement:

Despite the alarming views of the world as depicted by radio and printers' ink, we feel a need of divine help that should help the church to keep more fully awake to our possibilities of spiritual death, or life, as individuals. We are happy to report that all but two branches in our district have been heard from, and each has exceeded its quota toward the Auditorium fund.

We are pleased to say, too, that we have no division through quarrelings in doctrine or in purpose, but while the Saints are one in this measure we are deeply conscious of our mission as the church of Jesus Christ, and that this is not sufficient if we seek to attain our calling as children of God. To this end we pray for strength.

We wish to pass this on for consideration of the Herald readers and suggest that it is indicative of the spiritual growth which continues to evidence itself in the onward march of the church.

W. J. Breshears, President of the Gulf States District, reports for November, from which we extract the following:

A series at Ocean Springs, Mississippi, resulted in five baptisms. Interest and response were excellent. In 1948 I first visited Ocean Springs-Biloxi for missionary work. We baptized sixteen persons and organized a mission. Two men baptized then serve in the priesthood now. Saints met in homes and the city hall. When Escatawpa Saints moved into their new building, they donated the old one; men of the Ocean Springs-Biloxi mission used it, with some new material, for their first church home, of which they are justly proud. All work was done by the congregation. Lt. H. W. Patrick, formerly of Walnut Park, Independence, serves as pastor. . . . I am visiting Birmingham Branch, organizing a two-month missionary program for Pensacola, Belleview, and Pensacola Negro congregations, with the help of Evangelist A. D. McCall and Elders A. L. Dungan and H. M. Cooper. We will be conducting cottage meetings in the branches during the week. Similar programs are scheduled for Brewton, Alafloa, Berrydale, and Coldwater in February and March; we are using "The Restoration Story" and slides by Apostle Oakman and Seventy James Daugherty. District baptisms for the calendar year total 127—our best record since 1948. . . . With my associate, Elder M. L. Salter, I conducted a priesthood and workers' conference at McKenzie, Alabama, on December 8 and 9 with Bishop J. E. Baldwin, J. A. Pray, Franklin Steiner, and others. Under Apostle P. E. Farrow, we are planning the annual winter district conference at Escatawpa for January 12 and 13. Final action of transferring Brewton reunion grounds to General Church is expected. Sister Mary B. Davis deeded about six acres adjoining the reunion grounds on the north to the church. Brewton congregation recently purchased a building at 414 Belleville Avenue, valued at about fifty thousand dollars, for fifteen thousand.

Midyear Students to Be Accepted at Graceland

Graceland College will have room for about twenty-five new registrants the second semester which begins January 24, 1952. If you are a mid-year graduate or have been out of school for a while, consider now the advantages of beginning your college career without further delay. Graceland will also be glad to consider applicants with previous college credits.

It will be possible for new freshmen to arrange a well-rounded course of study except perhaps in a few technical fields. A complete list of available courses will be sent upon request. If you would like to receive application forms, further information, or answers to some of the questions you have, write to Dr. William S. Gould, Chairman of the Committee on Student Selection, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa.

President of Far West Stake

IN THE FALL migratory birds fly southward to a warmer climate and better feeding grounds. Among the longest journeys are those of certain shore birds that nest on the Arctic tundras and winter far south toward Cape Horn. Such a journey covers thousands of miles. The Arctic tern flies to Europe southward over the eastern Atlantic. Its summer and winter homes are 11,000 miles apart, and nearly half its life is spent in travel. The American crane which crosses to Siberia to nest comes back eastward across the Bering Sea each fall before it turns southward. The blue geese nest on the shores of Newfoundland and follow the regular Missouri River fly-way to South America. They have definite stops and never fail to use this route year after year.

Like their nesting and building habits, birds' migratory habits are inherited and instinctive. The young birds of the year make an equally long journey with adults, and it is no longer believed that adult leaders show them the way. For instance, birds often fly thousands of miles to nest in the same place. In turn, they will go back to winter quarters with equal precision.

After spending several months in the ocean, salmon always seek their native streams to spawn. They swim thousands of miles, leaping over rapids and waterfalls, to reach their spawning grounds. After spawning, the salmon die, but their young come forth to obey their inherited habits. All fowl, fish, and animals have laws "by which they move in their times and their seasons; and their courses are fixed; even the courses of the heavens."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 11.

HOW GREAT are the courses of the heavens! The most distant systems have been recorded on long-time photographs as being about 500 million light-years away. (A light-year is the distance light travels for a year at the speed of 186,000 miles per second, or nearly six trillion miles.) It is estimated that within the sphere of this radius there are about one hundred million universes. The average distance between one universe and another is about a million light-years. And throughout all space that has been probed, the universes seem to be scattered with a uniform distribution. Our solar system is merely a small group of planets rotating around the sun, all of which is out toward the rim of our universe. As we gaze on the Milky Way, we are looking toward the center of it. The distance from our sun to the center of our universe is about thirty thousand light-years.

One of the distant universes in the constellation of Bootes is receding with a velocity of 24,300 miles per second and is now about 230 million light-years from us. Such a distance is beyond the power of imagination to conceive. What is beyond these distant systems no man knows. But scientists know that between these universes and us, stars and planets are in motion; all are traveling at a high rate of speed, rotating in their respective systems, never changing their courses. James Jean claims that the heavens are so well planned that an actual collision between two stars in a system can occur on the average of only once in 600,000 billion years. This is much greater than the age of the stars, so for all intents and purposes a collision between two stars never occurs.

