Through the twelve days of the Fair nearly two thousand inquisitive people found this picture and the name of the church which extended the full length of the twenty-foot booth an invitation to a calming haven with opportunity to learn. On either side of the picture, large colored photographs portrayed the ordinances of the church. Many of these were new to most people. Some had heard of baptism and confirmation, but the laying on of hands, blessing of children, administration for the sick, and others were generally new to them. The attendants in the booth were aware of the interest people showed but made no approach until the people, who were purposely left at their own leisure, began to ask questions. Numerous individuals and often whole families showed a keen interest and were encouraged to take some of the available literature. Approximately fifteen hundred tracts were distributed.

Since some people liked to talk, the three attendants were kept busy most of the time. Often conversations lasted an hour and longer. But there was always a good feeling telling the message of Christ, and the Fair booth created an excellent opportunity to do so. It was stirring to hear some people say, “Yes, I have heard of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Tell me about your beliefs.”

A description of the booth will explain how it was designed for greatest effectiveness. The total background was made of punchboard painted in desert sand and lighted indirectly with GE blue bulbs which were inexpensive and yet gave a fluorescent effect from a scalloped overhang. The name of the church which ran the full length of the booth on this overhang was finished in a tone lighter than the backwall so that it gave an extremely rich effect. The picture of the Christ with its rustic redwood frame which blended with the tones of the painting was central and lighted by hidden spotlights. The excellent colored photographs which were ordered from the Audio-Visual Department were placed geometrically on either side in natural satin-finished frames. Beneath these were captions containing Scriptures from the Three Standard Books on each subject, thus informing the observers that the Three Books taught exactly the same message. Above each picture there were identifying name cards. Outstanding pictures of the prophets of the Restoration were prominently displayed on one wall which incited interest in church history.

It was gratifying to see the numerous people of varied nationalities and colors find a message of equal interest in the church booth. There were multitudes who at least read the name of the church for the first time who possibly wouldn’t have heard of it otherwise.

The church people of the three northern California districts are to be commended for promoting another means of reaching more people with the gospel story.

A similar religious display was used at the California Midwinter Fair held in Imperial Valley, March 9 to 16. Tracts were given to the many people who stopped at the booth to talk with priesthood members serving there. Men from near-by areas in Southern California District took turns so there would be a priesthood member stationed in the booth day and night. James Kemp of San Diego was in charge. His statement on the results of the booth was "I am very pleased."

The booth was a project of the Imperial Valley mission to get people of the Valley acquainted with the church and to let them know that it is now represented in the Valley. A membership of ten raised money for the booth, with help from other church sources.

The booth was done in two shades of brown, with brown and gold furniture. It was acclaimed one of the loveliest at the fair. A photograph of it appeared in the Imperial Valley Post and Press.

Worship the King

I WAS VERY young, very far from home, and very lonesome that Christmas Eve as I wandered the streets of Bahia, Brazil. It must have been near midnight when at last I came upon the cathedral, its interior ablaze with candlelight and filled to overflowing with worshipers. I paused a few moments just inside the entrance and listened to the priest as he celebrated the mass. I understood no words and knew nothing of the service, but I felt a unity, a consummation. Tears came to my eyes and joy filled my heart.

Early in February of 1948 my wife and I presented our new daughter to the elders that they might hold her up to God for a special blessing. Being a teacher in the beginners department, my wife suggested—and I agreed—that Pat should be blessed before the children. When we started to leave, a little voice called out, "We want to see her." So I walked around the circle holding Pat down so that all the children could reach out and touch her. As they did so I knew they were, in their own way, blessing her, and tears came to my eyes that these children should be so concerned and filled with love for my daughter.

The first of these two experiences I shall never forget. It was, I believe, an emotional experience produced by my youth, my lonesomeness, and my desire to be at home with my family.

The second experience I cannot forget. For it was, without doubt, a worship experience in which all present enjoyed a singleness of purpose, a companionship with God.

Most of us have known moments when we were so caught up by an experience that we "stood outside ourselves with joy." It may have been as we stood in the midst of a wonderful anthem of praise by nature; it may have been when a little child snuggled in our arms; it may have been when we placed our hands upon a loved one and experienced God's answer to our prayers.

These mountaintop experiences have meant so much to us that we have never forgotten them. They have left such an impression upon us that we continually seek similar experiences.

But true worship experiences are not to be had easily. Many times we find ourselves involved in an experience which we would like to believe is one of worship but which, in reality, is only an expression of emotion. A true worship experience will appeal to the intellect, and its effect will be a lasting one.

We continually seek worship experiences, knowing that through them we come close to God. We attend church services regularly; we contribute generously and file our tithing statements each year. Some of us teach Sunday school classes or work with the young people. Many of us have responsibilities of one sort or another through which we serve God and our neighbors. Sometimes as a result of these efforts we are caught up in a true worship experience. Not often, though, in spite of our efforts, and we wonder why.

We probably do not know how much we need to worship, how much our very existence depends on God's awareness of us as individuals. Do we really believe that "in him we live and move and have our being"? Often we accept responsibility and then refuse anyone's help, even God's, in accomplishing our task. There can be no doubt that, as we recognize the part God has had, can have, and is anxious to have in our lives, we will recognize our need to worship him.

It may be that we do not know how to worship God. This lack of knowledge may result from lack of training at home or church. It may result from lack of concern or awareness of need. Probably it results from relying upon ourselves to the point of excluding everyone else from our efforts to worship.

Sometimes we become so involved in things which seem important to us that we make no real effort to worship. The knowledge of our need gets pushed off into a corner of our awareness by physical things that seem to be important. We become more concerned with television programs than with family worship, with helping ourselves in preference to helping someone else. A worship experience requires effort; it is a companionship with God resulting from growth.

Usually we attempt to worship in an unintelligent and inadequate way. Many times we go to a service anticipating the presence of the Holy Spirit and are disappointed when we leave the place of worship unfilled. Not often do we remember the arguments that took place before we left home or the petty thoughts we engaged in during the service. Someone has said, "You won't find God in church unless you take him there." Our best teachers and ministers begin preparing for a service long before they even know they are to participate. They realize that for a service to be a success study must be made, ideas must be developed, and ideals must be lived. It seems that those who most often enjoy worship experiences are those who are most filled with concern for the welfare of others, who have a burning desire to do something about it, who magnify their abilities through study and prayer, who realize that in themselves they lack the ability and knowledge to properly carry out God's will. These people invite and make themselves receptive to God's direction and assistance as they attempt to worship with whatever talents God has seen fit to bestow upon them.

Very rarely someone will prevent us from worshipping. We find ourselves in a place or condition where, it seems, the Holy Spirit hovers above us, being prevented from filling us with peace, with joy, with enlightenment because of the actions of someone else. There is great truth in the statement, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." The founders of our church enjoyed, time after time, the blessings of the Holy Spirit as they approached their heavenly Father in humility and in unity. And when they disagreed or became more concerned with their own desires than with God's, they were denied the fullness of his blessings.

We are meant to worship God in spirit and in truth. Our Scriptures are filled with references concerning those who did so—from the angels in heaven before creation to our own latter-day leaders. Enoch walked and talked with God; angels came down from heaven and ministered to little children. Many of us have felt the transfiguring effects of a true worship experience.

When at last we have recognized our need to the point where our entire lives are devoted to the glorification of God and to his service, then with the flowers, the trees, the clouds in the sky, yes, with the angels in heaven, we shall worship our King.

I Had an Experience

WHEN ONE endeavors to select a single experience from his life he encounters difficulty in picking the right one. That which might help one person may not assist someone else as much as another experience would. The first thought is that an experience which happened too far back tends to glorify yesterday to the exclusion of present tense happenings. This I would not want to do, because I feel the experiences of today are greater than any time in my memory which now spans more than a quarter of a century. At the same time, I am reluctant to relate an experience that is too recent. Our experiences grow sweeter and more confirming in retrospect, and the mellowing of time often gives them prestige and power.

The one selected took place early in 1946 while I was a lieutenant in the Navy at the air base near Memphis, Tennessee. My wife, Maurine, and our little girl had gone to Pittsburg, Kansas, en route to Independence where we expected the arrival of our second child in April. We had accepted General Church appointment which was to become effective the first of April. As I contemplated the work ahead, I was not deluded by the grandeur of being a church appointee nor deceived as to the cost of this consecration. After retiring to bed one evening, being alone in the room, I began appraising the tasks before me, praying for strength and guidance. Apparently, I dropped off to sleep rather quickly and I awakened at what seemed not more than fifteen minutes later. But in that time there had transpired an experience that has often succored and inspired me in the days since.

The dream which I had was different from any I had ever experienced. It was truly a spiritual dream. I was aware of endeavoring to ascend a steep hill. The progress up the long slope became more arduous as time passed, and I became increasingly weary. Eventually I became so fatigued that it seemed I could no longer move one foot in front of the other. At this time there came upon me as a shroud the mantle of the Holy Spirit. While I was bathed in its influence, new life surged in my limbs, and the revived heart gained strength to continue upward. Often since I have reflected on Doctrine and Covenants 83:6 which speaks of the renewing of the body by sanctification of the Spirit.

Some time later I found ascending the precipitous incline even more enervating than previously. As I continued upward, conditions worsened with each step. The precipice was so steep that I gradually and painfully ceased to climb. Then I discovered not only that my progress was terminated but also that I was about to slide backward. How true is the maxim that the cessation of forward movement does not permit stability nor security but means regression and loss. Man does not stand still!

In desperation I viewed my plight and prayed for help when I knew that even a holding action was impossible. At the very instant when endurance was gone, I felt a firm handclasp on my arm that assisted me up the otherwise unconquerable steep to the summit. I knew this to be the hand of Jesus. And I knew at that moment he was truly my Savior. Furthermore, I was made to know that he will never leave me so long as I seek to do his will.

Many times, and particularly during recent years, I have had to draw on that experience for strength. At moments when the task has seemed overwhelming, I have called again for the strength of that hand upon my arm to bear me upward. It has not failed me. I trust I may never forget.

Part VI

ENGLAND easily could be known as a land of ancestral homes. They have been preserved and used by succeeding generations as a heritage, along with the land. We respect such tradition, for historic New England inherited the same tendency to preserve its antiquities. Most palaces in all the Old World have been preserved, too, and are open to the public. Even those in ruins are spectacular and are on tour routes.

At the close of Part V (March 24 issue) we were about to enjoy the fulfillment of another lifelong desire—to see Toppesfield, England, the ancestral home town of the progenitors of Joseph Smith, Jr., prophet and martyr. Four generations back of him lived Robert Smith of Toppesfield, Essex County. During the reunion at Enfield, the afternoons were free for those who desired to “sight see.” When Brother Esil Meredith and his wife, Madge, offered to take us to Toppesfield we were delighted and doubly so to find that Brother William Worth, his wife, Kathleen, and young daughter were to be with us.

Esil's commodious bus-truck held us all comfortably. We hurried along the narrow, woodsy English roads through delightful one-street villages, the homes tucked cozily among flowers, gardens, hedges, and trees. We chatted continuously about the pioneers of the Restoration and about the continued pioneering facing the members and leaders of the present generation in the church. Our sturdy bus rounded curve after curve as we fairly swung along the eighty-mile route to our destination. Rounding a final bend in the road, we entered a beautiful tree-lined street and at its dead end were halted by the town pump of Toppesfield.

The main thoroughfare through the town ran crosswise behind the pump, forming a T-shaped junction. The pump, centered on a very large platform and roofed from the four corner supports, formed the town square. Here a dog enthusiastically encouraged its boy pals to climb higher on the supports. An ancient bachelor, curious, sauntered toward us with his bucket for water and later took us into the four rooms which he had occupied alone since the death of his mother. The rambling house has been condemned, but four families still use it, although it is plainly maneuvering to keep itself upright. The experience was a treat, but the bits of information which we received did not include any knowledge of the Robert Smith property.

Suddenly we missed Mark, but we continued interviewing neighbors and snapping pictures, hoping that someday one of the subjects would prove to be the home we had expected to find. Soon Mark appeared in the distance. He had been “having tea” with the rector of the splendidly preserved Episcopal Church, through which we had browsed previously and in which hangs a framed record—a list of all the rectors who had served there back into the 1200's. The aged man was not at all well, but he had a faint recollection concerning the Robert Smith homestead. He promised to look into the records when he recovered sufficiently. We are most grateful to have walked the same streets and looked upon the same homes which the forebears of the Martyr loved back in the 1600's.

The British Reunion was a lively one. The desire to please and co-operate was very evident during discussions. One could not help sympathizing with the “where-do-we-go-from-here” predicament some were experiencing as a result of quite a drastic change which had been made in the geography of the Mission. The dissolving of the three districts into one British Mission called for extensive adjustments. Reorganization was difficult.

However, Brother F. Henry Edwards of the First Presidency and High Priest Frank Fry, who was in charge of the British Mission, were most understanding as chairmen—so much so that I noticed a spirit which brought tears to their eyes and to many in the congregation. Also I have in mind the very fine attitude of Sister Zeta Fry, and I noted the same high regard of the Saints for her now as was shown when Brother Frank was in charge of this Mission prior to 1952. She is a very conscientious and wise woman. She thinks before she speaks, and her thinking is sound. She offered a prayer at the opening of one of the women's classes, the effect of which is with me still. I am reminded also of Betty Worth's motherly and concerned prayer in behalf of another women's class, as well as of her further participation in the reunion activities. Betty is the wife of Seventy Thomas E. Worth. She has served as branch organist and has always been a Sunday school worker. She is now assistant to the Birmingham women's leader, Sister Lily Rose.

BROTHER TOM's sister, Violet, is reunion secretary. I enjoyed her sparkle and vivacity. There are Rose and May also of the Worth sisters. They are among the women's department reliables and live at home in Enfield with their father, Patriarch William Worth, who is one of those who are both zealous and jealous for the success of the kingdom-building program abroad. He is frankly averse to English emigration because their field is so large and their helpers are so few. He is a valiant gentleman, respected and revered by all. (Patriarch Worth died March 29.)

Back to Brother Tom and Sister Betty Worth. They have three sons, James, Richard, and Charles. Many of us recall with pleasure the several years when they served under missionary appointment here in the United States. Brother Tom taught one of the women's classes at Enfield reunion, developing the theme of the reunion, “The Way, the Truth, and the Life,” for our particular understanding and application. We also listened with avid attention to Bishop Anton

Compier from Holland as he earnestly pictured to the women the stewardship of life as applied to the responsibilities of a home, "What is in thy hand?" and to church activity, "Where is thy brother?"

The office of priesthood is duly revered by our oversea membership, and the brethren holding office are well supported by their wives and families. I heard the substance of this conclusion discussed in an informal group, and I thought, Surely half the battle is won when a family accepts equal responsibility with the priesthood member.

THE LEADER of our women in the newly organized British Mission is Sister Arthur Mayne (Olive). She is tall and youthful and thoroughly enjoys her sons, Stephen and Andrew, about ten and twelve years of age. She has a lilting soprano voice. She is at present studying at the Manchester Northern School of Music, "making the most of what I have before it is too late, enjoying the school atmosphere again as well as the weekly visit." Her word "visit" is descriptive of herself: hospitable, friendly, and blithe. She is a woman of considerable secretarial ability and experience in the world and for the church. She presided over the women's meetings with pleasing dignity. She has a large area to cover now that the three districts have become one. There are sixteen branches in England and Wales. She arranged for a rally on March 23 in the Northern Region and is planning for one in the Southern Region on May 11. She carries on an extensive correspondence and is looking forward with expectancy to receiving encouraging reports from the leaders at the year's end. These report blanks are received from the Women's Council in Independence and are somewhat of a liaison between the two groups. Their every effort is to follow the main pattern of our women's work as far as it is possible, sometimes under quite different circumstances than we experience. But believe me, they are faithful, tireless women.

"The aim I have chosen for the sisters for the coming year is this," says Sister Olive, "to build better spiritual resources to better witness for Christ." She says further,

Many of our groups have yearbooks, if only in a simple form, but I have endeavored to stress that it doesn't matter how simple the books are, if they only plan ahead. Some of the groups meet in the homes during winter months. We do not have a recess in the summertime so that when the lighter evenings are with us, most groups meet in the church. Every group has a "sick visitor" or a Friendly Visitor, as far as I am aware, but again I am trying to stress that this doesn't absolve us from our own individual responsibility to visit as we have the time and opportunity. One or two of our groups are able to foster social projects, thus widening their scope and opportunity for service. I believe this will grow, not necessarily as we grow numerically but as we grow spiritually and have a greater sense of our responsibilities to those around us. But at the moment the accent is upon our homes. We cannot bypass this field of service which is so very much at the heart of women's work. Many times perhaps we feel that we are called to service of a nobler kind, as it were, outside our homes, and thus we tend to neglect our first call, our homes and loved ones.

We agree heartily with Sister Mayne, for we find ourselves faced with the same problems and decisions. We must not neglect our homes.

Here again we have a 100 per cent example of husband and wife co-operation in church work and home affairs. Brother Mayne is an elder, a large, jovial man, dedicated to family, church, and the operation of a substantial bus and trucking business in Manchester. Without his support I am sure that Olive could not attempt the great responsibility facing her. Even this is not enough. We must individually support her with our confidence and our prayers. Making a success of the women's work in the British Mission is a most important task. In our missions abroad much of the non-member interest is generated through the Sunday school and the women's groups.

The branch leaders who report to Sister Mayne are Sister Franklyn Schofield (Freda) of Enfield; Sister Joseph Holmes (Annie) of Clay Cross; Sister Edward Wragg, Jr., (Eileen) of Sutton-in-Ashfield; Sister Lily Rose of Birmingham; Sister Edward Wragg, Sr. (Stella), of Gloucester; Sister E. Challands of Leicester; Sister Brown of Nuneaton; Sister William Cowley (Frances) of Llanelly, Wales; Sister Jean Foster of the Beresford Road Church in Manchester; Sister Ethel Fray of Farnworth; Sister William Entwistle (Margaret) of Wigan; Sister Walter Dawbarn (Hilda) of Warrington; Sister Irene Wright of Stockport; Sister Davis Kaye of Leeds; and Sister North of Bradford, Yorkshire. I remember seven of these sisters and want to add my commendation to Sister Annie Holmes who lost her husband by auto accident when he was returning home from the 1956 reunion. She continues to be a consistent worker whose words and efforts are practical and helpful.

Sister Mayne predicts a great future in the church from its youth in the British Mission. The members are qualifying themselves in many subjects, obtaining college degrees, and some have several degrees. Many—both young and old—are gifted in music, and they render a fine service. I was interested to see so many men organists. Sister Marjorie Hughes of Wigan has a truly wonderful voice which is under training, and young Mary Schofield, daughter of Bishop Franklyn and Sister Freda Schofield of Enfield, is also a coming vocalist. In 1951 Mary was a little girl and loved to sing. Book in hand she would stand in the garden putting on her own concert. Her birdlike tremolo was lovely to listen to. Now her voice is maturing, and she takes her part as a soloist.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING in Britain is festive. The Sunday afternoon of the reunion, some three hundred and fifty Saints were present, and their voices in song seemed to go up through the roof into the sky above. The English Saints seem to do more memorizing of hymns than we do, and that helps the volume as well as making for enthusiastic performance. On Sunday afternoon before reunion, after the six o'clock evening service had just closed, most of the congregation was still present when the bus-tour group from the United States arrived. This group had expected to be present at the service but had miscalculated the opening hour. However, the disappointment was lost in a flurry of greetings and pleasantries. The congregation was visibly delighted to see and greet so many from the church in America.

Soon the visiting group was assembled across the front of the main auditorium, while members of the congregation took places standing at the back of the room. Introductions continued then, in an orderly fashion, each person introducing him or herself amidst laughter and repartee. The highlighting experience passed all too quickly. I'll not soon forget the whispered ejaculation and the fun in the eyes of Brother Tom Worth as he slipped past me and took a chair in the center of the room, "I want to sit where I can have a good look at these foreigners!"

They Like Student Nurses

"San" Students on Affiliation Are Welcome in St. Louis

Student nurses from the "San" arrive for affiliation study at a St. Louis hospital

THERE are four very special occasions in the St. Louis Branch every year. That's when the student nurses from the Independence Sanitarium School of Nursing come to take training on affiliation at the State Hospital for the Insane and the Koch Hospital for Tuberculosis.

Pastor Ronald Manuel has a schedule and knows when to expect each group. Arrangements are made to pick up their luggage at the depot. Members of the St. Louis Branch try to make these girls feel welcome and a part of the branch.

For over eleven years Mr. and Mrs. Virgil Noakes—better known to all as "Mammy" and "Pappy"—have opened their home to the girls. They live near the State Hospital. The nurses have the use of the Noakes's sewing machine and can use the kitchen for candy and cooky-making. The Noakeses have had a boat in the family and have taken the students on summer outings. Many times "Mammy" has been a real help to these girls with her motherly advice.

At the Koch Hospital for Tuberculosis "San" student nurses receive valuable specialized training.

Student nurses learn more than just bedside nursing at Koch. There is also the care of children such as this one.

When one group leaves the State Hospital to start affiliation at Koch, the Noakes name and telephone number are left with the incoming group of "San" nurses with the message, "In case of any need, call!" This close contact has been valuable. On several occasions a real need has been discovered and the Noakeses or members of the women's department were able to help.

Transportation for the student nurses is arranged to all branch affairs. Many families invite the girls home for Sunday dinners and evening meals. When the students move out to Koch hospital, someone is there to transport them and their luggage. Even though Koch is some fifteen miles away from the city, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Norvell and Mr. and Mrs. Lindsay Braddy and their son Duane provide transportation to and from church. There are several other families—like the Prices and the Pages—who help with this transportation. George and Fanella Jones have been like brother and sister to the student nurses.

The Hearn, the Manuels, Clarks, Counts, Goetz, Fears, Cassidys, and several other families have participated in entertaining the nurses in their homes.

The "San" student nurses bring joy and inspiration as they bear their testimonies on Wednesday nights at prayer service, as they blend their voices with the congregation in song and contribute their musical talents. New interest is awakened as they take part in church school discussions. And with the nurses there, Zion's League takes on new activity.

The St. Louis Branch is indeed blessed by these charming, devoted, and dedicated young women. It is saddened as each group departs but eagerly awaits the arrival of another group. Its members try to plan better ways to make the girls feel welcome and help them enjoy their stay in St. Louis.

Affiliation study in St. Louis also includes a few weeks of specialization at the State Hospital for the Insane

Question Time

Question

It has been my understanding (based to an extent on Alma 19: 88-106) that the sin of Adam caused all mankind to be banished from the presence of God, until the infinite atonement, the crucifixion of Christ, had been made, after which the plan of salvation became effective and man once again was permitted to dwell with God. If this interpretation is correct, how can it be reconciled to the fact that Enoch and his people walked and talked with God long before the atonement had been made?

S. H.

Iowa

Answer

It certainly is true that without the atonement man could never be redeemed. The apparent error in the interpretation presented above is found in the fact that Scripture states, "until the infinite atonement . . ." and indicates that there was no atonement before the literal crucifixion of Christ. If this were true, the crucifixion—not the grace of God—would be the power of salvation. This assumption is obviously false.

Salvation is centered in the very nature of divinity. God is concerned about us because he loves us. He extends the power of salvation through his grace, which is the extension of his love that causes him to ceaselessly reach for the good he has created in man in spite of man's continued rejection.

But what of atonement?

Just as an earthly parent, motivated by love, pays the price of heartache and giving without reserve of all that he is and has to help a wayward child find the right path, so also God pays the price of our salvation. This is atonement. Our heavenly Father began paying the price of atonement the moment man fell. He continues to pay that price.

Why, then, the crucifixion?

Again, as an earthly parent is limited in what he can do for his child by the response of that child to his efforts, so also is God limited by man's response to divine love. Alma tells us, "The plan of redemption could not be brought about, only, on conditions of repentance of men in this probationary state" (Alma 19: 94).

Man has been slow to recognize that repentance is not based on force or fear, but rather on response to God's love. Only as man senses something of the depth and extent of our heavenly Father's love can he be challenged to respond in such a way that God can work the miracle that transforms him into a son of God. In order to save man God had to find some way to help him understand and appreciate this love. The crucifixion was in the heart of God from the beginning, for he chose to teach men not only by precept but by example, and thus he sent his Only Begotten Son to take upon himself the sins of the world, to live among men and die upon the cross in a soul-stirring portrayal of divine concern for man's salvation. Unless the crucifixion moves a man to an appreciation of and affirmative response to God's love, it holds little meaning for him.

But what of Enoch?

A careful study of the Scriptures shows us that in his effort to approach God, Enoch was made aware of this love (Genesis 7: 35-41, Inspired Version) in such way that he was challenged to respond. He saw God weeping at the sins of man. He sensed truths about the nature of divinity that most men could discover only through realization of and searching belief in the crucifixion.

In brief, then, Enoch and his people were able to walk and talk with God because they discovered the true nature of divinity, were moved to repentance, and thus God made of them that which they should have been.

RUSSELL F. RALSTON

Question

Jacob 2: 65 in the Book of Mormon tells us that the wicked will be sent to a lake of fire and brimstone. Do Latter Day Saints believe this to be a literal fire? I have been taught to believe otherwise.

W. H. C.

Alberta

Answer

Reference is made in many places throughout the Scriptures to the "lake of fire and brimstone" as the final residing place of the "sons of perdition" along with the devil, his angels, and hell. The exact nature of this punishment no one knows, except those who experience it. Doctrine and Covenants 76: 4 i, j states:

Wherefore he saves all except them; they shall go away into everlasting punishment, which is endless punishment, which is eternal punishment, to reign with the Devil and his angels in eternity, where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched, which is their torment, and the end thereof, neither the place thereof, nor their torment, no man knows; neither was it revealed, neither is, neither will be revealed unto man, except to them who are made partakers thereof.

Mosiah 1: 84 speaks of this anguish as being "like an unquenchable fire." Since the second death is a spiritual condition it would seem reasonable to conclude that the lake of fire and brimstone also refers to a spiritual condition and would therefore not be a literal or physical fire.

history and building progress of the Auditorium. I was making a trip to Porsgrunn and arranged with our pastor to hold an "Auditorium Day" service March 2. The sermon was illustrated with the slide set and some others. Afterwards we had a special offering.

Yesterday in Oslo we followed the same procedure in accordance with the rest of the General Church, and took a special offering. Enclosed you will find a check amounting to the dollar equivalent of these two offerings.

We here in Norway are happy to do a small part toward finishing the work on the Auditorium. It was also a good experience for our members here to see the pictures of the work being done. It helped them feel more a part of the work. Many expressed appreciation for the beauty and harmony set forth in the finished building.

Another noteworthy accomplishment of our Oslo group took place in the last week. The last of our active members filled out their annual tithing statements, giving us 100 per cent participation for 1958. Our group is not large, but the fact that each regularly attending member desired to fulfill this aspect of the law was encouraging. Our bishop's agent for Norway, Brother Olav Kristiansen, has been doing a conscientious job and has been able to help several of the members with their accounting.

A clipping from the St. Joseph, Missouri, News-Press has been forwarded to us. It has some interesting remarks concerning Elder Evan Agenstein, a teacher in the St. Joseph public school system.

Brother Agenstein has taught mathematics there for fifteen years and has a Master's degree in school administration. He is voluntarily taking a leave of absence to do further graduate work in physics and mathematics so that he may help meet the need for teachers in the St. Joseph Junior College. He will be doing this at great personal sacrifice, the article points out. He will receive no salary while on leave and will receive no additional salary when he returns and begins college teaching.

"But he feels he can serve St. Joseph's schools and students better by taking the additional work. And that is sufficient reason for his action as far as he is concerned," the story said.

The superintendent of schools had this to say about Brother Agenstein, as reported by the paper:

"We appreciate very much the willingness of Mr. Agenstein to take postgraduate work in physics and mathematics at the University of Missouri. We find it difficult to employ teachers with qualifications to teach in our Junior College. Especially is this true in the field of science.

"Mr. Agenstein is a proved teacher of high school mathematics. He is liked by teachers, students, and parents. We feel extremely fortunate in having an able, competent teacher willing to make such sacrifices for our boys and girls."

This letter recently received from Brother O. C. Henson, Jr., in Orlando, Florida:

News has come from Mr. Charles F. Darby, a member of the Utah church who lives in Winter Haven, Florida, of his presentation of the film, "Other Sheep." On February 2 he presented the film to his own congregation. Baptist, Presbyterian, and Spiritualist Church representatives were also present. One hundred and fifteen persons were present and saw slides of the Auditorium and President Israel A. Smith, as well as the film, "Other Sheep." The children present were quite interested in the recordings, "How We Got the Book of Mormon," and "The First Easter in Ancient America." In fact, the entire evening service was devoted to seeing and hearing these things from our church.

Mr. Darby said several people came forward and expressed appreciation for the information regarding our church. The following week the Methodist people invited him to present the film to their congregation, which he did. He was then invited to present the film to the Florida Southern College (Methodist) in Lakeland.

Such communication media as the church is now developing will have far-reaching influence. In the many areas of Florida where we have shown "Other Sheep" it has always been well received, and such approval certainly confirms its value.

Elder Leland W. Negaard, presiding elder of a new mission in New York, sends the following information:

We would like to ask your help in locating church members in Manhattan, Bronx, and Staten Island. The location of our new church group is excellent, easily reached by subway and bus. We have the regular use of a fine room in Earl Hall on the Columbia University Campus at 116th Street and Broadway.

Our meetings are from 3 to 5 p.m., each Sunday.

So far we have a mailing list of about forty-five names in the central New York City area. Each week a newsletter is sent to these people. The attendance during the first two Sundays was seventeen and nineteen. The group so far is mostly older young people and young adults. Several nonmembers are already in the group.

Brother Perce Judd and Seventy Loyd Adams have both been very helpful in their interest and suggestions.

We have as an eventual goal a "Liahona House" in New York City similar to that of the church group in Columbia, Missouri. There is a need for a building which can provide dormitory space for young single church people here. Such a building could also provide a meeting place and church home.

Evangelist J. W. Worth Dies

The Presidency has received word of the death of Evangelist John William Worth of Highams Park, London, England, which occurred on March 29.

Out of Every Nation

lives have been enriched by the gospel. We share a great destiny.

Can anyone bear more ardent testimony of the love of God? Does any movement have more to offer to the world than this one which started with a new vision? Is there any message so full of hope as ours concerning the living Christ, the nature of man, and the kingdom of God?

We have reason to be enthusiastic. Testimony shall be the expression of our enthusiasm. We will testify.

We have reason to give. Giving shall be the outer sign of our commitment and the expression of our concern for others. We will send where we cannot go.

They shall come to Zion "out of every nation."

Ellensburg, Washington, Mission Obtains Church

THE FIRST meeting of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in Ellensburg, Washington, was held at the home of Glenn Davis on May 22, 1955. Of the sixteen present at this first meeting, twelve were members.

From that time until the present church was obtained, the YMCA in Ellensburg was used for services. The first service in this meeting place was conducted by Evangelist Adolph Lundeen.

From May, 1955, until July, 1956, the mission was sponsored by the Yakima Branch with Elder Glenn Davis in charge. He was assisted by various members from Yakima, including Paul Anderson, Revere Brown, Carl Seago, Foster Pulliam, Wallace Van Eaton, Glen Banks, and others. Brother Davis was also assisted by Glen Petre and Robert Galusha of Ellensburg.

Foster Pulliam reported as of June 16, 1955, an average attendance of twenty-five, with ten members.

In March, 1956, at the spring conference held in Seattle, Glen Petre was ordained to the office of teacher and there were nine baptisms. Three families were united as a result of these baptisms.

In July, 1956, Elder Glenn Davis moved to California. Elder Revere Brown was appointed mission pastor by Howard Sheehy, district president. The mission from that time until the present has been under district sponsorship.

There were seven baptisms and three ordinations in April of the following year. As a result of these ordinations, the mission had Elder Glen Petre, Deacon Delbert Petre, and Priest Robert Nunn.

It was decided at a business meeting of June 5, 1957, to place fifty dollars in a building fund.

Approximately a week later there was news of a small white church for sale. Sister Barbara Lienhard was appointed to find out more details. The church was spoken for, and the mission had until December 1, 1957, to raise the funds.

During these months the members undertook large pledges, and the women's group, under June Petre, sponsored money-raising activities, including a box social, a chili and pie supper, and bake sales.

Elder Glen Petre was appointed pastor of the Ellensburg mission on October 1, 1957.

The consecration service was held in the new church on Sunday, December 1, 1957. It was fitting that this was also Communion Sunday. Evangelist Adolph Lundeen gave the Communion thoughts, Elder Howard Sheehy gave the sermon, and Seventy William Haden gave the prayer of dedication. Musical numbers were presented by Mildred Sheehy and by Bryan and Neva Buckingham of Wenatchee.

On the evening of December 1 the film, "Other Sheep," was presented at the church. A very large turnout was present for this showing.

The following two weeks Seventy William C. Haden conducted a series of missionary meetings at the church.

COMPTON, CALIFORNIA.—For some time the children of the branch brought extra money to church to enable them to give a present to Jesus at Christmas time. Letters

From an Isolated Member in Ontario

Although I am an isolated member I have loved and cherished the gospel most of my life. Lacking association with the Saints, I have studied the Three Books that I might gain knowledge and understanding. I have been blessed many times, and I believe that God would have me help in his work by encouraging those who may feel discouraged.

I would advise all young members to receive their patriarchal blessings early in life. I had mine after I was baptized at the age of fourteen, and it has been a source of comfort to me during times of trial and sickness.

Seven months ago I began to have severe pain in my legs and arm. I went to the doctor for six months and was helped, but I still could not do all my work. However, I tried not to complain. I have prayed constantly that my loved ones might someday desire to accept the gospel also, and I thought perhaps God was allowing me to go through this experience for a purpose. On July 8, while I was attending a family reunion, a very bad storm came up. There was hail, wind, and lightning. When we returned home we found that our house had been struck. Plaster and paper were torn off the wall and blown across the kitchen where we ordinarily would have been seated. A hole was burned through the curtain and tablecloth, a lampshade, and a stack of magazines. I had tacked a clipping from the Herald, "Winds of Evil Doctrine," on the wall, and though the plaster was blown off around it, it wasn't disturbed. I was indeed grateful that God had spared us and our large brick home, since it could so easily have burned to the ground.

Early in the morning I awoke, thanking God for his protection. As I prayed a personage appeared before me. I wondered if I could believe what I was seeing and reached out to touch it; as I did so, it disappeared.

I felt unworthy to receive such a manifestation and wondered if it was meant to strengthen me for future trials.

In the evening, two days later, I was alone washing dishes at the sink when I noticed another storm approaching. I pulled the cord of the refrigerator and walked across the dining room and turned on a table lamp. Again our house was struck by lightning; the water heater, electric stove and some of the lights were affected, but our home was once more saved from fire.

The next day as I worked with the shrubbery in our yard I suddenly realized that I was no longer stiff and in pain. At first I did not tell my husband and children about seeing the personage, but when I did, one accepted it readily, another was amazed; my husband made no comment.

Many people have marveled at my recovery. Now I am able to do all kinds of work with speed and agility. It is my prayer that my children and husband will eventually partake with me of the wonderful love of our heavenly Father. I read the Daily Bread and the beautiful hymns of the Restoration to my husband. I find the sacred books are a source of strength, especially to those of us who are isolated. To any member they should serve as a guide to light the path that leads to God.

Pray that I may accomplish his purpose in me.

Fellowship by Candlelight

On Wednesday evening, January 29, I assisted, for the first time, in a prayer service. The meeting was to begin at 7:45, but I went to the church at 6:00, praying for strength and courage to say the things that would help make the service a spiritual experience for all who attended. At 7:30 Elder Percy Smith who was in charge of the service, came in and asked if I would go into the backroom with him for prayer before the meeting began. As he prayed my whole being was filled with a warmth that could have come only through the Spirit of God.

Outside a windstorm raged, and a power line was blown down. All the lights in the church went out, so we lit candles and moved to the basement so that we could have our service around the fireplace. We began by singing a hymn; then I offered the invocation. After another hymn we had prayers. My two oldest daughters—Leola, nine, and Bonny, six—were seated at a little table on which two candles had been placed. After several prayers had been offered, little Bonny arose and bowed her head. As the candles cast flickering lights and shadows across her face she offered a very sincere and heart-warming prayer, remembering to thank God for giving us candles so that we could have light in the storm. It was the first time she had taken part in a prayer service.

I looked down at the opened Doctrine and Covenants on my lap and read (Section 90) the commandment of the Lord to one of servants to "bring up his children in light and truth." I was to give the opening testimony, and I used this as my theme. As Bonny remembered to thank God for candlelight, so also we should remember to thank him for sending his Only Begotten into the world so that we might have this greater light of Jesus Christ to guide us.

The meeting closed and, although the electricity was still off, we left the church feeling that we had been blessed abundantly in our candlelight fellowship.

Suggests "Year of Jubilee"

The Lord has blessed us abundantly, and I am deeply grateful for all the influences in life that have given me a firm faith in the restored gospel.

Being the wife of a bishop's agent, I take an active interest in the so-called temporal things of our church. When I read of the year of jubilee, as described in Leviticus 25, it occurred to me that we could have a modern jubilee in 1960 to celebrate the centennial of the Reorganization. We could start now setting our financial affairs in order, cleaning up time payments, etc., so that in 1960 we could turn over to the bishop not only the tithe but all surplus over our actual cost of living.

Doing that for one month would untie the hands of the bishop and let him accomplish things that have waited too long. If we did it for a year, the Lord would know we really are earnest and sincere. The cause of the kingdom would be greatly advanced, spiritually as well as financially.

Our Lord has been so good and merciful to us, we couldn't do too much for him.

Theme for a Testimony

I kept searching my mind this last week for a suitable subject on which to bear my testimony at prayer service on Wednesday evening.

The prayer service is an important occasion, our source of spiritual strength and encouragement, so I always make the subject of my testimony a matter of prayer. As I continued to pray and think over the matter the question of what I wanted from life flashed suddenly into my mind.

What did I want my life to be? Of late years I have come to feel that if I could live my religion and remain faithful to God and his church I would ask no more. However, there is more. I want the Saints with whom

I have been associated to remember me as one who was kind, understanding, and sympathetic. I want to be remembered as one who never refused any office given her and who was faithful to her duty.

The love, respect, and understanding of friends both within and without the church becomes more and more important to me.

As I have done in the past, I again dedicate my life and the ability I have been given by God to the work of the church and the spreading of the gospel.

This bit of verse by Edward Everett Hale I have taken as my creed:

I am only one,
But still I am one.
I cannot do everything,
But still I can do something;
And because I cannot do everything,
I will not refuse to do the something that I can do.

A Symbol of Christ's Gospel

I was pleased to read the Herald article, "We Remember Kirtland Temple." All lovers of this church should never forget the Temple.

Since a small boy I have enjoyed the stories of our Temple and its deep spiritual significance to the people. One hundred years after the dedication of the Temple (1936) I flew over Kirtland and circled as I thrilled at the sacred sight. Then, last fall after driving my father to London, Ontario, the home of his birth, I brought him to Kirtland. Arriving there for breakfast, we had time to view the grounds and the exterior of the Temple before one of the local brothers arrived on the scene. I was treated courteously, but my attention was called to the fact that a notice had been placed on the front doors stating no admittance could be granted. I was very disappointed as my aged father had traveled a long distance out of the way to visit this sacred place. Our brother sensed my keen frustration over this matter and referred me to someone else, but I assured him that we would abide by the decree tacked on the doors and ask no favors.

As I turned to walk away I noticed my father standing reverently with his hat in hand waiting to be admitted so he could worship in the Temple. Not wanting to let him know that we had been denied the privilege of entering I said, "Dad, the Temple is not ready for visitors, so I guess that we can't go in this trip." At that remark he gave me a brave smile and replied, "I shall not pass this way again." How true he spoke. He died a few weeks after arriving home.

The day was still young as we left Kirtland and as we drove west through the countryside my father spent a great deal of time conversing about early days in Ohio. He told of the sacred experiences he enjoyed as he viewed the grounds and exterior of the Temple. He told of some who had helped build the walls who were crowded out the day the Temple was dedicated. He told of the tears, toil, and sacrifice they endured in harmony with God's command to build the Temple. Then, as he adjusted his seat for a nap he smiled and in a soft but earnest voice said, "God had builders then, and he must have them now. The Lord led me to the church and his gospel where I met and married your mother. Now we have five children, all married in the church, and my three sons are elders who are working with grandsons in the greatest work of all. . . . I'm so glad we saw the Temple today as it is a symbol of Christ's gospel."

Ministry in Salina

When I sent the names of airmen stationed at Schilling Air Force Base in Salina, Kansas, to F. Carl Mesle [executive secretary to Ministry to Armed Forces Personnel] in order that these men might receive helpful literature, little did I think that the Salina church group, which is without local priesthood leadership, would be blessed thereby. Soon came a letter from Brother Mesle telling of Lt. Jerry Gibson, a priest, of Webb Air Force Base in Big Springs, Texas, and his desire to be of help where he was most needed. The result was that Brother Gibson flew to Salina for a week end.

Because of his fine personality, tactfulness, and devotion, we feel that much good was accomplished through his ministry. As one lady remarked when we met together for prayer, "We felt as if an angel had flown in to help us."

For this service and the ministry of district priesthood, we are most grateful. I'm sure many small groups would also appreciate such help.

And Finally...

WHO SAID THAT?

There seems to be a tradition among the elders that God has said, "If my people do not go ahead and redeem Zion, I'll raise up another people who will." With all of the counsel and the many blessings he has extended to latter-day Israel, it seems probable that our heavenly Father might feel that way, but I have never been able to find any such statement from him.

Isaiah was the first to write about Zion's redemption (1:27). God promised to purge the dross from Israel and she [Jerusalem] should be called the "City of Righteousness, the faithful city." Zion, the New Jerusalem, must wait for a willing and obedient people. Neither numbers, wealth, nor the Lamanites coming to independence, Missouri, will move God to bestow the endowment of the Holy Spirit. The promise is for a sanctified people.

SILENCE IS NOT GOLDEN

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Negro pastor from Montgomery, Alabama, speaking on the struggle for racial integration, has said, "All too many ministers are silent while evil rages. It may well be that the greatest tragedy of this period of social transition is not the glaring noisiness of the so-called bad people, but the appalling silence of the so-called good people."

BADGE OF WISDOM

We learn of fire by being burned, and the scars are our badge of knowledge gained. We mortals have no other way of learning of life than by being broken and bruised and scorched. The wise seek not to avoid the hurts, but to bear them with fortitude, and wear the scars as the brave wear their battle ribbons.

STEWARDSHIP

We really own much more than we ever realize. Ownership does not confine itself merely to what we buy or pay for. Ownership is appreciation. We are not permanent owners of anything, even though we may have much in our possession that may have been inherited or earned over a term of years. In time all is dispensed to other owners. We grow richest when we give away the most. We then become partners in an ownership that others distribute.

Antonius D. Compier

IN A RECENT Stride article Joe Bayless, an ex-GI who has returned from Europe, recalled his acquaintance with Anton Compier:

"I remember when I attended Kansas University Brother Compier spoke to us at a college conference," Joe recalled. "His first words were that he felt like a Dumkopf among all of us brilliant college students. I have seen over here [Europe] how much of a Dumkopf he is. He has been the interpreter, along with Oskar Stüve, at the European conference. Sometimes he switches among three languages at once: German, Dutch, English. He also speaks Norwegian and French and travels throughout Europe speaking whatever language is needed at the time. Some of us 'brilliant scholars' could pick up a few pointers from Anton."

Anton Compier is a General Church appointee who makes his home in his native Holland. Before he became an appointee, Brother Compier was in charge of the insecticide department of the biggest agricultural co-op in the Netherlands. He did the buying and selling for this department which had a turnover of three million dollars each year.

His first call to the priesthood came in 1948 when Seventy Albert A. Scherer was serving in Holland.

Brother Compier says, "I was very skeptical as to the divinity of the call and wanted to have my own testimony. Not only I but also my wife-to-be (we were engaged at the time) made this a matter of prayer.

"One night I awoke and had the answer that I had been longing for. Even today I could not say whether it was a dream or a vision, but it was so outstanding that even now I can still hear the voice speaking to me, saying I should go out and teach stewardship. It went on to explain that there is a stewardship of the gospel entrusted to us, and a further stewardship of things such as money and time.

"The day following this experience I could not help thinking of it all the time while at work, and as soon as it was time to quit, I hurried over to the mission house to tell Brother Scherer that I would accept the call."

In 1949 Priest Compier was ordained an elder. In 1954 he was ordained a high priest, and in 1957 a bishop. The same year he was ordained an elder he was married to Elizabeth Leuntje Johanna Verhaagen. They have three children: Kornelis, seven; Elizabeth Antoinette, four; and Daniel Hendrik, ten months.

"The preaching and teaching of the kingdom, and the kind of life that will bring it to pass upon this earth is my greatest desire," says Bishop Compier. "I have a firm belief that Zion will be realized and intend to dedicate my life toward this purpose."

The Searching Spirit

I have not found that the church has complete answers to questions about biological evolution—particularly about the way man came to be. I have found that the wisest men are the humblest, and that they are still working away at the questions.

In my own thinking I see God working purposefully through the centuries, and I do not set down final answers as to the way everything happened. About the only place I am dogmatic is in reply to persons who have all the "answers." I call on you to develop the appreciation of the creative mind and the searching spirit. Such a mind led me into the church, and I am not going to forget it now.

Called Out Men

EVERY AGE AND ALMOST every ethnic group has had its "holy men" or prophets. Yet because the distinction between these prophets and others is of the spirit, and because it is impossible to recognize the righteous by outward appearances, the world is likely to regard all human beings alike.

Someone observed, "There is little difference between one man and another, but that difference is very important." The physical appearance may, or may not, be marked. The way the mind works and the spirit functions in the man makes the real difference. In determining one's personality the two human aspects cannot be separated. A man's physical characteristics combine with his mental traits to make his personality.

In Jesus' early ministry he taught in the synagogues, and the amazed Galileans asked, "Whence hath this Jesus this wisdom and these mighty works? Is not this the carpenter's son? . . . And they were offended at him. But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honor, save in his own country, and in his own house" (Matthew 13: 55-58). Because of their distrust or failure to recognize this man as the greatest of all prophets, Mark tells us "He could do no mighty work there" (6: 7).

If people made this colossal mistake with the Son of God, and thus failed to get the full benefit of his ministry, how much more likely will men fail to recognize God's servants today and lose the opportunity for divine blessings. Jesus used fishermen, tentmakers, and tax collectors in Palestine. In our age he has called out farmers, merchants, and factory workers for soul-saving work, and men reject them because of outward appearances and educational backgrounds. In their own way they say, "This is the carpenter's son."

MOSES HAD A RELATED problem on hand as shown in Numbers 16. The Levites accused Moses and Aaron of taking too much authority upon themselves. They were rebuked in these words (16: 9): "Seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel, to bring you near to himself to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord, and to stand before the congregation?"

These were called out men whom God had used and wanted to use. They murmured against the Lord and brought contention to Israel by condemning their leaders and seeking the high priesthood also. Moses said, "Ye take too much upon you." It was not their duty to regulate the camp of Israel nor to elevate themselves.

It is relevant to observe here that it was the God of Israel who called these men out from the congregation. Jesus said, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you" (John 15: 16). Christ still holds the initiative in calling men to priesthood responsibility. He does not reject anyone's love or efforts to help in telling others about his grace and goodness. Yet the great commission to "Go . . . teach . . . baptize . . . observe all things" was to the eleven disciples—a specially trained group.

When this church was in its infancy some of its leaders came to the Prophet and wished him to inquire of the Lord concerning the special work they were to do. His brother, Hyrum, was told among other things, "Behold, I command you, that you need not suppose that you are called to preach until you are called" (Doctrine and Covenants 10: 8 a). One of the qualifications which followed this injunction was "That you may know of a surety my doctrine." Men without convictions cannot preach for "love nor money."

IN MY BOYHOOD I used to wonder if some of our men would interpret the gospel differently if they had a college training. Often they would call attention to Paul's statement, "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are chosen; for God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise" (I Corinthians 1: 26, 27). It followed logically that God could use those of little systematic training, who might even be considered "foolish," to do his work. But it seemed then as well as it does now that he could inspire trained minds as well or better. "To be learned is good, if they hearken unto the counsels of God" (II Nephi 6: 61).

The Prophet Joseph Smith, Jr., is erroneously referred to as "an unlearned boy." This applies to the time when he received the heavenly visitors in the woods. But he had a highly trained mind at the time he organized the church and did his greatest work. God still calls out men who are not "wise after the flesh," but he expects them to take every opportunity to prepare themselves to serve even the "wise and the noble."

Ministers must speak the language of our day and of the people to whom they minister among all nations if they are to give them an equal opportunity with us to hear and receive the gospel. Our work is cut out for us. This is our day to magnify our callings. C. B. H.

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Missionary A. M. Pelletier, Jr.:

The Middletown, Ohio, series (February 16 - March 2) concluded with outstanding missionary experiences. Twenty-one people were added to the church in this concluding service of baptism—the largest single service of baptism reported in the congregation for many years. This affected thirteen homes in uniting ten of them and introducing three new ones to the work. Thirteen of the twenty-one people baptized were adults, one was a teen-ager, and seven were youngsters. One interesting thing to note is that all the nonmembers who attended five or more meetings during the series were baptized at its conclusion.

The pastor, Elder Russell Rockwell, and his corps of workers did a remarkable job in preparing some one thousand advertising folders, and distributing them. Also a fine series of newspaper advertisements were prepared and displayed effectively in the local newspaper. This, in addition to the enthusiasm which was engendered from this publicity, resulted in many of our members phoning their friends daily and bringing them to services. There was a great spirit of evangelism.

The following comes from Elder Frank A. Fry, president of the British Isles Mission:

The Saints here have been happy to have Brother and Sister Oakman return to this mission.

Following the successful priesthood institute at Birmingham in November, we decided to hold another at Hope, Derbyshire, near Chesterfield, on February 15-16.

We were fortunate to have Apostle Oakman present for the mission-wide priesthood retreat. As this was a new venture for the mission, we were happy to have sixty-two present for the entire period. We were blessed abundantly with the Spirit under the ministry of Brother Oakman, Elders James Schofield and Ronald Chandler, and many of the local priesthood.

Saturday, February 22, a regional church school institute was held at Nuneaton under the supervision of Elder George Barrington. Twenty-five leaders and teachers attended. They evidenced real interest and also grave concern for this important part of our work.

As I visit the branches of the mission I find renewed interest and a spirit of expectancy among our people. I feel that this is a prophecy of better things to come.

From Fred O. Davies, President of Kansas City Stake:

You will probably be interested to know that we set aside the months of April, May, and part of June, 1958, for a concentrated effort in the church school.

This called for the using of the Church Member's Manual in all classes from the Zion's League up. (We have since learned that even children's groups are now taking it.) This has resulted in the sale of about 750 books; it will reach 1,000 before the end of April, plus all that had been bought by individuals previously.

We have had some fine testimonies already as to its value; one nonmember family bought five copies, one for each person in the family. A church member bought one for each of her three boys.

We had good response from presiding elders and church school directors regarding it, and even the old, well-established classes have taken up the course.

Our recent "Crusade with Christ" series no doubt helped to inspire people to take up this "Teach Our Members" program.

District President Fred C. Banta of the San Francisco Bay District reports the organization of a mission at Pittsburg, California, on February 2. This brings to a total of seven the number of missions organized in the district. In addition to these missions there are eight branches and a small group meeting regularly.

Brother Banta adds: "The San Francisco Bay District has shown a steady growth, and it is a real pleasure to have as one of my last official acts in the district that of organizing a mission."

Brother Banta is now assigned to the Scandinavian Mission.

The following information comes to us from Brother William Coates in Birmingham, England.

We are starting a Scout troop here in Birmingham—the first ever sponsored by the church in England.

Our leader and assistant have been to a near-by group for training, and they will start the Wolf Cub Pack meetings right away. We hope to start the Scouts in about three weeks.

The troop will be registered as the First Billesley (area in which the church is situated) R.L.D.S.

We will have a mission youth leaders' meeting at Manchester soon, and I will teach a class on Scout work.

The Ten Virgins

and the Parable of the Talents

SEVERAL YEARS AGO I had a discussion with a traveling companion concerning religion. In the course of the conversation I told him that most of our ministers serve without receiving a salary. He expressed the feeling that this was good. He spoke of some clergymen as being "bread and butter" ministers. He said, "They make their living by preaching, so they are usually pretty careful about what they say. They are not always as concerned about teaching the truth as they might be, especially if they know that the truth might be taken as criticism of the actions of some of their congregation."

It is true that our ministers are not restricted in what they say by the need to support their families. However, I think they are hesitant at times to speak out sharply because they like to have the good opinion of their congregations. More often, however, I think it is because men of the priesthood sincerely desire to be kind and loving and therefore do not want to hurt the feelings of the people. If such is the case, they labor under a misconception. It is neither kindness nor an expression of love to allow people to gloss over their mistakes and excuse themselves. It is neither kindness nor an expression of love to withhold truth from them because it might make them appear sinful. The knowledge of truth is freedom. The opportunity to recognize sin and go on from there to a better life is a most sacred privilege.

Truth Is the Judge

In Doctrine and Covenants 63:15, we find these words, "for this is a day of warning, and not a day of many words. For I, the Lord, am not to be mocked in the last days." In Section 6:4 we read: "Say nothing but repentance unto this generation: keep my commandments, and assist to bring forth my work according to my commandments."

The parables of Jesus contain the message about the kingdom of God. I know that the truth which I present condemns some of my actions. However, the fact that I am condemned by this truth does not negate its truthfulness nor lessen the need for me to teach it. Perhaps this truth will condemn some of your actions also. If so, you should remember that it is the truth which judges you. I have a right and a responsibility to teach you the truth, but I have no right to judge you.

Preparation Is Important

The parables found in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew deal with the ten virgins and the three servants to whom talents were given. Various aspects of the kingdom of God are likened to them. Perhaps the most important point stressed in these parables is preparation. At least that is the point I wish to emphasize.

First, let us consider whom Jesus had in mind when he told these parables. "And then, at that day, before the Son of Man comes, the kingdom of heaven shall be likened unto ten virgins, who took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom."

We notice that Jesus was speaking. He was speaking during the time that he was on earth, and he was speaking about the time just prior to when he would come again. We do not know when Jesus will come again. We are told that no man nor even the angels in heaven know when that time will be.¹ However, we have been told that the kingdom would have been established by now if we had so desired.² We have also been told many times that we are living in the latter days. We might not be too far amiss to say that Jesus was referring to our time when he said, "at that day, before the Son of Man comes."

For Believers Only

To whom was Jesus referring specifically when he gave his parable of the ten virgins and the three servants? Was he speaking of all people who would be on the earth at that time—in other words, on the earth now? Or was he speaking only of a part of all the people? I believe that he was speaking only of a certain group. He was speaking of his servants, people who knew him and looked forward to his coming.

We might say that Christ was speaking of all Christian people, then, for certainly all Christians have at least a nominal belief in Jesus. However, if we look more closely at the characteristics of these ten virgins and three servants we see that they had in common something which not all Christian people have. They were looking forward to the coming of Jesus Christ. The ten virgins were awaiting the bridegroom, who is Jesus.³ The three servants knew that their master would return and require an accounting of their stewardships. Notice that the master returned to the servants, not that the servants went to the master.

The Kingdom

Our church is almost unique in its belief in the literal coming of the kingdom of God on earth. Although many people express a belief in Jesus, very few look forward to his coming to reign among them. Many people believe that his second coming was fulfilled when he returned after his resurrection. Others say that the kingdom of God is in heaven and will remain there. Still others say that the kingdom of God involves a purely personal relationship between individuals and God, and that this relationship alone is the kingdom.

However, members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints hold as one of their most fundamental beliefs that God desires mortal men to become righteous enough so that he, God, can come and reign in their midst. Further, we believe that the kingdom of God is not complete until this happens. We look forward to the time when he will come, and we invite others to join with us in making preparation for him.

We are not the only people who look forward to Jesus' second coming, but we are among the few who do. The point I want to emphasize is that when Jesus spoke of those of his servants who were looking forward to his coming, and who lived in the latter days, he was most certainly including us—the members of his church. It therefore behooves us to study carefully what he had to say with respect to us.

Very briefly, Jesus said that some of these people who were his servants and who were watching for his coming would be shut from his presence, or would be cast into outer darkness. The reason for their being cast out was that they had failed to make adequate preparation for the coming of the Master. The five foolish virgins had not filled their lamps, and the servant had neglected his stewardship also.

Good—But Not Diligent

Notice that these people were good people, judged by our standards. The five foolish virgins were virgins nonetheless. They were not immoral, not prostitutes, not drunken street "scum." They were virgins who not only associated with but companied with the virgins who were wise and noble. Likewise, the servant who received the one talent was a servant who was loyal to his master. He had his master's interests at heart—at least that is what he said. However, the master judged him and told him that he had failed to make a proper use of what had been given him. Notice the words of his condemnation: "slothful" and "having known this . . ." ⁴

The five foolish virgins failed to make proper preparation because the wait for the bridegroom had been long and they felt they still had plenty of time. The servant failed simply because he was lazy and did not want to be bothered with his lord's work. Think how much easier it was just to bury the money than having to concern himself about finding a profitable investment and then having to watch over it.

A Message for Today

I think that the warning to us is quite clear, and I think it applies to each of us. Judged by the standards of our contemporaries we are a relatively righteous people, yet many of us have said in our hearts, "The responsibilities which his church asks me to accept, the contributions which I should give, and the luxuries which he would ask me to deny myself represent a burden that is too great. I do not want to be bothered with it all—not at the present anyway. Perhaps next year or at some other convenient time I will do these things which I realize are required of the truly righteous."

I am sure most of us would feel a certain bond of understanding with a person who would express such feelings, and we might therefore be somewhat hesitant to condemn such an attitude. But let me remind you again of what Jesus himself said about these people. First, he said that they had no understanding of his nature and purpose. ⁵ Then he said, "Cast [them] . . . into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." ⁶

This may appear to be rather severe punishment to be meted out to one who might have good intentions and really might be a "pretty good" person when compared to other men. Nevertheless, those are Jesus' words.

Have we as individuals and as a church become too complacent regarding our responsibilities? Have we been guilty of convincing ourselves that Zion will be established, but not in our time? Have we looked at the pleasures of immediate worldly enjoyment and the joys of righteousness, and decided that the first are more desirable? Have we lost sight of the fact that now—the living present—is the momentous time? Have we become so sophisticated that we tend to give more weight to individual interpretations (and convenience) than to inspired leadership? If these things are true, then we are no less wicked than the five foolish virgins or the slothful servant. Furthermore, our condemnation will be just as sure and just as severe.

Who Will Build Zion?

WE AS A CHURCH fully believe that Zion will be built. It must be, because the need for it is so great. Man's destiny is not complete without this final great work. Christ came to man as the Savior because the need was great—salvation demanded it. But he cannot dwell with man in his risen glory as man is now temporally organized. To complete the cycle Christ and man must dwell together in harmony, and only a Zion society will make this possible. The waiting seems long—doubtless the long wait for the coming of the Messiah was just as irksome, and men doubted and turned away scoffing then as now. If we would dwell with Christ we must provide a city to which he can come, not as a stranger to be crucified again but as Lord and Master, the Shepherd of his flock, recognized, obeyed, and loved.

When this will be accomplished no man can say. It waits upon a gathering together of a sufficiently large group of like-minded, single-minded people—people who not only will to live together but determine to live together with Christ.

Who will build Zion? At the moment it can be answered only negatively. Zion will not be built by those who doubt that it can ever be. Zion is man's ultimate destiny upon this earth; its inevitability is dictated by man's great need for such a mode of existence. It is not enough to desire Zion; one must believe in its inevitability in order to give one's self wholeheartedly to its accomplishment. Zion will not be built by the impure in heart—those whose hearts are unpurged of doubts and dissensions, whose beliefs have not crystallized in fruitful deeds.

Read Your Periodicals

EVERY YEAR NEARLY two million copies of church periodicals come off the presses at Herald House.

Are you taking full advantage of this good reading—this ministry—that is offered to you?

Obviously a lot of church members are, because for every magazine printed there has to be a subscriber. However, many members are not aware of the wide range of good reading that is available to them. Worse, some know about these magazines but do not subscribe to them—even though none of the yearly subscriptions cost more than a tank of gasoline or a few haircuts.

Let's run down the list. Check off the ones that should be in your home.

The Saints' Herald

If you are reading this article, you are probably a subscriber to the Saints' Herald. That's good. Every church home should have the official weekly magazine of the church. At present 16,635 copies of the Herald go to members all over the world each week. It costs $4 yearly.

The Herald had its beginning as the True Latter Day Saints' Herald in 1860 when the reorganization of the church was beginning to take form. It has reported the Reorganized Church for over ninety-eight years. If you read the Herald regularly, you know it reflects the true gospel.

Stride Magazine

Stride, the official youth magazine of the church, is the newest Herald House publication. It is issued monthly and is aimed at Zion's Leaguers, older youth, college students, and all other church young people. However, many older people also enjoy reading the magazine. It should be in every home that has a young person in his teens or twenties. Stride is now going to 3,274 subscribers. It costs $2.50 for one year.

Daily Bread

Daily Bread is a family devotional magazine. It is another magazine intended for every family in the church. It contains a suggested devotional service for the family for each day of the month. Daily Bread is published bimonthly and costs $1.50 a year. About 6,000 families are now subscribing.

Guidelines to Leadership

Guidelines to Leadership is published monthly except in July and August. It costs $2 a year for the ten issues. Guidelines is a magazine for leaders in church school, youth work, priesthood education, and all other phases of branch and district church work. It is currently going to 2,868 leaders.

Stepping Stones

Stepping Stones is a weekly church school paper for junior and junior high ages. It costs $2 a year and is also sold in quantity prices to branches that buy the paper in bundles. Nearly 10,000 children now read Stepping Stones every week.

Zion's Hope

Zion's Hope is another weekly church school paper. It is for kindergarten and primary ages. Beginning in October church school teachers will find material in the Hope that will help them use the new church school curriculum for this age group. It costs $1.75 a year and also has quantity prices. There are 8,409 children receiving Hope.

Newsletter

The Newsletter is published by Herald House for the Committee on Ministry to Armed Forces Personnel. The four-page paper is for military personnel and their families. The paper is free to any such personnel or their ministers. About 1,000 persons are now on the mailing list. Requests for the bimonthly paper should be addressed to Committee on Ministry to Armed Forces Personnel, the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Reminder

The Reminder is for those who do not have branch privileges. Its tenth anniversary year issue has just been published and will go to more than 11,000 readers. It is a quarterly paper and is also free to those who wish to receive it. Requests for the magazine should be made either to district presidents, nonresident pastors, or directly to the Council of Twelve office, the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Prices Differ

The prices quoted are for subscriptions mailed to points within the United States and its territories. Subscribers living in Canada will have to pay a few cents more, and those living in other countries will pay a little more due to additional mailing costs.

The cost is small compared to the joy these periodicals can bring to your home and to the members of your family. They bring a type of ministry that every family should receive.

How did you do? Are you receiving the periodicals that should be in your home?

The best of the Restoration thinking appears regularly in the church's periodicals. The magazines all aim to lead, inspire, comfort, inform the reader.

A Zion home is many things. One of its distinctions, certainly, is the presence of the church periodicals, regularly received and regularly read.

Upland California Branch

Organization and

Consecration

Let your consecrations be without covetousness; and be content with giving such things as ye have; for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.

This was the call to worship at the consecration service of the Upland Branch on December 15, 1957. It was followed by a review of "The Establishment of the Upland Mission," by Priest Lyle Graham; its "Present Stage of Growth and Plans for Future Development," by Elder Nelson M. Van Fleet; and "The Special Service at the Branch Organization," by Southern California District President J. P. Davis. Presentation of the charge was given by Apostle E. J. Gleazer, followed by the acceptance of the charge by the pastor, Elder George O. Scott.

Following the consecration service, Apostle Gleazer delivered the morning sermon.

A potluck dinner was served in the social hall of the church at noon.

History

Early in 1955 Saints in the Upland area were moved to organize a mission for the purpose of providing Christ's doctrine in the midst of a rapidly growing city and its neighboring communities, as well as making services more readily available to those members residing there.

On March 6, 1955, a mission was duly organized, and the Saints held meetings in the only available place, an Upland hall. Elder Clyde Graham was elected the first pastor, which office he held for two years.

A building committee was appointed at the first business meeting, and pledges were accepted to establish a building fund. A total of nine thousand dollars was pledged.

Various sites were studied, and on September 11, 1956, a lot was purchased. On October 14, 1956, an architect was retained to draft plans for the proposed building.

Rent of the hall was immediately discontinued and services were held in the homes of members. Many beautiful spiritual experiences occurred at these meetings.

In April, 1957, the chapel and social hall were completed, and services were held in the new edifice.

The exterior of the building is frame-stucco construction consisting of a chapel 28 by 60 feet, and a social hall, 30 by 60 feet.

The interior of the chapel has a seating capacity of approximately 150. Large windows in the rear make possible a "cry room" off the foyer for those with small children. This room is equipped with a public address system installed by the membership's electronics "fans." The font under the floor of the rostrum, has been used a number of times for home congregational baptisms as well as those of other branches.

The social hall provides ample space for dinners and social activities; it has a large kitchen at one end. Two folding doors suspended from tracks in the ceiling provide three classrooms when closed.

Donations by members and friends include a beautiful organ for the chapel, a piano for the social hall, a deepfreeze and refrigerator for the kitchen.

Building plans for the future include construction of a junior chapel when funds permit.

Branch Organization

At a special service on September 8, 1957, the members met to organize a branch, at which time officers and department leaders were elected for the ensuing year. Southern California District President J. P. Davis presided, assisted by Elder George O. Scott. It was resolved that the congregation be known as the Upland, California, Branch.

The following officers were elected: pastor, Elder George O. Scott; counselor, Elder Nelson M. Van Fleet; secretary-recorder, Eloise Van Fleet; treasurer, Jack Ball; director of religious education, Helen Ferguson; women's leader and book steward, Lola Scott; young people's supervisor and bishop's solicitor, Lyle Graham; director of music, Lewis Ferguson; director of drama, Grace Ferguson; publicity agent, Frank N. Van Fleet; auditors, Nelson M. Van Fleet, Frank N. Van Fleet; custodian, Charles Scaiola; historian, Marion Van Fleet.

The present membership of forty-four is blessed with a priesthood comprised of two elders, one priest, two teachers, and one deacon. A women's department of thirteen active members meets twice each month for devotional programs and the planning of fund-raising projects. One fund-raising dinner is held each month. Several rummage sales have been held recently. The Zioners, fifteen in number, are led by Lyle Graham, assistant Southern California District youth leader. They meet two hours each week, Friday or Saturday evenings, for discussions and recreation and two hours on Sunday for class study. This group has six church members and nine nonmembers. It is planned that the Zion's League Annuals will be used for the 1958 activity guide.

WORKING FOR FAITH

ONE OF THE QUESTIONS a child eventually asks — "Who made God?" — has troubled many conscientious parents. The puzzled wonder concerning the existence of everlasting personality is shared at times by adults. It is difficult for us to conceive of a Being who never dies, largely perhaps because we have never had direct contact with such a person. All we have known either die or expect to die.

Yet we have no difficulty in thinking that time is infinite. Let us forget for a moment the vague things most of us have heard about Einstein's theories and higher mathematics. We know that time is measured differently on different planets, by varied lengths of days, months, and seasons. Time as measured unto man will sometime end, the Scriptures tell us, but eternity stretches on beyond. We cannot imagine a today without a yesterday or a tomorrow.

"When will it be tomorrow?" a child asks, and we are amused when he cannot understand our explanation, when tomorrow always eludes him. But do we understand? Or is the mind interpreting time by our own past experiences and conceptions?

The same thing is true of space. The horizon is always beyond, at least for most of us.

"It curves in on itself," a learned friend said of space. But I am like a child, always questioning. "What lies beyond the curve?" This he cannot answer. To conceive of the immensity of space staggers any mind. Try to imagine space as ending! Can we imagine complete nothingness? Even our so-called vacuums occupy space.

What happens in our minds, the things we can perceive, is important to us. It determines our true beliefs and colors all of our experiences.

It is not difficult to believe that time and space are infinite. If so, it follows that the great organizer of all things in time and space can also be infinite. Because our first parents sinned, we are separated from God; to return to his presence requires serious effort. But he has provided a way. The first steps consist of something which happens in our minds; namely, belief and faith.

Must We Know?

For a pretty war bride, a native of a remote Pacific island, life had been simple and primitive. Flying with her young husband to his home state, and being whisked in a car to a modern farm home beside that of his parents, were breath-taking experiences. Left alone that first evening for an hour or two while the young man helped his father, she could not bring herself to touch the water tap although she was thirsty, nor to press the button on the wall to get light. To her mind it was either foolishness or black magic. When her husband returned she was still sitting, thirsty and lonely, in the dark. A reporter treated the incident lightly and with humor. But how very like her we sometimes are!

Since she had a normal mind, the girl — once fear was dispelled — most likely accepted modern conveniences with joy. Certainly she would not wait until she understood electricity fully and completely before she turned on the light. If so, she is still sitting in darkness. For, despite the tremendous accumulation of knowledge in this field, there are unexplored areas and possibilities.

Our creed is "All Truth." That doesn't mean we must know everything before we can function on the Christian plane. It means that we believe the gospel embraces all truth, and that we must be alert and receptive to it. To know all truth we should have to assemble an almost unbelievable array of facts on every subject, and all these would of necessity have to be co-ordinated so that the total meaning should not escape us. Only God is that kind of an "observer." This he told Moses in no uncertain terms.¹ Moses contented himself with partial knowledge and walked in faith; the work he did and the things he said extend his influence to our times.

The Advertisers Know

Advertising has become a science. The value of what a man thinks about a certain product has long been known. Methods of manipulating the thoughts of people become more and more effective. Now advertisers can get results without the prospect's knowing what hit him. By slogans flashed so swiftly on a movie screen that they were invisible, thoughts were projected into the subconscious minds of patrons. Relaxed and receptive, they were so greatly influenced that sales of popcorn rose by 58 per cent, colas by 18 per cent. The danger in this type of thought control is portentous. It would seem that, more than ever before, if we wish to preserve our political, economic, and religious freedom, we must learn to manipulate our own thinking.

God Wants Us to Think for Ourselves

It is Satan's way to try to coerce, to force decisions on us. Often quoted, but one of the best short sermons our literature yields on faith, are the words of Alma.² First desire, he said, and cultivate that desire until it grows.

Some have objected to this method. They feel if there is such a thing as faith in God, it should come with no effort on their part, a strange delusion, since no other good thing usually comes that way.

"To cultivate desire to believe would be working psychology on myself," a friend said.

Indeed, the obtaining of faith in God is a psychological process. So is sinking into the despair of doubt. So is faith in our electrician, our taxi driver, our government, or even in the quality of food we eat for breakfast. We cannot escape psychology. We were born with mental potential. A brain is a psychological apparatus that works almost as constantly as the heart beats.

On the highest levels of intelligence, we control our own minds and govern our own thoughts, even if the price be martyrdom.

Even the insane think. Their imagery is distorted, they have lost control, but the brain still drones away, sometimes with compulsive repetitions.

On the highest levels of intelligence, we control our own minds and govern our own thoughts, even if the price be martyrdom. Most of us drift indecisively, and that is where advertising has a field day. If we do not manage our own thinking, we can be sure that someone else or something else will. This is true on the spiritual plane also. The best and sanest course is to discover what is desirable, desire it, believe in it, and spend our lives for it. Belief in God is desirable. Faith of the right kind brings power to cope with life's problems and a blossoming of personality. Faith becomes precious also in time of crisis.

"I'd give anything to believe in God and in a future life," an agnostic said after losing a loved one. Her believing friends may have failed her at that time.

"I'll give up all my sins to know him," said the old Lamanite king to Ammon, after he had spared the king's life. (The old man did so, and straightway discovered much about God!)

Where Shall We Find Security?

When his followers found that Jesus had no intention of becoming an earthly king, nor feeding them bread and fish without effort on their part, many turned away and followed him no more. Sadly he turned to the Twelve: "Will ye also go away?"

"Lord, to whom shall we go?" Peter replied. "Thou hast the words of eternal life."

Economic stability is what most people seek first. Although this is one of life's good things, they do not find in it complete satisfaction. The secure life is more than electric appliances, automobiles, or modern homes. Where may it be found? Some place unquestioning dependence upon scientists and specialists. The true scientist is a humble man, maintaining an open mind. He realizes how little he knows, though his fund of information may seem vast to others. Our great specialists readily admit their limited knowledge even in their own fields.

In private rooms in our best hospitals, with expensive and skilled ministrations, people still die. No matter how expensive and powerful the car, accidents can occur, often caused by another driver who found his questioning, his unsolved problems, too much for him and sought momentary relief in strong drink.

The scientist and specialist are needed, but they do not have ultimate answers for our seeking hearts.

What about Philosophy?

Some search the sayings of great philosophers for security. These works are worth reading and contain much truth. But in many cases they only state problems in a new way and try to solve them without Deity. They try to find finite answers to infinite questions. This seems at best a bit foolish, like a housewife cooking apples because she wants to serve mashed potatoes for dinner. If you want mashed potatoes, you must cook potatoes. An infinite question must be answered in infinite terms. Otherwise it is inadequate, false, or ephemeral.

Can You Believe Your Eyes?

"I believe what I see," a man once said. But did he? This man was a farmer. Beside him was his dog. Not far away a small rabbit crouched, hidden, alert. The farmer was driving some cattle to a fine field. He pictured the field, his eyes telling him that with care it would yield a good return for a long time. He saw it in terms of cream checks, provisions for his family, a new car. To the dog the field meant frustration, because wild things could readily find a hiding place. To the rabbit it meant security. To the lark soaring overhead and to his mate and their nestlings, the meadow was home. As for the cows, they could scarcely wait until the man opened the gate for them. They saw what they believed would be a fine salad for dinner.

Every one of these beings had two good eyes. What they "saw" depended upon the brain with which each had been endowed and its interpretative abilities.

Some time ago I was chosen for jury duty and a pamphlet describing the conducting of trials and what would be expected of the jury was sent me. Among other things we were to consider about witnesses, if we had opportunity, were their background, who they were, what they did for a living, the excitement under which each might have labored at the time of the incident in question, their manner of relating the experience.

Two people might look at an accident and see different things. One might have gone through a similar experience himself. His observations would be prejudicial, if he were not more than human, favoring the man whose situation paralleled his own. A doctor seeing the same accident might note first the position of the bodies of the victims, the unnaturally bent arm or leg at once suggesting fracture. The artist would "see" the disarray of clothing, the red blood, the green grass, and the background beyond the scene. The mechanic would see more clearly than others what had happened to the car. The police and the relatives of victims would also "see" different things.

Point of View

Let us consider something simple (?) like grass. The botanist would see whether it belonged to the family of true grasses, sedges, or rushes—he would notice the jointed stems and sheathing leaves. The farmer might see it in terms of pastureage. To the nutritionist it would suggest vitamins; to the chemist, chlorophyll. And to a poet like Whitman, it would be "the beautiful, uncut hair of graves."

Two art students can stand only a few feet apart, painting the same scene, yet each will have a different picture. They not only see the view from a different angle, but each sees things the other misses.

Some speak of situations such as this when they mention the "viewpoint of the observer." Only the infinite observer, God, can see all things and understand their implications.

A crime was committed in one of our large cities. A man was held as suspect. Evidence was needed beyond what the police had. Finally a large reward was offered anyone who could identify the criminal. Pictures and descriptions of the suspect and his alleged victims appeared in many editions of the papers. A very respectable man and his wife, religious people, came and positively identified the suspect as one they had seen, with the victims, in their cafe.

One trouble seems to be that we desire the fruits of belief but do not wish to accept the responsibilities which faith connotes.

They described everything accurately, and gave the date and hour when they were seen. But the suspect was freed. The autopsy proved the victims died many days before the couple had "seen" them. How did this happen? Did they need money so badly that their subconscious mind had tricked them? Desire is a powerful thing. Alma knew that when he said, "First desire to believe."

"I Believe What I Hear"

You had better not, at least until it is properly authenticated. Mark Twain heard of his own death and came forth with some very witty remarks concerning the gossip. But gossip is not what we have in mind here. Can we believe what our sense of hearing actually tells us? Let us investigate.

The story of the mother (and the experience is almost universal with all mothers) who slept undisturbed through the noises of a great city but awakened immediately when her child whimpered in the next room is a classic example of selective hearing. The subconscious mind, alert even in sleep, sorts out the important from the unimportant. The mother desires to care for her baby. Desire is a powerful thing.

A story about hearing is told in the twelfth chapter of John. Jesus was telling his friends that the hour had come for him to be glorified, and what he said warned strongly of his approaching death. A voice came from heaven. Some said an angel spoke. Others said it thundered. Even the ones who heard what the voice said didn't understand the implications of it. They did not desire to hear. They did not want to believe what Jesus was saying. They passionately desired that he should become their earthly king. Thunder was a comforting interpretation of what they "heard" at that time.

Years ago a young woman who loved western ballads and popular tunes married a man who was fond of classical music. He owned a fine phonograph and many records. Because she loved him, she bought a record she knew he would like. As she listened one morning, after being exposed daily to these renditions of great artists, she realized that what once had been a mere jumble of sounds had become beautiful and meaningful to her. Yet her sense of hearing had been there all the time.

What About the Other Senses?

The same thing applies to the other senses, to a greater or less degree. Our senses are all conditioned and trained by our desires, our environment, our experience. Watch a baby's face when a new food is given him! Some people learn to like chocolate covered grasshoppers and fried silk worms.

As for the sense of touch—

Thomas, one of the twelve, had seen Jesus die on the cross, and he said he would not believe that Jesus lived again unless he not only saw him but placed his hands on the wounds. So he was given opportunity to "know" about the resurrection with three of his five senses: sight, hearing, and touch. Jesus said to him: "Stretch forth thy hand . . . and be not faithless, but believing."

Yes, he still needed to exercise belief. He needed to develop the quality of life having the power of faith in it. The others of the twelve had seemingly developed this quality to a larger extent. Barring legend, we hear very little else about Thomas except the story of his doubt. But the others started a fire of idealism which permeated every phase of life and laid the foundation for our great western civilizations, paving the way for the Restoration movement. Belief is a powerful thing.

We have seen that we cannot depend upon our senses to give us accurate information, since everything must finally be accepted, rejected, or interpreted by the mind. The conditioning of our minds, then, is of major importance. It goes back to the question: What do we really desire with all our hearts? Shall we drift with the current, or shall we read Scripture, ponder it, attend church, associate as much as possible with other believers, desire to believe? We shall find Him if we seek with all our hearts.

Tremble not at the responsibilities that faith implies, for faith carries with it the power to accomplish what it requires.

Road Blocks in the Way

One trouble seems to be that we desire the fruits of belief but do not wish to accept the responsibilities which faith connotes. We see uneasily that if we have faith we shall be willing to follow Jesus all the way to Calvary, without hesitation or denial, that we shall take up the cross. It means we shall be good stewards, so willing and eager to give that we shall work to develop latent talents, pay tithes and offerings with joy, recognizing God's ownership of all things. It might reach down into all the "simple" things of life like cultivation of cheerfulness, retiring and rising early, refraining from tobacco, alcohol, and even food or beverage which debilitates or defiles the body, the temple to which we invite God's spirit. Every aspect of life is involved. We must be willing to walk "in newness of life."

The way of the cross, God's way, seems deceptively hard, the way of evil deceptively easy. The wrong way of life can be likened to the cigarette advertisements. Presented in beautiful surroundings by handsome, happy, and sophisticated people, every brand seems milder, less harmful, and tastier than every other brand. "First the silken cord, then the hempen rope."

The advertisements do not show the hempen rope—the hospital beds with cancer victims, families too early bereft of a parent, or at best, a personality enslaved by an unlovely, expensive habit which may rob him and his of many of life's finer blessings.

God, on the other hand, does not deceive us. He shows us the whole picture. He tells us: "Yes, you must take up the cross and the burden. But in comparison with the evil way, these burdens are light to bear. And there is the water of life to satisfy you on the way, to quench thirst, to give you security and happiness of which you had hardly dared to dream."

Mirage or Reality?

"But," some say, "if I try to manipulate my mind, use the psychological process of desire to obtain belief, how can I know it will not lead to delusion? There are mirages, you know."

The wanderer in the desert knows about mirages. But if he is about to die of thirst, he presses on toward the only hope he has. Where else can he go? If the vision of his desire does not disappear, if at the end of his travail he finds water which satisfies his thirst, if he finds there respite from his toil in the sun, he knows his vision was real. He will not regret the steps he took to arrive.

If one persists in his desire for faith, works at it consistently, and is almost immediately rewarded by a foretaste of the joys of belief, will he not be encouraged to press on? And if, long before he has arrived at the end of his destination (knowledge) he receives the gifts of the Spirit, the fruits of belief, and some of the power that faith brings, "Oh, then, is this not real?"

The water of life is just as real as its physical counterpart.

Turn on the Water— Turn on the Light

If we refuse to seek the fruits of belief we are as foolish as the island bride who sat with her thirst in the darkness because she was afraid to press a button or turn a faucet. Tremble not at the responsibilities that faith implies, for faith carries with it the power to accomplish what it requires. Jesus, the best authority the world has known on the subject of burdens and crosses, says: "Be not afraid—only believe."

This modern, well-equipped church home is located in an area where missionary prospects are excellent

A New Church for Kingsgrove (Sydney) Australia

THE OFFICIAL OPENING of this fine church building on February 1, 1958, made a further excellent addition to church buildings in the Australasian Mission.

The building is of contemporary design, and the interior finishing and furnishing are of modern style. The sanctuary seats 116 for normal occasions and includes new, modern style pews and chancel furniture, a small but quite adequate pipe organ, lime-colored velvet drapes on a faced brick chancel wall, and rich blue carpet covering the entire chancel area and aisles.

The building has a small recreational hall which will later be extended to full hall size with classrooms at ground level. The kitchen has been completed and equipped. Total cost of this portion of the structure was in the vicinity of £8,500, £4,000 of which was provided from the General Church Revolving Building Fund.

This church is situated in an excellent, middle-class residential area, where there appears to be good missionary prospects. It is prominently located on a main bus route and will no doubt be of great value in the total work of the church in Australia.

Representatives of the General Church attending the opening were Apostle R. E. Davey, Bishop D. A. Alberts and District President A. R. Gunning. Also present were Elder K. Cramp, pastor of the branch during the years of planning and building the new church and the local member of state parliament.

Land was purchased for this building in 1954 by the congregation formerly known as the Campsie Branch, and in 1956 the foundation stone was set by Presiding Bishop G. L. DeLapp during his visit to this mission.

Branch members and all who have assisted, including the architect and the builder, are to be congratulated on their fine achievement.

A Sure Investment

A RECENT NEWS item disclosed that in 1908 the Church of the Nazarene "registered a per capita giving record of $13.52 per member." In 1956 the figure for that same denomination showed an increase of more than $150.00 per member.

Let every member of Christ's church contrast this amount with what he gives to the work of the Lord. In many cases there is a wide discrepancy.

Should we permit people of other faiths to outshine us in the financial support of their churches while we profess to have Christ's truth and do not support it as well? Surely we must make greater sacrifices for the Lord and give more that his kingdom will soon become a reality and the gospel be preached universally.

Paying tithes and increasing our donations to the church can be a type of insurance for the spiritual development and an investment in Zion's establishment. Surely no insurance or investment will ever pay the rich dividends that will be received by those who support Christ's kingdom. What's more, no investment is so certain as that which we put into the Lord's work, because he has assured us of its success. In the light of this we have no reason to hold back anything—time, talent, knowledge, or money. Certainly the amount of our giving is a barometer which can be used to indicate the extent of our faith in this work, for if we truly have faith in its ultimate success we will not hesitate even for a moment to give it all we can. But if we have little or no faith we will be timid and hold back those things over which we are stewards—things which God expects us to use for his people and his kingdom. We will fear lest the great project will not succeed and we lose our investment.

Certainly such people of little faith will not accomplish anything. They are weak and undependable. They are the type who say, "You try. Let me see how you make out. Then if I'm satisfied with the results I'll try." But can God use such people? What he needs is people of faith and determination, people who will start now to incorporate the gospel in their lives—for such will be the builders of Zion.

and how to pay for it

SO YOU WANT to go to college next fall?

You had better be making out applications and planning your finances—now!

The Committee on Ministry to College People has recently compiled some hints for church youth looking forward to college this fall. Its first advice is this: "Those anticipating enrolling in any institution of higher learning in September, 1958, should send out inquiries and make applications at the earliest possible date."

This advice is especially directed to church youth wishing to enroll in Grace-land College or the "San" School of Nursing.

The committee advises students who need financial aid to make inquiry directly to the college concerned regarding funds available for scholarships and the conditions necessary to qualify.

Inquiries may also be sent to the following:

The State Department of Education in the state of the school concerned.

The Committee on Ministry to College People, Auditorium, Independence, Missouri. Available on request is a compilation of aids provided by state colleges and universities in the states where ten or more R.L.D.S. students are enrolled.

He Will Save You

Recognize Christ as your greatest friend. Stay close to him, so that he will be able to save you from temptation.

At most camps each swimmer is required to stay close to another. If something should happen, someone will be able to render assistance.

The same principle is applied by some hunters. When they go through unfamiliar woods, they go together. Then they can be of mutual help if anything goes wrong.

While traveling life's road, we sometimes meet temptation. That's why it's always best to have Christ near so that he can assist us. He is the only one who can safely guide us through this world and guarantee our acceptance in the Holy City. We can make the Lord our companion by doing his will.

The Master Calleth

I Hear His Voice

WHEN WE HEAR the words "calleth" and "hear" we immediately think of some form of communication between people. Down through the ages from beginning of time man has sought ways of communicating with others. We have evidence of picture writing on cave walls; we know of the Indian smoke signals and the jungle savage's tom-tom, indicating man's desire to express himself to others. Today we have the telephone, telegram, cablegram, wire photos, television, radio, and air mail, yet we still seek to improve and speed up our methods of exchanging messages.

Few of us can realize what life would be like if suddenly we no longer had the telephone or our mail system was like that in the days of the pony express. Some people I know feel lost when their television sets get out of order. We have become so accustomed to these wonderful services that seldom do we give a thought to the day when we were without them. Nor can we realize the time when these things were only a dream. Someone had the vision to see into the future and recognize man's need for such a thing, then devote his time and ability to bring it about. It has not been an easy way that has given us our luxuries of life today.

Perhaps the most wonderful of all our communications is the spoken word. I cannot imagine a world without the spoken word. If you have ever spent time with a deaf friend you will probably appreciate even more the human voice and man's ability to speak. It is marvelous that we can make a series of sounds and others understand us.

Communication is vital in our life. The business of the world depends upon it—our health, our welfare, our safety, our education, our pleasures, and even our life itself may depend upon our methods and means of communication. We have been instructed how to use our radios and tune to the stations that cannot be traced, in case of an enemy attack on our country. Millions of dollars have been spent in years of research, millions more in construction of complicated and intricate machinery, and still millions more in materials and equipment, to say nothing of the man-hours and the brainwork involved. Yes, man has truly done many wonderful things.

THERE IS STILL another kind of communication I have not yet mentioned. It is the most vital of all. There is no expensive equipment involved; there is no intensive training needed to use it. There is no breakdown of equipment nor a chance of power failure. You and I have the privilege to use it, and we have the right to expect wonderful results. This is a communication system that we ourselves initiate and have much control over. This is our communion with God. The only equipment we need is a sincere desire, faith, and a right attitude. We have the privilege to call upon God, and we have the right to expect his answer. It is only natural for us to have a desire to keep in touch with our friends and those who are dear to us. We enjoy receiving letters and phone calls or in making visits with those in whom we are interested. So we should be just as eager and as anxious to keep in tune with our Master so that we may always be able to receive the message he would give to us.

AS MEMBERS of the restored church we are distinctive in our belief that God speaks today as he did in days of old. We believe that he reveals himself and his will to us according to our need and our readiness to hear him. We believe that our priesthood is called, and that the calling is divine. Many ordained ministers of this church would tell you of their experiences at the time they were called to enter into the service of the Master. They had the assurance of the divinity of their calling.

Our Doctrine and Covenants is a written record of messages that God has given to us. Some have been to specific individuals, some to the church, and some to all men. Section 1 of Doctrine and Covenants starts with the word "Hearken." Many of the revelations begin this way, signaling us to listen to his message. Section 1, verse 3 says, "The voice of the Lord is unto the ends of the earth, that all that will hear, may hear; . . . and the day cometh that they who will not hear the voice of the Lord, neither the voice of his servants, neither give heed to the words of the prophets and apostles, shall be cut off from among the people." Our prophet today reveals God's will to us, just as the prophets have always received the divine message and handed it on.

There are numerous ways in which the voice of the Lord comes to us. Our priesthood teachings and preachings reveal the will and commandments of God to us and help us to interpret and to understand the Scriptures. When our priesthood members keep their lives in right order, they have every reason to expect God's Spirit to bless them as they minister to us. God's message may be words of admonition to us or words of advice on present problems. They may be words of instruction or direction. He may speak to assure us that what we are trying to do is approved in his sight. His words will comfort us or bless us, strengthen us or give us courage, enlighten us or give us inner peace. Whatever our need, he can supply the answer to that need. God never speaks just so we may have the honor of hearing him; but he may speak for a purpose when we have a need. Often we feel our Master's Spirit in our congregation, in group meetings, in committee meetings, in our prayer meetings, when we are engaged in doing his work or while we do good for others. There is no limit to the time, no bounds to the place of divine communication. In a noisy crowd his voice may penetrate our hearts, or in the silence of a moment of meditation his still small voice may come to us. Whenever, wherever there is a need, he will make himself heard. In answered prayers, in problems solved, in goals reached, surely we can say that we have heard his voice.

MANY PEOPLE HAVE HAD the wonderful and thrilling experience of hearing an audible voice speak to them to give them a needed message. I have never heard an audible voice; I have never had a vision or a dream of spiritual importance; yet I truly have heard his voice. Surely each of us has received divine communication at sometime. We may have felt a warm inner glow or a burning within our breast. It may have been a strong conviction or an impulse to do good. We may have felt an urging to do something that perhaps we had neglected to do, or we may have felt "Here is a task I must do, although I don't know exactly why."

God uses many methods of making himself known to us. The way his voice comes to you may be different than the way it comes to me, but each of us truly may hear him. Each may be called to a different mission and each called for a different purpose, but we are all given to know what we should do. If we heed his voice, he will give us the strength to do the thing we are called upon to do.

John 10 tells us that the sheep will follow their shepherd, for they know his voice; but they will not follow the stranger, for they know not the voice of the stranger. A flock of sheep will be able to tell its shepherd's voice out of many voices, just as a mother is able to pick her child's voice out of many voices. So should we be able to tell our Master's voice when he speaks to us. Saul of Tarsus heard the voice of the Lord and, heeding the instruction given him, became one of the foremost disciples of the Master. The New Testament is full of messages that Christ gave for us to live by. Through the Scriptures we can find the answers to our problems and the strength and courage to take us through the trials of life. As we read and study the Scriptures the voice of the Master comes to us with the spirit of learning and understanding.

If we keep our lives right and keep in tune with God, we, too, may know his voice and will want to follow it. Perhaps it is not always easy for God to speak to us. We may be so busy with the things of the world that we will not take time to listen. Or perhaps he is waiting for us to make the right kind of preparation in our lives so that he may be able to speak. Sometimes when he would speak words of admonition to us, we may not want to hear. He is surely desirous of keeping in touch with us. If we lose the connection the fault is with us.

Through our patriarchal blessing, each of us may receive instruction that is for us alone—words of comfort or words of advice. Through the patriarch comes the voice of God, giving us strength and counsel as we need it now or as we may have need of this direction in the future.

IT IS IMPERATIVE today that we listen and hear the voice of him who would direct our lives. If we hear and give heed to his voice we shall find peace and rest, happiness and satisfaction. His voice will lead us into paths of righteousness. If we will but follow after him we shall be desirous of living our lives in his service. Sometimes he calls with a gentle command, sometimes with the voice of urgency, for the task is great before us and our time is limited.

Many people feel that the voice of their Master is revealed to them through the beauty of his handiwork in the glory and majesty of his creation. Most of us do feel that nearness to him when we are surrounded by the beauties of nature.

Then let us cast from our minds the noises of the world, the din and clatter. Let us give heed to the message, "Be still and know that I am God."

We may seek and find the voice of the Master in the winds that rustle through the trees, or in the rushing river as it cascades over mighty boulders on the mountainside. We may hear him in the song of the wren in the treetop or in the voice of the happy child at play. It may be in the midst of a congregation singing hymns of praise or in the sermon of the minister as he stands behind the pulpit. We do not know just how or when this voice may come to us, but we do know that if we are listening for it, we shall hear it. As we have the need and the desire in our hearts, so the Master has the desire to speak to us.

In a Friendly Mood

HERE'S A NICE short article. Read it when you have time." My husband handed me a magazine opened to his selection. A few years ago, or even a few months, I would have replied, "Oh, I read that a long time ago," thus disparaging his reading speed or his choice of "nice" material, or that I'd read it and implied I didn't think it was worthy of calling to his attention. Or I might have said, "I just haven't time to read it," making him feel he was responsible for my multitudinous household duties which deprived me of the pleasure of reading or time for anything but doing things for his benefit.

But I learned a lesson just recently. I saw a lovely rose-colored felt hat, with pink velvet leaves around the pill box crown, and a little pink veil. It wasn't the hat so much as the way the woman wore it atop her graying hair that made me remark, "What a lovely hat! And it is so becoming to you!"

She looked around to see where her husband was and then said, "I'm glad you like it. He did, too. He picked it out and bought it for me. He likes it, so I wear it." She was wearing it with pride, too, in doing something which pleased her husband.

So I gulped back my usual retort to my husband, read the article—I had read it before and it was nice—and we chuckled together over the development. Which all set the tone for a pleasant, friendly evening.

This Oriental attitude of pleasing one's partner in homemaking is one many of us need to cultivate. It isn't always on the wife's side, either; but it happens I know more about the wife's viewpoint.

How I wish I had learned this lesson earlier in life; so many years have gone by in which I have failed to be "friends" with my husband. Cultivating friendship should not be reserved for neighbors, for church groups, or even for children, even though it is so much easier to be friendly and agreeable when everyone has on his Sunday manners. And who can withhold a smile when a lovely child is on good behavior?

Social amenities need to be practiced in the home first to produce the most natural results. A considerate husband and wife make for congeniality in the home life. One young woman was heard to remark, "If you want to know what kind of husband a young man will make, observe how his father treats his mother."

Children need models more than critics. Model parents with accord in their relationships can develop children with tendencies toward pleasant relations. To that extent, delinquent parents are responsible for delinquent children.

We do not need to go around with an "I'll-be-happy-if-it-kills-me" expression. Sometimes it's easier to tell a person's mental attitude by looking at his back than at his face. One wife said she always watched her husband at his chores around the barn. If he were in a good humor, she could tell by his walk, and she would rush his dinner on the table and meet him with a laugh. If his walk showed anger or displeasure, she "beat him to it" with some words of blame and displeasure before he had time to express himself. This isn't recommended for making a happy home, but it does point up the fact that one can discern moods and act toward creating a friendly one.

The Resurrection of the Dead

AS WE GROW OLDER we are caused to think more of the future and the resurrection of the dead, thus agreeing with Job (14: 14) who says: "If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come." The prophets of old understood there would be a resurrection of the dead.

There are those who in our day think they believe in the resurrection, but they believe that when we die all there is to us goes into the grave with no spirit returning to God. However, Job knew better, for he stated (32: 8), "But there is a spirit in man; and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." So I try to show these people that they believe in a new creation but not in the resurrection—the reuniting of the body and spirit. But they are very hard to convince.

There is one resurrection that we seldom hear mentioned—the one that took place at the time Christ was resurrected (Matthew 27: 56, 57, I. V.). "And the graves were opened; and the bodies of the saints which slept, arose, who were many, and came out of their graves, after his resurrection, went into the holy city, and appeared unto many." The Book of Mormon states (III Nephi 10: 36), "Verily, I say unto you, I commanded my servant Samuel, the Lamanite, that he should testify unto this people, that at the day that the Father should glorify his name in me, that there were many saints who should arise from the dead, and should appear unto many, and should minister unto them." The enormity of that resurrection is realized by very few Bible students. All the righteous from Adam to Noah, and from Noah to Abraham to Christ must have numbered millions upon millions. Paradise must have been emptied at that time!

Now a word from the Apostle Paul (I Corinthians 15: 20, 23): "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming."

The righteous dead are to come forth at the second coming of Christ. There will be at least two resurrections in the future. Doctrine and Covenants 76: 4 tells of those that commit the unpardonable sin, ". . . having denied the Holy Spirit, after having received it, and having denied the only begotten Son of the Father; having crucified him unto themselves, and put him to an open shame: these are they who shall go away into the lake of fire and brimstone, with the Devil and his angels, and the only ones on whom the second death shall have any power; yea, verily, the only ones who shall not be redeemed in the due time of the Lord, after the sufferings of his wrath; for all the rest shall be brought forth by the resurrection of the dead." It would seem that they put themselves out of the reach of their Savior.

Verses 5 and 6 tell us that the celestial and terrestrial glories will be on the earth during the thousand years. Verse 7 states that the celestial will not be resurrected till the thousand years are over: "And again, we saw the glory of the telestial, which glory is that of the lesser, even as the glory of the stars differs from that of the glory of the moon in the firmament; these are they who received not the gospel of Christ, neither the testimony of Jesus; these are they who deny not the Holy Spirit; these are they who are thrust down to hell; these are they who shall not be redeemed from the Devil, until the last resurrection, until the Lord, even Christ the Lamb, shall have finished his work."

So I tell the skeptics, infidels, and atheists that they may believe as they please and live as they wish, but they will be resurrected any way. Christ died for all men. But those who made themselves devils, by denying the truth after they had the knowledge of it, are the only ones who do not receive some reward, though it be but that of the smallest star in comparison. We hope there will be but few of them! I have met only two who seemed to have committed this sin against the Holy Ghost, and I assure you it is anything but pleasant. I think in our preaching we should warn humanity more and more against this sin.

Accept the Guidance

I can feel the Spirit's guidance
In my heart from day to day.
I can hear the voice of Jesus
If I listen, while I pray.

I am sure my Savior hears me
If my heart is cleansed from sin,
Every selfish motive rendered
As unfit to bring to him.

"I am near you," saith the Master,
"Feel my presence, trust me now.
All who heed my words of wisdom,
The obedient knee shall bow."

"I am coming in my glory
To accept my servants soon.
Oh, prepare now to receive me,
In your hearts and lives makes room."

I shall now accept the guidance
Of thy Spirit. Hear my prayer;
I shall heed thy words and follow
All thy teachings, everywhere.

Question Time

Question

Oliver Cowdery in his description of Hill Cumorah (Journal of History, Volume 11, page 3), says, "Here between these hills, the entire power and national strength of both the Jaredites and Nephites were destroyed." Does this mean that the last battles of both the Jaredites and Nephites were fought in New York, close to where the plates were buried? If so, some of us will have to revise our thinking.

C. H.

Iowa

Answer

It is conceivable that Oliver Cowdery was under the same misapprehension that many others have been, that the Book of Mormon plates had been left buried in the Hill Cumorah where the last battles of the Jaredites and the Nephites were fought. As a matter of fact, the Book of Mormon plates were the only ones which were not left buried in the original Hill Cumorah (see Mormon 3:8, page 701). Carrying with him these plates which became the Book of Mormon, Moroni was escaping to the north for his life, after the last battle, getting as far as he could from the area of battle then taken over by the Lamanites.

There are many other evidences from the Book of Mormon that the Hill Cumorah in New York was not the Hill Cumorah of Book of Mormon fame.

HAROLD I. VELT

Question

Does the church accept as authentic David Whitmer's testimony recorded in Journal of History, Volume III, pages 299-300 which reads in part as follows:

The translation was by Smith, and the manner as follows: He had two small stones of a chocolate color, nearly egg-shaped, and perfectly smooth, but not transparent, called interpreters, which were given him with the plates. He did not use the plates in the translation, but would hold the interpreters to his eyes and cover his face with a hat, excluding all light, and before his eyes would appear to be parchment on which would appear the characters of the plates. In a line at the top and immediately below would appear the translation in English which Smith would read to the scribe who wrote it down exactly as it fell from his lips.

How could there be any errors, as for example in the Lord's Prayer, under this manner of translation? On the flyleaf we are told, "And now, if there be any faults, they are the mistakes of men." How can this be explained?

S. C. B.

Iowa

Answer

David Whitmer was an old man whose memory was failing at the time of this interview. He was an old man when he dictated his testimony to the reporter of the Kansas City Journal Post. We must keep this fact in mind as we read his testimony and writings.

There have been several explanations regarding the manner or procedure of Joseph Smith's method of translation. Oliver Cowdery, Martin Harris, and David Whitmer were agreed in the central testimony that the Book of Mormon was of divine origin. Joseph was the only man who knew the exact method of translation. He said, "I translated by the gift and power of God." He does not amplify this statement.