The motivating and intelligent power by which all these creations—organic and inorganic—move is the light of Christ (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 2, 3). They were created by Jesus Christ (Doctrine and Covenants 12: 5) and "declare his name for ever and ever" (Doctrine and Covenants 110: 23). They keep the laws of their kingdom and reveal the greatness of God for, "Any man who hath seen any or the least of these, hath seen God moving in his majesty and power."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 12.

From all the numberless heavenly bodies, God has reserved the earth as the final resting place for the redeemed. Its divine purpose is "that bodies who are of the celestial kingdom may possess it for ever and ever; for, for this intent was it made and created." In harmony with this purpose it abideth the law of a celestial kingdom and thereby "filleteth the measure of its creation" thus "transgresseth not the law."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 6.

HE WHO WOULD RECEIVE divine commendation with physical and spiritual blessings while living on the surface of Mother Earth must keep the celestial law revealed in Jesus Christ and restored in these last days or be swept off. Man was created and placed here to glorify

God and have joy and life through right conduct in obedience to law. Adam failed and brought misery to himself and his descendants. Humanity has shared the consequences of his disobedience.

History is mostly a story of human carnage and wanton destruction of the earth's resources, until today we stand at the brink of total annihilation. What a pity! What an indictment against the intelligence of man! But Satan, the wicked one, "cometh and taketh away light and truth, through disobedience." And as long as men continue to disregard the teachings of Christ, they will suffer and, when ripened in wickedness, will destroy themselves. Men are without excuse for their plight. For God has sent his prophets to teach men the way of life. He sent his son who died that men might live. Jesus, speaking of himself as the Son of God, says:

He who believeth on him is not condemned; but he who believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the name of the Only Begotten Son of God, which before was preached by the mouth of holy prophets; for they testified of me. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil.—John 3: 18, 19.

THE DIVINE PLAN is for man to "have life and have it more abundantly," but life comes by the keeping of the celestial law. We may flout the laws of the celestial kingdom for a time without dire results but not for long. The terrible conditions in which the peoples of the world find themselves are the result of a universal failure to accept the laws of God and live by them. Consequently, we have turmoil, strife, and death on every hand. The creations were not placed here to be used by man the way they are. Evil and wicked ways are not compatible to their spirit and purpose. To the contrary, they were made for the benefit and the use of man, both to please the eye and to gladden the heart; "yea, for food and for raiment, for taste and for smell, to strengthen the body, and to enliven the soul."—Doctrine and Covenants 59: 4.

The earth itself rebels against unrighteousness. When Enoch, commanded of God, went to the top of Mount Simeon, he "looked upon the earth, and he heard a noise from the bowels thereof saying, Woe, woe is me the mother of men! I am pained: I am weary because of the wickedness of my children! When shall I rest and be cleansed from the filthiness which has gone forth out of me? When will my Creator sanctify me, that I may rest?"—Doctrine and Covenants 36: 10. The Lord gave answer,

As I live, even so will I come in the last days; . . . and the day shall come that the earth shall rest; . . . my people will I preserve; righteousness will I send down out of heaven; and truth will I send forth out of the earth, to bear testimony of my Only Begotten; . . . righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood, to gather out my own elect from the four quarters of the earth unto a place which I shall prepare; a holy city, that my people may gird up their loins, and be looking forth for the time of my coming; for there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion, a New Jerusalem.—Doctrine and Covenants 36: 12.

The gathering of the House of Israel or the "elect"—the process by which God proposes to "preserve" his people—can only be accomplished as "his people" are willing to accept and live the truth. This great and marvelous work began in the translation of the Book of Mormon and the restoration of the fullness of the gospel. There is no other "way." All beings who refuse to accept the restored message are not "justified" and must abide another kingdom. They who would establish Zion and share in the coming of Christ and his celestial glory must prepare themselves by obeying the laws governing the conditions that make such a holy event possible. The Apostle Paul asks who shall abide the day of the coming of the Son of Man?

Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon on February 16, 1832, being in the Spirit and by His power, had their eyes opened and their understandings enlightened "so as to see and understand the things of God." They "beheld the glory of the Son" as he sat on the right hand of God. These men testify that they saw and heard concerning those who live the celestial law and thus qualify to be with Christ when he comes to inherit the earth. "They are they who received the testimony of Jesus, and believed on his name, and were baptized after the manner of his burial, being buried in the water in his name, and this according to the commandment of which he has given, that by keeping the commandments they might be washed and cleansed from all their sins, and receive the Holy Spirit by the laying on of the hands of him who is ordained and sealed unto this power; and who overcome by faith."—Doctrine and Covenants 76: 5.

HERE IS SET FORTH the divine requirements for living the celestial law in preparation for inheriting and possessing the earth in celestial glory with God and Christ. Obedience to the gospel principles must come first. These principles are clearly stated in Hebrews 6: 1, 2: (1) repentance from dead works, (2) faith toward God, (3) doctrine of baptisms, (4) laying on of hands, (5) resurrection of the dead, (6) eternal judgment. By the obedience and keeping of these doctrines or laws we can develop and acquire the divine virtues necessary to live and abide in God. These fundamental or basic principles are divine laws of the celestial kingdom and are the "causes" for celestial glory to all who obey and abide in them. They are efficacious. They are constituent because God ordained them to be the laws for spiritual growth. By and through them only can men be made alive.

It is true that all men, through the atonement of Christ, are made "alive" or "saved" and therefore are entitled to a resurrection and immortality. Paul states this in I Corinthians 15: 22: "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Jesus says that all men shall hear his voice and shall "come forth"—they who have done good in the resurrection of the just, and they who have done evil, in the resurrection of the unjust (John 5: 29). Christ abolished death, which is a separation from God, and "hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (II Timothy 1: 10). Even though Jesus is the Savior of all men, there is a still greater reward to "those who believe" (I Timothy 4: 10). This is the justice of God made manifest. Men who are not willing to accept the full law of Christ and "labor and suffer reproach" with him, are not eligible to enjoy celestial life on earth and the presence of God and Christ in eternity. They must inherit the terrestrial kingdom or telestial kingdom.

For he who is not able to abide the law of a celestial kingdom, cannot abide a celestial glory; and he who cannot abide the law of a terrestrial kingdom cannot abide a terrestrial glory; and he who cannot abide the law of a telestial kingdom, cannot abide a telestial glory; therefore, he is not meet for a kingdom of glory. Therefore, he must abide a kingdom which is not a kingdom of glory.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 5.

No wonder the Apostle Paul admonished Timothy to "take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them; for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee."—I Timothy 4: 16. And it is not suprising that God at the very outset of the Restoration Movement commanded his elders to "say nothing but repentance to this generation" (Doctrine and Covenant 6: 4). The people of the world a hundred years ago needed to repent, and they do even more so today.

I have often wondered what the world would have been like if the testimony of the restored church and the law of the celestial kingdom and glory had been universally accepted. Would not wars and human misery have been eliminated? Would not mankind's physical and spiritual needs have been supplied? I'm sure they would have been. In the first place the hearts of men would have been changed from hatred to a love which would cause men to have a genuine concern for the welfare of one another. The right use of all scientific discoveries would result in the betterment of mankind in every field of human activity.

It is true that many people throughout the world have been helped a great deal, but largely because of a financial gain for those who controlled the resources or information available. Most of the world's trade or commerce is still done strictly on a business basis where the important factor is money. The same can be said for most personal transactions, too. One can present many arguments to sustain the so-called free enterprise economic system, the socialist system, the communist system, or any other system; but the fact remains that the world is in serious trouble.

RECENTLY I had an opportunity to hear Dr. George Montgomery, head of the department of economics and sociology, Kansas State College, Manhattan, Kansas. He spoke on "A Look Into the Future." He believed fairly good economic times were in store for the United States for the next three to five years, but from then on the future looked dismal. And "good times" for the next few years depend on what Russia and her satellites do. His optimism for the future wasn't very bright. Other economists and sociologists are also terribly concerned about what is to take place in our national and world economy in the near future.

Some people take the position that the world is merely passing through an other "growing pain." They say the troubles of this day and generation will provoke us for a time, then civilization will settle back for a season in which there will be peace and progress. These individuals take the position that the world has had wars and troubles before and has come through to give humanity many good things with which to enjoy life. They point to the great industrial productions, educational opportunities, labor-saving devices, rapid transportation vehicles, wonderful communication facilities, and scientific advances. These do facilitate life, but they have factitious value in the development of character and the perpetuation of life. Over a score of civilizations have come and gone because they failed to recognize the redemptive process of spiritual law, and went into decay and oblivion. The obligation of life is to spiritual law or to reap the consequence of physical, mental, and spiritual disarrangement which brings confusion and eventually total annihilation, either self-imposed or by external influences or forces.

MAN WAS CREATED to live the celestial law of God which brings joy, peace, security, and eternal happiness. Conversely, any type or kind of life less than the keeping of the celestial law is contrary to man's being and trouble ensues. This law is inevitably associated with life. Man may resist it, but such resistance is to his peril. Man's ordained calling is to the keeping of the celestial law, and great are the blessings when he accepts it and lives in accordance with it.

There are two or three indispensable requirements imposed upon man to know the way of life. In the first place, he must have a desire to know what the will of God is. If he has only a desire, Alma says this desire will grow into faith and faith into knowledge (Alma 16:151). If a man possesses a sincere desire to learn "the way" of life, he will be eager to "search the Scriptures" as Jesus proclaims to discover the laws to direct men into the way. Furthermore, he will be most happy to adjust his thinking to the commandments of the Almighty. His mind will be open for new light and understanding, irrespective of his traditions and previous teachings that may not be in agreement with the word of God as found in the Scriptures.

I have been very much concerned about many of our Saints who do not read and study the Three Standard Books of the church. Some do not even possess the Books. How can children reared in these homes ever have a knowledge of the celestial law? The simple truth is, they don't. And, consequently, too many of these people are lost to the celestial life—and many are lost completely. I visit among some of our church members almost every week who fall in these categories. What tragedies good people go through all because they have neglected to be faithful in studying the Inspired Version, Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, other church books, tracts, and the Saints' Herald. They do not attend church, participate in the sacraments and ordinances, cultivate the friendship of the Saints who are able to give spiritual strength to those who are weaker.