The church as a corporate body has never officially endorsed or accepted the Whitmer statement, other than that which is associated with Oliver Cowdery and Martin Harris as one of the Three Witnesses to the divinity of the Book of Mormon.

The problem of the "Lord's Prayer" to which you refer is baffling. There is no satisfactory explanation. Evidently it is a human mistake. That is the best explanation which can be given.

JOHN BLACKMORE

Question

Does the General Church have anything definite for or against foreordination?

C. E. L.

Saskatchewan

Answer

I know of no official statement for or against foreordination. The strong belief and teaching that men have their agency to choose, however, would certainly be clear evidence against the belief in individual foreordination in the Calvinistic sense of being elected for salvation. In Romans 8:28-30 Paul talks about predestination. He must have been thinking in terms of the whole human race as being "predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son" and not individuals.

We cannot conceive of individual agency of choice and foreordination as both being true. They are contradictory to the human mind. It may not be so to the infinite mind; we cannot know.

Nevertheless, the whole framework of the church understanding of the process of salvation is opposed to a belief in the foreordination of persons to be saved.

Love and Conflict— New Patterns in Family Life

By Gibson Winter

Doubleday and Company, Inc.
Garden City, N. Y.

Price, $3.50

America boasts of its "production . . . abundance . . . standard of living . . . expanding economy," but "family life is paying the price" of all this. The family has been uprooted, and "Like a plant without roots, it will perish."

"A new concept of the expression of authority is required," but unfortunately "we are allergic to authority." Where shall the authority of the family be centered? In the father? In the mother? In the children?

How shall we help the family put down new roots?

The solution to this problem, according to the author, is to be found in "the emergence of a new family." This new family is based upon our Judeo-Christian heritage—on the biblical conception of family and community life. Accordingly the husband must become "father in fact"; a real father and a real person, a "somebody in the home." He is responsible to God for the order and welfare of his family.

The mother must become "the best liked guide and supporter for the emotional and personal lives of the members of the family." It is her responsibility to lend support to the father's leadership. "This is not a gimmick, but a new alliance."

Our greatest need and most difficult achievement in the family is "intimacy." This requires "compatibility, mutual affection, mutual trust, reconciliation, and forgiveness," all in an atmosphere of love.

Conflicts and tensions are inevitable; they are "the inescapable meetings with God." In turning against our responsibilities to others we turn against God who binds us to them in mutual love. . . . There are no easy answers.

Having established his thesis the author proceeds to discuss most helpfully such topics as the following: "The Covenant of Intimacy," "Time to Love," "The Sexual Conflict," "Children and Youth within the Home, School, Church and Neighborhood," "Growing Old in the U.S.A.," and "Grandparents in the Home."

Love and Conflict provides a profound understanding of these problems and a genuine stimulating leadership in developing new insights based upon the insights of the Scripture.

Of this book the editor of Pastoral Psychology writes, "It is our confident prediction that it will evoke widespread re-thinking, among clergy and laymen alike, about that institution that everybody thinks he already knows everything about anyhow—namely the family—it is a first-rate book that is as readable as it is provocative."

The author, Gibson Winter, is a member of the Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago, as assistant professor of ethics and sociology. He is an ordained minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

For his research and experimental projects dealing with the relationship of Christianity to daily life problems, he has gained nationwide recognition.

Graceland Gazette

■ The Graceland Ham Radio Club, a member of the Associated Church Amateurs, has been reinstated with the historic call letters W₀YO operating by code for the past two months. The Associated Church Amateurs is composed of a ham radio network operated by church members. The members of the Club have made contact with twenty-one different states, Australia, and Japan. They expect to be equipped for voice operation within the next month. For the last month the Ham Club has been sponsoring classes in Morse code and radio theory. It is anticipated that as a result of these classes, approximately six students will be able to pass the novice license examinations within the next three weeks.

■ Graceland played host to approximately eighty-five professional teachers Friday and Saturday, March 28-29, at which time they met together for the RLDS Professional Teachers Regional Conference. The theme for this conference was "Exploring and Finding Ways of Implementing the Educational Expectations of Latter Day Saints." Friday night they all met together in food service for an evening of socializing. The theme for the party was "Readin', Ritin', and Revelry." Saturday morning and afternoon were spent in general meetings and group discussions concerning Latter Day Saint educational expectations. Wayne Updike acted as moderator for the panel discussion which was presented to the entire group.

At 4:00 p.m. Saturday, under the leadership of Roy Cheville, the teachers participated in a fellowship, "These Things We Share." The conference was finalized with a banquet Saturday evening.

■ Two inspirational services were held on campus on Palm Sunday, March 30. At 6:00 a.m. a sunrise fellowship service was held in the Student Center with many of the students attending. Alma Blair was in charge of this early morning testimonial.

At the general meeting in the Center at 10:30 a.m. Apostle Maurice Draper was the guest speaker. Music by the Chapel Choir was also presented.

■ Continuing the pre-Easter unit the seven division groups met Wednesday evening at 7:30 for testimonial meetings. The theme for these meetings was "I Will Go with Him to Jerusalem." Then on the following night, which was Maundy Thursday, both students and faculty met in the Student Center for the service of the Last Supper. On Good Friday morning, matins were held in the Student Center. This service, though brief, was an inspirational beginning for the last day of classes before the spring recess.

■ "April Foolishness" was the theme for the assembly Wednesday morning, April 2. Betty Jo Kerr from Willoughby, Ohio, acted as mistress of ceremonies. She adopted a costume appropriate to each skit that was introduced and kept the program tied together quite effectively. The first skit was presented by Jayne Selby of Chico, California, and Gary Oatsvall from St. Claire Shores, Michigan. A French love scene followed which featured Nancy Chapman from Independence, Missouri; Ed Warner from New Philadelphia, Ohio; Larry Purcell from Woodbine, Iowa; Dave Berry from Cleveland, Ohio; and Judy Whittmore from Englewood, Colorado. The skit was done entirely in French and repeated immediately in English, only for the audience to discover that the entire script had been Nursery Rhymes. Miss Celia Schall, communication instructor, who was in charge of the entire program, then directed a chorus which sang several songs. Mr. Faunce, Dr. Cheville, and Dr. Gould offered their renditions of three barbershop quartet songs. In closing, LeRoy Field of San Lorenzo, California; Howard Booth of Council Bluffs, Iowa; and Ed Gould from Lamoni, Iowa, offered a musical preview of next year's English literature class entitled, "Brush Up on Your Shakespeare," with lyrics by Miss Schall.

■ Spring sports are well under way. The following events took place during spring recess.

Members of the track team journeyed to Maryville, Missouri, April 8, where they had a dual meet with North West Missouri State College. The score was 78-58, with Maryville the victor. Those who took first places for Graceland were Elbert Harrington from East Moline, Illinois, in the mile (4:39.8) and two-mile (10:27.6); Ron Becker from Woodland, Washington, in the 220-yard dash (:23.1); Gary Tickemyer from Arcadia, California, in the high jump (5'10"); Hank Volskay from Springfield, Missouri, in the javelin throw (164' 6"); and Gary Tickemyer, Ron Becker, Ron Parton from New Plymouth, Idaho, and Bill Russell from Flint, Michigan, in the mile relay.

On April 11 they went to Missouri Valley College in Marshall, Missouri, and lost by a score of 76½-59½. Elbert Harrington broke Graceland's record again in the mile run (4:33.8).

The tennis team went to Maryville also on April 8 and lost to its opponents 5-4. Gracelanders who won their matches were Bruce Clark from Baker, California; Barney Parker from San Antonio, Texas; Bob Bruner from Kansas City, Kansas; and Dennis Walberg from Stayton, Oregon.

The golf team met with the golfers of Creston Community College at Creston April 8. Graceland lost by a score of 8-4. Those who achieved points from Graceland were Dave Watkins from Chariton, Iowa; Carlton Farley from Rockport, Maine; and Leo Carroll from St. Joseph, Missouri.

■ For the first time in twenty years, the Yellow Jackets are fielding an intercollegiate baseball team. Harry Dennis, basketball coach, and Don Booz, Director of Public Relations and Development, are dividing the coaching chores. On April 10, the Graceland men opened the season at Rockhurst College in Kansas City, Missouri, and were defeated 8 to 0. On April 11, the team came back to hand Kansas City University a 10 to 7 trouncing. The first home game was April 12, in Lamoni, and the Jackets were again defeated 10 to 4 by a strong St. Benedict's (Kas.) team.

Very Successful Series

JACKSON, OHIO.—The Jackson, Wellston, and Limerick branches in the Southern Ohio District combined for a series of meetings held at the Jackson church February 2-15, with Seventy A. M. Pelletier, Jr., of Ontario, Canada, as guest speaker. An average of 104 attended each evening. At the close of the series sixteen persons made decisions to unite with the church. On Saturday evening, February 14, a baptismal service was held with a record-breaking attendance of one hundred and forty-two. This record-breaking attendance was set even though each person who attended truly "braved the storm." That day and evening, the city of Jackson and the area surrounding it experienced a heavy snowstorm and driving any distance whatever was extremely hazardous. It was impossible for some to attend, yet there were some who drove as far as fifty miles to attend the service. All who attended arrived safely home.

During the series, Brother Pelletier and Elder Ralph Bobbitt, district missionary, conducted a fifteen-minute radio broadcast over WKOV, Wellston, which was well received by all who listened and it was felt that many nonmembers were ministered to through these efforts.—Reported by MARGIE RADCLIFFE

Youth Retreat in Montana

FAIRVIEW, MONTANA.—The young people from the Northern Plains District attended a youth retreat held at the church in Fairview March 28-30. About fifty enjoyed fellowship in worship services and a play centered around the theme "What Seek Ye."

Young people from Minot, Glasgow, Williston, Bainville, Culbertson, Froid, Savage, and Fairview attended. Lester H. Anderson of Manning, South Dakota, Wilber Smith of Glasgow, Montana, Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Moorman of Williston, and Missionary Luther S. Troyer of Torrington, Wyoming, were leaders.

Mrs. Maggie Dittton was in charge of meals. Mrs. Laurence Brown, Mrs. Hazel Miller, Mrs. Chester Hillman, and others assisted her.—Reported by MRS. CHESTER HILLMAN

Two Families Converted

MARION, ILLINOIS.—Two families have been baptized within the past three months. They are Mr. and Mrs. Homer McGhee of Springerton, Illinois, and Mr. and Mrs. Forest R. Simmons of Cave in Rock, Illinois. The McGhee family was baptized March 23, and the Simmons family March 30.—Reported by CECIL ROBBINS

Women's Institute

BELL VERNON, PENNSYLVANIA.—An institute for women of the Pittsburgh District was held in Fayette City, April 19-20 under the leadership of Mrs. Arthur Warner. The theme was "Our Heritage—What Will We Do with It?"

Sister V. D. Ruch was the featured speaker. District President D. R. Ross and Brother Ruch also participated.—Reported by MRS. BEN F. WARNER, JR.

Missionary Series

LAWRENCE, KANSAS.—Seventy Alfred Yale conducted a missionary series in Lawrence, March 16 through March 30. In addition to speaking on Sunday mornings and Sunday and Wednesday evenings, Brother Yale carried his ministry into many of the local homes.

The Lawrence Branch was host to a series of Kaw Valley District priesthood classes and women's meetings during the month of March. These meetings were climaxed by a banquet on April 1 at Bonner Springs. The principal speaker at the banquet was Brother Charles Neff.

March 30 was District Emphasis Day in Lawrence. Seventy Alfred Yale spoke at the 11:00 o'clock service. Following a basket dinner at the church, the group was addressed by the various district officers concerning the work of their individual departments.—Reported by JOYCE OSBORN

Hold Institute

ATTLEBORO, MASSACHUSETTS.—District President Victor Witte scheduled a religious education institute under the direction of the district leader, Sanford L. Fisher, at Attleboro, on March 16.

Demonstration worship services were programmed by the Eugene Carter family, using the life of Bach for material and learning one of the new hymns which was composed by Bach; and by the Albert Fisher family, using Guidelines material.

Teaching techniques were demonstrated by Helen Witte and Kay Fisher. Helps were given by Sanford Fisher, and Brother Witte discussed many of the materials which were on display for all to see.

The Attleboro women served lunch to the many visitors from the branches of Southern New England District.—Reported by DOROTHY FISHER

Baptisms in Mission

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.—The North Hills mission was organized as a branch mission in July, 1957. Pittsburgh Pastor John Raisbeck appointed Elder George A. Tenos pastor, and Elder John J. Ross associate pastor.

Services were begun September 8 at the 74th AAA Missile Battalion (Nike) Site on Peebles Road. The privilege of using the chapel and other facilities was secured through the efforts of Lieutenant Kent Benetts.

The mission received the assistance of Missionary William Clinefelter, who conducted cottage meetings and preached for a six weeks' period.

For the past seven months, attendance has averaged thirty-five.

On February 16, ten were baptized. They were Darlene DeLuca, Dale Johnson, Eileen Johnson, Carol Johnson, and Keith Johnson, all baptized by Elder John J. Ross, and William Groom, Raymond Groom, Nancy Bates, Grant Groom, and Anna Roi Groom, all baptized by Elder George A. Tenos.

At the same service, two others were baptized from the branch. They were Kathy Windhager and Juanita Torrence, baptized by Brother Edwin Frankowski.—Reported by DOROTHY R. TENOS

Build on Church Property

RIVERSIDE, CALIFORNIA.—March 22 was a red-letter day for the branch. Mrs. Angie Peck, "mother" of the branch, turned the first shovel of earth to start building the recreation hall on the church property at 6674 Arlington Avenue. The building is to be used as a chapel until such time as the main sanctuary can be financed.

Julie Lynn and Jodie Kay, twin daughters of Lewis and Jane Hurlburt of Arlington, were blessed in February.

Brother Wilson Ritchie resigned as presiding elder because of duties and his health. Elder Bert Grosfield was elected to take his place.—Reported by VIOLET M. STEELE

Golden Wedding Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. James H. Kuykendall of Long Beach, California, whose fiftieth wedding anniversary was on April 8, were honored at a reception given by their friends and relatives at the Long Beach Reorganized Church on the evening of April 7. Both were born in Cochise County, Texas, where they were married in 1908. Mrs. Kuykendall is the former Ida Lee Plumley. They first went to Long Beach in 1913 on an extended visit, and in 1920 they returned to make their home there. Mr. Kuykendall started the first jitney line in Long Beach and later established a trucking business, which he continued to operate until his retirement.

They heard of the Reorganized Church through a nephew, Elder Alva Corley, and in 1929 they and their four children were baptized. They have been active members in the Long Beach congregation ever since, and Mrs. Kuykendall has taught in the church school for many years.

They have a son, Simon Seth; three daughters: Mrs. Thelma Lee, Mrs. Vinnia Williams, and Mrs. Virginia Palmer; nine grandchildren; and six great-grandchildren.

Across the Desk

The following is from a letter sent by Air Force Captain Charles Cockcroft, career Military man, now stationed in England:

I am writing to thank you and all the members of the Armed Forces Committee for sending us the Newsletter so faithfully and now the Armed Forces Manual. I am glad to see the church taking such an interest in the young (and some not so young) men and women of the church who are in uniform. To many of us it is by choice, as we feel we are doing our share to keep our country strong and free. To many more, it is only a brief period to be endured until they can be home once more. To all of us the realization that the church cares about the trials and temptations that face us away from home, and many times irregular church attendance, is comforting and gives us the support required to continue our fight to live as Christ would have us live.

The Armed Forces Manual appears to be the answer to a long-standing need. Our beliefs are stated in a way that will enable us to discuss our church intelligently with others. There will be many opportunities for this as I can attest to from my seventeen years in the Air Force. The worship programs and Scripture are helpful to those who are meeting together in small groups, as we did in Del Rio, Texas. All in all, I have nothing but praise for this manual and thank all of you who had a part in preparing it and sending it to service members.

We got over to Nuneaton awhile back and saw Sister Frank Fry and attended the service there and partook of the Communion. We did not meet Brother Fry as he was away. We hope to make the trip again sometime (170 miles one way) and meet Brother Fry and Apostle Oakman. I have been unable to locate any of our people on this base, and the chaplain says he knows of none. We are situated in Norfolk County near the Wash and live in the town of Hunstanton. We have a nice house and have met many fine English people. Of course, having my dear wife and girls with me this time has helped very much.

Elder Victor J. Witte sends the following information:

You may be interested in learning of the preaching series held in Akron, Ohio, March 2-9.

The fine support given by the Akron Branch through attendance and service in various ways was evidence of some excellent ministry having previously been done by the standing ministers and Branch President Harry Black. The work which these brethren had previously done in cottage meetings led to the degree of success which we experienced in the preaching series.

Nine were baptized in the last Sunday evening service. We were also pleased that the series seemed to open up a number of contacts which should result in additional baptisms in the near future.

The new church building, with its beauty and dignity and good facilities, is an expression of much good work and also evidences a spirit of devotion to the cause of Christ by our people in this area. I am grateful to have had the opportunity to work with them.

We have received a news clipping from Eugene, Oregon, Register-Guard telling of the gift of an Inspired Version of the Bible and a copy of the Doctrine and Covenants to the Springfield Public Library.

The donation was made by the Eugene congregation. An accompanying picture in the newspaper showed the librarian receiving the books from Elder Robert Seeley, president of the Southern Oregon District; Seventy G. Wayne Smith; and Elder J. C. Ford, pastor at Eugene.

The news story gave a good account of the origin and nature of the books.

The following was received by the Presiding Bishopric from Bishop David B. Carmichael of Southern California District:

In our March report from the Barstow, California, mission, the solicitor remarks, "We are sending money for twelve chairs for the Auditorium . . . almost as many as we have in our little church."

This small group now holds services in a church purchased last year from the Lutherans. Average adult attendance is twenty-five.

Elder A. M. Pelletier, Jr., has sent us this information on his recent "Crusade with Christ" in Kansas City Stake:

The March 9-30 Kansas City Stake crusade concluded with remarkable results. Attendance reached a high of 1,890 for one meeting. Average Sunday attendance was 1,504, and the average for the whole series was 1,002. Friendship cards were signed by 550 nonmember visitors.

Forty-two persons requested baptism. Ten of these decisions were received before the series. Several requested assistance to file their tithing statements.

Only five offerings were taken during the crusade. Yet, all expenses were provided for and a surplus for future stake evangelism of some $1,144 was realized. The people were outstanding in their desires to share.

A stake-wide women's luncheon at the Auditorium was also a missionary success. This was planned by Sister Shurback, stake women's leader. The luncheon was attended by 578 women. About 200 were nonmember friends.

This was the greatest missionary experience in my life. The expert organization of Al Scherer and Bill Williams, with good assistance of James Everett and many other workers in the seventeen congregations, will no doubt obtain even better results in the months ahead.

Some of the reasons for the success of the crusade are these: (1) Several months of preparation by Al Scherer and his workers; (2) complete co-operation of the Stake President, Fred O. Davies, and co-ordination of all stake activities; (3) enlisting the support of all congregations, presiding elders, and missionary co-ordinators; (4) preparation of an excellent prospect list; (5) expansive publicity expertly arranged; (6) assignments to many good workers; (7) very fine music and choir work, night after night; (8) engaging all departments for full support; (9) optimistic execution of the crusade; (10) good facilities for worship; (11) planned follow-up ministry.

It was a distinct pleasure to share with Fred Davies, Al Scherer, Bill Williams, Bishop Joe Baldwin, and their many helpers. I would be happy to be a part of that team again at any time.

I feel we have only begun to scratch the surface with this type of larger evangelism.

From Brother R. T. Allbon, Auckland, New Zealand:

My wife and four boys attended the reunion at Huai Vale. It was wonderful. All who were on the campground enjoyed themselves. The power of the Spirit of God was much in evidence, shown by the attitude of love of the people; it was also in the preaching and messages from the Spirit of the Lord to the Saints. I hope our two missionaries will go to other towns in New Zealand and preach the gospel of the Reorganized Church. We have an uphill fight to overcome the claims of the Utah Church. However, I think that the day of opportunity is right now for New Zealand.

Children's Day, June 8

Now that prebaptismal classes for children are in full swing in a great many branches, additional emphasis should be placed on making special preparations for Children's Day services, June 8. A reminder is also in order to arrange for prompt and accurate reporting to the Department of Statistics of all baptisms occurring at these services.

Unlimited Supply

THERE WAS little rain in certain areas of New England last summer. As a result water became scarce, and officials admonished people to use every drop carefully for essential purposes. If the rigid rules set down by those in authority had not been observed, there wouldn't have been enough water to meet the demand.

How different it is with the water of life. Christ will give us to drink of it whenever we have need. We need not fear that the supply will diminish, because our Lord has assured us that it will last eternally. Since this is so, let us drink of Christ's spiritual fountain and be rejuvenated.

Since no one is turned away from it, we have no excuse for not accepting that which Christ desires to give to all. We should drink of it often and grow spiritually so that one day God will bestow the good gifts of eternity upon us because of the lives we have lived.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE

The thing we need to do is to have in our minds the idea that the future is infinite. You can't avoid it. What are you going to do with it then?

—Charles F. Kettering

POINT OF NEW BEGINNING

One who fears failure limits his activities. Failure is only the opportunity more intelligently to begin again.

—Henry Ford

VIRTUE ALONE

While all other things are uncertain, evanescent, and ephemeral, virtue alone is fixed with deep roots; it can neither be overthrown by any violence nor moved from its place.

—Cicero

EXPERIENCE

It was early springtime and the melting snows had made quite a large pond in the pasture back of the house.

Mother had prepared her butter and eggs for marketing and left the young children in care of their older sister, Pearl, while she went into town with her produce.

Soon after she left the house Pearl looked out the window and saw David, four years old, up to his armpits in the icy water of the pond.

Fearing he would be ill, she rushed out, got him out of the water, took him into the house, gave him a warm bath, and put him to bed.

But in answer to all her questioning as to why he should have gone out into the pond, he replied not a single word.

He was sound asleep when the mother returned. Hearing what had happened from Pearl, she decided to let the matter rest.

One evening a few weeks later, when Mother was helping him get ready for bed, David said, "Mother, Jesus could walk on the water, couldn't he?"

"Yes, Jesus could walk on the water," she answered.

"We can't," said David, and a three-weeks-old question was answered.

WHO SAID THAT?

For many years I have heard Paul quoted from the pulpit and in classrooms as saying, "The things I once loved I now hate, and the things I now hate I once loved." At least that is quite close to the expression of change in attitude attributed to the apostle to the Gentiles. It sounds like Scripture and Paul may have said it, but I have never been able to find such a statement as coming from him.

Which reminds me that some religious people are quick to accept what they want to believe. A friend of mine in high school was approached by an elderly woman who began to exhort him and quote Scripture. Without a smile he replied, "I like that passage which says, Blessed are the blind, for they shall see no ghosts."

THE WAY AND THE WILL

When the Lord provides the way it is up to man to furnish the will.

—Frances M. Mills

PROFANITY

Profanity is biblical language in reverse gear. It is used chiefly by feeble-minded folks to plug up gaps in their conversation when their brains miss fire.

The Psalms of David

An unusual and very effective recording, just recently made available, is The Psalms of David, composed and played by Ralph Hollander and recited by Agnes Moorehead. The reading of these Psalms against the music of Mr. Hollander's solo violin is sensitive and dramatic and altogether effective and appropriate. Mr. Hollander's music creates poignant and tender moods for the words. The music is more than mere accompaniment, it is rather an intensification of the words in a dialogue where voice and violin have equal status. A speaking chorus is also used in four of the Psalms in the second cycle (Side 2 of the record).

The recording is by LYRIC ARTS and is acoustically and electrically of excellent quality.

Mr. Hollander and Miss Moorehead have done a most skillful and beautiful work. I wholeheartedly recommend their recording to all who would appreciate those marvelous outbursts of the human spirit which were the basis of Hebrew worship long before Christ, and are even yet the basis of a large percentage of contemporary musical worship, The Psalms of David.*

We'd Like You to Know . . .

Ronald Gould Sherman

AS A YOUTH Ronald Sherman took an active part in prayer and testimony meetings, seldom missing one. At one meeting a good brother turned to him and, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, testified that Ronald should prepare himself for the ministry.

In 1938 he was ordained a priest, in 1940 an elder, and in 1954 a high priest. He became a member of the Center Stake high council in 1956.

Through the years he has made steady progress in his work as a minister. Perhaps one of the greatest testimonies of his steadfastness is the fact that he has been associate pastor with the last seven pastors that have served Gudgell Park congregation in Center Stake. His great-great-grandfather helped build Kirtland Temple.

Brother Sherman is now general manager of the Wyandotte Furniture Company. He started with the company in 1931 as a warehouse worker. Later he served as a salesman, and then as manager of the firm's Independence store.

He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, Lions Club, and the board of directors of Uptown Shopping Center.

In 1929 he married Rosamond Filson. They have one son, Russell Jerome, who is an elder. Mrs. Sherman has worked as secretary in the office of the Presiding Bishopric for twenty years.

Graceland College Is Host for Regional Conference

"For the first time I think I begin to hear a voice emerging from the church's educators."

That was Carl Mesle's evaluation of the regional conference of the R.L.D.S. Professional Teachers Association held March 28-29 at Graceland College.

Speaking at the closing banquet of the conference, Brother Mesle, an assistant to the First Presidency, said the Teachers Association should have a strong, independent voice in church affairs relating to education. It should be a voice expressing competency and concern, he said.

Brother Mesle also pointed out that the members of the Teachers Association have a great freedom in establishing educational objectives and accomplishing them for the church.

"No longer should the Professional Teachers Association say, 'Why doesn't the church do this or do that?' If it is within the power of the association to accomplish the thing that is lacking, and if the goal is in harmony with the objectives of the General Church, there is no reason for the teachers to wait for someone else to do the job. They should move out themselves and assume the responsibility."

Theme for the two-day conference was "Exploring and Finding Ways of Implementing the Educational Expectations of Latter Day Saints."

A panel presentation began the discussions. L. Wayne Updike, Director of the School of the Restoration, introduced the theme, "What Should the Educational Expectations of Latter Day Saints Be?" He stated that all church members, teachers especially, should be vitally interested in a lifetime study program, and each person should receive an education according to his ability.

The panel, Chloe Price, Neva Ross, Harry Lorange, Ray Zinser, and Eleanor Sandy, discussed educational expectations of church members and decided that such expectations are lower than they should be. Church members should be more concerned about receiving the best possible education for themselves and their children, they said.

The topic was expanded in several smaller discussions ending in group discussions on the theme, "How can we implement the achievement of the goals we have set as educational expectations of Latter Day Saints?"

Teachers Discuss Expectations

At a noon luncheon Aleta Runkle, president of the association, reported on the progress of the church-wide teachers organization.

The discussions were followed by a fellowship service led by Dr. Roy A. Cheville. A banquet at the Coliseum closed the conference.

A committee of teachers in Lamoni planned the conference. Mary Beth Evans was committee chairman.

What Will We Offer Them?

insights of a generation
which must hear the gospel

IN THE MONTHS and years ahead the restored gospel of Jesus Christ will be presented to thousands of persons. Because the gospel deals with people, and the church's ministry is to people, it is important that we seize every opportunity to better understand the persons we seek to reach.

Perhaps one of the most interesting insights now available is that which is furnished by a Princeton professor who asked some senior students to write on their lives and hopes for the future. The results are found in the new book, The Unsilent Generation. The book's contents were previewed recently in Life magazine.

Some of the young men's papers are amazingly candid in their self-analysis; some are general and vague. But a general feeling seems to run through all of the papers. It is a feeling of frustration. And, oddly, most of the writers, for all of their frankness, seem unwilling to admit the presence of frustration. Rather, they maintain their frustrations are behind them and they stand ready to go into the world as educated men with their courses plotted.

In general, these courses seem to be charted along the lines of no organized religion, reluctance to conform, a desire for success based on personal standards, and a future occupation (usually vague, although these men are all seniors in college) that will offer them freedom of expression and opportunity to be creative.

Although the writers were chosen from a variety of backgrounds, all seem to have arrived at their present position out of generally similar experience—that is, experimentation with religion which ended unsatisfactorily, unhappy experience in trying desperately to conform as a freshman or sophomore, and the feeling of having become mature and sufficient as a Princeton senior—above a need for religion or a need to conform.

Indeed, it seems that a fear of conformity is preying on all of them. They wish to be "outside the stream of mid-twentieth century America." Yet they express a desire to leave an impression on their times, to contribute.

THE FRUSTRATION to which these desires lead is best illustrated by the student who wrote that he saw society's surest rule as "survival of the fittest." He says he intends to insure that he is one of the fittest by acting strictly in his own self-interest and on his own behalf. This senior wrote, "My hopes for the future are based on the assumption that I am going to have to take every short cut, every means at my disposal to achieve my desired ends."

That sounds bad. But contrast it with another statement which also echoes a need expressed by each writer: "My continuing problem, as I see it, is to find my identity, to find my place in a society which demands a total commitment that I cannot give."

Most of the writers expressed this desire to find identification with society but also the frustration of being unwilling to make a total commitment. Why? Because they have found nothing they consider worth such a commitment.

Each writer—like all of us—wants to find a cause that will challenge and spend him . . . usefully. Reading over these testimonies of educated frustration causes us to wonder, "What can we offer them?"

These writers were guaranteed the privilege of anonymity. We can probably assume they will never be reached by our church. Yet their testimony of the times should not be overlooked, for they represent a generation of people we must reach.

SO WHAT CAN we offer them? A philosophy? A cause? A God that is believable? A church that will challenge them?

We may marvel at the appropriateness of our message to meet this need of our time. We can offer an opportunity to become identified with the greatest cause on earth and in heaven. We can offer an opportunity to participate in kingdom building—a task so vast as to challenge everyone who will hear and a work so worthy as to humble the best who will accept.

We are messengers to a generation seeking hope, freedom, direction, love, security, happiness, and above all, a cause that will use them completely. This we have to offer in the restored gospel. A way not demanding conformity to the world but rather a way teaching us to be in the world but not of it. A way of hope, not frustration. A plan that calls for us to serve with all our heart, might, mind, and strength. An eternal plan of total commitment to God and his purposes.

The message we bear says, "He that thrusteth in his sickle with his might, the same layeth up in store that he perish not, but bringeth salvation to his soul." Interpreting this most important message to the people of our times is our great challenge. Let all who are bold enough in Christ speak out!

Official

Official Day of Fast

In harmony with our custom, and in response to our own deep feeling of need, we request that members of the church shall observe Sunday, September 7, as a day of fasting and prayer. Where wise and possible we suggest abstinence from both the morning and noon meals. We ask that specific time shall be spent by individuals and families in meditation and prayer for the needs of the church, the business to be transacted, as well as the elders and delegates who will meet in Conference, October 5 through 12. Let the whole church be united in prayer.

During the year as we make monthly baptismal reports, we indicate the districts, stakes, branches, and missions which have outstanding monthly records in baptisms. We note these entirely on the basis of the number of baptisms reported. At the end of the year, we are able to develop a more significant criterion than mere numbers. By calculating the percentage of baptismal increase, we are able to show baptisms on the basis of the size of the district and thus give the smaller districts the same chance to show as do the larger ones. The percentage of baptismal increase as we show it actually gives the number of baptisms per one hundred members in the district.

Based on this more accurate method of comparison, the first ten districts in the church in 1957 are as follows: (1) Central Michigan—116 baptisms and 8.13 per cent increase; (2) Kirtland District—158 baptisms and 7.68 per cent; (3) Pittsburgh District—55 baptisms and 7.51 per cent; (4) Northern Indiana District—85 baptisms and 7.23 per cent; (5) Red River District—30 baptisms and 6.68 per cent; (6) Eastern Michigan District—82 and 6.67 per cent; (7) Northeastern Illinois District—55 baptisms and 6.37 per cent; (8) Southwestern Texas District—60 baptisms and 6.05 per cent; (9) Central Illinois District—50 baptisms and 5.92 per cent; and (10) Southeastern Illinois District with 85 baptisms and 5.67 per cent.

Four of these ten districts were also in the first ten in 1956. They are Central Michigan District, Northern Indiana District, Southwestern Texas District, and Southeastern Illinois District.

The percentage of increase for all districts taken together for 1957 was 4.11 per cent. For the stakes it was 3.80 per cent. For the whole church it was 3.49 per cent. The church-wide percentage is brought down much lower than that for districts and stakes due to the fact that there are some 15,000 names on the unknown record of the church, and these are figured in but contribute no baptisms.

As previously reported, there were 5,705 baptisms reported to the Department of Statistics in 1957. The net increase was 3,586 or 2.19 per cent. The enrollment of the church as of December 31, 1957, is 167,277.

Auditorium Seats Ordered

The results of our united efforts throughout the church to raise money for the Auditorium are such as to justify our placing a firm order for the complete installation of the seats. This will be done within the next few days.

At the time of this writing, fourteen of the bishops and bishop's agents' reports for the month of March have not been tabulated. Based upon the returns of the seventy-two districts and six stakes which have reported a total of $105,638.06, we feel confident that in the remaining time between now and the time for completion of the payment on the seats (approximately August 15), funds will be in hand.

We wish to thank all who have contributed to the success of the project thus far. A continuation of these efforts during the next few months will be deeply appreciated.

The Ministry of Healing

Part I

And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. . . . On either side of the river, was there the tree of life, . . . and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.—Revelation 22: 1, 2.

WHEREVER WE LOOK we are appalled by the vast amount of sickness and suffering among the peoples of the earth, some of it curable but uncured, some of it tragically incurable, much that could be prevented or cured by love and compassion if people would only think and care for each other.

Those who have been brought by their religious faith and the ministry of the church into a closer contact with God and a better understanding of his purposes, and who have learned to enjoy the peace of Christian fellowship with their brothers and sisters in the faith, know how much comfort and welfare are derived and how often the causes of sickness and distress can be brought under control by the great resources of spiritual power.

Yet there are many who, in the words of latter-day prophecy, "have not faith to be healed" and must depend upon other agencies for their welfare.

There are many branches of healing. The body itself has remarkable power to heal some of its own ills. Some growths require surgery; infections call for antiseptics; antibiotics and vaccines are weapons in the war against bacterial and virus enemies of mankind.

The physician, the hospital, the laboratory, and the nurse all have their special services, by which many have been brought back from the borderlands of death and restored to life and service.

But religious people feel that they know there is, brooding above all of the saving arts, the Spirit of God that is the final arbiter of life and death and all human affairs. This has a part in all the great avenues of healing, as well as the power to heal by itself, even in miraculous ways.

So we have been abundantly blessed in the provision made by the kindness of the heavenly Father, through the Scriptures, for the spiritual treatment of those who suffer from illness of any kind:

Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.—James 5: 14-16.

There is a concern among the people of the church, and especially among the priesthood who carry a burden of responsibility for their welfare, about the conditions and the laws of the ministry of spiritual healing. Our concern is intensified when loved ones of the family and friends in the church and community become the victims of disease, sickness, and suffering. And that intensity becomes greater when we observe that human science and skill are not always able to allay the pain and remove the danger. And when we learn from experience that God can heal and comfort his children in miraculous ways we reach out to him in longing and prayer for help to be given to those who need it.

Watching an administration under the hands of the elders and observing how the sick receive a blessing under the Spirit of God, we may become concerned that those who are growing up in the ministry should learn to follow in the steps of the older ones. But we must remember that what we can see is external and physical and that the power which brings the healing is invisible to our earthly eyes.

In administration, anybody can learn a formula of words and imitate movements and gestures. But these are not the things that provide the power. They serve a purpose—what purpose we are not exactly sure—but they are incidental to something greater.

It is the Spirit of God that holds the healing power. It is the faith to be healed that helps the sick one to receive the blessing. The power is not in the ceremony but in the Spirit.

We are concerned, of course, that the form of the ceremony shall be reverent, orderly, and dignified, and that it shall make clear our respect for God and the church.

In the paragraphs that follow, an effort has been made to see what relation may exist between the procedures of ministry to the sick and the spiritual power that heals. In studying the material we should realize of course that the accounts which have come to us are brief and not necessarily complete. Observers wrote what they saw. The invisible powers could be seen at work only in the results that were achieved.

Healings in Old Testament Times

One of the notable healings recorded in the Old Testament occurred during a time of drouth when the prophet Elijah had been directed by the Lord to take refuge with the widow of Zarephath, below Zidon on the seacoast. There was the miracle of the unfailing meal and oil that sustained them. Then the widow's son became sick and unconscious. She complained to Elijah, who said, "Give me thy son," and took him up to the loft of the house where he laid the boy on his own bed.

First, Elijah expressed his anxiety in prayer: "And he cried unto the Lord, and said, O Lord my God, hast thou also brought evil upon the widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son?"

And he stretched himself upon the child three times, and cried unto the Lord, and said, O Lord my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come into him again.

And the Lord heard the voice of Elijah; and the soul of the child came into him again, and he revived.

We can only conjecture just how this technique of contact, the prophet stretching himself upon the motionless body of the child, could be managed and be efficacious. We find this ceremony, more minutely described, in an experience of Elisha, who revived the dead child of the woman of Shunem.

went in therefore, and shut the door upon them twain, and prayed unto the Lord. And he went up, and lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands; and he stretched himself upon the child; and the flesh of the child waxed warm. Then he returned, and walked in the house to and fro; and went up and stretched himself upon him; and the child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes.—II Kings 4: 33-35.

We shall recount one more example of this healing formula when Paul restored Eutychus at Troas.

In the healing of Naaman the leper, the captain of the host of the king of Syria, the reader may infer (and it cannot be more than an inference) that the prophet had the insight to prescribe an action that would teach this proud and autocratic man a lesson as well as heal him. The fact that Naaman became angry at the idea of healing in the waters of Palestine's river Jordan rather than Syria's rivers indicated that he needed lessons in the power of God, the importance of the conquered Israelites, and in the humility of obedience. Because this procedure is unique in the Scriptures it may have been fitted to the needs of the occasion.

Briefly, Naaman was instructed, "Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean" (II Kings 5: 10).

He was angry and rebelled, going away. But as he was leaving his servants persuaded him and talked him into obedience. On his healing, his conviction was complete, and he said, "Now I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel."

The last instance to be cited relates to a party of men burying a body and, seeing a band of possible enemies, dropped the corpse into the sepulcher of the prophet Elisha.

Leonard Lea

On contact with Elisha's bones, the man was revived and lived. On such a precedent, one great denomination has based many of its healings on the touching of the bones of dead saints. This is related in II Kings 13: 21.

Healings by Jesus

The healings by Jesus recorded in the Bible afford a rich field of opportunity for the study of spiritual ministry to the sick. There is no possibility of estimating how many he healed, for the great number of cases is related in general terms:

And Jesus went about all Galilee . . . healing all manner of sickness and all manner of diseases among the people which believed on his name. And his fame went throughout all Syria; and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those who were possessed with devils, and those who were lunatic, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them.—Matthew 4: 22, 23.

Great multitudes followed him, and he healed their sick.—Matthew 12: 13.

These general statements, covering perhaps inestimable thousands of cases, provide no material for study as to method. However, twenty-six cases of healing are described, some in detail, in the gospels, and in these some observations may be made; but even in these cases full details are not always given. He healed many different types of illness.

Jesus healed many cases of demoniac possession, as they were identified at that time, and other cases of insanity and mental disturbance. Cases of demoniac possession are described in Matthew 9: 33-36; 12: 18-21; Mark 1: 21-24; 5: 1-16; 7: 24-29; 9: 15-26.

Leprosy was healed by Jesus. One man was healed of it as described in Mark 1: 36-40. Ten lepers were healed at one time (Luke 17: 12-19).

Palsy was a severe affliction in his time. Healings are described in Mark 2: 3-12 and Luke 7: 1-10.

Cases of blindness came to him for healing, as recorded in Matthew 9: 33-37, 12: 18, and Mark 8: 23-27; 10: 46-52.

Deafness was remedied (Mark 9: 15-26) and dumbness relieved (Matthew 9: 38-40, 12: 18-20).

Jesus healed a crippled woman (Luke 13: 11-17) in whom a distorted posture was straightened.

The withered hand of a man was restored (Mark 3: 1-7).

The fever of Simon's wife's mother was controlled (Mark 1: 27, 28).

Finally, Jesus performed the supreme act of healing, the raising of the dead, as the widow's son at Nain (Luke 7: 11-16) and the restoration of Lazarus, described in detail in John 11: 1-44.

Have You a Fountain Pen?

MANY HUMAN ILLS and unhappy situations are the result of failing to take advantage of the opportunities offered. As a rule, each opportunity comes but once. If we do not take advantage of the offer or opening, it is lost forever, like a gem dropped into the ocean. And so many times our failure to use the advantage offered is due to human selfishness, pride, greed, or just plain laziness. It is just too much trouble.

I went to a "revival meeting" some time ago in a Protestant church, where the revivalist (whose name I do not remember, but whom I will refer to as John for simplicity) told of an incident in his life that struck me very forcibly. It seems that John had attended a country school as a boy where the entire eight grades were taught by one teacher. The children were all from homes of very modest circumstances; they had very little of this world's goods.

One morning the teacher came in with a small box that she placed on her desk. After the morning exercises were over, she asked the students the following simple question, "Have you a fountain pen? If you do, raise your right hand." Quickly, three hands out of the twenty or more students went up. "And what do you know," said John, relating the story, "one of the three raising their hands was my childhood rival. I fought him at recesses and noons, and to and from school, and the rivalry continued in our studies. We even liked the same girl. He was my archenemy. And his hand was up. He had a fountain pen, and I did not!"

For John to admit that his rival was ahead of him on such an important issue (fountain pens were precious in those days) seemed an impossible situation. Slowly and hesitantly he began to raise his hand. Soon other students, not wishing to admit their state of affairs, began to raise their hands. Finally all but two poor little Indian boys had their hands up, the false pretenders waving them more violently than anyone.

The teacher then asked them to lower their hands and told them the reason she had asked the question. Her father, a storekeeper, had given her a number of new fountain pens to be distributed to the children who did not possess them already. She then called the Indian boys up to the front of the classroom. The other class members, chewing their fingernails, had to watch the Indian boys pick through the beautiful assortment of pens, and choose the ones they liked best!

Now John did not really mean to cheat or lie when he raised his hand. He didn't really mean that he had a fountain pen. He meant, "I am as good as my rival, Jim Blake. Jim is no better than I!" But by not answering honestly and properly, by letting his pride rule him, he lost an opportunity. He lost a precious fountain pen. The teacher took the rest of the pens home and never referred to them again.

John was no different than the rest of us. We continually pass up opportunities by not being honest with ourselves. When the Lord spoke to Samuel, he answered, "Here am I. Speak, for thy servant heareth." Do we answer him in this manner? I am afraid not. We usually answer the simple question, "Have you a fountain pen?" with an ambiguous statement such as "I am as good as Jim Blake." We cannot put away our pride. We cannot accept reality. We cannot be meek. We cannot give a mature reply.

The story is simple, and the lesson to be gained just as simple. But it is so important. God is always waiting for a simple truthful answer, and he has a heaven full of "fountain pens." He stands at the door and knocks, but pride will not open the door; it takes humility and honesty to do this. Are you ready to open the door? Have you a fountain pen?

Grow as Long as You Live

LIFE IS GROWTH. A tree puts out new branches, leaves and roots until the day of its death. A plant works unceasingly from the moment it sprouts, building cells that become roots and stems and leaves, and finally reaches the glorious culmination of its growth in a flower. Even as the blossom withers, growth continues. Seeds form unseen in a snug capsule, or bulbs or tubers take shape in the dark earth. Even through winter's cold or the deep sleep of dormancy growth goes on, slowed but not stopped. The tulip, preformed within the bulb, gathers strength to answer spring's urgent call. If a plant can spend its life in growing, should man do any less?

Growth is life. The individual who does not grow with each day has lost that much of life. For mankind physical growth is not enough. Scarcely has the body begun to grow when the intellect also begins to develop. Man—sentient, mobile, on creation's scale far above the plant kingdom—is also set apart from other animals by the boundless reaches of his intellect. The physical being grows apace for a few years, then having reached its prescribed limits the pattern changes. The energy that once went solely into bodily growth is now freed for use in spiritual development. Even as a flower does not resemble the plant it grows upon, so likewise man's intellect differs from his body.

Who would grow the lily for its spindling stalk alone? Or the rose for its thorns? A cabbage exists solely to be eaten; its utilitarian end is its only excuse for being—certainly it is not cherished for esthetic reasons. A person who has not risen above mere usefulness is like a plant that has not developed beyond the vegetative stage. He has ceased to grow. He is a stalk without a flower. He has died before he truly began to live. Only in continued growth is there continued life.

FRANCES M. MILLS

The Conversion and Religious Experiences of

Elder Nils Oskar Nilsen

IN 1901 I LIVED in Porsgrunn, Norway. One day about the middle of summer my wife and I and our children visited my brother-in-law in West Porsgrunn. Upon our arrival my brother-in-law said, "Have you read in the paper that a preacher by the name of Peter Muceus will speak on the West Side Market Place today? His subject is 'The Everlasting Gospel.' I'm going up and listen to him. Will you come along?" We went together to the Market Place. There we saw a young man come out from a house with a little stool. He climbed up on the stool, sang a song, gave a prayer, and then began to preach. There were not many there to listen. I was not particularly moved by what he said, but my brother-in-law who was a sharp critic on religious questions went up to him afterward and entered into a discussion. They had a long conversation, and Muceus promised to visit my brother-in-law at his convenience in his home and continue the discussion they had begun. A few days after, I was visited by my brother-in-law accompanied by Muceus. I felt ashamed and was afraid that people might see them come into my home. He was known among the people as a Mormon preacher, and as I was at that time a Methodist I did not wish people to find out that I had had any connection with a Mormon preacher. I couldn't very well turn them away from the door nor forbid them to come back, so they came several times. My father who was also Methodist heard of this and warned me in the most serious terms that I should have nothing to do with the Mormons.

As Muceus and my brother-in-law conversed I would sit and listen to their conversation. I thought that it was very interesting and that my brother-in-law must admit Muceus was right. Muceus asserted that the church today must be organized as in the days of the apostles, with apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers, etc. (Ephesians 4), and with the spiritual gifts such as prophecy, healing, and miracles (I Corinthians 12). I began to listen more closely to their discussions and sometimes felt a wonderful peaceful spirit and an inner joy that filled my heart. My prejudice against Muceus began to disappear, and I became interested in what he had to tell.

Divine Assurance

One day I felt a very special joy in a conversation with them. I remember it as well as if it had happened today, even though it has now been more than fifty-three years ago. During our conversation I felt a great joy and a marvelous peace and was so enthusiastic that I was completely oblivious to the needs of the house. I was then interrupted by my wife calling from the kitchen, "Nils, fetch a pail of water for me." We had a little stream about fifteen to twenty meters from the house, and I took the water bucket and ran down to the brook, for I wanted to come back to our conversation as soon as possible.

On the way to the brook I was filled with a joy which defies description and at the same time the thought came to me in such a confirming manner that "This is God's work" and I would accept it no matter what the cost would be. I ran back with the bucket of water and set it in the kitchen and took my place and part in the conversation again. We continued to talk, and I felt as the one who had found the pearl of great price. We continued in study throughout the winter. Muceus assured us that he had no connection with the Utah Mormons but that he represented the Latter Day Saints with headquarters in Independence, Missouri.

It was decided that Muceus should baptize us, and the day chosen was Saturday, February 8, 1902. There were seven of us in all, my brother-in-law Carl Carlsen and his wife Marie, two sisters of Muceus, and V. Blom, Sofie Halvorsen, and me. Here I would like to inject that the latter-day work is to me the most wonderful thing I have found upon this earth. It has taught me to know God.

Opposition from Family and Friends

It was not long before I had opposition from my family as well as others not favorable to the church. My father was completely in despair. He came to me with emphatic scolding for what I had done and held a long, serious talk chastising me.

I answered him in a quiet and controlled manner explaining that I had done only what I was convinced God would that I should do, and that if I ever found out that the Latter Day Saint teachings were not consistent with the teachings of Christ, I would certainly not give the church my support. Many people tried to comfort my father for the terrible way in which he had lost his son.

I was employed at that time in Porsgrunn's Mechanical Workshop and had many good Christian friends who now took their distance from me and felt that I was an object to pity. They discussed religion with me a bit and thought that I had come into a most heretical sect. There was one man especially who had earlier worked as a missionary. He was most energetic and one day he came and said to me, "Nils, I'll prove to you black on white that the doctrine that you have accepted is false."

I thought that I'd take him on his word and said, "Yes, if you can prove that, it is your duty to do so and to show not only me but also Muceus."

"I'll be glad to do that, too," he answered.

I asked him when we could arrange to come to his home. He said that we could come whenever we could arrange it, and that his home was always welcome to anyone. I then quoted a few Scriptures for him and pointed out where he did not follow the Scripture. He then became quite angry with me and finally went his way.

I didn't see him again until dinner-time. He came and called me and asked if he could speak with me outside of the walls of the shop. He was extremely red in the face. He looked at me and said, "You must forgive me for what I have said. It came to me so forceably that I was like the coppersmith Alexander." "Yes," I said, and quoted the words of Paul, "Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil; the Lord reward him according to his works; of whom be thou ware, also; for he hath greatly withstood our words" (II Timothy 4: 14-16). I told him that I hoped the Lord would not charge him with this. He said that I must forget his challenge. I said all right, but after all it was his duty to prove me wrong if he could do it. We were later good friends. I wish to add here that if a man is humble and full of love in his heart that he can win over all opposition. Unfortunately this man continued to hold strong to his teachings that he had learned as a child.

Trials and Blessings

I felt God's Spiritual blessings many times. I stood one day at about the same place as the conversation referred to above. I was alone and thought on the word of God in the Scriptures. There came suddenly a heavenly blessing to me so that I felt I was lifted from the earth. It lasted a time—how long I don't know—but I never can forget such an experience. I was reminded at once of the words of Jesus to Nicodemus, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit" (John 3: 8).

I have also had many hard times with battle and doubt. The evil power tried to bring me to doubt the latter-day work, which I really did know little about—but then without battle there is no victory. I had also my difficulties of the flesh to overcome—to name only one, the tobacco which I used. I should of course be cleansed from the "filthiness of the flesh and spirit" (II Corinthians 7: 1).

Our meetings continued to be held often in private homes. I remember one Sunday, we had a meeting in a house at Knadalstrand. Five or six of us went together. I felt very discouraged as the people had no real interest in our meetings, and many looked down on us because of them. We started our meeting with the song which begins, "No other name sounds so wonderful in my soul as the name of Jesus." We came to the third verse where it says, "Jesus, when your name I hear I bow the Spirit's knee, and your mild spirit leads me on, nearer the cross's tree." The Spirit of God came over me in a great abundance, and I was filled with an unspeakable joy. All my discouragement and cowardice disappeared.

Priesthood Call

In the year 1902 we also received a visit from Apostle Peter Andersen from the United States. He was of Danish birth and spoke the Danish language very well. He was a fine, God-devoted man. Yes, even to this day he stands in my estimation as the most spiritual man I have ever known. He was always quiet and loving and had a great fund of spiritual wisdom and experience. I never tired of listening to him.

I remember one of his meetings where I had been so intently interested that at the close of the meeting I was quite stiff in the neck from straining to catch every single word and thought. Brother Andersen began to speak with me about his spiritual experiences in the latter-day work, and I learned a great deal from him which the Lord has later confirmed to me. He felt that I ought to accept the call of priest, but to that I answered that I was too reserved and shy and had no capabilities for preaching the gospel of Christ. He said that God would increase my talents and make me capable. He said, "I am of the same nature as you and very retiring and shy, and I suffer from it yet." He had preached the gospel for over twenty years. I thus accepted the call to the office of priest.

Brother Andersen and Muceus lived for the most part in Oslo, and we had to continue our meetings alone. I felt many times I would rather give up, as I was the youngest of the brethren and thought that they who had greater wisdom could have taken the leadership, but now I can see why it was as it was. They were, however, very good brothers. They helped me so much and they didn't look down on me because I was young.

Church Publications

Apostle Andersen and Elder Muceus were going to begin the publication of our little Scandinavian organ, Sandbeden's Banner (The Banner of Truth) and translate the Book of Mormon to Norwegian. The Banner came out with the first number the first of November, 1902, but listing as the fifth volume. The first four years were probably from Denmark, and I know nothing about them. It was a good little publication which gave us a lot of information on the latter-day work and its origin. It also had many other interesting topics, letters, and spiritual experiences of the brothers and sisters of the church. When they began to talk about the Book of Mormon I became a little worried and thought that now they were coming out in the open with something which could only serve to damage the reputation of the church in the country. I myself had quite a large prejudice against the book but of course I had never read it and knew very little about it other than people talked about it as being a most dangerous book. It was good to read the book myself when it was translated and to see what it spoke about and how it came to be. I began to read the book with skepticism, but soon I became familiar with it and I felt the same Spirit which bears witness in the Bible. It is a proof that God is unchangeable, always loving, but will not tolerate sin. It confirms the teachings of the Bible. While I had not experienced the spiritual gifts of prophecy and speaking in tongues during this time, I had had many spiritual experiences personally that I knew this was the work of God.

Brother N. O. Nilsen was one of the first to accept the latter-day work in Norway. He heard the first sermon of Elder Peter Muceus in 1901 and was baptized with six others February 8, 1902. He is thus one of the oldest members in Norway. He was ordained a priest later the same year by Apostle Peter Andersen and Elder Peter Muceus. In 1927 he was ordained to the office of elder. Of his nine children, six are members of the church, and with members of their immediate families included there are twenty-one baptized members.

In Drammen and Kragerø

I ended my work in Porsgrunn and moved to Drammen in 1906. We had no members there, and I was thus alone. Muceus visited me immediately after and held meetings there. There were several people present, but we received no new members. We did have a little Sunday school, however, with about twenty fine children. We also held a very pleasant Christmas program with the children as well as their parents.

I moved from Drammen to Kragerø in 1908. I began building and selling 2,000-ton motorboats. As soon as I arrived Brother Peter Muceus visited me and began some meetings, which were often very well attended. From that time until now our activity in Kragerø has continued. We have a few good members here, but the activity has not had missionary help in Norway from 1935 to 1954. There has only been local activity.

After I finished with the building of the motorboats I began in 1909 a bus route between Kragerø and Tordal, a distance of about 65 kilometers. This was the first automobile in this portion of Norway. I drove this until the end of 1915, a period of seven years. In 1916 I began my own mechanical products factory and foundry and continued with it until 1924 when the economic crash following World War I forced me to sell out.

To come back to my spiritual experiences, I have now learned the truth of what the Preacher says, "Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity" (Ecclesiastes 2: 15). I was now poor both in temporal and spiritual things. I began to call upon the Lord in serious prayer that I might be forgiven the laxness in his service while I had been so involved in the activities of business and the world. He answered my prayer and has blessed me abundantly all the days of my life. I am thankful to him for the great privilege of being called to participate in this wonderful latter-day work.

Question Time

Question

What is the true interpretation of Section 119: 6 e of Doctrine and Covenants concerning reverent organ music preceding prayer and testimony meeting?

Mrs. I. A. P.

North Dakota

Answer

The paragraph in question reads: "Nevertheless, let the organ and the stringed instrument, and the instrument of brass be silent when the Saints assemble for prayer and testimony, that the feelings of the tender and sad may not be intruded upon."

The question of interpretation of this paragraph hangs upon what the word "when" means. Does it mean while the people are assembling, or after they have assembled for prayer and testimony? There are good reasons to interpret it either way, so the question of a "true interpretation" as set forth in the question is practically impossible under the conditions because it all hangs upon a matter of semantics.

From a practical standpoint, in order to create an atmosphere of reverence preceding the prayer and testimony service, a large number of branches throughout the church customarily use a fifteen-minute organ prelude. In the opinion of this writer that is more conducive to a feeling of reverence on the part of those assembling for prayer and testimony service than to sit and visit together preceding the service, and let's face it, that's usually what happens if there is no prelude music.

If it is remembered that this revelation was given to the church in 1887 at a time when the Reorganization was very young and its membership made up largely by people from other faiths, and at a time when there was not a very strong precedent as to our modes of worship, it is not surprising that there was a considerable amount of dissension and contention regarding the use of an instrument. It wasn't so much then a matter of an argument about the use of an organ or a piano or something else as it was an argument on the use of any kind of instrumental music for worship purposes, a holdover from the Puritan influence. And the question of the use of the organ wasn't concerned only with prayer and testimony services but with any service. Nowadays we don't question the use of an instrument for any services except the prayer and testimony service, and as long as the injunction in 119: 6 stands we are bound by it.

Times have changed, however, and it is now almost inconceivable that the "feelings of the tender and sad" would be intruded upon by the sound of the hymns of the church being played in an appropriate manner on the organ, and it is the strong conviction of this writer that the time will come when the church will receive more light in regard to this question. We now take for granted things that the people of the church in 1887 held in question.

It is the feeling of this writer that there is nothing in Section 119: e which definitely precludes the use of organ prelude music while the Saints are coming in to the sanctuary or room for prayer and testimony service. Nevertheless let the organ be silent when the prayer and testimony service starts, until such time as the church shall receive more light on the question.

QUESTION TIME ERROR

In the Herald of April 21, page 16, Brother Ralston is discussing the statement made by Alma (19: 88-106) which was interpreted as meaning that Adam's sin caused man to be banished from God "until the infinite atonement had been made." Brother Ralston's answer begins, "It certainly is true that without the atonement man could never be redeemed. The apparent error in the interpretation presented above is found in the fact that it states, 'until the infinite atonement . . .' and indicates that there was no atonement before the literal crucifixion of Christ."

Through editorial error the pronoun "it" preceding the quotation was changed to "Scripture" whereas the antecedent was the interpretation in question.

If you are keeping these Question Time articles, please cross out "Scripture" and insert "it."

Intangibles

THE INVISIBLE FORCES of the universe are more powerful than those that are seen.

We cannot see electricity; we see only what it does. We cannot see the current that flows along the wires to the lights, but we can see the light that is produced. If we take a bit of wire and a bit of steel and make an armature, then fix it on an axis between two electromagnets, it will produce power. A good proportion of the power used in the world today is produced in this way. The most powerful part of it all is invisible—designated as lines of force.

If I take a magnet and pass it along the blade of my knife, it will pick up a steel pin or nail; it may pick up several. It is very significant that if I apply the negative end of the magnet to the blade, it loses its power. Our earth is a great magnet surrounded by a massive field of magnetic lines of force. These are very powerful and when properly harnessed can be very useful. But our earth is not an isolated body; it is a part of a most marvelous universe; it is constantly being bombarded by powerful influences from outer space—mostly from our sun.

Man is beginning to understand something of the majesty and power of the universe. Joseph Smith proclaimed these things to the world in 1832 (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 3, 9). "For there is no space in the which there is no kingdom; and there is no kingdom in which there is no space." In all probability that statement was scorned in 1832 and for many years after, but now men of science are discovering these precious truths. Man's discovery of the molecule was hailed as a great advance; later he found that the molecule was composed of atoms. This was supposed to be the smallest part of matter, but recently it has been found that these possess electrical characteristics called neutrons, protons, and electrons—all lively entities obeying definite laws. If they obey one set of laws, they are a certain type of matter; if they obey another set of laws, they are another type of matter. The latter-day prophet told us that all things created were spiritual at one time; it begins to look as if the early philosophers were right when they said that all substance was made of one thing which they called cosmos, and also it begins to look as if the form that matter takes depends upon the laws it obeys. That fits in with our idea of religion, does it not? Holy Spirit is the highest law. When we obey its promptings, we receive the "glory of the sun." What a wonderful condition of light and intelligence!

In his lectures given in Europe in the early 1840's, Orson Pratt taught quite convincingly that spirit is matter—spirit is matter obeying a higher law. What is the higher law? Isn't it the spirit of light and intelligence? (See Section 85: 3.) The light that you see "is the same light that quickeneth your understandings . . . which giveth life to all things," both physical and spiritual.

PRAYER FOR A CHAPEL ENTRANCE

GOD, make the door of this church wide enough to receive all who need human love, fellowship, and fatherly care; and narrow enough to shut out all envy, pride, and hate; make the threshold smooth so as to be no stumbling block to children, to the weak or straying feet, but rugged and strong enough to turn back the tempter's power. God, make the doorway of this church to many souls the gateway of thy eternal kingdom.

AUTHOR UNKNOWN

The invisible things all about us are clearly seen, being understood from the things that are made, states the Scripture. All about us is a great unseen universe that is far more important than what we see; by means of the "seen" we can understand the "unseen."

Most of us know something of the power of the Holy Spirit, especially the men of the eldership. Is it part of these beneficent rays that come from outer space—from the sun? Or are they part of the Holy Spirit? I am convinced that there is some connection. We know that the Holy Spirit is very powerful; it is light, intelligence; it is quiet; it is effective.

I was present at Erie Beach when, through prayer, a raging storm was stopped instantly; hundreds of people were there who can verify my statement. I have been in accidents which could have brought sudden destruction, and I have been spared. I have been bathed in the divine influence when I could see clearly and understand what my poor intellect could not discern—an unseen force or power operating in the seen and unseen.

I recall one instance when six of us elders visited a brother in his eighty-fifth year who was to have surgery. When the doctors operated, they found cancer and sent him home to die. Around his bed each of us prayed; I was last. I took him by the hand and offered a prayer of resignation. I prayed for peace and for angelic accompaniment when he crossed to the beyond. I felt a very powerful influence going through me to him; I did not say anything at the time, but the aged brother told another elder sometime after that when I prayed the power of God came through me right into his body and took away all suffering and pain. The doctor had given him ten days to two weeks to live. He got up, had his meals with his family, and lived for months after.

There was an unseen power greater than medicine. We should investigate these unseen powers and learn the rules that apply so we can enjoy the blessings God intends us to enjoy. When we study, when we pray and meditate, when we worship in prayer service, we tune into divine light; we see clearer, and our souls are uplifted. When elders go to administer and their hearts go out in deep compassion for a brother or sister, they tap divine sources and miracles often result. We need more development along this line. There are many marvelous miracles for us if we learn the divine ways.

Student Center

This Warrensburg home has been selected to serve as a student center for members attending Central Missouri State College

A PIONEER PROJECT IS underway in Warrensburg, Missouri. It is an attempt to provide a student residence and student center for church young people attending Central Missouri State College at Warrensburg.

There are one hundred and twenty church members attending the college at Warrensburg. They come from Independence, Kansas City, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, Colorado, and Texas, as well as Canada and Korea.

The plan is to buy a thirteen-room house at the corner of College and Broad streets, within a short block of the campus, and use the house as a residence and student center.

A first gift of $500 made the down payment possible. A holding corporation is being established to serve as owner and operator of the center after additional money is raised and the house is purchased. Stake Bishop Willard Becker has agreed to assume responsibility for the supervision and management of the house. Qualified persons to serve as house mother or resident counselor will also be used.

Plans call for the house to serve as a residence for men in the winter and women in the summer.

The project was initiated by the student Liahona Fellowship at C.M.S.C., and the campaign is being conducted under the sponsorship of members of the Committee on Ministry to College People and the Central Missouri Stake with the approval of the General Church officers involved.

In setting out the needs which the building is hoped to meet, the committee listed:

1. It is our largest group of students outside of Graceland.
2. The congregation at Warrensburg is most cooperative, and the church is used frequently by the students, but it is sufficiently far from the campus and in such regular use by the congregation as to limit its use as a student center.
3. The group is highly active on campus and cooperates in religious endeavors but is unable to hold denominational services on the campus itself.
4. While many of these students are Graceland graduates, and it is the desire of all involved that our college students first attend Graceland or our Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing, an increasing number are nevertheless entering the college at Warrensburg as freshmen and sophomores without the same advantages offered at our church schools. These students need the integrating fellowship made possible by a church student center.

5. In recognition of the continuing need for religious education, it is hoped that increasing numbers of our students shall have access to credit courses in church doctrine which may be offered in future "chairs of religion" adjacent to such campuses.

To Gain Knowledge

THE BOY WATCHED with interest as I took the house plants from their accustomed places on the window sills and placed them in the sink.

First came the yellow cat planter we had named "Job," a name chosen from the Bible by the boy. We had much trouble with the plant. First, the new leaves would turn brown and drop off, and then tiny spots of rust would appear and grow until the leaf was an ugly, sickly thing. After much nursing and clipping, it became a lovely green plant with sturdy stalks that seemed to dance about under the fine spray of water that washed the dust from its leaves.

Next was the round, pot-bellied stove planter that we cherished, and which brought a smile each time I tended it.

It had been brought to the hospital by a dear friend who commented as she placed it on the table at the foot of the bed, "to keep your feet warm!"

From that day, the tiny vine had grown steadily. Now it curled its tendrils thickly about the black stove as the love that had come with the gift had wound about our hearts.

One by one I washed the plants, then began to return them to their places on the window sills.

"Why do you turn the plants around facing the other way? Job was facing this way; now he's looking out the window."

"Because the plants grow toward the sunlight. When I turn them around they do not grow to one side, but straight, as the plants outside do. They turn their faces toward the sun. The same thing applies to people who keep their thoughts turned toward God. Do you remember the Scripture we read this morning?"

He spoke so low I scarcely heard the words. "For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts" (Isaiah 55: 9).

I detected the slight quiver in his voice and turned. He was looking out the window, up at the sky, and the sun streaming warmly through the pane glinted brightly from the heavy braces on his legs as he leaned upon the crutches.

Grandma and Kirk

KIRK WAS BORN a few weeks before our second wedding anniversary, and my job as editor of Stepping Stones thereafter became a half-day job. After a series of baby sitters (all of whom were excellent, but there was the inconvenience of taking the baby away from home each day), Don suggested we ask his mother in Canada to come to live with us and take care of Kirk while I worked afternoons.

We figured out a system of pay for her, bought another bed and chest, and prepared ourselves to become a family of four.

I must admit that I suffered some qualms about the arrangement we were undertaking. Like most of us, I had read too many articles about in-law troubles. It seemed the only happy solution was to stay away from in-laws on both sides. I wondered seriously if we actually could live together "Zionically," or was that just an impossible dream?

I wrote a friend about what we were planning. She answered laconically, "My advice is—don't get your mother-in-law living with you until you have to!"

After more than a year, I am indeed happy to report that not one argument has resulted from having Grandma in the Bayne household. Why? I believe the solution is that in-laws can be compatible and happy if they really want to be—if they remember to be kind and forget to be selfish.

Grandma Bayne accepted our limited facilities without a word. Our house was in a stage of being constructed, and we were living in the basement. She put her things away neatly, and kept them neat thereafter. She made friends with the baby by degrees, so that he would not be upset at meeting a stranger. She got up in the morning and retired at night about the same time we did.

We All Love Grandma

She helped around the house when she saw the need. She respected privacy at all times. (Besides all this, she brought us a box of much-needed cooking utensils that she had used in her own home, and she crocheted a beautiful tablecloth for us.)

And she did another thing that I'm sure all daughters-in-law would like tremendously. Before starting any household job, she would watch to see how I did it, then she would do it the same way. This applied to feeding Kirk his pablum as well as to shaking the rugs. She was observing and did not need to ask many questions.

Four people in a small, unfinished living area make considerable housework, but I have found it is more fun to do housework with her than to do it alone with only the radio for company.

GRANDMA BAYNE CAME to us voluntarily—that is, because Don's father is not living, she could have done other things besides helping us. In many families, of course, there is no choice but to "live in" with married children. In such cases, it seems to me, the older family members could help make daily life pleasant by doing some of the things Kirk's grandmother does. First, she is clean herself, and she helps keep the house clean. When she cooks, she remembers our somewhat limited budget. When she does the family wash, she uses soap and water frugally. When she cares for Kirk, she recalls what our pediatrician has said about his needs, and she listens to what Dr. Spock says about baby care. She doesn't remind us bitterly that "When you were young I did so-and-so for you, and that was good enough then!" (What young mother wouldn't appreciate this?)

She is patient and co-operative, and she never raises her voice to speak angrily. Is she a paragon of virtue that no one else can imitate? No, and she herself would be first to say so. But she has developed perception—she can understand how people feel, why they act and react as they do, when to pour oil on waters that may become troubled.

Several times I've been grateful for her comments. Not long ago, I tried dying some brown shoelaces black for Kirk's oxfords. The result was that I got my hands black every time I tied his shoes, and I had to buy new black laces after all. I mentioned my foolishness ruefully, but she only smiled and said, "Well, Alice, we all do foolish things like that sometimes, don't we?"

"Lovelorn" columns are full of stories of in-law troubles, and many authorities suggest young couples live by themselves at all costs. Before Kirk was born, I was in the waiting-room of the doctor's office one morning with an assemblage of mothers-to-be. Two near me were talking in low tones. Said one with a hard glint in her eye, "I wish my mother-in-law would take a long trip!" The other added grimly, "And never come back, huh?"

What makes people think a mother-in-law is a potential ogre? (I met Don's mother on our second date, and one of the things I liked most about him was the respect and kindness he showed his mother.) We who now have sons will someday become mothers-in-law ourselves.

LATTER DAY SAINTS believe that Zion is built first upon happy homes, then upon happy communities, where all work together for mutual good. There is no reason why three and four generations cannot learn to live together in happiness.

Grandma feels free to correct and teach Kirk when necessary, because we all wish it that way. Kirk will need, as he grows up, to obey many adults other than his father and mother. Grandma's gentle discipline now is a fine beginning influence for him. She loves him as much as we do, and we trust her to consider what is best for him in all situations when he is in her care.

One day I took Kirk across the street to play with Carla Olson, six weeks younger than he. Carla's parents are both working to complete college degrees, and Grandma Olson and Great-grandma Schafer take care of little Carla each day. I have seen a great deal of peace and love in that home.

"I think it's good for children to know their grandparents," Mrs. Schafer said. And I had to agree that in their case as well as ours, it certainly has been good.

ALTHOUGH SHE TRIES to fit into our home life, Grandma is never afraid to be herself, and I appreciate this, too. She thus spares herself from feeling and acting like a martyr. She accepts herself as a person with desires and ideas of her own—just as important in our household as any other family member.

Needless to say, Kirk loves Grandma. What pleasant memories of his childhood and home life we can build for him as he grows!

This is our true experience, presented with humility, because none of us could have accomplished such good results alone. We all prayed for and received the guidance of God's Holy Spirit.

We firmly believe families can live together happily. And it is possible for a daughter-in-law of 1958 to love as sincerely as did the biblical Ruth, who said "Where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

Make Home a House of God

ALL AROUND US today we hear of ways to make a happy family. Some say, "Education and culture produce the ideal home." Others, "Affection is the greatest contributory factor to any happy family, when husband and wife love each other, when there is devotion and affection between parents and children." Still others, "There must be religion of some kind."

Let us start with the last point. But just any religion, just any God, is not enough. To make our home a house of God we must have Jesus Christ in it, who says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." It is essential that each home be opened to the Master if it is to become a house of God. "Behold," he says, "I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me" (Revelation 3: 20).

One hears people say, "We're going to wait and have our children later. We're going to buy our home and furniture first and have some good times before we tie ourselves down with children." Now is the day. The home that is a house of God welcomes children. It looks at them as gifts from God.

There are many uprooted men and women in our land today. They do not take any pride in family success, and when people cease to care the family goes to pieces. In some of our branches we see some young people falling down in their opportunities. Only as we, the parents, understand this loss will we have the adequate incentive to make us use our imagination to reverse this situation. We of the restored church need to care, need to begin to sacrifice something—even in excitement and personal expression—in order to maintain the kind of homes the Christ must expect. Other things are prized more, therefore we have many habitations instead of homes. We build beautiful homes today, at great sacrifice; then our children spend most of the hours of the day outside its sheltering walls. The difficulty in most of our homes lies chiefly in our poverty of spirit.

Terrifically important is the attitude toward children. The future of our church, our nation, and our world depends on what we do with the children in our homes. The home has more influence to build character than all other institutions together. The home that is a house of God trains its children for God, and it does so by example and word. We teach how we love the Lord by what we say and do and are.

There never was a time when children needed wise and loving help and counsel more than they do today. These children of ours have been brought into a secular world that gambles too much, drinks too much, wars too much. It has not learned how to make just and durable homes or social relations or peace. We must seek to establish a home where joy and laughter and friendship reign, a home of mutual love and understanding and unselfishness, a home where a godly father and a pious mother seek to set an example in Christian living, a home where the Spirit of God has found an abode, a home where each person looks in faith to God in all the problems and decisions of life.

As parents it is our responsibility to so teach and direct our children that they will be seeking for the touch of the Master's hand. There is a poem entitled, "The Touch of the Master's Hand" which tells of a violin that was being sold at auction. At first, people were unaware of its value; they bid two or three dollars for it, but after listening to a master play the instrument they raised their bids. It was sold for thousands of dollars. It took the touch of a master's hand to bring out the true qualities.

THIS IS TRUE in our lives and the lives of our young people. Some, not knowing the value of life, are willing to sell it for the cheap pleasures of sin. But when Christ, the Master of men, lays his hand upon us, as the Lord once did upon the prophet Ezekiel, and brings out our finest qualities, he enables us to see the true value of life. He enables us to use our lives for the glory of God and our fellow men.

Let us look to God with hearts full of thanksgiving as we start forth on the next milestone of life's journey. As we glance backward we should not focus our thoughts on losses, difficulties, and defeats. To our souls is given that power through Christ to transform our environment, and to us will be given the strength to cast off circumstances, to smile at storms, to rise conqueror over defeat.

Doomed for years a prisoner in Bedford jail, John Bunyan wrote his immortal book. Beethoven was deaf, but he wrote his glorious symphonies. Phillips Brooks stammered, yet he became a great preacher. Our backward glance should promote faith and hope and confidence in a brighter and better new year.

The family is life's highest known ideal; it is a foretaste and an advanced demonstration of the kingdom of God. The responsibilities of parenthood are so great that without a closeness to the Master it seems almost impossible to succeed. In the years immediately before us may we resolve to maintain and demonstrate this ideal in great measure, every day as it comes.

The parents who succeed are those whose children can say one day of their home, "This was none other than the house of God, the gate of heaven." Working together toward this ideal we will say, "We love the work of God."

History of The Temple City Congregation

THE STORY of the growth of the Temple City congregation is a history of members who are blessed not only with an abundance of spiritual devotion but with determination as well.

In April, 1949, the first meeting was held in the Mission Chevrolet Company building. At this service Blaine Bender was elected pastor, with Paul Moore and F. H. Cunningham as associate pastors.

On September 13 of that year the building committee, composed of A. L. Nunamaker, Larry Christensen, Martin W. Gilbert, and F. H. Cunningham, gave a "kickoff" dinner for the purpose of starting the raising of funds to purchase a future building site. Just two days later, with the sanction of the General Church, plans were initiated for the purchase of a lot at the corner of Cloverly and Broadway for the sum of $14,850.00.

During the next four years the congregation continued to grow both in membership and stature. It was fast taking its place as an integral part of the community.

In 1954 Harry K. Waylett became the presiding elder. The same year the final payment was made on the indebtedness of the church property.

Ground-breaking ceremonies were held on June 17, 1956, and President Israel A. Smith was the featured speaker. This was the first step in the actual building of the new church. Others who took part that day were Stake President Garland E. Tickemyer, Stake Bishop J. Stanley Kelley, Presiding Elder Waylett, former Pastor Bender, and Walter Greismeyer, at that time vice-president of the Temple City Chamber of Commerce.

Because it was necessary to obtain special zoning variances from the county, the foundation was not laid until the second week in September. But from that time on, with Contractor D. C. Leneve on the job, the building progressed.

On August 4, 1957, one hundred and eighty-five people were present for the first service in the new building. Presiding Elder Waylett was in charge of the service, and A. L. Nunamaker gave the Communion message.

After Elders Lewis E. Scott and A. L. Nunamaker had donated the two buildings now being used as junior church chapels, they stated that those buildings were temporary until the lot could be paid for and a larger building erected on the front of the site. Then these buildings would become a center for youth activities. This dream has now become a reality.

Book Review

Faith and Ethics

Paul Ramsey,
Editor

Harper and Brothers

Price $5.00

Nine university professors of ethics or theology and contemporaries of H. Richard Niebuhr have undertaken an interesting and worth-while, though difficult, work. They have attempted to interpret the life and philosophy of a man who "rethinks his positions continually" and "hopes and believes that his best years of work are still ahead of him."

Editor Ramsey, approaching this admittedly trying task, feels the book is significant, for it "is presented at a time when Niebuhr's present literary achievements already demand a critical appraisal and while he has a still greater contribution to make to our common understanding." Ramsey's granting of greatness to Niebuhr is not his alone, for the Christian Century (Volume 74, Number 17, page 509) declares H. Richard Niebuhr has "made a brand-new whole of the best parts of contemporary theological thinking."

The book is divided into two parts. The first three chapters (part I) deal with the life and theology of the Director of Graduate Studies in Religion at Yale University. The second part concerns itself with some chapters that quote, explain, and analyze Niebuhr's position, whereas other chapters are "independent theological essays written, it is believed, in the spirit of Niebuhr."

Latter Day Saints will find many compatible concepts in the theology of Niebuhr, though of necessity there will need to be some sifting of sectarian philosophies. His theological background of the Reformed Church movement, which began in Switzerland in the sixteenth century, was further influenced by nineteenth century Protestantism, which in turn was influenced by German University academic traditions stimulated by Kant and Schleiermacher. The sovereignty of God and the spiritualization of all temporalities would find ready acceptance among Latter Day Saints. His concept of the "complex object of theology" and "radical monotheism" would also be agreeable to us. Some traditional Protestant concepts are to be found, yet they have been tempered by Niebuhr's new theology so that they are more nearly palatable than otherwise.

The book is well written, though on the level and in the language of university professors. It is, surprisingly, easily read, though proper and adequate digestion will require repeated reference to this 290-page book. It should surely broaden one's appreciation of modern Protestant theology and its continued, though unconscious, acceptance of the prophetic ministry of this dispensation which was originated at Palmyra.

The Meaning of Immortality in Human Experience

By William Ernest Hocking

To the serious student the title is more than intriguing, and this new book is even more thought-provoking than the title would suggest. Dr. Hocking, now eighty-four, is one of America's outstanding philosophers and lecturers, and this is a companion piece to stand beside his important work, The Meaning of God in Human Experience.

He is not concerned with immortality as a religious dogma but faces the problem from the field of philosophy and in so doing creates much for the theologian to consider. You might say this book concerns itself with death, life and destiny.

I was particularly fascinated by his logical explanation of death in human experience. As a pastor, I have had difficulty in explaining to the bereaved just what death is in our own experience. Dr. Hocking approaches death from the standpoint of logic, psychology, and philosophy. For instance, he speaks of the two selves—"the self which is within the world, and the self which contemplates the world from a point not within the world, and in this sense includes the world." With this as background he is able to give a rational idea of how we contemplate our own death: "It is a simple matter to contemplate one's death. But when one does so, one does it as a survivor." Then in logical sequence he points out some of the great master plan of God and nature. While scientific fact is lacking, we do have within our range of empirical knowledge the inward certainty that something happens beyond what is normally called "this life." "Unless there is a way for the continuance of the human self, the world is full of the blunt edges of human meanings, the wreckage of human values, and therefore of the failures of God."

This is not a book to be read lightly or quickly, but it will be time well spent as it enlarges our understanding of "why we are here" and gives us a better concept of what immortality really means. It is especially recommended for all priesthood and those who are doing home ministry and counseling.

Church Man in the News

Robert W. Hertel

Featured in Pulse

PROMINENTLY FEATURED in the November, 1957, issue of Pulse, monthly magazine published for the Prudential Insurance Company of America at Houston, Texas, was Robert W. Hertel, a member of the church "all his life."

Brother Hertel, whose picture appears on the cover of the magazine, was born in Butler, Missouri, January 11, 1924. He and his wife, the former Kathryn Sue Barbarick, are members of the branch in Nevada, Missouri, where they are now serving their second year as leaders of the Zion's League.

Brother Hertel has been with Prudential since June 4, 1956. Prior to that time he was an automobile salesman and lived in Butler, Missouri.

During the first six months of his employment with Prudential, Bob qualified for the Leader's Conference, which was held in West Palm Beach, Florida, in March, 1957. He won the Dual Achievement Award and the Quarter-Million Dollar Award in 1956. He also qualified for the Leader's Conference to be held in April, 1958, in Chicago, and for the Sales Seminar to be held in Colorado Springs, Colorado, in September, 1958. In order to qualify for these honors Bob had to write one-half million dollars worth of policies.

Brother Hertel holds membership in the Junior Chamber of Commerce, Masonic Lodge, and American Legion, and is assistant district commissioner in the Mo-Kan Area Council of Boy Scouts of America.

The Hertels have two daughters, Bobbie Kay, eleven years old, and Teresa Ann, born in October, 1957. Bob's grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Searfus, Sr., were charter members of Butler Branch, which was organized November 17, 1912.

In suggesting Brother Hertel for a Herald feature, Apostle D. Blair Jensen said, "Here is a young man who is making a success in his chosen field, and we are glad to commend him."

Emphasis on Missionary Work

TEXARKANA, ARKANSAS.—The spring conference of the Arkansas-Louisiana District met at Texarkana, March 29-30. A missionary institute was held in connection. Two missionary classes were conducted on Saturday afternoon. Missionary N. G. Coltharp taught a class on cottage meetings, and Seventhly R. M. Reid followed with a class on personal evangelism.

In the evening the business session was held. Delegates to General Conference were elected, and Apostle E. J. Gleazer announced the resignation of R. M. Reid as district president and the appointment of N. G. Coltharp. Brother Reid resigned because of his appointment to the Hawaiian Islands.

Following the business meeting, Brother Gleazer spoke on the General Church missionary policy. It was a stimulating discussion which emphasized the need for every-member missionary activity.

On Sunday morning, a prayer service was held with Brother Gleazer in charge. He expressed his appreciation to Brother Reid for his leadership in the district, and also his confidence in Brother Coltharp to continue a stable leadership.

The concluding service was a preaching service, with Brother Gleazer as speaker.

Every group was represented in the district conference. Attendance on Sunday was over one hundred.—Reported by R. M. REID

Organ Presented As Memorial

DAVIS CITY, IOWA.—A special service was held March 2 to dedicate the electric organ presented to the church by Erald Scott in memory of his wife Una, who passed away February 9. Mrs. Clarence Wickens played three hymns.

Pastor Robert Ballantyne accepted the gift for the church and offered the dedicatory prayer. The organ is a fitting memorial to one who played for both church services and church school for many years.—Reported by IDA MAY HILL

Host to Two Meets

CLINTON, IOWA.—The church was host to the Waterloo-Clinton District priesthood institute on March 22, and host to the Waterloo-Clinton District spring conference on March 23.

The priesthood institute, attended by thirty district priesthood members, was conducted by L. Wayne Updike, assistant to the First Presidency. Classes began at 10:00 o'clock, and concluded at 4:30 in the afternoon. There was a banquet for priesthood and wives Saturday evening, with Brother Updike and Apostle Maurice Draper as guests.

The conference began with a prayer service, followed by a preaching service, with Brother Draper as speaker. The noon meal was served by the Clinton women. The business meeting was held in the afternoon, under District President C. M. Beil. The call of Denver D. Shilling of Rock Falls-Sterling Branch to the office of teacher was approved by the conference. The conference also voted to accept the quota assigned the Waterloo-Clinton District in connection with the remaining indebtedness on Lakehurst reunion grounds. This quota, $4,500.00, will be apportioned percentage-wise to the involved branches.

Nine delegates to General Conference were chosen.—Reported by RICHARD C. SETTERBERG

Pastor Ordained Elder

WALLA WALLA, WASHINGTON.—Many things have happened since the last report. In November, 1957, the Saints were privileged to have Elder Paul Crinzi, district president of Spokane, with them for several days. During that time a study was held for the priesthood, teachers, department leaders, and the Liahona Circle for women.

Sunday, December 15, was very impressive for a record attendance when two babies were blessed by Elders Lloyd Whiting and A. M. Crownover, both of Richland, Washington.

Coming your way . . .

A completely new church school curriculum for kindergartners, primaries, juniors, junior highs, and senior highs.

Prepared under the direction of the Department of Religious Education of the General Church. To be used beginning with the October, 1958, quarter.

Sample kits will be available from Herald House about August 1, 1958.

Read the summer issue of GUIDELINES TO LEADERSHIP for further information about this brand-new curriculum.

The babies were Mark Randall, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Miller, Milton-Freewater, Oregon; and Jara Dee, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Croft, Walla Walla. Later in the day, Dean Gerstel, son of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Gerstel, was baptized by the pastor.

Saturday, February 1, the pastors and counselors of Spokane District held a workshop at the church in Walla Walla, and a dinner was served by the women at the conclusion of the meeting. Wednesday, February 12, prior to prayer meeting, Dean Gerstel was confirmed by Elders A. M. Crownover and Carlos Crownover of Richland. Thursday, February 13, a workshop was held for the district women, with the Walla Walla Branch as host. Mrs. H. C. Hight, district leader, was in charge. An evening of instruction on church school education was given by Elder H. C. Hight on Tuesday, February 25. March 8 and 9, several carloads of Saints drove to Richland for the spring conference of the Spokane District.

The main point of interest for the branch was the ordination service held March 18 in which the pastor, Frank S. Wilcox, was ordained to the office of elder by Elders Paul Crinzi and A. M. Crownover.

In addition to the speakers already mentioned, the members were privileged to hear Elders Wayne Rodgers, H. E. Chapman, Del Lawrence, James Lorenzen, Marvin Cox, and Robert Bailey.—Reported by ELAINE SARGENT

Recent Priesthood Approvals

JOPLIN, MISSOURI.—The Joplin District semiannual conference met March 30 at the church.

Eighty young people gathered March 29 for a hike and banquet. On March 30 the young people met in the lower auditorium and the adults in the main auditorium for a fellowship service. The theme was "The Challenge to Testify of a Risen Lord." During this service a part of the cantata which was to be presented by the choir at 1:30 was presented, with Mrs. Kenneth Cochran directing and Mrs. Truman Siler accompanying on the organ. At the close of the session, Carthage Church School

Director Carl Hobb read the poem "Sermons We See."

During the business session, several men were approved for ordination. Those approved for elders were Benjamin Goetle, Floyd Nichol, Fred Clifford Kyser, Robert E. Lynch, and Lloyd Elliot.

Approved for priests were Arthur Brooks and Harold Jackson.

Deacons approved were Alvie Karlstrom and Robert Smith.

Apostle D. Blair Jensen preached at the eleven o'clock hour. The program was to commemorate Palm and Easter Sundays.—Reported by RACHEL TROYER

Organize Glennville Mission

WICHITA, KANSAS.—The first day of January the Wichita Saints in the area south met together for their first prayer service in the mission building, located at 4628 South Seneca. They came fasting and praying for the Lord's blessings on the venture they were undertaking.

On January 5, a group from the Wichita Branch met in the mission building to organize the Glennville mission. Branch President William E. Landers was in charge, with Counselors Ralston Jennings and Francis Vickery assisting. District President C. R. Richards and District Missionary James Menzies were also present.

Although the mission building is still undergoing alteration and remodeling, the sanctuary now seats approximately eighty. There are four classrooms, a kitchen, and rest rooms.

James Menzies gave the first of a series of five Sunday evening missionary sermons. Regular Sunday services were started January 12, with Pastor Kenneth Ward presenting the morning ministry.

District conference was held with the Central Wichita Branch March 1-2. Brother Richards was in charge. Apostle D. Blair Jensen gave the Sunday morning sermon. Donald Manuel gave the evening sermon.

During the winter months, family nights were held.—Reported by EVALINA L. GUSTIN

Missionary Convention

ZENITH, ILLINOIS.—Seventy Cecil Robins, R. H. Ellis, Sam Anderson, and Dale Warren were in charge of the missionary convention at Brush Creek March 15-16.

A committee meeting of the Salem Crusade was held Sunday afternoon. Six branches participated in the crusade, held at Salem, Illinois, beginning April 6. Seventy Bill Guthrie was the speaker.—Reported by PANSY FATHEREE

Progress on Church Building

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO.—For the church year, the branch has retained Elder Harold N. Schneebeck as pastor and Martha Downs as church school director. There are eleven church school teachers and seventeen other officers for church and church schools.

In September, 1956, work was started on the new church, with members and friends doing much of the work. The main chapel will soon be ready. Ten have been baptized in the new font.

District President Ward A. Hougas has ministered to the group, as have his counselors. District Missionary John F. Jordan has also visited.

Zion's League and junior League are well attended, and the women are active.

Gerald Ford has been ordained to the office of deacon.—Reported by MYRTLE R. STEPHENSON

Branch Name Change

DESELM, ILLINOIS.—Mr. and Mrs. William Huffman, Donna Fuller, and Linda Rogers of Deselm, and Jerald Newton and Sherrie Chobar of Kankakee were baptized at Aurora Branch on February 23. Participating elders were James Elledge and Russell Rogers. In later confirmation services, Elders Elledge and Rogers, and Elders Harvey Grice and Earl Rogers confirmed the members.

Recent speakers have been Elder Arnold J. Settles of Aurora Branch, Brother W. B. Gray, district missionary co-ordinator, who spoke to the Beatrice Society, and by means of tape-recorder, Apostle Maurice Draper. Seventy George Njeim held a five-day missionary series in February.

Mrs. Jerald Newton has been appointed chairman of the greeting card project, and Mrs. Ethel Jackson of the dishcloth project for the Beatrice Society.

Deselm Branch will soon be known as Kankakee Branch, since the recent move into a new church home in the city of Kankakee. After weeks of preparation, and much work yet to be accomplished, the first service in town was held Easter Sunday. Patriarch John R. Grice was the speaker. In a sacrament of blessing service held that day, Elders Russell Rogers and Harvey Grice blessed William Albert and David Lee, sons of the William Huffmans of Deselm; and Jodi Renee, daughter of the Jack Cavitts, who were home from Graceland College in Lamoni.—Reported by BONITA PEMENT

Honor Audentia Anderson

OMAHA, NEBRASKA.—On March 29, Omaha Central held a "five-dollar dinner" which netted $600 to be applied to the building fund. This was sponsored by the women's department.

One feature of the program was a "This Is Your Life," honoring Audentia Anderson, granddaughter of Joseph Smith the Prophet. The mystery guest was her brother, President Israel A. Smith. His surprise appearance helped make the evening a huge success. Others of her family included her daughter Rogene, and husband Norman Prucha, from Lincoln, Nebraska; her granddaughter Claire Prucha from Graceland College, and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Oscar Anderson, from Des Moines, Iowa.

Items of her life included the writing of hymns, two of which were sung by the congregation, and research for the book "Ancestry and Posterity of Joseph Smith and Emma Hale." Other features mentioned her activities as piano teacher, pastor's wife, choir leader, church school teacher, author, club woman, and perhaps her most outstanding contribution, the editing of her father's memoirs. Audentia is the daughter of one prophet and the sister of two.

Champion Basketball Team

Student nurses at the "San" participated in the YMCA Girls League No. 1, which consisted of five basketball teams. The tournament was two rounds, making a total of eight games. Though some of the games were nip and tuck, "San" students won all eight. Captain Betty Burkhead led the scoring, with Carolyn Schneider and Lucretia Swetnam also helping chalk up a winning score. Other points were made by Barbara Thoman, Shirley Worthington, and Margaret Gohring, relief forwards. Mildred Carter, Maurcen Weable, and Pat Hansen formed the defense. Pat Determan, Betty Worthington, Zada Pement, and Margaret Gohring were relief guards. Alice Dyer and Barbara Phelps helped as time and score keepers. Coached by Mrs. M. E. Camp, medical supervisor, and transported by Margaret Walker, nursing instructor, and Marilyn Van Trump, pharmacist, cheered on by Mrs. Barbara Bloom, medical head nurse, and other members of the faculty and student body, the "San" team carried off top honors and a beautiful trophy.

Following the league series was the play-off between the two best teams in YMCA Girls Leagues No. 1 and No. 2. Again the "San" players were undefeated, bringing home an even larger trophy after winning two fast-moving games.

WORD TROUBLE

Little Carol Ann was fascinated with words, but often attempted to read beyond her depth. This happened when she attempted to read her grandmother's marriage certificate to her younger sister. "United in holy macaroni . . ." was as far as she got before the adult laughter interrupted.

TIPS FOR SPRING PLANTING

First, plant five rows of peas: preparedness, promptness, perseverance, politeness, and prayer.

Next to them plant three rows of squash: squash gossip, squash criticism, squash indifference.

Then five rows of lettuce: let us be faithful; let us be unselfish; let us be loyal; let us love one another; and let us be truthful.

No garden is complete without turnips: turn up for church; turn up with a smile; turn up with a new idea; turn up with real determination.

WIDER VIEW

In a sermon at the close of Conference, Seventy Howard Fisher told of bringing in the cattle on the ranch where he grew up.

He said that before he started after them, he would climb to the top of the windmill to locate them and see in which direction they would have to go to find them.

With another summer approaching with opportunities for camps and reunion, it is time for us to climb our personal windmills. By doing this we can align ourselves with God before we set out to do his work.

The PRESIDENT Speaks to PARENTS

IN ESTABLISHING Stride magazine for youth, very serious consideration was given to all aspects of the needs of youth and of the church work. It was our belief that church members should support this publication as a helpful instrument for the training of future leaders and workers for the church.

The need still exists. Stride has proved its value and serves our young people as no other periodical can.

For this and other reasons, it is most desirable and necessary that every young person should have an opportunity to read Stride. Every home with young people should have a subscription. The magazine helps the young to keep in touch with the church and with each other.

The parents of young people have a responsibility to see that they receive and read the magazine. Many of the young are in school and have very low incomes if any. They cannot afford to subscribe in many cases. If they are to have the advantages of the publication, parents should check and renew subscriptions for them.

Stride is a good and worthy present for any young person. Since promotions and graduations will soon be here, this is a good time of year to make the gift.

May we also point out that pastors, youth leaders, and interested priesthood members will find it an important advantage to be informed of the magazine by a careful reading of the contents. It will be helpful to them.

Some of our best church talent and most consecrated leadership goes into the production of this youth magazine. It can serve its purpose only if it regularly reaches all of the young people wherever they are.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Every home with young people should have a subscription to "Stride." It helps the young to keep in touch with the church and with each other.

How the Church Work Goes On

Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.—I Corinthians 15: 58.

AT REGULAR INTERVALS, letters go out from the First Presidency to the district presidents and pastors of the church, calling attention to current trends and objectives in church work, helps and services available through the departments, special needs among the people, and other matters that arise in the general administrative work. At church headquarters there is a never-ceasing concern, a vigilance always active to discern special needs and problems as they arise and to meet them before they have developed too far. The welfare of the church and its people depends upon continuous communication and a willingness to work together for the common good.

In these times when many church people are subject to moves dictated by conditions of employment, military service, and professional necessity, it is more important than ever to emphasize keeping in contact with the church and its people. If you move, make it a point to look up the location of the nearest branch. Attend services, get acquainted with church officers, and find a place in local organization. You will find friends; they will give you important information, and everybody will be helped. Keep in touch.

LAST WEEK the old Bible gave up and simply fell to pieces. Thirty-eight years ago it was a gift, in student days, from one who has gone to his reward. It came into church service marked up and annotated. It wore out two covers. It accumulated extra references, underlinings in various colors, and bits of wisdom gained out of practical experience. The type is a little faded with the years, and the pages have acquired a faint yellow cast, like late afternoon sunshine.

It was an office mainstay. Many times a day it was used to verify a quotation. No date of retirement was set. When the covers fell off it could still be used. But when the back broke and the leaves slid out, a new book had to be bought. The new one is as much like the old one as possible. But it will have a lot to learn.

THE HARD PACE of modern work and living leaves its marks on the faces of the people. Young businessmen gray at the temples and show wrinkles around the eyes. The demands of occupations are intensive, the costs of a failure severe. Competition everywhere is sharp. Whoever gains success may be paying a heavy price for it.

Church work, too, is not free from the anxieties and tensions of the times. Young men mature rapidly in missionary work, and many of them age early. This is a part of their sacrifice for the work they have chosen to do. And the burdens they carry are shared by their families also.

In a world like this in which we live and work, it is important that we should have special consideration for each other. We should be compassionate that others may consider us in turn.

WHAT IS the motive power that keeps the work of the church going? It is the love of God. In all of our concern for meetings, staffs, organization, and equipment, let us never forget that. We need tools and supplies, of course. But none of them will do us any good unless we have the power of the Spirit, the love of God, and the love of people in our hearts.

It is a part of the Futilitarian System to become absorbed in gadgets and things. Our primary concern is and always will be with the Spirit. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts."—Zechariah 4: 6.

With the Spirit all mechanical aids can be put to good and effective use. Without it they are useless.

General Conference Delegations

We have felt it important to reprint the following notice concerning the election of delegates to General Conference because of the number of district conferences that are now being held. (This notice was published on December 16, 1957.)

The Rules of Order (No. 23) provides that "stakes and districts are authorized to appoint, at their conference or business meeting next preceding the sitting of General Conference, delegates to General Conference who shall be entitled to represent said stake or district," and that "the enrollment upon which representation at General Conference shall be determined for the various missions, stakes, and districts, and for the branches in unorganized territory shall be the total membership thereof as indicated by the monthly balance in the office of the Department of Statistics two weeks prior to the date of the conference at which delegates ought to be elected" (Rules of Order, No. 24).

Rather a high proportion of our districts usually hold their conferences in September or October. If the selection of delegates is delayed beyond September 1, our experience would indicate that the Credentials Committee will have considerable difficulty in completing its work in time for the opening of General Conference on October 5, 1958. We therefore suggest that in stakes and districts where conferences would normally be held after September 1, 1958, these conferences be scheduled prior to that date or, if this is not advisable, that special conferences be held prior to that date for the specific purpose of selecting conference delegates.

The General Conference Credentials Committee will consist of Elders Merle P. Guthrie and Fred

O. Davies. Correspondence should be directed to Brother Guthrie at the Department of Statistics, Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

ISRAEL A. SMITH
President

New District President For Southern Indiana

Elder Chester B. Metcalf has tendered his resignation as president of the Southern Indiana District effective May 10, 1958, because of the availability of an appointee. After consultation with Apostle Gleazer, we are appointing Elder Howard S. Sheehy as president of the Southern Indiana District subject to the action of the next district conference.

We would like to express our sincere appreciation for the many years of service which Brother Metcalf has given as district president as well as for the fine support which the Saints have given him.

We ask for Brother Sheehy the continued prayers and co-operation of the Saints of the district as he assumes his duties as district president.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From a column by Pastor Alma C. Andrews of Omaha, Nebraska, in the Omaha Branch Newspaper, "Ray-O-Lite":

Saturday night of last week saw the branch participate in a "$5.00" dinner at the church. This was sponsored by the women's department of the branch and most commendably carried to a very successful conclusion. The figures are not in yet but should reveal a net profit close to five hundred dollars. Sister Lora Adams and her corps of workers are credited for a job well done. It may well be true that the greatest values were social and in the department members working together.

One feature of the evening was "This Is Your Life" in which Sister Audentia Anderson was the honored guest. A high light was the appearance of the mystery guest, President Israel A. Smith, brother to Sister Anderson. President Smith gave the sermon at the the eleven o'clock service on Sunday morning.

The following from Mrs. Earl Moore, Fort Worth, Texas:

I am the leader of women for Central Texas District. One of the most important projects of the women's department is the furnishing of at least one hostess (depending upon the size of the congregation) who wears a hostess badge and greets and welcomes everyone, member or visitor, who enters the church. She is selected carefully. She must be neat and have the personality necessary for her position. She asks newcomers to sign the guest book and then makes it her business to see that they are introduced to the pastor and as many members as possible.

We do considerable traveling. We carry a church directory, and when at all possible we visit branches in the towns we are touring. I have yet to feel the "cold shoulder." In fact I wish I had time to relate some of the experiences we have had in "far away places." It confirms to me that truly we are one big happy family—the family of God.

*If we desire spiritual gifts enough to prepare for their expression
God will grant them to us
according to our need*

By Richard M. Reid

Desire Spiritual Gifts

Follow after charity, and desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy.—I Corinthians 14: 1.

"God speaks today" has been the declaration made by the Restoration movement from its beginning. Many parts of our church history read like the book of Acts of the New Testament. Not only has the manifestation of spiritual gifts over the years rendered a great ministry to the church and its members, but their inclusion as a vital part of the church—and therefore as an important factor in our message—has assisted greatly in evangelism. It is satisfying today to talk to members of other churches and other movements who are slowly realizing the need for and the desirability of direct communion with God through the channels of the gifts of the gospel.

Although today we seek to emphasize the importance of these gifts as strongly as ever, there are some Saints who feel that the frequency and power of the gifts received has lessened over the past few years. Many older Saints state that in their childhood they remember many more gifts being manifested than they see in evidence today. Others, after reading the history of the church in the early days of the Restoration, have concluded that the experiences of our day are not comparable. If these charges are true, then there is great cause for alarm, for the loss of spiritual gifts is one of the surest signs of apostasy. It would indicate a growing lack of faith which would ultimately lead to spiritual degeneration. The Book of Mormon prophet, Moroni, made this clear in his writings: "And now I speak unto all the ends of the earth, that if the day cometh that the power and gifts of God shall be done away among you, it shall be because of unbelief."—Moroni 10: 18.