The second requirement, completely dependent on the former, is the willingness to discipline one's life to the demands set out in Holy Writ. Not everyone can adjust his thinking from error to truth; from the old to the new. Many people find it almost impossible to leave their traditions and begin a new life toward God. They have been "steeped" in the teachings of their "fathers" and find it difficult to break away. These people often use varied excuses to make themselves believe that a change is not necessary.

I realize it is not too easy to leave traditions, pleasant associations, or the world for the gospel's sake and live the celestial law. It certainly is not the line of least resistance but by so doing, celestial glory is assured, more pleasant fellowship is certain; joy, peace, and a sense of deep satisfaction result. Most of all, the person who yields himself in obedience to the principles of Jesus Christ is freed of his sins and places himself in a position to assist God in the establishment of Zion, with the promise of celestial glory, if faithful. He becomes the beneficiary of eternal life. He becomes sanctified and will possess the earth forever and ever.

Afterthoughts

By Kay Norman Beldin

I REMEMBER that as a child, when I read the Christmas story each year, I always "looked down on" the innkeeper for closing his door to the Christ. Of course if he had entertained the faintest idea that the babe to be born in his stable would be the prophesied Messiah, he would gladly have made room for him in the inn.

But since the outward appearance of neither Mary nor Joseph suggested they were to become the parents of such nobility, the innkeeper merely regarded them as poor, tired taxpayers.

Yet, as I reread the story this Christmas tide, I couldn't help comparing our reactions to those of the innkeeper. I wonder how many times we shut the door of our hearts on Christ because we fail to recognize him?

There's the dirty, rough-talking little urchin who is forever running through our prize flower bed. Because of his outward appearance and our irritation we threaten to report him to the authorities if he doesn't learn to use the sidewalk. And by doing so we gain nothing but his indignation and more broken flowers.

However, suppose we had spoken a few kind words of counsel and extended a gesture of understanding and friendship. Perhaps we would not only have gained his respect and obedience, but also discovered underneath the dirt and rough talk a bundle of valuable energy for the building of God's kingdom!

Then there is the neighbor whom we casually ignore because of his uncultured, uneducated, and seemingly lazy manner. Our usual excuse for ignoring him is that people of his level wouldn't understand anything we would have to offer. I wonder if perhaps the major reason is that we would rather not be seen associating with him.

On the other hand, if we would open our hearts to him there is no limit to the ministry we might bring him. Through our interest in him and our patience with him perhaps we could help raise him from his meager understanding of life and awaken within him the desire for a better life.

We might paraphrase one of Christ's statements concerning such people:

"Inasmuch as ye have received one of the least of these my brethren, ye have received me."

Fifty Years Together

By Charles Fry

I PRONOUNCE YOU husband and wife, and may God add his blessing," were the words uttered by Elder J. M. Terry on January 1, 1902, at the Delano Church, near Cameron, Missouri. The occasion was my marriage to Emily C. Kinney.

I was already an appointee of the church, and Emily a willing recipient of all that calling might bring for her to bear. From there we proceeded to the home we had selected near Tabor, Iowa. From meager means the four-room house was simply but comfortably furnished. We entered one cold January morning. The haulers had the evening before hastily deposited the furniture in the rooms, and we had come to set things in order and begin housekeeping.

After making a fire we mutually agreed to take our most precious possession and give it first place in our home. It was not something we had bought at the store, and it is a rarity in modern homes. It was our family altar—symbol of our pledged love and devotion to each other and to the God whom we both accepted and undertook to serve. It was spiritual but intensely real, a type of all that was good and true and ennobling; it was an emblem of the divine Presence, a place where God and we could meet. We dedicated that altar and established its permanence in our home.

By the warmth of the fire we read from John a message of divine love. Upon what surer foundation could we build a happy home than love for God and for each other? Our hearts were idealism has remained throughout the years as the cementing force which held our home together. Before it we met the perplexities and problems of life and dissolved petty differences and peevishness. There we have caught the vision of the higher and finer things of life, and tasted of the love and goodness of God. When our first son was born, we brought him one morning under divine impulse before that altar and offered him to the Lord, dedicating him to the service of the church. Time has shown the acceptance of that offering. There our offerings of prayer have ascended, sometimes with penitential tears, sometimes with tears of joy; sometimes in pleading and often in thanksgiving and praise.

And now, after fifty years, the light that has so long shone, still shines to light our pathway as we walk hand in hand with slowing steps down the western slope.

The waning sun is sinking to its rest,
And soon will disappear beyond our sight;
Its crimson hues o'er-spread the aerial west,
Revealing that tomorrow will be bright.

Three sons have come, each to take up his own calling; Evan A. of Missouri follows in the steps of his father in gospel ministry; A. Harold is a teacher of music in the public schools of Iowa; and Charles W. is engaged in business in Nevada.

Notwithstanding its imperfections and errors, we have found our home to be akin to the kingdom of God. By our invitation the divine Spirit has helped us rise toward the perfect ideals of the kingdom above, preparing us for inheritance there.