A Matter of Record

Actually there has been no great lessening of the frequency or power of spiritual manifestations in the church as some suppose. The impression can easily be corrected by looking back to those earlier years and making comparison to the present time. The Restoration took place in a day of great religious emotionalism. One need only read of the revivals of that day in which people got the "shakes," or exhibited other physical phenomena attributed to visitations of the spirit, to realize that spiritual experiences were often desired as ends in themselves rather than as means to greater ends as we understand them now. This general influence would naturally have some effect within the restored church. Because of a preoccupation with spiritual gifts the early Saints took great pains to record their occurrence. Today these blessings are received and appreciated but seldom recorded unless they are of such a nature as to benefit the whole church.

This absorption with spiritual gifts also undoubtedly caused many things to be classified as manifestations of the spirit that were merely the normal expressions of life and mind. Many people up to a few years ago (and some today) tended to attach supernatural significance to every event in their lives. Today, through the work of psychologists and psychiatrists, we have come to recognize the power of suggestion and the action of hysteria upon the mind. We now realize that many dreams are wish fulfillments, whereas formerly many thought almost every dream was of a spiritual nature. So today a better distinction is made between spiritual and natural occurrences and fewer experiences are erroneously reported as spiritual manifestations.

High Lights in History

Beyond this, both the memory and written record of past events always embrace the outstanding or unusual while minimizing or ignoring the ordinary or routine. Thus the recollections of older Saints as well as the written accounts of earlier days overlook the usual and thereby concentrate together the extraordinary, making it appear from a chronological distance that these events were in closer proximity than they actually were.

What member of the church has not thrilled to the story of the experience of J. J. Cornish in the baptismal service where the light descended from heaven to illuminate the scene. Many other outstanding manifestations of spiritual power accompanied the ministry of this good man. They have been recorded and many times repeated by word of mouth until one could gain the impression that his every act and utterance was attested by some unusual happening. When you read Brother Cornish's autobiography, however, you find that these events were the high points of his ministry; in between these experiences was much labor that, while fruitful, was ordinary and routine.

The Need Remains

While it is true that there is no serious diminishing of spiritual gifts in the church, it is also true that in many places the Saints are not receiving these blessings as they could and should. There are many adult Saints who have never witnessed the expression of a gift. There are far too many branches where the gifts are seldom, or never, received. Often you find people looking forward to reunions, conferences, and institutes in anticipation of a "spiritual feast" but with no similar expectations for the services in their own branch or mission.

Of course we should not make the manifestation of spiritual gifts our primary objective in the services of the church, but we should be aware of the fact that the receiving of genuine gifts is an indication of spiritual alertness and receptivity in congregations as well as individuals. There is always the danger of false gifts, and because of this some have resisted the thought or possibility of a real manifestation; but remember, the Scriptures admonish us to "Quench not the Spirit. Despise not prophesying" (I Thessalonians 5: 19, 20), and "Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy" (I Corinthians 14: 1). This certainly indicates the desire of God to reveal himself to us and should assure us that the gift of discernment will also be in our midst to protect us from error when we are sincere and humble.

Importance of Preparation

Truly we need the help, strength, and guidance that comes from these contacts with the Holy Spirit. They play an important part in our growth and development spiritually, they sustain us in times of doubt and discouragement. Of course we cannot demand or unwisely petition for a gift because these are gifts, given freely and graciously by God out of his love and wisdom according to the condition or need of those receiving. We can, however, prepare and condition ourselves to be ready and receptive to that which God might desire to reveal by any means or through any channel. There are several things we can do as individuals and congregations to bring about favorable circumstances for the receiving of gifts.

One of the most important things to do is to make preparation for church services. It has been wisely stated that "you cannot rush into the presence of God." To approach a service in a spirit of anger, lightness, or boisterousness makes it very difficult to attune to the spirit of worship. Those congregations that insist on talking and laughing prior to services instead of quietly meditating are raising barriers to worship that take precious time after the opening of the service to overcome. Those who are ready to worship are more easily reached by God and better able to receive his gifts.

Participation

Another factor in becoming receptive to God's Spirit is participation in the service. Services are designed to bring about a unity of mind and heart through prayers, Scripture readings, hymns, and other activities in which the congregation follows and participates. Those who are inattentive to prayers or Scriptures, those who do not enter into the singing of hymns, are not likely to achieve a oneness with the others present. Letting one's mind dwell upon problems, plans, or ideas that have nothing to do with the service prevents effective participation and prohibits unity. The promise is "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matthew 18: 20). But the condition is that they must agree (Matthew 18: 19). The only way to find agreement is by participation and attention in a service.

Two Requirements

For God to be able to use priesthood or Saints as instruments from the expression of the gifts, two conditions must be fulfilled. First, the individual must be usable and, second, the congregation must be willing to receive through him what God would extend. So there is a responsibility, especially upon the priesthood, to develop a capacity and ability to receive and express spiritual insight.

The second condition, however, is just as important and much more difficult to fulfill. Our local ministers labor under a handicap at times by being too intimately acquainted with the people they serve. People seemingly never expect anything outstanding from those whom they know well. When Jesus entered into his own country, he was not accepted as he had been in other places. The people of Galilee asked, "Is not this the carpenter's son?" They knew his family and him, so they asked, "Whence then hath this man all these things?" The significant fact is that "He did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief" (Matthew 13: 54-58). The same limitation is often placed upon our local ministers today. The Saints take them for granted and are not disposed to receive spiritual things by them. This renders it difficult or impossible for God to use them as instruments of expression.

We have been told, "If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers; and if they do not, they can not expect the riches of gifts and the blessings of direction" (Doctrine and Covenants 125: 14). If we would receive the gifts of God we should not only be willing to accept the ministry of our local priesthood, but also pray earnestly for these men that they might have the strength and capacity to render this type of ministry.

The Sense of Expectancy

Finally, the most important thing for us to do to create a favorable atmosphere for the expression of the gifts is to attend every service and approach every ordinance with a sense of expectancy. Jesus made it clear on numerous occasions that the power of the Spirit is received through faith. Faith leads to expectancy. Without an expectant attitude on our part, it would be useless for God to bestow his gifts upon us. "For what doth it profit a man if a gift is bestowed upon him, and he receive not the gift? Behold, he rejoices not in that which is given unto him, neither rejoices in him who is the giver of the gift" (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 7). Our sensitivity and alertness to spiritual things are vital factors in making the manifestation of the gifts possible among us. It is certain that if we "desire spiritual gifts" enough to prepare for their expression among us, God will grant them in great abundance according to our need.

The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital

A Statement by the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric

FUNDS FROM FOUR major sources are being used to finance the Sanitarium building project now nearing completion. Some funds were on hand from General Conference appropriations when an unexpected gift of $97,000.00 from the Ford Foundation brought the dream of a new wing a little closer. An additional $75,000.00 was appropriated at the 1956 General Conference. An application for Hill-Burton (Federal and State) funds proved successful, and a group of leading citizens of the community undertook the tremendous task of raising the $300,000.00 needed to meet the cost of the proposed $900,000.00 expansion and remodeling project. The use of these funds from the community, government, and Ford Foundation has resulted in questions being raised concerning the nature of the Sanitarium Corporation and its relationship to the church.

One of the questions most frequently raised by Independence citizens, and others, is this: "Who owns the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital?" The answer: "The title of the property is held by the Hospital Corporation. And the administration of the Hospital is vested in the Board of Trustees. The sponsoring organization is the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints."

Since the control of the institution is in the hands of the Board of Trustees, the membership of the board is of interest to those who have raised the question as to the status of the Sanitarium. The Board of Trustees includes the members of the First Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric of the church, and the Church Physician, as follows: Israel A. Smith, chairman; F. Henry Edwards, vice-chairman; G. L. DeLapp, secretary; H. L. Livingston, treasurer; W. Wallace Smith, W. N. Johnson, Dr. Charles F. Grabske, Sr., Robert P. Weatherford, Jr.,* and William J. Randall. Mayor Weatherford* is an ex-officio member of the Board as Mayor of the City of Independence; Judge Randall is an ex-officio member as

Incorporation, September 1909

The original articles of incorporation of the Independence Sanitarium were adopted in accordance with a resolution passed by the General Conference April 10, 1907. The corporation was organized September 24, 1909; the institution was thus incorporated in harmony with the laws of the state of Missouri before the Sanitarium opened its doors to patients.

The trustees of the original incorporation were Frederick M. Smith, E. L. Kelley, Joseph Luff, George H. Hilliard, George E. Harrington, Roderick May, and Ellis Short.

On April 20, 1920, the General Conference adopted a recommendation of the First Presidency which established an ex-officio board of seven trustees as the First Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric, and the Church Physician.

Ten years later on April 16, 1930, the General Conference again took action providing for the amendment of the Articles of Incorporation of the Independence Sanitarium in order to provide for its expansion and to erect new buildings. At this time the community was raising funds to assist in the erection of the new Sanitarium building, and the Board membership was increased from seven to nine by the addition of the "Judge of the County Court of Jackson County from the Eastern Division thereof and the Mayor of the City of Independence, Jackson County, Independence, Missouri." This is set forth in specific detail in the present articles of incorporation. No changes have been made in the articles of incorporation since that time other than changes in the ex-officio personnel of the Board.

It is interesting to note in reading these articles of incorporation that the name was changed at this time to "Independence Sanitarium and Hospital." Incorporated for a ninety-nine-year term, the corporation was to have no capital stock and to be operated as a benevolent corporation and not for profit. The hospital was to be nonsectarian and patients received and treated without regard to religion or nationality. The purposes of the corporation were set forth as establishment of a place of refuge and help for the sick and afflicted; to erect, establish, own, support, and maintain in the City of Independence, Missouri, a hospital or hospitals, where patients may be treated and nursed with or without pay or remuneration, under such regulations and conditions as the Board of Trustees may prescribe; to establish and maintain a home or homes for nurses, also a training school or schools for nurses, under such regulations and conditions as may be prescribed from time to time by the Board of Trustees.

Under these broad powers the corporation is empowered to receive funds by gifts, bequests, public subscription, governmental grants, or other legal means to carry forward the work of the institution.

For thirty-eight years the members of the First Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric, and the Church Physician have been Board members as provided for in the appropriate General Conference action, thus providing the closest possible relationship between the sponsoring church and the church hospital. These seven can be removed from office and new members take their places only by due process of church legislation. When changes are made in these church offices, the new incumbents find immediately that they are charged with a major responsibility as members of the Board of Trustees of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. All Board members spend considerable time and energy in serving the Hospital and School of Nursing, and they serve without remuneration.

The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital is thus operated under the direction of a controlling authority composed principally of church members. It is operated for the benefit of church people and also for the benefit of the people of Independence and adjacent areas, whatever the need may be. There are good reasons for this dual purpose, which have developed from the very beginning of its history. From the beginning also it had the purpose of providing both medical service and an atmosphere of good spiritual influence.

Serving the community as well as the church through the medical and spiritual ministry of the Sanitarium is one of the finest things we have done. Great good has come of it. The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital is still, as in the beginning, one of our church institutions; it is also an institution of service and benefit to the community, a friendly and helpful link with the greater society.

The Ministry of Healing

Part II

Methods and Procedures Used by Jesus

Naturally, those who are concerned with the ministry of healing would wish to use acceptable methods, established upon precedent. The tendency is to adopt one formal ritual which would be recognized as correct and to eliminate all others. There is something to be learned from the procedures of Jesus, but perhaps not what we might expect. Before making any general observation, let us consider the healing ministry of Jesus in cases where it has been described for us.

1. The Healing Power of Faith

In some of his healings Jesus laid emphasis upon the importance of faith in the sick person.

In Matthew 9: 33-37 he asked the two blind men who cried to him for help, "Believe ye that I am able to do this?" They replied, "Yea, Lord." In healing them he declared, "According to your faith, be it unto you."

He said to the woman who was healed of an issue of blood, "Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole" (Mark 5: 21-26). Healing blind Bartimaeus, he also said, "Thy faith hath made thee whole" (Mark 10: 46-54).

We may be sure that in these and similar cases, faith was operating, but we may also be of the opinion that it was not the only power involved, as we consider other cases.

2. Healing by Command

The cases in which Jesus healed simply by word of command, as one who had authority, are numerous, in fact they give us the larger number of instances of healing that have been described in any detail.

In healing the demoniac in the synagogue, related in Mark 1: 21-24, Jesus simply used the word of command, saying, "Hold thy peace, and come out of him." When the palsied man was let down through the roof (Mark 2: 3-9) on a stretcher, simply to gain access to Jesus through the crowd, Jesus merely said, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." When the scribes objected to his forgiving sins, he asked them what difference it made. Was it any easier to say, "Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk"?

In the country of the Gadarenes, Jesus was confronted by the demoniac who lived among the tombs, possessed by the "Legion" of evil spirits, to whom he said, "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit" (Mark 5: 1-5).

In healing the daughter of Jairus, who was reported during the interview to have died, Jesus went to the house and said, "Damsel, I say unto thee, arise" (Mark 5: 19, 20, 27-35).

The demoniac child was also healed by a command. In freeing him of the possessing spirit, Christ, said, "I charge thee to come out of him, and enter no more into him" (Mark 9: 15-26).

The son of the widow at Nain was raised by command, "Young man, I say unto thee, arise" (Luke 7: 11-16).

On the way through Samaria and Galilee, Jesus healed ten lepers simply by telling them, "Go, shew yourselves unto the priests" (Luke 17: 12-19). It seems possible that the healing was accomplished by the silent operation of mind and spirit, for we are told that "as they went, they were cleansed."

Another case in which a command was given, apparently after the healing had been determined, was that of the son of the nobleman at Capernaum. Jesus said, "Go thy way; thy son liveth" (John 4: 48-55).

Jesus healed the chronic invalid at the pool of Bethesda by saying to him, "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk" (John 5: 1-16). To blind Bartimaeus he said, "Go thy way" (Mark 10: 46-54).

Jesus raised Lazarus from death, in part by word of command: "Lazarus, come forth" (John 11: 43).

In these twenty-three individual healings (ten persons in one group) Jesus did not touch the patients in any way, except in one instance, where, after the healing—the boy victim of a demoniac possession—he took the unconscious child by the hand and lifted him up.

3. Taking by the Hand

The instance just cited, in which Jesus took the boy by the hand is similar to another healing, when he took Simon's wife's mother by the hand, who was in bed with a fever (Mark 1: 27, 28).

4. Healing by Touch

In healing the two blind men, Jesus touched their eyes (Matthew 9: 33-35).

Jesus healed the leper who came to him, asking for help: "And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand, and touched him" (Mark 1: 36-40).

Jesus touched the ear that had been struck with a sword by one of his followers, who attacked the servant of the high priest. It was restored (Luke 22: 49-51).

5. Healing by the Touch of the Sick One

The woman hemophiliac was healed by a touch of her hand on the garment of Jesus. She took the initiative. She hoped to escape attention, but this was not to be (Mark 5: 21-26).

6. Action Required of the Afflicted

The man with a withered hand was commanded, "Stretch forth thy hand" (Mark 3: 1-6). This is a reminder of the greater command given to Naaman by Elisha.

7. Anointing

There is no indication found in the Bible that Jesus ever used oil for anointing or in any way connected with the healing of the sick. However, there were occasions when he anointed in the act of healing.

In healing the deaf man with an impediment in his speech, Jesus touched the man's tongue with saliva (Mark 7: 31-36). In healing the blind man at Bethsaida, he used saliva in anointing the eyes (Mark 8: 23-27).

In healing a man blind from his birth, Jesus used saliva to make a clay with which he anointed the eyes (John 9: 1-3, 6, 7). Then he directed the man to go wash in the pool of Siloam.

8. Laying on of Hands

In healing a deaf man with a speech impediment, Jesus put his fingers into the man's ears. While this is not, apparently, the laying on of hands we recognize today, it is one of the applications of the principle (Mark 7: 31-36).

In healing the blind man at Bethsaida, Jesus laid hands upon the man, who experienced a partial recovery. Then Jesus laid hands upon him again, touching his eyes, which brought a complete restoration of sight (Mark 8: 23-27).

In healing the woman who was bent, Jesus laid hands upon her (Luke 13: 11-17).

9. Healing Associated with Forgiveness of Sins

Jesus identified healing with the forgiveness of sins in healing the man of Capernaum afflicted with palsy (Mark 2: 3-9). He also recognized the case of identification of affliction with sin when he healed the invalid at the pool of Bethesda, saying, "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee" (John 5: 14).

10. No Indication of Method

In a number of cases, the accounts left to us do not include details of what method of action was used in effecting the healing. Some of such cases are found in Matthew 9: 38-40, 12: 18; Luke 7: 1-10, 14: 1-4.

11. Healing at a Distance

Jesus effected some healings at a distance, without going to visit those afflicted. This occurred when others came in their behalf. The daughter of the Greek Syrophenician woman was healed in this way. (Mark 7: 24-29). He also healed the son of the nobleman of Cana, in Galilee, at a distance (John 4: 48-55).

12. With Fasting and Prayer

In the case of the demoniac child, the disciples were able to do nothing to effect relief. Jesus freed the child and healed him. Afterward, the disciples asked him why they could not heal the boy. Speaking of the stubborn evil spirit involved, Jesus said, "This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting" (Mark 9: 15-26). Jesus probably prayed in connection with this healing, but the account does not say so.

13. The Use of Prayer

The raising of Lazarus was a test of the power in Jesus, and it was also regarded by him as a test and a demonstration of this authority, as indicated in verse 4. He prayed to God before commanding Lazarus to come out of the tomb (John 11: 1-44).

14. Healing a Nonmember

Jesus would have declined to heal the daughter of the Greek Syrophenician woman, but she insisted, and the blessing was received. This woman was in the status of a nonmember of the church. A racial distinction was also involved.

The centurion who desired Jesus to heal his servant may not have been a "member" of the group, though those who pled for him asserted that he had been a staunch and liberal friend (Luke 7: 1-10).

15. Transfer of Spiritual Power

The case of the healing of the woman of her issue of blood has an interesting and important aspect. Here was a healing that Jesus had not willed, but when it was done he felt the transfer of spiritual power when he said, "Who touched my clothes?" He immediately knew "in himself that virtue had gone out of him"—that is, had been transferred from him to her. And she, too, was aware of it, for "she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague" (Mark 5: 21-26).

This may help us to understand something very important.

Healing Based upon Spiritual Power

The great variety of forms and actions used by Jesus may serve to indicate that the form of the ceremony was not fixed and indeed was not the important element in the healing. If a specific form had been important, Jesus would have followed it.

The important fact was that the divine power was in Jesus, and he was able to use it to heal. It was in him ready to work. He did not always have to pray for it, though he did at least once.

It seems apparent that the effective action in healings by Jesus was the silent and invisible movement in power of the mind and spirit of the Master.

We should be aware that even the most righteous and spiritual of men could not hope always to operate in the way Jesus did. However, he did say to his disciples: "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do" (John 14: 12).

What exactly was intended to be conveyed in that promise could only be conjectured. If men have surpassed Jesus in the spiritual power that is the key to healing, it has not been apparent in the history of events from his time to ours. It would be presumptuous indeed for any person to think or say that he could do greater works than Jesus did. The humility that must accompany righteousness and service would deter any discerning mind and spirit from such presumption.

How to Organize a Missionary Crusade

By Al M. Pelletier, Jr.

Introduction

An essential in any successful missionary experience is proper organization. Many series which might have been successful have failed because of insufficient preparation and lack of evangelistic zeal and optimism. Since the Lord informs us that the "hastening time is upon us" we should be dedicated to making all of our missionary opportunities count for the best. This is especially true since there is such a shortage of workers. Our task is to enlist our workers for the greatest effectiveness and to win a larger number of more devoted workers. This will demand the pooling of ideas and the development of new or more efficient methods of evangelism.

Perhaps not all the methods of evangelism have been discovered or tried out. We need to be aware of numerous methods and ways already at our disposal: cottage meetings, tracting, publicity and public relations campaigns, personal friendship contacts, radio, television, series preaching, crusades (which is a series involving two or more congregations), or a combination of a number of these methods and approaches. This outline is concerned with crusade or larger series organization, although many of these suggestions may be applied to organizing such other types of series as personnel and facilities are available. It will take hard work and sacrifice, but then it should. We are concerned with the souls of people whom we wish to win since we believe our message to be true and essential for all mankind.

I. Attitudes

A. Faith and Optimism

If any evangelistic endeavor is to be successful, a program that is imbued with a tremendous and growing faith must be launched. Greater methods to obtain greater results must be explored. Far too many workers settle into a rut, fearful of attempting something new. It will take faith to expand our methods into greater workability. In a similar vein, the methods presented here should be mere suggestions leading us to discover even greater ones. It will take faith to move in the direction of the unknown.

Some may have a dream or an experience wherein the Lord informs them how many are to be baptized at the end of a series, but most of us have to plod along, giving it all we have and trusting the Lord for the increase which only he can give. If we have visions of winning two or three we will usually organize a small unadvertised program. If we have visions of winning thirty or forty we will organize a larger, well-prepared, well-publicized campaign. We generally organize in proportion to our vision of expectations. It isn't that two or three are not important; they are. But thirty or forty are even more important.

Launching such a program will take a great deal of optimism. We must not be easily discouraged or dissuaded. Certainly we must quicken our pace in winning people to this great restored church. These other organizations we have termed the "churches of men" will not wait for us. Why should the churches of men be more successful than the Church of Jesus Christ? If we believe the church was destined to remain small, we should read again of the winning of three thousand (Acts 2: 41), the winning of about five thousand (Acts 4: 4), the baptizing of many Corinthians (Acts 18: 8), and our own growth in church history during our first fourteen years. In all our teaching, preaching, testifying, visiting, and ministering let us labor for decisions. Ours must be a winning program. We labor to win some people to Christ through the church and baptism. We also labor to win some members to the principles of stewardship, more active participation, and evangelistic awakening. There are many decisions to be acquired.

B. A Willingness to Sacrifice

1. Time. "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom . . ." is still sound advice. Effective evangelism will include the proper budget of our time allowing for this type of work. If we are looking for excuses we can always say, "Oh, this isn't a good time of the year for a series here." While there may be times which are preferred over others, there is really no impossible time since God's interests in the souls of men do not vary with the seasons or the weather. Yet the time most nearly suited to the area should be sought.

2. Money. Earlier pioneers obtained greater results as they moved out in a deep faith. They sacrificed! To believe that only the missionaries sacrificed is a fallacy of our day. Without question our evangelism has been too economical. Some priesthood and members have even announced, "the gospel is free." We generally get nothing or very little when we invest nothing. Even very little is often more than is deserved. The larger the endeavor the more it will cost in time, planning, and money. All of us should first pay our tithes. God has devised the law so that we can keep it without distress. Tithing is not expensive nor is it sacrificial. It is a debt of only one tenth of our increase. A good steward will support the other facets and institutions of the church even at some sacrifice. If we really want results we must join the parade of sacrificing Saints and sponsor some larger missionary endeavor—rent a larger building, give away a lot of literature to those who will read, launch a wide advertising and publicity campaign using the varied means of communication (newspaper, radio, television, and posters). It will cost money, but it will work. We have seen it work in many areas.

3. Appointments. Far too many live with the philosophy that we attend church to support a short two weeks' program when we have no other social or community appointment or "obligation." The greatest community obligation we have is to build up a strong branch of the church. Surely, for two weeks many appointments could be canceled, especially an appointment at a lodge, or a bowling league, or at some other recreation or sport. It all depends on our attitude toward evangelism. Which is the most important? When we allow our obligations to church attendance and church support to match our obligations to these other interests we shall greatly increase our effectiveness. When the work of the kingdom is accepted as our first obligation then will our missionary opportunities and results pyramid.

C. Indefatigable Devotion

"Ye shall run and not be weary" is God's promise. Any major campaign to win souls must be approached with a knowledge that it will entail a lot of hard work, but we enter it determined not to grow weary. Greater devotion to the work of the kingdom will permit us to get greater results with the investment of ourselves. We need to make up our minds that nothing will pronounce failure upon our program. We must be deeply determined that it will work. We must believe God wants the world won, and through his grace inspiring our zeal we must go out to help win it.

D. Constant Contact with the Almighty

Through prayer, fasting, and faith we must be in constant contact with the heavenly Father, recognizing that he is far more interested in the work of the kingdom than we are. He has ideas and methods of evangelism we have never explored or imagined. If we keep in touch with him he will share some of these methods and, in our partnership with him, we may obtain the greatest results possible in the short period of time we have. When we recognize that this is God's work and that he has sent us out to build up the kingdom with the admonition, "The hastening time is upon us," we shall be working as we have never worked before in this generation. "The Lord has [even] yet more light and truth to break forth . . ."

E. Courage to Try Something New

For a pioneering church we certainly have a shortage of contemporary pioneers. Too many are routinized into every thing they do. Some of the methods we shall want to explore may be considered hairbrained, yet we'll never know that until we try them. We may discover some new methods that are most effective. Many of the methods that are working for other groups could be applied to presenting our evangelistic message. Nowhere can we find any divine light which breathes the suggestion that we have a monopoly on good methods. It seems that many of our methods are the reverse. One thing is certain, many unexplored methods could not be any worse than the ones we have used and some we are still using. Five thousand five hundred baptisms a year doesn't seem to be very much in a world of 2,650,000,000 people. God must be more interested in his children than that. The question is "Are we?" More die every year without hearing the gospel than we baptize. Does that motivate us? It should! We need the vision of Kipling's "Explorer," ". . . a voice, as bad as Conscience, rang . . . on one everlasting Whisper day and night repeated—so: 'Something lost . . . and waiting for you. . . . Go you there.' . . . So I went."

Indeed the attitudes with which we enter our preparations will greatly determine our planning and execution of that program. They will also greatly determine the extent of our effectiveness.

II. Build-up . . . Preparations

A. Meet with all priesthood members in the area selected for a crusade and get their support and suggestions after presenting plans and suggestions for such a major campaign.

B. Meet with all departmental leaders and get their full support and their agreement to cancel all meetings which conflict with this imminent activity. Convince them that this is basically an evangelistic church and that the full support of all departments is needed in this activity.

C. Select your workers and committees. Remember that there are times and places to train new personnel. This isn't it! A large number of nonmember friends who have never been introduced to the church will be in attendance. This is the time for the best you have in professional competency. Choose your best pianists, organists, soloists and other musicians, the best presiders, and on through every committee chairman.

D. Have at least two special prayer meetings dedicated to this endeavor in preparation. Urge the people to give themselves unstintingly to this project as well as praying for its success, prospects, and ministry. These meetings would be most effective if the branches which jointly sponsor this missionary program can meet together for them.

E. It might be advisable to organize a prayer clock. This has been done most effectively in a number of areas. A large clock is made on stiff paper or cardboard and divided like a pie into fifteen-minute sections with one color for morning and another for afternoon. Have people volunteer to take a fifteen-minute section until all the sections are used for the entire twenty-four-hour period. Then write their names in the corresponding sections. During these fifteen-minute sessions one may meditate, read the Scriptures, think of other prospects to invite, and pray for the winning of more people and the richer endowment of the Spirit. (It works. We have witnessed it!)

F. Prepare a news item introducing the plans for the crusade, dates, speaker, place of meetings, along with a brief history of the church. Most newspaper editors will be happy to print such an item, especially if a large endeavor is being planned and anticipated.

(Note: The initial meetings mentioned under A, B, and C should take place at least two months before the series is to commence. Three months would be even better. Less than six weeks would decrease the effectiveness of the program considerably. The prayer meetings suggested in D should take place at two- or three-week intervals with the first one at least six weeks before the opening of the crusade. The prayer clock mentioned in E should go into operation at least two weeks before the endeavor starts and should continue throughout the series. The news item mentioned in F should be published at least six weeks before the crusade and could effectively be followed by a weekly news item of plans, progress, or an advertisement.)

III. Workers and Committees

A. The following list of personnel seems to be a working minimum and should be selected when the crusade director meets with the workers as suggested under II-C.

1. Presider and Selector of Assistants

It is advisable to get the same man to preside at all the services so the visitors will become accustomed to the order of worship. The man who has this presiding assignment should also choose two men to offer the prayers each evening. These may be two different men each evening. This presider may be the crusade director himself, and in many ways this would be advisable.

2. Preacher

Select the missionary you desire for this endeavor unless you have one suggested to you. Of course he should be requested only with the knowledge of the missionary already assigned to your area and with the proper administrative concurrence. An aggressive preacher is essential in this type of endeavor.

3. Publicity Director

This person should prepare the folders (make certain to get enough. The first 500 are the most expensive; the next 2,000 do not cost much more than the first 500), store window posters, and other general publicity as is indicated in the following section under "Advertising and Publicity" in IV.

4. Music

- a. Selector of organists and pianists
- b. Selector of soloists, duos, choir direction, etc. (There should be some special music each night.)
- c. Hymn service conductor for nightly fifteen-minute hymn services. (Note: It is best to give these three different music assignments to three different people to get a better job done on each and to employ more workers.)

5. Tract Table Host and Distributor

- a. It would be advisable for the chairman of this ministry to select an assistant so two would be on hand each evening.
- b. Tracts should be given to every nonmember friend each evening. They should be related to that night's sermon.

6. Advertising Distributors

A chairman should be selected for each congregation represented in the crusade. He should be responsible for the distribution of advertising and publicity in his area. He may deputize others to share in distributing posters in store windows and folders and invitations in residential areas. Zion's Leaguers usually do a nice job in this distribution, the women's department may help, and of course, men and the priesthood could be used.

7. Transportation Committee Chairman

One should be selected for each congregation. His major responsibility is to see that transportation is available for all in his area who wish to attend. His phone number should therefore be printed on the advertising folders.

8. Director of Ushering

He should select a good number of ushers. At least four are needed for the smaller endeavors. In most cases there will be a need for ten or more. They should be on hand at least an hour before the meetings begin and should usher the people to their seats as they enter. A well-organized and friendly ushering service is a tremendous asset to such a missionary endeavor.

9. Business Manager or Treasurer

He should open a checking account and care for all the offerings of each evening and pay all expenses. Receipts for income tax purposes may be given to any who care to make such a contribution. Of course, a budget should be arranged with the workers, pastors, and crusade director.

10. Chairman of Floral Arrangements

Flowers should be renewed and rearranged from time to time and kept fresh and trimmed.

11. Telephone Committee

Women's departments may do a splendid job in organizing teams to call entire pages of people listed in the phone book with a brief and cordial invitation to attend the crusade. An offer to provide transportation could also be suggested. Generally the week before the endeavor begins is the best time to start this.

12. Director of Nursery

This person should select some competent workers (at least two for every night) to care for preschool children in a nursery provided each evening, and the director need not be in the nursery each evening as long as she has it organized.

13. Director of Children's Crusade

- a. If there are enough children between the ages of seven and eleven, it is a splendid idea to meet with them twice a week after school for songs, games, brief instruction, worship, and refreshments.
- b. Generally these meetings are held from 4:00 P.M. to 4:45 P.M.
- c. A number of baptisms have been acquired from the eight- to eleven-year-olds as a result of scheduling this activity in several places. In addition, it reaches the seven-year-olds who will be baptismal age within the year as well as tying these youngsters into an evangelistic program.

14. Attendance Recorder

It is important to get an accurate count each evening to compare with past and future endeavors. Be certain to get the names and addresses of every nonmember in attendance, but avoid doing it conspicuously (see "Friendship cards," V, E). The frequency of their attendance will serve as an indicator of their interest in the church.

15. Parking Lot Attendant

He should have competent assistants to avoid confusion or improper parking.

B. Each chairman or director of some committee should work with the crusade director to select other workers and assistants. This will co-ordinate all the work, as well as avoid the duplication of assignments and personnel.

C. After the previously mentioned workers have been selected, it is wise to have at least two classes with them to explain the organization and expectations of the crusade. The work of each committee may also be defined during these classes.

D. It is best to select these workers from the different branches sharing in this missionary activity so each congregation will be tied in through its workers. If there are sufficient workers, an assistant could be appointed to help each chairman.

IV. Advertising and Publicity

A. A preliminary news item as mentioned earlier under 11, F.

B. A generous supply of folders announcing dates, time, speaker, theme, and various phases of the series as well as the place of meeting. These should be mailed to every family on the branches' records and to every known prospect and friend. In addition some could be distributed from house to house in an area adjacent to the place of meeting. A supply of these also should be available for distribution at the meetings.

C. Newspaper advertising should be at least three columns by five inches to be effective. These and the folders ought to appear two weeks before the crusade and continue throughout the endeavor. A news ad should appear at least twice a week or even more frequently.

D. News items and sermon quotes are generally wanted by daily newspapers. Most newspapers will print these daily stories if you prepare them and type them neatly (double spaced). This is some of the best publicity we can acquire, and it is free. However, you should also purchase some advertising.

E. Preliminary letters to all members from the crusade director, district president, pastors, or missionary, or a letter signed by all of them is a must. A letter should go out to all members again during each week of the crusade to announce progress and continue to stimulate attendance.

F. Daily radio spot announcements are helpful. These can be purchased on a staggered basis so that they will be announced at different times of the day to reach a larger number of people. They should be forty-five seconds to a minute long to be effective.

G. Posters for store windows heavily distributed in the whole region represented by the various congregations of the endeavor are most effective.

H. Banners stretched across the street or across the building where the meetings are to be held have been used in some places. These are seen by many people.

I. Bumper banner stickers for automobiles are excellent. These should be about four or five inches wide by two to two-and-a-half feet long.

J. Posters like those used in store windows also may be placed in buses and streetcars in cities. The space for these is rented inexpensively.

K. Announcements dropped from airplanes also have been used effectively in some places.

L. Some communities have places over parking meters which can be rented for advertising. This is an effective means of advertising.

M. Television spot announcements also afford inexpensive coverage.

N. Telephone committees in action with personal invitations as mentioned earlier under Number III, 11 often get good results.

(Note: The information for invitation folders, posters, banners, bumper stickers, radio and television spot announcements, and leaflets should be pointed and brief. It is essential to include dates, time and place of meetings, nature of the endeavor, speaker, and facilities such as a nursery which are provided in the endeavor. Not much else is needed. The larger the advertising and the fewer the words the more it will be noticed and read. Color is also preferred over standard black and white.)

V. Essential Facilities

A. Building

It has been discovered in many experiments that a public building other than the church brings out a much larger and more diversified attendance. A larger public building immediately suggests greater optimism and in every experiment has revealed a much larger attendance.

B. Ushers

Have ushers on hand early to usher every person to his seat and offer a hymnal opened to the hymn being sung. (It is best to gather all hymnals at the end of each service and hand them out to the people as they are ushered each evening.) The ushers should arrive at the place of meeting at least an hour before the service starts since many people begin gathering a half hour earlier than the time for the service to begin.

C. Nursery

A supervised nursery for preschool children gives parents the opportunity for regular attendance.

D. Hostesses

It is frequently helpful to have a couple of pleasant ladies welcoming people at the door each evening (in addition to the greetings of the deacons or ushers).

E. Friendship Cards

A different colored card for each night of the week permits easier identification and filing. Opportunity may be given during the hymn service for each person to fill out a card each night. Questions or favorite hymn numbers may also be written on the back of the card. These may be gathered during the hymn service. However, if they are gathered before the closing hymn some will write their requests for baptism or a visit. Remember that everyone ought to fill out a card each night to avoid singling out the nonmembers. This helps us see where our members are from and also gives us a permanent file of potential prospects and all nonmembers in attendance as well as the times they attended. The card may be designed as follows (three by five inches):

FRIENDSHIP CARD

Name

Address

City..... State.....

Are you a church member?.....

What denomination?

If R.L.D.S., what congregation.....

Questions and favorite hymns may be listed on reverse side.

F. Tract Table

An assortment of tracts on display for all to see and for any who wish them is a tremendous asset to any missionary endeavor. Anywhere from fifty to one hundred dollars worth of tracts should be available to give away, depending on the size of the crusade. Our church has an excellent supply of tracts on different subjects, and just about every subject should be available at the missionary endeavor. However, there are some tracts which would be best not displayed, such as "Joseph Smith Was Not a Polygamist" and "Baptism for the Dead." Some may be on hand and available, if requested, but they are best not displayed for free distribution. There are some tracts like "What and How Shall I Tell My Neighbor" which are designed for members; these need not be on the tract table for nonmembers to take.

A tract related to the sermon may be selected each night and given to all nonmembers in attendance as they leave the meeting. A host may be at the table to help any, including members, select tracts of interest. These tracts should be given away, never sold at such meetings. Include them in your budget.

G. Hymn Service

A successful missionary endeavor must have good singing as well as good preaching and good organization. A fifteen-minute hymnody is recommended for each service. Good missionary and spirited hymns should be selected and related to the subject of the evening. Thus, by the time the sermon begins the people are tuned to hear since they have been singing about this evening's subject during the past four or five hymns. It is generally best not to have too many different leaders conducting these hymn services. It is preferable to have the same leader throughout the entire series so people will become acquainted with his or her direction.

H. A Suggested Order of Service

Hymn service (about fifteen minutes)

Processional: Hymn 369, "The Old, Old Path" (congregational singing)

Announcements

Hymn of invocation

Prayer of invocation

Organ or choir response

Offertory statement and prayer

Reading of Scriptures

Solo, Choir, or other

Introduction of the speaker

Sermon

Meditation music (organ)

Hymn of benediction

Prayer of benediction

Congregational response

(Use a good refrain for committing the people and for those who go to get their decisions the next day.)

Postlude

(Note: A hymn service makes it possible to have enough congregational participation without having to sing too many hymns during the preaching service itself. Too often only twenty minutes is left for the sermon after the singing and specials. This is not enough time for an adequate or effective missionary sermon.)

VI. Attendance Stimulators

A. Encourage five-in-a-car attendance and recognize the ones who came in an automobile with five or more passengers. This may be done during the hymn service.

B. Have a "good neighbor night" and recognize the ones who bring the most neighbors that night.

C. Emphasize a "family night" with the entire family sitting together in church.

D. Recognize a different congregation every night and see which brings out the most people.

E. See who the "big fisherman" is (the one who has brought more people with him on a particular night).

F. Select twenty or more fellows and assign them ten seats each. It is their responsibility to fill these seats with members or nonmembers. Some have even asked for another row of seats in some missionary endeavors.

(Note: All these things can be done during the hymn service. This service is also a good opportunity to see who came the most miles to be at the service that night, who has attended every service so far, etc. In addition it is helpful as congregational participation and it has proved to stimulate a greater attendance. It also relaxes the people so they are easier to meet after the meeting.)

VII. Finances

A. Several weeks before the crusade starts announce that contributions will be accepted and receipted (for income tax purposes). These may be given to the pastor or business manager who will receipt offerings. In most instances one hundred dollars or more is already raised before the opening night of the endeavor.

B. Have offering envelopes in all the hymnals during the crusade for any who may wish to make an offering that may be receipted.

C. Receive an offering each night. There really isn't much need to emphasize the importance of a sacrificial offering every night, but we should be cautioned against apologizing for the offering or telling people not to give unless they feel like giving. They won't give if they don't feel like it anyway. It has been discovered that when we announce the expense of the endeavor people respond by supporting those financial needs. This has been true in every case, and these larger endeavors have been completely supported by the offerings of those in attendance. Remember that we can make the offering an act of worship. It ought to be, and if it is the people will give even as they worship.

D. On the opening night announce the approximate budget for the endeavor and every two or three days announce the progress toward meeting the expense. (In every large endeavor there has been a balance after all expenses were cared for. This should be placed in a district missionary fund to be used for further evangelism in the area.)

E. Every congregation sharing in the endeavor could also receive a special pre-series offering to turn over to the business manager if desired.

VIII. Special Projects

A. The guest minister may speak to the businessmen's club(s) while in town. Quite often we have men who belong to these organizations who could make arrangements for the missionary to speak. This helps our publicity a great deal.

B. Children's crusade as suggested earlier under III, A, 13.

C. Saturday night workers group meetings may be advisable to discuss progress and ways to improve the remainder of the endeavor.

D. A Saturday afternoon and evening series of classes in an Institute of Evangelism is always a tremendous help for many months to come.

E. Fifteen-minute radio sermons daily by the visiting missionary are also very helpful in getting a good number of people out to church who are stimulated to attendance by the little they hear during the day. The missionary could give a preview of tonight's sermon in today's broadcast. Broadcasting the entire Sunday night service is also very helpful if arrangements can be made.

In addition to stimulating attendance this radio work provides ministry for some of the ill or older folk who cannot come out to the services. Comments of appreciation for the radio work in these endeavors have come from many of these people.

Note: Preaching services are most generally advised for every night of the two weeks with the exception of Saturdays. Preaching every other night is discouraged since, in most instances, it is more difficult for people to adjust a train of thought when they are doing other things on alternate evenings. Sunday mornings are generally not a part of the crusade and the crusade minister can spend them preaching in neighboring congregations.

Conclusion

All of these things may suggest a lot of work and effort. It really is meant to, since no successful endeavor can be a mere spare time effort. Go all out with this type of planning and with all the faith a disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ needs, and you will have a crusade. The results will follow since God is interested enough in the souls of men to go all out to "bring to pass their immortality and eternal life." Are you willing to do a little more planning and work than you have been accustomed to doing? If you are, he will grant an increase. Come on, let's roll up our sleeves and plan a larger missionary endeavor. "The hastening time is upon us."

Floyd Potter

I Had an Experience . . .

I WAS REARED in the positive atmosphere of a good Latter Day Saint home. Baptized at the minimum legal age, I grew in succeeding years under the constant influence of church activities. The testing time of adolescence had barely registered, when the heavenly Father led me to the fullness of true conversion. It was mainly through the testimonies of older members of the local branch. At the impressionable age of sixteen, I began to notice over a period of months that many of the mature Saints would state in testimony meetings that this latter-day gospel meant more to them than anything else in life.

Upon truthful searching of my own inner feelings, I was forced to admit that I could not conscientiously bear the same testimony. Life with its many new experiences and opportunities was just beginning to unfold for me. Sports, hobbies, friends outside the church, the world of great books, all were more fascinating than church life, even though I was always regular in attendance at most activities and kept strictly to daily prayer as my parents had taught me.

However, I coveted the spiritual condition which I knew I ought to have, wherein I, too, could truly say that the gospel of Christ meant everything in life to me. It is not surprising that I decided to pray for this to become possible. After praying for some months along this line my purpose began to wane, and the prayer was gradually crowded out. But God answered that prayer in a way which makes me marvel to this day. I saw no great light, nor did I hear an unfamiliar voice, but the good Spirit took possession of my life through the avenue of the excellent literature of this church.

Previously I had foolishly held the literary standards of many church writers in contempt. Their efforts seemed puny and beneath my notice, till one morning I was faced with the bleak prospect of commuting to work without a book to read en route. I turned to the family library and condescended to take along a book to which I had often heard my mother refer. It was a biography of missionary life in the later period of the Reorganization. Just reading that book was a powerful spiritual experience. Never had a message penetrated with greater force and conviction into my life than did this simple, powerful testimony. It could have qualified as a straight thesis on the Savior's promise—"Seek ye first to build up and establish the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you." I began to "see" as I had not done before something of the magnitude of the latter-day gospel. Fortunately many other books were available to feed my aroused and well-nigh insatiable interest. Soon after, I wanted to read the Book of Mormon, which proved to be yet another great soul-expansion exercise. It seemed at times that I almost gasped at some of its marvelous beauties. My rate of spiritual growth was vastly accelerated in the next three years, to be followed by an even more intensive phase with the acceptance of missionary appointment. Long before this, however, I looked back one day and was struck with the realization that God had answered my prayer.

With the passing of time since then, I have had some cherished experiences, some of them much more dramatic than this one, but I return gratefully to rejoice in the gracious and compelling manner in which a kind Father brought personal conviction to a sixteen-year-old lad.

QUOTES

There is only one way to get ready for immortality, and that is to love this life and live it as bravely and faithfully and cheerfully as we can.

No man is worth his salt who is not ready at all times to risk his body, to risk his well-being, to risk his life, in a great cause. —THEODORE ROOSEVELT

The Doctrine and Covenants and Prayer

THE DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS and prayer are closely related, for much of the content of the book is direct answer to prayer as the prophet of the church sought light and direction from the Lord. Most of the instruction and counsel given in the revelations is of eternal significance and of universal application. As we consider specific answers to prayer, values of prayer, and help which may be obtained through prayer, may we apply the truth and admonition to our own lives. May we gain from each experience that which fits our own needs and our own opportunities for service.

The Doctrine and Covenants is most readily understood against the background of God's purposes for man from the beginning. In it there is much instruction in regard to the building of the kingdom. Before his creation of the earth, God purposed man's salvation through a social gospel which would demonstrate right relationships among men. In each dispensation of the gospel God has moved to gather or develop a righteous people. In the Doctrine and Covenants instruction is given in answer to prayer as the prophet of the church sought light in regard to the establishment of Zion (the prelude to the kingdom), for the organization of the church, the duties of priesthood, the atonement, life after death, stewardship, and many other matters. The challenge to "bring forth and establish the cause of Zion" is sounded many times.

We pause in our hurried living as we read such statements as "Be still, and know that I am God" (98: 4 f) and "Let the solemnities of eternity rest upon your minds" (43: 8 b). As we seek to learn of God and his purposes for us, we need to read the Scriptures, to study and meditate upon them. We must learn "to wait upon the Lord." "Pray always and I will pour out my Spirit upon you, and great shall be your blessing" (18: 6). "Search diligently, pray always, and be believing" (87: 6 e). "If thou shalt ask, thou shalt receive revelation upon revelation, knowledge upon knowledge, that thou mayest know the mysteries, and peaceable things; that which bringeth joy, that which bringeth life eternal" (42: 17 a). Light and understanding are given through study and through prayers.

IN THE EARLY HISTORY of the church, as men were won to the "marvelous work and a wonder," they desired to know how they might help in the work. Many of the early revelations to individuals are similar in content, proving the importance of the message and its universal application. As we read these words may we find greater challenge:

Behold, the field is white already to harvest, therefore, whoso desireth to reap, let him thrust in his sickle with his might, and reap while the day lasts, that he may treasure up for his soul everlasting salvation in the kingdom of God; yea, whosoever will thrust in his sickle and reap, the same is called of God; therefore, if you will ask of me you shall receive, if you will knock it shall be opened unto you. Now, as you have asked, behold, I say unto you, Keep my commandments, and seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion: seek not for riches but for wisdom; and, behold, the mysteries of God shall be unfolded unto you, and then shall you be made rich. Behold, he that hath eternal life is rich.—6: 2, 3.

This invitation is to "all those who have desires to bring forth and establish this work; and no one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care" (11: 4).

God is interested in each one of us as individuals; he is concerned with the quality of our lives, with our homes. Through prayer we may have forgiveness of our sins. In Section 87: 1 to Joseph Smith came this word: "Thy sins are forgiven thee, according to thy petition." When Emma Smith was called to specific work in Section 24 she was told, "Thy sins are forgiven thee, and thou art an elect lady, whom I have called." Forgiveness of sins is a prerequisite to effective service. When it occurs our hearts are made clean and our wills are redirected and aligned with his purposes for us.

IN PRAYER IS FOUND strength to resist evil. To Thomas B. Marsh, later president of the Quorum of Twelve, came this admonition: "Pray always lest you enter into temptation" (30: 4 c). And to a conference of high priests: "Pray always, lest that wicked one have power in you, and remove you out of your place" (90: 8 d). Today we need to heed this counsel to pray. Sin is so attractively clothed that it is difficult to recognize its true nature. The tendency to compromise with evil is so prevalent that it is sometimes difficult to see the situation clearly. We need to pray for the Spirit of God to enlighten our minds and to give us strength in our hour of need that we might resist the evil forces that surround us. Our young people need our prayers that they might have the strength and the integrity to stand for the right.

The church is stressing the importance of family worship. In Section 68:4 is this command to parents: "They shall also teach their children to pray, and to walk uprightly before the Lord." In the home children can learn early the value of prayer and thus develop greater faith. The observance of Sunday as a day for worship, for rest, and for meditation is stressed. We should evaluate the activities of the day; our children are taught more by example than by precept. We are demonstrating our standards and our values by the things that we do and consider important. "Thou shalt observe the Sabbath to keep it holy." That God is concerned with this phase of our homes is shown in the rebuke to Newel K. Whitney (90:9): "My servant Newel K. Whitney, also a bishop of my church, hath need to be chastened, and set in order his family, and see that they are more diligent and concerned at home, and pray always, or they shall be removed out of their place." Other men were spoken to in a similar vein, proving the importance of the spiritual standards of the home. The greatest gift we can give our children is a sound religious heritage and a firm faith.

IT IS INTERESTING to note the counsel given in relation to selecting a homesite. To Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon comes the word of the Lord: "Let my servants . . . seek them a home as they are taught through prayer, by the Spirit" (63:16). Do we pray earnestly, seeking light and direction as we consider the purchase of a home? The location of our home is of great importance in our lives. Where Latter Day Saints "gather" in communities their lives can be church-centered, their children can associate with those of like ideals. God is keenly interested in all phases of our lives and will give us direction as we seek him.

In the book A Man Called Peter, we read of the desperate hope of Catherine Marshall when her husband was stricken with a heart attack. She prayed about the verse in James 5:14 on anointing the sick with oil, and then went to the hospital and performed the act herself. Our hearts are made glad that we have this ordinance in the church today. "Pray over the sick, anoint them with oil, as commanded in the law, and leave them in my hands, that the Spirit may deal with them according to my wisdom" (125:15). The law in Section 42:12 reads: "And the elders of the church, two or more, shall be called, and shall pray for, and lay their hands upon them in my name; and if they die, they shall die unto me, and if they live, they shall live unto me." What peace of mind that, observing the law in faith, we can leave them in His hands.

IN MISSIONARY WORK the Doctrine and Covenants offers a challenge to all (a revelation to Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer in answer to Oliver Cowdery's prayer):

Remember the worth of souls is great in the sight of God; for, behold, the Lord your Redeemer suffered death in the flesh; wherefore he suffered the pain of all men, that all men might repent and come unto him. . . . And how great is his joy in the soul that repenteth. . . . And if it so be that you should labor all your days . . . and bring save it be one soul unto me, how great shall be your joy with him in the kingdom of my Father! And now, if your joy will be great with one soul that you have brought unto me into the kingdom of my Father, how great will be your joy, if you should bring many souls unto me!—16:3, 4.

As people are won to the kingdom we share in their joy and in their new found enthusiasm. Our souls evaluate again this gospel, and we, too, rediscover the "joy of our salvation."

"To evangelize the world is still our primary function. To build as a result of this evangelization a new type of community, a new and ideal social order."—President F. M. Smith.

There is great need to win people to the cause in our efforts to build Zion. In the early revelations men were told, "The field is white already to harvest." We sense something of the urgency of taking advantage of the opportunities which are ours as we read the words: "Hearken unto my voice, lest death shall overtake you: in an hour when ye think not, the summer shall be past, and the harvest ended, and your souls not saved" (45:1). In Section 76:6 these people are told they will receive terrestrial glory: "These are they who are not valiant in the testimony of Jesus; wherefore they obtained not the crown over the kingdom of our God."

MANY OF US ARE CONCERNED over loved ones or friends or neighbors who are not members of the church, people with whom we would like to share the joy of the gospel. The efficacy of prayer circles is being proved constantly as wonderful results are being obtained through joint effort in prayer. In 6:15 this assurance is given: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, as touching one thing, behold, there will I be in the midst of them." It is important that we pray affirmatively, in faith believing that our prayers can and will be answered. In the matter of winning souls to him, God is even more concerned than we are. What faith he has in us that we will have a divine concern for the souls of others! We must not fail him.

It is interesting to note (Section 66) this instruction:

"At the request of William E. McLellan, I enquired of the Lord and received the following. . . . Verily I say unto you Blessed are you for receiving mine everlasting covenant, even the fullness of my gospel, sent forth unto the children of men, that they might have life, and be made partakers of the glories, which are to be revealed in the last days, as it was written by the prophets and apostles in days of old."

We find reference through the ages to the everlasting covenant as given to Enoch: "that, when men should keep all my commandments . . . and shall embrace the truth and look upward" Zion should again come on the earth. The importance of the everlasting covenant is stressed in Section 45:2: "I have sent mine everlasting covenant into the world to be a light to the world, and to be a standard for my people." How important that every member of the church know the standard and try to live up to its requirements!

To us in the last days have come many revelations, all with a note of urgency:

"Let the church be admonished that the times are portentous and demand faithful adherence to the faith and work of the church, that mankind may be blessed by and find peace in those religiously social reforms and relationships which have been divinely imposed as a great task of achievement."—137:6.

This is our day to make our contributions to the progress of the kingdom. Let us in faith and prayer "search the commandments" and then "seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion." Section 65, the revelation on prayer, contains this counsel: ". . . pray unto the Lord; call upon his holy name; make known his wonderful works among the people, call upon the Lord, that his Kingdom may go forth upon the earth."

Graceland Gazette

■ The new religious unit, "Branch Building," began April 20 on campus. Mr. Clifford A. Cole was guest speaker at the 10:30 service in the Student Center. His topic for the morning was "Branches Are Basic." In continuation with the branch building theme the seven divisions held testimonial fellowships Wednesday evening, April 23. The theme chosen for these seven services was "My Home Branch and I."

At 9:00 o'clock Sunday morning, April 27, Mrs. Mary Beth Evans conducted a class on the branch and its need for children.

Dr. Velma Ruch was in charge of the 10:30 service Sunday morning and continued the unit theme with "There Are Women in the Branch."

■ Carol Elledge, a sophomore at Graceland from Independence, presented a graduate piano recital in the Memorial Student Center Sunday, April 20. Miss Elledge played several selections, and her performance was outstanding. While attending William Chrisman High School she was a member of the band, orchestra, and choir, vice-president of the National Honor Society, and member of the Student Council.

■ Graceland's track team and the team of William Jewell from Liberty, Missouri, met on the Graceland track Tuesday, April 15, for a dual meet. Graceland polished off William Jewell 86-50. Elbert Harrington of East Moline, Illinois, continued his winning streak by coming in first in the two mile, mile, and 880. Others who took firsts for Graceland were Jared Ingram from Pawnee Rock, Kansas (100- and 200-yard dash), Hank Volskay from Springfield, Missouri (javelin throw), and Gary Tickemyer from Arcadia, California (tied for first in the high jump).

■ The golf team lost to Missouri Valley April 11, by a close margin of 8½-7½. Tying for medalist honors were Leo Carrol, Graceland, who is from St. Joseph, Missouri, and Bob Portell, Missouri Valley. Both shot an 83 for the 18 holes. Winners for Graceland were Leo Carrol and Dave Watkins from Chariton, Iowa.

■ The Graceland tennis team almost made a clean sweep of the matches at Missouri Valley April 11, winning 6-1. Barney Parker of San Antonio, Texas, again moved into first position. He has played first man on the Graceland tennis team for four years and held the same position on his high school team. Winners for Graceland were Barney Parker, Bob Brunner from Kansas City, Kansas; Bruce Clark from Baker, California; Garry Piatt from Butler, Missouri; and Dennis Walberg from Stayton, Oregon.

The team was defeated by Drake University Saturday, April 12, on the Graceland courts by a score of 7-0, and defeated William Jewell Tuesday, April 15, 7-0. It won every match to sweep the meet.

■ The recently organized Graceland baseball team traveled to Liberty, Missouri, April 24, to score eight runs in the fifth inning defeating William Jewell, 9-6. Pitchers for Graceland in this game were John Nelson from Independence, Missouri, who pitched the first seven innings, and Ken Green from Rembrandt, Iowa, who pitched the final two. Jim Williams from Des Moines, Iowa, and Jim Swick from Clarksburg, West Virginia, each hit a double and triple for Graceland. The leading hitter for the team so far this year is Floyd Ayers from Eden, Idaho, with .500 per cent.

■ At a recent assembly Carl Mesle, director of the Committee on Ministry to College People, spoke on college and university student concentrations of church people. To the upper classmen he distributed a list of fifty-six colleges and universities where five or more church member students are enrolled. He encouraged Graceland graduates to continue their education and, in so far as practicable, to do so where they can attend services in a local branch or with organized student groups.

Dwight Rice

Honored for Agricultural Achievements

IN FEBRUARY of this year Dwight Rice of Ottumwa, Iowa, was given special recognition by the Iowa State College at Ames, as well as in the Iowa press, for his achievements in the field of agriculture when he was awarded the Iowa Master Corn Grower's medal over 350 other entrants from all over Iowa. This is the third year Brother Rice has been so honored, having produced a yield of 138.02 bushels per acre in 1957, 135.63 bushels per acre in 1956, and 117.84 in 1955. For several years he has also been honored as the top bushel-per-acre corn producer in Wapello County where he farms 320 acres of fertile land just north of Ottumwa in the Tall Corn State.

In addition to his newsworthy achievements as a master farmer, Brother Rice's name and picture frequently appear in newspapers in connection with his civic and community activities. Actively interested in boys' and girls'

4-H club work, he has served as leader and advisor, and for the past five years as a member of the Wapello County 4-H committee which is the directing body for 4-H work in that area. He is vice-chairman of the Wapello County Agricultural Extension Council, has been president of the Richland Township school board for the past ten years, and has served as a director of the Farm Bureau in southeastern Iowa.

Brother Rice was born in Ottumwa on January 17, 1917, and is married to the former Ruth Davis of Ottumwa. They have three sons: Terry, seventeen; Stephen, ten; and Randy, five. Reared in the Methodist faith, he became interested in the restored church shortly after his marriage. After several years of study and investigation he became converted to the message and was baptized in 1951. In 1954 he was ordained to the office of teacher.

He is singularly devoted to his faith and to his priesthood responsibilities. He teaches a church school class and is the Ottumwa Branch statistician. The testimony which he bears of the genuineness of the Reorganized Church is a strong one, and his testimony is reflected in his keen interest in the missionary phase of the work. He particularly enjoys cottage missionary meetings, which has resulted in his being of considerable assistance to Missionary Louis Zonker in his work in the Ottumwa area.

Letters

(As I have seen it)

EDITOR'S NOTE: One of the United Nations soldiers from America gives his impressions of Korea. He closes his transmittal letter by saying, "I would appreciate hearing from more people, if anyone has time to write. Each and every letter will be answered personally by me." His address is

*SP/3 Donald A. Schofield, US 55 591 231
Co C, 1st BG, 32nd Inf., APO 7, San Francisco, California.*

I came to Korea in May, 1957. As I approached Inchon from the sea, I saw nothing that looked interesting to me, and I wished I could turn around and go back to Missouri. (I am glad that I was chosen to come over here now instead of during the war as so many fellows had to.)

Korea has many people—too many for the small area it covers. There are estimated to be three people for every square yard. There are villages everywhere. As I travel along the old roads it seems as though I no more than leave one village until I enter another. Close to army camps the villages seem to be bigger (although I have not been far from camp).

The houses are not more than two or three feet apart; these are called hooches. There is variety in these, but the general hooch averages three rooms: one is the kitchen where the cooking is done over an open fire or in a hole in the ground; one is the bedroom, where the beds are grass mats laid on the floor; and one is the living room. The houses are built in a crude way. The land is cleared by hand and a stick framework is put up. Then dirt and water are mixed and put on the sticks to make the walls. The roof is covered with long grass or reeds. The doorways are open the year round. The modern homes are sided with cardboard or scrap lumber obtained from the army.

Sometimes the hooch will house two or three families. It is crowded but all of Korea is, so the people don't give this a second thought. Many migrated from North Korea during the war making South Korea crowded, but there are no hard feelings in the South Koreans' hearts.

All of Korea is mountainous. In the valleys between the mountains are the villages. Every available space not covered by homes or roads is taken up by rice paddies. Besides small gardens near the homes, I have seen only rice and barley growing.

Farming is done in the ancient way. Ground is plowed either by hand with a crude shovel or by oxen. The farmers who are better off have oxen and wood plows. The rice is started something like the way we would start tomatoes. The seeds are planted near the house until the sprouts get about three or four inches tall; then they are taken up and transplanted by hand in the small furrows. The furrows are under water at all times. Each rice paddy is only about thirty feet wide and long and has an irrigation ditch running around it for the excess water. The paddies are built in a stairstep fashion with the excess water from one paddy running onto the next and so on down the hill. Wherever it is possible to level the land just a little, a rice paddy will be found.

The people wear the clothes similar to those worn by their ancestors. The men wear long, baggy trousers and a jacket. The women wear long skirts and vestlike blouses. There are regular "statesside" clothes made in Japan and sent over here. Many people wear these.

The children wear all kinds of garments. Many now have good clothes furnished by the Army and other organizations over here. Students wear uniforms. All grade school boys wear blue trousers and blue jackets. High school students wear blue trousers or skirts with gray jackets. The shoes are small slippers made of rubber.

Most travel is done on foot. Some people use carts pulled by oxen. Others have bicycles and automobiles. There are Japanese made buses running all through Korea. The Korean roads are little more than paths. The Army has helped develop the roads for cars and buses with its heavy machinery.

The main dish over here is a draw between rice and kimsi. Kimsi is a soup made of spices.

The Korean Army, known as the Republic of Korea Army (ROKA), is somewhat similar to the United States Army. The boys may volunteer for five years or be drafted for three years. The majority of these pull about a two-year term with the U. S. Army, giving them more experience as soldiers. They are taught about our weapons and they learn easily. The Korean soldier is fearless and will give his life readily for his country. Korea is to them what the United States is to us.

In Seoul, the capital city, there are many vehicles—cars, trucks, streetcars, and buses. There are electricity, running water, and sewers. The roads are being improved along with the buildings and residences. There are farms and businesses as in America. The people are good-natured. Very seldom is there a cross word or an argument heard over here.

I have done the best I can to describe Korea as I see it. I expect there are many different opinions of it by those who have been over here. This, however, is Korea as it appears to me.

The Church Directory* Helps

Myron E. Lassen, a serviceman in Iceland, writes, "The Church Directory booklet was my biggest help, I think, while I was in the States. I visited many branches in Ohio, Indiana, Texas, a few in New Mexico and Missouri. I just wanted to make mention of that booklet and the good it is doing. I've benefited greatly by visiting other branches of our church and did it often before I joined the Air Force."

LED TO WATER

Brother George Pearson, for many years a resident of Joplin, Missouri, moved some months ago to Independence and told this story on himself in a group prayer meeting.

In his early years he knew the church was true but simply deferred reaching a decision to enter the water. Other members of his family were in the church.

A neighbor Saint, unable to convert her husband, said to George one day, "I wish you'd talk to Bill. I think you could help him."

George consented. In several days he explained the gospel from the beginning of the Restoration to the final consummation of all things.

The climax came when Bill said, "George, I'm ready to be baptized just as soon as you are!"

That did it. They were baptized together.

NUMBER—477

For a long time Herald House has had a box at the post office. But the business letterheads have been printed with the address: 103 South Osage Street, Independence, Missouri. Lately the post office has been asking that we use our box number instead of the street address. Until new letterheads are printed, we have been typing in the box number—477—on our envelopes. Some of our patrons have begun to use it; others, understandingly enough, continue to use the old address from force of habit. Postal employees write on incoming mail: "Box number?" meaning, "Why don't you tell your correspondents your box number?" Half-way measures seldom please anybody.

Seventy Edward Butterworth (left) and Seventy Alan Tyree work on the Tahitian translation of the Doctrine and Covenants.

Butterworths Return from Tahiti

Three appointees to labor in French Oceania in the future

SEVENTY F. EDWARD BUTTERWORTH, his wife, and three children—Gary, Cheryl, and Janis—returned April 12 from a three-year mission to French Oceania.

Brother Butterworth's return completed his third assignment to the South Sea Islands. He has spent better than nine years there, altogether.

"And it will probably be my last trip for quite a while," he said. "We hope to remain here until the children are through school and in college. Perhaps then we can return to the islands."

"We will always love the people and the work there and will remember them as long as we live," he said.

"The people in French Oceania are very receptive to our gospel," Brother Butterworth added. "They are hungry and lonely people, eager for the real meat of the church's message. Our gospel has been accepted without reserve by the Saints in the islands."

Brother Butterworth left the work in French Oceania in the hands of Seventy Allen J. Breckenridge. Seventy David Kaleikau arrived in Tahiti a month before the Butterworths left. The missionary force there will be boosted to three full-time appointees in May when Seventy Alan Tyree returns to the islands for his second mission in Polynesia.

These personnel changes point up one of the most important problems in ministry to the Saints in French Oceania, according to Brother Butterworth. "The language barrier is hard to overcome," he said. "A new missionary, going to the islands for the first time, must work hard to learn the language. When General Church officials visit, an interpreter is usually necessary. And a translated message loses perhaps half of its effectiveness."

Nevertheless, Brother Butterworth pointed out, appointee changes are necessary to build up a force of experienced missionaries who can be called on to go to the islands.

And, he emphasized, the islanders are eager to have General Church ministers visit. He pointed to the 1956 visit of Bishop G. L. DeLapp and Apostle C. R. Hield as a high point in the church's ministry in the islands.

Two General Church officials will be visiting the islands in May. C. L. Olson, church lawyer, and Apostle Charles

Spirit Begets Spirit

A GOOD SPIRIT BEGETS its kind as well as an evil spirit reproduces its kind. Solomon knew this well, for he declared, "A soft answer turneth away wrath; but grievous words stir up anger" (Proverbs 15: 1).

Heated discussions are not usually due to the climate but to the spirit of the participants. Imagine a chance meeting of two casual friends who engage in some casual remarks. Without any intention or premeditation, one takes exception to something the other says, and an earnest dispute ensues. One raises his voice and yells at the other, and the war is on. It may not come to blows or mayhem, but it is not a cold war. Solomon also knew of this kind of discourse: "A fool's lips enter into contention, and his mouth calleth for strokes" (Proverbs 18: 6).

Industry and safety patrol officers have plenty of evidence that some people are accident prone. Pastors and policemen have just as good evidence that some are combat prone. Spirit begets spirit, but "strokes" never solve problems. The Christian is warned to "turn the other cheek" rather than strike back. Paul urged, "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord" (Romans 12: 19).

One may come to the Wednesday night prayer meeting weary from the toil and frustrations of the day's work. He feels that duty requires his presence, but that he can contribute nothing to the uplifting of other worshipers. Then a change comes over him and he sheds the tired feeling like an old coat. Men and women are standing waiting their turn to testify of experiences which have brought them closer to God. The spirit of love for all mankind envelopes his mind and he feels that he must tell of God's goodness. In this select environment it is easy to think of the good in his fellow men and determine to do all possible to help them.

The Lord admonished the church, "Put thy trust in that Spirit which leadeth to do good; yea, to do justly, to walk humbly, to judge righteously; and this is my Spirit. Verily, verily I say unto you, I will impart unto you of my Spirit, which shall enlighten your mind, which shall fill your soul with joy" (Doctrine and Covenants 10: 6, 7 a).

MANY WHO SAY they are guided by reason are controlled much more by emotional responses. This is demonstrated by the voting in lawmaking bodies. The report reads, "The vote was along party lines." Who-speaks-for-what, rather than the reasons given, influences us more than we want to admit. The patronizing attitude gets into club and branch business meetings. We look for confirmation of our views and prejudices rather than for facts upon which to base a sound judgment. Because of emotional responses to individuals of strong persuasion, factions arise and lasting divisions come to divide groups. The freedom with which splinter groups can arise and perpetuate themselves provides the safety valve that keeps emotional steam from destroying the parent body.

Some of the signs of the "last days" are men's being "disobedient to parents" and "without natural affection" (II Timothy 3: 2, 3). These seem to be prevalent in all lands but are especially rampant in America. Hoodlumism has shocked the nation in the past five years. It is most vicious among gangs and mobs. Paul warned, "If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another" (Galatians 5: 15).

The widespread report of juvenile devilishness makes an ugly picture, and it is doubtful if any community has yet found the answer. Some take comfort in the small percentage affected. Others, particularly in America, argue that spending more money for slum clearance, and more supervised recreation can provide the solution. Adults are busy blaming each others: it's the schools, the army, the home, the government, the church, and commercialized entertainment. This confusion only adds to the evil. Are the dangers of moral agency just catching up with us after centuries of upward struggle toward civilization? If so then society must face the inevitable conflict which decides whether it is willing to bear the responsibilities which go with democracy and personal freedom or slip back into autocracy and slavery.

Paul wrote the Roman saints (6: 16), "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are . . . whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?"

THE CHOICE IS ours, but we must be willing to pay the price of the majority decision. Regardless of how you or I feel, we stand or fall together as states and nations. If we decide by default—to wait and see—we shall be punished for the sins of omission. Our culture can boast of its science and inventions and still be decayed at heart. It is still true that "Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people" (Proverbs 14: 34).

Yes, spirit begets spirit. Leadership is the indispensable element of society. With good leadership comes peace and prosperity. With bad leadership comes strife and iniquity. The old adage says, "Birds of a feather flock together." Science adds, "Like attracts like." If we drift with the current, we must expect to reach the rapids and the falls. If we choose to travel the heights, we must spend energy to climb. Freedom and democracy are socially attainable; the price, however, like the current inflationary trend is soaring. C. B. H.

Committee on Forming Resolutions

From time to time we have received requests for help by those who desire to propose General Conference action, particularly in the framing of their resolutions in an acceptable form. We have therefore appointed a committee of three to assist in the forming of proposed resolutions as well as seeing that they adequately convey what the person has in mind.

The committee will not in any way be responsible for what is presented to the Conference, nor would resolutions failing to be brought to the attention of this committee be regarded as inferior. The objective is to make this assistance available to those who feel that they have need of this help.

The committee consists of Elders Emery E. Jennings, Chairman, L. Wayne Updike, and C. B. Hartshorn. Correspondence may be addressed to these brethren in care of The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

This report was recently received from Elder Blair McClain, president of Detroit International Stake:

Easter Sunday services in Detroit International Stake set a new high in our attendance records. Church school attendance was 2,400. Morning worship attendance was 3,401.

Communion was observed throughout the stake on Thursday evening in order to provide a missionary setting for visiting friends on Easter. The resulting large attendance on Easter convinces us that this is the right procedure to follow.

Another high light was achieved this year when the women's department sponsored a pageant under the direction of Elder Trevor Norton. We obtained permission from the city to use Rouge Park in Detroit. We had the honor to be the first church to use the grounds for this purpose. It was a memorable experience for the cast and the nine hundred people who attended. It seems desirable that this be an annual performance in the stake.

We have received a large clipping from the Topeka, Kansas, State Journal describing briefly the major points of church history and doctrine. The article is by Dave Hicks and was printed April 5, the day before Easter and the Topeka church dedication services. District and General Church officers attended. He quoted from Missionary Alfred Yale's sermon, given at the dedication service. We greatly appreciate the effort and interest of Mr. Hicks in preparing this article.

Carroll Olson III

Word has been received that Elder C. L. Olson, Assistant to the Presiding Bishopric, suffered a heart attack on Saturday, May 3. He was aboard the S.S. "Monterey" sailing to Papeete, Tahiti, where he had been assigned to do some special work for the church. Apostle C. R. Hield and Elder Alan Tyree and his family were traveling with him.

Brother Olson is being taken on to Sydney, Australia, accompanied by Apostle Hield. It is expected that he will be hospitalized there until he is able to travel home. All that is possible is being done to make him comfortable. We solicit the prayers of the Saints in his behalf.

The Homestead Kitchen or "Keeping Room"

The Restoration of Nauvoo Homes

By Walter N. Johnson

I SHALL ALWAYS REMEMBER my first view of the apparent wreckage after the plaster had been removed from the logs and ceilings of the log portion of the Homestead. The rough ceiling beams were plaster-stained. Most of the chinking had been dislodged from between the rough-hewn logs. Lath and plaster of the next room closed what had once been a window, and worst of all, an entire section of the log wall was missing where a door had been cut through in one of the earlier remodeling jobs. I felt we might have done irreparable damage to a building dear to all church members.

A few days later, I waited impatiently while Brother Sidney Moore examined the room carefully. Finally to my great relief he said in his quiet way, "Well, this looks a whole lot better." Before the day was over, with the help of our able and co-operative contractor, Merle Strohmaier of Keokuk, Iowa, considerable progress was made in planning a restoration to more closely resemble the building into which Joseph Smith moved with his family in 1839.

The work was being carried on under a general program approved by the Joint Council. Recommendations to the General Conference had resulted in funds being made available to proceed with the project, and Brother and Sister Sidney Moore of Independence had accepted the responsibility of supervising the rehabilitation and refurnishing of the Homestead and Mansion House.

The next few weeks were most interesting as the work of restoration proceeded. The partition across the kitchen was removed to restore the room to its original size, and the plaster was removed from the ceiling. Old logs available from the rebuilding of the log section a few years previously enabled us to fill in the missing places. Our contractor found the rough lumber needed for doors and framing the doorways of the log building and secured special millwork for the wood trim in the kitchen. A search for wide, well-worn floor boards proved unavailing until we found suitable material in the old camp cabins on our own property. Hand-forged hinges and thumb latches were secured for the doors. Pine boards from an old pew, expertly finished by Brother Moore, completed the kitchen fireplace. Our faith in Brother Moore's ability grew as he would arrive at the solution for each new problem as it arose. Many items of furniture and the lighting fixtures were acquired at a fraction of the cost normally involved in restoration projects.

Living room in log cabin portion of Homestead

In April, 1956, our family accompanied the Moores to Nauvoo to prepare the Homestead for the official opening. Although Sister Moore had helped with the planning, she had not seen the building since the restoration work had begun. As she entered the log cabin, her face lit up in amazement and happiness at the transformation which had taken place, and we did not need her enthusiastic comment to tell us how she felt about the setting which had been provided.

Brother Fishburn, my wife, and I will long treasure the experience of that day as the Moores arranged and rearranged the furniture and fixtures to create the atmosphere needed in the building. They had long dreamed of doing this work for the church.

The Mansion House was substantially completed and furnished a year later. On the opening day several hundred members of the Illinois State Historical Society were shown through this building and were most generous in their praise of the results achieved. It was particularly fitting that President I. A. Smith was in Nauvoo on that occasion and was the first person to go through the Mansion House after it was reopened to the public.

Every effort has been made to restore the buildings as they may have appeared in the days when used by Joseph Smith, the Martyr. We were handicapped by lack of reliable information and pictures of that early day, also by later changes and remodeling that had occurred since the Nauvoo period. The major objective, however, has not been to restore the buildings with the exact furniture and equipment, but to give them a typical appearance of that era and thus provide a much more realistic and dramatic setting for telling the Restoration story, particularly as it relates to Nauvoo. While the connoisseur of antiques will find Nauvoo a fascinating place to visit, even the casual visitor will find himself transported back in time to a different day and culture as portrayed vividly in the furniture and equipment in these two homes.

Our church is fortunate that over a period of years it has been able to acquire title to the most historically valuable properties in Nauvoo, Illinois. These consist of the Homestead, where Joseph Smith first lived when the Saints settled in Illinois after being driven from Missouri, and the Mansion House where he and his family lived preceding his martyrdom. The graves of Joseph and Hyrum Smith and Emma, the only wife of Joseph, are in close proximity to the Homestead. Additional properties owned are the William Marks house used by the appointee minister, the Nauvoo House, a caretaker's home, a home located on the Temple Lot, and several other properties of lesser importance, including an old cemetery a few miles from Nauvoo.

Through the efforts of Bishop C. A. Skinner during the early 1940's, the church was able to purchase several pieces of property adjoining the Joseph Smith properties so that several blocks of land are now held by the church.

During the 1930's and 1940's, funds for upkeep were very limited, consisting of small budgetary appropriations, contributions from visitors, and income received from the adjoining church properties. Every effort was made to keep the buildings in good repair and to protect them from termites. Beginning in 1950 when some special appropriations for the historic properties were made, considerable work has been done in building sound foundations (particularly for the Homestead) replacing the exterior logs in the old cabin portion of the Homestead, and so forth. A massive granite slab has also been placed above the three graves. Before the actual work of restoration began, gas furnaces had been placed in the basements of both buildings and an automatic sprinkler system was installed to lessen the risk of damage or destruction by fire. A dollar value cannot be placed upon these buildings; maximum insurance protection is carried and every effort made to protect the buildings from the ravages of time and the destruction of fire.

The latest work completed in the summer of 1957 was an addition to the small stone building across the street from the Homestead which is to serve as a visitors' auditorium with a guide office and public rest rooms in the basement of the building. The upstairs has been completed with a beamed ceiling and rough stone walls; it is fitted with pews and equipped with a screen and projector for showing slides which accompany the guides' lecture.

Because of lack of funds, work has been delayed on the Nauvoo House, which is a large three-story brick house on the banks of the Mississippi River close to the visitors' auditorium. Plans have been drawn for rehabilitating this building to serve as an overnight hostel for groups of about fifty visitors. It is hoped that this can be completed some time after next General Conference inasmuch as there is constant demand from groups of church members who would like to stay overnight on a pilgrimage to Nauvoo. Additional work remains to be done in terms of landscaping, and renewing out-buildings and fences in order to more nearly recapture the atmosphere of early Nauvoo.

Financial Report

Over the fourteen-year period, 1944 to 1957 inclusive, the expenses of maintaining the properties and guide service (exclusive of appointee cost) was $108,048.16. This income has been received from the following sources:

Rental Income	$ 17,590.91
Sales of Literature and Contributions from Visitors	31,651.25
General Conference Budgetary Appropriations	58,806.00
Total	$108,048.16

Since 1950 special appropriations have been made for rehabilitation and improvement of the Nauvoo and Kirtland properties. During this period a great deal of work has been done at Nauvoo other than mentioned above. It was found necessary to rewire the electrical systems, remove unsightly or unneeded buildings, construct a new workshop and equipment garage, and modernize the William Marks house, in addition to fencing, grading, and similar projects, some of which still remain to be completed.

Altogether a total of $60,587.11 has been spent in the last eight years from special Conference appropriations for these purposes.

Brother and Sister Sidney Moore accepted this task as a special stewardship. They have brought to the work an enthusiasm, expertness, and devotion which has made it a pleasure to work with them. We have been greatly encouraged by the appreciation expressed by many visitors to Nauvoo during the past two-year period.

Our appointee, Robert Fishburn, has given an invaluable service in the past few years as this construction work has been carried on. Many others have helped in different ways with information, old pictures, and furniture. We believe the time, money, and effort invested has been worth while and that the Nauvoo Historical properties will continue to attract thousands of visitors annually, many of whom will make a primary contact with the church under a most favorable setting.

Our own church members are always invited, when they have an opportunity, to visit the church historical properties at Nauvoo, Illinois.

Joseph Smith's office in the Mansion House

Our Experience at Nauvoo

NAUVOO HAD LONG BEEN in our minds, particularly the restoration and proper furnishings of the Homestead and Mansion House. When Bishop Walter Johnson asked Mrs. Moore and me to assist in this work, both in advisory capacity and in locating and placing the furnishings, we felt it a wonderful opportunity to serve the church in a field we have been interested in for years.

Many basic changes and restorations were needed before the decorating could be started. In the Homestead, built in 1803, plaster and lath were removed, exposing original log walls and hand-hewn ceiling beams. Fireplaces, long since removed, were restored, one of limestone from a local quarry and the other of old handmade brick. Floor treatment varied from replacement of wide pine boards to painting and spattering other floors. Modern doors were replaced with slab doors. The exterior of the wings added at a later date were painted brown to blend with the logs.

In acquiring additional furniture, we attempted to find pieces with the old finish or paint intact. The earlier furniture was most often painted. Soft reds, greens, blues, yellows and even black were popular colors. At this point I might state that the Homestead has been furnished in an earlier period than the Mansion House. We have done this because the log house was built at an earlier date and seemed to require furniture of a more primitive style than the later built Mansion House. Joseph Smith and his family moved into the double log house (two story Homestead) in 1839. Quite often pioneers acquired additional furniture at estate auctions. The pieces the Smiths added for their comfort could well have been of an earlier period than the furniture made at that time.

The architecture and interior of the Mansion House are of a refined nature, making for a pleasing contrast to the log house. The architectural beauty of the façade has been enhanced by painting the trim white, the siding beige and the shutters slate gray. A low picket fence was added in keeping with the 1840 period. Old street lamps were placed on each corner post. The Mansion House has been furnished principally in the 1840 period. There are a few pieces of an earlier era interspersed, as the Smiths undoubtedly moved some furnishings from the Homestead across the street to their newly completed home. We were fortunate in having a few pieces of furniture and accessories used by the Smith family while living in Nauvoo. One fine example is a desk believed to have been used by Joseph in the Temple.

In this period wallpapers were scarce and expensive. Quite often walls were painted and stenciled. Occasionally the painter would execute a mural on the hall wall or over the fireplace mantles. These paintings were quite often primitive, depending upon the artistic ability of the painter. One mural has been finished in the study, and more are planned as the work progresses. Some wall stenciling is yet to be done.

The work has been a rewarding experience. More work is to be done, but the major portion is finished. We feel that a visit to Nauvoo will be well worth your time.

Edwin Robert Fishburn

Come to Historic Nauvoo . . .

COME TO HISTORIC NAUVOO, City of Dreams . . ." This is the theme of this historic community on the east bank of the Mississippi River, approximately fifteen miles above the Missouri-Iowa state line. This is also the first line of the song sung by the citizens of Nauvoo in their historic pageant, held each year on the Labor Day week end, known as the Grape Festival.

Historically, to Latter Day Saints, Nauvoo is a city of considerable importance. To the deserted towns of Commerce and Commerce City, Illinois, came Joseph Smith, Jr., in the spring of 1839, looking for a place to move his people, homeless after the expulsion from Missouri the previous winter. Finding a suitable place that could be purchased, Joseph bought a farm belonging to Hugh White and another belonging to Isaac Galland for the total sum of $14,000. Here the city of Nauvoo began to take form. Streets were laid out on an accurate survey with Main Street running due north-south across the entire bend of the river. Each block contained approximately four acres of ground so a home could be built on each corner, and a pasture and garden area was allotted to each family in the center of the block. The swamps in and around the city were drained, and good farm land resulted. Businesses began to flourish along Nauvoo's Main Street, and other activities such as quarries, brickyards, lumber mills and gristmills, printing houses, and a match and powder factory contributed to the bustling community.

Nauvoo was a beautiful city, basking in the morning sun on the bend of the river. By summer of 1840, many small but neat homes lined its busy streets. These homes were of brick and frame, with an occasional log dwelling, although timber was not plentiful here. With their painted shutters and picket fences, nice lawns, graded and curbed streets (over twenty-eight miles of curbing were laid), the houses were much better than the usual kind found in neighboring communities. Much of the glass in the windows of the buildings had been brought from the East or from Europe. Even the air was healthful, for the now drained swamps were no longer breeding the malaria-bearing mosquitoes. Wells were dug deep into the limestone underneath, thereby giving healthful water rather than the dangerous and polluted surface water. Locks were not needed on the buildings as the Saints truly loved one another.

People gathered to Nauvoo from other areas of the United States, Canada, and the overseas missions of the church—seven hundred and forty arrived on one day in 1843. The church owned several river steamers that plied the Mississippi between New Orleans and Nauvoo to bring the many new converts who had crossed the Atlantic to take up permanent residence in Nauvoo. The growing city, with its very liberal charter from the Illinois legislature and its growing political and economic power, began to alarm the older residents of many of the communities of Hancock County. During the winter of 1843-44 Nauvoo's population reached approximately twenty thousand making the city about four times larger than the city of Chicago and, according to some, the second largest city in the United States west of Pittsburgh. This rapid growth was a contributing factor to the eventual downfall of Nauvoo.

Unknown to most people were several other factors in Nauvoo's collapse. In the spring of 1844 several members of the church were excommunicated because of their teaching and practicing polygamy which was contrary to the church marriage law. Several men cut off at that time were involved in the printing of the Nauvoo Expositor, a slanderous newspaper that published but one edition, on June 7, 1844. The City Council declared the newspaper a nuisance and on June 10 the press was destroyed and thrown into Mulholland Street. This action was contrary to the Bill of Rights. Charges were filed in Hancock County Court House against the members of the City Council, including Joseph and Hyrum Smith. But before the hearings were completed, a mob of angry and drunken men murdered Joseph and Hyrum on June 27, 1844.

Immediately following the death of Joseph, men within the church began quarreling, and arguments were common on Nauvoo streets. After the illegal conference in August of 1844, Sidney Rigdon led a number of members away to Pennsylvania and formed another church there. During the spring of 1845 many additional groups were led away by various leaders of the early church—Apostle Lyman Wight went to Texas; Apostle William Smith settled in northern Illinois; Apostle John E. Page remained in Illinois; Elder James J. Strang led several hundred in a movement to southern Wisconsin and later to northern Michigan. Other groups were led away by Brewster, and Thompson, and Miller, and the most famous of all, Brigham Young. Only a few families, around twenty-five in all, remained in Nauvoo.

Nauvoo became a ghost city. Vacant houses with hand-blown glass windows stood on vacant streets, and gardens and farms lay untended. Millstones were silent in the once busy mills. No longer could the chiseling of stone for the Temple and the Nauvoo House be heard; both buildings stood uncompleted and abandoned.

In 1849 a short-lived French Icarian community began to take form here. These people established a communistic form of society, but it perished because of the lack of harmony among its members. These people, too, were dispersed, and their place was taken by other settlers. Nauvoo, today, is made up of descendants of early church families, the Icarians, and settlers of the 1860's and later. This community now totals around twelve hundred persons—a faint shadow of a once mighty city.

The Smith family continued to live in Nauvoo after the general exodus of the Saints in the 1844-1846 period. Here "Young Joseph" was reared to manhood, married, and operated the family farm. Likewise, Frederick, Alexander, and David established their homes here. Emma remained until her death in 1879, living at times in the old Homestead, the Mansion House, and the remodeled Nauvoo House, which was changed in 1869 by her second husband, Louis Bidamon. The Smiths retained ownership of their properties in Nauvoo until 1915 when Frederick M. Smith deeded them over to the church.

In the summer of 1918 the first guides were sent to Nauvoo. The Mansion House became the home of Brother and Sister J. W. Layton and was opened to the public for showing. In 1928 Elder James C. Page was sent to serve as a guide until 1940. During succeeding years various church appointees have been assigned to Nauvoo, including Cecil Ettinger, Maurice Draper, Charles Kornman, Wayne Updike, Fred Banta, Everett Berndt, and the writer. Additional assistance has been given during the summer by college boys who have come from all over the church. It might be of interest to Herald readers to know that President F. Henry Edwards once spent a summer at Nauvoo as a guide.

The visitor who comes to our properties now is given a short illustrated lecture in the Visitors' Auditorium. This building, completed this year, is an enlargement of the former guide office. Here in air-conditioned comfort during the summer, and in gas-heated warmth in the winter, the visitor sees and hears the story of Nauvoo with considerable emphasis on the history and doctrine of the church. This introduction provides him with an overview of the church and the history of Nauvoo that helps him appreciate what he sees as he is taken on the rest of the tour.

Next, the visitor is taken to the Homestead grounds where a general perspective of the church properties is given with explanations of the Homestead, Mansion House, and Nauvoo House. Then he is shown the graves of Joseph, Hyrum, and Emma, and is told of the various placements and removals and re-interments of the bodies. In the small Smith family cemetery, we have two of the old "moonstones" of the Nauvoo Temple, and the visitor is told here of the Temple construction, abandonment, and destruction by fire and tornado.

"Ohs" and "ahs" are heard as the visitors enter the Homestead. This realistic restoration takes them back to the "good old days" when oil lamps and candles provided the only illumination in the house, when beds were warmed with a bed warmer and soapstone. The comforts and necessities of such pioneer homes are well displayed in the Homestead. We also have a few old pieces of Smith furniture that attract considerable interest. The casual visitor, as well as the interested ones, finds a real thrill in visiting this building. Since it is heated now it is comfortable even in the winter. The Sidney Moores have done a marvelous job in the interior decoration of this building and daily we appreciate their dedicated service.

From the Homestead the visitor is conducted to the Mansion House. Before entering, he is told about the architecture of this building, and the old residences of William Marks and Sidney Rigdon are pointed out. Again, exclamations of real enjoyment are heard as visitors enter the Mansion House. The furnishings are typical of the 1840's when the Smiths first moved in. Joseph's office has been restored, and the typical masculine room interests all. The parlor shows the ladies' touch, even to the oriental sewing box and the fans and the "sparkling lamps" on the little organ. Many of the visitors are amused by the "sparkling lamps"—and the younger couples are glad we haven't returned to the "good old days"! A display of considerable interest to Latter Day Saint visitors is in the hall room. Here we have first editions of the Three Standard Books of the church as well as many other very early church books and histories. Finally, we enter the Smith family kitchen and dining room. The old "dutch oven," the fine glassware, and other kitchen paraphernalia attract attention here. In this room we have a fine display of many of the tracts, pamphlets, and books of the church. Also, post cards and colored slides are on sale. Many pieces of free literature are given out each year, and "The Nauvoo Story" is presented to visitors as they come through. As they register on cards that are provided here they sometimes check the blocks for missionary literature, addresses of our nearest church to their home, or a visit from one of our ministers. This closes the forty-minute tour.

Since the buildings were first opened in 1918, thousands of people have been here to visit the church properties. Since the recent restorations of the interiors of both the Homestead and the Mansion House were completed, we have had approximately thirty-four thousand people through the Homestead which was re-opened in May, 1956, and nineteen thousand through the Mansion House, which was opened only in May, 1957. Last year we had more visitors than any recent year on record. In August, September, and October, 1957, visitor traffic topped all previous records. Our books sales and offerings have likewise been the best we have ever had. When one realizes that about 85 per cent of our visitors are not members of the church, he can see the tremendous missionary and public relations opportunity presented. There is probably no other place in the church where we have opportunity to tell so many people of the gospel, its effect on the lives of men and women, and its restoration in this Church of Jesus Christ. We try to follow up on every good possibility that is presented, and local ministers are informed of important contacts made here. Like the sower, we cast out many seeds of the Restoration; some we know take root and bring people to Christ every year. We have very little opportunity for personal follow-up with the vast majority who do visit these grounds, but we learn occasionally that these fine folk have been converted to Christ and his church.

Visitors have opportunity to write comments on their registration cards. The Herald for December 6, 1954, carried an article about these. Some typical comments received this past year are as follows:

The visit and tour was well worth our 270-mile ride. Thank you and God bless you! (A lady from Oak Park, Illinois, Chicago suburb)
Educational—well-conducted—recommended (A Catholic from St. Louis)

We enjoyed the clear and lucid presentation of the beliefs of the church. (Reorganized Latter Day Saint from Ontario, Canada)

Have enjoyed seeing this place and will read the literature given me. (An Episcopal lady from West Virginia)

A fine narrative giving the colorful history of your church and area. Thank you. (A Catholic from Monmouth, Illinois)

We have surely felt God's Spirit on these holy grounds and are very thankful for this opportunity of visiting here. (R.L.D.S. from Michigan)

Everything is of great interest and well kept up. Enjoyed it very much. Your church is to be complimented (A Latter Day Saint from Utah)

I have been here several times before and find it more interesting each visit! (A Baptist lady from Macomb, Illinois)

Very interesting and informative. You are to be commended for how well the landmarks are kept. (L.D.S. lady from Georgia)

We have thoroughly enjoyed the tour. Makes us more fully appreciate our heritage in the church. (R.L.D.S. from Kansas City, Missouri)

Very enlightening and impressive. (An Anglican man from England)

Enjoyable experience. Courteous, intelligent young guides in a very important responsibility. (L.D.S. President of Seventy in charge of Temple Square guide service, Salt Lake City)

Many important people and many humble people have visited here. Regardless of position or the size of their bank account, these people need Christ and his church. Often I have felt a pouring out upon me of the Spirit of God as I have talked with various people. On one such occasion I received knowledge of my eventual calling to the office of Seventy, which was fulfilled eight months later. I am keenly aware of the necessity of maintaining a vigorous public relations and missionary program at the Joseph Smith Historic Properties in Nauvoo. Further, we need the co-operation and assistance of every member of the church in presenting to the world a witness of devoted discipleship and purpose in building up the kingdom of God so that visitors who first learn of Christ's church here may be invited and converted to the church in their own home area. Nauvoo could become an important cornerstone in the building of the kingdom and the evangelization of the world. Doctrine and Covenants, Section 107, has this divine instruction concerning the Nauvoo House and the guide service here:

... and let it [Nauvoo House] be a delightful habitation for man, and a resting place for the weary traveler, that he may contemplate the glory of Zion, and the glory of this the corner stone thereof; that he may receive also the counsel from those whom I have set to be plants of renown, and as watchmen upon her walls.

This Scripture is being fulfilled. The Nauvoo House will again be opened for week end groups as a "delightful habitation." The "weary traveler" now rests in comfort in the Visitors' Auditorium which is on the old foundation of the Nauvoo House. He "contemplates the glory of Zion" and the "glory of this corner stone" as he sees the grounds and hears the story of the Restoration in its truthfulness; and he "receives the counsel" of those who are "watchmen upon her walls." I am grateful that I have been able to be a small part in the carrying forth of this work at Nauvoo.

Hield will travel to French Oceania with Brother Tyree. Brother Olson will be looking into the establishment of an up-dated bookkeeping system for the mission and the building of a new church. Brother Hield will be making one of his periodic visits as apostle-in-charge.

At present there are about 2,300 members of the church in Polynesia. There are native members serving in the priesthood offices of elder, priest, teacher, and deacon.

Aside from the language problem, the church is faced with transportation difficulties in the islands. The members are scattered over an area nearly 1,000 miles long, and the main means of transportation between islands is a "five-miles-an-hour boat."

An up-to-date translation of the Doctrine and Covenants, a long-time need, is now near fulfillment. Since 1904 the church has used a translation of the first 127 sections in the native tongue. A corrected translation incorporating all the later sections will soon be ready for printing.

The church in French Oceania uses translations of the Bible and Book of Mormon that were printed by other denominations. Te Orometua (The Instructor) is a monthly eight-page paper printed in the native language. It is written mostly by the appointee ministers and contains missionary articles and news stories.

Brother Butterworth's new assignment is Ontario, Canada. He said he is looking forward to beginning his new assignment but still has some doubt about how he will do next winter when the Canadian weather turns cold. "It could be tough on an old South Sea Island hand," he said.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Moore stand outside their Country Store in Independence. The store is a museum of early American small town business. Goods range from oil lamps to high-button shoes.

They Make the Past Live Again

FOUR YEARS AGO, when the Presiding Bishopric wanted expert advice on restoring the Nauvoo historical properties, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Moore of Independence were consulted.

Results show it was a wise decision. Probably for the first time since the property was opened to the public, the buildings and furniture authentically reflect the period of the church's stay in Nauvoo.

President Israel A. Smith states, "Brother and Sister Moore have given most generously of their time and specialized skills in the restoration and furnishing of the Nauvoo properties. The church is indebted to them for the historic values added to these homes by their work."

Mr. and Mrs. Moore are experts in the field of antique furnishings and interiors. They have been in the antique business about twenty years. In the last two years they have had national publicity on their "Country Store" in Independence.

A "Country Store"

The store, opened in 1956, is a replica of the early American country store, complete with cracker barrel, penny candy, pot-bellied stove, dry goods department, impromptu checker game, and an old-fashioned barber shop with a red velvet upholstered chair and rack for moustache cups. The Country Store displays about 2,500 items and includes such goods as high-button shoes, carpet bags, leather leggings, and oil lamps.

One item, Sylvan-Orris-Myrrh tooth soap displays an early brand of advertising that sounds familiar today: it is guaranteed to "harden the gums, make the teeth pearly white. A fragrant and sweet breath confer. If used every day it will stop decay."

Newspaper and magazine articles featuring the Moores' Country Store have appeared from New York to New Orleans. They regularly are visited by tourists from distant states who have read about the store and have traveled far to see it.

In the beginning the Country Store was planned as a sort of museum in connection with the Moores' antique business which is still conducted in their adjoining home. When the Country Store began operation they sold only certain gift and novelty items from its shelves and used the store furnishings for display purposes. However, antique lovers and other visitors were so insistent in wanting to purchase antique items from the Country Store that gradually the Moores have found themselves having to replace many items that were sold.

Art to Antiques

Mr. Moore is an accomplished artist. He was a commercial artist until 1945 when he entered the antique business full-time "to find more time to paint." His oil paintings and water colors—mostly New England landscapes—are also for sale in the Country Store.

The Moores collect their antiques and Country Store displays on yearly trips to New England as well as in Missouri and the Midwest. They own an old sea captain's home on the coast of Maine which serves as their headquarters for antique buying in the East.

Their antique business began with a trip to the East soon after they were married. They bought antiques for themselves and for sale. They found that they sold all they bought and decided to make it a business.

In the years since then the Moores' knowledge of antiques has grown through much study and experience.

Restoring Nauvoo

In the four years that the Moores have been working on the Nauvoo project they have given many hours in planning, decorating, and acquiring authentic period furnishings for the buildings.

Some of the changes which visitors will see this summer are the pine floorings, exposed log walls and ceilings, authentic fireplaces, and period color schemes. All of these go to make a perfect background for the furnishings which mirror the times when Latter Day Saints were gathering to Nauvoo to build the largest city in Illinois.

"We were very fortunate in finding some marvelous bargains through our business contacts," Mr. Moore said, "We feel that we were able to make good use of the limited funds the church was able to give to the restoring of the historical properties. It was also fortunate that there were some nice pieces of the right period already at Nauvoo, and some good pieces have recently been donated."

Brother and Sister Moore related one memorable experience in their work at Nauvoo that was rather harrowing. Last year when most of the restoration work was complete, they received a two weeks' notice that two hundred members of the Illinois State Historical Society were to visit Nauvoo and see the church properties.

Several important pieces of work needed to be done to put the interiors of the buildings into shape for such a visit. It was obviously an opportunity to show off an important historical site to a group of people who would have a real appreciation for the properties. The Moores and others working on the project spent a very busy two weeks and when the time arrived, they were ready for the visitors. The members of the Historical Society left very favorably impressed. President Israel A. Smith and Seventy Robert Fishburn, as well as the Moores, were on hand to show the society through the buildings and answer questions on church history and the restoration of the properties.

"We count it a real privilege to have been able to help in this project," Mr. and Mrs. Moore said.

Unique Abilities

Making the Nauvoo properties live again fell into capable hands with the Moores. Their interest in restoring authenticity to historical properties formerly led them to restore several old houses in Independence. One, the old Woodson house, was for many years a show place of Early American furnishings. The house is now owned by a local lawyer.

With the Country Store in operation and the Nauvoo project almost completed, the Moores talk of restoring a country schoolhouse. Several years ago they acquired the desks and other antique equipment from an old schoolhouse in Maine. An early plantation schoolhouse near Independence is being considered. One day they may undertake it as another restoration job, using the antique school furnishings to make it a "little red schoolhouse" from out of the past.

The Moores bring an unusual combination of talents to their work in restoring antiques and interiors. Both have developed a good knowledge of antique American furnishings. This is coupled with Mr. Moore's artistic talents and the sewing ability of Mrs. Moore. Together they make a fine working team that has imagination, experience, contacts, and creative ability.

They greatly enjoy their antique hunting trips to the East. Sometimes it can be perilous, however. They have spent a lot of time in and under ancient structures looking for the treasures that are now seen in their Country Store and antique shop.

On one occasion, while searching through a barn loft in Maine, Brother Moore was warned to be careful. "I'll risk it," he said.

He fell through the loft floor and caught himself on the rafters with his elbows. Directly below him was an open cistern.

Old-fashioned Family

Mr. and Mrs. Moore have two sons, Sidney, Jr., and Gary. Sidney, Jr., is a high school student and an outstanding pianist.

Brother Moore holds the office of teacher and serves in the Stone Church congregation in Independence.

The Moores' Country Store is authentically old-fashioned in one more important respect—especially noticeable today: It is closed on Sunday. "That is the Sabbath," they point out.

ROGER YARRINGTON

Mr. Moore stands beside an antique barber chair displayed in the Country Store. The chair is upholstered in red velvet. Mr. Moore's paintings are also displayed and sold in the Country Store.

Question Time

Question

How shall I make out my annual tithing statement since I have been paying tithing for years but have lost my records?

Michigan

MRS. C. N.

Answer

Your question does not indicate the nature of the records that are lost. The Presiding Bishopric maintains an accurate record of all tithing paid, and this information is available to the tithing-payer upon request.

If one has filed a first tithing statement and has lost the record of expenses for a given year, it may be advisable to estimate as nearly as possible the amount spent for necessary expenses during the year and file on this basis.

In any case the Presiding Bishopric and the bishop's representative in the branch stands ready to assist any member to make an accounting.

If you would like to have some personal council or help please write to the Presiding Bishopric, the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Question

The Melchisedec priesthood was with Adam and came down the line. The Aaronic priesthood originated with Aaron. What kind of priesthood was used with the Melchisedec from Adam to Aaron's time to do the service of temporal affairs in the church?

Iowa

A. D.

Answer

I fear that question is based on an erroneous premise; namely, that the Aaronic priesthood "originated with Aaron." Although Scripture is silent about the men who held this priesthood before Aaron, it did not originate with Aaron any more than the Melchisedec priesthood originated with Melchisedec. The Aaronic priesthood evidently existed long before Aaron, for Aaron was chosen and ordained and set "in the priest's

Doctrine and Covenants 83: 3 says: "And the Lord confirmed a priesthood also upon Aaron and his seed throughout all their generations, which priesthood also continueth and abideth for ever, with the priesthood which is after the holiest order of God." The implication is plain. The priesthood "confirmed" upon Aaron was not a new priesthood which was invented to meet the emergency but one which was co-existent with the Melchisedec priesthood and which, like the higher priesthood, "continueth and abideth for ever."

Ever since Adam's fall there always has been and always will be need for the preparatory gospel of repentance, baptism, and remission of sins, which is the part of the gospel administered by the Aaronic priesthood (see Doctrine and Covenants 83: 4). Though I know of no scriptural record, it seems reasonable to assume that the Aaronic priesthood also existed from the beginning as the auxiliary of the Melchisedec.

Healings in Apostolic Church

A general description of the prevalence of the healing ministry in the times of the apostolic church is given in a summary of the events of the time.

And by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people; (and they were all with one accord in Solomon's porch. And of the rulers durst no man join himself to them: but the people magnified them. And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women.) Insomuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that at the least the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them. There came also a multitude out of the cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits: and they were healed every one.—Acts 5:12-16.

Another such general description of healings is given concerning the ministry of Philip (Acts 8:6, 7, 13).

Details are given in the Book of Acts on several specific cases of healing. Peter healed Aeneas of the palsy; he had been sick eight years (Acts 9:32-35). Peter was entering the temple with John and healed a man who had been lame from birth (3:1-8). Paul healed a man at Lystra who had been crippled from infancy (14:8-11). Paul cast an evil spirit out of a girl employed as a sibyl for commercial gain (16:16-18). On the island of Melita (Malta) on the way to Rome Paul healed the father of Publius of a fever (28:7-10). Paul restored Eutychus to life at Troas; the boy had fallen asleep from the extreme length of Paul's sermon and had fallen out of an upper window to the ground (20:7-12). Peter raised Dorcas from death at Joppa (9:36-42). An act the very opposite of healing, an affliction of blindness, was imposed by Paul upon Elymas the sorcerer, who was trying to interfere with the conversion of his master, Sergius Paulus, deputy of the isle of Paphos (13:6-12).

1. Command Healings

Five of the nine healings on which specific details are given in the Acts of the Apostles were command healings.

The lame man at the temple gate expected only money. To get his attention, Peter looked at him sharply and said, "Look on us!" Then he said, "Rise up and walk." The man was restored (3:1-8).

At Lydda, Aeneas was healed by command, "Arise, and make thy bed" (9:32-35). Peter performed this miracle.

At Joppa Peter restored Dorcas to life by command (9:36-42).

Paul healed the lame man at Lystra by command: "Stand upright on thy feet" (14:8-11).

Paul also cast the evil spirit out of the sibyl by direct command (16:16-18).

2. Prayer with Healing

It is recorded that when Peter came to the body of Dorcas at Joppa, he put out all the noisy mourners, "and kneeled down, and prayed." Then he issued the command that revived her (9:36-42). Paul also prayed over the father of Publius (28:7-10).

3. Laying on of Hands

In the healing of the father of Publius at Melita (already presented) Paul "laid his hands on him, and healed him" (28:7-10).

4. Lying on the Body

In restoring Eutychus to life, "Paul went down, and fell on him, embracing him." This is reminiscent of the actions of Elijah and Elisha in restoring dead persons to life, as previously discussed.

5. Healing by Contact with Objects

Something unusual in healing is related in the following:

And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul; so that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs and aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.—19:11, 12.

Note that this practice was for healing where Paul did not go to the sick ones, so it was a ministry for distances. No sanction has been received for this practice in the modern church literature.

6. The Use of Oil

Calling for the elders who are to pray over the sick and anoint them with oil in the name of the Lord is provided for in the one clear instruction on the subject that appears in James 5:14-16. The promise of blessing is contained with the instruction.

All the other Scriptures that have been cited up to this point have been by example. This gives us as much information as is available in the Scripture of the New Testament.

Jesus had promised his disciples: "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover" (Mark 16:19).

Thus all the features of the modern ministry to the sick are provided in the scriptural law: the prayer, the anointing with oil, the laying on of hands. It is possible that the consecration of the oil may be vaguely suggested, though not explicitly required, in the phrase from James, "anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

Healing in the Book of Mormon

The ministry of healing existed in Book of Mormon times when the spiritual condition of the people was right for it, and when there were leaders of spiritual power to make its benefits available to the people.

The healing of Zeezrom by Alma at Sidom is related, and important details are revealed in the account:

And also Zeezrom lay sick at Sidom, with a burning fever, which was caused by the great tribulations of his mind, on account of his wickedness, for he supposed that Alma and Amulek were no more; and he supposed that they had been slain, by the cause of his iniquity. . . .

Now when he heard that Alma and Amulek were in the land of Sidom, his heart began to take courage; and he sent a message immediately unto them, desiring them to come unto him. . . .

And when he saw them, he stretched forth his hand, and besought them that they would heal him.

Women of Good Works

Rebecca Jensen Froyd

A KNOCK AT THE DOOR interrupted Becky Froyd's study of the map of Washington, D. C. Hastily pushing it aside she answered the knock. "Oh, Brother Robley, I'm so glad to see you! Please come in." Pointing to the map she continued, "I'm trying to get my bearings so I can find the few Latter Day Saints here."

Elder George Robley, missionary, had just arrived in the city. In response to an invitation he had come directly to the Froyd apartment. "Yes, there are three or four members of the church here. Now that you have moved here, maybe we can arrange for a mission."

Rebecca Jensen—better known as "Becky" to her many friends—was born in a farm home in Bedison (near Maryville) Missouri, in 1884. Her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Jensen, were baptized into the Reorganized Church in Denmark. As a young married couple they came to the United States to find Zion and settled in Missouri. Their five children were well grounded in the doctrine of the church.

Becky was ten years old when she was baptized by Elder M. P. Madison. Church was the uppermost thought in Becky's mind, and her activities, even when she was a child, centered in the church. Her happy and loving disposition endeared her to everyone. As she grew older her desire for "service to God and man" also increased.

Becky became engaged to a young Missourian, also a member of the church. He accepted work in Washington, D. C., with the Railway Mail Service. After he left Missouri, Becky was lonesome and realized she must soon follow. So in 1907 she went to Washington and became Mrs. William Froyd.

As soon as they were settled in an apartment, Becky began to look for a branch of the Reorganized Church but found none. "I'll not give up for I'm sure there must be a few members here," she told Will one evening after a fruitless search. So she doubled her efforts and was rewarded by finding the Wilkinson family and a Brother Davison. She then began planning for a mission. After its organization, the Adolphus Edwards family (a big one) from Baltimore came many Sundays to meet with them and helped socially and spiritually. Many of the meetings were held in the Froyds' home.

A son, Lawrence, was born in Washington, and then in a couple of years Margaret arrived. In the meantime they had moved across the Potomac into Arlington, Virginia.

BECKY WAS an indefatigable worker. Keeping her home neat, her children clean and well dressed, she also filled a position as cosmetic buyer for one of Washington's large department stores. She was persistent in her effort to help in the church work.

The mission grew into a branch. Becky's steadfastness, cheerful ways, and bright countenance delighted the young people. She never forgot the "gladsomeness of youth" and was rewarded when the youngsters would say, "Where's Becky? We can't go without her!" They never thought of her as being older, for she was "one of them."

Brother and Sister F. Carl Mesle, who lived in Washington for a few years, paid her a wonderful tribute when they said, "Becky Froyd is one of the jewels of the church. Many things that others could not (or would not) do, were accomplished because of Becky Froyd. There was never any friction, but things just were done."

Becky rejoiced when her husband, William, was ordained an elder. Together they worked for the building of the kingdom.

The Froyd home was always open to the traveling missionaries. Apostle John Garver was a frequent visitor there and at times brought his family with him. In order to show the Froyds how much he felt at home he kicked off his shoes in the living room, saying, "This is indeed a home to me. I always feel so welcome." Apostle George Lewis spent many happy days there. Any missionary who stayed with the Froyds was invited to "make yourself at home. Fix your own lunch if you like when I'm away working." And many of them did.

During the war years many church members were temporarily located in Washington, D. C. Becky's home was open to all. "Our home is your home until you find something better," she often told the young women who came to Washington to work. Sister Dorothy Maze, whom Becky befriended, says, "She was a mother to many of us. When I'd return from a vacation, Becky did all my laundry. Nothing was too much trouble!"

Becky was skilled in the culinary art. She had made great progress from the time—in her early marriage—when she bought and cooked three pounds of dried beans for Will and herself.

Sunday mornings Becky was up unusually early preparing extra food, for she always brought a crowd home from church for dinner. Any visitors at the church—or a single girl living in a rooming house and hungry for a good home-cooked dinner—would be invited to a delicious meal. Then, too, Becky enjoyed doing a little match making and would always invite unattached males home for dinner.

WHILE APPARENTLY happy and cheerful, Becky Froyd had more than her share of worry and sorrow. Her beloved William died; then two years later her daughter Margaret died, leaving an infant son. Becky's faith and prayers sustained her. When the little grandson was blessed, Becky went to the altar with her son-in-law, George Wilcox. When Johnnie was one month old, Becky took him to her home and cared for him for three years, thereby beginning to instill in him the love of God.

For more than thirty years Becky attended the church services in the hall on Ninth Street. In the beginning she had set a goal—"a church building that will be worthy of the great R. L. D. S. religion"—and through the years she worked toward this goal. She gave numerous dinners in her home, doing most of the cooking. Personally, she held rummage sales. She gathered the clothing, carefully laundered and mended all garments, seeing that they were in salable condition, then stored them in her basement until the sale. (Being of a generous nature, Becky often shared these with poor people after she was convinced of their need, so the church fund did not grow very fast.) She also accumulated papers and magazines, tied them into bundles for sale, and stored them in her garage. Many discouragements were encountered. Sometimes when the branch needed money, Becky would delve into her savings to meet the local expenses. Then, as long as her health was good, she would renew her efforts to replace that money. At one time a friend helped Becky with her financial statement. She discovered that Becky had paid two hundred dollars as tithing when she really owed nothing.

Finally Becky's goal was realized. When the groundbreaking ceremony for the beautiful new church in Washington, D. C., took place, Becky was ill (the beginning of Parkinson's disease). But in spite of the illness, Becky was present and with assistance from others, she managed to turn over a little earth. She attended the first Sunday service in the church and has been present for two other meetings. She smiles now when any one reminds her that she had said, "If you don't get a church here before I'm gone, I'll come back and haunt you."

Although she is physically helpless from disease, Becky's mind is still alert. Her speech is curtailed, but she sometimes is able to ask, "What is going on among the Saints? Tell me more about the church. So sorry I can't help financially any more." If you tell her she has contributed more than her share she tries to answer, "Being able to help build the church in this great city was a wonderful privilege."

Becky is living now in the Brooks Grove Convalescent Home, Olney, Maryland. Her son, Lawrence, and his wife, Thelma, and the two grandsons give her loving attention.

Ye Have Done It unto Me

USUALLY DURING THE BUSY Christmas season we do not have much time for experiences, but once I had one. When I finished telling my eight-year-old daughter about it she looked up at me with wonderment in her light blue eyes and said softly, "Oh, Mother, you have a testimony."

My next door neighbor had just had an emergency operation. Since I am a nurse I thought that I could help her, and ordinarily it would have been easy. However, she had her operation in another town, so I did not have that opportunity of giving nursing care. But as I was ironing the next day, I had the strong urge to offer to do the family washing. At first I was inclined to let the urge go by as just a passing good thought. I could see the bushel of ironing I had to do! I could see the balls of lint under a chair and the film of dust on our furniture. The Brownies were coming over after school to finish their Christmas gifts for their mothers. At eleven that night I had to be on duty at the hospital where I am the relief nurse two nights a week. Oh, yes, it would have been very easy to let it slip by. Besides I think I have heard it said that you should take care of your family needs first. And then on the other hand I know I have read, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." So without thinking any more about it, I took my clothes basket and went to my neighbor's house. I gathered up the clothes and flew into action with my own conventional washer and had them on the line in no time at all.

That afternoon after the Brownies left, I brought in the washing and quickly did the steam ironing and fixed supper for my little girls. It was about six thirty and dark outside when I had time to slip over to my neighbor's with the clean clothes. On the way over I did not see the hole that had been dug by playing children, and down I went, feeling the sharp pulling of the muscles of my ankle and the sting of newly broken blood vessels. I knew I had a sprained ankle. As I tried to stand on it, I found it would not support my weight. As I sat there, I tried to think who could go on duty for me; I knew I couldn't go. Automatically I was about to call for my husband, when I remembered that he wasn't home. He is a missionary and is seldom home during the week. Besides, no one could hear me because the cold winter wind was blowing so loudly.

I tried once more to stand and did so, but my ankle still pained me considerably. I gathered up the scattered clothes and went about my mission. As I gave to my neighbors the results of my effort that day, I made mention of my recent fall. I received their thanks and left. I was halfway home when I realized that I was almost skipping. I stopped in my tracks. But I sprained my ankle; I know I did. I felt its pain only a few minutes ago. I should be at least limping a bit, I thought. It was then that I realized I had received a blessing. It had come quietly with no shouting or clapping of hands. It had come when forcefully these words came to me: "Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." In our dark yard that night there may have been a light. I do know that the rest of the evening, the night, and until early dawn I felt a warm radiance that could come only from my heavenly Father.

AS I ASSISTED in the birth of a baby that night at the hospital, I felt God was very near. After the mother was resting well in her comfortable bed and the baby was bathed, clothed, and wrapped snugly in its little crib, I went to the nursery window and looked out at the freshly fallen snow. The street light made the snow glisten, presenting a jeweled sight, and on the horizon the dawn of a new day was coming into view. I stood there thinking of our heavenly Father and his plan for his people on earth. I thought of the long time ago on a cold night when another mother had given birth to a baby in a stable because there was no room for them at the inn. Her baby was to be the Messiah. It was this King of Kings whose birthday would be remembered by millions of people in a few weeks. It was this baby who grew into manhood to be the Savior of men. And this Christ had said the words I had so wonderfully recalled only a few hours ago, ". . . Ye have done it unto me."

Frank C. Price

In February, 1958, Frank C. Price was appointed executive secretary of the Urban Renewal Board for the city of Des Moines, Iowa. Brother Price began his civic responsibilities as an engineer's helper in 1923, moving from this to the position of draftsman and of designing of public works projects for the city.

In 1945 he was appointed Housing Administrator for the city of Des Moines, in which position he was in charge of about 925 families and sixty-five places of business in the Fort Des Moines housing project. Included in his responsibility was another sixty families in a public housing project at the eastern edge of the city.

In 1957 the state legislature passed laws which freed the cities of Iowa to apply for help from the federal government in redevelopment and urban renewal. Brother Price was at this time appointed head of Redevelopment and Housing. This led, naturally, to the urban renewal program in Des Moines, which involves an area just north of the main business section including three hundred and forty acres of land, one thousand and four hundred families, and two hundred and twenty-five businesses.

In this capacity, Brother Price has appeared on KRNT-TV and WHO-TV and has spoken before various groups. He is a fine representative of the church. Publicity was also given him in the Des Moines Register and Tribune.

He was baptized at the age of fourteen, ordained a deacon in 1946, a priest in 1948, and an elder in 1949. He has served the church as pastor, chairman of building committees, and treasurer. He is now president of the Des Moines District.

And it came to pass that Alma said unto him, taking him by the hand, Believest thou in the power of Christ unto salvation?

And he answered and said, Yea, I believe all the words that thou hast taught.

And Alma said, If thou believest in the redemption of Christ, thou canst be healed.

And he said, Yea, I believe according to thy words.

And then Alma cried unto the Lord, saying, O Lord our God, have mercy on this man, and heal him according to his faith which is in Christ.

And when Alma had said these words, Zeezrom leaped upon his feet, and began to walk.

—Alma 10: 89, 91, 94-100.

In this ministry to the sick, prayer is included. Alma took Zeezrom by the hand. There is no indication of anointing with oil.

A general statement on the healings of Nephi indicates that there was a widespread ministry of healing under this man:

And in the name of Jesus did he cast out devils and unclean spirits; and even his brother did he raise from the dead, after he had been stoned and suffered death by the people;

And the people saw it, and did witness of it, and were angry with him, because of his power; and he did also do many more miracles, in the sight of the people, in the name of Jesus. . . .

But as many as were converted, did truly signify unto the people that they had been visited by the power and Spirit of God, which was in Jesus Christ, in whom they believed.

And as many as had devils cast out from them, and were healed of their sicknesses and their infirmities, did truly manifest unto the people that they had been wrought upon by the Spirit of God, and had been healed.

—III Nephi 3: 60-64.

The great healing ministry of Jesus at his coming among the Nephites in America is related in the following language:

And it came to pass that when he had thus spoken, all the multitude, with one accord, did go forth, with their sick, and their afflicted, and their lame, and with their blind, and with their dumb, and with all they that were afflicted in any manner; and he did heal them every one as they were brought forth unto him;

And they did all, both they who had been healed, and they who were whole, bow down at his feet, and did worship him.

—III Nephi 8: 9, 10.

After the departure of Jesus, the disciples he appointed to minister to the people performed many works, which are summarized in the following language:

And there were great and marvelous works wrought by the disciples of Jesus, insomuch that they did heal the sick, and raise the dead, and cause the lame to walk, and the blind to receive their sight, and the deaf to hear;

And all manner of miracles did they work among the children of men; and in nothing did they work miracles save it were in the name of Jesus.

—IV Nephi 1: 6, 7.

Student Nurses Elect Officers

The student nurses of the "San" School of Nursing have elected their officers for the school year 1958-59. Carrah Hendrix of Independence is the new president. Kay Cable of Independence is the vice-president; Janet Weable of Eagleville, Missouri, is secretary; and Nancy Scott of Nevada, Missouri, is treasurer. They will be the leaders of the approximately one hundred and twenty students that will be enrolled at the "San" this coming year.

School of Nursing Day

Sunday, April 27, was a day of great interest to the student nurses here at the "San." This day, which is set aside each year by the General Conference for our church members to contribute to the operation of the School of Nursing, brings the student nurses closer to the general church organization. This united presentation causes them to feel that they really are a part of the general membership and making a contribution of service.

We take this opportunity to thank each of the branches which took time to present the needs of School of Nursing and its work and to assist financially.

Student Nurses to Convention

The students nurses of the Missouri schools held their annual convention in St. Louis on April 17, 18, and 19. The "San" was represented by Beryl Jean Clesson of Oklahoma City, Carrah Hendrix of Independence, and Shirley Thomas of St. Louis. Miss Thomas served as a teller at the election of State Student Nurse officers.

April Showers

The annual spring festival of the School of Nursing was held on April 18. Karen Travis of Holyoke, Colorado, was chosen as queen to reign over the festivities. Her escort was Dr. Harry Jonas. Her two princesses were Mary Winston of Lee's Summit, Missouri, escorted by Dr. Vance Link, and Betty Worthington of Alpena, Michigan, escorted by Dr. James VanBiber.

The activities for the evening were under the direction of Alice Rupprecht of Caseyville, Illinois; Doreen Carpenter of Fulton, New York; Coleeta Antonio of Lorraine, California; and Kay Cable of Independence.

The evening was a very successful one and the financial returns assures the student body that they will be able to publish a yearbook again next year.

"San" Medical Staff Honored

March 30 was declared "Doctors' Day" at the "San." One day each year is designated on which the doctors who serve at the Sanitarium are honored. The Auxiliary of the medical staff presented each doctor with a red carnation. Refreshments were served to the doctors as their busy schedules permitted them to pause for a few minutes.

I used to think the Herald was the best paper I ever read, and you know something? Every Herald seems better than the last one. I didn't think that possible, because they have always filled my heart to the utmost. I have used them for talks, used the poems—and in fact I've used it every day, anywhere I could get a "listener." I not only read the editorials but study them also; this leads to research and more reading. And "I Had an Experience" is indeed a service to us. Thank you again for the Herald.

A Prayer Meeting Experience

There were ten people present, and all participated in the service. We spent ten minutes in preparation, singing and meditating before the meeting began. Then Hortense Dempsey came to me saying, "I have been commanded to have you and Elbert [her husband] administer to me!"

The meeting was blessed from the start with Spirit's presence. At the close we called for Sister Dempsey to come forward. Since there were three elders present I called them all into service.

Then Sister Bausell asked for the same rite. Following her administration came a request from Sister Palmer, making three candidates for administration, one for each elder.

Sister Palmer had been in the branch for about one year. The first time she came to church she was on crutches, having some type of muscular impairment that rendered her unable to walk without crutches. The next Sunday she was at church on her own power. I just returned from church today and talked to her husband who said she still walks without the aid of crutches. That was eighteen months ago.

Sister Bausell was thrown into the windshield and had broken a vertebra. She had to wear a support for her neck. Following the administration she took it off and never used it again.

Sister Dempsey was being treated for a tumor and was to see her doctor the next day for further examination. Because there were indications of cancer she was being prepared for surgery. But after the examination she was told that she was free not only of any cancer threat but of the tumor also.

Elder Dempsey told me that the doctor said it was about the size of his two fists when it was first discovered. Now there was no trace at all. The doctor was at a loss to know what had happened to the growth.

In harmony with the authority given by General Conference at the Business Session of Sunday, April 15, 1956 (Conference Herald, 116), the Board of Appropriations met at the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, Saturday, May 3. This Board consists of the First Presidency, the Council of Twelve, and the Order of Bishops. The three members of the Presidency, the three members of the Presiding Bishopric, the nine Apostles available in the United States, and twenty brethren of the Order of Bishops participated in the work of the Board.

Some of the time was spent giving consideration to the reports on appropriations to stakes and districts mentioned in the communication to the 1956 General Conference (Conference Herald, 107). Further action on this report was deferred until the meeting of the Board which was called for Saturday, October 4, 1958.

We submit herewith a schedule of the general church budget expenses for 1957 and of the appropriations for 1958. Appropriations for 1959 will be approved at the meeting of the Board next October and will be presented to the General Conference for final action.

The Board of Appropriations took action authorizing the Presiding Bishopric to provide funds to match those which may be available from the Hill-Burton Fund (State and Federal) for an addition to the School of Nursing facilities. This is to be made available in the event that such a grant is given; the anticipated amount approximates something over $30,000.

For many years the church has hoped to make provision for a pension for its employees other than those who are appointees. A pension plan has been developed to which both the church and the employees contribute. The amount needed to pay for past services of employees is approximately $40,000. Approval of an appropriation for this amount was had at this meeting.

Consideration of special appropriations, other than those mentioned above, was reserved until the October meeting.

Careful and painstaking preparation on the part of the Presiding Bishopric and the Pre-appropriations Committee (Elders W. Wallace Smith, G. Leslie DeLapp, and D. O. Chesworth) did much to facilitate the work of the Board, and the meeting was characterized by a fine spirit of unity and fraternity.

Very sincerely yours,
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY
 By ISRAEL A. SMITH

TRACT REVIEW

Should I Be Baptized Again?

Seventy James C. Daugherty, author of this tract, has collected from his experiences some of the reasons why a person should consider seriously the question, "Should I be baptized again?"

His initial presentation is the biblical occasion of Acts 19 when several disciples at Ephesus asked the same question of the Apostle Paul. He points out Paul's come-back question: "Unto what . . . were ye baptized?" Then he asks the reader of the tract to consider the reasons and bases for his own baptism.

Brother Daugherty presents the view that even if we are baptized several times, there is only one true baptism. He invites his reader to find the church of Jesus Christ and "be baptized into Christ." The question of priesthood authority is discussed briefly in a later paragraph.

The tract closes with several important quotations. One is Paul's familiar "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Another is by John Foster: "A man without a decision never belongs to himself; he belongs to whatever can capture him." Then follows reasoning: "To be baptized again—into the church of Jesus Christ—does not mean you discard the good and truths you knew before. Every good thing you have had before can be carried over into the new. You don't destroy the ideals, motives, and devotion of your former baptism by being rebaptized; you only redirect them into the larger channel of further truth which is in Christ and his church."

Single copy price of this tract is 4 cents. Quantity purchases reduce this as much as one half.

WATCH YOUR WORDS

Many untrained speakers and writers mar the effects of their efforts by wordiness. Perhaps those little three-letter words such as "and" and "the" are most common offenders. Yet these are quite important words when properly used.

Paul did not say, as many of us have claimed concerning the church, "We are built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets" (Ephesians 2:20). Human beings make a poor foundation for a divine institution. The church of Christ existed for a time without apostles. What Paul said was that the household of God rests on the same foundation that supported the faith and works of the apostles and prophets. That little word "the" makes the difference. C. B. H.

A DECLINE IN DRINKERS

The beer, wine, and ale industry is desperate, and advertising efforts will become more and more frantic in the months ahead. The most recent Gallup poll on America's drinking habits revealed a marked decline in percentage of drinkers. In 1957, 58 per cent of those over 21 said they drank on occasion.

This year the percentage had dropped to 55. Gallup has been asking the same question annually since 1945. In the thirteen years the percentage of drinkers has dropped 12 per cent with a corresponding rise in abstainers. —The Methodist "Clipsheet"

FRIENDS

Life is good with the friends we have made,
And the joys which in common we share.
We want to live on—not because of ourselves,
But because of the people who care.
It's living and doing for somebody else—
On this all life's spendor depends,
And the joys of the world—when you've summed it all up
Are found in the keeping of friends.

Into the Latter-day Light

This volume is from the pen of a man who came in touch with the work of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints early in life, and immediately gave up everything which interfered with the development of a Latter Day Saint character—a character of devoted service to God and for his fellow men. New President of Graceland

SINCE THE resignation of E. J. Gleazer, Jr., as President of Graceland College there has been concern throughout the church as to his successor. The following letter from the Board of Trustees signed by Earl T. Higdon, chairman of the board, will announce to the church the decision which has been reached after several months of research, interviews, and discussions regarding this very important position. We quote this letter in its entirety because we feel that it sets forth very clearly the situation pertaining to the selection of Dr. Harvey Howard Grice as President of Graceland College:

May 12, 1958

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY
THE AUDITORIUM
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

Dear Brethren:

We are happy to inform you that the Board of Trustees of Graceland College has elected Dr. Harvey H. Grice to the office of President of Graceland College as of July 1, 1958. Since the resignation of Dr. E. J. Gleazer, Jr., on September 1, 1957, Dr. W. S. Gould, vice-president-dean, has been serving as acting president. Dr. Gould has been serving in two capacities and is to be commended for the good work as acting president which he has willingly done at our invitation. With the coming of Dr. Grice, he will continue to serve as vice-president-dean.

Dr. Grice is a chemical engineer and manager of manufacturing and engineering of the Kankakee (Illinois) operations of the General Foods Corporation. He will assume his duties as President of Graceland College as soon after July 1 as satisfactory termination with General Foods Corporation will permit.

Dr. Grice comes to Graceland with a splendid background. He has a strong heritage in the church. He is the son of John R. Grice, lifelong missionary. His grandfather, William M. Grice, was a high priest in the church. Harvey Grice has been actively engaged in church work wherever he has lived. He was ordained a deacon in 1926 in Michigan, a teacher in 1936, and an elder in 1938 in Ohio. He has been pastor or assistant pastor in several congregations. He has had experience as district president or counselor to a district president in two districts. In 1956 he was ordained a high priest, and at the present time is president of Northeastern Illinois District.

Brother Grice has a splendid academic background. In high school he was active in sports, music, drama, as well as finishing second in his class. He received his collegiate education at Ohio State University, receiving his Doctor of Philosophy degree in 1941. His academic work was on a high level as attested to by his election to Tau Beta Pi, Engineering Honorary Society; Phi Lambda Upsilon, Chemistry Honorary Society; Sigma Xi, Scientific Honorary Society.

Dr. Grice has evidenced administrative talent and skill by the position which he now holds with the General Foods Corporation. His administrative ability has also been evident in his work as a church leader.

Harvey Grice married Ruth Lively, a Graceland alumna of 1941. Sister Grice is also from a fine church family. Brother and Sister Grice have four children: William H., fourteen; Ruth Ellynn, ten; Geoffrey, seven; and Mary Sherilynn, five.

We feel that Brother Grice is the kind of man into whose care the church may well trust its young people. We are sure that the church will be glad to know that Brother Grice has made himself available at considerable sacrifice for this responsibility, and we ask for him the support of the church everywhere.

Sincerely,

EARL T. HIGDON, Chairman
Board of Trustees

We are very conscious of the importance of higher education. Particularly are we concerned that higher educational opportunities shall be made available for our church young people as they complete their high school education. To this end we are interested that Graceland College shall be the kind of institution that will challenge all who enter its doors to higher achievement in the field of education and learning.

It is eminently desirable that men and women of both spiritual quality and academic competence shall make up the faculty of Graceland College, and it is especially desirable that we have as president of the college one who is not only well qualified but who has a high degree of devotion and concern for the church as the parent body and sponsoring institution of the college. We recognize such a person in Dr. Harvey H. Grice and feel that the Board has made a wise selection in choosing him to head our college. We solicit for him your support and pledge to him through the columns of the Herald our support and extend to him our best wishes for the success of his administration.

The following statement by the First Presidency concerning administration to the sick was approved by the Standing High Council on January 16, 1958.

THERE is perennial interest in the relation of faith to healing and in the spiritual resources available through the church for the restoration of those who are sick. Because of recent questions which have come to us we have checked our impressions with a number of high priests and elders and have discussed the matter with the Standing High Council of the church. In harmony with those consultations we have set out here a number of typical questions and our replies thereto. We trust that these will be of value to the elders and to the Saints in general.

Is the ordinance of administration to the sick outmoded because of advances made in the practice of medicine?

No. To the contrary, the evidence seems to be that the wise use of the ordinance is repeatedly vindicated. While it is true that many diseases which once plagued humanity have been brought under control through effective medical treatment, and the area of this control is being increased every day, many of the maladies so evident in our day make heavy demands on our faith as well as on our medical skills. The spiritual causes underlying ill health are now widely recognized by doctors and psychiatrists as well as by religious leaders. Moreover, administration to the sick is justified in its spiritual values, above and beyond the physical healing which is also sought.

Under what scriptural authority do the elders administer to the sick?

Each of the Three Standard Books testifies to the healing of the sick through the prayer of faith. The promise of such healing is most succinctly stated in the epistle of James:

Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.—James 5: 14, 15.

This admonition and promise has been renewed to us in our own time:

The elders of the church, two or more, shall be called, and shall pray for, and lay their hands upon them in my name; and if they die, they shall die unto me, and if they live, they shall live unto me.—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12 d. (See also Doctrine and Covenants 42: 13 a, b; 46: 7 c; 119: 9 c).

*What is the law concerning the blessing and use of oil?

There is no law known to us directing what kind of oil shall be used in administering to the sick, or indicating how, when, or why the oil should be set apart or consecrated for such use. It has become the custom in the church to use olive oil, which was presumably the oil used by the Savior and the early saints. In view of this tradition we believe that the oil used should be olive oil, except in case of an emergency, when we feel that other oil is equally acceptable. The oil used should be of good quality and should be kept free of contamination and stored according to the instructions of the manufacturer. When once it has been blessed, or consecrated, this oil should not be used for any purpose other than that for which it has been set apart.

It is our tradition that bottles or cans holding the oil to be blessed should be opened during the act of blessing, although failure to open the container should not be held to invalidate the blessing.

While there is no rule indicating the exact manner in which oil should be consecrated, we suggest that it should be held in the hands of the elders while they ask the blessing after the following manner:

Our Father who art in heaven, we present before thee this oil in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, thy Son, and ask thee that thou wilt accept it at our hands, that it may be blessed, consecrated, and set apart to right and holy uses. We pray thee to grant that whosoever may use this oil in administering therewith may do so in faith, nothing doubting; that those to whom this oil shall be administered may accept the administration in faith, having confident trust in thee, that thy purposes shall be wrought in them through their devotion to thy will and the ministry of thy Spirit. Amen.

We suggest this merely as a pattern and have neither the right nor the disposition to direct that it shall be used and that no other pattern will be acceptable.

How much oil should be used in anointing?

Enough oil should be used to be felt—not enough to be unpleasant or embarrassing. This requires one or two drops.

What is the function of the oil in the ordinance of administering to the sick?

It is widely believed among the elders that the major function of the oil is to be symbolic of the cleansing and healing power of the Holy Spirit. In administration the oil is not used for its medicinal properties and certainly should not be held to have healing qualities intrinsic to itself which are applicable to the treatment of every disease. The use of oil in this ordinance is inseparably related to the prayer of faith.

What part of the body should be anointed?

The head or, under some circumstances, the forehead. The anointing of other parts of the body, especially open wounds, should be discouraged.

The internal use of consecrated oil in connection with administration is a tradition among the Saints in many parts of the church. Because there is no warrant for this in the law, we would not encourage such use. We do not feel free to go further than this.

How long should be the prayers of anointing and confirmation?

There is unanimous agreement among the elders consulted that the prayer of anointing should be very brief. It recognizes

No Baptisms before Eighth Birthday

Because of many inquiries which continue to be received, we wish to call attention to the very positive terms of our church law, according to which children under eight years old are not eligible for baptism. (See General Conference Resolution 552, adopted April 15, 1904).

This conference action is an interpretation of the fundamental law in Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4.

Children who are prepared for baptism in prebaptismal class and elsewhere, but who have not attained their eighth birthday by Children's Day, should be baptized in special services occurring after they are eight or, if thought wise by the pastor, the date of Children's Day might be postponed for a short time so as to accommodate them.

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Word comes from Lee Abramson of Spokane, Washington, that Seventy James C. Daugherty has passed through a critical operation. Through the prayers and fasting of the Saints he was greatly blessed.

Brother Abramson is grateful for the unity of the response to this request for prayer and feels that it has bound the people together.

The following report was recently received from Apostle P. E. Farrow:

April 27 a college student and military personnel conference was held on the Lewis River campgrounds in Washington.

Five districts in Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia were included. About fifty persons attended.

It was a very profitable experience. A great deal of worth-while ministry was given by many who participated.

I had the opportunity to see at closer range the work being done by Carl Mesle, assistant to the First Presidency for ministry to college students and Armed Forces personnel. I believe he is performing a much-needed ministry to these people who many times do not otherwise receive essential church contacts.

I am sure that meetings of this kind, together with the ministry that is being given in our other church endeavors, will bring immeasurable returns in the future.

Mrs. Otto Slasor Dies

Word came last Monday that Ena Talberg Slasor, member of the Council of Women of the General Church, died on Sunday. The funeral was in Detroit on May 13. Three of her children are Graceland graduates, and one is now enrolled. She had been active for years in the women's department and in civic affairs. The Home Column will soon carry a tribute to this outstanding leader who blessed the church with talents.

Pastoral Issue

The "Saints' Herald" for June 16 will be a special issue devoted to the pastors or presiding elders and their work. These servants of the church are in touch daily with the membership and the community they serve. Read this issue to get a better overview of the pastoral ministry.

How Can We Use Our Talent for the Church?

VERY SOON now the Auditorium will be finished and the work and labor and sacrifice which have gone into its completion will need to be justified in the kind of use to which it is put. I have been asked to "dream a little" as to the future of the Auditorium and its impact on the cultural life not only of the Center Place but on the church as a whole; however, I find it difficult to limit my thoughts in this direction only to the Auditorium.

When this building is completed we will need artists of all descriptions to give concerts, lectures, recitals, and exhibits so that it will actually be used to promote the kind of culture that ought to be characteristic of Zion builders. This is going to take people who have dedicated their lives both to the church and to excellence in their chosen art or profession. The Auditorium should be a place of great preaching, great music, great drama, great painting, great sculpture; in other words, a place of greatness in all the cultural pursuits of life. Of course it ought to be more than that. It ought to be a place, too, of uplifting worship which will motivate the worshippers to a sense of commitment to build the kingdom of God on earth, a place where inspiration to great living will be commonplace. If it doesn't fulfill these purposes we are, all of us, going to fall short of the opportunities which are ours.

Many times, I have to answer the question put to me by young people over the church, "How can we use our talent and experience for the church?" If we look at that question from the standpoint of the immediacy of the problem it is hard to answer a young person who decides to devote his or her life to music for worship, simply because music in our church is placed on a voluntary basis; and, frankly, I can't see that that picture is ever going to be very materially changed. The one who makes a profession of church music rarely has the opportunity of using that profession in our church. In a way this is discouraging. Of course there are many other fine professions which do not give, and perhaps never will give, an opportunity to work directly for the church. However, if one looks at the problem and this particular question from a larger viewpoint everyone may have an opportunity to identify his work with the church, and the church with his work. I strongly believe that the church needs to develop artists, artisans, and experts in all fields—people who are loyal and devoted members of the church and at the same time excel in their chosen profession.

We hear many times, for instance, of famous people of the world who let it be known far and wide, indeed they make a point of the fact, that they are members of this or that church denomination. What they are actually doing is identifying their fame and renown and influence with their church, and this is all to the good because it also implies that the influence of the church has been in their lives and caused them to rise to that degree of renown. Our church greatly needs that kind of, shall we call it, publicity. After all, the gospel ought to make superlative men and women in all walks of life. If it doesn't, there is something wrong.

The Auditorium Organ

Perhaps in less than two years now we will have a beautiful new organ in the Auditorium. It won't be the largest or most expensive organ in the world, but I have been told by experts in the field that our organ will no doubt become one of the famous organs in this country and perhaps internationally because of the quality of the instrument. I keep asking myself, What good is this organ unless we have some great artists of the keyboard to play on it? Otherwise just about any organ would do that would perform the functions of providing appropriate music for our Conference sessions. In other words, where is our Latter Day Saint Marcel Dupré? Not only the one for today but the one fifteen or twenty-five years from now? No doubt that one now is going to high school or perhaps even grade school, but who is he and where is he? And what about the life of the church in the branches throughout the world, is it going to inspire some youngster to rise to that kind of fame?

Messiah Soloists

We have an immediate problem in the providing of soloists for our annual Messiah broadcasts. We have it, again not only for today but for five, ten, or twenty years from now, and if we have to choose from only one possibility in each of the four voice ranges in a church the size of ours, we are indeed impoverished. There should be now, and coming in the future, a number of soloists of the caliber and experience who could be called upon to perform our Messiah broadcasts. Again the question, Is the quality of worship, inspiration, and motivation to excel and to great living present in our branches sufficient to produce these future soloists, not only for Messiah but for the many other times that they could be used at Conference or headquarters and also throughout the church?

Art Appreciation

The Auditorium has a museum and gallery which has been completed now for about two years and in which there have been several art exhibits. As a matter of fact, however, we haven't even scratched the surface in this direction, and the whole matter of art appreciation should come up for some serious consideration on the part of adults throughout the church so that a later generation might appreciate artistic trends in the fields of painting and sculpture to the extent that those generations will produce outstanding artists. Again, not only for the sake of the renown that it will bring the artist himself but also for the renown that he might bring to the church.

I readily admit that the church will have to do a superlative job of conditioning any young person who is going into some of the artistic fields. The field of ballet, for instance, or of drama where the school life and the professional life will meet a Bohemian living influence which will take a person with a very strong character to withstand the pressures with which he will be surrounded, pressures toward a kind of life which would be the antithesis of that of a true Latter Day Saint. But here again the motivation toward righteous living needs to go hand in hand with the motivation toward excellence in a chosen profession or field.

A Quality of Life

What we have said about music and the other arts is equally true in the field of the development of high excellence in preaching and teaching.

It will now be apparent why I stated that it is difficult to narrow the field just to the use of the Auditorium. Really what we are talking about is a quality of life regardless of the Auditorium. But this Auditorium becomes a focal point in our thinking and will no doubt also be a focal point in our functioning in these various fields. And its completion really points up a problem which has always been with us, but also one to which we need to give some major consideration now.

Another facet of this whole problem is the fact that if we do develop great artists, musicians, and preachers, we ourselves, as a church, need also to develop our appreciations for the work of these people. Greatness in any of these fields cannot be developed in a cultural vacuum. We need to nurture interests and talents among us, and that nurture will take many forms, including an interest in the products of these talents, even perhaps some financial help along the way, and certainly the moral support and encouragement that comes from loved ones and members of that larger family which we call the branch, or with the church at large. It is improbable that a Heifetz will ever be developed in a branch or community where hillbilly music is considered the peak of the musical art.

We do have this immediate need for a justification of this magnificent Auditorium in the use to which it is put, but while we are fulfilling that need as best we may with what we now have, we need also to keep in mind the future and to begin to build now a wider horizon throughout the membership of the church in regard to the arts, not only the so-called fine arts but also the art of worship, preaching, and spiritual growth so that the future will hold for us a greater promise than we have at the present.

What I have been trying to say boils down to just this: Anyone who will develop his or her talent and become expert and famous in a profession of his or her choice can at the same time bring renown to the name of the church and be doing a great service to the church, even though the church does not employ his or her full time in the chosen profession. Artists and sculptors should try to get showings in the famous art fairs and exhibits throughout the land, and at the same time live lives whose "light so shines that others may see his good works and glorify our Father which is in heaven." And organists, composers, musicians of all kinds should become outstanding artists in the field of music while at the same time tying their lives so closely to the church that it is identified with every good thing they do.

Finally, the answer to that question, "How can we use our talent and experience for the church?" is that you should use your talent and experience in every walk of life. At the same time walk uprightly, live righteously, and let it be known far and wide that the church has an influence in your life and that you are devoting your life to the church as well as to your art. Then you are in fact using your talent and experience for the church, regardless of whether or not you are employed by the church.

that the anointing is in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and petitions the presence of the Holy Spirit in the ordinance. There also appears to be unanimous agreement that the prayer of confirmation should be a little longer, but that it also should be comparatively brief. Specifically, it should not be so long as to be fatiguing but should be long enough to minister to spiritual comfort and faith. In this connection attention is called to the following:

Prophesying over them that are sick in administering to them has been a fruitful source of trouble among my people. They must observe that this they are not required to do except there be a direct manifestation of the Spirit which may direct it. Pray over the sick, anoint them with oil, as commanded in the law, and leave them in my hands, that the Spirit may deal with them according to my wisdom.—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 15 a, b, c.

May consecrated oil be properly used by those who are not elders?

We know of no specific law which authorizes such use. On the other hand, there is widespread and long-held tradition favoring this use, especially when the elders are not available, and we cannot see our way clear to advise against this practice with any degree of assurance. But we must hold that it cannot take the place of administration under the hands of the elders. The use of oil in this manner, in the absence of any authorization in the Scriptures, might easily lead to superstitious regard for the oil, and this should be scrupulously avoided. The principle seems to be that God has promised certain blessings through administration. This is not to say that under other conditions, not specified, a blessing cannot also be received. The significant factor is the prayer of faith.

Is the ordinance of administration consistent with calling for medical aid?

Yes. There seems to be good reason for believing that "anointing him with oil" was accepted medical practice in the time of the apostles (Luke 10: 35). In our own time divine revelation approved "the use of that which wisdom directs" (Doctrine and Covenants 119: 9 c). Certainly the appointment of a church physician who is to serve "in his spiritual office and his calling as a physician" (Doctrine and Covenants 127: 2 c) would seem to indicate that there should be no conflict between the use of approved skills and remedies and administration in the spirit of faith.

The Ministry of Broken Things

THE PARENTS of a young girl who showed promise of becoming a talented singer proudly took her to a great master and requested an audience with him.

The artist himself accompanied the girl on the piano and listened carefully as she sang. When she had finished, he dismissed her, then faced her parents. "Take her home," he said gently, "and bring her back when her heart is broken."

In amazement, the parents voiced their strong objections. But the master shook his head and replied, "Your daughter has a beautiful voice, but it has no depth, no feeling. She needs to live a little more." And then he added a truism that they knew full well. "Life has a way of breaking our hearts over one thing or another."

Is there a ministry of broken things? There is much in the Scriptures that would lead us to believe so. Often the breaking was first necessary that a blessing might come to the children of men.

In the book of Judges, the Midianites conquered the Israelites and burned their crops, causing them to flee to the hills for safety. They cried to the Lord for succor, and he called a stalwart leader named Gideon from their midst. The young prophet listened to the voice of God and chose three hundred men. He equipped them with trumpets and pitchers. At a given signal, each man blew his trumpet and broke the pitcher resulting in such noise and confusion that the enemy fled in terror. The breaking of the pitchers brought the desired blessing—victory!

Jeremiah the prophet lived in a time when the Israelites were besieged by the enemy without the city walls and were suffering from hunger within the gates. Knowing full well that misfortune had befallen them because of their evil doings, Jeremiah cried to them to repent and return to God. "Break up your fallow ground and sow not among thorns," was the word of the Lord to them. In breaking up the ground, they would take the first step toward reaping the blessing of a harvest. Both the ground and their lives were fallow. They needed to break up the evils that threatened to destroy them and sow good deeds in order for God to bless them.

A GREAT PROPHET once thought to run away from duty. Jonah had been commanded by God to go to the city of Nineveh and preach repentance to the people. He rebelled and boarded a ship headed in the opposite direction. A terrible storm arose which threatened to break up the ship. Seeing the impending peril, Jonah began to repent and, rather than have the ship and its occupants lost, he told the sailors to throw him overboard. Subsequently, he repented and went on his way to Nineveh. His preaching saved the people and the city from destruction.

In the gospel of Mark, while Jesus was preaching to a houseful of people, four friends of a sick man sought entrance that they might bring him to the Master for healing. Refused admittance, they carried the sick one to the roof and proceeded to open the roof so they could lay the man at Jesus' feet. The broken roof opened the way for the blessing of restored health to the man with the palsy.

The Apostle Paul was a prisoner on a ship bound for Caesarea. Paul had tried to warn the captain against sailing, but he would not listen. At sea the ship ran into a terrible storm which lasted many days and filled the passengers with fear. The wreck that followed broke the ship to pieces, yet Paul and every one of the two hundred and seventy-six men aboard were saved. Cast on the island of Melita, Paul was able to render a wonderful ministry to its people. He stayed for six months, preaching and healing the sick. The broken ship interrupted Paul's journey to Rome, but a great blessing was made possible to a group of God's children in need of comfort and ministry.

ONE OF THE LAST ACTS of Jesus before his crucifixion was to meet with his disciples in the upper room to eat the last supper. He broke bread with them and commanded that, after his departure, they should meet together often to partake of the wine and bread in memory of his broken body and spilled blood. In the ministry of broken things, the greatest of all was made possible by the sacrifice of our Lord and Redeemer on the cross of Calvary where he gave his life that he might "draw all men" unto him. Each time we partake of Communion, the broken bread serves to refresh our minds of the One who made possible the resurrection and the gift of eternal life.

The broken heart and the broken spirit are mentioned many times by the Psalmist, always with the promise that God is near to comfort and sustain in times of need. Because we live in a physical, imperfect world, we are subject to illness, accident and tragedy. God's people have not been promised immunity from these things. In the parable of the two houses the Master warned that the same storms beat upon both houses. "The floods descended and the winds blew," but the house upon the rock fell not. The hard experiences of life often cause us to lean on God. He has said that he will bind up our wounds and give strength for every trial.

Someday, says Solomon in the book of Ecclesiastes, the silver cord of life will break and the spirit return to the God who gave it. Those who merit the "well done, good and faithful servant," shall surely meet with joy their Creator and Redeemer and receive the greatest blessing of all, eternal life.

The Ministry of Healing

Part IV

Instructions from the Doctrine and Covenants

1. Require Not Miracles

Require not miracles, except I shall command you; except casting out devils; healing the sick; and against poisonous serpents; and against deadly poisons; and these things ye shall not do, except it be required of you by them who desire it, that the Scriptures might be fulfilled, for ye shall do according to that which is written.—Section 23: 6.

2. For Those who Lack Faith

And whosoever among you are sick, and have not faith to be healed, but believe, shall be nourished with all tenderness with herbs and mild food, and that not by the hand of an enemy.—Section 42: 12 c.

3. For Those Who Are Sick

And the elders of the church, two or more, shall be called, and shall pray for, and lay their hands upon them in my name.—Section 42: 12 d.

(Anointing with consecrated oil, or any anointing, is not mentioned.)

4. For Those Who Die

And if they die, they shall die unto me, and if they live, they shall live unto me.—Section 42: 12 d.

5. Gifts of Healing

And again, to some it is given to have faith to be healed, and to others it is given to have faith to heal.—Section 46: 7 c.

6. Do Not Prophesy over the Sick Unless Directed

Prophesying over them that are sick in administering to them has been a fruitful source of trouble among my people. They must observe that this they are not required to do except there be a direct manifestation of the Spirit which may direct it.—Section 125: 15 a, b.

7. Pray; Anoint with Oil

Pray over the sick, anoint them with oil, as commanded in the law.—Section 125: 15 c.

8. Leave Them in God's Hands

And leave them in my hands, that the Spirit may deal with them according to my wisdom.—Section 125: 15 c.

9. Warning against False Manifestations

Many spiritual manifestations have been had. Some of these have been false, and under the operation of the law which I gave many, many years ago, those who make these false presentations are not to be feared among my people.—Section 125: 15 d.

10. Warning against Errors of Human Sympathy

They are not justified in permitting their human sympathies to overcome that which has been written in my Scriptures. The spirit of the prophets is subject to the prophets.—Section 125: 15 e.

Joseph Smith Healed by Command

An account of how Joseph Smith once healed by command is related in Hayden's History of the Western Reserve (pp. 249-250; quoted in Church History, Volume I, page 91):

Ezra Booth, Mantua, a Methodist preacher of much more than ordinary culture, and with strong natural abilities, in company with his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, and some other citizens of this place, visited Smith at his home in Kirtland, in 1831. Mrs. Johnson had been afflicted for some time with a lame arm, and was not at the time of the visit able to lift her hand to her head. The party visited Smith partly out of curiosity, and partly to see for themselves what there might be in the new doctrine. During the interview, the conversation turned on the subject of supernatural gifts, such as were conferred in the days of the apostles. Some one said, "Here is Mrs. Johnson with a lame arm; has God given any power to men now on earth to cure her?" A few moments later, when the conversation had turned in another direction, Smith rose, and walking across the room, taking Mrs. Johnson by the hand, said in the most solemn and impressive manner: "Woman, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, I command thee to be whole," and immediately left the room. . . .

Mrs. Johnson at once lifted it up with ease, and on her return home the next day she was able to do her washing without difficulty or pain.

It is not to be supposed that Joseph Smith followed this practice in general. In his history of the church, he mentions that when he and Bishop Whitney were returning from Independence to Kirtland in the spring of 1832, the latter was the victim of a broken leg in a runaway accident near New Albany, Indiana, and Joseph remained with him four weeks caring for him and "administered to him till he was able to be moved" (Church History, Volume I, page 250). Regular administration, apparently, was the more common procedure. Details on the ceremony of administration, however, are not indicated at this point.

Joseph Smith III, and Ministry to the Sick

From 1860 to January, 1866, Joseph Smith III, son of the martyr and the first president of the Reorganization, presided over the branch of the Reorganization at Nauvoo. In his Memoirs he wrote of his experience in the ministry of healing at that time:

The Nauvoo Branch over which I presided had been growing steadily, though a few had also begun to move away. In the late summer and early fall an epidemic of some kind raged through the city, and a number of our members were stricken. The chief symptom seemed to be a low but persistent fever and much weakness. My brother David and I were the only available elders and we were kept constantly busy administering to our sick, as many as twenty-two being down at the same time. We visited each of these every day, going to some in the forenoon and the rest in the afternoon. No physicians were called in any of these cases, and the exercise of faith seemed to bring gratifying rewards, for out of the twenty-two only three were lost—a little son of Brother Chambers, Manada, the beautiful fourteen-year-old daughter of Brother Kendall, and Sister Hyrum G. Hall.

Sister Hall had been healed under administration, but was exposed, in her weakened condition, to the weather, due to the unwise and inconsiderate action of her husband, according to the further account of President Smith. Her death could have been avoided.

It will be noted that the people relied solely upon administration to the sick for relief from their sufferings. A further experience of President Joseph Smith relates to this matter and is in the following.

Physicians—and Administration

The problem involved when church members employ the services of physicians, and also call for administration, was a serious concern to President Joseph Smith. The following quotation will present the problem and also the solution at which he ultimately arrived:

The years 1878 and 1879 were years of trouble in the branch of the church at Plano, Illinois. Business was dull, the times hard; and during the fall of 1878 and all of the year 1879 there was considerable sickness among all classes. . . . The branch was quite large, but owing to circumstances there were not more than three or four elders available for visiting the sick as the law provides. . . .

These calls were numerous and came at all hours of the night and day, and it was quite a usual thing for these three to be out from supper time till near midnight answering to requests for administration. Nor were the requests all made by those who belonged to the church; quite a number of the neighbors and friends of the Saints having learned of the effective benefits derived from administration, availed themselves of the faith and asked to be visited, which of course was granted.

One thing was annoying, and to us elders seemed anomalous to say the least of it, and that was that among many, both the members of the church and those not of the church, physicians were employed; and, sometimes, both doctors and elders would be found at the bedside of the sick at the same time, or following each other at intervals.

This seemed to work well for a time, but finally became irksome in thought to the elders, and perhaps also to the doctors; though none of the latter complained that we heard of. The sick seemed satisfied and not many died.

One night at the close of a long and tedious day a good part of which was spent in going from place to place, visiting and administering to the sick, the writer, after a talk with his companion elders had about concluded that he would refuse to go to places where a physician was employed. . . .

After going to bed that night, President Smith had a remarkable spiritual experience, in which his mind and attitude were reversed on this decision. A messenger appeared and recounted the experiences and his discussion of them. He concluded with this:

Well, then, believing as you say you do, that the power by which the healing is done is the power of God; and that in each instance where an administration is had, whether the elders alone are called, or a doctor is also called, the healing power is sent or withheld according as it is decided by the wisdom of God, do you not think that it is your duty, the duty of the elders who believe and teach the doctrine of the laying on of hands, to go when called and administer according to such belief and teaching, and leave the matter in God's hands to send the power and heal, or otherwise as he may in his wisdom decide, whether a doctor has been called in or not?"

Somewhat reluctantly, "Well, yes; I suppose so."

And from that day to this when called to visit and administer to the sick the writer has gone when he could consistently without asking or caring whether a doctor had been called or the elders alone. He believes the visitation was intended to teach him his duty, and incidentally the duty of the elders generally, in the matter of administering to the sick and suffering, whether the faith of them who were administered to was weak or strong.—Saints' Herald, 44: 81-83 (February 10, 1897).

Danger in Prophesying Concerning the Sick

In addition to the warning contained in the Doctrine and Covenants the following is significant in relation to the harm that may come from prophesying over the sick:

Our early experiences in administering to the sick, in the church and out of it, for we were frequently called to attend those who were not members, all went to discourage this peculiar species of inquiry, and the after occurrences to which we have been a witness or have been made acquainted with upon the testimony of others, have also confirmed those early experiences. Our experience even at our earliest acquaintance with the exercise of the power of God in the healing of the sick went to show that, more frequently than otherwise, the continued importuning of the friends and elders for a witness as to whether the sick would recover or not, was followed by bad results. Sometimes, prophecies were delivered respecting the recovering of the sick person which were not realized; and immediately speculation would begin as to who was in fault, the friends, the sick one, or the elders; and grave questioning would take place as to the source whence the prophecy came; and unfortunate loss of faith would seem to be inevitable.

We reached the conclusion at that time that it was no part of the duty of the officers administering to the sick to ask the Lord for a manifestation as to the recovery of the sick one, or his departure from this life. Our subsequent experiences and our observation have confirmed us in the conclusion reached at that time, and subsequent events have clearly gone to show us that what sometimes followed then has continued to follow; more dissatisfaction than blessing has resulted from the importuning prayers referred to. . . .

When the elders are sent for to administer to the sick, they should go, if it is practicable; they should administer in faith nothing doubting; anointing with oil and laying on of hands; they should earnestly pray, and so far as in them lies do all that is possible to make the administration acceptable to the Lord; but we can not see that it is any part of their duty to seek for a sign. It lies with God to exercise the power to send relief; he can be trusted to do this without answering to prayer that the patient will either recover, or is appointed unto death. Overanxiety on the part of friends, including the elders, produces a condition in which it is possible for some one to be misled to the injury of the parties to the incident and to bring reproach upon the faith. This should be avoided, and the surest way is to submit the sick member to the tender mercy of the Lord in prayer, and then leave him in the hands of God without asking a pledge for recovery, or a warning to die.—Saints' Herald, 54: 59-61 (January 30, 1907).

The Use of Oil in the Ministry of Healing

No explicit law is known concerning the kind of oil to be used, or the manner of consecration. It has been the custom to use olive oil, but in case of necessity other kinds may be used. Cleanliness is most desirable.

One of the best statements on the subject is an editorial that appeared in the Herald in 1894. It was not signed. Internal evidence indicates that the author may have been Joseph Smith III, President of the church, Joseph Luff and Richard Salyards were the other editors listed at the time. However, they are excluded by a phrase in the text; only President Smith could qualify for the "thirty years" mentioned. The style and vocabulary are those of President Smith:

It is traditional that the oil should be taken before the elders, and either before the church in a meeting assembled, or in the privacy of a room aside from noise and confusion, and by the elders solemnly and devoutly consecrated by offering to God and prayer and set apart to right and holy uses.

All this is legendary, or the result and teaching of custom; but it is well said that "custom makes law"; and so far as there is any necessity for a rule of law to govern in the case, the things which are not in contravention of direct written law, prescribed by long continued custom, may be safely followed.—Saints' Herald, February 7, 1894, Volume 41, page 83.

The Customary Form of Administration to the Sick

There is no rigid or prescribed pattern to follow in administering to the sick. The occasion is a small meeting, and some discretion is permitted the elders under the law of the church which says, "The elders are to conduct the meetings as they are led by the Holy Ghost, according to the commandments and revelations of God"—(Doctrine and Covenants 17: 9).

The elder may decide, when several persons are present in the home or at the bedside of the sick one, to have a general prayer to produce a spiritual setting for the administration. Several, or only one, may pray as wisdom may direct.

It is ideal for two elders to be present at an administration. Sometimes this is not possible, and one elder alone may have to perform this service. If the elder has no other elder to assist him, it is well for another member of the family of the sick person to be present if possible.

When two elders are present, it is customary, by previous arrangement between them, for one to anoint the head of the sick, using a small amount of oil, and say a brief prayer of anointing, asking God to grant the presence and power of the Holy Spirit for the sake of the sick. The first elder should be careful not to trespass upon the proper function of the other elder who offers the confirming prayer.

(If other parts of the body of the sick one are to be anointed, it should be done by other members of the family, and before the elders enter the room.)

Then the second elder should utter the prayer of confirmation and blessing, and this prayer should be the principal effort to bring the Spirit of God to bless the sick one, and to present that sick one to God for a blessing.

When this is concluded, and especially if the afflicted one is very ill, the elders should use wisdom and not linger long in the room nor indulge in idle social conversation, chatter, nor purposeless laughter. A time in which the sick one may take the spiritual influence of the occasion into his soul should be assured him. A period of quiet and reflection is conducive to rest and recuperation.

As already indicated in the material presented, the elders should not yield to entreaties for predictions or prophecies concerning the recovery of the sick. This matter should be left in the care of God.

We should keep in mind that the ministry of healing is primarily a spiritual ministry, and that it depends upon a spiritual power no man can command, in the sense of controlling it; for as human beings who come into the presence of God with our needs, we are suppliants. We ask for what we think is good, and the decision must depend upon the wisdom, the grace, and the mercy of God, as well as, to a degree, upon the faith and sincerity of the petitioner and the elders.

Report of a Huddle

LINDA, how do you spell your name?" Instinctively, her fingers moved to answer my question. "Oh," she smiled apologetically, and then voiced the answer, "P-i-t-z-e-r."

Brief moments before, she had interviewed her mother at a crowded missionary huddle. The two of them, with Allen Stiles, Covina's presiding elder, had just returned from visiting another who could neither hear nor talk. Linda's mother had gone along to bear her testimony and to "speak" the invitation of the church to the one who felt isolated by her handicap.

Linda and her adult partners were one team of many which fanned out in the Covina area on Sunday afternoon to invite the families and friends of the church to attend the San Gabriel Valley area Huddle that evening. When a stalwart young man and an attractive miss bring enthusiasm with their invitation it's hard to say "No." The church was full.

Many of these young men and women were last summer's caravaners. What they have done since their return has surpassed their achievement while on caravan. They have rung hundreds of doorbells, inviting members and nonmembers to come to church. Shut-ins, have smiled their gratitude through misty eyes as Leaguers have departed to minister to others. Many congregations have these youth to thank for a new lease on life. The whole stake is responding to their vital activity.

This Huddle, like the others held regularly throughout Los Angeles Stake, was delightfully informal and friendly. Roll call of congregations, reports from missionary supervisors, and singing led by Mr. Enthusiasm, Blaine Bender. Youth bore testimonies of the day's experiences. Children sang a simple song with joy (and unrehearsed). Hazel Tickemyer and Helen Bender, stake leaders of women's evangelism, brought encouraging evidence of a swelling tide of testimony.

Then came "Farmer" Fred Crum with straw hat and overalls, exchanging informal greetings with Blaine Bender.

"How's the cotton crop, Farmer Fred?"

"Got no cotton."

"No cotton! Why not?"

"Didn't plant any—afraid of the boll weevil."

"How's the corn?"

"No corn neither."

"No corn?"

"Nope, feared it wouldn't rain."

"What did you plant, Fred?"

"Nothin! I played it safe."

"Nothing planted, and no harvest—we can't have that! Here's a package of seed you can plant." Blaine handed Fred a tract.

"And, Fred," Blaine called after the departing farmer, "you can be your own tract-or!"

Each month, at every huddle, a Tract-of-the-Month is featured. Anyone may have a tract. The only stipulation: it is to be given away and followed up.

Lee Hart, spark plug of the Huddles, introduced Jasper Pennington, stake youth leader. "Jeep" bore the testimony many of us hoped we could hear sometime. It was the story of a paratrooper, horribly mutilated by land mines—and incredibly spared. It was the story of words from Somewhere in the midst of agony, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." It was the story of panic transmuted to peace, of a life spared for a purpose.

There were apostolic reflections on fishing—for men. One of Lee's neighbors, John Adams, sang, "I'll go where you want me to go."

The evening had gone quickly. We had moved from moments when applause was natural to the quietness of reflective worship. A spirit of consecration prevailed in moments of benediction.

As we gathered around a table laden with refreshments, and mingled in small clusters for conversation, the church was not something apart. It was warm as affection . . . and worth sharing.

ICARIA

A Brief Account of the Second Attempt at a Model Society in Nauvoo

TO SOME it is only an old chair, but to me it represents an interesting period in American history. This chair was once a part of the utopian dream of a colony of people that attempted to live and labor together with all holdings in common.

On the back of the chair is carved the number "164" to designate the place and the person that was to use the chair in the large Icarian community dining room at Nauvoo, Illinois, during the 1850's.

For a brief time in the flush of enthusiasm all went well, and Icaria was a sort of terrestrial paradise. But the Icarians lacked what nearly all communistic societies have lacked, the Spirit of Christ, which is the Spirit of unity. The leaders failed to understand that human nature must be changed before people can learn to live in perpetual harmony.

The Icarian community was founded in France by Etienne Cabet and found its way to America in 1848. These people declared their devotion to their leader and the cause of humanity by vowing their eternal allegiance to their motto, "Equality."

They had an idea that what they felt would contribute to human uplift, and they were free according to our Constitution to express their convictions in this interest of equality of mankind.

They first settled in the Red River country of Texas, where they attempted to establish themselves. Here they were disillusioned, and early in 1849 journeyed to New Orleans.

It was at this juncture that Cabet learned of the abandoned city of Nauvoo. Quick to appreciate the possibilities of a ready-built city, they made haste to take the steamer up the Mississippi River.

Their journey was a fearful one. Cholera broke out aboard the steamer; they were not allowed to take their sick ashore, and in consequence many died from the lack of proper care. When the boat reached Warsaw, twenty miles below Nauvoo, floating ice made the channel impassable. The worn-out voyagers were forced to walk the rest of the way through knee-deep snow and slush, carrying the children and the sick the best they could.

One mighty consolation awaited them. Instead of a wilderness, they found a town with houses, gardens, and plowed fields. Here they found the hardest of their labors already accomplished, made ready as if by a miracle.

Yet they had privations enough. The climate was cruel, the water unwholesome; food was costly and wretched in quality. For the first month they lived almost entirely upon the beans they had brought with them.

One of the members said:

A chair once used in the Icarian community dining room in Nauvoo.

Beans are good, Madame, yes. But not for the month's entire. Also, the grand part of heem are sprouts. No man of us has tasted meat for year. No, nor coffee nor fine bread. We'll be dressed in these clothes, some silk, some of rags, which we bring into the commune; there'll be no money to buy more. Madame, my wife has a robe of lace, but no shawl; I have five velvet waistcoates, but no shoes. Happy? Surely, Madame. We'll be making the most grand work that the world ever see. Ah, we make mistakes, yes, and we have failed, but the plan was perfect.

The administration of the colony was controlled by six directors, elected annually. And the laws were made by the "general assembly," which included all men over twenty. Cabet was elected president from year to year, but his office was hardly more than a title. The members put every possession, even books and heirlooms, into the common fund. Furniture and tools were divided as equally as might be. Intricate schedules of hours and tasks were planned, so that the actual labor might be shared evenly also. Each household had its cabin apart, however; family life was held rigidly sacred.

They specialized in fruit culture, especially in grape vineyards, from which they made much wine; silkworm culture was also carried on. They were industrious, frugal, of simple dress, and had the forms of unity in which the ideal Christian life is truly to be lived.

The Icarians were jovial people, and above all they had great faith in the golden rule. It is true they had no church in which it was taught, yet its manifestation was displayed in their hall by readings, painted in artistic letters. During their existence of ten or twelve years in Nauvoo, there was never known to be a civil offense committed. They had no marshal, police, or jail, for these were not needed.

They were a great people for music. Their band at one time consisted of thirty-five pieces, and it was led by an expert professor from Paris, France. They were invited several times by the citizens of Nauvoo to participate in the celebration of special occasions. The Nauvoo band would be in the lead, with Major Bidamon and his cavalry horse, followed by the Icarians and families in wagons completing the parade.

By 1855 the Icarians became fairly prosperous. They had built mills and workshops; their farms flourished; their school had won the interest and praise of educators throughout the country. They had acquired a library of six thousand standard books. The colony published a weekly magazine in three languages, which was read widely in France as well as at home.

In the Nauvoo Independent of February, 1903, there appeared an article written by Mr. E. Vallet, who was a member of the colony as a young boy with his family. He said that this would have been a heaven on earth if it could have been made possible. He also stated:

I was very young; hence as a youth, I was at the mercy and destiny of this great social community. As I became old enough I became a close observer and as I was placed in school, I remember well yet its training, rules, regulations. First the pupils were not permitted to go home on Sundays, as the Institute contained lodging and dining apartments. Girls were on one side and boys on the other. When school was out the boys and girls had access to their respective yards. The schoolhouse was a stone building owned by Mr. Knaust. It was built out of the ruins of the Mormon Temple.

As school would be called the scholars had to be prompt getting to their seats, and all the branches of education that were taught consisted of what goes to make up a pretty well educated adult. Spelling, grammar, singing, music, drawing, and even the art of sculpture were taught. To illustrate the system of our professors to encourage the students to excell in all studies taught, I herewith explain its formalities and principles. On every Saturday bulletins would be issued, upon each sheet being printed at the heading, "Bulletin." On the last day of each week every scholar was given one of these bulletins. They were filled out by the professor who denoted the progress made by each student. Now came the beautiful part of the object lesson, but perhaps not always to the satisfaction of the pupil. On the second part of the bulletin, the scholar's conducts were defined. It read thus: Yes, or No. —Attention, Studious, Docile, Sincere, Polite, Fraternal, Clean, etc.

In 1855 Cabet grew tired of his lofty but narrow office of president and commanded the assembly to do away with the board of directors and place the administration in his hands. Moreover, he announced that the constitution was to be revised to lengthen the president's term to four years and to give him power to name and remove all other officials without limitation.

The colonists rose at once to the issue. Every man took sides, and within a week the town was split into two hostile camps. In a few weeks came the presidential election. The majority therefore made known their disapproval by choosing a new president. Cabet withdrew his demands in the midst of the dramatic scene; and the colony, thus placated, joined hands and gave him the presidency once more by a unanimous vote.

There was peace for a short time, but it was only a surface calm. In August, 1856, came a directory election. The voters put in their anti-Cabet candidates. The old officials, at Cabet's order, refused to give up their places to their lawful successors. This was the spark for revolt. The new directors were put in by force, whereupon the "Cabetists" promptly dropped their tools and stopped all work. They would not speak to each other; they turned aside when they met in the streets. The majority placed their tables in the assembly hall so that they would not face Cabet supporters at mealtimes. The children in the school took opposite benches and glared across at each other with all the hatred bred of the angry talk heard at home.

Efforts were made for peace, but neither side would concede enough to save the dignity of the other. The new directory seized the storehouse and declared that those who did not work should not eat. The Cabetists were given a week in which to reflect upon their error.

On the seventh day the directory weakened, as it was unfair to let women and children suffer. It was very humiliating for the Cabetists to stand in front of the storehouse that first morning and take their dole of food. One of the men, angered by a whispered taunt, threw his bread upon the ground and trampled upon it. This was a signal for an absurd and pitiable scene. The majority of the Cabetists followed him to the man. They turned with curses and abuse; they destroyed the food to the last crum. Luckily the majority kept itself in hand, and the riot was checked without bloodshed. But after such an outbreak, reconciliation was impossible.

Immediately the Icarians set about a legal division of the community. In October the committee brought a series of formal charges against Cabet, which resulted in his expulsion from the commune, and he left Nauvoo. Those who stayed in Nauvoo were crippled, but they still owned some property, besides unbroken lands in Iowa. After litigation of their property in Nauvoo, the remaining group migrated to Adams County in the southwest corner of Iowa. Here they soon faded as a "ripple on the waters," and all that is left of this social order is a few fragments of written history and a few old reminders, such as this community dining room chair:

I Had an Experience . . .

WHEN I first came in contact with the Restoration movement, my roots were very deep in the missionary arm of Presbyterianism. My parents and only sister were missionaries in the New Hebrides, South Pacific. My only brother was finishing his university course in medicine prior to serving as a medical missionary; and I, as trained teacher, looked forward to the possibility of a position associated with a native teachers' training school.

In 1930 I was appointed by the Education Department of Victoria to a teaching position at Kelvin View. At that time the Euroa Branch of the Reorganized Church was holding meetings in the schoolhouse. I attended some of these, and for the first time heard the latter-day gospel. I studied books lent to me by members living in the neighborhood, particularly Brother and Sister W. S. Crosbie and the late Brother and Sister A. J. Broughton.

From the beginning, the Book of Mormon fascinated me, although I could not admit its divinity. I noted what I later found to be common objections to the Book—the Isaiah quotations and the problem of similarities to the King James wording. Some "anachronisms" were investigated, but my findings tended to show my ignorance rather than show the Book to be wrong. These included such items as the use of gold plates, the use of steel by Nephi, and the presence of the horse in America prior to Columbian times.

There were not, in those days, many of the fine reference books that the church has available today, and I had to get help from wherever I could in deciding the vital question of the Book's divinity. I did note, however, the promise of help from God, as contained in Moroni 10: 4, 5:

I would exhort you that ye would ask God, the eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost.

Several barriers I could not pass, and the Saints at Kelvin View whom I asked were not able to help me. So it was arranged that Elder H. Jacka, then pastor at Euroa, be invited to discuss my problems with me. We had a long session that continued well past midnight; though some questions were answered to my satisfaction, there were still too many stumbling blocks to my wholehearted acceptance of the Book of Mormon as the Word of God.

But God knows the intent of our hearts. He knew my desire to find the truth, and before that evening's discussion was over, and in spite of the fact that, from a human reasoning aspect, I had not been convinced, my "sincere heart and real intent" brought to me the overwhelming enlightenment of God's revealing Spirit that the Book of Mormon was of divine origin and that I should accept it as such.

This was the beginning of a further phase of my investigation, not to find errors in the Restoration movement but to find my place in it. Since my baptism in 1932 I have been abundantly blessed, and I have never regretted at any time the step that made me break with the religious training of my childhood and youth, because such a step was initiated by the revealing Spirit of God, who made known to me the divinity of the Book of Mormon.

John J. Cornish's autobiography Into the Latter-day Light

First published in 1929, this reprint is the life story of Latter Day Saint missionary John J. Cornish. In this volume, he is preserving an account of some of the dealings of God with one of the men whom He chose to carry the gospel to the common people. And the people who gladly heard him are scattered over all the land of America. A new section, "Little Known Incidents in the Life of J. J. Cornish," is added. 208 pages; paper binding. Herald House

Mothers in Zion

THE invitation for all to assist in the cause of Zion is extended by the Lord to his Saints—to the priesthood, the young people, and to the women of the church:

The hopes of my people and the goals of my church, while not yet fully realized, and at times and to many seemingly distant, are closer to realization than many recognize. It is yet day when all can work. The night will come when for many of my people opportunity to assist will have passed.—Doctrine and Covenants 142: 5.

Among the earliest revelations to the church is found the following very important and meaningful statement: "Now as you have asked, behold I say unto you, Keep my commandments, and seek to bring forth and establish the cause of Zion: seek not for riches but for wisdom" (Doctrine and Covenants 6: 3). The language indicates that Zion is a "cause," and that in its establishment there would arise many problems requiring the exercise of much wisdom in solving them. Zion embraces the art of living together in peace and tranquility, the key of which is sacrificial love. This love was displayed by Jesus Christ when he went to the cross. Another requirement is the practicing of a high degree of morality in social and spiritual attainments.

One of the problems confronting the Saints is that of living in the world and not becoming a part of it or influenced greatly by it. Many of our church members labor in fields of commerce where living up to highest ideals of the church are made most difficult and present problems of a perplexing nature.

Beware of Materialistic Spirit

Women of the church need to be aware of the obvious fact that there has developed almost imperceptibly here and there among the rank and file of our church membership a materialistic spirit which is causing many to yield to some of the enticing voices of the world. This must bring the Master sorrow and displeasure. Zion is "the pure in heart," in which a worldly spirit can play no part. It is imperative, then, that eventually "the Gathering" will take place by which we will have freed ourselves from the world's contamination.

Sober meditation upon the signs of the times should incite us to keep our homes on sacred ground and hearken not to any voice which attempts to dissuade, divert, or discourage us from seeking to establish "the cause" of Zion, the kingdom of our God, the sacred and most important contract ever awarded to mankind. Being aware of these conditions should greatly hearten and stimulate us to perform the task allotted us, because we are truly lost without a Zion.

Women Assisting

How do women of the church assist? First, the lady of the home (with or without children) can keep the avenue of prayer open to the heavens in behalf of every endeavor to advance the work of Christ in his kingdom that the power of Almighty God will be active in behalf of her family. The power of prayer needs no proving, for it has been demonstrated quite effectually in the past. The church has made many fine advancements in its endeavors to reach its goal, nevertheless there still remains a number of frontiers which have not been fully explored. Prayer is the church's greatest source of power.

Second, there is need for building Zion homes. Tribute is due to the fine progress being made by the women's department in promoting the affairs of the church under the general direction of the governing powers of the priesthood, especially having to do with the relationship of building Zion homes, the important and essential unit in the over-all structure of the redemption of Zion.

Today our women face a bewildering problem in the transcending spiritual center around which the home as a unit of civilization is composed. It is well for a mother in Zion to be aware of and warned against some of the ominous signs of decay. The sacred ideals forming the foundation structure of the Zion home have been invaded by vicious enemies, social and economic, so deadly that today we stand in a situation most perilous, resulting in many broken homes. One of the direct results of these widespread evils is the prevalence of juvenile delinquency, and even more alarming is the trend of general complacency with which it is accepted by society at large. Our church is attempting to stem the rising tide of sin in its many forms through co-operation with all agencies which are dedicated to saving the home. Over six hundred women's organizations throughout the United States composed of more than twenty million women are working at the solution. Doubtless much has been done to curb the trend toward an ever-increasing deterioration of home life. However, it is evident that many organizations are not achieving their goal, and the besetting sins of the home go on unchecked.

Third, there is the need to stimulate spiritual understanding. The women's department is playing a definite role in increasing knowledge and mental culture and stimulating a spiritual understanding.

One of the encouraging efforts having tremendous spiritual value in the Zion home is to be found in the various youth activities. Last summer our young people attended youth camps in forty-two locations in the United States, meeting in groups under competent instructors. Here they came to grips with important and vital questions of the day.

The World of Tomorrow and the Home

The prophetic views of our top scientists foretelling things to come seem fantastic, but they assure us these future developments will take place in the next twenty years. For instance, David Sarnoff, head of R.C.A.'s electronic department, states that all vehicles will be atom powered. Limitless energy will provide fresh water from the briny sea which will flow over immense surfaces of the earth hitherto unavailable. Amplified light will be freed from electric bulbs. Guided missiles will deliver passengers to safe destinations in an unbelievably short space of time (example, fifteen or twenty minutes to Paris from New York). All this could happen before 1980. DuPont chemists say: "All energy will be derived from the sun." And one of the nation's top engineers, Greenwalt, says, "All of the increased power given to man will not end his divine discontent." Von Neuman states, "All of this will merge every nation's affairs with each other" and concludes with the implication there will be either a world's government or no government and no world. A dire prophecy indeed, and the last implication is untenable with our beliefs.

Had scientists of seventy-five years ago predicted inventions and discoveries of the present age which have so greatly advanced civilization their statements would have been received with extreme skepticism.

Inevitably there will be advancement along the lines of vastly increased powers of controlled energy. This prediction is readily accepted, but what the result will be of its impact upon our industrial relations is difficult to comprehend.

Naturally there will come readjustments in Latter Day Saint homes. In the past our living conditions have become involved in the many complicated problems resulting from drastic technical advances. These will occur in the future as events cast their shadows before them.

Preparing the minds of the Saints for the future the Lord said,

Wherefore I the Lord, knowing the calamity which should come upon the inhabitants of the earth, called upon my servant Joseph Smith, Jr., and spake unto him from heaven, and gave him commandments, and also gave commandments to others, that they should proclaim these things unto the world.—Doctrine and Covenants 1: 4.

The world is filled with confusion, frustration, and dismay. As a people, may we not reason in logical manner that the "calamity" mentioned in the revelation given one hundred and twenty-seven years ago is closer to hand than many think? Zion and Zionic homes are our hope of salvation! Our minds are incapable of grasping the full significance of the tremendous responsibility placed upon us when Infinity honored us with such a sacred task.

The Financial Law and the Home

Many of us are faced with making the most important decision of our lives. This decision will indicate our faith in that which totally concerns our present as well as our future existence. It is the extent to which we express our belief in Zion through our willingness to comply with the financial law and to invest our talents in the "marvelous work and a wonder." The extent to which we are willing to do and teach this in our homes is the extent to which a steady consummation of the goal of Zion will be realized. Today is the day of all days when members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints take upon themselves a new found courage, a refreshed sacrificial love, and a greatly increased faith.

Prayer for Leaders

Our church leaders are continually opening up new frontiers which are basic and fundamental in the formation of an enduring Zion. There is enjoined upon us a command to pray for our heaven-called men who have been appointed to the ecclesiastical leadership that they may continue to have the inspiration and directive power of almighty God. Thus we assist in bringing to pass the day when righteousness will abound and Jesus Christ will come to reign over his children for ever.

And finally, after many years of devotion to the study of the spiritual as well as the social aspects of Zion, the conclusion is obvious. The only hope for the salvation of the world's society, the only panacea and relief from the dilemma and the tragic ills confronting us is the message of Jesus Christ in the great Restoration movement, comprehending as it does the redemption of Zion as its goal.

R. W. SCOTT

Saint Mary

SINCE she lives just three doors up the street, I stop often to talk with her. These are brief visits, but despite their brevity I find an ever-present inspiration in them.

Born into a Roman Catholic home, Mary attended mass regularly with her devout parents, brothers, and sisters. To them it was unthinkable that, at the age of six, Mary should question the ritual of the church, and because she feared retaliation, she kept her doubts to herself. "But I prayed silently that God would someday lead me to his church," she recalls, "and when I met Jerry, who told me of the Restoration, I knew my prayers were being answered."

Few members pay such a price for Sainthood. Mary's people would not attend her wedding; in fact, they did not recognize her marriage. When they did come to visit, it was only to harangue, to taunt, or to predict eternal damnation for her. But Mary's faith did not weaken.

A modern counterpart of Job, she suffered many things that could have turned her from her chosen belief, but somehow through the pain and loss came renewed devotion. Mary is a beautiful woman—and I use the term not as a handy adjective but in its truest sense—yet her young body is tortured with arthritis. Her fingers are twisted with it, and only recently has she been able to walk again without crutches. When the damp, cold season of the Midwest begins she knows little relief until warm weather returns. Yet I have never heard Mary indulge in self-pity.

Ten years after she and Jerry were married, he developed cancer. First he had his left leg amputated and there seemed to be some hope of recovery. Two years later the malignancy spread to his lungs, and Jerry died. A crippled widow with three small daughters, rejected by her family, Mary could well have become bitter, but still she smiled and asked God to see her through.

As Ruth of Moab, Mary turned to her husband's people and made her home with them. Here her daughters share the love and attention of a fond grandmother and grandfather, and Mary is ever grateful. But her gratitude extends beyond the home walls. Last night as I talked to her she told me, with eyes shining, of a blessing often taken for granted by parents in Zion. "Marieta has her badge for paging at the Sanitarium now. I was so proud of her at the award service, and I thought how much I would have enjoyed belonging to an organization like the Orioles when I was a girl. We didn't even have Sunday school, you know." As we talked Marieta skipped to the telephone to call about her next paging assignment, and slightly younger Darlene came to ask if she had practiced her music lesson long enough. Outside Sharon played hopscotch and talked about when she would be old enough to go to school.

Mary has had so much tragedy packed into so few years I wonder at her ability to remain sweet, cheerful, optimistic. Hers is a quality of Sainthood that measures well to the standard, "I have fought a good fight; I have kept the faith."

NAOMI RUSSELL

David Thomas

While Elder R. L. Amsberry was employed on the Point Four program of the United States Government at Kermanshah, Iran, he needed an interpreter and came in contact with a fine young man who ably served him in that capacity, David Thomas, a native Assyrian with a Welsh name. David is twenty-two and speaks four languages: his native Syriac, Farsi (Persian), Turkish, and English.

Although he holds membership in the Presbyterian church, he was asked to serve as pastor of a Pentecostal congregation there since the members could find no minister of their own faith. While working with Brother Amsberry he learned of the restored gospel and is now studying the church books with the assistance by correspondence of Elder George Njeim of the Seventies. Finding the emphasis on spiritual life harmonious with his own needs, he is hopeful of finding spiritual confirmation of the truth of the work.

His great desire is to attend Graceland College and he is making plans to that end.

Summer Courses Set

ELEVEN COURSES will be offered during a two weeks' summer session at the School of the Restoration, June 16-28, according to L. Wayne Updike, director.

Each of the courses will have a daily class meeting during the two weeks' period. Students may take from one to four courses, as their schedules permit.

The courses offered and instructors are as follows:

English Composition for Speakers (Communications 123), Ann Barnhard, instructor.

Introduction to Religious Education (Education 101), Roy A. Cheville, instructor.

Worship Leadership (Practicum 115), Herbert Lively, instructor.

Child Development (Psychology 102), Harley Morris, instructor.

Introduction to Pastoral Counseling (Psychology 108), Harley Morris, instructor.

Survey of the Old Testament (Scriptures 101), Alfred Yale, instructor.

Survey of the New Testament (Scriptures 111), Alfred Yale, instructor.

Introduction to the Book of Mormon (Scriptures 131), Herbert Scott, instructor.

Life and Letters of Paul (Scriptures 213), Alfred Yale, instructor.

Life of Jesus (Theology 100), Roy Cheville, instructor.

Basic Beliefs (Theology 101), William Clinefelter, instructor.

Brother Updike stated that students wishing to attend the summer session need to register as soon as possible. Registration fee is eight dollars. Registration cards can be obtained by writing or calling the School of the Restoration, 9900 Winner Road, Independence, Missouri.

Students must arrange their own transportation. If assistance is needed in securing housing, the school should be notified.

The courses offered for the summer session have been chosen after considering the response to a March announcement of the two weeks' session. More than twenty courses were offered in the original announcement. Responses to the school showed predominate interest in the eleven courses that will be offered, Brother Updike said.

Scholarship to Marilyn Smith

Marilyn Esther Smith, a senior at William Chrisman High School in Independence, has been awarded a General Motors Scholarship to Washington University in St. Louis.

The scholarship will provide Marilyn with about $1,000 a year for four years.

Washington University has placed her in its highest group among hundreds of scholarship applicants.

At school Marilyn's activities have included the Pep Club, Future Teachers of America, National Honor Society, and orchestra where she plays violin. Her scholastic record has been outstanding. She has made mostly "E" grades.

Marilyn is the daughter of the late patriarch, Frederick A. Smith, and Mrs. Esther Smith Carter of Brandenton, Florida.

The Widow's Mite

As my husband and I arrived to attend the first Communion of the new year, the service was about to begin, so we were seated in folding chairs along the back of the chapel.

When we were seated, I noticed a small, elderly lady sitting next to me. With one glance I could see she was a lady of modest means. She smiled and leaned over to remark about the beauty of the church. I smiled and nodded in agreement. Again she leaned over and with tear-filled eyes said she had recently been widowed. At once I could sense the emptiness she felt, and I tried to console her.

As the service began, she listened intently to every spoken word, nodding occasionally. When the oblation remarks were being given, she reached for a tattered purse and took out one small silver coin. Meekly she dropped it in the basket as it passed. Then once again her attention was turned to the altar. Toward the end of the service, the customary sacrifice offering for our church building fund was taken. Once more she opened the tattered purse and this time took the last two pennies remaining. Again she smiled and timidly dropped her sacrifice into the passing basket.

In leaving the church, I felt that the heaviness and loneliness in her heart must have been lifted somewhat, for she seemed to have a kind of radiance about her—a radiance which comes only from an inner satisfaction.

Surely a great number of us could take heed of this example and give all we can—our mite—to the building of God's kingdom on earth.

ALBERTA WILLIS

A Review

of 1957 Religious Statistics, Events, and Trends

(The American Review of Eastern Orthodoxy recently accumulated a number of interesting religious facts and figures concerning the United States. Following are some of these.)

FORMAL CHURCH membership in the United States showed its customary rate of about 3 per cent increase. This compares favorably with the estimated 1.7 per cent population increase—the only cloud of doubt on these ratios being on the extremely probable inaccuracy in reported statistics from religious bodies.

To point this up, a number of church bodies make rough estimations. The larger groups among the twenty branches of Eastern Orthodoxy in the U. S. A. report their membership in even thousands. One of these has raised its figure from 440,000 to 760,000 in the last two years; another raised its figure from an even million to 1,150,000. The grand total for all of the Eastern Orthodox Churches thus is 25 per cent higher (in statistical figures) than two years ago.

In reference to church membership, the U. S. Census Bureau, which had been pressured into dropping a question on religious affiliation from the 1960 census, released the results of the sample survey of March, 1957. At that time the question had been asked and the answers were entirely voluntary. The tabulation indicated that 96 per cent of Americans over fourteen years old had a religion, 3 per cent had none, and 1 per cent refused to answer the question. Two out of every three classed themselves as Protestants; one in four as Roman Catholic. A projection of these figures showed that 79,000,000 persons regard themselves as Protestant; 30,700,000 as Roman Catholic; 3,900,000 as Jewish; 3,200,000 as having no religion; 1,500,000 as having some other types of religious beliefs. This gives a grand total of about 118,500,000.

The 1958 Yearbook of American Churches places the grand total of membership at about 103,225,000 (these figures based on answers to questionnaires submitted to the various bodies in the United States). As a sidenote, it must be mentioned that figures from all except Roman Catholic, Episcopal, and Lutheran include only those over thirteen years old. The other bodies mentioned incorporate all baptized members, regardless of age.

Disputing the figures of the Yearbook, Presbyterian Life (magazine of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.) stated that actual church membership totals 129,300,000. This report was based on a survey, made by the Presbyterians, which included all baptized members, regardless of age. According to this report, only one fourth of the men, women, and children in the United States are unaffiliated with some church.

A quick look at church building construction reveals, from department Commerce and Labor reports, an all-time record for 1957, with $868,000,000 invested in new buildings erected for church and synagogue use. The new record surpassed the previous one (1956) by $100,000,000.

Two notable unions of denominations were consummated in 1957. The union of the Presbyterian Church, USA, and the United Presbyterian Church was approved. In the second union, the Congregational Christian Churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church formed the new "United Church of Christ." Abroad, in India, seven Protestant bodies (including Anglican, Baptist, Methodist, Disciples of Christ, and Brethren) are merging into a "United Church of North India."

Turning to the massive problem of racial integration, 1957 saw several manifestations in the expressed opinions of leaders of religious groups. Dean Liston Pope, Yale Divinity School, told the general assembly of the National Council of Churches that the church is still the most racially segregated major institution in American life, but some progress is being made in changing this situation. He amplified this by saying that 10 per cent of American Protestant congregations are interracial, compared with only 2 per cent a decade ago. Speaking at the same assembly, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Negro pastor from Montgomery, Alabama, said, "All too many ministers are silent while evil rages. It may well be that the greatest tragedy of this period of social transition is not the glaring noisiness of the so-called bad people but the appalling silence of the so-called good people."

A five-year research by a youth board in New York City revealed that less than 1 per cent of that city's 2,000,000 families produce 75 per cent of all the city's juvenile delinquents. Of these families, about one third were cited as being the "core" group—that is, families which either resisted help or refused it. Other studies showed that a working mother who flits from one job to another appears to have the highest rate of delinquent sons. Two Harvard criminologists expressed the opinion that there were five basic factors most significant in determining the juvenile delinquency potential of a child: (1) Affection of the mother for the child; (2) affection of the father for the child; (3) supervision of the child by the mother; (4) the discipline of the child by the father; (5) cohesiveness of the family.

From this and other expressed opinions and studies, it is apparent that there are a number of vital factors that religion could affect and help correct: (1) Family relations, especially in which religious background is practically nonexistent as a vital force in daily living; (2) physical conditions of health and environs. The FBI reports that 1957 saw a new crime wave record established in the United States. Mr. L. B. Nichols, assistant to the Director, urged churches to make more contact with youth, adding, "In the vast majority of cases where juveniles come into contact with the FBI, we find they have had very little contact with Sunday school or church training."

Graceland Gazette

■ Two students have recently arrived on the Hill from abroad and plan to attend Graceland next year.

Johannes Postma comes from Zwagerbosch in northern Holland. Johannes plans to attend Graceland for two years and then return to Holland to help in the work of the church there. This young man has a rich heritage in the church. His grandparents were among the first members in the Netherlands. He has been very active in his home branch and holds the office of deacon. Johannes is interested in swimming and ice skating and hopes to acquire skill in American sports.

From Springe, Germany (near Hannover), comes Christa Tegtmeyer. Chris has been looking forward to coming to Graceland for about three years and is particularly interested in the religious opportunities and friendship of many different cultures which are to be found at Graceland. She has been a member of the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church since 1950 and is an active worker in her church in Germany. She senses the great need abroad for qualified and devoted Saints and hopes to return with renewed faith and knowledge.

■ The Student Center was nearly full Saturday evening, April 25, for the Second Annual Alpha Phi Omega Talent-erama. The three-and-a-half-hour show contained nine divisions of talent representing six areas of show business. These were television, Carnegie Hall, rock and roll, night club, Greenwich Village, and the Metropolitan Opera House. Also included were divisions from the home and campus. The entire show was under the supervision of producer Gene Porter from Portland, Oregon. Eric Leighton from Detroit, Michigan, acted as master of ceremonies.

■ Fifty-two members of the student body were inducted into the Lambda Delta Sigma Society Tuesday, April 29, in an initiation ceremony held in the Assembly Chapel. Following this a banquet was held for the new members, upper classmen who belong to Lambda Delta Sigma, and all faculty members.

To become a member of this honorary scholarship society of Graceland, a student must have obtained a grade point average 3.00 or better for three consecutive semesters and must have acceptable conduct and character.

■ In a closed-door session of the Graceland Publications Board Tuesday, April 29, Dave Berry from Cleveland, Ohio, and Hazel Imrie from Newcastle, Australia, were chosen as managing editors of the Tower and Acacia respectively for the year 1958-59. Dave has been working on the Tower staff this year as the feature editor. He was formerly the editor of the Marshall High School Interpreter of his home city. Hazel has served on various publication staffs in the past and has had considerable experience in administrative work.

Don Coleman from Evergreen, Alabama, was chosen as business manager for the Tower, and Blair Jensen from Independence, Missouri, will be business manager for the Acacia.

■ Members of the 1958-59 Crescent Club were announced Wednesday night, April 30. The girls are chosen by a vote of the women students and staff members on campus. The following girls were elected: Charlene Adams, president, Hicksville, New York; Carol Oliver, secretary, Moorehead, Iowa; Frances Ashby, Shawnee, Ohio; Mary Bavington, Toronto, Canada; Puala Bugbee, Lanikai, Oahu, Hawaii; Barbara Dewsnup, Independence, Missouri; Audrey Dutton, Peoria, Illinois; Bonnie Mortimore, Jefferson City, Missouri; Rogene Smith, Nauvoo, Illinois; Ruth Usui, Hilo, Hawaii; and Judy Whittemore, Englewood, Colorado.

The Crescents were organized in 1922.

They are chosen for their leadership ability and all-around friendliness to others on campus. A Crescent emphasizes her "big sister" role to the freshman girls, writing them letters in the summer and helping them to adjust to the many aspects of college life. Through the year she finds expression in varied areas of service.

■ Sunday, May 4, the freshman girls entertained their town mothers at a tea held in the Walker lounge. Refreshments were served, and a program was presented to the group. Each freshman girl has for her town mother some woman living in Lamoni who tries to help her and do some of the things for her that the girl's own mother would do. In September when school first starts, the mothers give a tea for the daughters. This tea in May is the girls' way of expressing their thanks for all the mothers have done for them during the year.

■ The tennis team has continued to do very well this season with a record thus far of five wins and two losses. It defeated William Jewell College April 25 by a score of 5-1. On April 26 Maryville College came to Graceland, and the Yellow Jackets won all matches except two double sets, making the score 7-2. May 6 the Graceland team traveled to Doane College at Crete, Nebraska, and again came out the victor by a score of 4-3.

■ The Alumni Association held its spring Council Meeting Saturday, May 3. Seven of the members were present for this meeting. The main business discussed was the progress of the annual fund drive. Reports from the various committees were given, and a nominating committee was appointed. The group also discussed at some length the responsibilities of alumni at commencement and home-coming.

■ Despite a continual downpour of rain all day Saturday, May 3, some 261 athletes participated in the First Annual Graceland Relays. Five colleges, eight high schools, and seven junior high schools competed in the day-long festival.

Kirkville took top college honors with 97½ points. Following in order were Missouri Valley College, 67; Graceland, 64 1/3; Tarkio College, 60 1/3; and Tabor College of Hillsboro, Kansas, 13 points.

Those taking first places for Graceland were Elbert Harrington from East Moline, Illinois, who won the mile in 4:37.1 and the two-mile in 10:37.3, and Hank Volskay from Springfield, Missouri, who won the javelin throw, 164' 9".

Tuesday, May 6, the track team traveled to Crete, Nebraska, where it participated in the Doane Relays. There were twenty-four colleges and universities participating in the relays. The Yellow Jackets did very well for themselves and came back with a first place in the distance medley, second place in the 880-yard relay, third place in the sprint medley, and fifth in the 440-yard relay. Jared Ingram from Pawnee Rock, Kansas, took fifth place in the 100-yard dash.

■ Freshman students in the engineering curriculum took their annual field trip April 27-29. The group was composed of forty-one men, including Ned Jacobson and Dave Shippy as sponsors. They began their tour by going to Stephens and Associates, Inc., in Kansas City, Missouri, a newly organized consulting and development engineering firm. Later they visited the Midwest Research Institute, Proctor and Gamble, and Black and Veatch, a consulting engineering firm. At each of these concerns the students were shown various phases of work being done and how different types of engineering were involved.

Question Time

Question

What should a member do who has more property than he or she needs, and wants to help the church?
Ontario E. S.

Answer

Members who desire to help their church and have property over and above the needs of themselves and their dependents may consider the following alternatives:

1. Surplus Consecration. In consultation with the bishop members may decide to give a certain portion of their property to the storehouse treasury of the church and may designate this gift for one or a combination of the following purposes:
 - a. Purchasing lands for the public benefit of the church.
 - b. Completing the Auditorium.
 - c. Building houses of worship and buildings as designated by the General Church officials and the Standing High Council.
 - d. Providing for the costs of economic and community planning in Zion and its stakes.
 - e. Developing of business, industrial, and agricultural stewardships.
 - f. Providing funds for care of the poor and needy.

To enable a consecration of "surplus," a member must first have complied with the basic law by filling financial statements and paying the tithe in full. Surplus may be paid over a period of years or in one lump sum, but counsel should first be had with the bishop.

2. Consecration Agreement. Members with no immediate dependents will often desire to turn a large portion of their property over to the church under a "consecration" or "trust" agreement. In return, the church may agree to pay a certain monthly allowance to the member plus any extra medical or other amounts as are needed from time to time. The advantage of this type of trust arrangement is that the member does not have to worry with the management of his property but is assured of having his needs met from his property and its income.

3. Will. Many members desire to retain all their property until they die but want the church to ultimately receive all or a part of their estate. A clause in their will accomplishes this desire, but counsel from the bishop

The Church at Boone, Iowa

SEVEN SAINTS WERE gathered together by Eli Cloither and Charles Butterworth to form the Boonesboro, Iowa, Branch on June 23, 1878.

For a time the Boonesboro Branch was in Gallands Grove District. In 1880 it was transferred to Des Moines District. Seven years later the town of Boonesboro was annexed and became a part of Boone.

The first regular meeting place for the Saints was "the little white church on the corner," about three blocks west of the present church. The little white church was sold, and services were started in the new location about 1915.

The land was purchased from John Moore for $1,000. Money was raised through donations and sales. After the upper part of the building became usable, Missionary David Dowker, along with many others, gave of his time and skill to help complete the basement for classrooms. Now classrooms, kitchen, baptismal font, gas furnace, and other good facilities are located on the lower floor.

In recent years the upper auditorium has been remodeled. Asa Smith, with the help of local men, sanded the chairs and floors and revarnished them. Dr. Elon G. Tucker, present branch pastor, Don Cassidy, and others used the old walnut pews from the basement to make a beautiful pulpit and Communion table.

The Boone church is on Highway 30 near the west limits of the city and just two blocks east of the county courthouse.

Pastors whose names have been recorded through the years are William McBurney, John Clark, Charles Franklin Walters, Oscar Tesdahl, Hollis Yarrington, C. B. Freeman, Harold Cackler, W. B. Johnson, Donald M. Cassidy, Milton Broadfoot, Paul Winans, and Dr. Elon G. Tucker.

Question

Is there a church law requiring the one blessing the emblems to kneel while doing so at the Communion service?

W. S.

Answer

The law is made very specific in Doctrine and Covenants 17:22 which says: "the elder or priest shall administer it; and after this manner shall he administer it: He shall kneel with the church and call upon the Father in solemn prayer, saying . . ."

Combined Sunday Night Services

PORTLAND, OREGON.—At First Church, recent guest speakers have included Apostle P. E. Farrow, Elders Roy Weldon and John S. Thumm, Bishop T. A. Beck, and Seventy James C. Daugherty.

The four Portland branches and missions have combined Sunday evening services. Outstanding speakers, including those above, have presented the services. They are Evangelists Miles Whiting and Mark Yeoman, and Elder Howard Sheehy from Seattle.

Freddy Nelson was baptized and confirmed recently. His two grandfathers, J. L. Verhei and Albert Nelson, officiated.

George and Marie Amis were recently baptized. They are parents of two teen-agers who are active in Zion's League and were baptized last summer at youth camp.

Several babies have been blessed. They include Mark Allen, son of Anita and Rolly McKinley; Mark Stanton, son of Jesse and Bea Stanton, and Danny Bryson, son of Gary and Jean Bryson.

Priesthood members meet each Monday evening for a class, followed by home visiting. The Abundant Life program has been presented.

Portland was host to a recent Book of Mormon series, presented by Elder Roy Weldon. There was excellent attendance.—Reported by ARGENE STANSBURY

Church Improvements

YAKIMA, WASHINGTON.—The Saints thoroughly cleaned the auditorium of the church, installed rubber tile floor covering and cushioned pews, in February and March. The Saints have earned money for several years at the lunch booth at the Central Washington Fair, and at bazaars and bake sales. Thus the improvements incurred no debt.

The film "Other Sheep" was shown to about 150 persons March 30 and 31. Seventy William Haden followed it with a two weeks' series.

On Easter Sunday, the Zion's League sponsored a sunrise service. At 9:45, the worship service featured the children in costume, singing before the tomb. Lorene Nutley, director of religious education, trained the children. Then the Saints listened to the radio musical program from General Church headquarters. Following this, Brother Haden gave the Easter message. The choir, directed by Nancy Mayo, presented the Resurrection story in song.

Ten persons attended district conference at Seattle April 19-20.—Reported by FRANCES ELLSWORTH

Choirs Active

SASKATOON, SASKATCHEWAN. — A priesthood institute for the Province of Saskatchewan was held in Saskatoon February 7-9. Other points represented were Regina, Prince Albert, Weyburn, Senlac, Moose Jaw, and Birsay. Ministry was supplied by Evangelist E. L. Bowerman, District President Ted Bowerman, Missionary Keith Harvey, and Bishop H. P. Grundy from Guelph, Ontario. Music classes were also held under the direction of June Fisher and Joy Postnikoff.