Our blessed Lord—him whom we long have served—
Will not forsake when comes the dark'ning night;
At morning's dawn the glory now reserved,
Will fill our souls anew with pure delight.

touched, our minds flooded with light, and our souls filled with confidence in the future. Our prayers were prayers of dedication.

The message of that morning so impressed us that we continued to speak of it for several days. Then one morning we decided to reread our first Scripture and extend our study of the subject; but strangely as we read that same chapter, we found in it no word about love. Our first lesson had come from some other source than the printed page.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF

J. A. Gunsolley

PART VI

First Funeral Sermon

Upon meeting an officer of the Boston Branch on my arrival Saturday evening, I was informed that the presiding elder had been called away on some ministerial service and wanted me to go to Haverhill, Massachusetts, to preach a funeral sermon Sunday morning. This Sunday was to have been the last Communion Sunday I would have with the Saints in Boston, as I had decided to return to Lamoni before the next one. But I could not refuse the presiding elder's request. It was a difficult task for me because I never had preached a funeral sermon, and I would not have another member of the priesthood with me. I had previously visited the home where lived the little girl who had died. The mother had left a bucket of scalding hot water on the floor into which the child fell when her mother's back was turned. The girl reminded me of my own Lucy at home whom I had not seen for several months. So I went, trusting God would be with me. I reached the home some hours before funeral time and prayed in secret that I might be divinely led in the undertaking. When the time came for the service, I selected the hymns, directed the singing, offered the invocation, and preached the sermon in perfect composure. This apparently was of much comfort to the bereaved ones and others present, nearly all of whom were nonmembers. Upon returning to Boston I learned that the Communion service had been postponed one week, so I was privileged to enjoy one more Communion meeting with the Boston Saints.

Return to Lamoni

Gradually it became more and more apparent that I was not giving full satisfaction to my employers due to a number of reasons, principally that the amount of work they expected of me was too much for one man, and the equipment was inadequate. When Mr. Peasley told me one day he had negotiated with another man to relieve me it was welcome news. The feelings were mutual. He was willing to release me from our contract, and I was willing to release him. So we parted as friends and I immediately made arrangements to go home to family and loved ones. My adventure in the east had been profitable in many ways. I learned much about the people, their manners and customs, and was able to appreciate them more fully by understanding better the differences between them and the people of the Middle West.

The first problem after returning to Lamoni was employment. I was willing to do anything honorable, but my preference was to continue teaching. I had learned a system of shorthand from a private teacher and felt qualified to teach it, but I needed to qualify for teaching typing as well. So I spent a part of the summer at Highland Park College in Des Moines studying penmanship and typewriting so as to be ready to do most all lines of commercial teaching.

Opening of Graceland College

The question of a church college had been before the General Conferences a number of times, and finally action was taken appointing directors with authority to proceed to the establishment of an institution of higher education in Lamoni. Articles of Incorporation were drafted and approved by the state of Iowa, a date set for opening the school, a faculty employed, and operations started in September, 1895.

I was offered a position on the faculty as head of the commercial department. Two other departments were organized at the opening: the classical in charge of Joseph T. Pence, and the scientific under Thomas J. Fitzpatrick. The classes were in six upstairs rooms over a brick business building on South Linden Street.

President of Lamoni Branch

I was serving as presiding officer of the Lamoni Branch in 1893 and 1894 and resigned to accept the position with the college at Salem, Massachusetts. It was apparently an infraction of church law for one holding only the Aaronic priesthood to preside over a branch, especially if the branch be large. At this time Lamoni Branch numbered about sixteen hundred members—the largest branch in the church and world headquarters. But there is provision in the law that says a branch may be presided over by a high priest, elder, priest, teacher or deacon chosen and sustained by vote of the branch. It is also provided that in case one of the lesser priesthood should be chosen, he should soon thereafter be ordained an elder. Soon after my return to Lamoni I was again chosen to preside and was ordained an elder in 1896. Four years later I was called to the office of high priest.

Ordained Elder

When I was called and ordained to the Aaronic priesthood I was assured of the divinity of the call, for the word of prophecy to that effect had been given a number of times through others, as well as the testimony of the Holy Spirit to me. My work as superintendent of the Decatur District Sunday School Association gave me frequent opportunity to preach at places I visited. Then the officers of the Decatur District testified to my call and proposed my ordination. But my call to the office of elder was somewhat different. While I had sufficient evidence that I would be called to that office, I was not just sure the time had come. It was true I understood the law of the church to provide that if a minister of the Aaronic order of priesthood were chosen to preside over a branch, he should be ordained to the office of elder. As to whether or not the time had come for such ordination in my case, I had sufficient confidence in the law to accept the provision that calls and ordinations should come through the regularly ordained officers of branch or district, and I had faith in the officers at that time. When the district president, the apostle in charge of the territory, and Joseph Smith proposed my ordination, I consented and was ordained elder on February 23, 1896. However, with a bit of anxiety I looked for some manifestation that my ministry as an elder was approved of God.

Confirmation of Call to Eldership

I had not long to wait, Louise Roeder, who taught in the public schools, was boarding in our home. She was a member of the Methodist church, but attended the Saints' Sunday school and was given charge of a class. Of course she was interested in the Bible and quite naturally we conversed about the gospel and the churches. Her teaching a class from a Latter Day Saint quarterly and her living in a Latter Day Saint home with the frequent talks about the church and the gospel convinced her.