Missionary Keith Harvey, assisted by local priesthood, conducted a series of sermons on Sunday evenings during the month of March. Throughout the week cottage meetings were held in a number of homes.

The three choirs in the branch, the Chapel Choir (adults), Carol Choir (juniors) and Cherub Choir (small children), have been active. Besides presenting choir selections each Sunday morning and evening, they have presented two cantatas recently, one at Christmas and one at Easter. A concert was held in February, featuring secular and sacred music. The Chapel Choir is now preparing to present the story of Joseph Smith (in an outdoor setting), in music.—Reported by SYLVIA LESTER

Baptismal Service

BRIDGEPORT, WASHINGTON.—On January 19, Henry Kenny was the guest speaker. Deanne Rose, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Petersen, was blessed by Elder L. N. Johnsen, with Brother Kenny assisting. The baby is a granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Dobson.

February 4-5, District President Paul Crinzi visited homes and conducted a class at the church in the evenings. On February 28, Brother Crinzi and Bishop Ted Beck showed pictures of the Center Place. Refreshments followed, served by the ladies of the mission.

On March 2, after regular services and lunch, the Saints went to the river for a baptismal service. Marshall Holland, son-in-law of Marvin A. Dobson, was the candidate. Returning to the church, the Saints witnessed his confirmation, and also the blessing of three small children. Elders L. N. Johnsen and Charles W. Bruce officiated. Those blessed were Verna Lynn and Clarence Marshall Holland, and Beverly Suzanne Wiltfong.

Warren Cole of Spokane was a recent guest speaker.—Reported by MRS. VERLIE DOBSON

Spring Conference

SPARTA, WISCONSIN.—The spring conference for the Wisconsin District was held April 13. Conference convened at 9:30 A.M. with a prayer service, with Apostle D. T. Williams in charge. Brother Williams was the speaker at the eleven o'clock service.

The business session was held in the afternoon. Delegates to General Conference were selected.

The following men were approved for ordination: Harry Luce, Beloit, Wisconsin, to the office of elder; Victor Lakowske, Sparta, Wisconsin, to the office of elder.

There were 180 in attendance.—Reported by MARIAN L. SCHORR

Emphasis on Stewardship

CHILLIWACK, BRITISH COLUMBIA. — Evangelist Monte E. Lasater of Seattle, Washington, held a two weeks' series of meetings in December. On December 15, the last Sunday of the series, the ladies served a pot-luck luncheon to members from Rosedale, Agassiz, and Chilliwack.

On February 2, Bishop Hudson Grundy, of Guelph, Ontario, visited the Saints. Sister Ethel Piedt, of Victoria, B. C., district women's leader, spoke to the women at the church school hour, and Bishop Grundy instructed the men. The morning service was a combined Communion and accounting service. Annual tithing statements which had been filled out before were deposited in trays and gathered by the deacons.

After a basket lunch, a special afternoon meeting was held, in which Elder Charles Stanbridge of Vancouver, B. C., showed the film "The Center Place." A question and answer period on stewardship was conducted by Brother Grundy after the film.

Elder Raymond Huggett, British Columbia District missionary, held a series of meetings March 2-26. Sunday mornings and evenings he preached in the church, and during the week held cottage meetings in the various homes. On Wednesday evenings he gave lectures in the church, illustrating his message with films on "The Church of Christ" and "Life after Death."—Reported by MARY JEWETT

Faith

If you ever feel "down in the dumps," pick up a copy of this leaflet and read it through. It is just as good for members as it is for nonmembers. It is "chock full" of hope and should give you a real lift when you feel low.

By Patriarch Elbert A. Smith, Faith is the second of the "Gospel Series" of tracts—originally the Busy Man's Series. It was written many years ago but, although it has a few outdated references, is still very timely and constructive in approach.

Brother Elbert points out the continual use of faith in all phases of living—the home, business, government—and he recognizes it as a "universal human instinct." He affirms that both science and religion are based "first, on faith in continuity of law; second, on faith in universality of law. . . . There is no conflict between true science and true religion."

Among the gems of thought to be found in the tract are these: "Doubt is negative and destructive. Faith is constructive and affirmative. . . . Ally yourself with those who believe and affirm and create." "Credulity has its root in ignorance. Any half-wit can be credulous. Faith has its root in observation and revelation. It calls for the keenest minds, the biggest hearts, and the cleanest lives." "The follower of Jesus Christ has everything to gain and nothing to lose. The atheist has all to lose and nothing to gain."

Single copy price is 3 cents. Keep a copy handy for your own use as well as for giving a friend.

CHECKPOINT

The test of courage comes when we are in the minority; the test of tolerance comes when we are in the majority.

—Ralph W. Sockman

A SLOGAN WE SHOULD USE

"The church where you are a stranger only once and then for only a moment" is a slogan used by a congregation in Newport, R.I.

People like to go where they feel welcome. That's why we should make everyone who attends our church feel that he is wanted, that he is a brother, and that we are interested in him. If we will cultivate friendliness, love, unity, and good will for each other and extend the same to our fellow men, we can go a long way toward holding our members in the church. Not only that, we will also attract nonmembers who come into our midst. They will feel this good Spirit and want it to work in their lives also.

BRACERS

The most important branch of education is learning to live in harmony with God. It will serve you when nothing else can. It will serve you after death.

When you pray for your enemy don't ask God to make him see as you see; rather ask him to see as God sees.

We generally "cut the pattern" for our deepest sorrows and for our greatest joys.

Ernest F. Brace

AUTO INTOXICATION

Today I stood on the sidewalk waiting for the traffic to clear on a one-way street where there was a stop sign. I saw only one car approaching and thought, Here's my chance! It was at a four-lane highway, and the driver had chosen the farthest lane. By walking briskly I made the crossing, but I could feel the swish of the tires on my heels. The driver didn't wish to break the rhythm of his motor and was reserving his steering wheel action for turning corners only.

What gets into people who sit behind the wheel of a fine automobile, which causes them to be so discourteous and impudent? The pedestrian has the right-of-way by law, but he risks his life every time he takes it. I can think of only one plausible excuse for such highway manners: auto intoxication. This kind of self-poisoning is due to the fumes of burning gasoline in the exhaust pipe, the unique odor of the car's upholstery, and the vanity, sometimes called "pride of ownership," which overpowers the normal brain functions. Any intoxication is bad, but the auto kind seems to have reached epidemic proportions.

Walking the Plank

THESSE men aren't being forced to walk the plank by pirates, nor are they preparing for a high-diving contest. They're not even trapeze artists in a circus.

What you see is the last of the scaffolding which was suspended from the Auditorium dome as work was done on the ceiling. It's a long way to the floor from that scaffolding, and we've come a long way in beautifying the interior of the Conference chamber, too.

As can be seen in this picture, new lights have been installed in the dome. Ventilation grills are also in place now and the entire ceiling has been finished in a pleasant gray shade. Indirect lighting illuminates the huge ellipse, and as an additional feature there is a catwalk for maintenance men to use.

The new sound baffles suspended over the rostrum area have been variously referred to as "angels' clouds" and "flying saucers." They will greatly improve the acoustics inside the giant room.

The cove above the balcony doors is finished now. Behind this cove is another catwalk and more indirect lighting. This catwalk will be useful for TV cameras and special lighting effects, as well as for regular maintenance work. Also visible is the space for the antiphonal organ which will be included with the new pipe organ to be installed at a later date.

A new floor is taking shape as aisles are moved and the seating arrangement altered. Beautiful new seats will be put in place, and the aisles will be carpeted to add beauty to this huge chamber which will shortly house another world-wide General Conference.

Other parts of the building are vastly improved also. A new workshop area has been completed; new office space is being provided on the sixth level; and additional rooms have been finished for quorum sessions. East and west entrances are being widened and beautified. New public telephone booths are being prepared on either side of the main foyer. The Auditorium is being brought nearer completion.

No one person, nor even a select group of persons, owns this building. Many people from many different lands have shared in its construction. The fine response to a recent request for added funds for seats was most heartening. Some congregations have done wonders in accepting the challenge.

Saints all over the world will rejoice to see the Auditorium being improved and beautified. It will bear visible testimony of the devotion of faithful disciples of Christ who gladly pool their resources in response to the divine invitation to "build up the Center Place."

Nearly twenty years ago, President Frederick M. Smith made the following observations:

"To follow Jesus as believer, disciple, and servant, man must hold all his possessions, his life, his conduct, his attitude, and his money at the service of God, ready to utilize all in the service of his fellow man, as full duty to Deity.

"Wealth and property are not for personal pleasure, according to caprice, but for service and enlarged contribution to common weal or comfort. Riotous or extravagant living is incongruous with the doctrine of stewardships, and . . . luxury is justified only when commonly enjoyed. . . .

"And here lies the justification even today for costly, beautiful, and even luxurious public buildings—they are common wealth."

This Holy Ground

And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him . . . and said, Moses, . . . put off thy shoes from off thy feet; for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground.—Exodus 3: 4, 5.

IF THERE IS ONE THING from which people of the world are suffering in our time, it is their failure to realize that there is such thing as holy ground. The materialistic philosophy and the carnal world have almost robbed them of a sense of holiness. Something important has been lost.

A young pastor, not long in the church and recently ordained, having come from a faith in which the altar and pulpit are profoundly respected, writes for help. He is distressed by the informality in which anybody can go into the pulpit to talk or make announcements. People are lacking in reverence, and as a result their spiritual life suffers.

There are no strict church laws regarding the use of the pulpit, and General Conference has established no regulations. But we are not without a means of help, and some suggestions are available.

Some of our newer churches have altars, with pulpits reserved for the use of the ministry, on one side; and lecterns, for reading, announcements, and general talks, on the other. Some believe that it is good for people to stand to one side and let attention be focused on the Communion table, an altar, or other sacred symbol.

Not all churches, especially those built long ago and those that are small, can have a good altar arrangement. We must do the best we can with what we have.

If we wish to deepen and strengthen the spiritual life of our people, we must lead them to an appreciation of the importance of sacred things and places, especially the church at the time of worship. This can be done.

If we are to help people, we can do so best in a situation in which we have already established a relationship of sympathy, understanding, and trust. In such circumstances it is possible to give them leadership in a direction that will enrich their spiritual life.

Improvement in the spirit of reverence and worship can be had by asking for the members' help and co-operation; and we can sincerely promise them that the blessings of God will be greater as they make progress in developing reverence and the spirit of worship. It might be easier to quote a law and demand obedience, but it would not be so good. Giving orders is seldom as effective as using more gentle ways.

Some years ago one of our large congregations had a serious problem at the church services. The spirit of worship was weak. People were noisy, not very orderly, visiting too much, and not dignified or reverent. The situation was discouraging.

The young pastor thought something could be done about it. He would appeal to the people and try to make a little program of education to improve worship conditions.

At the time when he made the announcements, before the beginning of the service, he included a short plea for help in improving some part of the worship or in correcting some fault or mistake on the part of the people. He did not criticize or scold. He called attention to the problem and in a kindly way asked for co-operation in solving it.

Improvement began immediately. In a few weeks, as he discussed the problems one at a time, they were solved. After that, it was seldom necessary to mention them. He worked with the deacons, who proved a great help in meeting the problems. In wisdom and kindness he met the problems. The people were much happier and better satisfied. Worship conditions greatly improved. The people simply needed leadership and guidance.

It was believed at the time that a key to the problem would be found in a consistent educational effort, that the people would respond if they were helped to understand.

RESPECT FOR THE ALTAR and the pulpit must begin with the priesthood members themselves. When they are careful, dignified, and reverent the people can be willingly and kindly led to new and rich experiences in the good spirit of worship.

Certainly we know it is true that God can bless us more richly when we love him, and that when we love and respect the house of the Lord it will truly become a sanctuary and a spiritual refuge in which we can find security and peace.

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Seventy T. Ed Barlow comments on a conversion experience in which he participated in Laporte, Indiana:

Two weeks ago we baptized a Mormon priest who was the branch clerk of his former church and one of its loyal and active workers. Two women missionaries from Utah had brought him the Restoration message, and the story of Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon rang true. However, after two or three years, he found other doctrines coming to the front that Brigham Young had introduced, and he became confused and on the verge of dropping out of church activity.

It was about at this point that the Reorganization held a preaching series last August in the same hall that the Mormons were using. His mother, a Mormon also, came the first night after reading our newspaper article. She then got him to come, and ever since we haven't been able to answer his questions fast enough because of this thirst for truth. Last December he resigned his office in the Mormon church and began attending our services regularly. Because of one mistake, he was very cautious in being baptized again for fear he would be wrong again. It was at a baptismal service in which four others were being baptized that we asked for any others desiring to make their covenant with the Lord to come forward. This young man, Lewis Vermilyer, then took off his coat and shoes and walked with me into the lake.

This whole experience has been a blessing to the Saints of Laporte. It makes me wonder how many other Mormons are confused today and dropping out of activity because of finding contrary doctrine that dishonors the entire Restoration movement.

Seven Ways to Pray

"Grace" by Enstrom

And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites; for they love to pray standing in synagogues and the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men; for, verily, I say unto you, they have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to thy Father who is in secret; and thy Father who seeth in secret shall reward thee openly. But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the hypocrites do; for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Therefore be ye not like unto them; for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him. Therefore after this manner shall ye pray, saying, Our Father who art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven. Give us this day, our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And suffer us not to be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever, and ever, Amen.—Matthew 6: 5-15, Inspired Version.

SOME PEOPLE SCOFF at prayer because they seem to think that it is a kind of superstition by which believers hope to maneuver God into position so they may get him to run errands for them. Of course this is absurd. Prayer is not a magic means by which we can control God but a humble means by which God can control us—by which he can find expression through us, release his power and express his purpose in us.

A glance at the history of mankind reveals that prayer is a universal need and a natural function of human life. The very act of praying, practiced by most peoples of the world, indicates a reaching out of the soul with a degree of faith in some higher power. "He that cometh to God must believe that he is."

We shall not consider so much the theory as the experience of prayer. Many factors enter into this and there are many avenues of approach to the Supreme Being. We shall mention seven of them.

The Prayer of Affirmation

This is a positive declaration of our faith and confidence in and our adoration for our heavenly Father.

"Our Father who art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name."

"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want."

"Though he slay me, yet will I trust him."

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me."

There is great power in prayers of affirmation. This creates a center of attention, a pattern of thought, an attitude toward God and toward life. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night."—Psalm 1: 1, 2. The pattern of our behavior is fashioned by the center of our most desired interests. We find ourselves doing the things upon which we "meditate day and night."

There may be danger in this, even in prayer. One may pray about trouble so much that trouble becomes the center of his attention, and he thus attracts trouble. Some who have temptations and bad habits such as stealing or lying or drinking or smoking or sexual problems may affirm those things and put them in the center of their minds so often and so strong that they "meditate day and night" about them, and even though they include them in their prayers they may end up worse than they began.

Our affirmations and delight must be "in the law of the Lord." In so doing we are not affirming sin or selfish interests; the center of our faith and hope and desire is in God. Jesus said, "After this manner shall ye pray . . . Suffer us not to be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory."

The Prayer of Inner Conflict

The most decisive battles of the world are not fought with guns or planes or battleships or guided missiles but deep down in the hearts and souls of men and women. The destiny of Israel was with Moses when he was alone with God beside the burning bush. The destiny of mankind was with Jesus when he was alone with God in the wilderness for forty days and forty nights. The destiny of the Restoration was with the boy Joseph Smith when he went into the woods to be alone with God, seeking divine wisdom. The destiny of many a man and woman hangs in the balance as he or she stands, as it were, in the wilderness of life alone with God, trying to win the battle of spiritual and moral conflict that so often rages fiercely in the heart and soul.

The decisive victory in that battle or the destiny of that soul may well be determined by the right approach to God in prayer—or the absence of that prayer. Jesus found it necessary to fast and pray and commune with God.

Beware of self-righteousness and overconfidence in moral and spiritual conflicts. Even when Jesus had communed with God, Satan came also. It is too late to prepare for the onslaught of Satan after his vicious attack. That preparation must be completed beforehand in communion with God. Then and only then can you resist the powers of hell. But when, by the help of God, you have found victory, you may experience a peace of mind, conviction of truth, and a companionship with God that exceeds all earthly glory.

Prayer of Submission to God's Will

This is the prayer that releases the power of God.

Some seem to feel that to submit to the will of God means self-sacrifice or self-denial. But the truth is exactly the reverse. To place one's all completely in the hands of God is not a sacrifice but a privilege that is filled with the blessed assurance of final victory over all of the opposing forces of earth and hell. To deny evil is to enjoy freedom from sin and degradation. May I repeat, prayer is not a way of getting God to do what we want, not a way of maneuvering him into our desired position, but rather a way of putting ourselves in such relationship with God that he can do in and for and through us what he wants. It is not a magic means by which we can control God but a humble means by which he can control us.

Are you afraid to trust the mind and will of God?

Are you afraid that God may take a loved one whom you are unwilling to release to him?

Are you afraid that God may ask of you a service of sacrificial consecration?

Are you afraid that God may require you to forsake some of your pet sins and coveted selfish transgressions?

If any of these fears are yours, then you have need to renew your faith and your convictions concerning God and the whole truth of the purpose and power of the gospel of Christ.

The Prayer of Fellowship with God

This type of prayer is lived rather than uttered.

There exists in some lives the misconception that prayer is an emergency measure only. Some people forget about God until they get into a tight place; then they try to pray themselves out of it. This is a false concept of prayer.

It is good to go to God when we are in trouble, but that approach to him will be most effective when we have been in constant fellowship with him in good times as well as bad.

This fellowship is closely related to one's mental attitude. The content of our minds is exclusively our own. Some things in the material world that we want may be denied us, and some things we do not want may be thrust upon us, but if we are normal we can be master of the content of our minds. We may entertain thoughts of selfishness and sin, of hatred and resentment, of ambition and lust, or we may—if we will—select as our companion in thought sacred fellowship with God. That fellowship will not suffer us to be led into temptation and will deliver us from evil.

The Prayer of Gratitude

This is a prayer of love.

An ungrateful soul is a selfish soul. But one who, in humble gratitude, gives honor, praise, and glory to the Giver of every good and perfect gift has learned of Christ.

The very experience of thankfulness opens the heart and soul to God. This is particularly true when one's sense of gratitude reaches out from self to a sincere appreciation of God's goodness to others, and when it finds expression in a willingness to share his own blessings with his fellow man. When, without jealousy or envy, one can "rejoice with them that do rejoice," he has learned to live the prayer of gratitude in the true spirit of fellowship and love.

The Prayer of Obedience

Jesus said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

A prayer of words only, without attempt to obey the will of God, is not only ineffective in practice but hypocritical and sacrilegious.

When unrepentant, disobedient people came to John to be baptized he said, "O, generation of vipers: who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Why is it that ye receive not the preaching of him whom God hath sent? . . . Repent, therefore, and bring forth fruits meet for repentance" (Matthew 3: 33-35).

In outstanding contrast to this the Apostle James said, "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much" (James 5: 16).

The Quiet Prayer of Inner Peace with God

Have you learned to relax and rest in the divine Presence? I do not mean a life of idleness and inactivity but restful moments in the stillness of the soul. There is no peace or joy known to man to excel the quiet companionship with God in the silence of the soul. "He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul" (David). "Stand in awe, and sin not; commune with your own heart . . . and be still" (David). "Be still, and know that I am God" (David). "Peace; be still" (Jesus).

There is said to be a river in the northern part of Canada the source of which is high in the mountains at the foot of glacier formations. The water in this river is muddy from sediments at its source and from its muddy banks. It rushes swiftly and restlessly down the ravine as though impatient to reach its destiny in the sea. Then suddenly the river levels off into a valley and pours its muddy content into the deep waters of a beautiful lake. The lake, sheltered by mountains and forest, is very still. For a time the muddy waters of the rushing river are peaceful and quiet, calmed by the restful shelter of the lake.

Then on the other side as the lake overflows the river continues its course. At this point the water is almost clear, much of the mud and sediment having disappeared in the stillness of the lake. But again the river rushes on, dashing itself against the rocks and muddy banks and soon becoming almost as muddy as before, until another valley and another lake, larger and deeper than the first, again calms the restless stream. For a long time the river is held by the still waters.

And finally, emerging on the other side, the water is as clear as crystal, and quietly moves on to its destiny in the sea.

Some of us may permit ourselves to become so troubled and worried over the trend and course of events in our lives that we rush here and there and figuratively dash ourselves against the rocks and mud and filth of the world as though we were impatient with everything that God has done for us, and as though we were anxious to throw ourselves into the great sea of the final destiny of man.

A little boy was awakened in the night by the thunderous road of a fierce electric storm. Frightened, he ran quickly to his mother's room and soon fell asleep in the quieting security of her loving arms.

Years later when that little boy became a man, he was awakened and frightened by the merciless storms of an ungodly world, fierce enough to crush the moral and spiritual life out of the very hearts and souls of men. "When he came to himself" he went quickly to his heavenly Father, and in the quiet security of God's loving presence found peace that passes all understanding.

"Lord, teach us to pray."

Thomas A. Johnstone*

Comprehending God

The day shall come when you shall comprehend even God.
—Joseph Smith in Doctrine and Covenants 85:12.

This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.—Jesus Christ; John 17:3.

These two statements have much in common, for really to "know" anything is to comprehend it.

God Only an Idea

Some anthropologists say that there is no God. They suggest the idea that God originated in the mind of primitive man who imagined that the animals, trees, and other natural phenomena must have been created by someone more powerful than themselves. Then again, they say that it might have grown up around the memory of some "old man" whose wise leadership brought the tribe successfully through some great danger. Gods, they point out, are tribal possessions and they cite the Israelite God, Jehovah, as a typical example that shows how the idea has grown and developed through the ages as man's knowledge increased. There is a vast difference, they point out, between their conception of "God of the burning mountain" and that held by us today.

They ascribe the similarity in the ritual that is so noticeable in the ancient and primitive religions, whether in connection with the sacrifice of a bear in Siberia, a bull in Rome, or a human in Africa or Central America, as the outgrowth of man's basic needs that somehow led to the rise of a similar ritual in every part of the world.

They simply refuse to consider the far more logical explanation presented in the Bible—that it is a heritage stemming from their common origin which they carried with them wherever they went all over the world. While the object sacrificed varied with the geographical location, the ritual stayed the same.

Adam, at God's command, instituted the first sacrificial offering, a lamb, to point his descendants to the great sacrifice of Christ which was later to be made on Calvary in atonement for their sins. The suggestion of the human sacrifices, that later become so common, was inherent in this first sacrifice. Its original purpose and meaning became lost and forgotten as man sank into a state of degradation and savagery. God foreknew man's need and made provision for it when he planned his creation. Thus the everlasting gospel, based on the truth and righteousness and love of God, was revealed to Adam and was preached by him to his family from the beginning. Seth and Enoch, among others, were preachers; and Noah, it is recorded, was a "preacher of righteousness" in a scoffing world at the end of the glacial period when the "fountains of the great deep," the ice sheets that covered so much of the earth, were "broken up."

God's Unreality

The nations of the world have no sense of God's reality. He is less real than a shadow, for he has nothing to cast a shadow. This unreality of God among the nations of the world is the source of the dark calamity that overshadows them today. In office, factory, mart, and on the street the word "God" is heard mostly as a meaningless curse. Many people go to church on Sunday, impelled more by superstitious fear than by a real desire to worship God. "Most Christians," said Erasmus, "are superstitious instead of pious; and, except for the name of Christ, are not far from the superstitions of the heathen." How can they be otherwise with their conception of God? God is a spirit—something without either body, parts, or passions. He is everywhere and in everything at the same time. He is "light"; he is "love"; and someone may even say he is science's omnipotent baby, energy. But that is not all, for he is also three persons in one—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. What sense can anyone make out of this confusion?

Some of God's Names

The Bible mentions the following names for God: I Am, Almighty, Jehovah, Father, the living God, Alpha and Omega. "I Am" proclaims his eternal nature, Jehovah, the Eternal One. He is Father because he is the creator and source of life; Alpha and Omega, the first and the last, because there was nothing before him and there is nothing beyond him; all things exist and have their being through the "intelligence" we know as "God."

Whence Comes Intelligence?

You who read this and I who write it consider ourselves intelligent beings. But did you ever stop to think where our intelligence came from? The first words in the Bible are "In the beginning God," and herein is wisdom, for before there could be any knowledge of anything there had to be an intelligent entity. There never could have been any creation if there had not been something that knew of the existence of the material, forces, and laws that govern the orderly process of creation.

Every creation is a manifestation of the work of a Creator. The universe with all its marvels is reproducing and renewing itself in orderly cycles. This process is most plainly seen in the living organisms and is also to be noted in the recurring cycles of nature, the seasons and circling stars. All this is a revelation of the majesty, power, and glory of the supreme eternal intelligence, God, through whom only could anything ever have come into existence.

Intelligence could not, and did not, come from unintelligent matter. Nor is it a manifestation of equally unintelligent energy. Life comes from the living; intelligence from intelligence; and unintelligent things beget only unintelligent things. "Tall oaks from little acorns grow" only because the "little acorn" was once part of an oak.

Man and God

When God created man he created him in his "own" image and after his "own" likeness. He fashioned a body out of the dust of the earth and put man's spirit in it. The body and the spirit thus joined together become a "living soul." Only when the body and the spirit are joined together are they living. This is the principle of life. It is what makes man a living soul and a being "like" God. God must also be a living soul—have a body and a spirit.

Long ago Job, who was highly favored of God, revealed to man the source of his intelligence: "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." The spirit in man, which is the intelligent part of him, receives its understanding from the Spirit of the Almighty, progressively, "line upon line, here a little, there a little," as it is able to receive it and has need of it. This is proved by the fact that most of the world's great discoveries have been the result of flashes of inspiration, intuition, and accident, and not the fruit of man's own unaided intelligence. It is when man commits the mistake of imagining that his "proud brain" is his intelligence and not just an organ of his body like his liver and his lungs that "all highroads of the intellect, all byways of theory and conjecture lead ultimately to an abyss human ingenuity can never span" (The Universe and Dr. Einstein, Lincoln Barnett).

Doctrine of the Trinity

To understand the doctrine of the Trinity one must hark back to the Nicean Council, A.D. 325. It was through the deliberations of that council this was made part of the doctrine of the Christian church. It was done to please Constantine the Great, the Emperor, who was never converted to Christianity, though he was baptized just before he died. It was he who called the council into session, and he who suggested the word "identical" be used to describe the relationship of God, Christ, and the Holy Ghost.

It is to the actions of these councils of the early "church fathers" who were ambitious, self-seeking, quarrelsome men whose chief desire seemed to be power to rule and dictate the policies of the church and not humbly to teach the pure doctrine of Christ, that we owe much of the confusion that exists today. They denied continuous revelation, closed the canon of Scriptures, and thus shut Christ out of the church. They knew nothing about the inspiration and guidance of the Comforter and Spirit of Truth Christ had sent to keep his church from being led astray. They felt they were wise enough in themselves and needed no guidance from anyone, including Christ. The church had advanced well along the road to the apostasy mentioned so frequently in the New Testament writings. Its leaders were "teaching for doctrine the commandments of men."

Some Quotes and Comments

At the time of Christ's baptism a dove descended from heaven and a voice said, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." Was Christ only a cheap magician faking doves and voices from heaven to deceive the people into believing he was something which he was not?

"As thou hast sent me into the world, even so I have also sent them . . . and these have known that thou hast sent me." Do you believe Christ was "sent," or do you believe he came on his own?

Again Christ said, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." And again, "I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. But I know him; for I am from him, and he hath sent me" (John 7: 28, 29). "I bear witness of myself, . . . and the Father himself who sent me, hath borne witness of me."

In these quotations Christ states that he and the Father are two separate persons.

He prayed to the Father for the disciples, "Make them one, even as thou and I art one." Would you suggest that this means that the eleven apostles be made into one person, and not "make them all of one mind"? How you decide this question will determine the relationship of God and Christ. If Christ and the Father were actually one and the same person, what would be the point of Christ praying to the Father?

"I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me" (John 8: 42). Could anything be clearer?

"Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus; . . . who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God. . . . Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name" (Philippians 2: 5-9). Did Christ exalt himself and give himself a name "above every name"?

"Looking unto Jesus . . . who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross . . . and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Hebrews 12: 2). Note that Christ is set at the right hand of the throne, not on it. That is reserved for someone else.

My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me.—John 7: 16.
And he that sent me is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him.—John 8: 29.
And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. I have glorified thee on the earth: I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do. And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was. . . . Now they have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee. For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me.—John 17: 3-8.

And I saw in the right hand of him that sat on the throne a book. . . . Who is worthy to open the book? . . . The Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book . . . a Lamb as it had been slain. . . . And he came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne . . . And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood. . . . Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.—Revelation 5. [The Lamb took the book out of the hand of him that sat on the throne—two of them].

And I, the Lord God, spake unto Moses, saying, That Satan whom thou hast commanded in the name of mine Only Begotten, is the same which was from the beginning; and he came before me, saying, Behold I, send me, I will be thy Son, and I will redeem all mankind, that one soul shall not be lost, and surely I will do it; wherefore, give me thine honor. But behold, my beloved Son, which was my beloved and chosen from the beginning, said unto me; Father, thy will be done; and the glory be thine for ever. Wherefore, because that Satan rebelled against me, and sought to destroy the agency of man, which I, the Lord God, had given him; and also that I should give unto him mine own power; by the power of mine Only Begotten I caused that he should be cast down; and he became Satan.—Genesis 3: 1-4. [Here the separate personalities of God and Christ are clearly set out.]

More Than One God

Is there more than one God? . . . No.—Alma 8: 81, 82.

. . . becoming as gods, knowing good from evil.—Alma 9: 51.

As it is written, They are gods, the sons of God.—Doctrine and Covenants 76: 5.

And Christ, speaking to the Jews (John 10: 34-36), said: "Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? [Psalm 82: 6]. If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken; say ye of him, whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God?" Is it strange that those who are sent and act for God, doing the things he tells them to do, should be called gods? They have the use of his power to accomplish his will.

In Doctrine and Covenants 18: 2, we find a passage that is used to prove that Christ and God are one: "For behold, I, God, have suffered these things for all . . . which suffering caused myself, even God, the greatest of all, to tremble because of pain, and to bleed at every pore, and to suffer both body and spirit, and would that I might not drink the bitter cup, and shrink." A further reading in this paragraph makes it plain: "Nevertheless, glory be to the Father, and I partook and finished my preparations unto the children of men." And in the same section, paragraph 1, "Christ the Lord . . . having accomplished and finished the will of him whose I am, even the Father, concerning me." Also in Doctrine and Covenants 34: 1, "I am Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was crucified for the sins of the world, even as many as will believe on my name, that they may become the sons of God, even one in me as I am in the Father, as the Father is one in me, that we may be one."

The Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants, three books with one testimony—Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God.

Joseph Smith, the latter-day prophet, in his first vision saw two personages, one of whom said, "This is my beloved Son, hear him." Again, Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon wrote: "This is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him, that he lives; for we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the Only Begotten of the Father (Doctrine and Covenants 76: 3).

A Personal Testimony

And now I will relate the experience that gave me my understanding of God. I came to disbelieve the Bible and doubt the sincerity of the preachers as a result of studying the "natural sciences." The first Sunday I spent in Canada, to pass the evening, my brother and I went to hear a preacher who was "packing" a theater in Toronto every Sunday night. That preacher, R. C. Evans, gave me a new outlook on Christianity. And I left feeling that Christianity was either the most worth-while thing in the world or the biggest fraud in it. He repeated Christ's challenge to all mankind: "My doctrine is not mine but his that sent me. If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." That challenge struck me, and I felt there was only one thing I could do—test it. I began to read and study, and at the end of four years I decided that if the teachings of Christ were to be found anywhere, they were in the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and I joined it. I continued studying for perhaps eleven or twelve years more and was still unable to say that Jesus was more than just a man. Certainly I had received no testimony to make me think otherwise. As I read and studied one Sunday morning, I began to think there wasn't must sense in my continuing to do so any longer. Then as I was deciding to give it up, a voice said: "Thomas, thou hast a testimony, even the testimony of Peter, than which there is none greater, for unto you it is given to know that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and ye shall bear this testimony."

I cannot adequately describe this experience and all the enlightenment that came with it; I can only tell of it. In that moment I knew God was living, that Christ was his Son, and that he was everywhere through his laws, not in person.

It is not important that God and Christ be "one" person, but it is of the utmost importance that they be of "one" mind, for on that man's salvation depends.

And finally I would leave this thought for you to consider: to the extent you do God's will you are in God and God is in you, even as he was in Christ and Christ in him. I pray that the Spirit of God may make these things as plain to you as it has to me, or even plainer.

No one can intelligently worship something he cannot comprehend. Worship based on ignorance is largely an act of superstition grounded in fear. Man begins to comprehend God when he realizes he is basically "like" him. The world cannot comprehend God; but "his" people can, for he has revealed himself to them. "The glory of God is intelligence." The glory of man is his intelligence, imperfect as it is.

The True Worth

THE BIBLE's true worth is calculated by its content—not by its age or rareness.

I recently read of a court case in which several contestants claimed a two hundred-year-old Bible. Since its owner had died without leaving a will, each person who wanted the book tried to give reasons why he should be given permanent possession. But it wasn't that these people wanted a Bible. They wanted a rare book for which collectors would pay a fabulous price.

These people were applying wrong standards in valuing the Bible. They forgot that the real value of this sacred book is reckoned from its contents—not by materialistic standards. If they would only study the Scriptures and employ them as God directs, they would become wealthy indeed, for they would one day receive eternal treasures which are the most valuable of all gifts.

A Church Designed for Ministry to Children

THE Prairie Village congregation is one which has done something special for its children. More than two years ago the members of that congregation began to plan for building a church home. After careful consideration they decided to build the educational unit first and hold their worship services in a section of the building that would be divided into classrooms at a later date when the main sanctuary was erected.

Brother Lewis E. Scott knew of their problem and their concern for their children, and it occurred to him that with the proper design a building could be erected and have permanent classrooms for all classes, adequate in size for a congregation of a book membership of three hundred and fifty, and in addition, have a children's chapel which could be used for adult worship until the main sanctuary was built, as well as a fellowship hall with a ceiling high enough to permit limited forms of volleyball and basketball. This offered Brother Scott an opportunity to try out his theory that, with adequate and balanced educational facilities, the church could do a better job of teaching and minister more effectively to a larger membership. He therefore presented the idea to members of the building committee for their consideration; they agreed to its possibilities and approved the plan and his constructing of the building.

The children's chapel, now being used by the adults, has all the facilities of a sanctuary. The pews will seat ninety in the nave. They are a little closer to the floor than adult pews but not enough to be uncomfortable for the adults. The children were considered when the pews were chosen; and a low end design shorter than the regular ends was selected. There is a balcony in the rear for the choir. The balcony seats thirty-eight and is equipped with pews identical to those in the nave. At the present time there is a fourteen-rank pipe organ, which is large enough to be used later in the main sanctuary. Between the nave and narthex are sliding glass windows that drop down into the wainscoting to permit the narthex to be used for overflow seating. Behind the narthex is the women's parlor which can also be used for overflow. One hundred and ten people can be seated in these two overflow areas. A cry room with double glazing is at the side and rear of the nave; about eight mothers can be seated here to see and hear the service. Approximately ten more people can be seated in the balcony with chairs in an area in front of the pews, giving the children's chapel a seating capacity of two hundred and fifty-six when needed.

The decorating of the building was turned over to Brother Scott, and the purpose of each room was kept in mind when the details were worked out. The hope of all working on the building was that it would be possible to create a lasting impression on those who worshiped in the chapel, especially the children. It had been decided that the children's chapel would be a fitting place for the baptismal font. Because of these two things, the chancel needed special attention; it was felt that a beautiful stained glass window could be the center of interest there, and everything surrounding it should tend to draw the eye toward this point. Natural ash paneling was selected for the chancel so that it would not be distracting. The stained glass window took a great deal of consideration. A number of suggestions for the design of this window were made. All agreed that it must make a lasting impression upon the children, and that the design was not something to be worshiped but rather to stimulate and inspire the thoughts of those worshipping. Abstract patterns were suggested, but it was not felt that this would accomplish its purpose. Brother Scott suggested that the design should embody as much as possible of our particular belief, and Brother Eldon Derry, chairman of the building committee, suggested that the brotherhood of man should be incorporated in the window. The final design was turned over to Brother Scott, and the window was completed with Christ leading the children of various nationalities up the path to Zion. Along the pathway is the scroll of the New and Old Testaments joined together, the Book of Mormon plates, and the open book of the Doctrine and Covenants. At the top of the path is the beautiful city of Zion. Close observation reveals the writing at the end of the Old and beginning of the New Testament on the scrolls and the first page of the Doctrine and Covenants. The Scripture selected for the base of the picture was "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you" (III Nephi 6: 11). Brother Scott worked closely with the Hopcroft Art Glass Company of Kansas City in the development of the window. A number of visits to Hopcroft were made by Stake President Fred O. Davies, Bishop Joseph Baldwin, and Apostle Maurice Draper in checking the details of the window. The stained glass was imported from Germany and Italy. The glass varies in thickness and shading.

A Five-Year-Old's Faith

And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, Verily, I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven!—Matthew 18: 2.

THERE HAVE BEEN many times in my teaching career when I wondered who had the greater lesson to learn—the children or the teacher.

Helping a child to become conscious of his environment and fellow beings is one of a teacher's never-ending lessons. I struggled with this lesson, as most beginning teachers do, until the interpretation of my real objectives was given me by a five-year-old.

One day a little boy was called from my room by the school nurse for a physical examination. During his absence the children sang their prayer and drank their milk. As was the custom in our room, each then got his rug and began resting on the floor in various places around the room. The curtains were lowered and all was quiet.

At this time the little boy returned. Without hesitation he stepped around the resters and went to his table. Sitting down, he directly folded his hands, bowed his head, and sang his little prayer with all the conviction of the ages.

To a trained adult ear, the prayer was not sung very well. However, what was lacking in quality was more than compensated for in volume. At that moment I knew that this was perhaps the most beautiful hymn I had ever heard. It was sung from pure and simple faith and with great humility of heart. None of the other five-year-olds stirred or indicated in any way that this boy had done anything unusual.

We, as adults, still have to learn what these little children know instinctively. That is, always to do unashamedly in the eyes of the world the thing our faith dictates as right.

Three Approaches to

Organizing Your Personal Study Program

THE CHURCH HAS always been interested in the education of its people. Writers are constantly at work preparing materials for use in personal study and in various classroom situations. Among these materials are books and tracts, reunion and camp study material, vacation church school materials, course materials for the Priesthood and Leadership Education program, and textbooks and study guides for the courses offered through the School of the Restoration. In addition to the efforts put forth in the preparation of such materials, the church is also constantly active through its administrative officers in an attempt to encourage members to participate in individual or group study.

Generally speaking, people are more easily motivated to study if they can readily see a frame of reference within which their efforts become significant. Study just for the sake of study alone soon becomes drab and pointless except for those who have the good fortune to be blessed with a natural thirst for knowledge. For many people, however, the desire for knowledge is a "hidden hunger" which does not call them into an active learning effort without some external stimulus being applied.

Since many who are in positions of leadership recognize these conditions and are sincerely interested in promoting more avid study among their people, we submit here a short word picture of the "frames of reference" within which they might well bend their efforts toward promoting consistent study among those who are within the range of their influence.

(1) Personal and individual study. The people of the church can be encouraged to buy books and tracts from Herald House, to obtain films and film strips and other audio-visual materials from the Audio-Visual Department, and to participate in various educational opportunities provided in their own communities such as college extension programs, local adult education programs, evening discussion groups. Almost every city has a variety of opportunities for those who will take the trouble to enter into them and participate. Probably few better ways exist for us to meet the "quality" potential Latter Day Saints who are to be found all around us. It is indeed unfortunate that so many members, even those who are well informed, have so few personal friends outside our own organization. The first step in becoming an effective personal witness may be to win friends outside the church through participation in wholesome and worthwhile learning activities sponsored by the community.

(2) Participation in the Priesthood and Leadership Education Program. This program sponsored by the church is operated under procedures outlined in the Priesthood and Leadership Education Bulletin, often referred to as Bulletin 106 (free on request). This bulletin lists the courses available and provides for the selection of the local discussion leader or instructor with the advice and counsel of the local presiding officer. Those participating in such a program have the opportunity to set up their classes under any arrangements which are convenient to the group. By payment of a small fee the class members

Neighbors' Estimate of Joseph Smith III

EDITOR'S NOTE—This article was written after a tour of Hancock County, Illinois, which includes Nauvoo and Carthage, by Bishop E. L. Kelley. It was published in the "Saints' Herald" of July 15, 1893, under the title, "Joseph Smith. Where He Was Raised." Since Joseph was then and has since been misrepresented and maligned, we think many of our readers will appreciate this statement.

Return to Carthage

So much has been said and written of the life, habits, and character of Joseph Smith, son of the founder of the Latter Day Saints, and prophet and presiding elder of the Reorganized Church of this peculiar people, that I was glad when the opportunity offered to visit in his company the old home of Mr. Smith, and meet, and see him meet his old associates and acquaintances.

Whatever may be said and written through prejudice and an inordinate religious zeal of those who dare to brook public opinion in matters of religious differences must in the eternal fitness of things be finally weighed and tested by the facts, and there is no circumstance under which these may be so readily and impartially gathered as that of seeing the parties brought face to face in business and social meetings.

In this situation on the morning of the 16th of June, 1893, I entered Carthage, the county seat of Hancock county, Illinois, upon business matters in company with Joseph Smith, and at once found that my companion had a very large number of acquaintances in the town for a person who had been absent from the county except upon an occasional visit for twenty-seven years. These, too, were of all classes; lawyers, farmers, bankers, editors, judges, colonels, etc., and men of varied faiths, sentiments, and beliefs in politics, policies, and religion.

Mr. Smith was reared and lived in Nauvoo, eighteen miles distant from Carthage, from 1839 to 1866, just twenty-seven years, the time elapsing since leaving and making his residence in Plano, Illinois, and afterwards at Lamoni, Iowa, where he now resides; and when I made inquiry as to how he happened to have so large a circle of acquaintances at the county seat so great a distance from his place of residence, I learned that he had held the office of justice of the peace of his town for about seven and a half years while he resided in the county, almost the entire time of his residence there after he became of age, and was elected to the office by a largely increased vote (his majority over other candidates being four to one) in the year 1862, at the time he was holding forth his religious views as a minister.

Among Friends

Away from his home I had heard and read the tales and gossip of the viciousness and idleness of Joseph Smith and his distinguished father; but when I met him in this home I find that he was the peace officer and leading citizen, of and with a people who were in no way adherents to his religion, and who were neighbors to and had come in contact with those who had permitted their prejudice and fanaticism to run so high as to become tools in murdering his father and uncle.

Judge Edmunds, of Carthage, with whom we had business, being absent on a visit to Chicago, we spent the remainder of the day in visiting and chatting with former acquaintances of Mr. Smith, among whom were Judge John B. Risse, Wm. R. Hamilton, W. C. Hooker, W. H. Manier (who is now second assistant attorney general of Illinois), Hiram Ferris, banker, James Davidson, editor of the Carthage Republican, and later Col. Thomas C. Sharp, long known as one of the bitterest enemies the Saints ever had in Hancock county. Mr. Smith met him with a pleasant good morning and introduced me.

Carthage Jail

We also visited the old jail, but now occupied by Mr. Browning as a residence, where Joseph and Hyrum Smith were murdered and John Taylor severely wounded by an ignorant, fanatical, and blackened mob forty-nine years before, lacking a few days.

Although raised in the county Mr. Smith had never been at this jail before, having no wish or desire to see it.

Mr. and Mrs. Browning and daughter received our visit kindly, and took quite an interest in pointing out the scarred and marked portions of the building that bore evidence of the tramping under foot of law and justice and the rage for blood on that dismal 27th of June, 1844.

We were told by Mrs. Browning of the frequent visits made to the building by persons curious to see and learn more of the transactions that took place on that day, and of the efforts of the people of Utah to obtain the building or some portion of it as a relic to be removed to Salt Lake City.

This again reminded us of the inconsistency and unreasonableness of the usual man in his religious zeal and fanaticism. Here was the son of Joseph Smith, and heir, successor, and highest exponent of the doctrine that he promulgated, gifted, broad-minded, logical, and consistent in his life and work, but whom the people of Utah would neither hear nor tolerate in their meetinghouses, simply because he boldly claimed that much of their doctrine was erroneous and that his father's teachings in the plainest terms condemned it.

It is the old story over again. The Jews declare: "We have Abraham and Moses to our fathers. We know that God spoke to Moses, but as for this man we know not from whence he is." But Christ said: "Ye build and garnish the tombs of the prophets and stone those who are sent unto you."

Principles

Joseph and Hyrum Smith, who gave their lives at Carthage, came before the world with a message of principles. These they claimed were nothing more nor less than what was taught by Jesus and his apostles and were in fact the gospel that was by them declared to be the "power of God unto salvation." They boldly held forth and advocated these principles to the world, not hesitating to canvass them with the most learned or avow them in the face of death. Their motto was let the world see and hear, for "whatsoever is in secret shall be made known upon the housetops."

The world met them, however, with the charge that they were not a highbred family—not educated—similar to the old charge "Is not his mother Mary, and Joses and James and Simon and Judas his brethren?" And so made their warfare against them through gossip and slander unto death; but the principles they advocated are today unshaken, and the son is demanding for them a reasonable hearing.

What then if the professed followers of Joseph Smith in Utah, or the great world outside of Utah, shall join hands and shut him out from their churches and synagogues and attempt to meet him upon the outside with gossip and tales, or vituperation and stones, does it furnish a reason for not accepting the principles originally revealed or answer the query as to the divinity of the mission?

Other Acquaintances

Leaving Carthage at 5:30 P.M. we set out for Nauvoo, changing cars at Ferris, where we took supper and met Mr. Christie, another old resident of the county who had known Mr. Smith from boyhood.

Mr. Christie has been a Universalist in faith; and a few years ago took an interest in the debate between Elder Forscutt of the Latter Day Saints, and Elder Shinn of the Universalist society. Mr. Christie heard the discussion throughout; while he thinks their minister held his own on the first question, he feels that Elder Forscutt was too heavy for him on the last proposition.

Passing through Keokuk we met Hon. Daniel F. Miller, Sen., at the depot, who had been acquainted with the elder Smiths of Nauvoo and the later families; but instead of speaking of them as bad men in any sense, Mr. Miller referred to them as men of the highest honor and integrity.

In Nauvoo

On Saturday morning we arrived in the city of Nauvoo, and I soon found that the reputation of my traveling companion was in no manner dimmed in the estimation of the old residents of the home of his childhood and youth.

We first called at the old Nauvoo House, and then at the old residence of Joseph Smith the Martyr which is still owned by Joseph Smith the son. Took dinner at the Temple Hotel, kept by Mr. John Kendall, an old resident of Nauvoo. During the day we met and conversed with a number of the citizens: Messrs. John Icking, merchant; Wm. B. Hubbard, attorney and son of one of the earliest settlers; Joseph Ochsner and Nicolas Reimbold, merchants; Noel Dation, Abraham Saunders, and Thomas Kelley—the latter a genuine Kelley from the Isle of Man ancestry; Joseph Kirschbaum the gardener; Charles E. Dundey, a young attorney; Wm. Argast and H. J. Bossler, publishers of the Nauvoo Rustler, live young men who are pushing ahead in the world; and divers others whom I cannot mention, nearly all of whom had been acquainted with Joseph Smith from his boyhood up, and who entertained for him the respect due to an honorable life. I queried, "From whence come the tales and stories peddled so often by long-faced, pious pulpiteers of the world?"

The Son of "Old Joe Smith"

On Monday morning, June 19, we again had occasion to call at Hotel Ferris on our return to Carthage, and met with the landlady a second time. This time, however, new light seemed all at once to dawn upon the mind of our hostess, for upon a sudden she emerged from a distant part of the house and came excitedly into the office and inquired of my traveling companion, "Are you Joe Smith, son of old Joe Smith the prophet?" Mr. Smith replied that that is what they said.

Upon inquiry being made if she was afraid of being carried off by the prophet, she said, "No, I have heard of him all my life, but never saw him before. I never heard anything bad about him in the county here. I have lived here all my life."

But this interview in the morning was not quite so strange and amusing to the writer as was that in the evening when we took supper awaiting the train westward.

Mr. Smith, a couple of traveling salesmen, and myself were partaking of supper when our hostess broke the monotony by announcing: "Did you know you were eating supper with Joe Smith from Salt Lake?"

Like the illustrious Barnum, this woman believes in the principle that when she has a drawing card to make use of it, and let the people know it. She is a natural-born and full-grown Hancock girl, and of course, to be like herself must be natural. Why not entertain her guests by exciting their curiosity? Of course Joseph Smith could not care—everybody talks about him. Mr. Smith replied to the announcement of the hostess: "I am Joseph Smith, but not from Salt Lake."

"Oh, well," says the lady, "I know he don't belong in Salt Lake, for he was raised in this country, but I wanted to fool 'em."

Idle Words

This is the key to much of the misrepresentation prevalent in the world. Somebody good-naturedly would like to fool somebody else; another takes a cue from this, and he makes use of it to further a selfish and base purpose. After a while the devoutly pious (?) find that their craft is in danger from the man with a live, heavenly thought, and he wants to meet the issue; in his desperation he gets hold of the tale that was told to "fool 'em," and spins it out to the delight of the multitude until it is ready to cry out, "Away with him, such a man ought not to be permitted to live."

Upon our second trip to Carthage we met with Judge Edmunds, one of the foremost attorneys in western Illinois, and after consultation with him upon legal matters dined with him and his accomplished lady.

In conversation with this gentleman, who has been a resident and practitioner in the courts of the county since 1845, I was struck with the remark, in reply to a statement, that "Joseph Smith has more friends in the county than any other one man."

No wonder that so-called Christian societies and publishing houses have failed to destroy Joseph Smith or his religion by the industrious circulation of stories and tales against him and his ancestors.

The honor reflected in the actual life and speech of these men will arise phoenixlike and destroy such work of idiocy.

The only way that the doctrine, the teaching of Joseph, can ever be successfully met by the world, if he is in error, is by an examination of the principles advocated. If these are in harmony with known truth, he was and is right, and no amount of slander and falsehood that Satan or the world manufactures and circulates can crush out this right.

Lighting Lamps for the Future

SHARON ATKINSON held six-year-old Billy in her lap and put her arm about nine-year-old Linda, who sat on the footstool beside her. They were in the midst of their evening devotions and John, Sharon's husband, was reading the story of the ten virgins from the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew.

At the conclusion of the devotions Sharon helped the children prepare for bed. The words of the Scripture John had read kept returning to her.

They that were ready went in with him to the marriage; and the door was shut. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, Ye know me not.¹

Sharon wondered into which category she might be placed. Might she enter in the door with the Master or might the Lord say to her, "Verily I say unto you, Ye know me not"?

Having tucked the children into bed, she returned to the living room and seated herself on the footstool beside her husband. Gently she laid her hand on his arm.

John laid aside the paper he had been reading and smiled at her. Sharon asked, "Why did you choose that particular Scripture tonight, John?"

"I didn't choose it especially," he answered. "I just opened the Bible at random and began to read. Why?"

"It has caused me to do some thinking. Bess Andrews stopped to see me this afternoon. She wanted me to take a church school class. I told her I had all I could do to take care of my own family. She asked me who would teach Billy and Linda if everyone felt as I did. I said a person couldn't do everything. Last month I was asked to take job in the women's department, and last week I refused to take a Skylark band. I said I couldn't spend time away from home on things like that."

"And I agree," John affirmed. "When mothers start doing things away from home, the children and the home suffer."

"I've felt a little guilty all afternoon, and when you read that Scripture, I felt God was condemning me. I keep remembering Bess said she really needed help. I'm not so sure I should have refused. I keep thinking of the future, and my part in the building of the kingdom. I keep wondering if I am one of the foolish virgins with no oil for my lamp."

"No oil for your lamp?" queried her husband. "Why, Sharon, you not only have oil, you have a whole row of lamps. As for the future, I always say, 'Take care of the present and the future will take care of itself.'"

Sharon, still troubled, went into the kitchen. She could not erase from her mind Bess's words nor reconcile her response with the Scripture her husband had read. Half aloud she breathed a prayer, "Oh, God, how can I know what to do? Help me to know what is right."

The events which followed were unusual, a little mysterious, a puzzle about which Sharon was to wonder for days to come.

She remembered intending to take a walk. She had a vague recollection of getting her sweater to put on against the cool air of the spring twilight. When she became aware of herself again, she seemed to be walking down a strange path. Darkness seemed to be gathering around her quickly.

With fear clutching at her heart, she hurried on, and soon she came to a sign which said, "Your future is now!"

She went a few steps farther and came to a wall in which was a high heavy gate, upon which was written, "Behold the bridegroom cometh."²

Instinctively Sharon knew this was the gate into a glorious future with the Master. Would there be oil in her lamp when the gates opened, or would the Master say, "Verily I say unto you, Ye know me not"?

As Sharon stood there pondering her condition, the gate began to swing open very slowly, revealing a blackness which her eyes could not penetrate. How could she go through the gate into the unknown future without a light?

It was then she noticed beside the gate there hung a row of lamps, each of which bore her name.

Happily she took the first lamp off the hook, but she had no torch to light it. She stood for a moment in desperation.

"I give unto you to be the light of the world,"³ said a voice at her elbow. Sharon whirled around to see standing beside her a kindly, bearded man dressed in a flowing white robe. She was frightened and was about to run when the man handed her a torch and spoke gently, "The path of the just is as the shining light."⁴

Sharon touched the torch to the wick of the lamp. It flickered and burned unevenly. "The wick needs trimming," Sharon observed as she looked around for scissors.

The visitor at her side said softly, "Study to show thyself approved unto God."⁵ "Treasure up in your minds continually the word of life."⁶

It was then Sharon realized what the visitor was trying to tell her. She had been lax in her study. She had not treasured the words of life. She spent too much time watching television and reading novels. Sharon cast aside the lamp with the untrimmed wick, for she knew her lamp of knowledge would not see her through the gate into the future.

Sharon reached for the second lamp. She applied the torch to the wick. It smoked a bit but gave forth no light. She shook the lamp and discovered it contained no oil.

As she stood bewildered the visitor at her side said quietly, "Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me."⁷

"But I keep my record book," protested Sharon. "I pay my tithes and offerings."

The visitor answered, "Remember in all things, the poor and the needy, the sick and the afflicted, for he that doeth not these things, the same is not my disciple."⁸

And Sharon remembered how she had been concerned only with her own family. She had not even contributed to the basket the women's department had given at Christmas time. Sharon knew that the lamp of compassion would not light her way through the gate into the future.

She reached for the third lamp. As she raised the globe to apply the torch to the wick, the globe broke in her hand like a crisp cracker.

The visitor at her side said reproachfully, "All should consecrate of their talents, abilities, and substance for the prosecution of the great work intrusted to us."⁹

"But I do consecrate my talents and abilities," Sharon protested. "Why only last week I sang a solo for a special service." But even as she said it, Sharon was remembering the church school class she had refused to teach, the Skylarks she had declined to lead, and the job in the women's department she had turned down. And Sharon knew the light of her service would not see her through the gateway into the future.

Quickly she reached for the fourth lamp. She touched the torch to the wick and the light flared. She replaced the globe only to be disappointed because the globe was blackened with smoke and allowed very little light to penetrate.

The visitor said, "Hold up your light that it may shine unto the world. Behold, I am the light which ye shall hold up—that which ye have seen me do."¹⁰

Then Sharon saw that she had not glorified her Father before the world. She had not considered her neighbors who might be seeking the light of the gospel she could bring to them.

As the visitor reminded her, "Do men light a candle and put it under a bushel?"¹¹ Sharon was aware that she could not carry the light of evangelism through the gateway into the future.

Anxiously she reached for the fifth light. She raised the globe to light it. The wick had burned deep, and she must turn up a fresh portion of wick. She struggled with the wick holder, but it had rusted.

In a soft voice the visitor said, "See that ye love one another; . . . cease to find fault one with another."¹²

As she struggled with the wick holder Sharon recalled how recently she had criticized one of the leaders. It was then she realized she was supercritical of those who tried to serve.

Her visitor said, not unkindly, "If a man be overtaken in a fault, . . . restore such a one in the spirit of meekness,"¹³ and Sharon knew the lamp of consideration would not light her way into the future.

Frantically she reached for the sixth light. Desperately she prayed that this one, the last of the row, would light her way before the gate closed. She touched the torch to the wick. It burned brightly. She replaced the globe and noted it was clear and shiny, intensifying the light.

Sharon paused for just a moment. A glow of happiness flowed through her. This lamp would take her through the gateway into the future. She grasped it by the handle and lifted it a few inches. Then it became terrifically heavy. She struggled but could lift it no farther, and she saw it was fastened by a heavy chain.

Her visitor said, "Owe no man anything."¹⁴ "Seek diligently to take away incumbrances."¹⁵

It was then Sharon remembered how her family was shackled with debt. The payment on the house, the car, the television, the storm windows, and other items. Desperately she realized that debt might keep her from entering in with her Lord.

It was the last lamp. How could she go forward into that darkness without a light? Yet she knew she must go. Somehow she must get through those gates before they closed. She did not want the Master to say of her, "Verily I say unto you, Ye know me not."

As she stood staring at them, the gates began to swing shut very, very slowly. Desperately Sharon turned to the man at her side and said, "What is it that I must do to go through the gateway into the future? I love the Lord. I must enter!"

For answer she heard the words, "It is not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, that shall enter into the kingdom; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven."¹⁶

"But I do try to do the will of my Father. I love my husband and my children. I am trying to rear my children to be good citizens of the land and of the kingdom. I take good care of my home. I go to church, to prayer services, and to women's meetings. Is that not doing the will of the Father?"

The kind answer was flavored with condemnation: "A virtuous woman? . . . The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her . . . She . . . worketh willingly with her hands. . . . She looketh well to the ways of her household. . . . Her children arise up and call her blessed."¹⁷ These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."¹⁸

Thoughtfully Sharon considered herself. What had she left undone? What could she do for the work? "I could tell stories. My own children love to hear them. I could teach. I know about the gospel and can study to become more efficient. I have organizing ability. I can plan and put my plans into practice. I have a level head and don't become easily discouraged. I am rather skillful in making things. Oh, there are many things I could do. And I will, oh, I will do them. I wish I had understood before."

She turned toward the gate. Already it was halfway closed. It was then her eyes fell upon a lamp she had not noticed before. It was a tiny lamp she had overlooked.

Quickly she lifted the globe and touched the torch to its wick. It glowed readily with a bright light.

The visitor at her side spoke softly, "The Lord your Redeemer suffered death . . . that all men might repent and come unto him. . . . How great is his joy in the soul that repenteth."¹⁹

As Sharon slipped through the crack in the gateway carrying the bright light of true repentance, she heard the soft words of counsel: "It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure."²⁰ "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."²¹ "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you."²²

As the gate closed tightly behind her, the light from the tiny lamp lighted the whole area. Sharon turned and seemed to take two or three steps into an expanse of nothingness and oblivion.

When she came to herself again, she felt as though she had heard the great clock of eternity ticking off an undetermined quantity of time. In her hand she held her sweater, and she thought she must have been staring out of the window for some minutes, seeing another world.

"Oh, John!" she cried. "I see it all now. I was wrong. We were both wrong!" Incoherently she told the story of her vision. "Don't you see, John? We can't go on living just for ourselves—just for our own little family! We have to use our time and talents for the glory of God. We have to light our own lamps for the future."

John, trying to piece together the bits of her story, began to see it as did his wife. "Just how are we going to start to light our lamps for the future?" he asked.

"I know what I can do right this minute!" And Sharon went to the telephone and dialed a number.

Dedication at Dunreath, Iowa

THE DUNREATH congregation began when Elders Henry Castings and Milo Burnett were invited by Mr. and Mrs. Perry Folck to come to Dunreath to hold a series of meetings in the schoolhouse.

The first sermon of the Restoration was preached by Brother Castings on December 27, 1915. He was assisted by Brother Burnett. They remained for two weeks with Mr. and Mrs. Folck. In the daylight hours they traveled through the community selling kerosene to the people. In this way they were able to provide for themselves. They would return to the schoolhouse at the end of the day to tell the Restoration story to all who would listen. Many who came accepted the gospel and are still faithful today.

During the next three years Brother Castings returned to Dunreath to continue preaching. Brother D. T. Williams, a missionary, came in 1916 to help carry on the work. He was followed by Missionaries Roy Parker and E. E. Long, who conducted their services in a large tent by the side of the schoolhouse.

In 1918 Clyde McDonald was elected pastor of the group, and he served until 1925, at which time William Robinson was elected pastor and served one year. Brother McDonald was again elected and served until 1948. Ernest Kirlin was then elected pastor and served until 1951, at which time the present pastor, Elder Arthur Nichols, was put in office.

From 1915 until the present time, many outstanding ministers have preached at Dunreath. These have included Brothers John Lintell, C. A. Kress, L. G. Holloway, John J. Cornish, Richard Baldwin, A. L. Loving, E. Y. Hunker, John Conway, John Loren, William Haden, Vivian Sorensen, Roscoe Davey, and many from Des Moines, Knoxville, Newton, Runnells, and Oskaloosa.

The church, on one acre of ground, was purchased in October, 1957, and is now free of debt. Much of the money was donated by friends and business establishments not affiliated with the church. The pulpit was made and given to the church many years ago by Brother Frank Hull.

The church has two rooms and a basement. One room is the sanctuary, and one is for classes and social functions of the church and community. There is an oil furnace in the basement. The room used for the sanctuary was redecorated for the dedication service held March 2, 1958. Apostle Maurice Draper, District President Frank Price, Bishop Stephen Robinson, and High Priest Ralph Wicker participated in the dedication.

Communion was held at nine thirty in the morning, with Brother Draper in charge. The dedication service followed. After the reading of the church history, the deed was presented to Brother Robinson, who in turn presented the church key to the pastor. Brother Draper gave the sermon and offered the dedicatory prayer. A basket dinner was held, and in the afternoon there was a testimonial service with Brothers Draper, Price, Robinson, Wicker, and John Caswell (Knoxville pastor) taking part.

Elder Ernest Kirlin, former pastor at Dunreath, and Floyd A. Whitmore and Joseph Clark, the first two converts at Dunreath, took part in the service of testimony. Because of ill health, Brothers Castings and Burnett could not attend, but both sent letters to be read to the congregation concerning their early experiences.

The women's department was organized in October, 1952, and has been very active, as has the Zion's League.

Average church school attendance is thirty. There are seven classes.

Four priesthood members, one of whom is pastor, have been called from the congregation.

The Dunreath Saints hope to carry on the work started forty-two years ago by those who sacrificed to tell the gospel story.

are registered in the office of the Director of Priesthood and Leadership Education, and a record is kept of the courses in which they participate. At any time they may write to the director's office and obtain a list of the courses they have taken. In addition to this, a Course Credit Card is given for the completion of each course, and these credits accumulate toward a series of Certificates of Progress. Under this arrangement students may proceed with an orderly study of most of the materials which are published by our church. Also, they may discuss with others in a class situation other good books and materials which are listed from time to time as courses in the Priesthood and Leadership Education program.

(3) Participation in the School of the Restoration. This third approach to the matter of individual study on the part of church members who wish to become better informed is set up within the framework of the usual college situation. The School of the Restoration is operated under procedures outlined in the official catalog of the School (also free on request). The curriculum is divided into units, and records are kept in the School administrative offices. Each student may select his courses with a view toward meeting particular needs as well as accumulating credits toward graduation. Under this program a higher degree of studentship is usually required than under the previous two approaches to study. At the present stage of development, only a few of the courses in the School of the Restoration curriculum are available by correspondence. These are referred to as "Home Study Courses." Others will be made available as the school grows. Courses offered in classes on the school campus are determined by the advance registrations submitted by students who live within driving distance of the campus so that they can attend classes. Summer sessions are offered which make it possible for students at a distance to attend in cases where they can obtain freedom from home and employment responsibilities to permit such attendance.

In the School of the Restoration a record of courses taken by each student is kept. To this record there may be added courses which are transferred from other schools and which may be included on the student's record to help him accumulate enough credits for graduation, provided such courses he wishes to thus transfer are in harmony with the purposes and standards of the School of the Restoration.

Every local leader should have available a Herald House catalog, a copy of Bulletin 106, and the School of the Restoration catalog. He should become thoroughly acquainted with the procedures in each of these programs. Thus he will be in a position to advise and encourage wider participation under one of the three approaches to study which are listed here.

Question Time

Question

Why does Herald House advertise and sell the King James Version of the Bible and books written by ministers of other faiths?

MRS. V. M. C.

California

Answer

There are considerable differences between our doctrine and that of other churches. However, it must be remembered that on the basic beliefs of Christianity, we have many more beliefs in common with the Protestant faiths than we have points of disagreement.

Actually, our own literature in most fields is very limited. For instance, we have just begun to write in the fields of children's literature. The children in my home and many other Latter Day Saint homes have been ministered to by the carefully selected books of Bible stories written by Christian authors not of our faith and distributed by our publishing house.

The Board of Publication believes that the publishing division of the church has a stewardship to encourage members to read not only church literature but also to "become acquainted with all good books," as commanded by the Lord in Doctrine and Covenants 87:5. Again in Section 85:36 the Lord commanded his people to "seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom."

When you look at the wide range of subjects recommended for study in Doctrine and Covenants 85:21, you realize immediately that the church was not being restricted to books of Latter Day Saint authorship in 1832, and it would still be impossible for our members to study these subjects, restricting themselves to Latter Day Saint authors.

Our major Bible advertising is on the Inspired Version. Nobody would deny the value of this version to Latter Day Saints. But when we talk to members of the other faiths, the King James Version provides a common meeting ground. It is still the most widely accepted version of the Bible and there should be a copy of it in every Latter Day Saint home.

Latter Day Saints should guard against the error of denouncing the King James Version too harshly. Actually nearly all of the Inspired Version is an exact copy of the King James Bible.

WALTER N. JOHNSON

Question

What is to be done with the bread and wine left from the Communion service? Is it wrong to allow the children to have it?

MRS. R. S.

Iowa

Answer

There is no ruling against using the unused emblems for food. They have no mystical qualities. It would not appear fitting, however, to allow children to treat lightly something with sacred associations. It is a matter of the effect that such action might have upon their attitude toward this important sacrament. Careful planning will eliminate excessive waste. It would seem best for the person who takes care of leftover bread and wine to dispose of it privately.

A Church for Children

After the full-size picture was put on paper, the hundreds of pieces of glass were selected and cut and laid in position. The glass for the figures was then painted and fired in a furnace where the paint became a part of the glass. The predominant color outside of the figures and the city is a soft rose with blue as a secondary color. The side windows of the chapel are of an abstract design, so they will not distract from the message of the window. These are rose and blue, with the rose predominating and the blue complementing the soft blue of the walls. The sunshine in the morning and the interior lighting in the evening produces a myriad of color for the passers-by. Red carpeting up the center aisle and on the floor of the chancel was selected to maintain the warmth of the sanctuary and direct attention to the window. The rich mahogany stained oak pews also give a feeling of warmth. The base of the pulpit is made in two sections, one removable, so that when the chapel is used exclusively by the children, it can be set down to height more suitable for them.

The children's classrooms are all painted in different colors with each door an inviting bright color. This has won warm admiration from visitors. The ceilings are acoustical plaster. Because of the bright colors, the children are not aware that they are on the ground floor. There is a classroom for the toddlers, the three-year-olds, four-year-olds, kindergarten, large rooms for the primary and junior departments, a good sized room for junior high, and a large room for senior high. Perimeter heating in the basement eliminates cold floors. There is a large classroom behind the choir loft. The women's parlor can be used for a classroom and also the fellowship hall. The kitchen is designed for efficiency, and according to Sister Minnie Peterson who takes charge of it, the women are delighted with the ease with which the food can be prepared and served. The fellowship hall will eventually be doubled.

On dedication day the 9:30 service was appropriately child-centered. Apostle M. L. Draper based his address on the message depicted in the window.

So effective has been this emphasis on the children that attendance has increased until it is now necessary to hold two worship services each Sunday morning to accommodate the many young worshipers who attend Prairie Village church. Brother Scott feels that this insures a good future for the congregation.

A fine spirit prevailed Sunday morning. The high point was the ordination of J. G. Stephan to the office of priest by Brothers Couey and Coltharp. The conference was well attended.—Reported by JACK WILLIS

Early Member Honored

PRITCHETT, COLORADO.—At the annual business meeting, Arthur A. Dowell was appointed pastor. All other officers remain the same except Elzadah Jesser, who was appointed women's leader to replace Norma Lackey.

Elder Norman Page has recently held missionary services. The November series averaged an attendance of fifty, with sixteen nonmembers. There was one baptism. The first of 1958, a second series was held, with an average attendance of sixty. There were twenty nonmembers in attendance, and three were baptized. The last of March the third series was held, with an average attendance of fifty-two, with sixteen nonmembers. Two were baptized.

The women have been active with bake and rummage sales for the benefit of the building fund.

The Zion's League and junior League are active, and hold bimonthly meetings.

Recently the Saints instituted family night, held once a month on the second Zion's League night, as the Saints are scattered over a wide area. At one of these family nights, Sister Rhoby Webb was honored on her eighty-eighth birthday with a large cake, a "This Is Your Life" ceremony, and fellowship. Sister Webb's efforts years ago brought the beginning of the church work in Pritchett. It grew into the Uteville Branch, which numbered 108 members before dust bowl days. The mission in Pritchett now numbers over sixty members.

Sister Webb has two daughters and one son, four grandchildren, and eight great-grandchildren. Her son, Ray, and grandsons Vern, Irby, William, and Glen are all priesthood members. She now lives in Delta, Colorado.—Reported by VIRGIL LACKEY

Baccalaureate Speaker

BALD KNOB, ARKANSAS.—Elder Duane E. Couey of Memphis, Tennessee, delivered the baccalaureate sermon at the Hunnicutt Auditorium on Sunday night, April 20.

Three of the forty-six seniors are church members. Music was furnished by the junior class, directed by Mrs. Curry Martin.—Reported by NORMA EDWARDS

Former China Missionary Joins Church after Series

AFTER SPENDING years in China as a missionary, Miss Edna May Burkwall has now found that she herself is a new convert.

Miss Burkwall was converted to the restored church at a recent missionary series in Kansas City Stake where Seventy A. M. Pelletier was the speaker. She has spent a good part of her life in China as the daughter of a missionary and as a missionary herself.

She was born in Seoul, Korea, and schooled in Chefoo, China, at a British School for missionary children. Her father was a missionary in China for over forty years for the Evangelical Free Church of America and the British and Foreign Bible Society.

"Very little was left to chance in my education," Sister Burkwall said. "At home, at school, and in seminary I received careful, intense training in personal devotions, public worship, church attendance, revival meetings, Bible study, prayer meetings, and Christian living.

"At the British school I attended in China, no child was permitted to join the church just because parents requested it or the proper age had been reached. When a child requested baptism some evidence had to be given to show a definite change in attitude and behavior—even though there had already been thorough daily training in Christian habits of thought and action."

Sister Burkwall was graduated from the Biblical Seminary in New York with a bachelor of religious education degree. Following her graduation she returned to China in 1929 as a teaching missionary for the Presbyterian Church. She taught handwork and Bible to the blind and some basic sciences to Chinese nurses and medical students. During this time she lived a number of years under the Japanese occupation in China.

Miss Burkwall left China when the Chinese Communist Party made it impossible for her to remain. She moved to Kansas City in 1942 and resigned from missionary work in 1944. She has been nursing since 1945.

She was first introduced to the restored church through Miss Bina Gilbert in 1955. Miss Gilbert is a convert to the church herself and shares her home with Miss Burkwall.

An inquirers' class, taught by Earl Shalley, led Sister Burkwall nearer the church, and she also attended a missionary series conducted by Apostle Maurice Draper in 1956.

She was baptized into the church at the conclusion of Brother Pelletier's crusade on March 26, 1958.

Book Review

Hosea, The Heart and Holiness of God

by G. Campbell Morgan

Publisher:
Fleming H. Revell Company

Price, $2.25

This book contains twelve meditations on the prophecy of Hosea given first to the congregation at Tabernacle Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and then to the congregation of Westminster Chapel, London.

In it one will find a very thorough presentation of many of the high lights of the prophecy of Hosea. The author has brought the main theses into modern understanding.

At points there seems to be some wordiness and repetition; however, it appears that such is used to emphasize a basic idea. Keeping in mind that it is written in the style of recording a sermon, and imagining that one is hearing it presented orally, seems to enhance its appeal.

"We have in the Book of Hosea one of the most arresting revelations of the real nature of sin, and one of the clearest interpretations of the strength of the divine love." Here Mr. Morgan sets forth his appraisal of the prophecy of Hosea, and then proceeds to give his exposition. He says, "Sin breaks in upon the divine order and ruins the rhythmic nature of the universe," but suggests that in the experience of Hosea's loss of Gomer we can find something of what sin does to God. In that we find the real heinousness of sin.

We find the following among the gems of thought with which the book is generously sprinkled. "When we have lost a sense of the spiritual, and the deep inner conviction that the secret of all beauty is holiness, and that the mental and the physical, sacred things, divinely created things, are, after all, in the last analysis, subservient to the spiritual, we have lost our sense of the normal in human life." "There is no correction more quick, and sharp, and powerful to my own spiritual and moral carelessness and blindness than determined consideration of the normal and the ideal of my human nature, as it is given to me in the person of Christ. Consideration of him means the restoration of the vision of the normal."

While this volume will appeal to the average reader, it will be particularly helpful to the men preparing sermons. There are many excellent ideas expressed upon which a whole sermon could be built. In many instances I found them in accord with basic doctrinal ideas as understood by Latter Day Saints.

I'm happy to have this book in my library.

TRACT REVIEW

An Open Letter . . .

"Fair-minded people like to know both sides of disputed questions in order to make an honest appraisal of the facts. And one of the controversial issues periodically discussed by press and pulpit is 'Mormonism.' If you, at some time in the future, have an interest in writing or speaking on this subject, we ask you to read a viewpoint on the subject that will be important in your preparation of materials." With this introduction, this tract begins its summary of several of the differing issues which separate the Reorganized Church from the Utah Church.

Revised during the past five years, this tract has just been reprinted during the past month in a new pocket size with a new cover design. The contents have been prepared and signed by President Israel A. Smith and Presiding Patriarch Elbert A. Smith. It is especially directed to a limited group but contains information that is useful to every Latter Day Saint for his personal reference and to all nonmembers who are studying our origin and beliefs.

The various topics discussed in the tract are "That Question of Polygamy," "Concerning the Character of God," "Items of History," "Important Court Decisions," "From United States Senate Records," and "Editorial Tribute to Joseph Smith III." A summary of "We Believe" closes the tract.

Single copy price is 6 cents.

Introducing . . .

ELI BRONSON, Sacramento, California (page 5), comes from a long line of Restoration progenitors. His grandfather, Eli M. Wildermuth, was one of the early missionaries of the Reorganization. Brother Bronson lived as a boy in northeastern Illinois and was born in Plano where the Reorganization had its first headquarters.

He was graduated from Graceland in 1912 and studied at the University of California at Los Angeles in 1931. From 1919 to 1932 he was under General Conference appointment serving in Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and California. He is now presiding elder at Sacramento.

He was a real estate broker from 1932 to 1956 except four years while he served in the U. S. Air Force as security officer (1942-1946). He is now working in the treasurer's office for the state of California. He is past president of Fort Sutter Lions Club and deputy district governor of the Lions International District 4A, California. He has five daughters and one stepson, all members of the church. Brother Bronson says, "Through the goodness and mercy of God I can say, with Job of old, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth!'"

THOMAS A. JOHNSTONE, Edmonton, Alberta (page 8), was born in Moffat, Scotland, and came to Canada about 1914. He was secretary-treasurer of the school district for ten years and secretary of the United Farmers Local for another ten years.

His two sons, Morris T. and Alan C., both hold the priesthood. Brother Johnstone says he has always been interested in nature and became concerned about the relation between science and religion. His first acquaintance with the gospel was in Toronto where he heard R. C. Evans preach. He says, "My interest in scientific things is still as keen as it ever was, but I am more critical of its theories. God is a reality I know from experience."

Unlike the Israelites I have never seen "mana like coriander seed" fall from the skies. But in our town we have something of a phenomenon this year: the maples are sending down peas with wings on them and the elms are showering us with breakfast food by the bushels.

The Psalms of David *

An unusual and very effective recording, just recently made available, is The Psalms of David, composed and played by Ralph Hollander and recited by Agnes Moorehead. The reading of these Psalms against the music of Mr. Hollander's solo violin is sensitive and dramatic and altogether effective and appropriate. Mr. Hollander's music creates poignant and tender moods for the words. The music is more than mere accompaniment, it is rather an intensification of the words in a dialogue where voice and violin have equal status. A speaking chorus is also used in four of the Psalms in the second cycle (Side 2 of the record).

The recording is by LYRIC ARTS and is acoustically and electrically of excellent quality.

Mr. Hollander and Miss Moorehead have done a most skillful and beautiful work. I wholeheartedly recommend their recording to all who would appreciate those marvelous outbursts of the human spirit which were the basis of Hebrew worship long before Christ, and are even yet the basis of a large percentage of contemporary musical worship, The Psalms of David.

Evan Fry Leaves Radio

AN important era in church communications will end in June when Evan Fry, radio minister, leaves the microphone to become church historian.

Every week radio stations in the United States and Canada carry the radio series "Here Ye Him" which features Brother Fry's thought-provoking sermons. In the Independence-Kansas City area where his sermons have been heard over the air for nearly twenty years, his voice is familiar to many persons who have never seen him or been in an R.L.D.S. church.

More than six hundred copies of his radio sermons are mailed out weekly from the Auditorium to listeners who have asked to receive them.

Brother Fry began radio broadcasting as a boy in high school. He and several friends often sang for an infant radio station in Independence.

After being graduated from the University of Kansas and teaching school in Rochester, Minnesota, he was called to Independence to work on the 1930 edition of the Saints' Hymnal. He began church broadcasting in 1930 with a series of daily devotional programs on station KMBC. The programs were discontinued the next year when the church began its depression retrenchment.

Brother Fry became a professional radio announcer, working in Kansas City, Kansas; and Wichita.

In 1940 he returned to church broadcasting in Independence. In those days he had responsibility for ten radio programs weekly over KMBC. It was not unusual for him to serve as organist, choral director, even soloist, as well as speaker and script writer.

In 1948 the radio department began recording the KMBC programs and offering them to other stations across the country. Nearly thirty stations are currently broadcasting the church programs weekly.

The "Hear Ye Him" series began in 1953. Brother Fry recently completed his two hundred and eightieth sermon for that series. He also recorded one hundred sermons for a non-doctrinal radio series and seventy-seven sermons for a doctrinal series. He will leave the Radio Department with more than four hundred and sixty radio sermons on tape. He is also a member of the Radio Choir which furnishes music for the recorded radio programs.

"It's much harder to write a seven-minute radio sermon than a half-hour sermon for a church service," Brother Fry said.

"Last week, for example, we broadcast a sermon that took only seven minutes on the air but two weeks to prepare. There is always so much to say in so little time. It has to be boiled down. The wording has to be meticulous.

"The semantics of a radio sermon have to be perfect," he said. "It is necessary to realize all the interpretations that different people with different backgrounds may read into the sermon."

Brother Fry believes radio has done much to raise the esteem of the church in the Independence area.

"From 1924—when we were the first church in the country to own a station—to the present, radio has lifted the name of the church immeasurably," he said. "It has kept the name of the church, our doctrine, our attitudes, before the public. As a result, people know and respect us. This is not because of me or my sermons. It is because radio is a powerful tool.

"I think radio has had a whole lot to do with the change in public attitude toward the church in the last twenty-five years. My only regret is that we don't have time, money, or man power to get on TV more. We ought to be in on the ground floor in TV as we were in radio. Instead we are lagging way behind."

The Stranger within Thy Gates

*A warm heart is a Christian essential.
Nothing else can take its place.*

A STRIKING AND colorful phrase in the fourth commandment is "the stranger that is within thy gates." Therein is contained an ancient rule of hospitality. Elsewhere in the Law of Moses there are other rules on the subject, so that the ancient Israelites had a code for the treatment of visitors and strangers. It is not likely that they always obeyed their rules, any more than we do, but they had them. They were not to require a stranger to work on the Sabbath. "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him." If these seem negative and primitive, try to remember that strangers sometimes received even worse treatment.

Our point here is that we have a code, even if it is an unwritten one, for the treatment of strangers. It is important, especially in church. Like the children of Israel, we sometimes fail to observe it.

The First Presidency recently received a letter which was written by a nonmember to her parents about a visit to one of our churches. "It is the coldest church I have ever been in," she reported. "I felt that I was an outsider. The people were very standoffish." And more, unfortunately.

Of course, a "standoffish" visitor, if sufficiently formidable, can effectively discourage friendly overtures. A visitor has some responsibilities, too. But so does a congregation.

Could this report have been written by a visitor to your church?

It must be admitted that some churches are cold, not only for strangers and visitors but also for visiting preachers. Yes, some churches are as chilly as sepulchers, and it would be as easy to worship in a cemetery, with a tombstone for an altar, as there.

Warm hearts are the only things that can make a church really comfortable.

Kindness and friendship cannot be simulated. There is all the difference in the world between the real thing and the imitation.

If we have a sincere love of people, we will manage somehow to do good for them, even if we are untrained. The warm heart gives the right motivation.

The cultivation of good manners is a fine and gracious thing. But if our manners are to have life and reality they must come from the warm heart. They need to be based on something real and sincere. The foundation of all good is truth.

WHEN A STRANGER comes into the church, he should not long remain a stranger. Somebody should be at the door to welcome him and greet him. Somebody should escort him to a seat—or at least offer to help him. And if someone near by hands him a hymnbook, opened to the right place, and gives him a smile of welcome, a good start has been made. The stranger should also be thanked for attending after the service.

Look at it this way: God is glad to have that person come to church. How about giving God a little help to bring the stranger back again?

Warm hearts not only make a church comfortable: they also make strangers comfortable. And, to follow through with the principle, warm hearts make the home folk happy, too.

There is nothing, absolutely nothing in the world, that can take the place of a warm heart.

A STRANGER'S FIRST VISIT to a church may be the decisive one. In the case of the young woman, it was her last one. If the visitor is welcomed and kindly treated, if the people show that they are genuinely glad to have him there, it is possible and probable that he will return.

If the visitor is ignored, if church people are timid about approaching him, he may think they are cold and not interested in him. It is hard for a stranger to see the difference between mere diffidence and plain hostility.

If a member thinks to himself, "I will shake hands with him if he comes back next Sunday," it may be too late. He may not return.

People do not like to be overwhelmed or surfeited with attentions. But when a human being enters a church he comes with a need for fellowship—contact with God and friendliness with people.

When the stranger goes away still a stranger, when no friendly word has been spoken to him, the opportunity to present the gospel to him is lost, perhaps forever. He stood outside the door and knocked, and nobody opened it to him. For him, it remains forever a closed door.

Be kind to "the stranger within thy gates." Be kind—it could be the Christ himself standing outside your door.

Remember that a warm heart is an essential part of your Christian equipment. There is nothing else that can take its place. It is the only thing that can warm up a cold church.

Civil Defense Plans

Quite recently the undersigned was invited to attend a meeting of leading church administrators at Washington, D. C. The invitation came from the Honorable Leo A. Hoegh, Federal Civil Defense Administrator, a former governor of the State of Iowa. It was a National Church Executives Conference held on May 6 and 7, 1958, at 2000 Florida Avenue, N.W.

Believing the purpose was worthy, I went to Washington and attended this conference. It was conducted by Dr. Fred W. Kern, director of Religious Affairs Federal Civil Defense Administration, and began at 9 o'clock Tuesday morning and closed late the following day.

The time was well employed by lectures and addresses by the director and assistants, technicians and experts, on the hazards of the present world situations, the attitude of Soviet Russia, modern weapons, radiological "fall out" problems, medical and health problems, national plans for defense, preparedness in church and home facilities for disaster, chaplain services, etc.

To say the least the program was pretty heavy, and perhaps our readers will be helped to understand the aims to be accomplished from a paper placed in our hands entitled "Information Paper on Civil Defense."

The printed matter available is voluminous. We could not reproduce it all. But we can and do say that civilian defenders have a tremendous responsibility and will do well to become fully advised as to their duties and responsibility in the event of enemy attack. Civil defense functions are outlined:

"Warning, Communications and Control, Survival Planning, Recovery, Education and Research."

We cannot present all to our readers, but we advise all pastors to seek counsel and advice from local and county defense personnel. The civilian defense is well organized and the national government is spending large sums of money to educate our citizens how to protect their lives and property.

Here is a typical statement:

"Survival of the Nation will depend upon the ability of government at all levels to operate in an emergency."

With the national government doing so much on behalf of our citizens, certainly all of us should co-operate to the utmost.

Adopting a slogan we hear so often: "The life you save may be your own."

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Apostle Paul M. Hanson:

The Council of Twelve welcomes Dr. Harvey H. Grice as president of Grace-land College. The college is fortunate in securing one having experience in the fields of education and business. We are sure Brother Grice will be valuable to the college and the student body.

From Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp:

We are very pleased to read the official statement of the selection of Dr. Harvey H. Grice of Kankakee, Illinois, to be the next president of Graceland College. We have appreciated very much the manner in which the Board of Trustees approached this problem. The needs of our church college are becoming increasingly greater and in many ways more complex.

We are sure that the fine administrative experience he has had, excellent educational background, and his record of devotion to the church will make possible an outstanding contribution as president.

Apostle C. R. Hield reports that Brother C. L. Olson has arrived in Sydney and is now at the Royal Prince Alfred Hospital. Sister Olson has flown to Sydney and is with Brother Olson. The doctor reports excellent progress, although an extended period of time will be required for him to convalesce.

The Saints in Australia have been most co-operative in aiding Brother and Sister Olson and Brother Hield.

Apostle Hield reports that he plans to leave on June 3 to return to Tahiti, where he expects to arrive about June 6.

This information was recently received from Elder John W. Blackstock:

We have just held our first church service at Eaton, Ohio. There were twenty-three present for the morning service. The Lord graced our first meeting with the power of his Spirit, and for this we are thankful.

We have high hopes that it will not be too many years before we have a church building in this city.

The mission will be under the direction of Brother Ezra Rockwell for the present.

Do Good unto All Men

ON A PHOTOGRAPH in the office of a professional man the donor had written, "I love you because you love the things that I love." It is a beautiful sentiment, though somewhat selfish. If we love only those who love us we have not much to our credit, and if we are the kind of people who are concerned only about those who think as we think we are a rather selfish people. Our theme, "Do good unto all men," brings us to the thought that no one in the human family should be excluded from our interest.

Edwin Markham wrote a much quoted quatrain:

He drew a circle that shut me out—
Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout;
But love and I had the wit to win;
We drew a circle that took him in.

There is no resistance that can long prevail over the power of love. It is the only force I know of in this world that is so all-powerful. Jesus said in his Sermon on the Mount,

Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?

Thus was laid a foundation for the universal love of God. The golden text of the New Testament is the core of the message of Jesus, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have life everlasting." With all these instructions of loving our fellow men, even loving our enemies, there is no room for hatred or jealousy or persecution in the heart of a true Saint.

THERE CAME to us out of the last war a beautiful story, and the best part is that it was true. Some of you may remember it. It was written up in the Christian Herald of May, 1947. It concerned Mr. and Mrs. Robert Johnstone of Parkersburg, Pennsylvania, whose son had been killed in the Asiatic sector of the war—shot down in combat over the Pacific Ocean. When they received the ten-thousand-dollar life insurance which the government paid to them as beneficiaries, they did not want to use it for themselves. They were wondering what kind of Christian act they could do that would be of most benefit to mankind. After talking about it and praying about it for a time, they decided on a course of action. They went to the president of Lafayette College and said they would like to establish a scholarship, preferably for some Oriental who was in the last war. They believed that they would like it to go to some worthy Japanese.

This was a most unusual request for them to make, because it was the Japanese who had shot down their son. After considerable searching they and the president of the college finally selected Robert Nishiyama, a Christian youth who had been converted in a mission in Japan. His wife, while Japanese, was American-born and educated in Stanford University. To them went the honor of this scholarship to Lafayette College for four years.

One condition was laid down by Mr. and Mrs. Johnstone, that there should be no publicity for this gift. But somehow, as good things sometimes do, the news leaked out and it became a front-page story in some of the papers. Generally it is the evil things of life which make the front pages, but this was a good Christian act—too good to keep hidden. The kind of Christianity that this represents is the kind of Christianity I want to talk about. It stirs one's soul to see how forgiving Christ can make us when we really are put in touch with his Spirit.

BROTHER H. I. Velt tells about the time when the large group was coming to the 1930 Centennial General Conference. It was one of the largest gatherings the church has ever had; great plans had been made for it, and great effort was made to get people to come from countries abroad. Quite a group came from Australia, among them Brother and Sister Velt.

The thing that I remember about his story was of their reception when they landed in Papeete in the South Sea Islands. Word had gone before that they were coming in on this boat. A crowd had gathered to meet them, and the Saints on shore were looking up at the ship trying to identify some of the members. Brother Velt said that as they went down the gangplank to meet these people they saw a sea of brown faces filled with anticipation and friendliness. There seemed to be no thought that these people were any different than they; all were their brothers and sisters. In that moment of mutual exchange of greetings, though they couldn't understand each other, they could sense something in their handshakes and greetings that spoke volumes of love to them.

In the Doctrine and Covenants there is a statement that has troubled some people. It tells us that God gave commandments "to lay the foundation of this church, and to bring it forth out of obscurity, and out of darkness, the only true and living church upon the face of the whole earth, with which I, the Lord, am well pleased, speaking unto the church collectively and not individually" (1:5). Then follows this statement: "And again, verily I say unto you, O inhabitants of the earth, I, the Lord, am willing to make these things known unto all flesh, for I am no respecter of persons" (1:6).

Some people cannot get the relationship between these two thoughts, that this is the only church with which the Lord is well pleased and on the other hand that God is no respecter of persons. I believe that there is a very clear answer. If we understand what the Lord had in mind when he spoke of the churches and give the proper inflection to the wording "with which I am well pleased," we will see that he is not saying he is not pleased with any of them, that none of them do good, but rather that the only church with which he is well pleased as a church is this church.

Here is a little more difficult passage from the Book of Mormon which we have heard misquoted many, many times.

And it came to pass that when the angel had spoken these words, he said unto me, Remember thou the covenants of the Father unto the house of Israel? I said unto him, Yea. And it came to pass that he said unto me, Look and behold that great and abominable church, which is the mother of abominations, whose founder is the devil. And he said unto me, Behold, there are save two churches only: The one is the church of the Lamb of God, and the other is the church of the devil; wherefore, whoso belongeth not to the church of the Lamb of God belongeth to that great church, which is the mother of abominations; and she is the whore of all the earth, . . . and she sat upon many waters; and she had dominion over all the earth, among all nations, kindreds, tongues and people. And it came to pass that I beheld the church of the Lamb of God, and its numbers were few, because of the wickedness and abominations of the whore who sat upon many waters; nevertheless, I beheld that the church of the Lamb, who were the saints of God, were also upon all the face of the earth.—I Nephi 3: 217-227.

I AM NOT an isolationist in religion. I don't see how I can be, under the conditions of my training and experience. This incident happened when I was teaching school. We had a very good friend, a Lutheran minister, who had two children in high school. This man was an ardent supporter of the P.T.A. He had a daughter who was being graduated, and the graduating class had chosen a Christian church minister, who had a former pastorate in this city, to come back and give the baccalaureate address. I thought it would be good to have the Lutheran minister offer the invocation. It was the custom to have the baccalaureate service in the Methodist Church.

When I asked him, a peculiar look came over his face and he said, "I can't do that, Mr. Hartshorn." I said that I was sorry, that I felt the seniors would be disappointed, as they would really like to have him. When I asked why he couldn't do it he said, "The Missouri Lutheran Synod to which I belong just wouldn't let me do it, and their reasoning is that if I sat on the platform with ministers of other faiths, I am saying in fact that they have priesthood just as I have, and we don't believe that." I could see his problem, and I rather felt sorry he felt that he had to isolate himself. I believe at heart he would like to have done what was asked.

Do you remember the experience that came to Peter when he said it wasn't lawful for a Jew to have dealings with a man of other nations? It concerned one Cornelius, a centurion of the Italian band. This man was not an ordinary centurion; he was a devout man who feared God with all his house, and he gave alms and praise to God always. This centurion had a vision in which an angel appeared to him, and Cornelius asked the meaning of it. The Lord said, "Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God. And now send men to Joppa, and call for one Simon, whose surname is Peter."

The centurion sent his messengers there, and about the same time that this happened to Cornelius something happened to Peter. He was on the housetop praying and he saw a vision in which a sheet was let down from heaven on which were all kinds of four-footed beasts, including pigs. The Jews, of course, would not eat pork, but the simple command was to "slay and eat." Peter said that at no time had he ever eaten anything which was common or unclean. But the word came very clearly from the Lord, "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. Kill and eat." This changed things.

WHEN THE MESSENGERS sent by Cornelius from Caesarea came to Joppa, Peter was ready, for the messenger in the vision had said, "Behold, three men seek thee." He came down and said, "I am the man you seek." They told him what their mission was, and Peter went back with them to Caesarea and talked with Cornelius. In this conversation he reminded Cornelius that it was unlawful for him to come to a man who was not a Jew and to keep company with one of another nation, but God had shown him that he should not call any man common or unclean. Then he arrived at this conclusion: "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." Some of us haven't learned that, and are still pointing the finger at the Roman Catholic church and saying that it is the "great and abominable church, the whore of all the earth."

In one revelation to the church we are admonished, "Content against no church, save it be the church of the Devil" (Doctrine and Covenants 16: 4 d). We convert our friends, not our enemies. If we cannot show friendship and interest and concern for other people, but rather point the accusing finger and say that they are of the Devil, we are not going to win many of them to this beautiful message.

There is a hymn which carries a beautiful sentiment. "Join hands, then, brothers of the faith, whate'er your race may be. Who serves my Father as a son is surely kin to me." How can we estrange ourselves from other people who accept the Sonship of Jesus Christ? There should be some relationship there, some sympathy which we should enjoy.

SOMEONE wrote to the editor lately, saying, "What this church needs is some opposition and persecution." This person remembered the days when every man's hand was against Latter Day Saints, and they sought the Lord diligently; sometimes they had some remarkable experiences. However, they didn't get many people into the church. They were just a small, struggling group; stirring up persecution wasn't the way to build up the church of God. Diversionsary conflict is the strategy that dictators use. When they feel themselves slipping, they say, "I know what I'll do to unite my people behind me and make them feel that I am necessary; I'll start a war and in the struggle against a common enemy they will forget their misgivings about their leader and cease their hostility against him." That is not good strategy for this church. It would only alienate us from people to whom we could do good. Jesus said, "It must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh."

On January 24, 1950, Dr. Frank J. Pippin, pastor of the Community Christian Church of Kansas City, one of the largest and most popular churches there, talked to the Independence Young Matrons Club. One of our church women who attended told me of this experience. In his talk Dr. Pippin said, "Religious persecution is a terrible thing. It brings a blot on the history of mankind. I am not thinking of the Spanish Inquisition or the days of Bloody Mary, but of our own land and what was done to those good people, the Latter Day Saints, right here in Jackson County. That was less than one hundred and fifty years ago, and it could happen again. If it does it will be a terrible blot upon us as a community and as a nation."

I think he was quite right and quite sincere. Persecution of religious denominations has never accomplished good. It is of the Devil.

Some have misinterpreted the passage appearing in I Nephi 3: 217-227. There are only two churches according to this revelation previously mentioned (16: 4 d). One is the church of the Lamb of God and one is the church of the Devil. If you point out that the church of the Devil is a particular denomination, say the Roman Catholic, then every Protestant church is a member of the church of the Lamb of God. We are not ready to admit that. It is very plain that the Lord is talking about the work of the Devil in every way, in every place. It is the purpose of the Devil to defeat the work of Christ.

It has always been Latter Day Saint doctrine that the Lord will judge us and reward us according to our deeds, whether they be good or evil, whether we be Roman Catholic, Methodist, or Latter Day Saint. Only as our righteousness as Latter Day Saints exceeds the righteousness of other people are we worthy of commendation and a greater reward.

THERE ARE two things that are bad on a man's heart. One is running upstairs and the other is "running down" people. We ought not to do it. I remember a person who told me a number of times about her virtues; that she was very frank, even "brutally frank." Some may think of this as a virtue, but more often it is just an opinionated indulgence lacking in virtue or Christian kindness.

If you remember, Christ wanted to spend his last night here on earth in a little get-together with his disciples, and he arranged for a supper. At this supper he served the emblems; then he took a towel and a basin and washed the feet of his disciples. He knew at the time he did it that one of them was a traitor, and that he was waiting for an opportunity to betray Jesus to those who would take him and kill him. That didn't make any difference to Jesus; they were still people that he loved, even the traitor. The call for us is to come up higher and to love people in spite of their weaknesses. "Ye which are spiritual, restore such an one."

At the Institute on Social Planning held at Graceland in 1957, Dr. A. W. Ward of the Methodist church was a speaker. He is on the council of sixteen executive secretaries who do much of the work of the Methodist church in an administrative way. The Methodists had a budget that year of $378,000,000. He said that they have over ten million members right here in the United States and, "Therein lives our danger—our bigness. Too many people in Methodism find it a comfortable place to be. They like to belong where the crowd is, and it doesn't require much of them; they just enjoy it as if it were a nice social club. It is awfully hard to do the work that Christ called us to do with a group like that.

"You people may sometimes bemoan the fact that you are a small group, that you can't do things like other people do. That might be a virtue if you use it to its best advantage."

That is pretty straight talk from a Methodist minister, and it is quite true. If we are united, if we can be consecrated to the Christ and keep hatred out of our midst, either among ourselves or for other people, if we can love all men, we can get the work of Christ moving along and thus consummate the kingdom of God.

WHEN I was in Philadelphia recently at our farewell luncheon I sat with some Seventh-Day Adventists. They are in general a wonderful people. In spite of the fact that we do not see alike on the day of worship, they are deeply devoted to Jesus Christ, and they are a consecrated, clean-living people. They eschew those things which harm the body and they consecrate of their funds, too. They do great work here and in foreign missions.

The Friends or Quakers have long emphasized the need of "the inner light." This inner light is something they pray for, they fast and struggle for; and when the light comes, giving them a new vision, a feeling of acceptance, they are happy. They say nothing else matters. Our feeling is that we are not entitled to the light unless we comply with the law and keep the ordinances. They say that if this inner light comes to them, then it makes no difference whether one is baptized or partakes of the Lord's Supper. He already has the evidence of his acceptance. They are good-living people, they have influenced history.

At the Philadelphia editors' convention in 1957 I was surprised when a prominent Philadelphia minister, Dr. A. W. Price of the Episcopalian church there, spoke to us on the subject of "The Ministry of Divine Healing." He not only spoke to us; he convinced me that something good happens when they get together every Thursday in their prayer meetings and pray for the people who need divine healing. He said that it was not just the psychological cases—those who are suffering from abnormal ways of thinking, though they had lots of them—but people with organic diseases who came often as a last resort. He said that if they saw they were really sincere, they talked with them, prayed with them, tried to straighten out their thinking, and build up their faith in God who is the great healer. He pointed out that the Scriptures say Jesus came into Galilee "preaching the gospel and healing the sick" and that healing the sick is still a part of the gospel.

He further surprised us when he said that there were a number of these healing clinics by different denominations in the larger cities of America today, and they have an organization among them. They have a lot of workers, and I believe he said that in the past year they had something like seven thousand and five hundred cases. These people seem to be moving along in the right direction; they are making steps toward the greater light, and we have lots of common ground on which we can work together.

I REMEMBER when I first came back to Independence (I lived here from 1920 to 1927) in 1945, it was only a few months until I was invited to preach for one of the congregations. I was quite surprised at the changes I saw in this neighborhood. The pastor took great pride in telling me of the fine Latter Day Saint homes in the community. I told him I was quite pleased and surprised in the changes which had taken place in the eighteen years I had been away. I observed the way our members had moved in and were working with other civic groups and were well received by Independence citizens generally and thus were able to accomplish a great deal of good. He said, "You know, Brother Hartshorn, if we Latter Day Saints would stick together we could vote anyone we wanted into office in this town."

That shocked me, and I said, "If we Latter Day Saints stuck together and voted someone into office because he was a Latter Day Saint, it would be the saddest day here for the church since 1833." The thing we need is the same thing other people need. We should vote as good citizens and for the good of our community, not because someone is a Latter Day Saint.

The Catholics have helped to stabilize the home; they have done a great deal to diminish the divorce rate; they exalt marriage—they have done a lot of good things. I can't begin to enumerate all the good things, but we ought to appreciate good where we see it. God is going to reward every man according to his deeds, good or bad.

Marcus Cook told about a Sister Barbour who lived in a remote part of Oregon several years ago. He made a great effort to get to this community where she lived. She was the mother of a large family, and there was no Latter Day Saint church near. Because she was a good Christian woman she went to the nearest church, which happened to be Presbyterian; she did everything she could to help there. However, she told the people that she was and intended to stay a Latter Day Saint. They appreciated Sister Barbour and put her to work. She taught a Sunday school class and was finally made church school director there.

When Brother Cook visited her, she took him to meet the minister where she went to church. They were mutually attracted, and when Brother Cook said he was going to preach at a certain time and place the minister said he would come to hear him. After the service he asked Brother Cook to have dinner with him the following day. Among other things this minister said was this, "If Latter Day Saintism will do for other people what it does for Sister Barbour, I wish every member of my congregation would get a big dose of it. She is by far the best member that we have—the most reliable and the most trustworthy."

She was doing the thing that would help to make Jesus Christ more meaningful in the lives of people. That is what all of us ought to do.

"As we therefore have opportunity . . ." We are held responsible for our opportunities for doing good.

There was a poor Italian widow who lived in a third floor flat. She had only three small rooms and a family of six children. She needed help. A welfare worker visited her and while she was talking with this widow she noticed the cockroaches scampering across the floor. The welfare worker called her attention to them and told her to use some roach powder on them. The Italian lady said, "Me do." The worker asked what happened, and the woman said that they went away, but they came back again. "They go downstairs and the lady down there uses roach powder and they come back up here." The welfare worker said, "Why don't you two get together and both use roach powder on the same day?" The Italian lady was very sober for a little bit and then she said, "Can't do that, me and her don't speak. We not friends."

That is the trouble a great many times; we can't get along because we are not friends, and we are not friends because we have a different brand of religion or politics or we go to different schools. Some trivial things keep us apart when God so much intended that we should work together.

John T. Conway

I Had an Experience . . .

ON A SULTRY summer evening as I was returning home from one of the branches in the district, I came through a downtown residence area in the city of Baltimore. The crowded rowhouses stood on the edge of the street. Men and women were sitting on the steps while little children played in the gutter. The parents looked listless and oppressed, but the children were as happy and carefree as if they were playing at the seashore. As I neared the corner and slowed down for a little boy and his daddy who were crossing the street I had an experience with the Spirit of God which I hope I shall never forget.

The boy was barely three. He was very small, and he held his daddy's hand with an air of complete security—as if his whole life were in his father's hand. The father was young but slightly stooped. His clothes were dirty, and he walked wearily as if he had just returned from a day of hard toil. As they crossed in front of me my whole being was flooded with a compassionate desire that this father be good to his son. I sensed something of the Master's concern for all of his children. I was deeply moved by the knowledge that much of the joy and welfare of this little boy, both now and in the future, depended upon his father's care.

I desired to go and stand in the life of that father to help make up for his infirmities, to assist him in molding the life of his son, to be his eyes in spiritual things until he could really see, to be his ears until he could hear—for he needed to hear and see some things for the sake of his son. My heart was stirred again with thoughts of our need to be less concerned with proving we are right with words, and to be more fully doing what is right. I longed for the manifestation of our rightness in righteousness, for Zion to "arise and put on her beautiful garments."

Since the time of that experience I have been more willing to bear the Master's burden—to help bear the infirmities of his people, to make their problems and weaknesses my problems and weaknesses, and to unite our strength with the powers of the Master that we be not overcome by evil but overcome evil by good. This has led to many joyous experiences as I have seen the weak become strong and go forth to strengthen others.

Benediction -- A Prayer of Blessing

THE HEART of a biblical writer's philosophy, hopes, and ideals is often summarized in a brief prayer. After he has offered his best counsel and advice, he looks for some final word that will give courage, hope, and inspiration. The Apostle Paul has done this quite effectively. To the Corinthian Saints he wrote (II Corinthians 13:14), "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." This is a benediction, which means to bless. It is a parting prayer of blessing.

In our worship the benediction comes at a strategic moment in our religious experience that is reserved for pronouncement of a blessing on us.

There are two public prayers that remain vivid in my memory. The first was a benediction by Presiding Evangelist Elbert A. Smith, the other was by Elder Charles Fry. Brother Smith asked a short prayer of invocation followed by the words "and now, our heavenly Father, I would pronounce a blessing on these, thy children." The blessing followed. I do not remember the words that Brother Fry used, but the spirit and vitality of the prayer will never be forgotten. I have heard thousands of public prayers, yet these two stand out in my religious experience as being memorable.

The benediction is different from other prayers in that it is pronounced. It is not asked as are other prayers. In the benedictions recorded in the Scriptures the person praying is speaking for God and talking to the people. "Mercy unto you, and peace, and love, be multiplied" (Jude 2). It is accompanied by great earnestness and humility.

Because of our traditional approach, to pronounce a prayer seems to be almost sacrilegious. It may give some the idea that the person praying is assuming too important a position. Yet the purpose of the ministry is to be a channel through which blessings may come to people. If the person praying is close to God, he understands the needs of the people and the will of God. This is why the prophets and writers of the past have pronounced blessings upon the people.

Another distinctive feature of the benediction is its brevity. Sometimes it consists of no more than a sentence or two. The longest I have found in the Scriptures comprises less than sixty-five words. This is particularly important because of its place at the close of the service.

Most members, sooner or later, are called upon to offer a benediction—children in their worship services, the women in theirs, and the priesthood in the public worship services of the church. Helpful ministry can be given through this prayer.

In preparing to offer a benediction the one who is to pray would do well to consider what would be the greatest blessing that could be given to these people at this time. One of the biblical writers (Deuteronomy 1:11) felt that the greatest gift that could be given to the people was an increase in the number of those who believed in and followed Christ: "The Lord God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many more as ye are, and bless you, as he hath promised you!"

One frequently given blessing is that the presence of God should accompany people more: "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen" (Romans 15:33).

In II Thessalonians 2:16, 17 Paul was concerned that the people receive comfort from the Spirit of God and that they be established in God in everything they did: "Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, comfort your hearts, and stablish you in every good word and work."

The writer of Hebrews desired to give the saints the essence of the Christian message in his benediction found in Hebrews 13:20, 21: "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is wellpleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen." The ministry of the atonement is well summarized here.

A benediction requires study. It requires a knowledge of God, his ways, and his purposes among people. The purposes are revealed in the Three Standard Books and through the voice of the Holy Spirit.

It requires experience with God. Though we may be able to recite certain facts relating to God and his work among men, yet until we have had that personal experience with God which will give us a working knowledge of him, our prayers cannot come from the depths of understanding.

A PRAYER of benediction requires a careful use of words. They need not be big words, but they ought to be plain and understandable.

A knowledge of the people for whom one is praying will be helpful. Then he will be able to pronounce the blessings that will fill the needs of the moments in their lives. Everyone has needs. The effective prayer seeks to fill these. Alma in the Book of Mormon (Alma 16:200) saw the needs of his brethren when he prayed, "May God grant unto you that your burdens may be light, through the joy of his Son. And even all this can ye do, if ye will. Amen." The people had turned from God and had need for repentance. The decision was theirs to make.

The Spirit of God is as essential in prayer as in any other media of worship. The benediction which is motivated by the power which comes through the Holy Spirit can make the prayer a worshipful experience. Our nearness to God can be advanced by praying concerning the prayer we are to offer.

The benediction provides an opportunity to bring to the people a blessing from God. It can have a lasting effect for good in their lives.

Samuel the Lamanite

But before the great day of the Lord shall come, Jacob shall flourish in the wilderness; and the Lamanites shall blossom as the rose.—Doctrine and Covenants 49: 5 a.

IT IS TYPICAL of Latter Day Saints to desire to see prophecy in fulfillment. Much of my desiring has been realized in light of the above Scripture. The promise of the Lord to the Lamanites as told in the Book of Mormon prompted my wife and me to move to this valley on the frontier of Mexico. A real thrill filled our hearts as we worshiped together with our Lamanite brothers and sisters that first Sunday in the beautiful chapel in Weslaco. We felt a deeper love for these humble people and dedicated our lives to do whatever we could to help bring about this promise that our Lord made so many years ago.

We had moved to Weslaco without the assurance of a job, but the Lord was with us, and I quickly found work teaching in one of the elementary schools. There were over a thousand Spanish and Mexican children at the school, and I had as many as sixty students at one time in my fourth grade class. Many of these children came directly from Mexico and knew little or no English, but they were quick to learn. One of my students learned to speak and read English in just three months.

I would often walk across the grassless playground to watch the small children of the first grade and to talk with them. Many of these barefoot children would grasp my hand and follow me around the school. One afternoon I observed some six-year-olds playing a game as they waited for their bus. From the ground they scooped up small handfuls of dirt and smoothed them out over the sidewalk and with one finger made lines through the dust. Two children would then select three rocks each—three light and three dark. By turn, they placed the rocks at the corners of the squares or where the lines touched. When one obtained a line of three, he won. I played this game many times before I won. These children have a genius for creating things such as little games like this, using the least material.

Each day I found my work to be a two-way learning experience both in and out of the classroom. Things I had considered absolutely necessary for rearing children were sometimes unheard of among them. Once, while teaching a health class, I asked for a show of hands of all who had recently seen a dentist. Of the sixty students I then had not one had ever been to a dentist.

My first year was a very rewarding one. The achievements of these children in art, reading, and music were motivating to them and to me. One of my students from that class is now a member of the Reorganized Church, and three of her family also belong.

Since February of this year, I have been teaching a higher grade, and I have some very fine students. We began our experience together by singing and now have over thirty songs for memory. The favorites are the camp songs "Tell Me Why," "I Want to Be a Friend of Yours," "Jacob's Ladder," "Kookaburra," "Tiddly Winky."

Looking over my students one day and seeing their dark heads bent in earnest study, I prayed that God would soon fulfill his promises to these people. Exactly what I wished the Lord to do, I hadn't thought, but in the succeeding days veritable fulfillment came. We progressed in our lessons. In geography we were studying the United States and then began to study the Rio Grande Valley. Emphasis had been upon the crops, occupations, and cultures of the regions. Opportunity came to discuss the Mexican and Spanish influences in the Southwest, and the question arose, "Who were the Indians?" I was about to point out the many possibilities when I was impressed to tell these boys and girls who they were and from whence they came. That day there entered a kinship into our hearts that has brought us closer together and made our school experience one of abounding accomplishments.

I began to look for leadership with a dual purpose—to help me in the classroom and to help the Lord in the kingdom. Knowing that the one would complement the other, I stressed the merits of learning and the virtues of citizenship. I felt that we needed further experience in working together, and selected a play to be given. Its title was "The Greatest Dreamer," a story of Columbus. Tryouts were held, and the cast of thirty-eight was chosen. After much reading and coaching we had our first rehearsal with actions, after which I told them no books would be used in the next rehearsal. To my surprise, all of them knew their lines by memory at the next practice. They quickly began to live their parts. Samuel, as Columbus, had over seventy lines—and some of them were long paragraphs. He was inspiring to the others as he brought Columbus to life before them, even though we had no costumes or stage props. When the play was given for every classroom the teachers and students were thrilled at the performance. I'm sure that it surpassed their highest expectations.

The more I watched Samuel the more impressed I became. His interests are well rounded and his exceptional ability challenging. In arithmetic, I found him taking books home that were a year advanced for him. He did a commentary in geography on "The Europe of Napoleon." He has remained humble after winning consecutive spelling championships. When the Zion's League planned a trip to Falcon Dam, I invited Samuel. He was able to go and enjoyed the fellowship of the Leaguers. He attended Sunday school and prayer meeting the following week. Last week end he went to San Antonio to a youth retreat. He has been grateful for experiences such as these with our church young people.

Samuel is a loving boy. He is now fourteen—truly an age of seeking. He has done much on his own to qualify for service to others and has a desire to be a teacher. He reads and speaks both English and Spanish excellently. He is a fine ball player and enthusiastic about all wholesome things. Beyond his good quality of life and his qualifications I am sure that he now senses the call of God to him. There are thousands upon thousands who need what Samuel would be able to give. Here, in the Rio Grande Valley, live over 200,000 Lamanites awaiting ministry. Among them are a number like Samuel.

When we seek to aid God as he fulfills his promises to the peoples of the earth we anticipate this restoration with certain steps. When the Reorganization waited for young Joseph to be raised up, its members must have placed much faith and trust in Emma Smith's ability to rear him. Among the Lamanites are some outstanding leaders. I shall expect many youths to come and be reared in the church. Thus I look to my school and to boys like Samuel. In deed and word I hope to share heaven's plan with these Lamanite people.

I see the "blossoming" in terms of learning and wisdom, and I know that great works of righteousness will follow. I have been caused to know as I minister among them that the Lord does remember his promises to his people and that many are rejoicing to receive their spiritual heritage.

The Forgotten Father

NO ONE remembers him as an ideal father. Yet no one ever loved and honored a young bride more than he or was kinder to her child.

The home he provided was a humble one in a small village. But he had a trade and was a skillful artisan. He taught the young lad to be as painstaking in the work as he had always been. Every bench, stool, and yoke that left his modest shop was strong and smooth.

His family, grown to seven children, lived and worked and prayed together. Religiously they kept the holy days, journeying a great distance for special celebrations. Earning a livelihood demanded long hours of work, yet there was time for worship and a little time for play. There were no schools. Children were taught at home.

Like other villagers, he was happy to take his family to the annual feast. Across the miles they traveled, mostly afoot, to the temple in the city. It was several days' journey—a wonderful adventure when he could visit with relatives and friends, sleep beneath the stars and watch the children while the women cooked along the wayside.

To the temple he brought his sacrificial offerings. He listened to the law read by learned doctors. And then, his mind refreshed, his faith renewed, he started homeward.

At the close of the first day, he gathered his family together for prayers only to find the oldest boy missing. He sought the lad at the fireside of friends, through all the traveling throng. His anxiety grew. No one had seen the lad since they left the city. There was nothing to do but turn back.

Three days he searched the city until the boy was found—teaching in the temple.

No one remembers him as an ideal father.

Topeka Church Dedicated

THE CHURCH in Topeka, Kansas, was dedicated Sunday, April 6. President Israel A. Smith gave the dedicatory sermon; Bishop G. L. DeLapp received the deed and key to the church building from the pastor, Elder E. R. Marolf, and returned the key to the pastor; Apostle D. Blair Jensen offered the dedicatory prayer.

Six former pastors were on the platform: Charles Fry of Independence, Missouri; Ammon Andes of Lawrence, Kansas; O. E. Weedmark of Kansas City, Kansas; B. F. Deller, E. C. Christenson, and Loyd E. Martin of Topeka.

A brief historical sketch was given by Mildred Goodfellow, branch historian. Topeka Branch was organized October 13, 1895, at the home of James Duffey near Menoken. The first pastor was James Baillie, one of the charter members. The group met in North Topeka on March 1, 1896, and organized a Sunday school. Beginning in August, 1903, meetings were held in Oakland (in the east part of Topeka) in homes and a school building, until February 19, 1905, when the first services were held in the new church on Rowley Street in Oakland. About twelve years later that property was exchanged for the property at 1116 (later 1160) Clay Street, on the west side of town, where most of the members then lived. After the purchase of the church at 914 Topeka Boulevard in 1944, the Clay Street property was sold. Elder M. E. Cheeseman (now deceased) was pastor at that time.

In 1948 the state took over the land at 914 Topeka Boulevard as a part of the site for a state office building, and the church was torn down. Services were held in temporary locations until December, 1949, when the present building was ready for occupancy. A consecration service was held December 18 of that year.

Elder Marolf has been pastor since 1956. Before coming to Topeka he was pastor of the Goodland, Kansas, Branch for six years.

The Challenge of This Generation

The promise has been given that no power shall stay the hand of God in the accomplishment of his purposes among his people; and as the church shall move forward in its great work, the fulfillment of prophecy may cause the Saints to tremble at the exhibition of divine power, yet they shall rejoice in the protection of his grace.—Doctrine and Covenants 135: 3.

A FAMILIAR term to all of us is "hastening time." We have been told before that we are in such an era. Not until the recent days, however, have events taken place which have caused such a vast change—even the nations of the earth have a sense of limited time. There is an awareness of extreme needs which are very urgent among the people of the earth. Upon the ideals and quality of individuals rests the hope upon which the power and strength of these nations depend. Suddenly we realize this is the hastening time. This is that period in history in which the quickening forces of good and evil shall be known.

As we witness recent events and look to the near future to see even more startling discoveries, many questions come to mind and many new responsibilities rest upon the shoulders of the people of the church. There is so much to be accomplished while the Lord yet allows us time. There is so much to consider and seek by prayer that our understanding may increase. In a very personal way, changes must take place. Our goal is set. The needs are known. The question is: Are we the generation of people who will bring about this great and mighty work? Do we have what it takes to carry the burden of spiritual power within our breast, power to change nations, to bring rulers to the feet of the Master, to offer freedom and refuge to the oppressed, and to set the ensign of Zion on a hill so that all may see and know?

Our nation has its goals set and is racing with time. Even the need for a people who have vigor in their ideals and a quality of life so rich that the human spirit may be vindicated has been recognized at last. Yes, the needs are known, the time element is known, and before us are burdens great in their nature. And we in the church also have our days numbered.

We, the people of the church, carry the responsibility of producing spiritual leaders who can give to this sick world healing and comfort, and to the human heart peace. We hold in our hands the power to bring souls to the Master, the power to offer eternal life to all. Upon us lies the heavy burden of providing refuge. Upon us lies the burden of living fearlessly before our fellow men. The time has ceased for us to hold all this within a small group of people. Only so many days are allotted to us to reach out to all who seek to know the mysteries of heaven and the laws of the kingdom.

IMMEDIATE PREPARATION is now the task we face. We cannot hope to bring about such a great work without unity of purpose and spirit—even unity of purpose and unity of spirit in the homes. As the urge increases throughout the world to seek for faith, so the load we carry will increase. We need to put into daily practice the principles and procedures of saintly living. By the quickening spirit we shall be chastised by our own waste, by our own wrongdoing; we shall be cleansed from all evil if we desire to be.

Today we should feel a renewed urgency to dedicate our children to the service of the Lord. If we do so, in our hearts and minds will come the wisdom sorely needed by parents to rear children so full of spiritual qualities they shall rise mightily in a work for the Lord, even as the sons of Helaman. If we place these children in the hands of God with faith in their unknown future, they will have paths of safety prepared before them. Is there a better way to instruct our minds and teach our children than a dedicated family worship? According to our ability as parents to perform this function, devoted and consecrated results will take place.

NOW IS THE TIME to live and practice the financial law fully. From this practice comes order in our daily routine. Necessities become apparent. We are quickened by the spirit in wise choices in the use of temporal blessings, followed by spiritual blessings and wise use of them. Even our talents seem to be progressively taken care of and put to best use. Little by little all of the people in the church and others in need would have their necessities and just wants supplied; no one would lack temporally or spiritually. Best of all, as the practice of stewardship becomes habitual with us, great treasures are stored in heaven for us, and our eyes are opened so that we see the value of life itself. How can we evangelize the world on a part of our tithes? How can we prepare a place of refuge and care for the sick on oblations? Many of us have not learned the meaning of true sacrifice. Few have given "until it hurts." Few of us bow in sorrow when we look about and note those who have so much less, even in the ways of the Master. Few of us have our houses in order so there is room for more. Yes, time is limited for us to be full of thanks. Time is limited to learn the principle of giving. All of us will need to sacrifice if we are to bring about a goodly portion of work in evangelization.

IS THIS the time to learn how to pray so that faith becomes second nature with us? Is this the time to confess our sins and make right all our wrongs, one to another, that we may be clean and know peace in our souls? Only by such labor as this in our daily life shall we assure ourselves of fruits which will bring forth marvelous days of kingdom building.

Shortly one by one we shall be called upon to answer these questions. The work of the Lord cannot wait for us slowly to determine our course ahead. The Lord has not time to wait while we who have long been in the church spend aimless effort, and seek without truly desiring to find. We must hasten to do as we are bid. Each one in his own small way is to offer his contribution in thanksgiving to the Lord, and in praise that he has been given so much, that in the presence of God, and in the eyes of the world, each one shall surely radiate light.

We must seek for a power which comes from the Lord; we must seek for the fulfillment of prophecy. We must seek for protection in such a world as ours.

We are the generation he has chosen to perform such works. There is little time, but if we put it to use with divine direction it will be sufficient.

painstaking efforts to raise a garden of colorful flowers, some of which could adorn the church for Sunday service, or perhaps brighten the day for an elderly person.

What a lovely talent one possesses who is asked by a mother to stay with her "Suzy" or "John" while she fulfills some necessary obligation, because that child feels at ease with you and responds to your genuine love for children.

Many more talents could be brought to mind, some of which we take for granted day by day and do not attach any importance to the fact that they must be exercised. Unless they continue to be developed they cannot possibly bring happiness to ourselves or those with whom we come in contact.

No, unless we make that friendly visit to the hospital, unless we see that the doll's dress gets to the convalescing child, unless we take those flowers to church this very week, or unless we offer our services to care for our neighbors' children, we have not given the best stewardship possible of our talents. We will have failed to pass on these gifts and to make the full use of them—the use for which God gave them into our keeping.

LET the maestro wave his baton to start his great concert; let the well-known singer thrill his audience; let the actor bring down the house with his magnificent performance; let the artist move the hearts of many generations with his fine paintings. Indeed, if you or I or any member of our family shows even a small inclination toward any of these great talents, let us encourage and develop them; but let not any one of us sit back in the shadows and say that we cannot do any special thing, or that we are not endowed with a talent of some kind, for this is saying that our Creator forgot to complete the pattern for some of his children.

God, in his infinite wisdom, has given some individual talent to each. This gift can help us to help ourselves by the conscientious sharing and expanding of it. We can assist in our own character building, through a healthy, active mind and busy hands, in the application of this talent in the right channels, in service to others. This is direct service to God.

To have the foresight to give a cup of cold water cheerfully, lovingly, and with a heart open to understanding when a brother is in need, even this is talent.

May we all be good stewards of the talents entrusted to us.

Pauline Strangeway

The Stewardship of Our Talents

WHAT are talents? Where are they? How do we obtain them?

When the maestro in a great music hall successfully conducts an orchestra through a difficult musical composition, we are made aware of what is known as "great talent." While listening to a well-known singer, thrilling thousands with a beautiful voice, or to an actor whose dramatic ability can move an audience to tears, we are also in the presence of talent.

Let us think, too, of the magnificent talent of an artist who has spent perhaps years to complete a picture of such renown that it will go down through the ages as a priceless work of art.

Are these different talents that are advertised, widely discussed, and readily commended the only types of talents one may possess? Are outstanding qualities found only in people who are popular with the public? Or are those things that are truly gifts to be admired discovered in those only who are in executive positions of employment, or perhaps associated with great numbers of persons who will be impressed by them? I think not. God is the sole giver of all talents, and he has been so generous that he has given one or more of these talents to each of his children—special works, arts, or characteristics that could be a help and joy to the receiver of this gift and those around them.

These talents, however, may go unrecognized and be forever unprofitable unless those to whom they are given develop them. A smile is of little value unless it is shared. When it is passed on, it makes two or more people happy.

The stewardship of anything is in the way it is managed. As God is the giver of our talents, we should try to manage and direct them in a way pleasing to him. That way is not by hiding them, nor by refusing to use and share these gifts, but to make them blossom out into something beautiful through the addition of our effort and practice. We are actually commanded to see that this is accomplished; in Matthew 25:14 we read Christ's own teachings on the way to use talents.

Never let any of us say, "That does not include me. I have no talent. There is nothing outstanding I can do. I have tried this or that, but it is of no use." Talents are so numerous and varied it would be difficult to list them all on paper.

DO YOU not think it is a talent to be able to visit a sick friend, cheer him with pleasant conversation, and leave him feeling just a little better through some bit of wit you may pass along?

Can you deny that it is talent that enables one to make from a few scraps of cloth an attractive apron, or doll's dress, that would please some little girl who has been in bed for a long time with some illness?

It is indeed a talent when one may help God through faithful labor and

Church in Jonesport, Maine Remodeled

MEMBERS of the Jonesport, Maine, Branch have met for worship in the same location since 1912. Recently the interior of the upper auditorium was remodeled and redecorated.

Emphasis was placed on the remodeling of the chancel. The floor was covered with cinnamon-colored wool carpeting. The walls of the chancel were covered with walnut paneling. The pulpit is set to one side and the choir on the other side of the chancel. The wall back of the chancel is draped and fronted by the Communion table on which the Three Standard Books are arranged and spotlighted.

The chancel with a center aisle affords an ideal setting for special services without the furniture having to be rearranged. With this setting a deep feeling of reverence is felt by all who come to worship. It is indeed a place of beauty. After the completion of this work, which was done mostly by the men of the church, special services were held March 6, 1958, with over six hundred in attendance at the three services. The first service in the newly decorated sanctuary was a Communion service at eleven o'clock. In the afternoon, ten candidates were baptized into the church. The concluding service of the day was held at seven o'clock with District President B. L. Carter delivering the dedicatory sermon. Other members of the priesthood who officiated during the day were Chester Gray, pastor; Calvin Crowley, Erwin Alley, Clifton Look, Harry Rogers, Ulmer Davis, Albert Small, Orel Noyes, Lessie Woodward, Clifford Seavey, Ronald Tucker. Those baptized were Charles Alley, Josephine Crowley, Nellie Norton, Maurice Alley, John, Dolly, and Darlene Farnsworth, Arnold and Louann Francis, Adelman Urquhart.

Members of the priesthood are actively engaged at the present time in a home visitation program, and District Missionary D. L. Kyser is having a series of cottage meetings. Church attendance has been growing rapidly, with a membership of 192 enrolled in the church school. The record attendance is 257, with an average attendance at prayer service of 85.

The branch has an active women's department with fifty members, two Zion's League groups, and four Skylark bands.

The members anticipate the erection of an education building in the near future. Under the able leadership of their pastor, Elder Chester Gray, they continue to contribute to the building of the kingdom.

Jonesport is one of eight branches and one mission located in Maine District.

Church History as I See It

Joseph Smith, Jr.

The first church president, Joseph Smith, Jr., was a young, impetuous man. A man of that temperament was needed to present to the world a new idea in religion and a new system of social living. He gathered around him a group of men, largely young ones, ready to accept such a challenge. Joseph believed that when the Lord said to do something he meant do it.

Although Joseph spent some time in jail on trumped up charges, and from beginning to the very end was hindered by mob violence, he translated and had printed the Book of Mormon, wrote the Doctrine and Covenants, and made corrections in the Bible. He established the idea of adult education, stood for and worked for higher education. He and his group converted thousands, built a city, and established a new church. We always think of him as a young man. He never grew old, but in his short life he accomplished more than most men do in long lives of peaceful existence.

Joseph the Third

Joseph, son of the martyr, took his father's place and was our second president. He has become known as Joseph the Third, although at first he was simply "Young Joseph." Joseph was more like his mother than his father. He was devoted to his father's teachings, taught them, and stood steadfastly by them through his life. However, he had been through the trial of persecution, and he decided that the church could gain momentum by slowing down a little. The hasty gathering that took place in the early days had resulted in disaster. Joseph sent a message through the church that, for the present, there would be no gathering to the Center Place. Members should stay where they were. They should try to build up the work in their communities and make the name of the church honored by the lives they lived.

The church took his advice. Groups were built up all through the country. The ministry worked to keep evil out of the church and to keep the members living on a high moral level. It still was the church militant. Wherever a minister raised objections to the church he found someone ready to set him straight. Many were the public debates held throughout the country. Men who had little formal education were well educated in church teachings and were surprisingly successful in debates. One reason they were so well trained was that they had fought the church themselves until they had become convinced of the truth.

Joseph spent his life clearing his father's name of some odious reputations that had been attached to it through the objectionable doings of some of his followers. He lived a long and useful life, respected by all who knew him and loved by the church. Through all of the persecution the church endured, the thought remained, "Zion shall not be moved out of her place." Independence was still the Center Place. Joseph, the son of the martyr, with his calming influence, made the return of the church to Independence possible. He moved the headquarters to Independence, and he and many of the officials established their homes there.

Frederick M. Smith

The third president of the church was Frederick Madison Smith, popularly known as Fred M. He was the son of Joseph III. For a time he followed his father's policy, tightened up a little. He gave new life and pep and vigor to the church.

Finally he sent a message to the church that the time had come to resume the Gathering. I heard a man say not long ago that Fred M. sent out the call for the Gathering, but the church did not heed it. I think many did. A large movement like that cannot start suddenly. One reason the start was slow was that with the call came a warning that was given in the early days but was unheeded then. This warning was that people should have "the way prepared" before them. Independence and the stakes have become the Mecca of many members, and the Gathering which began slowly has gained momentum since.

Fred M. was a practical dreamer. That is, he dreamed great things for the future of the church, but he did not just dream them—he tried to put a practical foundation under his dreams. One of his dreams is the Auditorium of which we are so proud. We have built on the foundation he started.

President F. M. Smith's sudden death cut off further future plans and left the leadership of the church to its fourth leader, his brother.

Israel A. Smith

Israel A. did not begin his work as president in his youth as the others had. He is still president, and it may be presumptuous to judge his work at all until he has finished it. But there have been some interesting developments that I would like to mention.

There has been a series of specialized, personalized conferences through the years that could have a great influence on the work of the church. For example, there was a conference of businessmen. Think what this type of conference can mean to the church. Men and women who have had the special training, experience, and discipline that come with life in the business world can meet to discuss that phase of our work much more intelligently than a mixed group. Think what practical progress it could mean to the church.

There was a conference of public school teachers; they now have a church-wide organization. The possibilities along this line are unlimited.

Our college people are well organized and are hoping to be able to help in the work of the church, and surely they can.

There was a conference of women studying the Zionite home. This gets down to the groundwork of life. Zionite homes are one of our greatest needs today. Let us hope that these studies will continue and go deeper and higher with their plans each conference.

People concerned with audio-visual education got together and discussed future plans. I think these activities are significant but, as one said, they have been done so quietly and with so little fanfare that he had not stopped to add up what had been accomplished.

There is a movement in Independence to provide higher education for the church. This is fairly new but it is already making strides forward. Great plans are being made for the future.

Many people are working on these projects just as there were in each era of the past. Each leader and group seemed to be especially fitted for the work of his day.

God is still the leader and planner of history. The future is safe in his hands.

Question Time

Question

1. Recently I have been reading concerning the plates of the Book of Mormon (see Mormon 1: 4-6, 44; 2: 2-25; 3: 5-8) and will appreciate answers to the following questions: (a) Which plates did Mormon hide in Cumorah? (b) When did he hide them? (c) Why did he hide them?

MRS. M. O. D.

Louisiana

Answer

(a) All except the few he gave to Moroni (see Mormon 3: 8). These would include the brass plates, the plates of Nephi, the record of Zeniff, probably a translation from the twenty-four gold plates discovered by the people of Limhi, and many other records "which are particular and very large" (see Helaman 2: 12-14 and III Nephi 2: 93).

(b) They were deposited or "hid up" in the hill Cumorah, where both the Jaredites and the Nephites fought their last battles.

(c) By the Lord's command, that they might be "kept and preserved by the hand of the Lord, until they should go forth unto every nation, kindred, tongue and people" (see Mormon 1: 1-5; and Alma 17: 33-49). The Lamanites had sworn to destroy the Nephite records (see Enos 1: 22).

Question

2. Which plates did Mormon give to Moroni?

Answer

The plates of Mormon's abridgment, some of the smaller plates of Nephi (possibly all), and the twenty-four gold plates found by the people of Limhi, or at least, as one writer has suggested, a translation for them (see Words of Mormon 1: 9; and Ether 1: 1, 2).

Question

3. (a) Which plates did Moroni hide? (b) Where were these? (c) Why did he hide them?

Answer

(a) These few plates mentioned in answer to Question 2 were all hidden. (b) At the time of their revealment by the angel, they were in Hill Cumorah in New York.

(c) By commandment (see Ether 1: 97) and for the same reason as given in answer to Question 1 (c).

Question

4. (a) What did the stone box contain, which Joseph Smith found in New York? (b) If it had more than the abridgment, which plates were they?

Answer

(a) The plates, the Urim and Thummim, the breastplate, the ball or directors, and the sword of Laban.

(b) The plates of Nephi (the smaller plates) down to the time of King Benjamin (see Words of Mormon 1: 9) and the sealed part containing the mysteries revealed to the Brother of Jared (see Ether 1: 2, 97-99).

Question

5. (a) If he found other plates besides the abridgment, why was Mormon commanded to make the abridgment? (b) We read in the Book of Mormon that the abridgment was made for safety and convenience of hiding the plates. Why, then, did he hide all the plates in the same box? (c) Why did he not leave all the plates for Moroni to hide?

Answer

(a) Joseph Smith did not find, with the abridgment, the plates from which the abridgment was made. The abridgment was made from the larger plates of Nephi, which were deposited by Mormon in the original hill Cumorah. But suppose we had access to all of these, how valuable to have first a brief or concise account such as we have in the Book of Mormon (see Mormon 1: 45). Also we are told specifically that the world would not have sufficient faith, at the time the abridgment would be translated, to profit by the deeper mysteries still to be revealed (see III Nephi 12: 3 and Ether 1: 99-101).

(b) The question seems to be based upon misinformation. At least we can find nothing in the Book of Mormon stating the abridgment was made for "convenience in hiding." Neither do we find that Mormon hid all the plates in the same box, but simply "in the hill Cumorah"—that is all except the abridgment and the few accompanying plates (see Mormon 3: 8).

(c) They would have been too many, too heavy, and too cumbersome for Moroni to carry in his rapid flight northward from the original hill Cumorah where the Lamanites had taken over. Hill Cumorah in New York must be a vast distance from the hill Cumorah where the plates were buried by Mormon.

The Lord doubtless took into consideration, too, the conditions among peoples and governments which would best preserve and foster his purposes in his great movement of Restoration, of which the Book of Mormon was to be a prominent part.

Question

6. If Joseph found only the abridgment, what became of the other plates?

Answer

Presuming the questioner means the rest of the plates besides those returned by Joseph to the angel, they are probably still in the hill Cumorah, somewhere in Mexico perhaps, where Mormon deposited them.

A statement is ascribed to David Whitmer to the effect that he, as one of the witnesses, saw the brass plates and many other plates at the time he saw the Book of Mormon plates, but we are dubious as to the authenticity of the details of this statement. It is quoted from L. D. S. Biographical Encyclopedia, page 266, (see The Story of the Church, page 71, fifth edition).

However, the brass plates and others are yet to come forth in God's time and way to greatly influence and benefit the world (see I Nephi 1: 169-170; II Nephi 11: 127-132; and Ether 1: 98-101).

Question

7. If all the plates were in the stone box, were they bound together by rings, and did they all have the appearance of gold?

Answer

To the best of our knowledge the plates of the abridgment, the smaller plates of Nephi with them, and the sealed portion, were bound together by rings and did have the appearance of gold.

HAROLD I. VELT

In recent weeks we have received a few questions which writers would like to have us answer in our Question Time column, but they are unsigned or carry only initials.

We feel that it is not good policy to give consideration to anonymous letters. Doubtless some feel that since we publish only the initials that this kind of signature is sufficient. However, a letter is still anonymous when only the initials have been furnished.

If you are one who has sent in such questions, we suggest that you rewrite them, sign them, and send them to us again.

Two High Priests Ordained

In Memphis District

On Sunday, April 6, Elders Thomas S. Gough and J. Adelbert Withee of Memphis were ordained to the office of high priest. Officiating ministers were Apostle E. J. Gleazer, assisted by District President D. E. Couey and Evangelist Jerry C. Fitch. This was a significant occasion in that it was the first instance in which ordinations to the high priesthood have taken place in the Memphis District. The picture was taken while Brother Gough was being ordained.

Because the cultivation of Christian love is a major objective in the church "Make Love Your Aim" has been selected as the 1958 camp theme Must We Surrender Love?

By Carl Mesle

CHRISTIAN LOVE is the theme and "Make Love Your Aim" is the title selected for this year's senior high youth camp study and worship helps.

The decision to use this title was a difficult one, for at first glance it might seem that the church is surrendering to Hollywood. With so many present-day problems centered about infatuation or romantic love, it might seem that we are advocating a cheap objective for our youth. In senior high coed camps where boy-girl relations are so much on the minds of the campers, there could be danger that this title might cause smirks and such remarks as might undermine the very objectives of the camp.

In the face of these possibilities the committee which prepared the helps weighed and re-weighed the title. Tentatively, it tried other titles: "The Greatest of These," "Greater Love Hath No Man," "Explorations in Christian Love," "Make Christian Love Your Aim." All were considered either too philosophical or too "preachy" for a camp. A camp theme needs to be an action theme, straightforward, down to earth—one which whets the curiosity and contributes to the permissive atmosphere of frank and open discussion, rather than closing the door with a "church answer."

Camps using this year's helps are free to change the title or to develop their own materials, but those who have prepared these helps feel they are sound and that they deal with the most vital theme of the gospel. In making a final decision to stick by the title and to seek support in it, the committee asks these questions: "Should we surrender love to those forces which have wrested it from the church, dragged it through the mire, and left it but a skeleton of its former self; or should we try to reclaim it and restore it to its purity and beauty of meaning as we have successfully done with some other basic principles of the original gospel? Should we permit the threatened smirks of a few over-sophisticated and under-indoctrinated young people to rob us of the key word in the 'first and greatest commandment, or can we hope to reclaim it?'"

In the urgency of our declaration of other basic gospel principles have we not too often neglected to give due emphasis to the central theme of Christian love without which all other principles lose the true spirit of Christianity? Of this word which appears some one hundred and fifty times in the New Testament, Rufus Jones, the great modern Quaker, says, "Love is a word that needs a cleansing bath." I'm sure we agree with Mr. Jones and can expect other followers of Christ to applaud our efforts to help redeem the word "love."

When we read the words of the Master, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength, . . . and thy neighbor as thyself," all Christians know whereof he speaks and something of the depth and meaning of the word. He did not say, "Thou shalt 'Christian love' thy God . . ." but "Thou shalt love . . ." We make no apology as we try to live by this word, making its achievement a chief goal in our lives and hoping that others will say of us as they did of the original followers of Christ, "See how those Christians love one another."

To our young people in camp this summer, we say, "Make love your aim"—not self love, not family love, not romantic love, as fine and necessary as they are, but make the all-encompassing Christian love your aim. With a week to explore the many facets of this word, to seek to understand what the world has done to it, and to practice and to share some of the deeper meanings of the values Christ gave it, we believe that our young people will find a new place in their lives for the values the church places on the word "love" and will truly come forth making the cultivation of Christian love a major objective of their lives.

Come on Back

(an open letter to a friend who is sliding away)

Dear Friend,

For a while—when we were all going to Sunday school and church together, taking part in the social activities, arguing about this and that doctrine—I remember you said you felt you were being helped, that you saw a lot of sense to this religion business. If that were once true, isn't it still true?

We were enlarging our outlooks, growing steadily in the development of a personal code of conduct based on the big truths that were weekly being unfolded to us. Then we changed teachers, and—to put it bluntly—your spiritual rocket fizzled and died. (Now don't misunderstand me; mine hasn't soared to any majestic heights, but it is still under power, heading in the correct azimuth reading, and has passed some points of interest that yours didn't get to.)

My friend, I'm going to lay it on the line—Texas wrestling, no holds barred! You can hate me for it if you choose. You may thank me someday. I know I have no right to interfere with your life. Neither am I qualified to do so. I am simply tossing this out, straight from the heart.

Point number one: You are the head of a household. All this talk of "momism" to the contrary, the attitude of the husband and father still pretty much sets the tone of the family's attitude. I think this is particularly true in your case. And here's something for you to chew on: People who are strong-minded and strong-willed should be especially careful what they are strong-minded about. They exert much more influence over others than the wishy-washies do. In what direction are you leading your family?

Point number two: It was an evidence of weakness on your part that you slid away when the influence of our former Sunday school teacher was removed. He warned us, remember, not to pin our faith to man. And urged us to study and search for ourselves. Personal salvation must be, in the final analysis, a personal issue between oneself and God. It is immature of us to put that duty on anyone else. If you were God, would you want the final social culmination of your creations to be people unable to stand on their own moral feet?

Point number three: You like overmuch the pleasantly self-indulgent life you lead. And it is pleasant to indulge oneself; particularly if one has had a rigorous childhood or youth, as you have. Because you have had it rough, you doubly appreciate the soft. I know and understand this, for I have had it rough, too. And I don't for a moment believe that our Creator brought us into being to our sorrow. I do believe that we are to enjoy an abundant life. I further believe that I am on the track of it by subscribing to the philosophy that the more I give of myself to mankind the more mankind gives to me. The more nearly I line myself up with the will of my Creator the better I am able to appreciate and enjoy the bounteousness of his provisions for our happiness.

There is simply no room for selfishness in this philosophy. No successful social unit, whether it be a simple partnership, a nation, or God's kingdom, can be made up of individuals who think fifty-one per cent of the time of themselves and forty-nine per cent of others. That's a matter of cold, hard, mathematical logic!

That's all, my friend. See you in church.

Editor's note: This open letter seems to justify setting aside the policy of ignoring anonymous articles. It is better that no identifying marks are on it. However, the writer would do better to sign it next time and request anonymity if his contribution is published.

Dr. Charles Church, director of the Radio Department, speaking of Brother Fry's contribution said: "Through his many years in radio Evan has made a great and unique contribution to the church. Not only in Missouri and Kansas, but in many other areas of the country, his radio sermons have been of personal help to thousands of listeners and have created good will for the church.

"His narration of the film 'Other Sheep' has been a pioneering effort for the church in television.

"We are happy that he will still be available for counsel and also, as time permits, for revision of his earlier programs for general use.

"As Evan turns to his new assignment we are happy to welcome in his place Dr. Cecil R. Ettinger, presently pastor of the Central Des Moines (Iowa) Branch. Brother Ettinger is deeply interested in radio ministry and has already had considerable experience in both radio and television. We feel sure that the ministry of the church through radio will continue to be in most capable hands."

The Travail of Religious Liberty

By
Roland H. Bainton

Harper and Brothers
Price, $1.45

This book is an excellent historical account of man's struggle to construct his own pattern of religious thought and allow his neighbor the same privilege. With evidence well documented from Thomas of Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition down to John Locke of England, the author makes it clear that such words as banish, imprison, torture, strangle, behead, drown, and burn are more descriptive of the period than tolerance, clemency, forbearance, freedom and understanding.

By and large the author divides the book into case studies of men such as Thomas of Torquemada, John Calvin, Michael Servetus, Sebastien Castellio, David Joris, John Milton, and Roger Williams, pointing up the distinct role each played in the travail of religious liberty.

One becomes immediately aware through reading the book that if the Reformation ever pretended to correct the abuses of the Spanish Inquisition, it failed miserably, for the persecution of Protestant by Protestant, especially during John Calvin's period, rivaled any Catholic abuses.

The author makes excellent use of historical material. He chronicles events in a most compelling manner and gives the reader a startling insight into the price paid for religious liberty. He is quick to point out that the travail of religious liberty is not now merely a historic memory, but that the issues underlying the struggle are still quite unresolved.

An excellent index and bibliography add to the value of the book. It is highly recommended for any serious student of the history of Christianity.

DON LANDON

Time to Grow Up

HAVE YOU ever been walking along, confident of your path, or hurrying to seek shelter and security from a storm, only to lose your footing and fall?

Recently a number of people, from all walks of life, of different racial origins, had this sensation when a certain man died. Our cry was "What shall we do now?" "This man was there to aid me when I needed strength," said one; "to counsel with me when I needed advice," said another; "to stand up for our interests," and so on, each one echoing the loss in his or her heart. Each one had a special need that this one man, in his wisdom and God-given gift of discernment, could aid. We do not grieve for him, for we know he is in one of the "many mansions," but we do grieve for ourselves. There is no one else to turn to. No one, who so understands and loves and prays for us as he did, is available to help us now.

Yet the one person that loved him most and was most beloved of him, who will miss him more, is the one that gave the answer to our grieving hearts. "It is time to grow up. As long as he was available to lean on, you could not attain the height of your growth. There are men now who must develop their potentials to meet the responsibilities of the various offices he left vacant. So must each of you grow now, realizing God is available to each person, individually, with strength and guidance you could not know as long as my husband was still alive."

Each of us is groping now. We are searching our souls to decide whether we will grow inward, and thus prove this man loved us and sought to aid us in vain, or grow outward, reaching to others in need, with the strength and love God will give us, to become living memorials, testifying that this man we so loved and depended on did not live and die in vain.

And Finally...

TO GLADDEN THE HEART

As I looked out our kitchen window this morning nature was putting on a gorgeous display. The iris, poppies, roses, and peonies were disputing themselves in a riot of color. "The fullness of the earth is yours," declared the latter-day prophet. The beasts, fowls, and herbs God made "for the benefit and use of man, both to please the eye, and to gladden the heart; yea, for food and raiment" (Doctrine and Covenants 59:4).

People have become more color conscious in the last decade. The evidence is in the way they paint their houses, interior decorations, pastel shades of the automobiles, men's shirts and ties, the use of neon lights, color photography, and the exotic dress of our magazines and book jackets. Sharing in this artistry of color are the hybrid flowers of all hues and sizes.

Some writers and speakers are fond of the phrase, "I see God in the beauty of nature." The pantheist says that God is nature. It does not improve nature any to call it God, and it robs the God of the universe of his glory to identify him with the grass which "withereth and the flower thereof falleth away." More people's hearts would be glad-dened today if they transferred their affections from nature to "worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters" (Revelations 14:7). Remember also that the angel who brought this challenge indicated a time limit: "for the hour of his judgment is come."

Beautiful flowers and dresses, gay lights and pastel cars can make a fool's paradise. Only righteousness can exalt the nations, and the meek shall inherit the earth.

NONENTITY

A church friend whose husband is not a Latter Day Saint but is quite active in the church's program was the object of this remark made by an observant spectator: "Better to be an active nonmember than a nonactive member." This comment should spur "Latter-day ain'ts" on to greater accomplishments.

The Pastors' Issue

A Wonderful Field for Ministry

AS A MATTER OF FACT any diligent ministry in the church with and for Christ is a wonderful ministry. My first work in the ministry under General Conference appointment was pastoral. At the time pastoral work seemed to me the finest type of ministry to be rendered. It brought me into such intimate personal contact with individuals and the homes of the church members, both young and old. Later, as a member of the First Presidency, I had a wider and more diversified field, but sometimes I envied the pastor in intimate charge of a flock.

In charge of that first little flock I took most seriously to my heart the Lord's admonition, "Feed my sheep, feed my lambs." Never in all my long ministry, which has covered much more than a half century, have I been happier or felt more blessed in my work. So I can feel a warm fellowship with all you who are pastors. Along with the problems and vexations that sometimes arise there is a sense of closeness to the great First Shepherd of the flock that brings peace and satisfaction. Happy is the pastor who so diligently and patiently tends his flock that the Lord may say to him, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

The church has grown rapidly of late years. The number of congregations needing ministry has increased correspondingly. Fortunate is the pastor who has part in this great work. But it is not always the biggest congregation that furnishes the best opportunity for intimate pastoral ministry.

But whether your pastorate be over a large congregation or over a small group, may the Lord bless you. As your Presiding Patriarch I invoke the blessing of heaven upon you. May your ministry be happy and fruitful.

Three-Generation Pastors

THE PRIESTHOOD HERITAGE of Latter Day Saint men is to be extended through their sons. In Doctrine and Covenants 130: 9 we are told that the sons of the leading men of the church should prepare themselves to take the place of their fathers.

It is good to observe that we have many men who are now serving as pastor, or have been pastors, whose father and grandfather also served in this capacity. No doubt the list is quite incomplete, though two requests were published to get information. Below is a list of all those sent to us up to the time this issue was prepared for printing.

The Shepherd of Souls

He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.—Isaiah 40: 11.

THE GREAT PASTORAL ideal is that of the "Good Shepherd" that Jesus presented so beautifully. This is the ideal that inspires and motivates all those engaged in this important part of the total ministry of the church to its people. We think of the pastor as a shepherd of souls.

This special issue of the Herald provides an opportunity to center our attention upon the importance of this branch of ministerial work and to express our appreciation of the members of the priesthood who have accepted the call to service in this phase of our endeavor.

As shepherds, our pastors are alert to the spiritual and moral needs of their people and to many of their educational and cultural needs. They are also aware of the dangers that may threaten their group or individuals within it. In a spirit of self-sacrificing service they are ready to give themselves to defend, help, and save the souls that are committed to their care.

In the local work there are few, if any, who carry greater burdens and responsibilities than those of the pastor, and few who have wider opportunities for doing good for the people individually and in groups and for the church as an organization.

Our pastors are of the people themselves, share their experiences, know their problems. They understand the common life. They have not been specially segregated for education or other preparation for service.

In general, a strong and resourceful pastor will stand at the center of a strong and thriving congregation. The better the pastor, the better the people—on a long-term basis. The key to stronger congregations and better branches, it is felt, will be found in the development of pastors.

The need for such development is widely felt. The church is now providing help for its ministers, including pastors, in the School of the Restoration. The curriculum of this school offers training in "Ministerial Studies" and in "The Office of the Presiding Elder."

Those interested would do well to write for the catalogue of the School of the Restoration (9900 Winner Road, Independence, Missouri). The courses, while mainly for residence work, also have prepared materials for some courses to be taught by correspondence. The School is now in the developmental stage, expanding its services as they are required by the students. We recommend that our people, as far as possible, use these and other facilities to improve their capacities for service.

Many of our pastors serve their congregations as unpaid volunteers while engaging in business, employment, and professional life. In doing so they carry heavy burdens. They may have but little time for study so important to the enrichment of their ministry. Yet our growth in the future depends upon reaching higher standards of preparation and growth for the pastoral ministry.

The demands upon the pastor are increasing. Through the years, our congregations are changing slowly, having greater numbers of people with higher education, more graduates of colleges and universities, who still have the same spiritual needs and hungers that their parents had. It will require growth and development in the ranks of our pastors to bring effective ministry to these people, now and in the future.

In their special line of ministerial service and responsibility our pastors occupy an important and indispensable place. They have met many needs and challenges in the past, and they face a call to rise to new heights of dedication and service in the future. The church looks to them now, confident of their faith and devotion, praying that the Spirit of God and the companionship of the Good Shepherd may be with them in all their work.

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Apostle D. T. Williams:

It is a pleasure to be advised of the appointment of Dr. Harvey H. Grice to the position of President of Graceland College. The qualities of mind and spirit which are his commend him highly for such an important post. Dr. Grice's pleasing personality is quite in keeping with his other qualifications. He is a man whom the students of Graceland will learn to look to with confidence.

I have looked forward to this development with mingled emotions, for while it is a matter of personal gratification that Brother Grice is thus honored, we feel that there is in this appointment a serious loss to the area over which I have been given supervision in that it takes from us a district president of distinction.

We can commend Brother Grice most highly for this important trust and congratulate the church in having such a man available to undertake this stewardship. I know that Dr. Grice will accept this responsibility as a trusteeship under God and for His church. Likewise, would we commend Sister Grice as a faithful companion and a worthy helpmate in the things of the kingdom. May God bless them both in this glorious opportunity to serve the youth of Graceland, and through them the church.

From Apostle D. O. Chesworth:

Brother Harvey Grice, Graceland's new President, is certainly a splendid example of a church member. My acquaintance with him goes back to 1946 when I was serving as a bishop in the Eastern States Mission. He was living at Dobbs Ferry, New York. Although a very busy man with General Foods Corporation, he always attended our services.

He is a devoted member of the church and will surely give us capable and devoted leadership at our church college.

Graceland College is very fortunate to be able to look toward its future under the direction of President Harvey Grice.

The following is an excerpt from a letter received from Robert M. Seeley, President of the Southern Oregon District:

The Klamath Falls Branch conducted a successful missionary series over a seven weeks' period, from March 9 to April 27, 1958. This "Crusade for Christ" was entirely conducted by the men of the standing ministry under the direction of Elders Waldo Lasley and Harold Crooker. Brother Lasley is the pastor and Brother Crooker is the missionary co-ordinator of the Klamath Falls Branch. The manner in which this effort was planned and executed is most encouraging to me.

Publicity for the series was well executed. Window cards, newspaper articles, and handbills were used to inform members of the community of the coming Crusade. The Zion's League donated their efforts as a special project in distributing tracts and handbills from door to door. The efforts of the entire membership were enlisted for this endeavor. Every department functioned well in assisting the efforts of the pastor and the priesthood.

The appeal of this series was to all age groups. Special meetings were held for children on Monday evening of every week, with an average attendance of nine at each meeting. Cottage meetings were conducted on two evenings a week with two different groups, and special lectures were given at the church on Friday evenings for all ages. There were four baptisms at the close of the series and a total of eighteen prospects for future ministry and conversion.

The spirit of the Christ was present at these meetings and permeated the souls of those in attendance. The members experienced much gain in spiritual growth because of their devotion to this work. The men of the standing ministry in this branch are to be highly commended for the fine ministry which they gave in the course of this Crusade for Christ. They and the people were truly co-laborers together with God.

We are very happy to see the success which is being made in these endeavors, and commend these fine people for their diligence in carrying through on this project.

Elder Vern Webb, mission president in Germany, writes of the Whit-sun Conference held May 24, 25, 26 in Hannover:

As has been our practice in recent years, we again rented the large building, Akademie fuer Musik and Theater, and made use of all its facilities. The conference had an international flavor with Saints from England, Holland, Switzerland, Canada, the United States, and a number of service personnel stationed in Germany. They participated with enthusiasm, and there was fine co-operation in all activities.

Practically all visiting and local priesthood had responsibility in giving support to the ministry of Apostle and Sister Oakman, Evangelist and Sister Harry G. Barto from Independence, Missouri, and Brethren Anton Compier and William Horn from Holland, Elders William Entwistle and Jack DeWild (from Britain and Holland) were very helpful in carrying out the program of the conference. Oskar Stüve, Erich Huehold, Kurt Schenk, Anton Compier, and Jack DeWild acted as interpreters.

The Saints of Hannover did their best to provide housing for visitors. Some of the local people who carried specific responsibility were August Weber, Gustav Goedeke, Karl-Heinz Guene, Christian Roesch, George Sofke, Erich Kirsch, and Erwin Goedeke. Classes were taught by Brother and Sister Oakman, Brother and Sister Barto, and Brother Compier. Brother Oakman preached Saturday evening and Sunday morning, and Brother Beil preached Sunday evening.

Eight persons were baptized during the conference, making a total of eleven for the year in the mission.

We are thankful for this experience and feel that God was very near us. Our convictions of the divinity of the work were deepened, and we see our way more clearly for the future. We are grateful to the General Church for making the various officers available to us for this event.

What I Look for in a Pastor

PASTORAL LEADERSHIP is a fundamental need among people in Christ's church, and it is a wonderful, rewarding experience.

The following qualities and characteristics that I look for in a pastor are not necessarily in the order of their importance, but as I see the role this key priesthood member plays if he is to be successful as a leader.

I look for a man who is as completely converted to God, Jesus Christ, and his restored church as is possible—a brother of great faith in God, in people, and the church. He must be well grounded in the fundamentals of the Restoration. If he would lead souls to Christ, he must put Christ first in his personal life, his home, his business, profession, or trade. He must have a genuine love and concern for people. He must be humble and not anxious to be in the driver's seat for any personal and selfish praise, honor, or glory.

Since pastors are usually married (and should be), I look for one who has a wife of sterling qualities, a good homemaker who will support him in his work and share with him in the sacrifices he is called on to make. He should have a wife who stays in the background but who is always concerned and prays for his success in his pastoral work. A pastor's wife should not be prone to gossip or try to help administer the work, or push herself into places of major leadership in the branch or congregation.

I look for a pastor who, having children, is a family man interested in his children. He must rule his household well, but his ruling should be seasoned with kindness and love. It is imperative that he be highly regarded in his community and among those he works with at his job.

Pastoral demands are heavy so I look for a man who is physically well and reasonably strong. He should be very prayerful in all that he does, believing in divine direction, and be a student of the word. I look for a leader who has a good educational background.

A pastor should be one who keeps himself and his group informed of the General Church program, the stake or district program, and fits his branch or congregational program into the total movement of the church.

It is imperative that he be a good organizer, administrator, and team worker. I look for a shepherd who will lead but not do all the work himself. He will plan ahead and show others how to work. He must be inclined to place responsibility of leadership and ministry on others, and hold them responsible. There is no place in the pastoral role for a dictator. He is one who is able to measure abilities and talents of others rather well, inspire members of all ages to share in the work of the kingdom, and enlist them where they fit in best.

I look for a good public speaker with a fairly good command of the English language.

He must be friendly to all and have no favorites.

The quality of getting along with people without compromising principle is basic. He must be quick to admit error and mistakes, kind and considerate but firm, standing on his own feet after making up his mind. He should be one who never yields to pressures of priesthood and other members of the church unless he is reasonably sure they are right.

He should be of the disposition to withstand adverse criticism, not easily discouraged, and should welcome constructive criticism.

He must believe in Zion and the Gathering. He must be concerned with stewardship and comply with the law of temporalities, else he will not be able to lead the people of his group in this fundamental Christian participation so necessary for individual salvation, church-wide evangelization, and Zion building.

I look for the quality of good worship leadership. A pastor must appreciate the importance of individual and corporate worship. I also look for a brother who knows music or has an appreciation for its place in worship. He will then give leadership in this field directly or enlist able and capable helpers.

A successful pastor must have a passion for souls, therefore I look for a person who feels that home ministry is all-important to the church members and that missionary work is the lifeblood of our church. Such a shepherd will organize and carry out an effective year-round home ministry program and a dynamic missionary effort to those who are not members of our church.

I look for a leader who has a close relationship with the enlightening Spirit of God. In this relationship he will be constantly seeking guidance in developing leadership. He will always be looking for leadership and will be a live channel through which God will call and enlist men in his marvelous work.

I feel the able pastor must have a keen interest in all age groups but primarily he must have a basic, active interest in children and youth.

A pastor should be interested in the community and should concern himself with community interests as they relate to his charge as a shepherd.

I look for the quality of godliness and complete devotion to the greatest of all causes, the cause of Christ—a shepherd seasoned with a refreshing, positive testimony of the ultimate achievement of God's kingdom and his Zion upon the earth.

Garland Tickemyer
President of Los Angeles Stake

Pastoral Ministry

ONE OF THE MOST common errors made by our people with respect to the office and function of the pastor or presiding elder of a branch, or a congregation in a stake, is the feeling that the duties of this officer are comparable to those of pastors in sectarian churches.

The Latter Day Saint concept of the duties of pastors should take into account our multimembered priesthood system which is uniquely different from that of any other religious organization. The breakdown of our system (and not infrequently of the pastor himself) occurs where we load all of the functions of public and home ministry on one man. Pastoral ministry should be shared by all men of the priesthood.

There is actually some danger to this multimembered system resulting from the appointment of full-time appointee pastors, particularly if the full-time services of one man gives encouragement to dependence upon this man for ministry that should come from the priesthood as a whole.

On the other hand the local pastor, giving only his spare time to the work of the church, will have difficulty in measuring up to the performance of professional ministers of other churches who give full time to their church work. The result will be reflected in poor performance on the part of the congregation unless pastoral functions are shared among all members of the priesthood.

The strong congregation is one which has a broad base of leadership. Ideally the situation is best where the office of pastor can be passed around so that one man will not carry it to the point of endangering his health and neglecting his family and business responsibilities. We give instructions to all presiding elders in the Los Angeles Stake to have at least one man in training to take their places and to work themselves out of a job as quickly as possible. Only under conditions of necessity should one man hold the office through many years. We encourage our presiding elders to step out of the presiding office as soon as possible, even if their successors are only 80 per cent as good as they are, providing the new men are people with promise. Outgoing officers are encouraged to enter into the missionary and home ministry aspects of pastoral ministry.

We tend to regard long tenure of office, therefore, as evidence of failure of the congregation to develop leadership in the ranks of its workers.

Qualities in Leadership

For the past twenty years it has been my responsibility to supervise the work of presiding elders and pastors of numerous congregations. Out of this experience some general theories of what makes a good pastor have taken form. The following are some that seem to be important.

1. Genuine love for people. The scriptural injunction, "No man shall assist in this work except he be humble and full of love," is particularly applicable to the presiding elder. As an administrator it will be his duty to enforce the laws of the church, but the legal requirements need always to be tempered by that spirit of love which seeks in every way possible to minister to the needs of the wayward.

2. Good Judgment. A good leader should have sufficient emotional feeling about things that he can transmit this feeling to others. Emotion is the dynamic of religion. Reason, however, should be the ruling principle. The wise pastor is one who doesn't keep his people in a state of confusion by frequent shifts in policy and objectives, even though a new idea may stir him emotionally. Leaders who are the servants of their emotions tend to be unstable both in their loyalties and in the ability to pursue ends on the basis of sound planning.

3. Moral Integrity. More than any other person in the congregation, the pastor symbolizes the moral standards of his people. He should therefore avoid the very appearance of evil. He should protect his credit standing by avoiding financial commitments that would jeopardize it. He should be a good citizen and an exemplary family man.

4. Affirmative Outlook. The moment a leader admits defeat he loses his standing as a leader even though he may retain the office. A good leader must always evidence an optimistic outlook with respect to solution of any problems. Individuals have hidden resources of strength that come into play when they are tapped by the spirit of optimism.

5. Friendliness. The pastor is the principle public relations officer of the congregation. This should include interrelations with the members. These members will be particularly sensitive to the attitude the pastor appears to have toward them. Failure to shake hands with a wavering member may clinch the determination of that member to drop out. A friendly pat on the back may be just the thing that is needed to renew an uncertain worker's determination to carry on.

6. Sharing Responsibilities. One of the hardest things for a leader to do is to trust someone else to do a job that he knows he can do well himself; yet herein lies the key to good organization work. We must share responsibility and not attempt to supervise every move a subordinate officer makes. Good administration requires frequent council meetings. The branch council must meet monthly for greatest working harmony and accomplishment.

7. Need Not Be a Super-man. Observing the changing fortunes of congregations and leaders over a period of years, I have become especially aware that the best pastor is not always the one who has the most ability in the performing of the functions he supervises. Sometimes an extremely capable leader will overawe his associates. They will insist upon his doing more than he should do simply because he does things so well. This may stifle the emergence of leadership qualities in others. The best pastor is the man who can put a lot of people to work and make them feel that the welfare of the church depends upon their doing a good job of an assigned task. Excellence of leadership should never be measured in terms of how many hours are put on the job but in the results that are obtained in the over-all program. Some pastors who almost work themselves to death have to do it because they have been unable to transfer these responsibilities to others.

A Pastor's Wife

8. The Pace of the Leader. A worker recently said to me: "The pace of the leader is the pace of the people." This adage may be applied to such things as loyalty to the district, stake, and General Church programs, and general attitudes. Show me a congregation that is constantly holding back in supporting the larger objectives of the church and invariably there will be a small group of people in key positions whose attitudes are influencing the group. Not infrequently it is the attitude of the pastor himself, not always openly expressed, sometimes manifest in the form of faint praise. Where there is a spirit of humility, love, enthusiasm, and optimism it affects the attitudes of all of the members of the congregation.

9. Close to God. The burdens that are carried by the pastor are usually very heavy. He should stand close to God. It is through him that God's will must be expressed in the calling of men to the priesthood. Many situations will tax his own resourcefulness to the point where he will need the discernment of the Spirit of God to adequately minister.

Blessed indeed is that congregation that has within the ranks of its priesthood humble men who, out of love for God and their fellow men, are willing to stand as leaders of this people. Upon their shoulders rests the future of the church.

Feed My Sheep

Feed my sheep, both the fractious rams
And the weary ewes with spindly lambs.
There may be wolves who would raid the flock—
Remember I'm with you, and I'm the Rock.

Feed my sheep, though they may not eat
The pasture you choose for their willful feet.
They may not recognize frauds you see.
Stay alert. You're on watch for me.

Feed my sheep, though the night be long.
Didn't I choose you because you're strong?
Though devils and perils haunt the fields,
Every evil to courage yields.

Feed my sheep when you stand alone
And every ally is overthrown.
Frustrate you may be, but patience still—
Finally all things work my will.

Feed my sheep, who may forget
All you've done when the sun has set
And they are snugly inside a fence.
Were you ever betrayed for thirty pence?

Feed my sheep, for they are still mine—
The slattern, the limping, the ones that whine,
The wicked, the lazy I still would keep.
It isn't easy, but—feed my sheep.

VERE JAMESON

HOW DOES a pastor's wife look at her husband's work? From the center of a world which revolves around the questions, "How can I further that work? How can I help?"

A pastor's wife is never free from this concern. She cannot view dispassionately the work of her husband because his work is part of her.

Often in the course of his ministry my pastor husband is called in the middle of the night to administer to an ill member. How do I view this call? From the point of view of my responsibility. I must send him off with my prayers, my encouragement, a smile, and free from concern over whether I'll be all right or afraid alone in a big house.

Perhaps his work requires him to counsel vigorously with a young couple on the verge of a marital breakup. How do I view this ministry? It may require many evenings away from home, leaving me with boys to put to bed, stories to read, and other numerous nightly chores. Once again my view is What is my part? His work is essential. These are two of God's children who need help. My prayers go with him and continue in my heart. My mouth never utters a complaint for the extra burdens or for the hours I wait sleepless until he arrives safely home.

A disgruntled member loses his Sainthood long enough to make a disastrous, biased, destructive criticism of my husband or the church. My husband reacts in Christian manner, accepting the value in the criticism, disregarding the rest, forgiving and forgetting, leaving only love and concern in his heart for the soul of that Saint. My view of all this—a difficult one. It's hard to accept without anguish the criticism of a loved one, either direct or indirect. My role is follow his lead, replacing anguish with love and concern for a soul at the moment unhappy and distressed.

The pastor must plan many activities, organize many people into a smooth-running, smooth-working group. This takes hours of preparation, hours which I must let him have. This requires of me a smooth-running home where he is free to spend his needed time alone and in quiet.

My husband is concerned in his work with the spiritual growth of people. He himself must live close to God and ever strive to grow if he would help others. I view this phase as a vital basis for all his work, and irrevocably this idea leaves me with the responsibility of fostering such growth in my home and my family life. Family worship, personal study and prayer, a religious atmosphere are requirements. My husband can grow spiritually only if he has a spiritual atmosphere surrounding him. And that is my job as pastor's wife.

I view my husband's work much as he does, only over his shoulder, being present or absent as he needs me, quiet or talkative as the occasion calls for, respectful of confidences, loving in judgment, and always ready with my encouragement. My view of my husband's ministry as shepherd of a flock is one of willingness to give him up as little or as much as necessary for the furtherance of the work dearest to both our hearts.

The Pastor's Team

HOW DOES a pastor get all his work done? That is a pertinent question in a church that relies mostly on self-supporting pastors—pastors who haven't a great amount of time to give to the thousands of details of weekly branch activity.

The answer to the question is this: He depends on a team of helpers.

The pastor's team can be a very simple organization of one or two helpers, or it can be complex involving dozens of directors, leaders, assistant leaders, and committees.

Perhaps the simplest pastoral team would consist of a pastor, several church school teachers, a music director, a women's leader, and a branch secretary-treasurer.

At the other extreme is the team that consists of

1. Pastor
2. Counselors
3. Several group elders
4. Bishop's agent
5. Missionary co-ordinator
6. Music director
7. Women's leader
8. Youth supervisor
9. Church school director
10. Young adult supervisor
11. Home ministry supervisor
12. Building committee
13. Representatives to community church organizations
14. Priesthood members who preach, teach, visit, help conduct services and perform the ordinances.

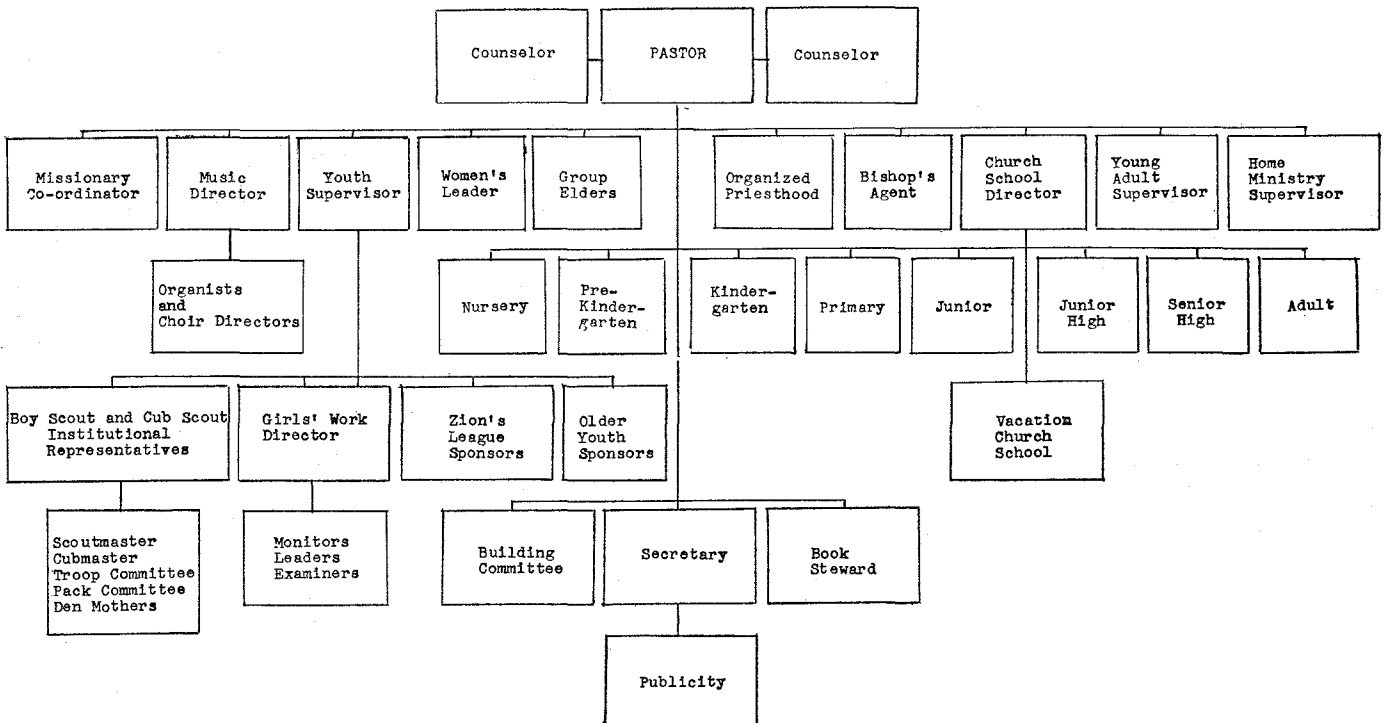

Any one of these offices may be just the beginning for a complicated organizational structure involving many other persons. The church school director, for example, may have other leaders helping him direct such departments as nursery, pre-kindergarten, kindergarten, primary, junior, junior high, senior high, adults. And all of these supervisors have teachers helping them in their areas.

The youth supervisor also may have many helpers, such as a Zion's League leader, an older youth leader, a cubmaster, a Scoutmaster, and a girls' leader. Each of these in turn will have committees, den mothers, troop committees, awards committees helping them. In fact, youth work alone can be an organization involving enough people to fill the church on Sunday.

The job of being a pastor involves spiritual leadership, counseling, teaching, and many other things. Perhaps one of the most important, however, is that of team leadership. The pastor of a healthy congregation must be a team organizer and a good team captain.

It is part of the church's doctrine that all are called according to their gifts. To translate that philosophy into good branch life means the pastor must share his responsibility with many people, according to their abilities, so that all may answer the call to them to serve.

Wherever there is a good congregation in the church there is certain to be a good pastor with a good pastoral team working with him, sharing his responsibilities. And the best pastoral team in the church is probably one that, in some way, involves every member of the congregation.

The Evolving Concept of The Office of Pastor

HE PREACHES; he teaches; he visits; he shepherds; he presides. He is a missionary, sometimes a judge. He organizes people; he marries them; he baptizes them; he lays hands on their heads for many reasons; he buries them. Who is he? Why, of course, he is the pastor of your branch, or the pastor of any one of the approximately one thousand other congregations of the church throughout the world.

. . . For Lack of a Word

Actually, we have no word in our language that realistically describes what this man is or what he does. In the history of our church we have used extensively in the past such terms as "branch president" and "presiding elder." These terms emphasize the "presiding" phase of his work. They picture him as an organizer of functions, an administrator.

However, because of their more formal meaning—because they make him seem more unapproachable, more involved in the mechanics of things instead of being interested in the feelings of people—these phrases have been slowly dropping out of our everyday vocabulary. But legalistically, they still remain in our literature. Our Rules and Resolutions calls him the "branch president." ("Presiding elder" is not emphasized because the leader of a group may also be a "presiding priest" or some other office of priesthood.)

But the members of a local congregation usually say "pastor" because it calls up a fondness and warmth of emotion. It brings to mind that function of the branch president which most appeals to them. It means love and affection to them. They think of the relationship of Christ as a shepherd (pastor) to his flock (the church). They want to feel that their branch president represents Christ in expressing His love and concern for people as people, not as toy chessmen to be manipulated for the accomplishment of a "successful program."

Origin and Early Concept of "Pastor"

The word "pastor" is derived from the Latin word meaning "shepherd." It has been passed down from the early centuries of Christianity. Discussing the origin of the meaning of the word, Cruden's Concordance comments: "The Eastern shepherd must both protect and feed his sheep—so there is a derived meaning of spiritual leader, minister, one given charge of a church of Christ, to care for spiritual interests of the people and feed their souls with spiritual food." Although "pastor" appears several times in the Old Testament, it is used only once in reference to the New Testament church—in the familiar Scripture of Ephesians 4:11—and it is used only once in the Book of Mormon (1 Nephi 6:30). It does not appear at all in the Doctrine and Covenants.

During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, in Protestant circles, considerable effort was devoted toward dividing the study of the functions of a "pastor" or "presiding minister" into narrow work units. For instance, "poimenics" (derivative from a Greek work meaning "shepherd") identified a course devoted to the study of the shepherding function; "catechetics" was the study of religious instruction; "homiletics" was the study of preaching and religious communication. With this division of functions, probably only one out of every dozen events in which the pastor functioned could be regarded as "shepherding."

But as one author has put it, "Not everything done by one with the title of 'pastor' is shepherding. But neither is shepherding a kind of faucet to be turned on only at occasional times and places." Shepherding is an attitude. A genuine "pastor" always is motivated (in whatever he does) by an attitude of tender and solicitous concern for people.

So the word "pastor" brings that emotional content that most of us appreciate. And we continue to use the word.

Its Use in the Restoration

The church, from 1830 on to the second decade of the twentieth century, made use of the term "branch president." This "president" was an elder or high priest, preferably. While the Utah segment of the Restoration movement has combined the "spiritual" and "temporal" affairs of a group under one man called a bishop, the Reorganization has maintained a strict division of authority in these functional areas—the elder or high priest is the "spiritual" head; the bishop or his representative is in charge of financial and other "temporal" affairs.

Early in the Reorganization, the church school and several other departments now an integral part of each branch administration were not in existence. As they later began to function, they had a tendency to be "stepchildren" to the branch president—he left their care to other people and he continued to be primarily or exclusively interested in the other "general" services of the church. Following the ordination of President Frederick M. Smith, studies and suggestions culminated in the introduction in 1930 of a "new type of branch organization." This was first advocated by C. B. Woodstock in the March, 1930, edition of Departments' Journal. In discussing the functions of the pastor under this "new type" or organization, he writes:

The new plan recognizes the president of the branch, or the pastor, as the one primarily responsible for the conduct of the entire activity program of the branch or congregation. This may be but a tardy recognition of a responsibility which should always have been his. Indeed, a look around . . . will reveal the happily active, growing branch as one where the president or pastor has been a dominant factor, in touch with all the varied activities of a full and rich program. Not obtrusively dominant, but a kindly sympathetic, encouraging personality, remaining in the background but inspiring love and confidence and consecration by his example and leadership.

Also after Frederick M. Smith became president of the church, the word "pastor" seems to have got its start. A feeling that this was a "Protestant" apostate word to be shunned was gradually dispelled. The trend toward emphasizing the "shepherding" function has continued ever since.

The "Team" Concept

Although we have always given lip service to the concept of priesthood functioning as a team, today the "team" concept of shepherding is being advocated more actively than ever before. Notice this statement in the current book, The Ministry of the Elder:

"The word 'pastor' is used to include the responsibilities and services of all the elders in a group. It is not a term restricted to the one elder selected to co-ordinate and direct all activities of the Saints in one specific church. This man, it is true, is the presiding elder; but the term carries with it connotations entirely distinct from the pastoral concept. All elders are called to be pastors over the flock."

So we begin to enter another phase of our understanding of the word "pastor." Technically, the leader of a branch is the "branch president," and we hold that ideally he is the "pastor." But we seem to be moving on to the recognition that one man cannot alone "shepherd" a large flock. There must be a team of "shepherds"—a pastorate. How the evolution of this concept will grow is a secret yet to be revealed by the future!

Pastoral Tenure

IN RESPONSE to our questions to district and stake presidents concerning those who had served continuously as pastors for ten years or more, we had several point out that it was their policy not to keep a pastor in one congregation for that long a period.

Where good leadership is available, we think that the policy of changing pastors after a period of two to five years might work to the good of the congregation and the minister. However, it is the policy in many of the stakes and districts to transfer good leaders to other congregations so that they might continue to grow in pastoral stature.

We are conscious, however, that in some localities men have been retained in office because no one had developed to the point where he could do the work acceptably in the minds of the district officers who have the right of nomination (Rules of Order 13). Such men are worthy of great honor for having continued to give an important service under difficult conditions.

It is relevant to note in the following list that of our 944 congregations, 22 per cent are composed of a membership of 50 or less. Or if we include all those having enrollment of 100 or less, it takes in 56 per cent of our congregations. No doubt it is the constant prayer of the faithful in all these small groups that the Lord of the harvest will send more laborers into the vineyard.

Hawaii is carried as a district and is not broken down by branch and therefore is not included in this analysis. The membership totals 1022 in Hawaii.

God is concerned with the raising of new workers, and where these men are called and show the willingness and ability to give leadership, they should be trained to take over and relieve those who have served acceptably for some time. There are localities, however, where these young men, soon after they are called, leave for other fields of employment and the branch is left to struggle along as best it can without their help. We salute the faithful leaders who have served their congregations under difficulty.

They Served a Decade

We realize that the list is not complete. Unfortunately, a complete and accurate list would probably be impossible to compile. However, we are happy to present the names that were reported:

 Adams, Arnold, Guilford, Missouri
 Aldridge, George, Bradford, England
 Allen, O. P., Marion, Illinois
 Allen, Willard, Wellsburg, West Virginia

DISTRICT AND STAKE presidents were recently asked by Herald House to report the names and congregations of all pastors and presiding elders who have served for ten continuous years.

Some of the men have served for a decade or better in the congregation shown. Others have served several congregations but have been pastors for ten continuous years.

A PASTOR'S WEEK

by Cecil R. Ettinger

City Pastor, Des Moines

THE BULK of the work of the Church of Jesus Christ in these latter days is carried on by devoted and consecrated men who earn a livelihood for themselves and their family in their daily vocation and who have as their avocation professional ministry for Christ. One such man is James C. Blair, pastor of the Payton Avenue congregation in Des Moines, Iowa.

To earn his livelihood, Brother Blair is head bookkeeper for the Furnas Ice Cream Company, where he spends forty-four hours each week in this area of his labor. However, a great deal of time plus all of his heart goes into his pastoral work during the remaining hours of each week. If a person wants to become a pastor merely for the recognition or the honor that may be attached thereto, he is in for a great disappointment. If, however, he wishes to be a pastor in order to give unstintingly of his time and receive the joy of a job well done, then he desires a good thing.

A typical pastor's week can be envisioned as we list the activities engaged in by this pastor of a congregation numbering approximately 125.

Monday nights in the Des Moines Branch is devoted to priesthood activities. On the first Monday of each month the pastors in the city meet at 6:30 p.m. to discuss mutual problems and to plan their programs. This is followed by a priesthood class with all of the priesthood members meeting together. On the third Monday night of each month priesthood members meet together in their own congregations to discuss local problems and plan their program. The remaining Monday nights of each month are devoted to the visiting program.

Tuesday night is planned as family night—the night in which families are encouraged to stay together and enjoy the home experience. Many times, however, Brother Blair is called upon to counsel with a family, schedule a committee meeting, or make an administration call. Because Des Moines is in the center of the state and has seven hospitals, there is always a lot of hospital visiting to do. The elders from the Payton Avenue Chapel have Tuesday as their hospital visiting day. Pastor Blair either arranges for another elder to go to the hospitals on that day or, as often is the case, goes himself.

Wednesday evening is prayer meeting night. Although there is good help in the Payton Avenue congregation, Brother Blair is consistently in attendance at prayer meeting though he may not have a direct responsibility for that service. Thursday evening the women's group meets and committee meetings are scheduled. This may entail a finance committee meeting, meeting of the building committee, planning church school activities and the many other committee activities necessary in a congregation of this size.

Friday night is set aside in the Des Moines Branch as fellowship night. Once a month the Payton Avenue young adult group meets.

Des Moines has seven hospitals, and Pastor Blair is often called to administer to a hospitalized member of his congregation.

On another Friday evening in the month there is a general women's department meeting of the branch, and still another Friday night a branch-wide dinner, play, or other fellowship activities may be held.

Saturday afternoon and evening usually finds a pastor busily engaged in planning for Sunday, outlining the service, arranging speakers, contacting men to be in charge and to offer prayers. This is not to say that the services are planned for the immediate day following—rather, preparation for that day's activities has been made two to three weeks previous and bulletins already printed for tomorrow's activities and the week following. This day's preparation will affect four to five weeks hence.

Sunday is the busiest day of all, but it is also the most rewarding. Church school begins at 9:30, followed by morning worship at 11:00 o'clock. Usually there is a class to teach, arrangements or last-minute rearrangements to be made in the program. Sometimes he may sit in a class and enjoy the fellowship of learning with others in the congregation. Very often on Sunday afternoon there are district meetings to attend. The district pastors meet once a quarter; the reunion committee, church school committee, and other groups are necessary in coordinating individual programs. All are joyous activities but time-consuming in their nature. Such is a pastor's typical week.

Sunday brings many routine duties—and various incidental activities, such as a district pastors' meeting

In a recent survey the six pastors of the Des Moines Branch spent an average of forty-four hours in their vocation and twenty hours in their pastoral duties. This is a wonderful contribution to the work of the church and is the secret of the vitality of the church. Our original thesis would bear repeating at this time. If you desire to be elected pastor of a congregation for the honor that might come or the respect that might accrue, your ambition will be frustrating and the work of Christ will be hindered. If, however, you want to devote all of your being and much of your time in striving to minister for him who is our Savior, and the people for whom you have been called to serve, then no task can be more rewarding and no satisfaction greater.

Remember, faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, charity, humility, diligence. Ask and ye shall receive, knock and it shall be opened unto you. Amen.

Satisfactions from Pastoral Ministry

I

TWO SLEEPY children were tucked in for naps just in time for a brief period of quiet before the other three came from school when there was a familiar rap at the door. Daddy Lundeen's cane was a door knocker that sounded a unique signal. Comfort, counsel, encouragement, and a reassuring prayer were the marks of his visit. He came this day to a divided home where the mother of five children was an active member of the church. To many members of the branch this family did not seem to be one of particular promise, but Daddy Lundeen made regular investment here. The conversation during his visits covered a wide range of subjects—such as church doctrine and teaching, the needs and opportunities of the church as a whole, child discipline, and right relationships in the home. Family worship and financial law obedience were also frequent topics of discussion, and although there was never any "lecture," Daddy Lundeen seemed to see clearly certain things which needed to be done with this family. Step by step he took it toward these accomplishments in the process of his ministry.

God was at work here, and many unusual experiences were shared. One day while the young mother was praying earnestly during a period of fasting and prayer about severe financial difficulties, she was amazed to feel a fifty-cent piece pressed into the palm of her open hand—an almost unbelievable token to evidence God's interest in her affairs. In due time the financial problems were resolved.

In this family of very moderate means and of casual church attendance enforced by circumstances beyond its control, the children gradually grew to maturity. Under the tutelage of Daddy Lundeen the mother gave spiritual leadership to the affairs of her household. A fervent desire to keep the commandments of God, regular financial support to the church which meant sacrifice, daily prayer with the children, and the counsel of regular ministry, combined with the grace of God and the guidance of his Spirit, engendered in the hearts of these children the testimony of Jesus and a strong desire to labor for the cause of Zion.

The three boys in this family are all in the priesthood today, two in full-time appointee ministry. The two girls are active workers in the church.

The accomplishments in this family would have brought great satisfaction to Daddy Lundeen if he had lived to see the results of his years of pastoral ministry. However, he saw these things with an eye of faith and labored diligently.

I received the benefits of this ministry. I was one of the children who learned the satisfactions of the kingdom life as a result of his influence in our home. I have gone forth to invest myself in the lives of others, according to the principles which I learned from the ministry of Daddy Lundeen. I have tried to love those who are yet unlovely, to lead those in whom the promise of accomplishment is yet obscure, to pursue those who do not respond readily to ministry, to take the long view, and to labor in the utter confidence that the Master will multiply my feeble efforts and make them fruitful in the lives of his people even as he multiplied the loaves and fishes by the sea.

There is rich satisfaction in such ministry.

PASTORAL MINISTRY has many compensations, for out of ministry to people comes an understanding heart. Many problems that are common to all mankind have been discussed by men who feel the responsibilities of shepherding the flock. From this knowledge comes a yearning for the souls of men that is the kind of yearning the Master of men had. Jesus said, "I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine." This statement contains a principle that applies to every type of ministry, for all want to know and to be known.

A great deal of satisfaction comes to pastors, and men of the priesthood, when people confide in them and seek their counsel. In the experience of counseling comes ways of solving problems. What rich reward there is in seeing someone overcome that which may hinder proper growth. What we are able to give through the ministry of pastoral care, we are likely to receive in direct proportion. Not only is there a change in members, but there is also a change in members of the priesthood who are engaged in the work of ministry.

We learn from specific experience, and when we have other experiences then we are better equipped to meet the problems of life. Through our contact with other people comes self-understanding and also a better appreciation of why they need ministry.

The gospel is not just about God, but it is God's relation to man. Some people that come under our care may be far from God, but they are not godless. What an opportunity to be present at the many kinds of new births that happen in God's way of life. In this satisfaction that comes we have seen the lives of men change as much as did the life of the Apostle Paul. Is this not a reward that comes to a servant of God when men who are nurtured, blossom and grow? All who are pastors can testify of this.

In our ministry we need to use the power which is beyond our own. Jesus was more aware of the positive "thou shalt" than "thou shalt not." Today we need to take a clue from the positive and help people to build the Zionitic way of life. Jesus never was content to denounce the Pharisee. His main concern was in calling men to see a better way of life. This needs to be our concern; we are to "teach, expound, exhort, baptize, and watch over the church."

Because the Master established his church among men and used priesthood to help, it is reasonable to believe that we must be intimately associated with God and other men. It is this close association that brings out the best in men. As we seek to establish the kingdom way of life we must encourage people to participate in the total program of the church. We must sense the beauty of working together to establish the ideals and objectives of the kingdom.

A great satisfaction in pastoral ministry is to see groups working together for the benefit of the whole. This means, above all, the elimination of self, and selfish motives; this brings us into harmony with Christ who is concerned about all.

THERE ARE many experiences which bring joy and satisfaction in pastoral ministry. Those which bring the greatest joy and more abiding satisfaction are those which evidence that God is still guiding his church, those which bring the awareness of being instrumental under his leadership, and those which manifest the growth and response of people to the gospel and the kingdom.

There can be no greater source of strength and motivating power in pastoral ministry than the realization that God is directing. In every aspect of pastoral ministry his strength and influence can be felt. Even in the minute detail of service-planning, his guidance has enhanced the beauty and dignity of the service. Often, this guidance is received in the selection of speakers, assistants, and music. This has brought unity of thought and experience, out of which true worship has been expressed.

In the personal ministry of preaching, teaching, counseling, and family visiting his direction and pervasive influence has motivated people to a deeper desire to share in right living. Such motivation made the ministry worth while. At other times when the solving of personal or administrative problems and de-isions are necessary, wisdom and understanding beyond that of man has come to forward the work. Often God's influence in finding the answers and making the decisions is realized only after the results of those decisions have been viewed. Indeed there comes the deep and abiding satisfaction in the testimony that God continues to lead, direct, and influence the work of his church.

There also comes deep satisfaction from the privilege of sharing with God in shepherding and feeding the flock. To feel that one has been instrumental under His leadership in ministering spiritual life to the souls of men brings joy and satisfaction not found outside the kingdom. Shepherding under God is an experience in which the servant is able to feel a degree of his love, mercy, compassion, knowledge, wisdom, and all of the other attributes of his nature. By the grace of his Spirit one comes, to a degree, to see as He sees, to feel as He feels, to speak as He speaks, to behold the work as He beholds the work. Life is beheld in true perspective. New vision and understanding are received. The potential powers in the lives of people are revealed and their inner needs are brought into view. People's lives become meaningful and worth while. To the degree the servant shares in such experience he is able to truly shepherd and minister the power of eternal life. From such persuading influence the servant goes forth to feed the sheep. His decisions and choices have in them the power of new life, the life of the kingdom. The desire of the pastor is always to be a true shepherd and to feed the flock the bread of life. When he does so there comes peace and satisfaction.

Another of the great joys of pastoral ministry is to witness the response and growth of people in the gospel and to see the transformation taking place in their lives. It is a very rewarding experience to share the zeal and enthusiasm of those who have newly found the gospel; or to share in the efforts of those who, through trials and problems, continue their endeavors to endure to the end; or to feel the strength and righteousness of those who, after many years of kingdom life, have been steadfast and faithful to their deep conviction of the gospel. To see people responding to the call of Christ brings the testimony of the final triumph of his kingdom.

Pastoral Work Abroad

Germany

Brother Erich Kirsch is the pastor of the Springe Branch in Germany. He was baptized May 26, 1948. On February 16, 1952, he was married. His wife, Marli, was baptized March 22, 1952. They now have four children and are indeed a happy family group.

DURING THE WAR many Germans returned to their homeland from the Polish occupied areas of Eastern Germany. Among these people were Brother and Sister Krysmanski. Upon their arrival in Springe they tried immediately to make contact with the Saints in Hannover. Hannover lies about thirty kilometers distant, and the Krysmanski family traveled to Hannover often in order to hear the word of God preached in the meetings there. Brother and Sister Krysmanski were very valiant in testimony as they made friends in Springe, and it was soon necessary for someone to come regularly from Hannover to conduct services there. Brother August Weber took over this pioneer work. Under the most difficult and primitive conditions Brother Weber succeeded in establishing a branch in Springe. We are all very thankful to him for the work that he, through the power of God, has been able to do for us.

Since June 20, 1948, our branch has held services in a schoolroom. As of June 10 of this year our branch will be ten years old. We have experienced some excellent services and received many wonderful testimonies during these years. Our number grew from five to sixty-four. Today we have fifty-three on the roll with about twenty-three active. We have regular Sunday morning services and midweek Bible study and prayer service. In addition we have a women's group and a Zion's League which are very helpful and contribute much to the development of the branch.

Brother Weber was the leader of Springe Branch until October, 1955, at which time I was asked to assume this responsibility. Brother Zonker, who was the leader of the German Mission before Brother Webb came, asked me to take this responsibility as early as 1954. I felt too weak at that time to take such a responsibility. However, through much study and prayer I was able to overcome my weaknesses to the extent that the Spirit of God was able to work through me. Since taking this work upon my shoulders I have been very happy and thankful because I know it is the work of God and by serving him my life is improving in quality. My greatest desire is to be able to lead the group here in humility and love, that God's plan of Zion may become a reality among us.

We were sorry to see Brother Zonker leave this mission but are happy to have Brother Webb in our midst. He has visited us often here in Springe, and we have had many good experiences together. It is my personal observation that the fellowship between the German and American brothers and sisters is growing; I look upon this as a mark of real progress. Brother Webb and I have often talked about our branch here, and I feel that we have a good foundation in the gospel upon which we can continue to build. It is our present project to win new young people and some young families to the work here.

We are especially happy that one of our young people, Sister Christa Tegtmeyer, is now in America where she will attend Graceland College. We look forward to her help in the future here in our mission. It is our deepest desire that we may all be mutually helpful in spreading the gospel and telling the Restoration story. S. ERICH KIRSCH

Australia

DRUMMOYNE BRANCH has a membership of about three hundred. It is located in an inner suburb in Sydney, a city with a population of two million. Services have been held in its new building for a little over two years, though the branch, known formerly as the Balmain Branch, is sixty-five years old. The new building has cost $50,000.00 to date. The final sanctuary is yet to be constructed.

This building faces one of the main arteries into the inner city. Members have found that the slight disadvantage of noise is far offset by the publicity received by the prominence of the position. It could be conservatively estimated that at least one hundred thousand people pass the church each week. The result of this has been that, since the opening in this area, we have had more nonmember visitors attend services in these two years than probably ever visited us in our old location in Balmain in the sixty-three years we were located there. During the two years of our location in Drummoyne we have had twenty-six baptisms; nineteen of the new members are of mature age. The good aspects of our work are as follows: of our one hundred and thirty families, sixty-two are located within one mile of the church. The attractiveness of our building has brought dignity to the community and commanded the respect of the citizenry. It also causes the members to respect their house of worship. One pleasing aspect of our work has been the way in which our church has become recognized more and more by our Municipal Council. The Mayor visits with us quite regularly, and the pastor is invited to all municipal functions where clergy attend.

Our branch departments include the women's, church school, Zion's League, junior Zion's League, Ladasa (younger married women), and junior church. Our midweek prayer service is reasonably well attended. We conduct a study class at regular periods in the home of the pastor. Recently thirty enrolled from this class in one of the home study courses of the School of the Restoration.

More and more of our members are associating with and contributing to the work of the community. Some are associated with the work of the Red Cross, the Christian Temperance Society, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and other good municipal activities.

Our main project within the branch at the present time is the raising of funds to pay off the debt on our church building and complete the sanctuary. Last year we raised $7,500.00 for this purpose. In another year we expect to clear our debt, and then within another year or so complete the building. (The basic wage in Australia is about $30.00 a week, and the average weekly income of our branch members would approximate $38.00 to $45.00.)

One of the main problems associated with our church is the fact that since it is in an inner suburb it is most difficult for our young married members to build, or even buy, in this area. As a result they are moving out to newer areas farther from the inner-city. Another problem is that we find it difficult to obtain new children for our church school. This difficulty is reflected in our baptismal proportions—nineteen adults and only seven children in two years.

When we first moved to Drummoyne it appeared that several of the clergy of the larger churches in the district would oppose us, and some did. However, what resentment may have existed has dwindled. Some things may have contributed to this. We never publicly criticize other denominations but always aim to keep our message affirmative. Of course the main reason for the respect the church is winning in the area grows out of the quality of the lives of the members and from the fact that we are of sufficiently concentrated numbers to gain some recognition.

Many people, of course, confuse us with the Utah Mormons. While that church is not making any progress in our area, and is not strong in the city of Sydney, it remains one of our problems to differentiate between the two churches so that the people will disassociate our beliefs from the teachings of that church.

We have enjoyed many blessings, individually and collectively. The hand of our heavenly Father has been evident in our history as a branch. Many prophecies concerning its future have seen fulfillment, sometimes in miraculous ways. The way events developed to enable us to begin our church building was undoubtedly in response to earnest prayer.

We seek to be interested in the activities of the General Church; its projects are our projects. Sixteen members of our congregation have attended General Conference, which has helped to enlarge our vision of the world-wide overview of the church.

Our main wish as a branch is to be a part of the church, contributing where we can to its onward progress toward the "building of the kingdom."

PAUL HENRICKS, Pastor

Canada

THE NATIONAL capital of Canada offers opportunities to witness that we here in Ottawa hope to meet. Every year people come to this city to view the symbols of their national heritage. Others are sent here to represent the people, while nations around the world also send their representatives. Here the laws of the nation are passed; policy is formulated; and the representatives of the government are sent forth into the land to carry out the policy and to enforce the laws. From here into the world at large go those who represent the government. As these representatives make their mark in the world, national prestige rises and the eyes of the world focus on this city. Those who have been sent here return to their homelands with a testimony of Canada, its people, its culture, and its religions.

The establishment of a stronghold of the faith in such a city is of tremendous importance. Though this has been recognized for many years by the congregation, many factors have prevented the completion of the program to establish a strong representative group of our people here. At times the goal seemed almost at hand. On other occasions only a few men with vision continued to work toward this goal. Like all congregations this one has its roll call of unsung heroes who have worked, watched, and prayed for the day of fulfillment.

Our branch is located in what the General Church now calls the Eastern Ontario Area. The nearest group is one hundred and ten miles away. Only three groups, varying in size, are within this distance. Our city has a population of two hundred and fifty thousand and continues to expand. Right across the river is the city of Hull, Quebec, with a predominantly French language population. There is a large number of French folk here in Ottawa. Last year it was estimated 40 per cent of the population was French speaking. Our congregation to date is predominantly English. Opportunities to reach these people and to meet the expanding growth of the city challenge us on every side.

A few years ago the congregation then presided over by Elder A. E. Caldwell, working in close harmony with the church officials, began a program which has led us steadily toward the accomplishment of the goal to establish a stronghold of the faith here. At this time the most urgent need appeared to be a house of worship. The Saints were then meeting in a hall. They wanted a building that would meet their needs for several years to come. They also wanted one that would fit into the city's background yet provide a distinctiveness that would call it to the attention of citizens in the community and those who would visit the city. Three years ago the congregation moved into its new stone church which followed closely the architectural line of the old Norman churches of England. Thus far there have been many evidences that indicate the fulfillment of the members' desire for their house of worship. Many people know the church by its appearance; visitors to the city have joined us to worship (members, friends, strangers); and many have come just to examine the architecture. Friends in the neighborhood have expressed their appreciation for the lovely building which adds to the beauty of the area. A step toward the goal has been achieved.

Of course such accomplishment has brought with it one of the problems of our day—Finance. To meet our financial needs we have tried to develop our congregational offering pattern, our departmental fund-raising projects, and our branch fund-raising projects. Recently the chairman of the finance committee commented on the remarkable development made in this field. In three years our income has increased 400 per cent. We are sure that much of this is due to the demand which is upon the group. By publishing our needs and calling attention to the envelope system, we find there is continuous growth in contributions from the group. Many who are giving are doing so, sacrificially, that all needs may be met. The departments have taken responsibilities in this area of need. The women's department, under the leadership of Sister Phyllis Graveley has been to date one of our most consistent contributors. It was this department that three years ago, under the leadership of Sister Mary Diggle, embarked on an adventure at the Central Canadian Exhibition. Last year this became a general branch project. This seems to be one of the largest sources of income from projects to date. The co-operation of our people to make this food concession a success suggests great possibilities in the future for it and for all other activities in the branch. Overcoming the financial needs will allow us to expend more of our energies in the other phases of the work.

Our next problem perhaps will never be completely solved. Until all have turned to Christ it will remain a task unfinished. For it is the task of witnessing and winning. In the development of our financial program, emphasis has constantly been placed on the witness that we evidence. In our exhibition project, we asked everyone to testify of the church when possible; tracts were available to be given out. Every attempt has been made to improve the appearance of our booths to have a clean, wholesome atmosphere. The women's department placed emphasis on this in its bazaars. The leaders worked hard to have attractive settings, to provide worth-while items, and to present a social atmosphere of warmth and friendliness. One cannot estimate the good will established at these moments when we provide a service to others. Thus far our attempts to exploit these fields have brought good reports. We hope to take greater advantage of these opportunities in the future.

In this same area we have been striving to meet the problem of making friends who become potential members of the Church of Jesus Christ. First we have felt that our people must be made aware of their responsibility to have a growing group of friends who are not members of the church. Even though our congregation is small, there are enough of us that we can get along. We cannot say to date that we have succeeded in making all of our people aware of the need for making good friends outside the church. However, we have used the following methods: direct challenge by the pastor, priesthood, department heads, and traveling ministry; and social functions with emphasis on bringing a nonmember friend. Last February the men's club sponsored a valentine's supper for the ladies of the congregation and their friends. Fathers who had small children remained at home to baby sit; those without small children served and cooked the supper. It seemed to be very successful. The women's department has offered us great support in the early attempts to establish a background for other attempts of this kind.

We have recognized the need of getting people who are not acquainted with our members or our beliefs into the church and among those of our congregation. We have thus far tried these methods: (1) the missionary series with advertising, (2) common interest programs (Our only attempt in this area so far was in showing the film "Martin Luther." It was a successful program. One third of those attending were people who had never been in the church before yet lived in the surrounding area), (3) tracts for those who show or voice interest in our work and who shy away from personal contact, (4) following up the contacts made by those who voice some interest. We feel that we have just begun to explore in this field of need and opportunity.

Another problem which we are working with is the amalgamation of our group. Like other groups we have a vast range of people—from those with highly professional skills to those of common labor. In a small congregation this means that there are only a few in each group, sometimes only one family. Common interest and understanding often exist only in regards to the tenets of the faith. It is most obvious that the harmony needed in a body is not resident in such a situation. Before I came here some definite steps had been taken to meet this problem. The men's club had carried out a program under the leadership of Brother Marvin Diggle in which each man of the group spoke either on his work or hobby. An appreciation of each other's interest and occupation was the goal. The women's department has been constantly grappling with this problem. This year it has used small circle groups in hopes that a richer relationship would be established. Socials to get our people together where they can share in common entertainment and fun have helped thus far. All signs point toward a growing ability to cope with this problem.