She said, "Oh, if I could only believe it. It seems too good to be true. But what would my family and friends think if I should join the Latter Day Saint Church?"

My reply was, "You will find the ties of the gospel stronger than the ties of blood."

She requested that we ask God for light and strength that she might be guided aright. I baptized her and laid hands upon her in confirmation for the gift of the Holy Ghost. To my great joy and satisfaction in a prayer meeting shortly following she stood and bore testimony that she had received the gift of the Holy Ghost as promised, and the Spirit bore witness to my mind and heart that her testimony was true. I knew God accepted my ministry as an elder, and that knowledge has been confirmed in many instances down through the years.

My qualifications as a presiding officer in the church while serving the Lamoni Branch was regarded favorably and in accordance with the practice generally followed I was called and ordained a high priest on April 19, 1900, under the hands of Richard C. Evans and George H. Hilliard.

Pastor of St. Joseph Branch

At the General Conference of 1903 I was appointed to St. Joseph, Missouri, to serve as full-time pastor. At that time not many branches had full-time pastors, but St. Joseph was one that had been thus favored. The membership was by no means united, for some among the priesthood believed the pastor should be self-supporting, and when the ministry is divided the membership is sure to be divided. When presiding over the Lamoni Branch I had been a member of the faculty of Graceland College and dependent upon my meager allowance from the college for the support of my family.

Upon my arrival in St. Joseph, one of the first men I met was an elder who was opposed to my being supported by the church and giving my whole time to ministerial work. Inviting me to his place of business he told me frankly that he expected to oppose my being elected by the branch as full-time pastor. He called attention to statements in the Book of Mormon to the effect that the ministers labored for their own support and were not dependent upon the members. I listened patiently until he finished his argument and then suggested that the Book of Mormon statement was an account of how they managed at that time under existing conditions and was perhaps the best for the church at the time and under the situation in which they lived. It was a historical statement and not a principle or commandment to be followed always and everywhere. At other times and under different conditions wisdom directs other methods of carrying on the work of the church. It had been the judgment of the authorities of the church that the branch in St. Joseph could best be served by a full-time pastor. I was much pleased upon meeting this elder at the church on the evening the vote was to be taken on the question of my being accepted, for in talking to me before the meeting was opened he said he had been praying over the matter and had decided to withdraw his objections and vote for me. When the matter was presented he made the motion that resulted in my being accepted. He was one of my most dependable supporters during the time I was with the branch.

I did not move my family to St. Joseph, since I didn't know how long I would be permitted to serve there. My wife was suffering from quite a serious affliction. We had a comfortable home in Lamoni, where her parents lived and could help her when she needed them. We had three children. I was a member of the presidency of the recently organized Lamoni Stake, and it was desirable that I be located as conveniently as practicable in order to respond to calls to meet with the stake council for consideration of matters pertaining to stake business. It was not difficult to go back and forth, so I arranged to board with a family of Saints in St. Joseph.

Called Home by Sickness

Apostle Isaac N. White was missionary in charge of Far West District, which included the St. Joseph Branch. In late summer he requested that I attend a reunion in Kansas, and during the reunion I received word that my wife was very sick. She did not suggest that I come home, but knowing of her condition I was greatly disturbed. I called together the members of the priesthood present in the evening to pray for direction as to what I ought to do. As a result I felt a strong conviction the next morning that I should go home.

I found not only my wife in a more serious condition than I had expected, but also our youngest child, Marjorie, five years old, bedfast with a fever and paralysis of her lower limbs.

Wife's Death

My wife's mother had taken May and Marjorie to her home. The best medical skill available was secured for both, but neither of them seemed to derive any permanent benefit. This was in September. My wife gradually grew weaker until her death on December 12, 1903.

Marjorie's Affliction

Marjorie's fever and muscular soreness left her, but she was paralyzed from her hips to her toes, a victim of poliomyelitis. She never took another step, but she had a happy and cheerful disposition and was always a model of patience. Her ambition to learn and cultivate her intellectual talents never wavered on account of her physical handicap. She graduated from high school, Graceland College, and completed a course in shorthand and typewriting. She taught typing for a time in the college, was private secretary to the president, and later was secretary to the business manager at the Herald Publishing House. She always had plenty of friends among the young men who were ready to assist her in going upstairs and downstairs and moving about.

Recalled to Work in Graceland

When I reached home because of the sickness of my wife and daughter I was informed that the college authorities had been trying to locate me, as they desired I should take care of the Commercial Department for a time inasmuch as they had not succeeded in securing an instructor. Accordingly I consented to help. I thought I had quit the classroom for all time when I accepted appointment by the church to give my life wholly to ministerial service. But being kept home because of illness in my family I could not well refuse to help out.

Writing to Sell, by Scott Meredith. Harper & Brothers, $2.75.

IF YOU HAVE EVER WISHED that you could view writers and writing from behind the editorial desk and thus learn what it takes to earn the editorial nod, this book will grant your desire.