Our next problem, and the one which we thus far have had the least amount of success with, is the development of leaders. I do not wish to imply that our present leadership is poor. However, when positions of leadership are vacated it is difficult to find those who can and are willing to assume them. Our methods of approach to this problem have been those of direct challenge, some attempts to train for the future, and encouraging participation in those general church activities that could supply knowledge and incentive to become leaders. We feel that we have a great task before us to find more adequate methods to enlist leadership and help these leaders meet the challenge of our age. Perhaps at this point we should challenge Canadians who wish to serve the church to consider the opportunities for service that are available to them here. Those who have talents for leadership, music, and organization will find an opening awaiting them.

Widely separated from others in the church and from joint church activities, some of our people lack a deep appreciation of the world-wide power and scope of the Restoration movement. Only a few have had the privilege to attend reunions and institutes. Those who have returned from these activities have enriched our branch life. The need for this type of fellowship that gives church-wide perspective and world concern, stimulating missionary zeal for all mankind, is with us. As we grow in number here in Ottawa and the Eastern Ontario Area, and as modern transportation continues to cut distances, we will overcome this deficiency.

From the capital of Canada our prayers ascend for the growth of the church in this land and the world. With greater assurance and expectancy we join the rest of the Saints in seeking to bring forth fruit in the Lord's vineyard.

Pastoral Ministry at Graceland

THIS SPRING there were 666 students at Graceland. They came from thirty-seven states of the United States, from the Alaskan and Hawaiian territories, from Australia, England, Canada, and New Zealand of the British Commonwealth. One student is from Korea, and two are from Iran. Of these, 666 students, 632 are members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

These students constitute the "campus congregation." This is the name for the church in action as a group. It is not a branch. All students retain membership in their home congregations. There are no legislative functions in this campus congregation. It is a temporary nine-month unit for the college year. Yet in a sense, for these months, it is the church home of these students. The director of religious activities, appointed by the First Presidency on the nomination by the president of the college, leads the campus congregation.

Pastoral Ministry Is Pervasive. The Graceland program is built on the premise that ministry is a unit. Complete separations between the missionary and the pastoral ministry are artificial. These are simply phases of a single program. Likewise, a sharp distinction between education and preaching and worship is for consideration only, not for effective administration. In a given unit, such as that on filing financial statements, the program involves study, counseling, pastoral visitation, preaching, worship, publicity, library reading, and music exhibits.

Pastoral ministry means a quality of personal contact that runs throughout the program. The priest who serves the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper is functioning pastorally. The chaplain in the residence hall who invites a fellow student to a service is contributing to the pastoral welfare. The faculty member who counsels his student advisee can be functioning in the pastoral field. The instructor who sees that the "good way" of living is furthered in his classroom is contributing. The elder who administers to a student in the health building is a pastor. So the list might go on and on. At Graceland it is the total picture that tells of pastoral ministry.

No Separate Church School. The program of religious education is inclusive. The "campus congregation" as a whole is the school. The academic classes are looked upon as part of the program. The student who considers learning a stewardship looks upon his classes in communication, science, psychology, sociology, music, and so on as part of his religious education. They are equipping him for expanded living and increased service.

In each unit of the college year there are classes, council meetings, committee sessions, and project expression to further competency in the field of this activity.

Expression in a field is within the context of the unified program. Worship separated from the flow of everyday life can be without utility, lacking meaning and expression. Study of the financial program of the church without expression in contributing and filing financial statements is artificial. In this light ministry is related to the expressional program.

The College Year. Graceland has to outline a calendar for the college church year that harmonizes with the total program. This schedule of religious activities is constructed with consideration of these major factors: (1) the academic schedules and recesses; (2) the current emphases of the General Church; (3) contemporary campus needs and interests; (4) present social and world conditions; and (5) available facilities and man power.

This year the calendar has been formulated into units in accordance with objectives for the period. The activities for a unit point to achieving this purpose. They become a means for conducting pastoral activities for this time. The units are planned to provide for balance in the religious education for the years. The thirteen units for the 1957-58 school year were (1) Orientation, (2) Stewardship, (3) College Mission, (4) Religious Emphasis Days, (5) Thanksgiving, (6) Christmas, (7) Latin America, (8) Youth Renaissance, (9) Christ in Ancient America, (10) Church Administration, (11) Easter, (12) Branch Building, (13) Commencement.

Chaplaincies and Divisions. A few years ago, when the number of students increased markedly, the student body was divided into smaller groups with student pastors for each. This was to provide (1) for more immediate pastoral contact and for (2) opportunity for more participation by students as members of smaller groups. This year the general program has continued with alterations.

The six hundred students are grouped into chaplaincy units, eighteen for men and sixteen for women. Residence is the basis for unit groupings. For instance there are six chaplaincy units in Walker Hall, two on each floor, and seven in Gunsolley Hall. A chaplain of a unit is a student, a sophomore or junior. This year women serve as leaders in the women chaplaincies. Associated with each is a member of the faculty. These are not considered sponsors; they are faculty associates.

These chaplaincies are the core units for pastoral ministry. The chaplains have direction of devotions in their units in the residence halls. They make the primary contacts with students in publicity and invitation to meetings. They direct instruction in finance education. Directing the work in the men's chaplaincies this year was Clyde Youngs, in the women's chaplaincies, Velma Ruch.

This year several of these chaplaincies, four to six, combined with a "division" with a student pastor at its head. This permitted students to meet in groups larger than their residence unit and to widen their circle for devotional activities. This college year was divided into three periods with different groupings of units for these three periods. In the fall and the winter there were ten divisions, in the spring, seven.

The divisions in the fall were named after cities in which the church has mission houses, in the winter after congregations in the Center Stake, in the spring after reunion grounds owned by the church.

Unit Devotions. Dorm devotions are a recognized part of Graceland life. Chaplains and their co-chaplains arrange for these. There is no set time or length. Usually they are held "after women's hours" for ten to twenty minutes once a month, once a week, or on special occasions. Often leadership for the devotions is passed from room to room. Sometimes units will combine. Effectiveness depends both on the leadership and the attitude of members of a unit. Some students get too involved in activities to respond; some are indifferent; a few are hostile; most consider these residence-unit worship experiences as essential. Often they iron out strains and tensions.

Unit Adoptees. Each chaplaincy unit has adopted one or more members in missions abroad for the college year. Many of these adoptees are appointees of the church. These adoptions are for two-way communication and acquaintance. They are to express support and to afford fellowship to those far from the Center Place. They push out the sights of the souls of those who enter into this adopting experience. One of the objectives of the Graceland program in religion is to extend the outlook or the outreach of youth until their church becomes a world-wide company.

Today in mission fields of the church around the globe, branches and districts are using gifts sent out from Graceland College. In the youth camp in Norway campers are using a volleyball and net sent by a college group. In Weslaco, Texas, and in Manitou Island, Canada, Saints are receiving the bread and wine from utensils sent by the college. Last year first copies of The Hymnal were sent to Ryde and Hayhurst Branches in Australia and to friends of the church in Barbados, British West Indies.

This year students have been writing series of letters and sending gifts as symbols of friendship. One chaplaincy unit adopted the wife of Juon Hae Lee of Korea; Juon has been a student in Graceland for more than a year. He left his wife and their four-month-old son to attend Graceland. This group of Graceland women have come to know Mrs. Lee and her son, for they have given gifts and greetings. Another group has been corresponding with "Judy and Seki" in Japan. These two, graduates of Graceland in 1957, are pioneering in holding meetings in Japan and in translating church materials into the Japanese language. It is a moving worship experience to sign a letter and dedicate it in prayer as it starts its long journey. This list of ministries through adoption would fill many pages.

Finance Education. Educating students in managing finance is assumed to be part of the pastoral program. During the year, two students have served as representatives for the bishopric. The chaplains take the lead in the units. Classes are held for beginners and other classes for those more experienced. Several faculty members are named as advisors. On February 16 financial statements were presented in a service of dedication. Each chaplain brought to the altar table the bundle of financial statements from his unit. The bishop of Lamoni Stake received them. The percentage of college students filing is well above the average of the General Church. Said one chaplain, "It was a thrilling experience to carry to the table the statements of my wing of the dormitory; the 'kids' certainly responded well."

Auditorium Offerings. Six hundred "dime cards" were distributed to Graceland students. Posters appeared on bulletin boards. The construction work going on was discussed in unit and division meetings. The movie, "The Center Place," was shown. It was the chaplains, however, who did the bulk of the work. At a Christmas service, chaplains brought forward the cards of their units.

In the second "drive" an offering was received on March 16. Some nine hundred dollars was contributed by students. Much of this might be considered as sacrifice offering given by youth of limited means. Worship and giving to the worthwhile are associated in such a project.

Study of Latin America. Three weeks were spent in studying Latin America as a possible field for evangelistic activity. Here study and worship were combined. Each of ten divisions studied one to three countries particularly with respect to their culture, their religious life, and their probable reception of the Latter Day Saint message. Then the ten groups brought together their findings in a general service. Apostle Hield came to the campus twice to bring his picture of Mexico, Central America, and Latin America. In the closing meeting members of the congregation brought together their outlooks and their recommendations for taking the gospel to those peoples of Latin America.

What was discovered became a training foundation for evangelistic work in many countries. Hearts were enlarged to include other peoples. Students saw how the gospel must be interpreted in terms of the cultures of the peoples visited. The church came to be universal, not American. In the presence of so great a mission and so complex a world, a group stood in prayer and said, "Lord, help us!" Such a program reveals how a truly pastoral program is evangelistic in tone.

Social Service. Each chaplaincy unit takes up some service projects as a part of pastoral ministry. This is done on the assumption that worship and service cannot be separated and that service in Christian spirit furthers spiritual healthiness. This year's list included a wide variety of projects. Some chaplaincy units made up Christmas baskets for less privileged families in the Lamoni region. One women's unit made six scrapbooks and sent them to branches in Michigan, Nebraska, and Ohio. Another unit took over house cleaning for one family. Another has provided money for a student from abroad for purchase of personal items. One prepared a tape recording for the Norwegian mission. The planning of the project and the carrying it through are generally climaxed by some devotional service of dedication.

Visits of Church Leaders. In March the campus congregation conducted a unit to study church administration. On March 15 and 16 members of the Joint Council of the First Presidency, of the Council of Twelve Apostles, and of the Presiding Bishopric came to the campus.

Their wives accompanied them. Divisional meetings about the church's organization and administrative personnel had preceded their coming.

This general visit was followed by a visit by representatives of the three councils to interpret the administrative work of the church as seen by the quorums.

The General Church came to life for students. Our church administrators became living men. Said one young man from the eastern coast, "This is more than I anticipated. To see and to meet these men of our church was a dream I never expected to happen. It's my church, too, from now on." It was a two-way ministry. These men and their wives brought something to the campus. The college congregation wanted to bring something good to their church leaders.

With Many Persons. At Graceland, counselors of many callings contribute to the ministry to students. Here are specialists in psychology, finances, marriage, academic subjects, health, theology, and other fields. In the spirit of ministry these contribute hours and hours to students' welfare. Elders among faculty and students are available for administration. Many of the outstanding experiences of testimony and worship are when "two or three are gathered together." A resident patriarch brings the ministry peculiar to his calling. Choirs for sacred music bring ministry to singers and receivers. The library provides books and periodicals in the religion category. Ministry is an interblending and inter-bonding of many persons.

Nonmembers Too. This year at Graceland there were thirty-nine non-member students. Leaders feel that they must be wise in working with these. They are not to be pressured, nor are they to be neglected. Many come with barriers and defenses built up. Often it takes many months for these to give way. On the other hand conversation on religion is not to be avoided. One of the fields calling for most careful interpretation is the close communion observance of the Lord's Supper. During the second semester an "Investigator's Class" was held for interpreting the church to nonmembers.

And Our Own Youth. More problematical than nonmembers are the Latter Day Saint youth who come to Graceland with either indifference or hostility to the church. Some say they have been compelled to go to church and now they are going to take a long vacation. Some come with cynicism. These call for plenty of patience and lots of wisdom. In these cases the most effective pastoral ministry is in the consistent living and contagious faith of students and staff members. Long ago leaders in religious activities realized that "you can lead a horse to water but you can't make him drink." Often students of this type do not begin to respond until the latter part of their second year.

Training Ground for Ministry. The program of chaplain and pastor activities is a laboratory in pastoral ministry. Sophomores and juniors are not highly experienced, and they do not always do first-class work. But they can learn and do "learn through doing" with supervision and consultation. Said one woman chaplain concerning a woman in her unit, "I've asked and invited and suggested in a friendly way, but—never a response. What do you do with persons like that?" The leader's reply: "You'll meet many a situation like that in your home branch. You're getting training for branch leadership." Those in charge believe that this program is developing youth who will be qualified to minister in branches and districts.

A Temporary Church Home. Our college becomes an alma mater, that is a "foster mother" for college years. Responsibility for pastoral ministry belongs to "back home" congregation and college community. Through the years it has been observed that students get along best who look upon the college as their congregation and live in it. Those who commute home on many week ends are like itinerant Saints who do not have roots anywhere. It is unfortunate when students plan their traveling so they belong to neither place. Fortunate are those who share in the total life of Graceland, a community in which they participate and in which they may receive ministries in many fields. Balanced development with a spiritual motive uniting and integrating all phases is the goal.

In the Life of One Student. Here is a Graceland in the growing stages of his young manhood. He knows little about the church; he has been baptized a few years but none of his family belong. He is confused about dating, uncertain about planning for marriage. His vocational outlooks are not clear. He has a meager background for academic study. He is troubled that some ordained young men take their priesthood with so little sense of responsibility. He is short of money. He feels he understands little about God, and that his communion with God is weak.

What are the ministries he needs? Many from many persons. Out of athletic participation, out of academic advisors, out of psychological counselors, out of administrators in the business office, out of general meetings and out of association with ministers to whom he says, "God is real," has come an upturn, a finding himself, a dedication to the work of the church, and quite recently a call to the priesthood. No one person, no one activity has accomplished this. Many ministries have worked together. Such is Graceland's outlook on pastoral ministry.

■ The Graceland faculty enjoyed a dinner at the Mount Ayr church Thursday, May 8. The dinner was served by the women's department of the church.

Dr. John Wellemeyer was the toastmaster for the dinner. The theme was a parody on the current faculty self-study, and the program was given as if it were in the year 2058. Alma Blair, Oliver Houston and Richard Carter each presented humorous addresses concerning aspects of campus life in the future. Dr. W. S. Gould sang and played a ballad on his autoharp. This was followed by an address on the serious implications of the space age by Dr. Roy Mortimore.

■ Lorne Worthington from Spokane, Washington, was recently elected president of the student body for 1958-59. Jim Williams from Des Moines, Iowa, was elected executive vice-president, and Carol Oliver from Moorehead, Iowa, is the new public relations vice-president. All three of these freshman students have been very active this year in school activities and are well qualified for these responsibilities.

■ The music, drama, and art departments, and the Social Activities Planning Committee sponsored a fine arts festival from May 7 to 11. The Festival officially began Wednesday at 10:00 a.m. in the Student Center with a presentation by the Concert Band under the direction of Harold Neal. At 4:00 p.m. Wednesday afternoon a faculty music recital featuring Dr. Roy Benson, pianist; Henry Anderson, tenor; Oliver Houston, organist; and Harold Neal, violinist, was presented for both students and faculty. This recital was followed by a student-faculty tea.

Then, Friday evening approximately four hundred people attended the program, "A Night at the Opera," which was held in the Student Center. The Concert Choir, directed by Henry Anderson, presented two numbers, "The Telephone" and "The Lowland Sea." Stage director for this performance was Roscoe Faunce. Accompanists were Frances Ashby from Emporia, Kansas, Diana Damitz from Lamoni, Iowa, and Janet Graham from Independence, Missouri.

The Graceland Players under the direction of Winston Inslee, staged "The Mousetrap," a two-act mystery by Agatha Christie, in the Student Center Saturday. Nancy Chapman and Dutch Miller, both from Independence, played a young married couple who had just opened a guest house. Hazel Imrie from Newcastle, N.S.W., Australia, played Mrs. Boyle, one of the guests, and J. P. Scott from Independence was an eccentric gentleman. Ted Traver from Lamoni, Iowa, was a detective and brought the law and order. Jean Cottrell from Lima, Ohio, and Ron Roberts from Lucas, Iowa, rounded out the cast.

Sunday afternoon at two o'clock Janet Graham, a sophomore from Independence, Missouri, presented an organ recital in the Memorial Student Center. Following this recital, the annual Graceland-Lamoni orchestral concert was presented in the Lamoni High School Auditorium. This concert was for the entertainment of the Lamoni community as well as being part of the fine arts festival. The orchestra was conducted by Harold Neal. He was assisted during the concert by the Chapel Choir, directed by Mrs. Mabel Hyde.

The festival came to a close Sunday evening with a service of music vespers by the Cantantina Chorus of Independence, Missouri, in the Student Center.

■ Saturday, May 10, was a victorious day for Graceland's golf team. Meeting Drake University in the morning and William Jewell in the afternoon, the Yellow Jackets dropped them 8-4 and 9½-2½ respectively.

■ Rolling on to another victory, Graceland's tennis team took honors again in a meet May 10 at Kansas City University. Barney Parker from San Antonio, Texas, and Bob Brunner from Kansas City, Kansas, teamed together to win the doubles play three to one.

■ The third annual student leadership conference was held on Saturday morning, May 10. It was sponsored by the student senate and was directed by Lorne Worthington. After giving the official welcome, Lorne introduced Mark Thoman, former student body president at Graceland and currently president of the Religious Activities Council at the University of Missouri. Following Mark's talk, the conference was divided into two sections. One section, led by Don S. Davis from San Jose, California, discussed campus life in general. The other section, led by Hazel Imrie, discussed leadership in religious activities.

Following these discussions the conference was divided into several smaller groups that talked about different areas of leadership. When these discussion meetings were closed, the students returned to the assembly chapel to hear a summary report.

■ As part of the Sadie Hawkins week end on campus, the Social Activities Planning Committee featured "The Story of Jazz" on May 17. Claire Prucha from Lincoln, Nebraska, was director and organizer of this performance. Bob Smith from Arlington, Virginia, was the narrator. Several different combos played, and there were also various piano and vocal solos. This jazz concert was very well received. Following this, refreshments were served.

■ Two graduating students gave organ recitals Sunday, May 18, in the Memorial Student Center. Mary Rae Bingham from Des Moines, Iowa, and John L. Williams from Ottumwa, Iowa, presented their recitals at 2:00 p.m. and 3:30 p.m. respectively.

■ The annual cap and gown assembly was held Wednesday, May 21. Graduating sophomores and seniors wore their robes and mortarboards to the traditional ceremony. Janet McFarlane from Independence, Missouri, presented a short speech concerning Graceland. This was followed by a talk about the world by Channing Oakman, also from Independence. Everett Graffeo, who comes from Independence too, finalized the theme by addressing the graduates of 1958. Class gifts were presented to Dr. Gould, followed by the prayer given by the graduates. To close the program the entire assembly sang the Alma Mater Hymn.

■ The track team defeated Fort Riley Army Base, located at Junction City, Kansas, in its final meet by a narrow margin Monday, May 19, by a score of 69-67. Elbert Harrington from East Moline, Illinois, continued his winning streak by taking the mile in 4:29 and the two-mile in 10:05.1. He broke the Graceland record in the mile and the meet record in the two mile.

■ The baseball team also finished its season victoriously by defeating Penn College in a double header, 10-4 and 3-0. Ken Green of Rembrandt, Iowa, pitched the first game, and John Nelson from Independence, Missouri, took over for the second game. Jim Swick from Clarksburg, West Virginia, led the attack with three hits.

OUR FOURTH PRESIDENT

1946 - 1958

We'd Like You to Know . . .

Vance E. Link, M.D.

DR. VANCE E. LINK came to Independence in 1943 and has been making friends ever since.

In 1956 Dr. Link was ordained a high priest and became a member of the Center Stake High Council. He says he finds great pleasure in working with church people and is happy to have an opportunity to assist in the growth of the church in the Center Place.

During his working hours—which are long—he is associated with Dr. Charles Grabske, Sr., the church physician. Dr. Link is also secretary-treasurer of the medical council recently formed by the church's physicians and dentists.

He received his medical education at the University of Nebraska where he was graduated in 1942. He served as a medical officer in the U. S. Air Force from 1953 to 1955. Captain Link was stationed in Reno, Nevada, and later in England. It was while living in these areas that Brother Link says he saw the true need for ministry in our church, not only by priesthood but by all members.

"These experiences helped me to realize the task before us as a church to fulfill our mission in spreading the gospel," he said.

In 1941 Brother Link was married to Catherine Weller in Lincoln, Nebraska. They have four children: Karen Sue, twelve; Richard Dennis, ten; Ronald Vance, seven; Timothy Kent, two.

Dr. Link is a member of the Optimist Club, Jackson County Medical Society, Missouri Medical Society, and American Medical Association. He is also a member of the American Academy of General Practice and has served as president of the medical staff at the Sanitarium.

*Sixth Floor of Auditorium
Is Being Finished for Department*

New Offices for Religious Education

THE Department of Religious Education will move into new offices in the Auditorium sometime in July.

For the past five years the department has occupied a two-story house on Grand Street, to the rear of the headquarters building. The frame house is the last dwelling left on the square block occupied by the Auditorium. It will not be reoccupied. Plans call for the house to be removed in the near future.

The new offices for the Department of Religious Education will be located on the sixth floor of the Auditorium. The top-floor space is in the front of the building.

Contracts for construction work to finish the interior of the General Conference Chamber included the work done on the new offices. The space for the offices was formerly unused. By capitalizing on what was dead space and also by using some new space created by the present construction work, room for the new offices has seemed to materialize from out of nowhere.

The department's suite will include eight offices. They will be reached by either the east or west elevators from the Auditorium lobby. There are no ramps leading to the offices. By taking the west elevator to the sixth floor, visitors will arrive in the department's general office. Hallways will lead to offices occupied by Clifford Cole, director, or other department personnel. Private offices will also be occupied by Richard B. Lancaster, Clifford P. Buck, Athol B. Packer, William A. Clinefelter, Edna Easter, and Thelona Stevens.

At present the department is divided into the following divisions: church school division, youth division (includes boys' work), children's division, adult division, girls' work, and ministry to the blind.

Another room on the sixth floor will be the Library and Conference room of the Department. R. Y.

“Losers Weepers”

Ralph Waldo Emerson once wrote, “I discover that the ancients stole all my best ideas.” The only valuable property one can claim by right of discovery is an idea. A person cannot copyright an idea or title for his clever article or book. The copyright one gets covers only the form of expression of ideas or titles. This is his property which will be protected by the government through due process of law.

The pioneers used to roam over government lands in search of mineral deposits or accessible timber growths. Neither was theirs by virtue of discovery but by filing a claim and paying a nominal fee before anyone else.

Jesus gave a parable which illustrates the principle (Matthew 13:46):

“Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a treasure hid in a field. And when a man hath found a treasure which is hid, he secureth it, and, straightway, for joy thereof, goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.”

Children should be taught that anything of value they “find” still belongs to the one who lost it. It is very probable that the owner is looking everywhere he can think of to locate his property and is very sad because of the loss. The old doctrine of “Losers weepers, finders keepers,” has no basis in law or ethics. The child who finds an article should be taught to make every reasonable effort to locate the owner. A search of the “lost and found” column may give the answer. Dishonesty may even be encouraged by parents who accept too readily the idea that the money, or cap, or pocket knife that Johnny “found” is his to keep.

Festival of Roses

Those who have visited Independence during the spring months up to the middle of June must have been impressed with the beauty and abundance of the roses. They are especially bountiful in the large and sunny yards of Beverly Hills and on Blue Ridge, but many other areas also show a great interest on the part of gardeners in the development of roses. One of the pretty spots has been a small park area near the Auditorium maintained by the church. Church members recall a phrase, “Zion the beautiful,” when they behold the roses. Other people can recall a descriptive newspaper phrase of the seventies and eighties—“Beautiful Independence.” There have been times when the city suffered from neglect and dowdiness, but those are passing now. People show their love of home in programs of beautification and the development of gardens. If we are spiritually right, we will want to show our gratitude to God by making our dwelling places beautiful.

Space Age Lives

By this time the strains of “Pomp and Circumstance” have died away in most of the communities across the United States and the nation has a new crop of high school graduates.

Many of these newly graduated young people are members of the restored church. What difference will the church make as they make their plans for the future?

Looking at the young people of today one cannot help but be impressed with the tremendous range between those who have a purpose in life and those who do not. On one hand we are likely to find some who hold hopes of higher education or a vital occupation leading toward a life that counts. On the other hand we find those whose highest ambition is a jalopy with a set of loud tailpipes and a pair of fur-covered dice hanging from the rear-view mirror.

You might say that one group is planning lives fit for the space age while the other group is planning for the hot rod age. There is little doubt which has the greatest future.

We are challenged to plan lives fit for God to use to achieve his purposes. This is a good time of year for all of us—young people in particular—to take a look at the direction of our lives and be sure that our plans for the future are big enough for God’s work.

Official

Death of President Israel A. Smith

It is with deep personal grief and official concern that we have to inform the Saints of the death of President Israel Alexander Smith. This occurred shortly before 11:30 a.m., Saturday, June 14, at a hospital at Bethany, Missouri.

President Smith left Independence around 8:00 a.m. to drive to Lamoni, Iowa, where he was expecting to participate in the setting apart of Elder Harry J. Simons as President of the Lamoni Stake. About nine miles south of Pattonsburg, Missouri, on Highway 69, the car in which President Smith was traveling alone was hit by another car in which were two men. This was in President Smith's lane. President Smith received severe chest and other injuries, and died about an hour later in the Bethany Hospital. His son, Don C. Smith, and wife, Darlene, reached the hospital a little later.

Funeral services are planned for 2:00 p.m., Tuesday, June 17. The sermon will be preached by Elder Glaude A. Smith assisted by Stake President C. V. Graham.

In harmony with the Letter of Instruction prepared by President Joseph Smith (Saints' Herald, March 13, 1912; March 10, 1915) a meeting of the general officers of the church is planned for the day after the funeral. An account of the decisions of this Council will be published in the Herald for June 30, 1958.

We solicit the prayers of the Saints for the guidance of the Council mentioned and for those who must carry the burden of the administration of General Church affairs pending the convening of General Conference.

Israel A. Smith

Israel Alexander Smith, son of President Joseph Smith and Bertha Madison Smith, was born February 2, 1876, at Plano, Illinois. At the age of five his family moved to Lamoni, Iowa. He was baptized June 25, 1886, by H. A. Stebbins.

Israel A. attended the public school and was graduated from the Lamoni High School in 1895. He attended Grace-land the next two years.

He married Nina M. Genawalt on March 14, 1908. They had two sons, Joseph P. (died March 2, 1936) and Donald C.

He was assistant or associate editor of the Saints' Herald, 1908-1913. He served one term in the Iowa legislature, 1911-1913. In 1912 he was admitted to the Iowa bar, and in 1913 to the Missouri bar. Since January, 1929, he has been a member of the Independence Bar Association and Missouri Bar Association.

He was ordained a high priest April 11, 1915, at Lamoni, Iowa, by E. A. Smith and G. T. Griffiths. In 1920, he was ordained a bishop and second counselor to the General Church bishop, serving until 1925. In October, 1922, he was ordained a member of the Standing High Council and served until 1942.

He was secretary of the church from 1930 to 1940. In October of 1938 he was associated with President Frederick M. Smith as counselor by the action of the Presidency and Quorum of Twelve. His ordination as a member of the Presidency came as an authorization of the 1940 Conference.

In 1942 he was elected as president of the Iowa Pioneer Lawmakers Association and served several years.

In 1943 he was appointed a member of the Missouri Constitutional Convention and was made chairman of its Committee of Public Health, Welfare, and Federal Relations.

President Smith's resolve upon coming into the Presidency in 1946 was to bring about unity and close working relations between the quorums and departments of the church. At this time he publicly announced that he had been assured that he would be given ten years as Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the church to bring about the purposes of God.

At the closing day of the Conference of 1954 in his closing remarks he made this statement: "Brother Elbert Smith this morning in his talk to the priesthood suggested that he may not come this way again. I can't help but feel that maybe some of the rest of us may not be here again, but my hope is that when my time has come I believe that I could wish for no better thing for me, and for all of those who have been on the platform and under appointment of the church, than to have it said of me when I am through that I served my generation as David of old of whom it was said, having served his generation . . . he fell on sleep." I trust that the ministry who go out from this Conference will go out with the resolution to serve well their own generation."

The church is saddened by the loss of this kind, humble, and wise leader. Our sorrow is greater because of the sudden and tragic way in which the end came. Yet there was no lingering illness, no impairment of bodily functions to mar his eighty-two years of life well lived. Perhaps his epitaph should be "Mission accomplished, he served well his generation."

Memorial Service at Nauvoo

A special service commemorating the one hundred and fourteenth anniversary of the martyrdom of Joseph and Hyrum Smith will convene at Nauvoo on Sunday, June 29.

The service will begin in the Nauvoo Church at 10:30 a.m., and will be continued with a procession to the graveside, at which time it will be concluded with the laying of wreaths.

Organize Yourselves

AMERICANS are great organizers. The faith of the average American in his organizations is almost unlimited. Given a problem of almost any dimensions, he will naturally turn to an organization of some type for help in solving it. Small or large, simple or complex, these organizations play a major role in the lives of our people.

In the church we have developed a number of organizations to better enable us to carry forward the Zion program. These, of course, function with varying degrees of success, depending on the training and enthusiasm of the officers and members. Some of our branches operate on a low efficiency level due to a shortage of qualified leaders on the one hand, and to a lack of dedicated members on the other. Many of us are content, apparently, to relegate our kingdom-building activities to second or third place in our lives.

Goals and Choices

Most of us live under tension. This may or may not be of our own making, but it can be serious. We drive ourselves, seemingly caught in an irresistible rush toward goals of the world's making, without a clear understanding of why we desire to achieve these goals. Some of them are undoubtedly worthwhile. Many contribute to an enrichment of our lives. I would not take issue with those who desire a full and rich life program. I would, however, suggest that each of us view our round of daily activities with a critical eye. I would urge a re-evaluation of each activity and each goal in the light of our total Zion program. It should then be seen that our choice will often have to be made between two or more good activities rather than between those which are "good" or "bad." Goodness and badness are relative terms which need to be constantly re-examined as we grow in understanding and spiritual maturity.

Perhaps Zion would be a reality today if all members of our faith had an infallible spiritual barometer to which they could look each day to determine their spiritual "weather." Or perhaps some type of thermometer would serve us better. The Laodiceans were judged to be neither hot nor cold, but lukewarm. The penalty for lukewarmness is to be cast out. Remember, we cannot serve two masters. We cannot, but many of us try.

Only One Way

Do you find it difficult trying to be "in the world but not of it"? Perhaps nothing we can say here will entirely resolve this conflict of values, but we shall attempt to offer a few positive suggestions which may serve to guide you toward your own solution. You may observe that there are many avenues toward solving some of our primary problems but only one "superhighway" leading to our actual destination.

It may be pertinent, first of all, to observe that we ought to be thankful for problems to solve. We sometimes forget the character-building value of facing up to the problems of life and matching our moral and spiritual strength against seemingly overwhelming odds. It would be a cliché, perhaps, to compare such a contest with the physical well-being which comes from the daily exercise of our muscles, but such a comparison is valid. I believe it can be successfully shown that true greatness, in every age, has come only to those who have been willing to pay the price of valiant struggle.

By some, our day is called the "phenobarbital age." We are greatly concerned about such things as peace of mind and peace of conscience. Huge quantities of tranquilizer drugs are consumed each year. We struggle all right, but our goals being what they often are we feel a sense of frustration even if we achieve the success we dreamed of. We must fight, but we must fight intelligently for worth-while goals if we are to find the kind of peace Jesus talked about.

A Job for Everyone

Our second suggestion is that we should prepare ourselves by earnest prayer and careful study for the carrying of some definite responsibility in the work of the church. There is plenty of work for all, officers and lay members alike. The pastor of the branch has been assigned the over-all task of seeing that the branch operates smoothly and efficiently. This does not mean that he should do the janitor work, teach the classes, and preach all the sermons. He should, ideally, supervise the activities of others—humbly of course. Perhaps the admonition, "Let him who is greatest among you be the servant of all," is taken too literally by many. Modern revelation offers a solution to this problem:

Behold . . . I give unto you . . . a commandment, that you assemble yourselves together, and organize yourselves, and prepare yourselves; and sanctify yourselves; yea, purify your hearts."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 20.

This admonition clearly points the way toward successful individual and branch functioning. It can be made operative through the willingness of our people to be obedient to the divine command.

Blessed Are the Doers

Somebody once said that one who "learns and learns but practices not what he knows, is one who plows and plows but never stops and sows." In this sense it is easy, and often self-satisfying, to sit in a class Sunday after Sunday, "enjoying" the thought processes of Zion-minded teachers. Our own thinking is stimulated; we are able to vision the kingdom and what it shall bring on earth. Clifford Buck, however, points out a distinct peril for us in our tendency to identify the words which describe religious experience with actually having had the experience. (Read his excellent article entitled "Some Dangers Teachers Face" in the October, 1956, Guidelines.)

Our classrooms have their place, and it is an important one. However, the laboratory in which we do our most significant learning is the laboratory of actual branch experience where we accept a task and follow it through to completion. Perhaps we should be up in front teaching our own class. Perhaps we should be singing in the choir instead of listening. Perhaps we should be visiting instead of complaining that we have not been visited.

The divine command to study to show ourselves workmen approved unto God is woven into the fabric of our spiritual lives. But we need to know how to study and how to apply the skills we acquire. We need to achieve the kind of balance in our lives which makes it possible for us to work with people. No amount of technical skill is adequate unless we are mentally and spiritually mature in our relationships with our fellow workers. And here is exactly where so many of us fail. We usually do not have such basic qualities as humility, charity, and love as inborn characteristics. These qualities must be achieved in the crucible of everyday living. They must be constantly nurtured to bear Zion fruit. Our selfish, arrogant, and often blind human nature must not be allowed to triumph.

Planned Evangelism

Our third point is of vital concern to our long-range program and objectives. If our lives are to have meaning in any real Zion sense, we need to organize them around a core of missionary effort. The dynamic impulse of our entire Restoration movement is its evangelistic outreach. In order to build up God's kingdom we must learn to share. We must feel ourselves a living part of the "spiritual protoplasm" which feeds strength and movement into the body of Christ—his church. We cannot reach this objective by withdrawing ourselves from the society of our fellow men, except perhaps for brief periods to gain strength and inspiration from a closer communion with God.

Evangelism demands that we be in the world. It demands that we rise above the banalities and spiritual immaturities which so often plague the Zion endeavor. Good evangelism requires more than mere knowledge of Restoration doctrine and goals. It requires more than sporadic efforts to "warn" our neighbors. It even requires more than living an exemplary life and hoping that others will notice and ask what we have which they do not experience in their meager religious lives.

The best we can muster is required to win others to the church. We do need to know the church, its doctrine, goals, and, above all, Jesus Christ our leader. We do need to live good lives, but we need to couple these with an aggressive, purposeful, active campaign to "tell the story." Fanaticism, lack of wisdom, and failure to live our program under stress and strain account for many of our failures. We need a positive approach which does not condemn the beliefs of others but rather uses what they have as a basis for teaching the fullness of the gospel.

Organized Disciples

Our discipleship needs organization. Too many of us are apt to find ourselves in the same condition as the legendary man who mounted his trusty steed and galloped wildly off in all directions. Few of us are equipped to do any more efficient job in several areas of church work than in several types of industrial or professional work. We should be content to become as expert as possible in some phase of our mutual effort and give ourselves completely to that task. Yet, because we must evangelize or die spiritually, in this one area we should all strive for competency. It should become as natural as breathing or smiling or grooming ourselves for our day's activities. Whatever may be our regular field of competency will be expanded and enhanced by a well-defined and properly organized evangelistic outreach.

Word of Warning

Perhaps a final word of caution should be added here. As important as organization is, there is always a danger of becoming so organization conscious that we neglect the purpose for that organization. We would not build a house without properly framing it. Neither would we leave it a mere frame without sheathing and otherwise finishing it. Once the house is built we do not see the framework, but we know it is there, fulfilling its important function. So it is with proper organization. It should be the means to a desirable end, not the end itself. It is the bone structure which makes body movement possible, to use another comparison.

Christ's church has what we may consider to be a perfect organization. The only chance for weakness lies in the members who make up the body of the church. Through proper organization and intelligent application, we minimize that weakness. Let's strengthen ourselves!

A Rock and Its Shadow

The shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

This word picture conveys the idea of shade, refreshing and welcome in a barren waste; of a place to rest during a long journey; of shelter from the elements in time of storm. Strength and peace may be brought to mind as one meditates on the ideas suggested.

Actually these few words are describing a man in Christ's kingdom as envisioned by the prophet Isaiah.

A righteous man, whose strength is in the Lord, should be a comfort and a help to others. He would bring rest or peace to the troubled and sorrowing and prove a source of courage and inspiration to many. His strength would be as a haven in times of storm and stress.

He would truly be as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

Pilot Project for the First Presidency

Introduction: The author of this report, Miss Margaret Christensen of Berkeley, California, has taken a year's leave of absence from her work as a supervisor in Alameda County, in order to attend the University of Kansas City, and to work part time for the Committee on Ministry to College People in the development of a vocational questionnaire and to actually carry out the collecting and compiling of the material necessary for the completion of this project. The Committee is deeply grateful for her contribution.

CARL MESLE, Executive Secretary

FOR SEVERAL months the Committee on Ministry to College People has been working on a pilot project for the First Presidency in an endeavor to gain some facts about the professional people of the church. It has been felt by many that there is a need for the church to know something of the skills and training of the membership. In order to determine the relative value to the church of such information, the committee is conducting a pilot project which is starting with some of the more highly trained people of the church. High priesthood members are being included in this survey which will cover approximately fifteen hundred to eighteen hundred members.

In carrying out this project many questions keep coming up in the office of the committee, such as "How many physicians and dentists are there in the church?" "Does anyone know where Dr. Lyle Hartford is practicing?" "Isn't it strange that out of about fifty lawyers on our professional list, twenty-four of them live in the Independence area?" "How many engineers belong to the church?" "Aren't there more than two optometrists in the whole of the church?" "How many members hold Ph.D. degrees, and in what fields have they specialized?" So far the committee has been able to locate thirteen architects, ten osteopaths, eight veterinarians, seven pharmacists, and two psychologists. It is felt that there must be many more in each of these fields and in other professions not mentioned here.

A vocational questionnaire has been developed which is being sent to these highly trained people. The committee is providing the necessary return envelopes and asking that the questionnaires be filled out and returned to the committee within one week from the time each individual receives his questionnaire.

The committee, under the chairmanship of Lawrence Brockway, has maintained a list of professional people as their names have come to the attention of those in charge, but the current list is far from complete, and many addresses are not up-to-date. The committee has lost track of many college students who completed their training in the past several years and are now professionally engaged. It is hoped that a fairly complete file of the more highly trained people of the church can be built up by the co-operation of the membership in providing this office with the names and addresses of these people. This will give the First Presidency an idea of the strength or weakness of the church in various skills and fields of endeavor.

There are other benefits accruing from this project. In the past the information on hand has been of assistance to the Committee on Ministry to College People in its effort to bring encouragement and direction to the increasing number of young people who are seeking higher education in a variety of fields. There have also been times when the office has been able to help those who are looking for someone with a specific kind of training.

The R.L.D.S. Bar Association, the R.L.D.S. Professional Teachers Association, and the new Medical and Dental Association which was organized last fall are co-operating with the committee in locating individuals within their own professions, but even these associations do not know all who are in their respective fields. The committee will appreciate hearing from members who will send in the names and addresses of the highly trained people in their areas.

The cost of this pilot project is divided between the General Church and the Committee on Ministry to College People, which includes Dr. Lawrence Brockway, chairman; Carl Mesle, executive secretary; Dr. Evan Shute; Dr. James Van Biber; Dr. E. J. Gleazer, Jr.; Dr. Margaret Barker; Ed Ford, and Harley Morris, all of whom are appointed by the First Presidency. Friends of the committee have also made financial contributions to carry out this project.

It is hoped that the greater portion of the work involved in this pilot project can be completed within the next couple of months, so that the results can be in the hands of the First Presidency by the end of the summer.

The Waters of Yamuna

IN the waters of Yamuna six Indians were baptized. The Yamuna flows from beyond Dehra Dun in the far-off Himalayas. The Indians are John and Zelma Gideon and four of their children. Once again, in April, the church is begun. This time in Delhi, India.

"Perhaps ours is the first family to join the church in this part of Asia," writes John Gideon, a lecturer in economics and commerce at Delhi Polytechnic Institute. "It was a wonderful experience for us and a day never-to-be-forgotten so long as we live. For the Indian Union it was a historic day. A new chapter in our lives has begun."

This joyous tone is echoed in the words of W. E. Connell who drove from Peshawar University in West Pakistan to meet the Gideons and to administer the ordinance of baptism: "Sunday was a day rich in spiritual experiences, a day we will never forget. We tried to give worship experiences that would help these people visualize what might be experienced in such services at home.

"Our first service was church school. After an opening prayer and Scripture, Sister Connell took the children and their mother into another room for class-work where she demonstrated to Sister Gideon some teaching techniques that might help her. Brother Gideon and I had our own class, discussing gospel principles. We then had a 'preaching service.' I gave a sermonette on 'The Church of Jesus Christ.' Afterward, we ate a typical Indian dinner of pillau (fried rice) and meat curry, and in the afternoon we visited.

"That evening toward sundown we drove to the River Jumna (Yamuna) and I baptized the six new members. May that number be a significant token of the future of the church in India. A short distance upstream from us were several Hindu Sadhus bathing in the river to cleanse themselves of their year's accumulation of sins.

"We returned to the house for the confirmation service. As I laid my hands on each head I felt the presence of the Spirit and sensed guidance in the words spoken.

"After the confirmation we had a Communion service followed by prayers in which Brother Gideon and little Rita participated. An oblation offering of rupees 3.75 was given, and the equivalent is being sent to the Bishop. On Monday we had our farewell visit, and I blessed the two remaining members of the family, little Samuel and Larry, who lay very quiet and solemn in my arms as I asked God's blessings on them and their parents. Sister Gideon had a nagging pain in her ear that had persisted for several weeks, and she asked for administration. When we parted she said the pain was gone. We left them with expressions of love and the hope that we may meet again soon."

THIS new chapter in church history began, in the plaintive words of Professor Gideon, seven years ago when he wrote to the First Presidency for information about the Restoration. It was a new chapter in my life when the letter was referred to me for answering. I, too, have something never-to-be-forgotten, the words of his letter, "Why India has been left out is a mystery."

From then until now letters have winged their way back and forth across the Pacific Ocean. Sometimes they flew frequently. Sometimes there were heart-breaking intervals. Always the letters were warm with affection even as they were deeply probing in matters of faith and doctrine. The sense of fraternity grew, and he became my brother John. Other names of his family and mine became familiar to each. We matched child for child at four, at five, and then John and Zelam forged ahead with six and we conceded. They named their last child, Larry, after ours.

Someday we'll bring them together. They shall be a symbol of a greater union, these two Larrys, one possessing dark, penetrating eyes, reflecting the rich philosophical heritage of the East, and the other eyes, blue, mischievous, and friendly, bespeaking the pragmatic freedom of the West.

INDIA IS no longer monsoons and maharajahs to me, nor Kali and sacred cattle. India is Janet who wants to come to Graceland, on to medical school, and then return to her people as a medical missionary. India is Zelma, mothering the first church family in the land of Krishna. India is my brother John, teacher in an ancient world that has growing pains. India is Samuel, blessed according to the ordinance of the church and impatiently waiting for the age of accountability. India is Phyllis, Joyce, and Rita, such as Jesus would cluster about him. These are India to me, and a share of my heart lives in a land I have never seen.

And these are not alone. Nearly four hundred million people swarm in India. Most of them are hungry. Their eyes are radiant and sad all at once, for hope rises above their poverty in every generation. If there is value to be found in the dream and principles of Zion, is not that dream, are not those principles valid for India as well as Independence? Surely, America is Joseph's land, but the words ring clear from the time of his fathers through that of another Joseph and thunder into our own day of fear, "In thee and in thy seed shall the nations of the earth be blessed." Is any nation to be excluded?

Some people shall go as the Connells have gone, with skill to answer far off need. Gene is assigned to Peshawar University to help set up an agricultural curriculum. Because of his nearness to Delhi, he was asked to go there to visit the Gideons.

Gene Connell could not go immediately, but his son Terry, age seventeen, went and was the first member of the church to speak face to face with the Gideons about the restored gospel. Then, as soon as they could, Gene and his wife, Ruby, drove to the capital of India from the foot of the Khyber Pass.

The foundation is being laid quietly and in the strength of a humble family of pioneers, just as the church expanded in the earliest times of Christianity. The gospel, being universal, will grow in Indian soil as well as American. From the beginning there shall be no colonialism. We hope for the fundamentals of the gospel to be applied to the specific needs and culture of India.

While Brother Gideon has expressed a desire to translate church materials into

Elder Eugene Connell baptizing Janet in the Yamuna River

Hindi, and this will be imperative so far as standard works are concerned, we are hoping that he and others will be able to author materials, applying the essentials of the gospel and flavoring those materials with the cultural heritage which is India. We shall build as we can.

Why India was left out is no mystery—really. We have been preoccupied with concerns close to home, restive under delays but perhaps ourselves the reason for them. But the Spirit moves, and we are awakening to the larger sphere of our opportunity. The locale of that opportunity is everywhere. As we have the disposition and strength to do so we must specify more and more areas of accepted responsibility.

For the present, no words express so eloquently as their own the fraternity, faith, and need of this fine family in Delhi, India, "A new chapter in our lives has begun. We need the prayers of brothers and sisters as we begin this journey. With God's help we shall march forward."

Myron F. LaPointe

IT WAS the last Sunday of camp and the last worship service. By popular request a Communion service was planned. The morning was clear and bright without a single threatening cloud in the sky. Two rows of benches and the worship setting were arranged in the grove. There were no service trays, so a wire mesh milk case was turned upside down on the Communion table and draped in white along with the other linens. The filled wine cups fit nicely in the square mesh of the bottom of the milk case. A lower and smaller table was placed in front of this arrangement to hold the worship center and the tray for the oblation. The setting was beautiful and inviting.

At ten o'clock over one hundred campers and staff members assembled in the spirit of worship and with some expectancy. The service was opened with hymns and an invocation. Some twenty young people offered their prayers, petitioning for the presence of God's Spirit.

In the words of a well-known phrase, "Brothers and sisters, let us pray." Pray for John, Zelma, and their children. Pray that in the waters of Yamuna other Indians shall be baptized.

It Happened at Camp

A small dark cloud moved overhead, and scattered drops of rain began to fall. There was no movement within the group of unrest or concern. There must have been a number of silent prayers, pleading with God that his wisdom prevail in this closing camp worship. Assurance came for the course to follow.

With a number of visiting friends attending the camp, the purpose of the Lord's Supper and close communion was carefully explained, as was the use of the oblation offering. All were invited to participate in the service of hymns, prayers, and testimonies as opportunity allowed.

When all had knelt facing the altar the blessing was asked upon the bread. A little rain continued to fall, but bench by bench, from both sides of the out-of-door chapel, the campers moved to the outside aisle coming to the front where a minister on either side served them the bread, if they were partaking. Then they left their oblation and returned to their places by way of the center aisle. There were those campers who came in the line to leave their offerings. Although they were not privileged to take of the emblems, they were worshipping.

During this time dark clouds gathered rapidly, completely covering the sky. Lightning danced across the heavens, and thunder warned of ever-increasing rain. All the campers were wet.

In one accord all knelt for the blessing of the wine. As the lines again formed for the serving of the wine the rain broke loose in all its fury. There was no seeking for shelter and no hesitancy in the oncoming campers as they came to renew their covenants. The ministers served them cup by cup. The hard driving rain splashed in the wine cups, leaving the once beautiful setting soaked and spattered and the oblation in a tray full of water.

Back to their seats went the campers, drenched and dripping but warm and happy. They had come to offer their testimonies too, and the Spirit of God was there.

As the service of testimony proceeded there was no time wasted. Sixty-six stood to their feet, member and friend, many for the first time. Some had never attended this type of meeting before. The presence of the Spirit of God increased in power.

The downpour of rain never ceased and at times came in torrents, coupled with the flashes and jagged streaks of lightning amid the rolling rumble and the explosive crash of thunder. This drew the campers together that they might hear as much as possible. The ministers moved up to stand next to the first row in order to hear and direct.

The Spirit of God was of such power that all present shed tears of joy. Member and friend alike were on their feet to praise God and dedicate themselves to his service. Then came the testimony from one least expected: "I never knew it was possible to be so close to God." One young consecrated brother was noted to be nearly overcome with joy when his older brother stood and pledged himself for the first known time. One who felt he had been a problem to camp and camper turned to the group to beg forgiveness publicly, then expressed love for all and gratefulness for the love and the presence of God. One friend said, "I want to be a member of a church like this, and I want my family to be united in it." They all are now.

Yes, God spoke to these young people, assuring them that he was God of the whole universe, creator of all. Even as these young people had withstood the storm with its thunder and lightning and torrents of rains, in this same spirit they could withstand the trials and temptations of the world and could assist in the building of the kingdom of God.

During the lunch period the clouds rolled away and the bright drying sun was there to help in the closing of camp. Over a hundred campers will bear testimony of this experience—one that will not soon be forgotten.

I Had an Experience

ON April 11, 1958, I left home to go to the hospital for surgery on my left knee. It was not a serious operation, so I expected to be back in the field within two weeks.

Everything went as planned until the day I was to leave the hospital. I began to run a high fever, alternated with chills. The doctors made every available test known to medical science but could not find the cause. For a week I grew progressively worse. My fever went to 105.3, and the doctor told my wife that if the members of my family wanted to see me alive, they should come at once. There was no assurance that the fever would not go higher on the morrow.

My wife called my family and also her brother, Dr. Sheppard, one of the finest surgeons in the Middlewest. He flew to Spokane to be with me. I told him I thought I had cancer above my stomach. He studied the X rays and called three other surgeons together; after consultation they agreed that there was a growth in that region which in all probability was cancer. They talked frankly about it to both my wife and me, trying to prepare us for the worst. I tried to plan for the future of my family, as I felt my time had come. The news of my illness was transmitted to the General Church. The First Presidency, Presiding Bishopric, Apostle Farrow, and Paul Crinzi were a tower of strength to my wife and family. Special prayer services were held in my behalf, and prayers were offered throughout the whole church.

The morning of the exploratory operation the surgeons planned to determine the type of cancer and the treatment indicated. To their amazement, they found no malignant growth but an infected gall bladder. They were as happy as we; this meant full recovery and many years of ministry. All felt that a miracle had occurred.

I knew that it was by the grace of our Lord that I was still alive—not because of my own worthiness, but because of the faith and prayers of the church and my many friends.

My wife later told me that the Portland Saints had called a prayer service in my behalf. Evangelist Mark Yeoman was in charge, and during the prayers he had a vision. He saw two angels lift me up and take me to the Master. The Savior touched me, and I was healed. I did not know anything of this experience as I was too sick to be told. However, when I heard, I verified it with an experience I had the morning of my surgery.

I had an open vision. The master came to me, took me by the hand, smiled upon me, and said, "You have

Who Owns the "San"?

A Statement of Purpose, Ownership, and Operation

AT THE TIME the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital went to the citizens of Independence to raise a fund of $300,000 for expanding its facilities, it issued a brochure entitled "Know the Facts" that contained questions and answers which would be useful to campaign workers.

One of the questions was this: "Who owns the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital?" The answer was given: "The title of the property is held by the hospital corporation. And the administration of the hospital is vested in the board of trustees. The sponsoring organization is the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints."

Since the control of the institution is in the hands of the board of trustees, the membership of the board is of interest to those who have raised the question as to the status of the Sanitarium. The board of trustees includes the members of the First Presidency, members of the Presiding Bishopric of the church, and the church physician, as follows: Israel A. Smith, chairman; F. Henry Edwards, vice-chairman; G. L. DeLapp, secretary; H. L. Livingston, treasurer; W. Wallace Smith; W. N. Johnson; Dr. Charles F. Grabske, Sr.; William H. Sermon; and William J. Randall. Seven of the nine men are church members. Mayor Sermon is an ex-officio member of the board as mayor of the city of Independence; Judge Randall is an ex-officio member as Judge of Eastern Division of the Jackson County Court.

The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital is thus operated under the direction of a controlling authority composed principally of church people. It is operated for the benefit of church people and also for the benefit of the people of Independence and adjacent areas, whatever the need may be. There are good reasons for this dual purpose, which have developed from the very beginning of its history. From the very beginning also it had the purpose of providing both medical service and an atmosphere of good spiritual influence.

An editorial in the Herald for June 1, 1904, not signed (but the language would suggest that it could have been by President Joseph Smith—the senior editor; Israel A. Smith and Frederick M. Smith were also editors then) indicated the character of institution that was wanted:

The church should have an infirmary or sanitarium located in some healthy site, where our people who are ill with chronic ailments, or who may be in need of hospital treatment and who have not the personal means to pay for attention and care necessary to their situation, could be looked after and receive the treatment which the church believes in, administration, careful nursing, as provide for in the law, together with such surgical treatment as the absolute necessities of cases might demand.

Medical care and spiritual influence, indicated in the editorial, were also indicated in the revelation in April, 1906. Joseph Luff was named as director because he was trained as a medical doctor, and he was to serve both "in his spiritual office and his calling as a physician" (Doctrine and Covenants 127: 2 c).

The Sanitarium was planned primarily for the needs of church people, but no civilized or Christian people, establishing a hospital, would deny its facilities and benefits to others in need.

It was opened on December 15, 1909. On December 20 a man was badly injured on the railroad in the city, and was brought to the Sanitarium for the amputation of his leg. Planned as a hospital as well as a recuperation institution, it was ready to serve. Thus also began its service to the community, for it was very much needed. It has been conducted in both medical and spiritual capacities ever since.

In 1930, the new building was begun, but the great depression dried up funds, and the shell of the building stood idle for ten years. In 1941, negotiations carried on with the Federal Works Agency of the U. S. Government brought a grant of $288,000 to finance completion of the structure so it could be put into service.

Through the years since then, Hill-Burton funds, Ford Foundation grants, and many other contributions have helped to expand the hospital so that it could meet both church and community needs. If another hospital had been established here, the Sanitarium could not have received the funds that made possible its splendid development. It was necessary to serve the community as well as the church.

Serving the community as well as the Saints through the medical and spiritual ministry of the Sanitarium is one of the finest things the church has done. Great good has come of it. The Independence Sanitarium and Hospital is still, as in the beginning, a church institution; it is also an institution of service and benefit to the community, a friendly and helpful link with the greater society.

I Rejoice in His Service

I WOULDN'T WANT you to feel that I am bragging or being untruthful when I say that I rejoice in His service. Many happy experiences have been mine in His service. I don't know of anything that brings more joy or deeper satisfaction than service rendered for the work of the Master, especially when one serves with a willing heart and mind. We have been told, "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God." There is no greater service, to my knowledge, than assisting in this Restoration movement called in the Doctrine and Covenants "a great and marvelous work." We should be the happiest people in all the world, as we are joint heirs with Christ in this marvelous work. We should rejoice and call it a privilege to serve. Work becomes play when our hearts and souls are in it.

There is a little poem entitled "Service" by Merlin Miller that expresses my thoughts:

I belong to my church
For but one reason—
 To serve;
To seek to build
The kingdom of God
And establish his righteousness.
And for myself I seek nothing
Save the accomplishment
Of this end.
And though I have faith
In his promises,
No dreams of celestial glory
Lead me on.
And though my reward
Be pain and disappointment,
Yet my desire shall be
 To serve.

—Saints' Herald, July 24, 1948

I had an experience a few weeks ago that brought joy to my soul. For the past few years, since my mother passed away, my father has been making his home with us children much of the time. I don't know how many of you have ever had the privilege of caring for an elderly person in your home. I have had this opportunity several times. Of course there are some adjustments to be made. My father is eighty-three, and he is hard of hearing, but he doesn't like to wear his hearing aid. He finds it hard to sit very long, so he doesn't care to sit through two or three services at church. I usually go to church school and stay until about ten thirty, then I leave class and go home after my father and take him to the eleven o'clock service. This particular morning we were having a very interesting discussion in our class, so when time came for me to leave I was rather reluctant to go. As I was driving home I was thinking about the class discussion and feeling rather sorry for myself, when all of a sudden the words of a hymn came to me, "Gladly will I toil and suffer, only let me walk with Thee." My heart lifted, and I rejoiced. I needed this sip of water from the well that never runs dry.

Rejoicing comes from the heart. We think with our minds, but the heart is the symbol of emotions. It beats high with emotion. It is sick with sorrow. Sometimes fear grips the heart, and it is hard to rejoice and to serve. Fear weakens the body and destroys the soul. A few Sundays ago there was an article on the back of our church bulletin entitled "Fear Not," telling us that fear is more damaging to man than any other one thing. It breaks a man's spirit and keeps him from discharging his responsibilities. Fear can be banished by the pure love of God. In Luke 12:35 we are told, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

THERE ARE A FEW Scriptures I would like to refer to on rejoicing and service:

Ye shall rejoice in all that ye put your hand unto, ye and your households, wherein the Lord thy God hath blessed thee.—Deuteronomy 12: 7.

Thou shalt rejoice in every good thing which the Lord thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thine house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you.—Deuteronomy 26: 11.

Serve the Lord with gladness; come before his presence with singing.—Psalm 100: 2.

Men are, that they might have joy.—II Nephi 1: 115.

The Lord, speaking to Emma Smith, said: "Thou shalt lay aside the things of this world, and seek for the things of a better. And it shall be given thee, also, to make a selection of sacred hymns, as it shall be given thee, which is pleasing unto me, to be had in my church; for my soul delighteth in in the song of the heart; yea, the song of the righteous is a prayer unto me. . . . Lift up thy heart and rejoice, and cleave unto the covenants which thou has made" (Doctrine and Covenants 24: 3).

All of us are called to serve. All who have received his gospel and have made their covenant with him in the waters of baptism are called the sons and daughters of his kingdom. We all have a part in his work. "God has no hands but our hands to do his work today. He has no feet but our feet to lead men in his way." We should be ready and willing to serve whenever and wherever we can. It may not be "on the mountains high or over the stormy sea," but I am sure he has need of you and me. There are many avenues in which we can serve.

AS DAUGHTERS of latter-day Israel, we know our first service is to our homes and families, then to the church. We have been given the special task of directing and developing Zion's homes. We certainly need the help of the church in this task. It takes both the husband and wife to build Zion's homes. It has been said that the husband is the head of the house; the wife is the head of the home. It is a full-time job to build Zion's homes. How can it be accomplished with so many of our women working away from their homes? How about the family worship and telling the angel's message to our children? We were warned several years ago about the importance of saving our natural increase to the church. We read and hear about juvenile delinquency. Dare I say there might be delinquent parents who are to blame for juvenile delinquency? It certainly behooves all of us to be about our Father's business. After the terrible experience we had here in Lincoln recently when two teen-agers were responsible for the murdering of eleven people, we should all awaken to our responsibilities. Do we need Zion homes? Yes, the whole world needs them.

A few weeks ago I heard Eleanor Roosevelt speak to a group of students at the university. She had just returned from Russia and was telling about her trip. I was especially interested in what she had to say about the women in Russia. She said that the United States was a showcase to the rest of the world; that our country was a beacon light to the world; that things are by compulsion in Russia; that the whole purpose of Soviet Russia is to catch up with the United States in production. They say, "give us fifteen years and we will catch up." They think they can help this by having healthy children. Over in Russia a woman may leave her place of employment a certain time before her child is to be born; the company or the country will pay her wages up to and through the birth of her child and for fifty-seven days after its birth. Then the baby is put in a nursery where it is cared for and trained, and the mother goes back to work. Mrs. Roosevelt told about seeing babies only six months old doing exercises. They knew exactly what to do, and the number of times they were to do exercises. She said the children were certainly disciplined. Looking at them, one would think they were on a production line. She told how clean the cities were and about the women washing the streets. She said one never saw a piece of paper blowing about nor a cigarette stub anywhere.

Certainly such regimentation and state control is far from the Zion plan of living, but on every hand we see that a certain amount of discipline and authority is necessary in the home.

THERE ARE A FEW points I would like to mention that I think are essential in helping to build Zion homes or in performing any kind of service.

1. Prayer. "But behold I say unto you, that ye must pray always, and not faint: that ye must not perform anything unto the Lord, save in the first place ye shall pray unto the Father in the name of Christ, that he will consecrate thy performance unto thee, that thy performance may be for the welfare of thy soul."—II Nephi 14: 12.

2. Study. "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."—II Timothy 2: 15.

Knowledge is only a tool for service. Sister Bath has stated that service is friendship in action. We have many opportunities to gain knowledge. Many of us have been admonished to study. I was told in my patriarchal blessing to study all good books that came into my possession, and to treasure up in my mind those precious truths that I found in them, as the Savior would ask me to use that knowledge to the honor and glory of God and for the advancement of this precious angel message, the gospel.

3. Planning and organization. In our women's work as a department we meet with committees and plan our work for the year, make yearbooks, plan programs, and so on. Then we try to follow the plan or the work plan. Sometimes we have to make changes, but it helps to have a program and to have things planned ahead and organized. The same thing is true with our work at home. We need to plan and organize it. Any work or service we accept needs some planning and organizing, whether it be teaching a class, singing, doing cradle roll work, or friendly visiting.

4. Right Attitudes. We should be glad and accept willingly when we are asked to serve, if it is at all possible. Of course I realize there are times when one can't and will need to be excused. We sing, "take the task he gives you gladly; let his work your pleasure be. Answer gladly when he calleth, here am I, O Lord, send me."

Sing the songs of Zion as you go about your work. Yes, and whistle sometimes if you care to and if you can.

5. Enthusiasm. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Enthusiasm is like measles. It's catching. No matter what the task may be we should approach it with as much interest as we can and feel that it is very important. I believe Jesus was enthusiastic about his mission in life. He loved people and was deeply interested in their welfare.

I think a little praise or appreciation offered at the right time helps to bring about rejoicing and gladness to serving. It is like adding a bit of seasoning to a well-cooked meal. It makes the person feel as though she would like to serve again.

Little Nancy Hunt, who enjoys coming to our house, was so enthusiastic about her school she said, "I like school. It's my favorite subject."

Let us rejoice in his service and make it our favorite subject.

Parental Wisdom

THE YOUNG MOTHER of three teen-agers often found herself without an answer to the actions of one or the other of her young hopefuls. It caused her worry, although her anxieties did not help much. Then, one day, she placed this maxim under a mirror she had hanging on the wall: "God grant me the serenity to accept things I cannot change, courage to change things I can, and wisdom to know the difference."

She found it helped her to reach out for this serenity when she was faced with a baffling problem. If the problem was something she must accept, it did not help to waste her voice in expostulating, but if it was something she could solve, she prayed for courage to know the best way to approach the trouble. First she must know whether her interference would help. She must have wisdom, which is the first named of the gifts of the spirit by the Apostle Paul in I Corinthians. After that she needed courage, for the wisdom of parents is often questioned by teen-agers, no matter how hard those parents try to work for their children's good.

Serenity is just another word for patience, and she found by holding tenaciously to the principles she deemed were for the good of these young people, they made the grade. She did not feel like a nagging mother who acted before she weighed a matter, but rather, after taking careful thought, she did the best she could to give them the help they needed.

Ends Career as Teacher

EVANGELIST BEN H. HEWITT of Toronto, Canada, will end forty-three years of teaching in June. His accomplishments were recently recognized in a Toronto Daily Star feature article.

During his last four years of teaching, Brother Hewitt has headed the department of secretarial studies at Northern Technical-Commercial school in Toronto. He has taught at Northern for twenty-eight years. He is the co-author of several textbooks in typing, shorthand, spelling, and office practice.

To stimulate interest and proficiency in secretarial subjects, Brother Hewitt organized annual contests in typing, shorthand, spelling, and mental arithmetic. The Toronto and District Business Education association sponsored the contests.

Brother Hewitt also organized the Ontario Commercial Teachers' Association typing contest. The contest has been held for the past twelve years at the annual convention of the Ontario Educational Association.

Students of Brother Hewitt won four of the five cups awarded in the last provincial contest.

One of Mr. Hewitt's proudest moments came shortly before World War II when a student of his won a diamond-studded gold medal as shorthand champion of the British Commonwealth. The student set an all-time record for secondary schools by taking shorthand at the rate of two hundred words per minute.

Brother Hewitt is a graduate of the University of Toronto and is now working on a thesis toward his doctorate. He has been president of the East Kent Teachers' Association, the Toronto district of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, the Toronto Teachers' Council, the Toronto and District Business Education Association, and the Ontario Commercial Teachers' Association. He served several terms as secretary of the latter and was editor of its yearbook.

He was pastor of the Humber Bay Branch for four years and of the Toronto Branch for a similar period. Earlier he was superintendent of the Toronto church school for nearly twenty-five years.

Catholics and Protestants on

The Mission of Christian Colleges

THE COMMISSION on Christian Higher Education of the Association of American Colleges, Washington, D. C., has sponsored meetings during which representatives of the Commission on Higher Education of the National Council of Churches, from the University Department of the National Catholic Educational Association and from the Association of American Colleges formulated a statement, reproduced in full below. Those who met recognized differences as well as similarities in their institutions and programs but were able to agree on a preliminary statement which sets forth a broad area of common purposes. The statement does not purport to be a declaration of the complete goals and objectives of either group. It is not intended to be in any way binding on the constituencies of either of the bodies. It is rather a setting forth of some of the minimum goals and purposes that these educators believe are common to both the Roman Catholic and Protestant institutions of higher education, and for the achievement of which both groups can work together. The text follows.

The Christian churches, from the formation of our republic, have been deeply involved in education. These churches actually established our earliest colleges and set the pattern for much of our system of higher education. Through their educational programs they have continued to develop and safeguard the religious faith and democratic idealism of our country.

Undue emphasis on the material elements of twentieth-century education has led to a neglect of and a disregard for the values of religion and religious thinking in our culture. In the complexities and pressures of contemporary life, the true meaning of life and a sense of responsibility are being obscured or lost in confusion. There is a critical need of an expansion of higher education that gives wisdom as well as knowledge. If our spiritual heritage in education is to be perpetuated, Christian higher education must be emphatically re-emphasized, and all persons concerned with our country's welfare must give it high priority.

As Christians we share with all educators commitment to the generally accepted basic principles of higher education, such as the primacy of truth, honesty in the search for truth, integrity in the teaching of truth, respect for persons in the dissemination of truth, excellence in teaching and scholarship, and the acceptance of social responsibility.

All philosophies of education must rest upon certain presuppositions of faith which ultimately determine the nature of education. It is our conviction that knowledge of reality and of the meaning of life is adequate and complete only in the light of the revelation of Jesus Christ by which, consistent with our Christian traditions, all our teaching must be judged.

Some of the most significant and important aspects of higher education can in the long view be maintained only through this kind of education. In Christian higher education spiritual values are made real; and mundane activities become endowed with spiritual significance. All knowledge of the sciences and all enjoyment of the arts are God's gifts to man so that he may have the abundant life of those created in the image of God.

We believe that under God man is free and responsible; that because of the fact of human sin, man's mind and will must be set free if he is to know aright, live in love and be in true accord with God and his fellow men.

The Christian college is a community of teachers and students seeking to know the nature of the universe created by God and the kind of society in which man can live according to God's will. Education in this context enables the student to learn and grow within the framework of a meaning and purpose that unifies and orders his knowledge, illumines his appreciation, and gives direction to his existence. The Christian college offers to our generation an interpretation of the whole of knowledge, a way of life and of learning, and a sense of earthly vocation and eternal purpose, without which sciences and arts, inventions and technology may enslave and destroy mankind.

This Christian conviction of the unity of truth, of the love of God, and of man's nature as a child of God is the surest safeguard of freedom, high ethical and moral standards, and social responsibility. Further, we affirm that this commitment to the freedom of our colleges and universities under God is the ultimate safeguard of these institutions against domination by the state or by other forces within our culture.

For these reasons church-related colleges—upon which this Christian higher education depends—must be maintained at all costs.

Initiative Brings Progress

A TEACHER often advised his pupils to cultivate some "get up and go." "These are the individuals who accomplish something," he would say. "These are the ones people can depend on, who dream big dreams and then make them come true."

Perhaps this teacher had the right formula for Zion builders. If we are going to redeem God's kingdom, we must have some "get up and go." Maybe that's what the Lord had in mind when he said,

Men should be anxiously engaged in a good cause, and do many things of their own free will, and bring to pass much righteousness; for the power is in them, wherein they are agents unto themselves. And inasmuch as men do good, they shall in nowise lose their reward. But he that doeth not anything until he is commanded, and receiveth a commandment with doubtful heart, and keepeth it with slothfulness, the same is damned.

Yes, God wants people to work willingly with him—not people who always have to be pushed and coaxed. That's why members of Christ's church should resolve to have some "get up and go" and assume the responsibility of redeeming Zion. Their efforts would not be vain, and the kingdom would not be long in materializing.

A Four-point Program to Reduce Traffic Deaths

Connecticut Governor Abraham A. Ribicoff has called upon citizens to adopt a four-point program to reduce the annual traffic toll on our nation's highways. One of the nation's leading exponents of traffic safety, Governor Ribicoff put forth his program in the Travelers Insurance Companies annual highway safety booklet, The Road Toll.

"First," said Governor Ribicoff, "individually or through your citizens' organizations, make known to your legislators your determination to see a strong highway safety program enacted in your state. Demand the formation of a working safety committee which will survey needs, recommend improvements in regulations, and focus public attention on the urgency of the problem.

"Second, insist on a program of safety education which begins in the grade schools and continues through a mandatory program of driver training before young people can be licensed to drive.

"Third, express your support of and willingness to abide by a program of motor vehicle law enforcement without 'fix' or 'favor.'

"Fourth, develop within yourself the habits of care, caution, and courtesy behind the wheel."

Underlining the need for this program, The Road Toll shows that highway accident casualties reached a new high in 1957—38,700 killed and 2,525,000 injured. A decrease of 3 per cent in the number of fatalities was more than offset by a 6.6 per cent increase in the number of injuries.

Elsewhere in his message, Governor Ribicoff urged the people to make it their responsibility "to elect officials who will make the road toll a primary target for improvement."

"What makes the tragic killing and maiming on our highways even more tragic is that it is needless and senseless," said the governor. "There is ample evidence that the tremendous cost in lives and wealth can be reduced. In that evidence is a challenge that is a reproach to our society unless we meet it boldly."

Smoke Victims

A recent news dispatch told of a girl's being taken from a burning building. Doctors later discovered she was suffering from "smoke poisoning."

People who are enslaved to the cigarette habit are victims of another type. They, too, suffer from smoke poisoning. This type of poisoning may cause lung cancer and a number of other serious ailments.

Question Time

Question

Please discuss original sin and its essential part in God's plan for the salvation of the human race.

Missouri

Mrs. E. P.

Answer

We will consider this question in its order and first of all discuss original sin.

The original sin is still that which plagues us. That which took place in the lives of Adam and Eve still lives within the hearts of sinful men. A thoughtful analysis of that sin reveals that the partaking of the forbidden fruit was not the first sin but rather a manifestation of the sin that had already ruled their lives. In the same way the sinful acts we commit are but manifestations of the self-centeredness that rules us.

In the beginning of man's relationship with God, man was God-centered. When God commanded, concerning the "fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden," "Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die,"¹ Adam and Eve apparently did not think to question this command. At that time their lives were only concerned with His wishes and commands. However, Satan came to tempt them. A careful reading of the Scriptures² shows that the real temptation to eat the forbidden fruit was not because it tasted good, but rather that "ye shall become as gods, knowing good and evil."

When Eve saw that it was "a tree to be desired to make one wise," the temptation for self-exaltation was too much for her; it overruled her desire to exalt God in her life by being obedient to Him. In this way God was moved from the center of her life and self took over. This was her sin, the original sin. This is the same sin which, as a way of life, causes man to commit sinful acts today. The essential reason for our disobedience is found in the fact of our rebellion. We would rather do what we want to do than to do what God would have us do.

The second part of the question asks us to discuss the essential part original sin occupies in God's plan for the salvation of the human race. This seems to presume that God planned for man to sin, and that without man's yielding to original sin there could have been no salvation. If this assumption is intended, I believe it to be a false one.

The generally accepted definition of salvation as known in our modern Christian world is stated by Webster as follows: "salvation . . . The saving of man from the spiritual consequences of sin; especially, deliverance from sin and eternal damnation through the atonement of Christ; redemption."³ Salvation as such was not necessary until man sinned, fell from the presence of God, and was lost.

The Restoration conception of salvation does expand our understanding of God and his purpose. To us salvation is not just being saved from sin but being saved to the perfection that will permit us to dwell intelligently and worthily in the presence of God. When Adam and Eve were placed in the Garden of Eden, they were in the state of innocence and as such could abide the presence of God. However, they were not perfect, for their agency was still untested. The perfection God desires of man is not the state of being sinless because it is impossible to be otherwise. God wants man to be sinless because man intelligently chooses to be that way.

Apostle Charles R. Hield has said on many occasions, "There will be no sin in heaven, not because man cannot sin but because he will be too intelligent to sin—he will know the stupidity of sinning!" Thus, when Adam and Eve were placed in the Garden of Eden they did not need to be saved from sin. They did need to be saved to perfection. It is my firm belief that if they had used their agency to follow God from the beginning, this perfection could have been achieved without man's becoming a sinner. To believe otherwise is to make God an unjust heavenly Father, one who would punish man for doing the very thing that he (God) had planned for him to do.

Although it was not necessary for man to sin, God had planned ahead and was ready for the possibility of man's fall. Alma (19: 81 ff.) explains that when man sinned (rebelled against God) he was driven from the Garden of Eden lest he should also partake of the tree of life and live forever in this sinful condition, "having no space for repentance." This would have been a state of eternal imperfection and, according to Alma, would have frustrated the great plan of God to save man to perfection. It was at this point that the plan of redemption, which could be brought about only on conditions of repentance of men in this probationary state, was placed in effect.

Although it was essential that man be given opportunity to sin, for without this he would have had no agency, it was not essential that he actually sin. Thus, the original sin was not an essential part of God's plan for the salvation of the human race.

Bishop Adams to Retire

BISHOP William R. Adams of Logan, Iowa, is retiring as bishop's agent of the Northwest Iowa District and also from his post as Harrison County drainage clerk. Brother Adams has been serving as a bishop for thirty years and has been in the service of Harrison County, Iowa, for forty-four years.

A local newspaper recently reported a Kiwanis Club dinner honoring Brother Adams and another long-time county officer. The article noted that he has been asked by the board of supervisors to make up a new auditor's land plat book after his retirement.

In 1933 Bishop Adams was instrumental in interesting Harrison County farmers in organizing a co-operative creamery which has since developed into one of the largest in western Iowa. He has also served on the city council and board of education.

Brother Adams was ordained a priest in 1904 and an elder in 1906. He served as pastor of the Logan Branch for twenty years. He was ordained a bishop by Presidents F. M. Smith and F. M. McDowell in 1928.

"Under these various callings I feel very humble; they have been the greatest challenge in my life," Bishop Adams said. "I deem a call to the priesthood of this church the greatest honor that can come to an individual."

Book Review

The Art of Dating

By Evelyn Duvall and Joy Duvall Johnson

Association Press

$2.50

This book is, in the words of the authors, "written for young people—belongs to young people—has come from young people." It is addressed to them and "to adults who care about them."

Its modest purpose is to serve as a guide "for the serious thinking and serious daydreaming that every boy and every girl does about dating and love and sex and marriage."

Just recently off the press, this little volume has already received a clearly deserved recognition as "The Blue Book of Dating." It begins where most treatises on this subject end; that is, with the most frequently asked questions on the part of the teen-agers: (1) "How do you get a date?" (2) "What do you do with a date when you get one?"

The authors have collected, analyzed, and sifted seventeen thousand questions about dating and boy-girl relationships. These questions represent young people of both sexes, those in high school and college, those in town and country, those in church and nonchurch groups, those in the north, south, east, and west.

Here are just a few of the questions: How do you get a date? How do you refuse an invitation to date? How much should parents have to say about whom you date, where you go, when you get in? What about kissing, necking, petting, and other intimacies? How can one say "No" in the best way? What is right or wrong about going steady? How do you know when you are really in love? These and hundreds of other equally significant questions are considered.

I have devoted most of the years of my ministry to and among the young people of the church—on college campuses, among organized church groups, at youth conferences and camps. I, too, have collected thousands of the questions frequently raised by young people.

It is significant, therefore, that a large majority of these questions are identical with those listed and discussed in The Art of Dating. Because of this and because the answers provided in this book are so thoroughly Christian, so clearly and frankly stated, and so obviously motivated by a genuine understanding and affection for young people, I cannot recommend this volume too highly to our own young people and to all the adults of the church who should care.

been redeemed from your sins. Come, you are a chosen servant unto me." He took me to sit among a number of disciples, none of whom I recognized, and began to teach us. The vision disappeared, and I heard the intern say, "I see you are awake."

I then remembered a prophecy that Apostle Oakman gave at the Detroit Lakes reunion some years ago. The Lord said there were some illnesses that could be cured only through the faith and prayers of the members of his church. The power to heal was not strong enough in the individual, but the time would come, when the members were united in faith and prayer for each other, that even the worst illness and disease would be rebuked.

I knew that was what happened in my case. It was by the prayers and faith of the church that the Master extended his hand and removed the cancer.

The church has always meant much to me, but now I see it as larger, more beautiful, more precious. I love it as I never loved it before. I owe to it my devotion, my all. My only desire is that I may serve it with dignity and humility.

This is my testimony to the church. My prayer is for God's grace to attend every member of his great church.

Tribute to Members in Anchorage

I have come back from spending a year in Alaska with fellow Saints, and I feel it would be interesting and inspirational to bring to the attention of members here in the States the tremendous efforts these people put forth in carrying on the Lord's work there in that great northland.

Alaska is fast becoming a modern country, but it still has its rugged rural life and severe winters which present a problem to most people there. During the winter the roads are sometimes impassable, and when the snow is very deep many people have to be dug out in order to continue their daily duties. Our Saints are some of the most determined people in this respect, and none of these inconveniences have weakened their love for Alaska.

In Anchorage, for instance, these people, with the help of the Lord, have overcome the hardships to become a strong, thriving branch. They have an average winter attendance that is quite high every Sunday, and some of these people must travel far to attend these services. In summer the average is much larger. They started with meager means and such a small group of Saints that they met in a member's home. Then finally, after drawing out more and more members, they became large enough to build their own church, a place I have grown to love and shall never forget.

The members are well known and respected in the city of Anchorage and for good reason, too. They are teachers in the city schools; members active in radio and television; leaders in youth movements; and various community helpers.

These people are a shining example of what can be accomplished through love, faith, and fellowship.

Finding the Church

In January, 1956, I first came into contact with the Reorganized Church. I met a girl whose father is an elder in the church. One night when I went to visit her, her parents began talking about the Restoration. At first I was very opposed to the church, and I began to study to prove it wrong. I did agree to attend services with them, and I was favorably impressed. As Joseph Smith had done 130 years before, I took the advice of James (1: 5) and prayed for enlightenment. Within a week I was convinced I had found the true church and asked for baptism.

The following summer I attended reunion with the family that had introduced me to the church. Soon after that I became very ill, but I asked for administration and received relief. I feel that it is only through God's goodness that I am well today.

I ask an interest in the prayers of the Saints that I may be able to withstand the temptations of life and live as I knew the Lord would have me do.

News from England

EDITOR'S NOTE: Bishop M. H. Siegfried has shared with us a personal letter from a busy pastor at Gloucester, England. From it we are quoting:

I must tell you of my Christmas morning run. With Jim we went to a place called Witcombe about nine miles from home and visited two sisters. They are the oldest members of our branch. One is ninety-one years, the younger is eighty-one years. The older of the two always plays the piano for me—old Latter Day Saint hymns from the Saint's Harp from memory. I think she is remarkable. They were pleased to see us, and what joy it gives when we do a ministry of that nature!

Every Whitsuntide Sunday we have a rally day. The Gloucester Branch and the Saints in Wales hire a coach and come to visit us. Then we go down the following year. It is a distance of one hundred and twenty miles. We are thinking this year of going to Broadwell in the Forest of Dean. We have nine Saints living there, and the prospects for more are good. Only this last Sunday I spoke at a Men and Lad's Union of nonsectarian body. My subject was "Meaning and Purpose of the Gospel." I had a good hearing and am asked to come again. President Tom Worth has also spoken there. He says it is a fine opening. If we fix the Rally Day for Broadwell I think good can come of it.

Grateful for "Herald"

I want to thank all the contributors to our Herald. I receive it joyfully each week. Since I am unable to get about much and cannot attend services regularly, I read and reread it. I have been a member for nearly forty years and am still trying to serve the Master.

I was happy to read the article by Eli Bronson. It was he who brought the gospel message to the little town of Fairview, Montana. We heard some of the first sermons he preached, and they were wonderful. Before a year passed he baptized us. I well remember the words of part of my confirmation: "You'll find it hard to tell the gospel story or to express yourself in public, so live what you believe, and in that way you can witness to those around you." I am trying to be an example worthy of imitation. Remember me in your prayers.

Funeral services were conducted in Oregon City by Elders Robert Livingston and Reuben Porter and at the graveside in Mountain View cemetery by Elder Reuben Porter.

EMERICK.—George Edward, son of David and Elizabeth Emerick, was born February 5, 1882, in Lancaster County, Nebraska, and died May 24 in Tilden hospital. He came to Antelope County with his parents and lived in the Grecian Bend community almost his entire life until he retired and moved to Neligh.

On December 25, 1905, he was married to Bird Hickman. They observed their golden wedding anniversary in December, 1955, in Neligh. He was a member of the Reorganized Church and IOOF Lodge.

Two daughters, Evelyn Alice and Olive Rae Pick, preceded him in death, as did his wife, a brother, Dave, and a sister, Alice. He is survived by one daughter, Mrs. Vivien A. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Questions, even good ones, come in the dime-a-dozen class. It is the answers that are costly, painful, long-delayed, and difficult.

Scientists, in their early years, have encountered questions, and they are fortunate if, at the end of their careers, they have found the answers they want. So often the answers merely turn up other and more profound questions.

Many questions come to church headquarters. People want to know this and that. They do not realize the time and toil, or the cost involved, to answer their questions. If an itemized bill were rendered with each answer, some questioners would be astonished.

For example, a recent question sent in by a member cost the church fifteen dollars worth of time on the part of a staff member to produce an answer. This did not include overhead. Some cost more, some less, depending on the amount of research and effort involved.

Honest questions, asked in a genuine desire and need for information, are usually practical and can be answered quickly. They are welcomed. There is a feeling of gratitude for such questioners. . . Other questions, regrettably, are planned as thorns in the flesh.

They are asked in the spirit of the scribes and Pharisees who tried to trap Jesus in technicalities. The answers may require much research and careful consideration, and when they are sent it is doubtful if they do much good. One wonders if it is worth the cost to answer some of the trivial, pointless questions.

Yet questions are important. Patient study and careful consideration must go into the answers. Human dignity has certain inalienable rights, and people's questions bear upon those rights.

The person who asks somebody else to answer his question gets a minimum benefit from the answer. He who seeks to find his own answers is the one who grows and develops.

To Have and to Hold

We'd Like You To Know . . .

J. Floyd Mengel

I BELIEVE the responsibility for carrying out the objectives of the church should not rest primarily on the full-time appointees but upon everyone capable of shouldering part of the load. All of us should have a high sense of calling to serve as ambassadors for God's church and kingdom. This concept, to be effective, must become a way of life and be lived seven days a week."

That is the philosophy of J. Floyd Mengel, a member of the Center Stake High Council.

He adds: "It seems to me that in the larger sense, service to God's kingdom includes being a wise parent, a considerate, helpful neighbor, and a person of good will, understanding, and tolerance in all the associations and contacts of day-by-day living."

Brother Mengel works as head of the Foster Home Department of the Jackson County Juvenile Court. In that position he finds many opportunities to live his philosophy.

He attended Graceland College and Kansas City University where he was graduated in 1949. He received his Master's degree in social work from the University of Kansas in 1957. Before accepting his present position he worked in civil service and with the State Department of Welfare.

Brother Mengel was married to Beatrice Butterworth in 1946. They have three sons: Elliot, nine; Phillip, seven; and Leslie, two. Their home is in Independence.

He is a member of the National Probation and Parole Association, American Association of Social Workers, and the Missouri Association of Social Workers.

He was ordained a high priest in 1956.

Colleges and Cities Having Church Opportunities for Students Are Listed

A NEW CAMPUS DIRECTORY is now being sent to pastors, district presidents, youth leaders, and college students.

The directory lists colleges and communities which offer church opportunities. The booklet was prepared by the Committee on Ministry to College People and is available on request to any person wishing to receive a copy.

The forty-eight-page directory contains two listings. The first listing shows colleges in the United States and Canada have more than five church members enrolled as students. Fifty-three colleges are listed in this section.

The second section shows colleges in towns having local church congregations or student groups. This section lists 559 colleges in 257 cities.

Each entry in the directory indicates the agency accrediting the college, the degrees granted, the source of support and control of the school, and the type of program offered.

Carl Mesle, executive secretary of the Committee on Ministry to College People, said the new directory is to help students not attending Graceland to find a college where they may have church privileges and associations.

Brother Mesle pointed out that the committee now has more than 1300 college students listed who are attending colleges other than Graceland or the "San" School of Nursing.

He suggested that students who would like to have free copies of the directory write to Committee on Ministry to College People, Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

Another valuable help to college students will be published soon, probably in the fall. It will be a campus leaders' handbook. The handbook is now in the experimental draft stage and is being read by several campus leaders.

New Campus Directory Out

The handbook will be to help the twenty Liahona Fellowships and others who wish to organize in planning, organization, and activities. It will be a "how-to-do-it" book using examples of how successful groups have operated in the past.

Congregational Participation in Church Services

A HERALD READER recently commented in a letter: "I think that too many people leave our church services without actually being conscious of having worshiped God. I think that more active congregational participation should be provided for. . . . It would seem to me that the sermon message should be only a part and not the main feature of a worship service."

This concern for more congregational participation has been voiced before by a number of people. And most pastors are aware of the desire. But they are also concerned with how to accomplish this without moving into a set ritual of congregational prayers and readings. Of course, you may say that most of our services already have a ritualistic form: call to worship, hymn, prayer, response, special music, Scripture reading, offertory, sermon, hymn, benediction, and response. But within this framework the variety of music and spoken word is not predictable—mostly subject to participants as they may be led by the Spirit.

Probably the number of people who in an audible voice question the order of services in a congregation are relatively few (this, undoubtedly, to our detriment). My experience has been that amazingly few members give it much thought. And most people resist change—whether it be for better or worse; they seem to dislike the insertion of any variety in a service. They feel that variety makes them aware of the mechanics of the service and decreases their ability to concentrate on spiritual things. They feel insecure.

Of course, once a new procedure is determined and stabilized, people fall in the "groove" again and develop a pattern of response to the service. It "feels good" again.

If you were a pastor and had the task of establishing an order of worship for your congregation, what would you include? Would you provide for a variety of services? How would your Sunday evening services differ from those on Sunday morning—or would they? And how formal or informal would you make them?

THE Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches use formal liturgies to dramatize the life of Christ—to recall to the worshiper the importance of Christ in his life. The Roman church especially emphasizes the sacrifice on the cross, and builds every major service around the re-enactment of the Lord's Supper.

The extreme revolt against the formal, planned Mass is found in the Society of Friends—the Quakers. They stress an informal spiritual worship, where the worshipers wait for the Holy Spirit to direct all that shall occur in a service. In a Quaker service, people speak only when they believe the Spirit directs them. A Quaker service may continue for an hour without any audible sound, and the members may go home without anything else happening.

In between these two extremes lie most of the present Christian churches, including our own. Along with many others, we place great emphasis on preaching (with full scriptural support of the Apostle Paul in his comment on the importance of the "foolishness of preaching"). One of our Sunday services each month is devoted to the re-enactment of the Lord's Supper, but in the other seven services usually held on Sunday for worship most of the time is utilized in preaching services.

Out of this situation comes one possible question: How much of each of these seven preaching services shall be devoted to preaching? And two schools of thought emerge with answers: (1) Some feel the preacher should have a full forty-five minutes or more for his sermon; (2) others think he should be limited to 25 to 30 minutes with more time for congregational participation. Personally, I think more congregational participation is needed, and this brings us back to paragraph two of this editorial: how to bring about more of this wanted participation.

IT takes a skillful pastor to steer a path toward congregational participation without bumping into more formal ritual. Responsive readings can sound very artificial and formal; so can other group readings and printed prayers. But that is not to say that they can't be effective if used under trained leadership and in a variety of ways and at differing times in the service. A single testimony from a member in the congregation, if well delivered, may also prove to be a spiritual stimulation.

Official

Report of Special Council

A special council of the chief presiding officers of the church met at the Auditorium at the call of the First Presidency on Wednesday, June 17. There were present the two members of the First Presidency, the nine members of the Council of Twelve who are in the domestic field (Apostles Oakman, Hield, and Davey are abroad), the Presiding Evangelist, the Presiding Bishopric, the senior President of Seventy, and the President of the Quorum of High Priests.

Agreement was had, in harmony with the law and precedents governing, that the present members of the First Presidency shall direct the affairs of the church, in association with the other officers of the church, pending the selection of a successor to the late President Israel A. Smith.

The Council also concurred in the recommendation of the First Presidency that the next General Conference shall be held at Independence, Missouri, October 5 to 12, as previously announced.

The brethren of the council were saddened by the loss of President Smith. They nevertheless conferred in good spirit, seeking earnestly to observe the requirements of the law, and were happy that clear guidance has been given for such a time of crisis.

We sincerely trust that the Saints will move forward with quiet confidence in our heavenly Father and in the ministry of his Spirit. We earnestly solicit the prayers of the Saints for the church and for those to whom the church must minister and for all who are called to lead.

W. Wallace Smith Designated

In a statement addressed to the church and to the Council of Twelve Apostles, left in the custody of President F. Henry Edwards, the late President Israel A.

Smith named President William Wallace Smith as being called to succeed him as President of the High Priesthood of the Church.

The statement, which was witnessed by President Edwards and Presiding Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp, will be made available to the quorums and councils of the church, and to the General Conference, when the Conference convenes in October next.

The First Presidency, as now constituted, will preside at the General Conference until the Conference is fully organized. Choice of the President of the High Priesthood, who is also President of the Church, will be the first item of business thereafter. As soon as the Conference is fully organized the chair will be surrendered to the President of the Council of Twelve, or someone else selected by that Council, who will preside while the statement from the late President Smith is considered by the body and action is taken thereon.

The new President of the Church will be ordained by one or more members of the Council of Twelve, assisted by the President of the Quorum of High Priests and the President of the Aaronic priesthood (the Presiding Bishop—Doctrine and Covenants 117:3). The President of the Church will then assume the presidency of the Conference. It is expected that he will present such light as he may receive concerning his counselors, and that action completing the organization of the First Presidency will follow shortly thereafter.

Accident Investigation

Following the accident in which President Israel Smith was killed, the Legal Department immediately began an intensive investigation into the facts and causes of the accident. Donald E. Benton of the church's Legal Department, in co-operation with the Independence Police Department, has obtained statements of the persons immediately at the scene of the accident. Chief Louis Howell and Lt.

Lloyd Baer of the Independence Police made a thorough investigation early Sunday morning with the help of Sgt. Norman Eager of the State Highway Patrol, who was the officer on the scene immediately after the accident occurred. Also, Kenneth Raveill of the Audio-Visual Department took pictures at the scene of the accident and of the two cars involved.

Local and state law enforcement officers at the scene of the accident have also been questioned. It is the opinion of law enforcement officers and experts alike that President Smith was in his own lane and was struck head on as the oncoming car cut across his traffic lane.

On the basis of the facts gathered and the statements of experts on the scene, it is the consensus that President Smith was not at fault in the accident.

Obituary of Israel A. Smith

Editor's note: This was read at the funeral and is published by request. It presents him as the family man and supplements the biographical data published last week. The sermon will be in the next issue.

C. B. H.

ISRAEL ALEXANDER SMITH was born in Plano, Illinois, on February 2, 1876. He was the son of Joseph Smith III and Bertha Madison Smith. The family moved to Lamoni, Iowa, in October, 1881, where Israel grew to manhood. He was graduated from the Lamoni high school in 1895 and attended Graceland for two years. He received a Bachelor of Law degree from Lincoln Jefferson University.

By nature he was reserved and studious. When his father asked him what he wanted to do in life, he said, "I want to be a lawyer." He studied in a local attorney's office to acquire his legal knowledge and to get such training as he could from a practical association, supporting himself through various types of employment during this time.

In 1908 he went to work as an assistant in the editorial department at Herald House and carried on his studies during evening hours. Also in this year he was married to Nina M. Grenawalt of Lamoni. Three years later he was elected to the Iowa legislature. In 1912 he was admitted to the Iowa bar, and the next year he took the examination and was admitted to the bar of Missouri.

Jesus' Rules for Human Relationships

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thow away. Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.—Matthew 5: 38-48 Authorized (King James) Version.

MOST OF THE WORLD'S problems grow out of faulty human relationships. These relationships form one of the most difficult and most important aspects of life, because all of us have to live with and associate with other people, at least to some degree. We are made for God, and for each other; yet very few of us have completely learned the lesson of getting along or maintaining good relationships either with God or with each other.

Some idea of the importance of human relations may be had simply by enumerating certain areas where such relations have noticeably broken down. There is unhappiness and frustration in our homes, between husband and wife, as evidenced by our divorce rate; between parent and child, as is evidenced by our record of juvenile delinquency, and the prevalence of mental illness which psychiatrists say often has its origins in early youth. We point to the oftentimes precarious relations between employer and employee, between capital and labor, between the pastor and his flock. Ask any pastor what causes him most trouble, most heartache, most disappointment, most sleepless nights, and it is quite likely that he will say, "People, and their inability to get along and work peaceably with each other."

Human relations are important between the salesman and his prospect, between the man at the wheel of a car and all the other drivers on the road, between people of different races, between different labor unions which quarrel over matters of jurisdiction, between geographical sections of the country with competing interests, between competing businesses, between churches, and on the broadest scale of all, between nations; for poor human relations on the national and international level produce war with all its attendant suffering, destructive waste, and bloodshed.

One good sign of mental, emotional, and spiritual maturity (among many that might be mentioned) is the ability to get along well with other people. Some people live to be eighty or ninety or a hundred years old chronologically, but still react childishly to the stresses of difficult human relationships. They never learn to get along with other people.

In Spite of Religion . . .

The gospel of Jesus Christ should help us significantly in this important field. It can and will, if we will let it. But many people seem to be able to absorb a lot of religion in the form of churchgoing, sermon listening, prayer meeting, testifying, and doctrinal argument, without ever solving this problem. In spite of their religion, their lives are plagued by resentment, jealousy, fear, hatred, anger, irritation, and rejection. No one likes them; they don't like anybody else. No one enjoys having them around or even joining in conversation with them. They rub everybody the wrong way, even though a part of their duty should be the making of friends to be ultimately won for Christ. Some are even confirmed in their attitudes by the belief that they are being persecuted for their strange beliefs, and that this is what God demands of them—that they shall be at odds with most of the people around them. Didn't Jesus say, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you for my name's sake"? Firm and set and secure (?) in this belief, they have no desire to change.

An Illustration

Many years ago, as a student just out of university, I took a summer job of selling Bibles. In each town my first task was to approach all the ministers and get from them a list of their church and Sunday school workers who might be prospects for the particular brand of teacher's Bible I was selling. In most of the towns I worked, there was no congregation of my own church, so during the week or so that I remained in one place, I made it a point to be friendly with all, to sing or play the organ if they needed it (I was fresh out of the famous 1926 Men's Glee Club of Kansas University which had been very much in the news that year), and to participate in the young people's activities of any church where I found a welcome.

In one town I knew that there was a branch of our own people, but it chanced that I called on the minister of another church first. Gratuitously, out of a clear blue sky and with no mention having been made of any other denomination, he warned me to stay away from the Latter Day Saint preacher, describing him as cantankerous, irritable, argumentative, unfriendly, hard to get along with, and a trial to everybody's patience. I discounted his report somewhat, but by the time I had gotten the same gratuitous advice from five or six other people from different denominations, I decided that there must be something really wrong. I never did call on our pastor in that town. I was fairly sure that if I did, our relations might not be what they should have been.

Reflected Attitudes

Within certain limits, human behavior is predictable. We cannot absolutely control the behavior of others toward us, but we can certainly influence it. Men will nearly always react in the same way to the same stimuli. It is human nature to retaliate, to give back what we get; and therefore we get what we give. By choosing what we will give to others, we can pretty well control what we receive in return from them. If I walk up to a man on the street with a ferocious scowl on my face, and with my fist doubled up ready to poke him in the nose, his reaction will probably be to double up his fist and poke me first.

This is true not only of human beings but of birds and animals. I once had a friend who had a pet canary. This bird had been taught a trick to amuse his master's friends. When the owner approached the cage with a fierce scowl and menacing gestures, the bird would flutter about the cage and seemingly make frantic efforts to pick out his master's eyes. Of course it was all in fun—but if even a canary can be taught to react that way to the wrong kind of approach, can human beings be blamed for reacting in the same way?

Perhaps this principle is more important than we have realized in the field of evangelism. If we make the basis of our evangelism harsh criticism and ridicule of other churches and their beliefs, we get what we give. It's often just as simple as that. Whatsoever a man sows, that shall he also reap.

Everyday Diplomacy

Of course there are sometimes things that need to be said, but there are different ways of saying the same thing. The truth can be phrased diplomatically and kindly, or bluntly and pugnaciously. I recently heard a speaker give an example of this which, because of its humor, has stuck with me. Suppose, she said, that you have got bored and tired and out of sorts with your wife. She is no longer the sweet girl you married, and her face is a horror for you to behold. You can be blunt about it and say, "You have a face that would stop a clock," and find yourself in the midst of a first-class fight. Or you can use diplomacy and say, quite as truthfully, "My dear, when I gaze into your eyes, time stands still." She will think you are paying her a compliment and will love you for it. As long as you have to live with her, you might as well be diplomatic about it.

Another story comes to mind by way of illustration. In a certain town there was a kindly old man who had got himself quite a reputation by never saying anything unkind or critical of any other man. One day some of the other townspeople decided to test him out and see whether he could be tempted to speak unkindly about someone who richly deserved it. They opened a conversation in his presence about the town ne'er-do-well, a most deplorable and reprobate character, who was seemingly without a single redeeming feature. The kindly old man listened until all had had the critical say. Then he spoke up. "Maybe all you say is true," he said, "but he sure is a good whistler." Who do you think had the best chance of reforming the town reprobate? Yes, we can largely control the actions of other people by our actions toward them. We get what we give.

Jesus and Human Relations

Jesus said a great deal that may be applied to the field of human relationships. Let us consider at least a few of his sayings or rules for human relations. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." How do you like to have other people regard and treat you? With suspicion, mistrust, repugnance, contempt, scorn, impatience, ridicule, hatred, harshness, or superiority? No! With trust, confidence, faith, tolerance, love, patience, understanding, kindness, gentleness, humility, and forbearance. Do you like to have someone else pick out your faults and failings and bad points and criticize them, or do you prefer to hear about your good points? Do you like praise or blame? "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

Another rule laid down by Jesus is "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, . . . and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Right relationships with each other are dependent upon and interrelated with right relationships with God. The two cannot be separated. If our conscience condemns us before God, we try to justify ourselves by finding fault with others—by criticizing and condemning. If we feel guilty because of our own faults, we tend to point out the faults of others in order to take the pressure off ourselves. If we can point to another and say, "See what a bad man he is," that directs attention away from us and from our sins to someone else. Does this make us loved and popular? No, it alienates us from our brethren and our neighbors, and this alienation separates us still further from God. And so we go round and round in a vicious circle.

Suspicious Characters

The critical, irritable, fault-finding person is giving himself away, is proclaiming to the world that he feels insecure and uncertain before God—that he is guilty of something he doesn't want God or anyone else to find out about. An old teacher of mine once illustrated this principle by saying that if a man in a dense crowd yelled "watch out for pickpockets," he was the man to watch. By calling out a warning, he established himself as an honest man, and people would not bother to watch him. Then as each man in the crowd reached to see whether his own wallet was still safe, the pickpocket could observe where the wallets were and be prepared to steal them. So it is often true that the brash, loudmouthed, offensively aggressive type of man is showing not his courage, but his own basic sense of insecurity and his own lack of faith.

Repentance before God and the receiving of God's forgiveness are basic to good human relationships. We love our fellow men because we first love God and recognize all men as God's sons—and therefore our brothers. Good human relationships grow naturally and inevitably out of the application of the concept of the universal Fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man.