The author, Scott Meredith, is president of one of the country's largest literary agencies. A link between authors and editors, he has seen thousands of manuscripts of all degrees of excellence, and is, therefore, well qualified to talk to writers about their writing and selling problems. He looks at authorship as both art and business, recognizing, as many writers do not, that an author's problems are like those of any other manufacturer: problems of production and sales.

Many books on the development of writing skill are puzzling and discouraging to the future author studying alone. Mr. Meredith must have had this solitary student in mind when he wrote his book. He converses with the reader, rather than writes to him. In fact, his style suggests that the whole volume was talked into a recorder, because he writes in a friendly person-to-person manner which puts the reader completely at ease. He tucks in a bit of unexpected humor now and then to illuminate his advice, which makes for a light-hearted, hopeful attitude of mind in the student.

The dust jacket briefs the contents of the book: "A practical guide on the technique of magazine writing, the literary market, and the business problems of the author."

The subject matter is divided into four parts: the business facts, the story-planning and plotting facts, the writing facts, and the finished product facts. There are thirty-two chapters, and allowing roughly a half-hour to each, sixteen hours of careful reading will give the student an over-all view of the job of writing to sell.

This over-all view of the business of writing salable material will help change a struggling writer into one who knows where he is going and knows how to get there most quickly. It will start him on his way to being a poised, knowing craftsman.

In Part One, the business facts, Mr. Meredith orients the reader in the writing business. He pulls a few fleecy clouds right out from under the feet of aspiring authors and sets their feet on the solid ground of facts about writing and writers. He then clears away the underbrush in these authors' thinking about their intended vocation so that they can see both the forest and the trees. He readies them for the actual process of writing.

On the very first page he says that a writer must have basic writing ability if he is to be a literary success, and without this partly born-in ability no other qualification the would-be writer has will have much power to move him into the ranks of competent authors. He says that basic writing ability is a "product of many things such as heredity, childhood reading, and personality, and neither this book nor any other can affect the question of is-you-is-or-is-you-ain't-a-born-writer. But writing ability is not the only requirement, not by a thousand miles."

Assuming that you do have this mysterious complex writing ability, the rest is up to you. He tells you how to acquire the other qualifications.

The help that Mr. Meredith offers is of the most practical variety. His recommendations about the development, by writers, of effective working habits is based on inside knowledge of the minds of writers. He believes in work schedules for most writers as much as he does for bookkeepers. He is strictly opposed to dependence on alcohol, stay-awake pills, or any other stimulant for the mental alertness necessary for creative work.

All writers will appreciate his instructions for avoiding or, at least, ameliorating those deadly mental slumps which lie in wait for all who essay to live by the typewriter. This first part treats also of the technique of producing a professional-looking manuscript, and of the way editors work and how to please them.

It is in Part Two that the author gets down to the business of telling exactly how to plan and plot a piece of fiction, and in Part Three, how to turn this story framework into an account of flesh-and-blood people in action.

Since all stories must possess the same elements, the worth of a book on narative technique depends upon the writer's ability to teach that technique. Mr. Meredith teaches well. He makes the building and writing of a story look easy, although not once does he give the impression that the work is any push-over. It is just that he charts the way so thoroughly and good-naturedly that even the most timid reader becomes eager to begin the writing up of his long-dormant story ideas.

In Part Four, the finished-product facts, Mr. Meredith has something interesting and unusual to say about blue penciling: "Try to revise as little as possible by revising only when absolutely necessary. If you can't manage a white paper first-and-final draft, go ahead and do your first draft on yellow paper—but train yourself to write so tightly and carefully that only a limited number of minor revisions are usually necessary before you can retype and get the story to market."

The chapter on article writing is valuable since many fiction writers do occasional writing of informative intent.

The material on marketing, literary agents, contracts, rights, and other legal matters will add business ability to the writer's creative ability—an unbeatable combination with which to achieve success.

This book may be ordered from Herald House, Independence, Missouri.

Picked From the Periodicals

By Aarona Booker Kohlman

Christmas quite naturally fills the December magazines, and you have no doubt found the ideas which you will use. It seems to me that the suggestions for Christmas are unusually good this year, and many of them should be saved and used again and again. Because this reaches you too late for Christmas, however, we shall not mention these special features.

"Quo Vadis?" Reader's Digest, is a most stimulating article, in which a famous author asks himself and his fellow-men, "Whither goest thou?"

A book condensation, "The Sea Around Us," Reader's Digest, is fascinating reading, and it opens up amazing new fields of information and interest to the average reader.

It's not too late to read and benefit from "Let's Make This the Best Christmas Yet," Good Housekeeping. The author says, "Throw your heart into Christmas, 1951."

Home Column

Another in the Ladies' Home Journal series on "Political Pilgrim's Progress" is featured this month. The Journal contains several short articles that are challenging.

"Responsibility Scaled to Size," National Parent-Teacher, discusses the type and amount of responsibility which parents can expect of children at given ages.

"The Ready Self," National Parent-Teacher, is one of a series, "For the Spirit's Hunger." It is based on the biblical passage, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Whereupon I said, Here am I! Send me" (Goodspeed translation).

Coming down to more practical matters, American Home offers an illustrated guide to making pie crusts more attractive, in "Take a Package of Pie Crust Mix."

"Six Tricks of Ironing Little-Girl Frills," Woman's Home Companion, gives help on ruffles, shirring, puffed sleeves, and other special problems.

"No More Mad Mornings at Our House," Parents' Magazine, is one woman's account of how organization helped to smooth her family's morning rush and confusion.

If you have a teen-age boy around, you will thoroughly enjoy a nonsensical little piece, "It Can Happen in Any Family," Woman's Day.

Year-round Thanksgiving

On October 22 my wife and I left our home in the Santa Cruz Mountains to set gold traps in upper Butte Creek and Feather River. Each year millions of dollars of migrating gold is washed by the winter floods down these streams and into the ocean unless it is trapped in this way. After I had finished my work there we moved on November 21 to Bidwell Bar, where we rented a small three-room house by the river. We will stay here until December 20. Although we arrived late in the afternoon we were no sooner settled in our new quarters than the landlady invited us to share Thanksgiving dinner with other people in the community at the big dining room in the store next day. The long table was set for twenty-two, although only twenty persons came. The two extra plates were there in case some hungry travelers might happen by and want something to eat. John Mooney, long-time resident of the community, sat at the head of the table and gave thanks to God for His rich blessings before the meal was served. It was one of the best Thanksgiving dinners we have ever eaten.

This is not the only occasion when I have seen the spirit of brotherly love manifested among these people. There are two elderly people living here who ran out of dry wood the other day. As soon as their need was discovered, a neighbor drove his pickup to a sawmill in the hills and brought back a supply of wood for them. Whenever somebody is in need, these people are quick to do whatever they can to help. They are not related, and most of them have no church affiliation, but they do read the Bible. I want to help present the gospel to them while I am here because they are real Zion-builders at heart.

A Foundation of Zion

I note with considerable interest the campaign to raise funds for the completion of the Auditorium. I was present in the audience the day the box filled with church publications was placed in the Cornerstone of this magnificent building which symbolizes our aspirations as a people.

I happened to be in Independence visiting relatives the day this was done—some twenty-five years ago or longer. The basement of the Auditorium had just been dug. All that the handful of us gathered on the grounds that day to watch President Frederick M. Smith perform this ceremony saw was an excavation a half block square.

Some in Independence considered it the hole in the ground where our movement would be buried in a morass of quarreling and debt. But President Frederick M. Smith visioned it as a laying of the foundations of the Zion to be. We who had gathered there felt we wanted to be a part of this—to work with him to build something for ourselves and for future generations on the goodly land.

We gave of our moneys to help build this symbol of our dream of Zion. We who still live are glad to be alive at this time when this building is being completed and to be able to contribute again.

* DESERT DOLLARS

This story comes from Baker, California, where three related families form a group of members and friends of the church. There they maintain in the midst of the heat and desolation of the desert an oasis of comfort and security for passing travelers and truckers who may be in need of food and rest, sleep and gas.

The famous Death Valley is on route 127 to the north. South of town is Soda Lake, completely dry. U.S. 91 comes from the coast and goes eastward to Las Vegas, Nevada.

To Brother and Sister V. E. Willis the "Herald" brought news that church people everywhere would be contributing on November 18 to the fund to complete the Auditorium. Why couldn't they have a worship service and make their contribution too? Jay and Jeanette Hadlock, Wayne and Lois Bullard were happy to help, as always.

They held their meeting on the evening of November 18. Dickie Hadlock, age 3, held the Bible for the worship service and passed the offering plate, proud of his part in it. When the take was counted, they had $105—desert dollars.

The Baker group belongs to the Southern California District—the "everything else" area left after the Metropolitan District of Los Angeles is taken out. Brother and Sister Willis are the parents of Sister Ruth Draper, wife of Apostle M. L. Draper.

* KIRK'S FIRST PRAYER

It was a warm night. The curtains blew gently in promise of a cooler wind as I tucked two small boys in, kissed two scrubbed cheeks, and tiptoed out.

"Story, Johnny!" demanded Kirk of his big brother.

"Once upon a time . . ." responded Johnny, "there were three billy goats." His voice droned on to the end of the story. Kirk twisted and turned in his bed, trying to get comfortable. He was hot, and besides, he knew somehow that this wasn't the end. After the story there always came something else. Tonight, Mother had read a story while she rocked him, and Johnny sat close by; then they had gone to their room and Johnny and Mother knelt and—oh, yes!

"Pray," announced Kirk. "Jeshus."

"You want me to say another prayer, Kirk?" came Johnny's sweet voice.

"No," Kirk insisted. "No, Johnny. Tirt pray Jeshus!"

"All right, Kirky, you pray. I'll help you," said Johnny. And there in the quiet room Johnny led his small brother in his first prayer. They didn't know I heard—but I bowed my head to thank God for the sweet eagerness of little children.—Louise

The trouble with intellectual attainments is that you have to talk too much to let people know you have them.

New Slide Set

Coming Forth of the Book of Mormon

31 slides in color tell the story of how Jesus Christ, the Son of God, visited the scattered descendants of Abraham to bring them the message of salvation according to the ancient promise.

This is the story of the sacred records, of the war that destroyed those people, and of the burial of their records in the ground.

This is the story of how those records came forth in the latter days, fulfilling the prophecies of the Bible, and inaugurating the restoration of the gospel, in a "marvelous work and a wonder."