Right with God and Man

We have said that right relationships with our fellow men depend on a right relationship with God. On the other hand, right relationships with God depend on our right relationships with each other. We can't get along with God while we are unable to get along with each other.

There is a little incident recorded in Lucy Smith's history which illustrates this. She tells that during the period when Joseph was working on the translation of the Book of Mormon with Emma acting as scribe, the two of them had a little spat about something or other—we are not told what—about breakfast time. After breakfast, Joseph sat down to the task of translating, but nothing happened. The Spirit of God had fled. He could do nothing until he had made his peace with Emma, and confessed his fault before God. Then the work of translation could be resumed.

Let's get this right down to your own personal experience. Suppose that you were desperately ill and in imminent danger of death. Would you call an elder to administer to you if you knew that he had just finished a knockdown and drag-out quarrel with his wife? Could you have confidence in him to present your desperate need to God?

We are told in the Book of Mormon not to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper unworthily. Jesus said that if we come to the altar and remember that our brother has aught against us, we should leave our gift, go to our brother and be reconciled, then return and offer our gift to God. God won't accept our gift—or our prayers—until our personal relationships are as right as we can make them.

On Reconciling Differences

When two people are estranged, which one bears the responsibility of making the first move to restore fellowship and good will? It is the responsibility of both—equally, or, more exactly, it is the primary responsibility of the one who first becomes aware of the estrangement. "If thy brother hath aught against thee," go and be reconciled. You make the first move. Humble yourself. Apologize for the wrong done, if any. Straighten out misunderstandings. But "If thy brother offend thee, go and tell him between him and thee alone." You still make the first move. Don't tell your grievance first to the neighbors; don't gossip about it so that everyone knows about it, begins to talk about it, takes sides, joins in the fight, and makes it difficult or forever impossible to bring the two parties together. The one who first becomes aware of the difficulty bears the major responsibility for trying to reconcile it.

"Agree with thine adversary quickly." Don't put it off and procrastinate the day of reconciliation while the wound festers and spreads infection through the whole body of the church. On one occasion when I had preached along these lines, a sister came up to me afterwards and said, "I can give you a good illustration for one of the things you said. A brother in the church recently came to me and said that four years ago I had said something to offend him, and told me what it was. I couldn't remember saying it; I didn't think I had said it, for I certainly never entertained any such feelings for the man in question. I apologized for any wrong inadvertently done; he accepted my apology, and we are friends. I hadn't even realized that anything was wrong so certainly I didn't suffer any; but for four years that good man had wasted his time and his energies hating me. How he must have suffered!" "Agree with thine adversary quickly."

Asking for Help

Suppose that you cannot reconcile differences. There will always be some who refuse Jesus' rules for personal relationships and spurn your overtures of reconciliation. If you cannot settle the difference yourself, call for help. Take one or two more with you—still privately—and try again. One helper may very well be a teacher, or if necessary or expedient, some other member of the priesthood. It is a constant source of surprise, wonder, and sorrow to me—and I presume to many other men of the pastorate and the priesthood—that so few people observe this simple principle. They are either too indifferent, or too careless, or too much ashamed to ask for help. Time and time again I have had a wife or husband come to me and say, "My wife (or husband) is leaving me. Can't you make her (or him) come back?" I say, "How long has the trouble been going on?" "Oh, two, three, five years." "Why didn't you ask for help long ago?" "I didn't want anybody to know we were having trouble." All too often it is too late to do any good before the cry for help belatedly goes out.

When you take "one or two more" with you to help reconcile a difference, do not go with the attitude of using your companions to force your antagonist to come to your opinion. Look upon them rather as counselors to you both. The purpose of taking one or two more with you is twofold. First, the presence of an uninvolved and neutral third party will help both offender and offended to be more objective and perhaps more reasonable. Second, in the mouth of two or three witnesses shall all things be established. If you have taken others with you, and still fail, you have witnesses that reconciliation was sincerely and properly attempted.

If even with witnesses you are unsuccessful in bringing about a reconciliation, then it is time to "tell it to the church"—not to the whole congregation in prayer meeting but to the proper officials. Tell it to the teacher, or to the pastor, that proper and official ministerial labor may be done and court proceedings be instituted if necessary. Then it is out of your hands, and you have done your full duty.

Love—and Forgive

If your brother utterly refuses to be reconciled, continue to love him. Jesus said, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you." He told Peter to forgive until seventy times seven—or in Jewish colloquial language, indefinitely, time after time, forever. Of course, full forgiveness is partly dependent on repentance. Luke records this saying of Jesus with a proviso, "If thy brother trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him." An offender cannot be restored to full confidence and fellowship unless he does repent, but whether he repents or not, the Lord requires you to forgive. Harbor no hatred, resentment, anger, or grudges, even against the unrepentant. Such feelings and attitudes don't harm him, but they do harm and poison you.

"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." God acted first to forgive us. He has done no wrong; there is nothing in which we need to forgive him. If God forgives us, we ought also to forgive others. Unless we do, we can under no conceivable conditions claim the forgiveness of God for wrongs we may have done.

And Forget

When we forgive, we must also forget. Oh, memory cannot help holding some past image and recollection, but we do not need to nurse and cherish our resentment, hatred, and ill will, because such things harm us vastly more than they harm the one we hate. Such hatred and resentment and anger poison and ruin our relationships with everybody else, not just with those we hate.

Think a moment. Do you know a persistent and expert hater who gets along well even with the people he doesn't hate? If you are guilty of bitterness and contention, of fault-finding, nagging, and criticizing, even your friends don't like you. Every man's hand is against you, and you are against everybody else. Eventually you will become suspicious, jealous, quick to take offense, vindictive, sour, unhappy, frustrated, friendless, and alone.

Of Health and Happiness

The person whose human relationships are in bad repair is not only unhappy but usually in bad health. Human relationships have a definite effect on physical health. Attitudes of mind and spirit are inexorably reflected in the physical body. Ten years ago when I first began to dabble in some readings about psychosomatic medicine (which deals with the relationship between mental and spiritual attitudes and physical illness), I found the doctors saying that 40 to 50 per cent of all physical ills were emotionally or spiritually caused. Now I find some of those same doctors raising the percentage to from 50 to 90 per cent. Let me ask you another question. Think carefully before you answer. Have you ever known a sour, suspicious, faultfinding, jealous, vindictive, hateful, cantankerous, perpetually angry person who was in good health? I have known many afflicted or chronically sick persons who, in spite of their affliction, were happy, and who radiated joy, peace, and inspiration to all about them. But I have never known a chronically unhappy and cantankerous person who wasn't also physically sick.

Righteous Judgment

"Judge righteous judgment." We often judge others on partial evidence. We do not know all the facts. We do not know or understand the mind, the heart of the one we judge. We do not know the strength of his temptations. Often our judgment of others is biased by our own sin and the need to divert attention from it. If we judge righteous judgment, we judge as God judges.

An author whom I have recently read prescribes this simple formula for judging righteous judgment. He says to go into a quiet room by yourself for five minutes a day. There try to visualize the person you dislike or hate as God sees him. Then pray for him. If you do this, and do it sincerely and wholeheartedly, your hatred will turn to love, your resentment to understanding and sympathy.

"Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister [margin, "servant"]; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant [margin "slave"]. This is another rule of human relationships. No one loves a proud, imperious, demanding person who insists that his rank be recognized by special or preferential treatment. Many people envy the man with great wealth, great power, or high social position, but they do not love him, and if they can they will shove him aside in order to achieve that position of preference for themselves. But no one envies a servant or a slave. Few want his position. Yet in his unwanted position the servant or slave can endear himself to all by his self-sacrificial labor of love.

Ounce of Prevention

It is better to prevent an offense than to try to patch it up after it happens. Offenses always leave scars, even though they may be forgiven and forgotten. And so Jesus teaches activity, not passivity, in human relationships. There is an old proverb which says: "He who would have friends must show himself friendly." If you want to have friends, you can't sit down and wait for them to come to you; you must go to them. I once heard a woman complaining that she had attended a certain church four Sundays in a row, and that nobody had spoken to her. Well, that's bad. No congregation ought to be that cold, indifferent, and unfriendly. But I wanted to ask her, "And how many people did you speak to?" "He who would have friends must show himself friendly."

Good for Evil

I have said that Jesus taught activity, not passivity, in difficult human relationships. I purposely chose the Scripture for this sermon from the Authorized or King James Version—though I habitually use the Inspired Version in my study and preaching—because I think in this passage the Inspired Version obscures the meaning rather than clarifying it. "Resist not evil" (that is, an evil one, an evil man) does not mean that we lie quiet and passive and let him do whatever he will to us, letting him take command of the situation. The Christian in this difficult kind of personal relationship takes command and keeps control, but he does it by a different and completely unexpected method. The Christian does not react "naturally" to the behavior of others. The "natural" man is carnal, sensual, devilish, an enemy to God and to God's children. When evil is done to him, he retaliates with more evil.

Jesus said, "If a man smite thee on one cheek, turn to him the other also." Seize the initiative. Confuse and confound him by doing the unexpected, and doing it first. Don't wait for him to hit the other cheek: offer it to him. When compelled to go one mile and carry the baggage of an oppressor, seize the initiative and confuse your persecutor by offering—of your own free will—to go another mile. Be active, not resentfully passive. When compelled by law to give up your coat, turn the tables by offering your cloak also.

The Christian should be different. When confronted by hate (if he reacts as he should), he loves his enemies; he blesses them that curse him; he does good to them that hate him; he prays for them that spitefully use him. He is active, not passive, in his difficult human relationships.

Zion's Behavior

The kingdom—or Zion—will be made up of people who have learned how to maintain good human relationships. Those who refuse to live by Jesus' rules will be excluded from that kingdom. But don't think for one moment that you will have no more adjustments to make (if and when you arrive in the kingdom) because all the folks who disagree with you or rub you the wrong way are shut out. God isn't going to keep out all the Negroes, all the Jews, all the capitalists, all the Russians, or all the Democrats (substitute Republicans here if you happen to be a Democrat) so that everybody who gets in will agree with you. I imagine that there will be some Chinese, and some Mexicans, and some Indians, and some Japanese, and a lot of other people in the kingdom. If you haven't learned how to get along with them here in this life, it will be pretty late to start then.

Death and the resurrection will not change your nature, your disposition, your ability to get along with people, in the least particular. If you can't get along with other people now, you won't know how to get along with them then. There will be no magical change except the change of the body from mortality to immortality. If you still can't get along with people, do you think God will allow you to enter the kingdom and become a disturbing element for all eternity?

Cultivate the Christian graces. Put into operation the rules laid down by Jesus for good human relationships. Strive—actively, not passively—for good relationships with all men. "So an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." In that kingdom you will be privileged to extend the circle of your relationships to include all of the great and good and wise and saintly men of all ages who have loved their brethren and their God, and who have learned to live together in peace and harmony and brotherly love.

Thirteen Graduate in Religion

Graceland's first religion graduates plan careers and graduate study

On June 1 thirteen pioneers were graduated by Graceland College. They were the first class to be graduated with a bachelor of arts degree from the college's new curriculum in religion.

As they stood in the sun on commencement day, the thirteen looked no different than the 270 sophomores being graduated from the junior college curriculum. Yet, underneath the cap and gown, they were different because they had pioneered and the venture was successful.

The results of the four-year program in religion were outlined in an interview with Dr. William S. Gould, acting president of the college during the past year. He said: "The curriculum has worked out better than we had any right to expect."

According to Dr. Gould, the religion curriculum was begun because "there was no other place, in or out of the church, where our philosophy was being taught on a systematic collegiate level. The Board of Trustees and the faculty felt we could make a significant contribution to the church in this area.

"The nature of a college and its program is determined by the clientele," Dr. Gould explained. "People attend Graceland because it is a church college. Yet in two years at Graceland we are only able to touch the surface in religious activities and classwork. We want this four-year curriculum in religion to train highly motivated young people in theology, philosophy, religious education, and give them some practice in administering religious activities.

"We feel the program has been successful for these reasons," Dr. Gould continued:

1. "We have most of the students who started the program two years ago still with us. This is exceptional in any college.

2. "All of the graduates have good plans for their future. All of them plan some form of advanced study and most of them have definite career plans.

3. "The quality of our campus life has been greatly improved by having upper classmen who can take leadership in social life, student government, and religious activities.

4. "The program has proved to be an extension of what Graceland has done in the past. That is, the type of education and experience we have been able to provide for church young people in two years in the past can now be improved. What we can offer is deeper and of a better quality. And the young people we offer to the church are therefore capable of giving a better service."

The Graduates

Here is a quick rundown of the thirteen graduates and their plans for the future:

Ted Biller of Massachusetts plans graduate study and teaching. He holds the office of priest.

Don Davis of California plans to work and then do advanced study in the field of literature. He holds the office of deacon.

Gerald Davis of Ontario will work and continue his study in Canada. He holds the office of deacon.

George Gates of Nebraska will do graduate work at the University of Nebraska in social studies. He is a priest.

Everett Graffeo of Independence will do graduate work at the University of Indiana in the field of recreation leadership. He holds the office of priest.

Ruth Kuenzi of Wisconsin plans graduate study in social welfare.

Barney Parker of Texas will sell life insurance in Council Bluffs, Iowa.

Bob Speaks of Independence plans graduate study in the field of religion. He is a priest.

Jim Swick of West Virginia will study social service on the graduate level. He is an elder.

Sandra Traver of Massachusetts will do practice teaching in education and teach.

Ted Traver of Massachusetts will do practice teaching in Des Moines this summer and join the school system there as a teacher in the fall.

Darrell Webb of Iowa will study industrial arts at Colorado State as a graduate student and then become a teacher. He is a priest.

G. R. Westwood of Independence will do graduate work in sociology at Iowa State College. He is a priest.

What They Think

Barney Parker is one of the graduates. His story is interesting. He came to Graceland because of a friend. He did not know what church sponsored the college. After two years of study, he left the college. In 1956 he returned to Graceland. "The kind of people I want to be with are here at Graceland," he said. He entered the four-year curriculum in religion. Later he was baptized.

"I'm convinced that Graceland is one of the finest educational institutions in the country," Barney said. "And I know that my four years here have changed my life. My purpose now is to serve the church and all men, however I can."

Everett Graffeo, another graduate, listened to Barney's testimony and nodded agreement. Everett was pastor of a student group at Graceland. Barney was his assistant. They played football together, too.

Speaking of the religion curriculum, Everett said, "At first I thought it wasn't going to be up to par. The courses seemed easy. But then it began to get stiffer. It ended up really stretching us."

"It nearly broke me in two," Barney commented seriously.

"Our practical experience as pastors and leaders in the student religious program fit perfectly into the curriculum," Everett said. "We had many wonderful experiences and worship services together. All of the seniors in religion had a responsibility with a student group and we all learned a lot outside the classroom as well as in."

Darrell Webb came to Graceland just to take the few courses offered in religion before the four-year curriculum was begun. He stayed on and took the full four years and graduated with the first class.

"These last two years have helped me more than I had ever hoped they would," he said. "I came here to learn so I could serve in a branch. The whole program is geared to help us learn how to do just that. I feel I have grown spiritually and in my capacity for administering and doing church work."

And Girls, Too

There were two girls in the first class of thirteen graduates. Ruth Kuenzi says she took the course because she had so little background in the church and felt she needed a better foundation to build her life on.

"Now I feel better prepared for branch life, home life, and married life," she said.

"Of course," she continued, "it is a little harder for a girl to study religion. For one reason, people seem to have a hard time accepting a girl in religion. Actually, this course is a better preparation for married life than any other course I can think of. I'm well satisfied with what I have received here.

"I hope more girls will take the course in religion," Ruth said. "Girls need this training as much as fellows to be more effective church members and home builders."

It is interesting to note that the religion graduates will have immediate opportunity to use their training in home building. Nine of the thirteen are already married.

Next Year: More

There will be seventeen seniors next year, according to Dr. Gould. Twenty-five students will begin their junior year at Graceland.

As the pioneers before them, they will study in the social sciences, the biological sciences, in the fine arts, and in languages and literature. Also, they will take a certain number of hours in Latter Day Saint history, Bible, history of Christianity, religious education, theology, and practicum. Perhaps a course in our distinctive Scriptures—Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants—will be added. They will be in key roles in student religious activity program.

Congregational Participation in Services

And a period of silent mediation may be just the thing that many members would appreciate. Beyond these are prepared tableaux, pantomimes, short dramas, and other variety activities might be used if smoothly blended into the other phases of the service.

Also there are numerous opportunities to include the congregation in emphasizing the ordinances of the church. Sometimes a whole service may be devoted to ordinances; other times only one will be used in a service. There are also special religious days that can include special congregational participation. And you'll probably be pleasantly surprised at the response given to having an occasional prayer and testimony service at 11 A.M. Sunday when the pews are full!

After all is said about the mechanics of services, worshiping God is an attitude beyond mechanics for most people. They find satisfactions and contact with Divinity no matter what the mechanics. But for those who want to be led to an experience and want to be a part of the movement of the service, more concern needs to be given in our congregations toward preparing for services that will let people express themselves. More power to the pastor who leads the way to more congregational participation in the services of the church!

P. A. W.

"Any students who come here for their third and fourth year of college will probably find that they could have had it easier in some other school," Dr. Roy A. Cheville said.

"This is a difficult course. The members of the first graduating class all mastered it, though," Dr. Cheville said. "They have good stuff in them. They are a rugged group of individualists. They aren't the kind who listen to a teacher and accept everything he says. They are inquirers."

"The Acid Test"

Dr. Cheville has played a key role in the development of the four-year religion curriculum at Graceland. He said the students leaving the college have gained:

1. "A perspective of our past religious heritage and how the church fits in.

2. "Also, how the church fits into the world of religion today and the contribution it can make.

3. "They have a realistic picture of the church—its problems and potential.

4. "They have been building a good broad education.

5. "And they have a theology. It is not a finished product, but rather a foundation for contemporary life.

"This year and last were a real educational experience. I believe the basic idea of a four-year curriculum is sound and I am well satisfied with the products that have come out. Now I am concerned that they go to work in whatever locality they find themselves.

"That will be the acid test of the curriculum," he said.

ROGER YARRINGTON

I Had an Experience

William H. Dawson

WHEN I WAS twenty-two years old and a member of the church in Sacramento, California, I was approached by the missionary, a Seventy in charge of what was then called the Pacific Slope Mission and the presiding elder of Sacramento Branch. He advised me the Lord had let him know I should be called to the office of priest and asked, "Will you accept?" I was so surprised I refused but promised I would pray over the matter.

I began fasting one, two, and some times three meals a day (no food or drink) but continued working. After eighteen days of this praying and fasting I decided I would frame a testimony for the church: a man could not find out from God in regard to a call to the priesthood, for no answer had come, and I felt I would break my health if I continued my quest longer.

I was weary and lay down on my bed. While I was thus reclining, in meditation over my struggle to find the information I wanted and to frame a testimony, an audible, exterior voice, clear and plain, right over my bed, spoke to me asking, "Art thou willing to serve me in all things?" To my astonishment an audible voice, not using my vocal chords or my lips, asked of that spirit that had addressed me—spoke right out of my body—my heart, asking "Could I answer that I am?" While I was listening intently to the spirit that had spoken, it said, "Thou knowest that inasmuch as thou servest me, thou shalt be blest in very deed."

What joy and gladness, what peace of mind! God had answered. I am now seventy-seven years old, and my testimony is that God has always remembered what he told me, and he has verified his promise. I accepted the call, and the church voted to approve; I was ordained. Since then I have accepted other calls. God has inspired my mind to give instruction and direction to nearly one thousand of his Saints through patriarchal blessings. I have preached hundreds of sermons, always with the help of my heavenly Father.

A New Church School Curriculum for Children and Youth

EDITOR'S NOTE: This statement by the Director of Religious Education is of great significance to the membership of the church. We are happy to recommend that the material described be secured and utilized to its fullest extent in developing a more effective religious education program throughout the church.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

There is a new church school curriculum in the making! When October 1 comes, the children and youth of your branch, from kindergarten through senior high, will be introduced to new church school materials written especially for you and them. More than ever before, we have tried to take the home and parents into account in the writing of the materials which will be studied during the year ahead.

Religious education is basically the job of the family. At best, the church school supplements and assists the home in the education and spiritual growth of its members. At church we do in group activities those things which parents can do to help teach the faith and patterns of life which are so important to the development of young Latter Day Saints.

Kindergarten Materials

The quarterly titles for the kindergarten course for 1958-59 are

1. Learning about Our Church
2. Learning about Jesus
3. Learning How Jesus Wants Us to Live
4. Learning about God's Plans for Us

The form of the new material will be considerably different from that of the past. Kindergarten materials will consist of a packet of leaflets each quarter for the parents and children, and a manual for the teacher. In order to keep the parents in touch with the work their children are doing in class, a special leaflet is prepared for parents, which is to be sent home at the beginning of the quarter. Each Sunday every child will receive a special leaflet of his own. These have well-illustrated colored pictures, stories, poems, and other material which the kindergarten child will find interesting and helpful in learning the lesson each Sunday. Kindergarten children depend very heavily upon other persons reading the materials which they themselves have not yet learned to read. We hope that parents will be so interested in the work of the children that they will watch for the leaflets, read them over with their children, and discuss them in the home.

The teacher, too, will have her own valuable resource material for teaching her class in the Teacher's Manual.

Primary Materials

The quarterly titles for the primary course for 1958-59 are

1. This Is Our Father's World
2. At Home with Jesus
3. Partners with Jesus
4. Sharing Jesus' Love with Others

Primary children and their parents will have leaflets similar to those for the kindergarten children. Parents will be kept in touch with the lessons of each quarter through a parent's leaflet which will be sent home at the beginning of the quarter. The children's leaflets have been written in a simple vocabulary which second graders will be able to read. Additional material will be published in Zion's Hope each Sunday.

We believe that the experiences of the class and materials which the children study will be helpful to parents in teaching their children. We hope parents will give special attention to the church school work of their children, having the children read the stories from their leaflets, discussing the lessons with them, and helping them save the leaflets and Zion's Hopes for future reference.

The teacher will also have a Teacher's Manual.

Junior Materials

The quarterly titles for the junior course for 1958-59 are

1. Preparing for the Coming of Christ
2. Jesus about His Father's Business
3. Jesus about His Father's Business (continued)
4. Jesus Lives

The children of the junior division will have quarterlies which are especially written to appeal to their interest. The lessons are written in story form. These will be accompanied by a Teacher's Manual which will give resource material and suggestions to help the teacher plan the lessons for an interesting and effective class session.

Junior High Materials

All four quarters of the junior high course for 1958-59 are entitled "Followers of the Way." This is a course dealing with beginnings of the early Christian church.

This division will have pupil's quarterlies for the junior high young people to study, and a Teacher's Manual to assist the teacher.

Senior High Materials

Senior high material will be in book form. The material once presented in the quarterly series entitled, "What It Means to Be a Latter Day Saint," by Roy A. Cheville, has been revised and written in a book so it will be more durable and useful to the senior high young person. It will be accompanied by a Teacher's Manual which will help the teacher in presenting the lessons interestingly and effectively.

This will be the beginning of a two-year cycle of materials for kindergarten, and a three-year cycle for other children and youth divisions of the church school.

The church school will be enhanced by parents becoming acquainted with the materials and sharing in the home with the children in the lessons which they learn Sunday by Sunday. A recent article states, "A child's birthright is the unearned affection of his father and mother." Few places express this affection more fruitfully than in the shared devotional and educational experiences between parents and children. Love and affection are best expressed together in the presence of God.

It is the hope of the church that the new church school curriculum will provide a more stimulating basis for family study and shared worship during the year ahead.

Memoirs of Clara B. Stebbins

The author as she appeared in 1905

I WAS BORN December 13, 1858, in Sheawassee County, Michigan. My father was William Revers Sellon and my mother Alma Sophia Fletcher Sellon. My patriarchal blessing tells me that I have been saved from danger time and again. It may be that this protection began in my infancy, and I have recognized it at other times, spiritual as well as physical.

My father was at the head of an academy in a small Michigan town. The school was giving an entertainment, and my mother was present with me as a baby. In the midst of the program the floor of the second story room gave way and the audience dropped to the floor below. In the fall the end of a bench bore down across my neck. A man caught the bench and swung it around, and my life was spared.

My father was a lieutenant colonel in the Civil War. The family moved from Michigan to Pittsfield, Illinois, the home of Grandmother Sellon Bush. At the close of the war we moved to Burlington, Iowa.

My mother's mother had been a member of the old church, but the apostasy under Brigham Young held her family from association with any members of it. Finally Brother John Lake came to Burlington, and my mother learned of the Reorganization. She was baptized by Brother Lake.

My father was a shorthand reporter, and once when he was away at court my mother ordered a Saints' Harp, the old hymnbook with words only. When he came home she put it in his hand and told him about sending for it. When he saw what it was, he dropped it to the floor. Like many others he wanted nothing to do with Mormonism. My mother explained about the Reorganization and he was mollified.

After a time he offered to go through the church books with her and show her where she was wrong. She could ask nothing better. They read and talked together, and when they had finished the study he was ready to be baptized. He was a faithful member and was fully converted to the financial law. He wrote articles on tithing for the Herald.

Brother Lake's daughter, Oracy, in the last stages of tuberculosis, was cared for at our house until she died. Later on, his youngest child, Carrie, eight or ten years old, lived there for some time. The mother had died years before and the girls had lived in different homes.

My mother was a good example and counselor to her children, and she was devoted to the church.

The elders made their home with us when holding services in Burlington. Brother Mark H. Forscutt preached a month's series of sermons there, at the end of which my younger sister and I were baptized. This sister in later years was known as Hortense Sellon Cramer, a writer for the Herald. My older sister and her husband entered the church years later.

I WAS SEVENTEEN years old when I came into the church. At once I began teaching in Sunday school and acting as organist for the meetings which were held in the courthouse.

I grew up and received my schooling in Burlington. I have many pleasant memories of it. My health failed before I finished high school. In an optional course I had studied German. I think Latin would have been of more advantage to me because of the derivation of many of our words from the Latin.

I was fortunate in having parents who spoke good English and who encouraged their children to use the dictionary. When any word was in question we went to the dictionary for spelling and definition. All of us were readers with plenty of literature in the house, the church books and papers with the rest. I had read the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants before I was baptized.

My father, my sisters, and later my husband, always called me Callie. I accepted this, and in writing I signed Callie B. Stebbins. In later years I was "Aunt Callie" to many.

I WAS MARRIED to Henry A. Stebbins on October 7, 1879, at the home of my parents in Burlington, Iowa. We went at once on our wedding trip to the home of Brother and Sister David Dancer. Arriving in Lamoni, Brother Dancer met us with team and carriage to take us to his home two miles west of town. We had stepped from the train into a cornfield. The station had not yet been built. Ours was the first passenger train ever to enter Lamoni. Only construction trains were coming through while the road was being built.

Brother Stebbins had lived with the Dancers while their home was in Plano, so he was like one of the family. At that time his health was very poor from exposure in the army, and Sister Dancer had been like a mother to him. With them in their farm home was Aunt Libby, Brother Dancer's sister; their youngest son, Walter, and Sister Copis, who was later our good neighbor in Lamoni. They had two married sons living not far from them.

Brother Dancer was president of the Order of Enoch and Brother Stebbins was secretary. Saints from different parts of the country were settled on the colony farms scattered over the southern part of Decatur County, Iowa. Brother Dancer made daily trips to these farms, and Sister Dancer often accompanied him. She was known as the good angel of the colony. In an unobtrusive way she carried gifts to the families, sometimes dress material for the mother, at other times clothing for the children, always with sympathy and interest in their work. They took us with them on their rounds, and we visited in more than thirty homes during our month's stay.

They drove with us straight east from their place into Main Street of Lamoni. On Linden, the cross street, there were a few small houses, a meat market, a millinery shop, a small grocery, and some other buildings, while on the two west corners of Main and Linden two large buildings were being constructed. One was the Tilton store, the other the Teale store. These still stand, and through the years have had only a few changes of occupants. The post office was still in the country, a mile east and one south of town.

AT THE END of our vacation we went to live in Plano where Brother Stebbins resumed his work as assistant editor of the Herald. Here our daughter Helen was born. We lived in Plano only one year. At the end of that year we moved to Lamoni to spend the rest of our days.

Brother Dancer had started a lumber and grain business. He offered Brother Stebbins a one-third partnership in the business with himself and Brother Asa S. Cochran. Henry was to keep the books and help with the work in the lumber yard. It was thought the outdoor work would benefit his health, which was not good. It did help him, but he was not satisfied to be out of church work, so he resigned at the end of one year. His share of the profits for the year was one thousand dollars. His brother Roscoe sent him a check for five hundred dollars. This, with three hundred dollars he had saved, paid for our house. Recently it has been priced at five thousand.

Some years before this Henry's brothers had offered to take him into the banking business with them, but he could not think of leaving church work. They had five banks in the West—at Denver, Silver City, and three other places.

We had come back to Lamoni in the fall of 1880, but our house was not built until the next year. We stayed for a time with Brother and Sister Thomas in the original farmhouse of this section where the high school now stands. Later Patriarch Alexander Smith had his office in this house, and still later it was occupied by the Criley family.

We rented a small house southeast of the depot and lived there until our house was ready for us in July, 1881. Just as we were moving into the new house the check came from brother Roscoe. At the same time he sent a walnut bedroom set and a marble top oak sideboard. He was moving with his family from Atchison, Kansas, to New York City and they were disposing of their old furniture. This bedroom set will go to the Mansion House in Nauvoo at my death. Sister McDowell bought the sideboard to include with her antiques in Independence.

THE comfortable feeling that we were assured of a debt-free home (Brother Dancer had given us the lot) made us grateful to God, and we felt that he had opened the way in a time when the church allowances for families was very small. We appreciated the addition of this rare furniture which has increased in value all these years and has been admired by many people. Of these, one was Brother Elbert Smith who made a request for the bedroom set for Nauvoo.

As church recorder my husband brought the big record books into our home and counted his time when he worked on them at twenty-five cents an hour. Later he was given space in the Herald building. After that was burned and the new one built in 1907, he was given a large room with adequate space for work on the large books. At home he had spread them on the table, the couch, and the floor in the living room. In the new office Brother C. I. Carpenter was his assistant. He boarded for some months at our house.

In the fall of 1881 Herald Publishing House was moved from Plano to Lamoni. This brought with it the men and their families connected with the work of the office. First of these was Brother Joseph Smith and his family. Liberty Hall, the name he gave to his house, was built that year a mile west of Lamoni. His daughters, Carrie and Zaide, stayed with us while their rooms were being finished. With them was Mary Cazaly, who was in the millinery business here for a number of years. Later she married Daniel Garner and lived with him on a ranch near Fresno, California. After getting settled at Liberty Hall, the three girls were our frequent visitors.

In that early time Brother Joseph's eldest daughter, Emma McCallum, her husband and two young sons were visiting at the Hall. One day the boys did something of which their father disapproved. He said: "If you do that again, I'll take a switch to you."

Quickly the boys said: "You can't. There aren't any switches. Zaide said so."

And they were right. There were no trees except along the creek. All the new people were setting out shade and fruit trees, but there was nothing large enough to furnish a switch. The wind had the sweep of the prairies, and it blew all the time. After a while we grew accustomed to it, but visitors would say, "How do you endure the sound of it?"

The home of our next-door neighbor on the east, our beloved Uncle Asa Cochran and his family, was built in 1880. With them lived Mother Morse, Uncle Asa's mother. Next to them were Sister Cochran's parents, Father and Mother Church, and their sons Charles and Eddy; then the Isaac Bogue home and Mother Lysinger's. As the years went on others were added.

THE FIRST MEETING PLACE for the Saints in Lamoni was a house built by Rosalia Dancer. This stood just west of Katie Dancer's home on Main Street and was called Alberta's house. This was to be used as a chapel until the church could be built. Then partitions were put in and it was rented as a family home. Here, at one time, lived the Isaac Carlile family, followed by others. Later this house was moved a few blocks east and south, and where it has since stood. Howard Dancer built a fine large home, later occupied by Max Jones, owner of the drugstore.

Through the years the houses spread west, south, and north to where at the end of Silver Street the Saints' Home was built. For many years Miss Alice Dancer, niece of Brother David Dancer, was the much-loved matron of the Home. Here my husband was always welcome as he ministered to the old people. Other matrons later made him welcome, too.

In the Cochran home were two children, Frank and Clara (she became Mrs. Elbert A. Smith). Wilbur and Cora came later.

Across the street west of us was the house built at the same time as ours by David Dancer for his son Peter, who with his wife Katie lived in it only a short time. He became ill and died at the home of his parents. Katie, with her little daughter Alberta, born after her father's death, lived with them for a number of years. Later Katie married Lewis Gaulter. They lived in her house, where he died. Katie continued to live there until her death in 1953. We were fast friends. Her son Arthur and his wife Elsie lived with her. She had two other sons, Wilbur and Wayne.

“Whoso Is Faithful”

An Appreciation by Arthur Oakman

JOHN WILLIAM WORTH was born in Stepney, London, on May 10, 1873. He was the third of six children, two of whom survive him—a brother and a sister. He left school at the age of twelve, and from then on until he retired from secular employment at the age of sixty-seven, he worked in an iron foundry. He lived in the vicinity of Doctor Barnardo's homes, and early in his life was deeply moved by the Christian influence of this great man. He joined a Young Men's Fellowship and a nonsectarian religious movement at the Edinburgh Castle in London, under the auspices of Dr. Barnardo.

On Christmas Day, 1895, at the age of twenty-two, he married Mary Ann Newton, and through her family he came to hear of the Reorganized Church. He sought diligently to prove the church wrong, but the valiant testimony of the early elders and his own earnestness in quest of the truth finally brought him to the decision for baptism. He was baptized by Elder Thomas Bradshaw on March 21, 1897, at the Bow Common Lane Branch of the church in London and was confirmed on the same day by Elders Richard Clift and Thomas Bradshaw.

On October 30 of that same year he was ordained a priest by Elder James Gerrard, and on July 1, 1900, an elder by Elder William Kendrick.

He was pastor (or president) of the London Branch from May, 1914, until its disorganization in 1926. Subsequently, he was counselor for about ten years to John A. Judd, pastor of the Enfield Branch.

On December 1, 1940, he was ordained to the office of patriarch and evangelical minister by Apostle Arthur A. Oakman, in which capacity he ministered diligently until his death. His first patriarchal blessing was given in January, 1941, and the last during the August reunion of 1956. In all, he was instrumental in giving 262 blessings throughout the British Isles, on the Continent of Europe, in Canada, and the United States of America.

Fulfilling a prophecy of thirty years standing he visited Holland, the United States, and Canada in 1946. He went a second time to the Continent in 1952 with Apostle Oakman.

His wife preceded him in death in July, 1943.

With his passing on March 29, 1958, he left five sons: John, James, William, Thomas, and Albert; and three daughters: May, Violet, and Rose.

Those are the statistical facts in the life of a great man. These facts have a minimal importance in light of the influences which Brother John shed abroad in his life and ministry. He “came up,” as the saying goes, “the hard way.” He labored the major part of his life with his hands, but he was an uncommon laborer. He touched the ordinary things of life, but he was no ordinary man. He met the usual vicissitudes —joy, sorrow, hope, bereavement, disappointment, and poverty—in an unusual manner. He saw the same things others saw, but he saw them differently, for John Worth was a “seer”! He grew to be this amid these ordinary, usual, and common experiences, because early in life he was really born of the water and of the Spirit, and his birth initiated a spiritual life which grew to maturity in the respect of God. In 1940 he was physically exhausted and lay on what his physicians predicted would be his deathbed. Sixty-seven years had passed over him. But in those years John had built the foundations of a monumental evangelical ministry. So, when the time for the change came, he asked for administration. As the minister talked with him by the bedside the words of promise came clearly: “for whoso is faithful unto the obtaining these two priesthoods of which I have spoken, and the magnifying their calling, are sanctified by the Spirit unto the renewing of their bodies” (Doctrine and Covenants 83:6c). And thus John was given the choice as to whether he wished then to go to his reward or stay and take up the work for which his experience had qualified him. He chose to stay; and renewed and sanctified, he stayed with his people to minister to them.

He was a man of complete integrity, and this brought a basic insight into the heart of life itself which gave him a great gift of discernment. Nothing ever “got by” John Worth, and he was quite candid and utterly fearless in dealing with problems for which his advice was sought. To him the truth was precious—more to be desired than the regard of men.

He demonstrated that the Zionite life is possible and beautiful in “England's green and pleasant land,” the land of his birth and the land he loved.

He had a simple yet profound philosophy which was once expressed in a large priesthood meeting. “You men,” he said, “do what you can do for the Lord, and then what you would like to do and cannot for him will be counted to you as though you had done it.”

As a family man his life was beyond reproach. He held sacred all those gifts of God to man and woman which enable them to be stewards over those who come after them, and John's family consists of people of quality and usefulness. His advice and counsel to the young folk who loved him grew out of his own experience of home life, for John was a man of the people.

Something precious seems to be lost when men like this leave us. But is it lost? Is it not rather that “death is an horizon, and an horizon is only the limit of our sight”?

We pay tribute to a great man who has passed beyond the “limit of our sight” and thank God who made possible his greatness.

Democracy and The Church of Jesus Christ

WHAT does the law of Jesus Christ do to us? Does it bind us as individuals? Does it grant us license when it says "truth will make us free"? How does it foster the welfare of the individual and protect his rights as well as protecting society from the undisciplined individual?

The great question in government today is "How can we 'secure the blessings of liberty' and at the same time 'provide for the common defense'?" Twin values of social living are these. Does Jesus Christ guarantee them, and if so, how did he guarantee them? If we believe in democracy, and believe also in Jesus Christ, then we must assume that within the gospel of Jesus Christ is the only true democracy. We believe him when he says, "I am the truth and the light." We must, likewise, interpret this to mean that he is the only true demonstration of democracy.

Other similar sayings he pronounced: "Know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" . . . "for my yoke is easy and my burden is light." Aren't these the values guaranteed by the Constitution in the very Preamble? Jesus also guarantees them. The Constitution strives to show the way to attain these privileges of freedom, and Jesus Christ declares the way to attain these same privileges. There is one difference. Men of government search for the way as they progress in social living, while Jesus Christ knew the way. Does this mean we are not to respect our government? What did Jesus say? "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's." He recognized the need for government. Let us find his reasoning if we can.

As we weight the values of government in view of the gospel, we often tend to criticize the discrepancies which are so obvious in government. Should we? It has long been the principle of this church "to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's." In time of war our people were told that the church stood for every citizen's subjecting himself to the law of the draft. Where do we stand in this seeming inconsistency? We know the way of peace in which Jesus says to go. The government doesn't always go that way; yet we are told to support it. What should we do?

LET US look with the kind of understanding Paul perceived when he described charity for us. Paul knew through the influence of the Holy Ghost that there was much to suffer, much to be hoped for, much to be humble about within our lives. He knew we might have the full law of freedom or the answer to true democracy without practicing it in full. He knew we could not lead people rapidly, or with force, or with anything but charity and the application of this whole law. He knew we would have to join hands with all classes, kinds, and concepts; and, through the infiltration of the gospel in our lives, we would bring to them the answer to liberty and security. Then the pursuit of happiness would no longer be necessary, as its attainment would come through this fellowship.

It is true that there is a gap between our democracy of government in the United States and the pure democracy of the church in perfect operation. We see also that there is a gap between our lives and the life as proposed by Jesus Christ.

We must first fill the gap in our lives. Second, we must demonstrate the way through participation in this "hoped for" democratic government of ours. We have the gospel which in its restored fullness is "pure democracy." We have a country to which God led our forefathers that we might prove to all mankind the way. As our President of the Church has written "this can be and should be 'the acceptable year of the Lord.'"

Our answer then must be "We will follow Jesus Christ." We will render to Caesar all that we can to prove to those who search for the true democracy that Jesus Christ is the way. The government will rise to the goal of true democracy our forefathers set in sacrifice if we, as the leaven, do not grow stale in our complacency. We shall fall as a nation if the leaven which we are does not foment into action. Here, on this continent, lies our proving ground. Let us render unto God that which is his that we may fulfill our calling to render unto the people of this government that which we are called to render. Then shall the eyes of the world see Jesus Christ as representative of pure democracy, and all government shall "be upon his shoulders" at last.

All too often we state a principle of philosophy with great effusiveness without specifically stating what we should do about it. Each of us will nod his head at all that has been said. We believe in Jesus Christ. We believe in democracy. We believe our government grants us the opportunity to search for democracy and be protected while we do so. We believe Jesus Christ has the laws of this pure democracy. We believe we should demonstrate to these seekers outside of the church the way to this true democracy. But the great question is how? How this day, this hour, this moment do we demonstrate?

FIRST, with Emerson, let us find a basis for the charity Paul spoke of that we may see ourselves in relationship to all mankind. This he observed; he was capable of all the depravity of all men and capable also of all the love and sacrifice of all men were he to submit to either. All men can be cruel, mercenary, depraved; and all men can be kind, charitable, and all-loving. "We are at home without it all," he says. We think of all things we see or hear, of triumph or greatness, or genius, or success, as unattained but attainable. "Every chemical substance, every plant, every animal in its growth teaches the unity of cause, the variety of appearance. Everywhere is the same and nowhere alike exactly. Why? Because people are the same. The individual need is the same; so, the creation, the landscape, the old, and the new, are the same." What is Emerson saying to us? He is saying that our needs, our desires, our thoughts are so closely related that there is little difference in any of us except in varying talents to express these needs and thoughts.

License is not freedom nor democracy. "Am I my brother's keeper?" Someone wanted to be free, but this isn't freedom. Freedom comes from service, because people respond in our behalf when we serve them, and we learn the joy of complementing each other with our variation of talent.

Discipline for true freedom, we must conclude, is the only answer. Discipline for service is the answer. The six principles let us into the area where we can function with some understanding of service. As our interpretation of them is broadened we see them as the golden rules of democracy.

As we pass into this area of freedom, we must study. We must learn about people that we might better serve them. We should read all good books, but first the law. Knowing the law, we continue to read, to develop talents daily. We must serve in our community, state, and nation. We must be not just voters, but intelligent, well-read voters. We can join the League of Women Voters and read its material, contact other sources of governmental information, and read the newspaper thoroughly. We can go to church at every opportunity. The spiritual food and fellowship strengthens, reminds, and warms us. At home we should begin to understand the value of proper diet in social behavior. Proper use of our finances should be our goal in providing comfort and satisfaction to us and to our friends. We must pray always for guidance in all our areas of behavior.

We must observe caution in the use of these disciplines or facts governing democracy that the facts we know do not rule us. We must rule the facts! Some religionists bow to the fact, or the form, or the symbol. The fact, the form, the symbol must be our slave. We must utilize them. Emerson again says, "If the man is true to his better instincts or sentiments, and refuses the dominion of acts—then the facts fall aptly and supple into their places; they know their master and the meanest of them glorifies him. . . . Every reform was once a private opinion, and when it shall be a private opinion again, it will solve the problem of the age."

Democracy is individual! Democracy is social living in the true sense of fellowship. Democracy is truly the abundant life. Pure democracy is the gospel of Jesus Christ in action. It is the task of the church, in a country where freedom of religion is guaranteed, to demonstrate this pure democracy that all the world might come to the fullness of the knowledge of God and learn to dwell in his presence.

Lucy Mack Smith—A Woman of Action

DURING recent months I have been rereading the Journal of History. My faith in God's great movement has been intensified. The Restoration is a movement. It is an active, growing business in which many have engaged since its introduction to the world in these latter days.

One person I have come to appreciate with greater feeling is Lucy Mack Smith, mother of Joseph, the young boy who received the angel's message. We read that she was well fitted to be the mother of a man destined to be the leader of God's great church restored. Her courage and zeal, her unwavering faith and her splendid determination were like a reservoir of strength to Joseph and his brothers. She possessed a high sense of duty, and her standard of morals was unsurpassed. History says, "Perhaps there was a touch of the iron of old New England sometimes in her rebukes," and "Sometimes the rigidity of her discipline of self and others looked severe, but it was not without its affectionate sequence, love of man and love of right."

Lucy Smith was a woman of action, at times taking weighty matters in her own hands, as in the case of the school and meeting-house building in Kirtland. It was left in the hands of Reynolds Cahoon to be completed for meetings. The authorities were called to Missouri. Cahoon felt he could do nothing. Winter came on, and the Saints had no place of meeting. Lucy approached Cahoon. He admitted he could do nothing. She at once started out with a subscription paper, solicited and collected money, and set the carpenter at work. Cahoon, by use of authority, stopped the carpenter. She appealed to her husband. A council was called, and after a sitting of three hours those on the council voted that "Mother Smith," as she was lovingly called, should proceed to finish the house as she thought proper. History records, "and she proceeded."

One can trace this good woman's impulsiveness by many acts, but she was also conscientious, fearless, and determined. Her hospitality and charity, (her magnificent spirit were to be rocks of strength in the days which lay ahead. Perhaps it may be summarized in the beautiful tribute of appreciation her husband paid her in his last days.

"Mother, do you not know that you are one of the most singular women in the world?" he asked her.

"No," she replied, "I do not."

"Well, I do," he continued. "You have brought up my children for me by the fireside, and when I was gone from home, you comforted them, too. You have brought up all my children and could always comfort them when I could not. We have often wished that we might both die at the same time, but you must not desire to die when I do, for you must stay to comfort the children when I am gone. So do not mourn, but try to be comforted. Your last days shall be your best days, as to being driven, for you shall have more power over your enemies than you have had. Again I say, be comforted."

In May, 1855, Lucy joined her husband, leaving the record of one who loved much, suffered much, and was ever loyal. She was a "woman who had adhered to her own affectionately rigid rules in rearing her family and held the undying love of husband, children, and grandchildren—one who inspired reverence and confidence, though speaking directly and plainly. The memory of her is of a character strong, fearless, clear-minded, and God-fearing."

Question Time

Question

Since Paul was writing of Jesus, the great high priest, in his letter to the Hebrews in chapters 3 through 5: 10 and was making a comparison between Christ and the high priests of the Jews in chapter 5: 1-3, how can we rightly interpret 5: 4: "No man taketh this honor unto himself but he that is called of God as was Aaron," as referring to all offices in the priesthood? The seven men chosen and ordained, usually referred to as deacons, of Acts 6: 1-6, were chosen by popular vote with three qualifications necessary for ordination: (1) of good report; (2) full of the Holy Ghost; (3) full of wisdom.

Answer

We should be careful to avoid any inference from the cited passage in Hebrews that would mislead us to think that Christ was the last high priest to be called of God. Notice that Hebrews 5: 1 says "every high priest." Further, there is nothing in this Scripture to indicate that the principle applied exclusively to the high priesthood. The setting of the statement in a paragraph by itself may indicate that it was a generalization for a wider application. Observe, for example, that Aaron (Exodus 28: 1) was not called to the high priesthood at this time, but "that he may minister unto me in the priest's office." Thus the meaning of the passage is made to apply to both priests and high priests. And, if we look to other and later Scriptures, we shall find a broader application of the principle of the divine call.

It appears incorrect to say that the deacons "were chosen by popular vote." There is no mention of a "vote." It is recorded that "the saying [of the apostles] pleased the whole multitude," and "they chose." What they did may be compared with what is done in the church today in business meetings where members may confirm or approve, or withhold approval, of those called to the priesthood.

In the incident mentioned the apostles, confronted with a problem created by rapidly increasing membership, called a general assembly or special conference of the church. With "apostles and elders" (Acts 16: 4) at Jerusalem, we must accept the probability of spiritual leadership, strongly suggested in Acts 14: 21-23. The accounts are brief and incomplete, omitting details we would like to know; but we cannot exclude the probability of divine guidance in the calls to office.

The governing principles in selection of priesthood are two: the divine call, and the approval of the church. A man does not officially, in the church, receive his own call; it is given through another. Aaron's call came through Moses (Exodus 28: 1).

The principle of the call is expressed in Doctrine and Covenants 17: 1 b, concerning the calls of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery as apostles and elders. Section 17: 21 b also mentions as "called of God" the one who is to baptize, which includes elders and priests.

Finally, the whole ministry is included in Doctrine and Covenants 83: 15 a in the words, "all the faithful who are called of God in the church, unto the ministry."

Question

What is the teaching of the church regarding the renewing of our baptismal promise when we partake of the Sacrament or Communion?

E. P.

California

Answer

In the Herald of January 9, 1950, Brother Charles Fry includes the following paragraph in answer to a more extensive question:

We know of no Scripture which specifically says that partaking of the Communion is a renewing of our covenant with God, though it is often so spoken of in our services. It is not so much a renewal as it is an acknowledgment of the existing covenant and an affirmation that we have done and are willing to continue doing the things our covenant and the law of God require us to do. It is an enacted testimony or a witnessing that we have since last partaking either kept ourselves from those faults and sins which would estrange us from our fellow men and from God, or, having fallen into any such sin, we have followed the law of repentance, and have effected reconciliation, leaving our conscience clear and our souls an acceptable offering to God.

The requirement that the emblems are to be partaken of in remembrance of Christ undoubtedly involves more than keeping in mind the fact of his crucifixion and death, and includes remembering his commandments at all times and places. In partaking we are reminded of our covenant to serve him and keep his commandments.

It is probably rather fruitless to enter into discussion as to whether the use of the word "renewing" necessarily implies that the covenant was broken. This is simply a problem in semantics.

Those who feel that the word means to remake the covenant after it was once broken do not like to use the phrase "renewing our covenant." But those who think of the word as it is used when we say that a tired person is "renewed" after a good night's rest find no objection to this phrase. Perhaps the best thing to do, since the word "renew" has such variable meanings, is to cultivate the habit of using the phrase "to reaffirm our covenant."

History of Quindaro Congregation

Photos by Keith B. Stokes

QUINDARO, a town of considerable size and importance in pioneer days, was built on the Missouri River to the north and west of Twentieth and Quindaro Boulevard and Hutchings Street as they now exist in Kansas City, Kansas. Today nothing remains of the town but the name, adopted by Quindaro congregation.

Among those who remained in the vicinity were William and Emily Lewis, staunch Latter Day Saints. Tent meetings were held near the home of Brother and Sister Harrieth in the summer of 1903, and in 1904 by Missionary J. D. White.

The beginning of the Quindaro Branch was a Sunday school organized in 1908 at the Lewis home. Sister Emily Lewis called the neighborhood children together and organized the Sunday school herself.

The organizational meeting of the branch was held February 19, 1911, at Sleigel Hall by Apostle J. F. Curtis and Center Stake Presidency members George E. Harrington, William H. Harrieth, and M. H. Bond. Elder Daniel E. Hough was elected president. Other priesthood members were John Tucker, a priest; Albert Johnson, a teacher; and Zeno Eason, a deacon. Phoebe Tucker was chorister, Lester A. Fowler secretary, and Leo Lewis librarian.

Elias Etzenhouser organized the branch Sunday school with John Tucker as superintendent. Elder Schearer from Independence held preaching services in the early days of branch organization. Sister Phoebe Tucker tramped the hills of Quindaro, telling the Restoration story to all who would listen. She was a devout member whose work will never be forgotten.

Meetings were held in the Reimers Hall until a church was built at 2815 South Twentieth Street in 1910. Later the little white frame building was sold, and the Saints held meetings for about a year in the Sleigel Hall, until the church was built at the present address, 2932 Hutchings. The lot was purchased on July 23, 1919, and the cornerstone was laid August 8, 1920.

Cottage gatherings have been an activity of the group. From Quindaro storehouse, although small at times, those in need have received food, clothing, or fuel. For many years the group had an orchestra. A revolving treasury system gave beginners their instruments.

Brother Ammon White once prophesied that if the Saints would "hold together with a steadfast faith, their little frame building would not hold them." This prophecy has been fulfilled.

Charter members include Mr. and Mrs. Daniel E. Hough, John Tucker, Phoebe Tucker, Albert Johnson, Zeno Eason, Lester A. Fowler, William Lewis, Emily Lewis, Leo Lewis, Charles Barron and family, Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Kaplinger, and Emmett N. Palmer and family.

Pastors in the order of service have been Daniel E. Hough, James Kaplinger, John Tucker, Emmett N. Palmer, Wallace Eskridge, Harmon A. Higgins, Charles V. Graham, Lester A. Fowler, Joseph E. Davis, Meredith E. Mader, Lewis J. Richards, Donald L. Graham, Lewis E. Richards, Lester A. Fowler, and Glenn Sivits. Twice, in 1926 and 1948, the Stake Presidency was in charge for short periods.

The first service in the new chapel was held April 21, 1957, with Elder Sivits preaching the sermon.

On November 10 the consecration service and official opening were held. Priesthood members officiating were President W. Wallace Smith, Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp, Stake President Fred O. Davies, Stake Bishop Joseph Baldwin, Pastor Sivits, and his counselor, Meredith E. Mader.—Prepared from material by WILLIAM H. FOX

His father was now totally blind so Israel, Nina, and son Joseph Perrine, who was one year old, moved to Independence in 1913 where Israel was a constant companion and private secretary to his father until President Joseph Smith died on December 10, 1914. His second son, Donald Carlos, was born at the West Short Street home in 1916.

As a young man "I. A.," as he preferred to be known in his earlier years, was active in sports. He loved baseball and played it quite well. One of his chief forms of recreation of later years was to attend ball games or watch them on TV. He had no hobbies unless his reading could be called that. Most of his reading was associated with his work, whatever that might be. He did not care for fiction but read for enlightenment.

Israel Smith was a home man. He took his boys on hunting trips and the family vacationed together, but it was hard to get him away from his home for a social evening. He was a quiet and meditative man.

His son Joseph died in 1936 while attending Missouri University. It was a hard blow to the parents. In a prayer uttered following his death, Brother Smith said, "We have loved him dearly, and with loving and earnest hands have clung to him. . . . His was a bright and kindred spirit, and if heaven is peopled with spirits such as his, there is where I want to be."

Nina Smith, his talented wife, passed to the world of spirits on October 8, 1950. Since then his son Donald and daughter-in-law Darlene have made their home with him. President Smith had an apartment with a desk and typewriter so he could have privacy as the mood struck him. He did much of his office work in the seclusion of his room. He was fond of his three grandchildren, and found it easy to be considerate of both young and old.

A citizen of broad, humane interests, he was also a great church leader by the standard of righteous living and practical achievements. Besides membership in the Missouri and American Bar Associations, he once held the presidency of the Iowa Pioneer Lawmakers Association, Optimists International, and the Independence Bar Association. He was a member of the American War Dads and a trustee of tuberculosis, Red Cross, and historical societies. He gave much time to his work as President of the Board of Trustees of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. Perhaps his outstanding civic service was as a member of the convention which gave Missouri a new constitution in 1944. There he served as chairman of the committee on Public Health, Welfare, and Federal Relations.

Besides his son and family Israel A. Smith is survived by his sister Audentia Anderson of Omaha, Nebraska, and his three brothers, Richard C. of Kansas City, Missouri, W. Wallace and Reginald A. of Independence, many relatives and friends.

Today we lay to rest the mortal remains of a loving father and grandfather. When a good man has passed the four-score milestone, death holds more of hope and expectation than does more years. He had a strong conviction that his loved ones and the redeemed of all ages await him over there. We have lost a father, brother, neighbor, and friend. He has gained those things which "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man."

Letters

Don't Let This Happen at Your Reunion

Toward the middle of the week he came among them—a young man in the service of his country. He chose to spend his leave from his base in a way that was commendable; he went to a near-by reunion in the hope of meeting and associating with young people of the church. Life had not given him much opportunity to mingle with others of his age and religious belief.

A young man needs to have a feeling of "belonging." Perhaps that is why he loved his branch of the armed services so much—its great esprit de corps gave him the feeling that he was a useful member of a great team.

So he went to the reunion, stood around, sat in the services, left before his leave was up. No one talked to him except one or two older men. Young people his age, intent on their own personal relationships, walked by laughing, swinging hands; no one asked him to come along to play, no one said, "Come sit with us at this next service."

Perhaps he did not appear shy, but he was, deeply so. Shy people so often put on an unconcerned, nonchalant air for self-protection.

He went back to his base lonely, disillusioned. Today he writes a letter from a faraway land: "I feel I've reached a low point in my life. . . . I wish I could have religion and faith, but 99 per cent of my religious teachings don't seem realistic to me. . . . I still believe in a divine power, someone or something that is bigger than I—the One who planned all this. I need Him to lean on, to pray to, but I just don't know how. Some men can turn to their chaplain for help, but he is mortal, and I don't feel as though I could confide in any human being."

A mother wonders at what might have been and begs for your prayers in this young man's behalf and any others like him. But most of all she pleads, "Don't let this happen at your reunion."

God Is Ever Near

God is ever near when we need him. At times I feel unworthy to take the Communion, but all I need to do is talk to my heavenly Father about the things which trouble me, and I find him ready to help. He knows our hearts and understands the meaning of all that happens to us.

Recently I finished reading the Book of Mormon for the second time, and God's spirit was with me as I read each page. Surely no one with a sincere heart could deny its truthfulness.

I also enjoy reading the Herald and other church publications. The inspiration that accompanies the reading of God's word is one of the greatest experiences that can come to us.

"San" Student Honored

Kay Pinson, freshman student nurse at the "San," was recently honored by the student nurses in the Second District, Missouri State Student Nurse Association. Miss Pinson was elected corresponding secretary of the district association. There are approximately eight hundred members in this association.

Recovery Room Opens

Another milestone has been reached at the "San." On May 28 the first patients were taken to the new recovery room from the operating rooms. Ready to receive them were Mrs. Anna Payton, R.N., and Miss Elsil Hammer, L.P.N., and two student nurses, Janice Roberson of Kansas City, Missouri, and Sonita Smith of Eugene, Oregon.

This room is equipped to give the best possible care to patients recovering from an anesthetic. It is located in the operating room suite, conveniently arranged so that anesthesiologists and surgeons can be obtained quickly if their services are needed by the patient.

Commencement Exercises

Commencement exercises for the graduating Class of 1958 were held on the evening of May 30 in the Stone Church. Elder Charles D. Neff gave a stirring address entitled "Say It with Life." The music of the Cantanina Chorus, with Mrs. Ronald Lentell at the organ, added greatly to the beauty of the service. President Israel A. Smith, assisted by Vida Butterworth, presented the graduating nurses with their diplomas. Miss Gertrude Copeland, superintendent emeritus, assisted by Nelle Morgan, presented a hospital pin to each graduate. The class sponsor, Elaine Mitcalfe, R.N., presented a beautiful red rose to each. Chaplain Ray Ashenburt offered the invocation and Dr. James VanBiber the benediction.

In attendance at the service were the faculty, graduate nurse staff and alumnae, representatives of the medical staff, freshman and junior student nurses, the Board of Trustees, members of the School of Nursing Committee, and a host of relatives and friends of the class members.

Immediately following the ceremony a reception was held in the School of Nursing Recreation Building. In the receiving line with the graduates were Mr. and Mrs. A. Neal Deaver, Dr. and Mrs. M. R. Bay, and Chaplain and Mrs. Ray Ashenburt.

There were thirty-three nurses graduating:

Public Views New Additions

The general public was invited to view the new additions to the Sanitarium on Sunday afternoon, June 15. The conducted tours were preceded on Saturday night by a ribbon-cutting ceremony attended by special guests, persons who worked on the community hospital financial campaign, civic and health leaders, Civil Defense authorities, and volunteer service representatives.

An estimated 1000 persons saw the new facilities on the two occasions. They were guided by Gray Ladies and student nurses. Alumnae of the School of Nursing, departmental supervisors, and their assistants described the equipment to guests. Following the tours, visitors were taken to the new cafeteria for refreshments.

TRACT REVIEW

Authority in Religion

Here is a sixteen-page tract written by the managing editor of Herald House, Chris B. Hartshorn. Eleven of these pages are devoted to answering questions often asked on the subject of religious authority.

The introduction presents the three major concepts of ministerial authority: (1) the succession of authority view; (2) the Reformation concept including the professional training view; and (3) the restoration of authority directly from God after an apostasy. The meaning of "apostasy" and the place of the Restoration movement in a new concept of ministerial authority are then presented.

Among the questions answered are the following: "Has the minister of one church or denomination more authority to perform sacred ordinances than the minister of another denomination?" "Don't all ministers have authority to baptize those who repent and want to be saved?" "What does a minister do which necessitates a personal call from heaven?" "What do you mean when you say a minister has authority to represent God and administer the ordinances?"

The tract closes with the account of the experience of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery in receiving the Aaronic priesthood, and there is a summary of the biblical Scriptures pointing out the various offices of priesthood.

This tract sells for 10 cents per single copy.

And Finally...

TONGUE TROUBLE

We find many excuses for our lack of self-discipline; yet the fact remains we are responsible for our every act.

A little three-year-old, in trying to assert her independence, had overstepped the bounds of courtesy. Her father, sensing the potential danger in this type of expression, cautioned, "You had better watch your tongue, little girl. Do you think God would want you to talk that way?" She looked a little hurt and didn't answer immediately. Her father's attention was diverted momentarily and he failed to see her facial gymnastics. It wasn't until she began to cry and reach out to him in an appeal for an understanding of her problem that he realized she was still considering his remarks. "But, Daddy, I can't see my tongue. How am I going to watch what I'm saying?"

SILENT PARTNERS

My friend Spot walked me home again one noon last week. He had a friend with him who might have been a relative. He lacked the curly tail and was a wee bit smaller, but he had the same markings. The interesting thing about this pair was their evident satisfaction in trotting along near by without making a sound nor getting under foot.

Most pets demand and get lots of attention and will let you know they are around if you try to ignore them. In this age of noise, incessant noise, these two were unique, anomalous.

The sage who wrote "Silence is golden" died centuries before the radio, TV, jet plane, and auto horn reached the incubation stage. The young fry would call him a "kill-joy," but I think he had a good idea. Perhaps he liked to hear himself think.

HOURS SET APART

I have heard a lot of sermons on the Word of Wisdom (Section 86), and I would not underestimate its importance. However, I wonder why I have never heard one pulpit proclamation on the virtues of its counterpart (Section 119:9) ". . . take sleep in the hours set apart by God for the rebuilding and strengthening of the body and mind . . ." Of course, popularizing it may lead to as much debate on which hours God set apart as there currently is on whether "hot" means hot or something else.

Chances are, when the Lord gave this advice back in 1887 the Saints didn't have as much to do as present day members. At the pace we keep, he is going to have not only a tired people but a tired people.

I'm in favor of a thirty-six-hour day to fit our schedule.

The August issue of Stride will present the first installment of a serial feature by Seventy F. Edward Butterworth. It is entitled "Adventures of a South Seas Missionary." It will introduce you to some of the circumstances which face a missionary in the islands of the South Pacific, some pleasant, and others a little less so. Papeete Harbor, pictured above, is the main entry port for the islands. These fishing boats and copra boats represent the two main trades of the entire island chain. You may subscribe to Stride and read Brother Butterworth's testimony, along with many other items of interest to young people, for only $2.50 in the U.S., $2.75 in Canada, and $3.00 elsewhere.

Joseph A. Harrington

JOSEPH A. HARRINGTON became a beef butcher at Armour Packing Plant in Kansas City at the age of thirteen.

Although his father was an elder, he did not become interested in the church until after he was married to Laura Billinsly in 1899. Later he discovered that his wife had been fasting and praying for him for over a year.

In 1907 Brother Harrington was ordained an elder in the church. He was ordained a high priest in 1916 and became a member of the Kansas City Stake High Council, an office which he still holds.

"One of the most outstanding spiritual experiences I ever had was shortly after I was married," Brother Harrington said. "I picked up a tract to read about the church. I had only read a few lines when the Spirit of God rested on me in great power for a period of fifteen or twenty minutes. It gave me the knowledge that this church is the church of Jesus Christ."

Brother and Sister Harrington have four children: Verna, Edgar, Myrtle, and Paul.

Statistics Show a Gain in Filers and Contributors

RECORDS for 1957 show a large increase in the percentage of church members contributing to the General Church.

A recent report by the Presiding Bishopric states that the percentage of contributors in the United States, Canada, and Hawaii increased from 37.1 in 1956 to 42 per cent in 1957. The large number of Auditorium Fund contributors appears to be responsible for the increase, the report said.

The number of contributors in 1957 was 58,562. In 1956 there were 50,608 contributors to the General Church.

Despite this sizable increase in contributors, the report points out that there was only a twenty-seven-per cent increase in per capita giving to the general fund. In 1956 per capita giving to the general fund stood at $14.66. In 1957 the figure was $14.93.

Center Stake ranked first in 1957 among the ninety-three stakes and districts shown on the report. The stake had the highest percentage of contributors (62.5 per cent) and the highest per capita contributions ($35.22).

Far West Stake captured first place in percentage of members filing up-to-date tithing statements. Over 35 per cent of the Saints in Far West filed statements in 1957.

Church-wide figures show that the percentage of members filing tithing statements increased from 16.67 per cent in 1956 to 17.6 per cent in 1957. It is interesting to note that in 1947 the General Church averaged 7.88 per cent in this field.

General Church income in the United States, Canada, and Hawaii for 1957 was $2,603,796. In 1956 it was $2,454,458. This excludes surplus consecrated and bequests.

In determining the number of contributors, the Bishopric includes all persons who contributed to any General Church fund and received an official receipt covering the contribution.

Tithing statement filers are those whose up-to-date accounting is received at headquarters during the year. R. Y.

Ten Words That Changed the World

"For he whom God hath sent, speaketh the words of God."—John 3: 34.

IT WAS while the service was going on in church on a certain Sunday morning that something the speaker said suggested that each of the great messages of Jesus could be epitomized in a single word, and the thought came that a few words could be selected and easily remembered that would symbolize the great teachings of the Christian message.

The advantage of such a group of words would be that anyone could remember them and think of them without always having to open the Book to find them. There are times when we cannot carry the Scripture of our faith with us, and must carry our thoughts and ideals in mind if we are to have them with us as a guide.

From this point, it was easy to select a few such words and find the Scriptures from which they are taken. Some people may prefer other words. But the following will at least give us a start for something to remember:

Come. Jesus said: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matthew 11: 29).

Follow. Jesus said: "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men" (Matthew 4: 18).

Give. Jesus said: "Give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven" (Matthew 19: 21).

Do. Jesus said: "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise" (Luke 6: 32).

Pray. Jesus said: "Men ought always to pray and not to faint" (Luke 18: 1).

Repent. Jesus said: "Repent ye, and believe the gospel" (Mark 1: 13).

Believe. Jesus said: "Be not afraid, only believe" (Mark 5: 28).

Serve. Jesus said: "And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant" (Matthew 20: 27).

Love. Jesus said: "Thou shalt love." "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, . . . and thy neighbor as thyself" (Matthew 22: 36, 38).

Teach. Jesus said: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations" (Matthew 28: 18).

Ten words that have changed the world in two thousand years—ten messages of God, delivered by the Son. Ten words that have their counterparts in other languages, each standing for a universal idea. These are words of power that have exercised their power in the world by changing the hearts and minds of men and women.

These words are keys that can unlock the richer treasures of life and happiness for all people. They have the power to eliminate cruelty, hate, and greed, and to control all the destructive aspects of the societies of the world.

These words can change the lives of individuals. They can change you and me, and they can begin to do it now.

These are words of human language, it is true—one human language out of many. In other languages, other words take their places. But back of each word is a universal meaning that can express somehow, more or less effectively, the principle that God wants to teach. The meanings have value for all people, in all times, and in all places.

We know people who have put these words of our Lord to work in their lives. Such lives have been transformed, and the people have known the power and the glory of the gospel through the great meanings of these words.

The world has been blessed more wonderfully—so far as it has been blessed at all—through the great spiritual and social realities that lie back of these words and words like them in other languages around the earth. And millions of individuals have found their way to God through the pathways provided and illuminated by those who have used the words.

For all of us today, here are ten words that can change our lives, and change the world into something beautiful and wonderful as a place in which we and our children and our children's children can live.

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

From Apostle Arthur A. Oakman:

News of the selection of Dr. Harvey Grice as President of Graceland College reached me via your kind letter just now. I was instrumental in the calling and the ordination of this good man to the high priesthood. Needless to say the selection, so far as I am concerned, is ideal. Brother Grice has a real Christian ministry to offer. I was with him in two reunions and experienced this ministry in the priesthood classes he taught and was uplifted by his simple yet profound presentation of principle and theory. It is, in my opinion, very fitting that high priestly ministry undergird our college, and that the men and women who serve us there do so under intelligent and conscious sacrifice. Brother Grice will meet every requirement in this

Baptismal Report for March

There were 273 baptismal reports received in the Department of Statistics in March, 1958. This is 29 less than were received in March, 1957.

The total for the first quarter of 1958 is 850. This is 87 more than were received in the first quarter of 1957. Only two other years, 1930 and 1921, show more reports received in the first quarter.

The enrollment of the church at the end of the first quarter of 1958 is 167,575. Stakes and districts from which the five highest baptismal totals were reported in March, 1958 are Center Stake of Zion—17, Eastern Colorado District—13, Oklahoma City District—12, Kirtland District—11, Detroit International Stake and Maine District—each 10.

Branches and missions reporting the five highest baptismal totals in March, 1958, are Stonington, Maine—10; and Fort Wayne, Indiana, Lincoln, Nebraska, and Pueblo, Colorado—8 each; Del-City, Oklahoma, and Sault Ste Marie, Ontario—7 each.

regard, I am sure, and his experience as a doctor of science in the practical affairs of the business world will give an added value to his college presidency.

Seventy Fred C. Banta writes from Norway just after arriving at his new assignment:

Apostle Oakman, Bishop Compier, and Seventy and Mrs. Richard Andersen, along with other Saints from Oslo, met us at the dock. We were made to feel at home immediately, and an apartment was acquired for us that same day. We were able to move into it about a week and a half later.

Brethren Oakman, Compier, Andersen, and I have spent several days meeting the Saints in Norway and making plans for our work for the next few years.

Jan and I appreciated the Presidency's letter of encouragement we received when we boarded ship for Norway. This letter, and others from relatives and friends, as well as the fine fellowship we had with Saints in New Jersey before our departure, helped us overcome any anxiety we might have had about the journey. The Lord continues to bless us, and because of this we pray that our contribution in Norway may be significant in his sight.

Brother Banta adds a postscript:

Our three-day Pinse conference had Dr. L. O. Brockway as guest speaker. All of us received an excellent spiritual lift from Brother Brockway's ministry, and all seemed confident that the work of the gospel would progress in Norway and other parts of Scandinavia.

Seventy C. R. Mundorff has just completed a series of services in Grand Rapids, Michigan. He writes:

It was one of the most outstanding missionary experiences of my ministry. The series was launched with an early morning televised service over WOOD-TV, May 4. The pastoral arm of the branch under the leadership of the pastor, James Phillips, did an outstanding job of setting up the cottage meetings and arranging the schedule so as to get the missionary in as many homes of friends of the church as possible.

Six families were united in the faith with two new families being won. Sunday afternoon, June 1, fifteen people were baptized. Five more are preparing themselves by further study and worship with the Saints.

On Sunday, May 25, Elder Alma Dieterman concluded his prebaptismal class, and nine were baptized that afternoon. This brought the total of baptisms during the four weeks to twenty-four.

The Saints are enthusiastic in going forth with the message of the Restoration, and many have been refired in their conviction of the divinity of the work. The area looks very good for further missionary endeavor, and an excellent opportunity for growth is before the church in Grand Rapids.

A World-wide Influence for Good

The Funeral Sermon of President Israel A. Smith

Delivered by Glaude A. Smith, Pastor of Stone Church

"Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God; therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure."

"And in nothing doth man offend God, or against none is his wrath kindled, save those who confess not his hand in all things, and obey not his commandments. Behold, this is according to the law and the prophets . . . he who doeth the works of righteousness, shall receive his reward, even peace in this world, and eternal life in the world to come."

"Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord."

"Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity and in whose spirit there is no guile."

"Blessed is the man who feareth the Lord, and delighteth greatly in his commandments."

"Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee and in whose heart are the highways to Zion."

"And now I give unto you a commandment to beware concerning yourselves, to give diligent heed to the words of eternal life; for you shall live by every word that proceedeth forth from the mouth of God."

"Remember the worth of souls is great in the sight of God."

"For God so loved the world, that he gave his Only Begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish; but have everlasting life."

"Wherefore, ye must press forward with a steadfastness in Christ, having a perfect brightness of hope, and a love of God and of all men. Wherefore, if ye shall press forward, feasting upon the word of Christ and endure to the end, behold, thus saith the Father: Ye shall have eternal life."

In the very expressive words of John Oxenham, the poet:

*This earth is but a school preparative
For higher ministry. . . .*

*There is no death;
To those whose hearts are set
On higher things than this life doth afford.*

"And whoso is found a faithful, a just, and a wise steward, shall enter into the joy of his Lord, and shall inherit eternal life."

For to the good steward the Lord says, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

"And now if Christ had not come into the world . . . there could have been no redemption. And if Christ had not risen from the dead or have broken the bands of death, that the grave should have no victory, and that death should have no sting, there could have been no resurrection. But there is a resurrection, therefore the grave hath no victory, and the sting of death is swallowed up in Christ. He is the light and the life of the world; yea, a light that is endless, that can never be darkened; yea, and also a life which is endless, that there can be no more death. Even this mortal shall put on immortality, and this corruption shall put on incorruption, and shall be brought to stand before the bar of God, to be judged of him according to their works, whether they be good or whether they be evil. If they be good, to the resurrection of endless life and happiness."

This anonymous poem brings some wonderful thoughts:

*There is a plan far greater than the plan you know,
There is a landscape broader than the one you see.
There is a haven where storm-tossed souls may go.
You call it death. We, immortality.*

*You call it death, this seeming endless sleep;
We call it birth, the soul at last set free.
'Tis hampered not by time or space. You weep.
Why weep at death? 'Tis immortality.*

*Farewell, dear voyager, 'Twill not be long.
Thy work is done, now may peace rest with thee.
Thy kindly thoughts and deeds, they will live on.
This is not death, 'tis immortality.*

*Farewell, dear voyager, the river winds and turns,
The cadence of thy song wafts near to me,
And now thou knowest the thing that all men learn;
There is no death. There's immortality.*

Because of Jesus Christ our Lord and the victory we have through him, while facing death we talk of life—life eternal, life everlasting. We may speak of paying our last respects to one who has departed from our midst, as though it had to do with something final, something finished, but in the same moment, in our faith we look to God and commend the immortal spirit of our loved one to his care. We may talk of a land from which no one has ever returned, and in the same instant reflect upon the sure and certain hope of the resurrection because Christ did rise from the dead. He did return; and for forty days he ministered among the men of ancient Judea as their resurrected Lord.

The words of Jesus are very often referred to as the words of life. The words of Jesus are the words of eternal life; they have to do with this world and the world to come. They are the eternal words of God—not just spoken but purposefully translated into human living. Jesus declared the words of eternal life. He also personally ministered this life unto men. Christ in his followers—this was life brought into their very being by his word and by his Spirit. It became their hope of glory, and it is still the hope of glory of all followers of Christ. The beloved Apostle John said, "He that hath the Son, hath life"—not a future achievement but a very present reality.

We rejoice in the word of God today as he said, "This is my work and my glory, to bring to pass the immortality, and eternal life of man." We believe in the God to whom our Brother Israel gave his unquestioned allegiance, and whom he served faithfully to the very last. We believe that God is actively, helpfully interested in bringing through his Son and through his church and through the power of his divine Spirit eternal life to us today. This is the belief of the church over which President Israel A. Smith presided. God is actively at work in his world today. By his word and by his Spirit he enters into the lives of men to lift them up to refine their lives and make them spiritual and noble, helpful to all mankind, so that our world may become the kind of world into which God may someday come to abide among his people.

This belief affects all of life. It had great effect in the life of President Israel A. Smith as I saw him as his pastor. This belief gives deep meaning to life, for all of life takes its meaning and purpose from the life which was in Christ and was ministered through him to others. And it continues to be ministered into the lives of men through his church today.

Brother Israel shared much of life with us while he lived here among us—the life of God through his Spirit. We knew him. We saw him coming and going among us. We shared in his wonderful spirit of love and friendship. In his home for over forty-one years he shared all with a good wife, each faithful to the other until death parted them. They had much of joy, but they also had some very deep sorrow. Whether in joy or sorrow they shared, sustaining each other, rejoicing together or sorrowing together down through the years.

IN LATER YEARS, with his son and his son's companion and children in the home, Brother Israel found joy in the love he had for his grandchildren and in the knowledge that they loved him dearly. In the home this man was a Christian husband, father, and grandparent. In the community he was a very excellent friend and neighbor.

A simple little story, but typical of the man, is an incident which occurred the last time I remember seeing Brother Israel A. Smith. I had started to cross the street on my way to the Stake Office from the Stone Church when someone waved a hand and called, "Hi." I looked up as his car went by and saw and answered this man whom I rejoiced to call my friend, and whose love I had known. I can't forget that friendly greeting. Today the remembrance of it means much to me.

If this were something that had to do with me alone, it would not be very significant, just one man's experience. But I talked to someone yesterday who goes to work early each morning. This neighbor told me that while he was waiting for the bus, Brother Israel often came by as he went to his office in the early morning hours, and he would always wave a "good morning" as he went on his way. This neighbor of President Smith then told me how much this meant, getting on the bus to go to work after having this wonderful greeting from this good friend. Brother Israel was always friendly and approachable by all.

In the Stone Church congregation he was one of the most faithful members in attendance, listening to and encouraging the workers there as opportunity offered and frequently coming up to express his appreciation for the ministry we were striving to give. Very often he would speak in encouragement to some younger man of the ministry who might be preaching for the first time in the Stone Church. He was not one who liked to push forward. We invited him time after time to come up on the stand with us; but he chose to sit in his usual place. For many years he sat over in the west wing, but toward the last he changed, coming up the east steps and going into the east wing. We were always aware of his presence at our services, usually at the early morning hour on Sunday, faithfully attending, listening, doing everything that he could to encourage us in the local church life.

In civic life, he was interested in that which had to do with the welfare of his fellow human beings. Notice the various organizations of which he became a member, helping in those projects which would contribute to the good of his fellow men. He also entered helpfully into those things pertaining to law and government, and by invitation found his place with those who worked together in forming the new constitution for the state of Missouri. Here is a man respected in his home, in the local community, in his local church, and in civic affairs in his home city, county, and state.

HAVING NOTED ALL these good things, we now give attention to the very important place he held as the presiding head of the church. His influence immediately reached out beyond local limits when he became the head of the church. He visited various countries of the world, some of them beyond the oceans. The meekness and humility of the man and his love for human beings thus reached out to bless many people far removed from Independence. I feel that I am justified in saying what is in my heart and soul today. I believe that this brother of ours, the head of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ for the last twelve years, had a worldwide influence for good. As he reached out to the members of the church throughout the world, he stimulated in them a love for God and for their fellow human beings.

He stimulated and inspired in others a desire to unite with the people of God in carrying God's work forward. He made an excellent contribution to the unity and love and forward movement of the church during those twelve years. He was a man who had our respect, and at least part of the reason for that was that he had so much respect for others. The officers and members would be expected to respect and honor him as the president of the church; but he never lost an opportunity to show his respect for others. He has often told someone when we were out together, "This is my pastor—the pastor of the congregation where I attend church." It startled me at first to have him speak that way, but it was his way of showing his respect for the office of pastor and for me as his pastor. I'm sure he has affected others as he affected me, for he always showed a willingness to listen to what others had to say, to give consideration to their opinions and ideas, and to put all those ideas together for the good of all. We learned to respect him even as he respected each man in his office and in his place.

TWO THINGS ARE very important in the work of Jesus Christ our Lord. One has to do with the individual. The other has to do with sociality. According to the word of the Apostle Peter each is to add to his "faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." When this is done we have in our souls that which makes of us the kind of children of God that can eventually inherit the everlasting kingdom. As the Apostle Peter puts it, "For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ."

It is very necessary that we realize today that there can be no worth-while and effective social order unless the principles of life that have come to us through Jesus Christ—that not only mean abundant life on earth today but also life eternal—shall first bear fruit in the individual.

Brother Israel was moved by this transforming Spirit and added to his faith the Christian virtues. They made him the man that he was. Necessarily, there must first be many people who respond to the teachings of Christ, to the words of eternal life, and who bring into their own lives those virtues that were in Christ. Then by gathering all those people together who have thus taken Christ for their guide and leader, who are workers together with him for the accomplishment of his great purpose, and adding to them in their fellowship the guidance of that Spirit which moved Christ to give himself for the good of all mankind, we shall see the growth of a social order among us that will become a power for good for all. Today the greatest need in our world is that all those who love the Lord shall learn to so love each other and walk with each other in all things pertaining to life that the face of our world may be transformed into a place of love and joy and peace because of the righteousness of people. Those who have taken Christ into their lives and are guided by his influence may thus be able to make of our world the kind of place that is safe for everybody.

TODAY MEMBERS of the church everywhere mourn the loss of their leader whom they loved dearly. Today we in the Stone Church, in Independence, and in the Center Stake mourn the loss of one who lived among us, shared intimately with us, was very close to us. We honor him today by considering those things for which he stood which have to do with the transformation of the lives of men and women, that the glory of God may be seen in them. These good stewards of the teaching of Christ will not only apply them in their own lives but will minister them unto others.

And herein is the greatest reason for faith and hope that is held out to men today; for there is something more powerful in this world than atom bombs—something more wonderful, more meaningful than anything that has to do with physical life or death. It is the ministering of eternal life to men who, living in the light of Christ, may learn to control everything for the good of all mankind. This is vastly more important, more powerful than the destructive forces man can devise. Under the teachings of Christ and by the light and power of his Spirit men can learn to control all life for the good of mankind. Then all the things that come into their hands shall be used for wonderful, helpful purposes.

If I have thrown some of the idealism of the church into this and preached a little, I hope you will forgive me. I feel that Brother Israel A. Smith loved the cause of Christ and desired to see His work go forward that all men might live in Christ, that the fear of death might be taken away and that instead there might be a bright hope of immortality and eternal life.

As we think of Brother Israel and the place he occupies in our hearts, we offer in final tribute of respect the beautiful thoughts in this poem by Rossiter W. Raymond.

*Crowned Son of God! Behold, Thy friend
Departs from us, to bide with Thee. . . .
And by Thy promise sure, we know
That he on whom we leaned in love
Shall stand, as in Thy Church below,
A pillar, in Thy Church above!*

May the God of heaven help us that the vision which moved in the life of Brother Israel Smith can also be effective in us. May the special blessing of the Spirit of God be with our young brother Don and his wife and children, not only to comfort them in this time of need but to inspire in their souls all those things which have to do with life everlasting through Christ, our Lord. May they partake of the wonderful blessings of eternal life which meant so much to this good father, husband, and leader of our church. And may the blessing of God be upon all of these loved ones gathered here today. With some of them we have shared much through the years and have been in their homes many times.

God loves each and every one of you, of this we are assured. Under the power of his Holy Spirit he will guide and direct and help throughout all of your lives if you seek him. We ask God's divine blessing upon you and upon all those loved ones and friends here and everywhere who today share in paying respect and honor to Brother Israel. We ask it all in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Case for the World Fellowship Fund

AT GRACELAND the program entitled "The World Fellowship Fund" has been established to help finance a "Graceland Experience" for young people from other lands. This fund has been the primary source of financial aid for these students. In recent years the major contributions to the fund have been made during the Home-coming activities. However, individuals have contributed money at other times to support our students from other lands. These people have recognized that the church is increasing its missionary activity in other countries. They are helping the college to keep pace by providing finances for young people from those countries. To keep pace with the moving church program, the college must educate greater numbers of young people from other lands. The "World Fellowship Fund" must be widely understood; it must have greater support.

For a long time it has been the American dream to furnish maximum education for all. This meant that there should be no ceiling on the educational opportunity of the American youth. Each year, despite rising costs and a more complex society, that dream has been nearer realization for American youth.

It is important that the members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ with their basic conviction concerning the worth of the individual should be even more concerned with education of youth. We have espoused and been aggressively engaged in programs of education since the restoration of the church. As a part of this drive for education for church members the church has endorsed higher education by its support of Graceland College. The people of the church have aspired to send their children to Graceland, the church college.

Thus far most American youth, with the ability for success, who have wanted to do so have found the finances to attend Graceland. This is not true for students from other lands. The differences in the rate of exchange, the cost of travel, and the limited earning opportunity in other countries make it very difficult for R.L.D.S. young people from other countries to attend the church college. There is a real need for the fine young people from our churches abroad to share in the kind of educational experience that is available only to church youth at Graceland.

For several years the World Fellowship Fund has helped a few of these young people to attend Graceland. It is important that funds be provided for increasing the numbers of these young people to attend Graceland. Some of the reasons are noted here:

- (1) The entire college group as well as the students from other lands has benefited very much from the exchanging of ideas.
- (2) The students have developed a greater understanding of the universality of the church and its mission.
- (3) These students want to serve the church in their home areas. They will be better qualified for this work following a Graceland experience. They will be better able to interpret the meaning and mission of a universal church serving a universal God.

The total mission of the church will be helped as these young people are privileged to come to the church college and study. Their living experience will enrich the quality of their ministry after they return home.

The amount of money received for the World Fellowship Fund each year has been rather constant, while the costs of education have risen. We now need to find wider support for the church youth from other lands who wish to come to Graceland. There are several ways in which such support can be given to the fund. These avenues of help include

- (1) Direct grants of money. Some will desire that this be credited as an alumni contribution. (The Graceland Alumni Council acted last October to allow the World Fellowship Fund to share in alumni contributions.)
- (2) Gifts of clothing, bedding, and other material goods. This kind of help will aid significantly in reducing World Fellowship cash outlay.
- (3) Pledges for personal finances. In recent years several individuals have pledged a small monthly sum to help meet the personal expenses of a student.
- (4) Providing for employment opportunity. This last method is one of the best for helping students. Many of these young people come to our country with the competencies necessary in good employees. It has been our experience that all of them are industrious and anxious to help pay their educational costs.

The Student Immigration Laws allow students to work during the summer vacations. In many instances the students arrive in America in the early spring and have four or five months in which to work before school begins. The education of these students is broadened by the opportunity to live with church families in various parts of the country where they also have a good-paying job. The college favors this program, for the students earn their expense money while becoming oriented to our culture and improving their language facility.

The World Fellowship Fund will be benefited most by non-designated gifts. However, support in any of the ways mentioned will help materially and can be allocated to an individual if this is requested.

It is the dream of those of us who work at Graceland that each qualified young person in the church who makes application to come to Graceland will in some way find the financing to do so. We hope that this year funds will be available for many of those who wish to come to Graceland. Several are now awaiting acceptance.

Those who would share in this World Fellowship Program by gifts of clothing, by pledges of financial support, or by work opportunities, should correspond with the Dean of Students at Graceland. The case for the World Fellowship Fund is the case for youth in a world-wide church.

Financial Progress in 1957

THE YEAR 1957 showed continued gains in general church income and membership participation as indicated by the following schedule:

	1956	1957
Number and percentage filing tithing statements	22,758 16.67%	24,544 17.6%
Number and percentage contributing to the General Fund	45,341 33.22%	47,655 34.2%
Number and percentage contributing to all General funds	50,608 37.1%	58,562 42%
Contributions per member to General Fund	$14.66	$14.93
Contributions per member to all General Church funds	$17.98	$18.69

Twenty Leading Districts

Districts and stakes are ranked in terms of achievement in percentage of membership contributing to all general church funds, amounts contributed per member in tithes and all general church offerings, percentage of membership filing tithing statements. Equal weight is given to the ranking in each category to arrive at a combined ranking for all stakes and districts. The twenty leading stakes and districts out of the 93 rankings for 1957 will follow. The figures in parentheses to the right of the stake or district designated show the rankings achieved in percentage of membership contributing to all general church funds, per capita contributions in tithes and all general church offerings and percentage of membership filing tithing statements in that order. For instance, Center Stake achieved first place in over-all ranking with first places in percentage contributing and per capita contributions and third place in percentage filing tithing statements.

1. Center Stake	(1-1-3)
2. Lamon Stake	(2-11-5)
3. Far West Stake	(9-14-1)
4. New York Metropolitan	(6-7-14)
5. Detroit International Stake	(11-5-12)
(6. Central Missouri Stake	(10-16-3)

(6. Kansas City Stake	(8-13-8)

18. Philadelphia Metropolitan	(14-22-41)
(19. Northeast Illinois and	(19-9-53)
(19. Black Hawk	(24-28-29)

In order to complete the year in the top twenty rankings, a stake or district must rank in the top third of at least two of the three subsidiary rankings.

Outstanding Gains

Thirteen districts gained ten or more places in over-all rankings. Unusually high gains were made by Kansas-Colorado, Southern Ohio, Red River, Youngstown, and Alberta Districts.

Kansas-Colorado made an outstanding gain from seventy-ninth place in over-all ranking in 1956 to fortieth place in 1957. This was achieved by a per capita increase in giving from $13.05 to $15.11; a gain in contributors from 19 per cent to 36.8 per cent; and in filers, from 12 per cent to 20.1 per cent.

Southern Ohio gained thirty places over the 1956 ranking. Most outstanding was the gain from 9.9 per cent filing in 1956 to 18.1 per cent in 1957.

The numerically small district of Red River gained 28 places in over-all ranking with an increase of $8.25 per member in per capita giving to all funds and an increase of over 16 per cent of membership contributing to the General Church.

Alberta District made an excellent gain of 19 places with a nicely balanced increase in percentage filing and contributing as well as per capita contributions.

Lower Florida, with 17 places gained, and Central Texas, with 16, showed most encouraging gains for the year.

Percentage Contributing

The use of Auditorium dime cards resulted in a very marked increase in the number of receipted contributors. A gain of nearly 5 per cent of the total membership was made in contributors to all general funds.

The twelve leading stakes and districts, with percentage of membership contributing to all general church funds, are as follows:

Location	Per Cent
1. Center Stake	62.5
2. Lamon Stake	61.8
3. Scranton	57.1
4. Washington, D. C.	55.7
5. Miami-Pittsburg	55
6. New York Metropolitan	54.8
7. Hawaii	54.2
8. Kansas City Stake	54
9. Far West Stake	53.8
10. Central Missouri Stake	52.5
11. Detroit International Stake	51.5
12. Rich Hill	50.3

The lowest rank of 93 has 18.7 per cent of membership contributing tithing or general church offerings. While this percentage is very low, it should be remembered that in 1947 twenty-two districts out of 76 stakes and districts had less than 18.7 per cent contributing to the General Fund, and the lowest rank had slightly under 6 per cent of its membership contributing in that year.

Per Member Contributions

The per member contributions remain disappointingly low. The average annual tithing contribution (General Fund) in 1957 was $14.93 with oblation, Auditorium, College Day, and Sanitarium School of Nursing Day amounting to $3.76 for a total of $18.69 for each properly enrolled member in the domestic field. It is estimated from such stake and district records as are available that an additional two thirds of this total should be added to include all local offerings for budgets, building funds, reunions, etc. This would make a total of $31.15 per member for each properly enrolled member in the United States, Canada, Hawaii, and Alaska. The National Council of Churches of Christ in the United States of America in 1957 reported an average giving of $56.74 for forty-one Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches in the United States, and $48.27 for churches in Canada. Twelve United States denominations report per member giving of over $100.00, and one of these reports over $200.00 as the per member contributions for the year.

The lowest rank of 93 is based on $4.23 tithing per member and $1.16 for all other offerings, a total of $5.39 per member. This rate of giving throughout the church would have resulted in a total General Church income of $751,000.00. The top rank was achieved with a per capita contribution of $35.22, which amount on a church-wide basis would have provided $4,998,000.00 of income. The actual income for tithes and all General Church offerings was $2,603,796.33 for the domestic field. The twelve leading stakes and districts with the per member contributions to all General Church funds for 1957 are as follows:

1. Center Stake	$35.22
2. Washington, D. C.	28.86
3. New York	26.99
4. Northwest Ohio	26.17
5. Detroit International Stake	25.65

6. Red River	$25.44
7. New York Metropolitan	25.18
8. Toronto	24.67
9. Northeast Illinois	24.07
10. Kirtland	24.00
11. Lamoni	23.47
12. Columbus	23.23

Thoughtful church members will raise some pertinent questions at this point as they compare present per member giving with that of other churches.

Are we using comparable statistics? Does our church have a much larger inactive list than other churches? Is the average Latter Day Saint included in the subnormal income groups, and our giving therefore reflects more or less accurately the giving ability of our membership? Is it possible that we have placed such emphasis on tithing that we have come to believe the one tenth of the increase will meet all church needs? Is it possible our low level of giving in some areas at least reflects spiritual poverty to a greater extent than it indicates limited economic resources?

A tithepayer in most churches pays $1,000 tithing on a $10,000 annual income which tithing usually includes both congregational and general church needs. Most of the one sixth of our members who pay tithing on an accounting basis will contribute between 1 per cent and 3.5 per cent of income as tithing. How many of these devoted members realize that in order to match the church giving of a tithe-paying neighbor of another church, they must contribute surplus or offerings for local budgets, building funds, reunion, oblation, etc., totaling from two to nine times the amount dedicated to our church as tithing? Is it possible that Latter Day Saints have so concentrated on the one tenth of increase that they seldom stop to calculate the percentage of income contributed to the church for all purposes? Is there a need for the church today to give more attention to the stewardship accounting as a means of determining not only the tithe but also ability to contribute surplus, freewill offerings, and consecrations to advance the cause of the kingdom (Doctrine and Covenants 129: 8)?

Tithing Statement Filers

Gains continued to be made in percentage of membership filing up-to-date tithing statements during the year. Sixteen districts and stakes completed the year with over 20 per cent of membership filing tithing statements, and only three districts remained below the General Church average of 7.8 per cent filing in 1947. The twelve leading stakes and districts with percentage of members filing are as follows:

	Per Cent
1. Far West Stake	35.5
2. Nauvoo	34.1
(3. Center Stake and	30.5
(3. Central Missouri Stake	30.5
5. Lamoni	30.1
6. Miami-Pittsburg	27.0
7. Rich Hill	26.9
8. Kansas City Stake	24.3
9. Michigan Upper Peninsula	23.9
10. Owen Sound	23.2
11. Springfield	22.8
12. Detroit International	21.8

With the uncertain economic conditions of 1957 and the measure of unemployment which affected our people adversely in some areas, we have reason to be grateful for the increased participation on the part of church membership and the increased income which came to the church. Very substantial gains in the numbers of church members making their stewardship accounting have been recorded in districts where the Abundant Life Program has been taken into the homes of our members. While the annual gains may appear to be slight, nevertheless over a period of a decade these gains become very substantial indeed and are reflected today in every aspect of the church activities.

Complete statistics are being furnished to all church appointees, stake and district presidents, bishops and bishop's agents. Additional information concerning your own specific stake or district is available from any of these church officers upon request.

Letters from Marian

(The following excerpts are from letters written by Marian Blumenschein since her last article appeared in the February 24 "Herald." Because so much interest has been expressed by Herald readers in the Blumenscheins and their "mission" in Honduras, the editors have requested permission to publish these paragraphs.)

February 12

Everything is looking up. We are moving this week to Mogote, the nearest village to the Suiza. John got the bridge in last week. It is a twenty-foot span, and our wonderful (they really are) new neighbors helped him without thought of pay.

Mogote sits on top of the mountain ridge. It is a clean, beautiful, Swisslike village of forty homes. The homes are red-tile roofed and are well kept. There is green grass, and stone walls and white goats complete the picture. We are happy with our prospects there as the people are equally delightful. We are to have a new address—and we think it will be permanent. It is Mogote, Santa Barbara, Honduras, Central America.

The congregation which met at our home for the first service which we held in Spanish. There were twenty-six in attendance.

March 16

If people should ask about sending us gifts of food or any packages, please advise them not to. It costs too much on both the sending and receiving ends. The children's school supplies (books and pencils valued at $8.00) cost us $2.00 to get them through customs. Also, we know that we are not getting all of our mail, so we think it unwise for anyone to send money as a gift. However, we do truly appreciate the concern of friends and loved ones, and we are thankful for their interest.

It will take a year at least for John to get licensed to practice medicine in Honduras, so the clinic is still in the future. I wonder, though, if he will be pressed into medical work sooner than we expect. This has been our experience in telling the gospel here. Some folks are asking to be invited to our church services, which up to this time have been only in English for our family. John has his Spanish-language materials out that the Saints at Weslaco mission gave him, and although we feel "not ready yet," we are starting services in Spanish next Sunday.

We moved into our cabin on La Suiza March 3 and started school on March 5. We have four students—one in the second grade, one in the fifth, and two in the eighth—all named Blumenschein. . . . Our cabin is very small (20 by 10 feet), and our furniture consists of car seats, which serve as chairs and beds, a card table, a built-in kitchen table, and two gas plates with a detachable oven. John and José are digging a well. Our next project is a storage shed, and then we plant garden.

Our land is on a flat, grassy plain with mountaintops rising on two sides. We are halfway between Mogote and the lake—two and a half miles from each. A well-traveled foot-and-donkey road passes our door, and we have many visitors. There is no electricity, but a telephone line is not far away. Our cabin, which John and José put up in four days, has sheet metal walls, screen back and front, and a wooden floor.

Later

We had twenty-six people out to our first church service in Spanish, which was held in our yard. John's Spanish is "rough," but the people are interested in spite of our ineptness. After the service we served a meal to all; menu—rice and chicken, beans, rolls and honey, and water to drink.

All of us are fine.

April 16

This past Sunday we divided our congregation into two parts for classwork—adults and children over eight, and in a separate class, all children under eight. Thus far John's lesson material is being well received. It was prepared by our church members in Weslaco. I am teaching Bible stories of Jesus printed in Spanish by the Evangelical Church.

The front of our church home in Mogote.

My little pupils (one dozen) were very attentive, but in the activity period the boys tried to steal the new crayons. I had to frisk all in the class before I let them go.

Through the week our youngsters "go to school" in the morning, and in the afternoon we all work like troopers building the house. More than half the footings are in now. The walls will be of rammed earth, the floors of Mexican mosaic tile—if money allows—and maybe some flagstone (that's free).

I baked two squash pies this evening, and sometimes I'm up until 8:00 p.m., baking bread. We still are living with only the equipment that we brought from the States in the Volkswagen. We're having the time of our lives improvising—a lard can made into a bread pan, a sieve made from a piece of screen, a large salad bowl from a turtle shell, and a bread plate from his tummy.

April 27

Our services at church last Sunday were really something; we had thirty-five in attendance, and I had so many youngsters I was almost in a panic. José has made five more benches. I will have to give daughter Beth (age twelve) the children under six, and I'll take those from six to twelve. All over twelve will go in John's class. José needs to be in John's class, because John needs his help with the language occasionally.

May 26

The vacant home in which we hold services in Mogote is owned by a daughter of the Castillo family. It is at our disposal free of charge. Maria Castillo is our best friend here. She has started to read the Book of Mormon. Please pray that she may receive a witness of its truth. Latest word among the Catholics is that the gringos are building a house on the Suiza for the children of the Devil.

We have purchased hymnals for the congregation. All services and classes are in Spanish and without benefit of a translator. After laying a foundation of fundamentals from materials prepared by the Latin-American Mission in Weslaco, John is now presenting the Book of Mormon and reading it in class. It's surely too bad that Between the Covers of the Book of Mormon has not been translated into Spanish for the benefit of the children who attend.

The garden is in finally and well fenced against the neighbors' pigs. Our relatives and some of the Herald readers sent garden seeds from many parts of the United States, so we have the best of seeds and high hopes for an abundance of fresh vegetables. Some of the natives watched us plant. The next morning we had visitors wanting to buy seeds. What they wanted most was radishes!

We took a week off school so the children could get enough sand and rock hauled out of the nearest dry creek bed before the rains begin. At this point we are still pouring footings. Manuel Castillo has been hired to help us. One day we saw a bright green snake. Quick as a wink Manuel whipped out a "nigger shooter" I didn't even know he had and shot the snake right in the head. He is fifteen and a really fine boy. Jody said, "Mommy, let's give him an English name and just keep him." We all love him.

The people still come wanting to buy my home-baked bread after being refused time and again. We laugh and say José and I will go in business: he'll make candy, and I'll make bread.

We will have a picture of our cabin on the Suiza in about ten days or two weeks. The roll we had ruined at the studio in San Pedro had pictures of the Suiza, but we tried again. I am enclosing a few photos which you may use if you choose.

Memoirs of Clara B. Stebbins

FOR SOME YEARS two sessions of General Conference were held each year, one beginning April 6, the date of the organization of the church, the other in the fall. In 1882 the fall conference was held in Lamoni, Iowa. A place was provided for it on the north end of the Herald House lot. An arbor was built covered with boughs hauled from the woods south of town where later the Lamoni Reunion was held for many years.

Meeting under this arbor were the General Church officers, the people of the little new town, and a number from the surrounding country, some of whom came in lumber wagons. President Joseph Smith presided over the business sessions. This furnished a thrill to those who had not met him before.

The prayer meetings were full of interest, as also were the proceedings of the Conference, especially to those of the church. Then there was the pleasure of entertaining the visitors. This was the last semiannual General Conference.

Helen was eight years old when she was baptized. In that year a baby sister brightened our home and made her happy. Ruth was truly a gift from heaven with a smile for everyone and a peaceful outlook on life. She stayed with us only one year. Her going left such a hurt in my heart that Sister Dancer said I never looked the same afterward. She could sympathize. She had lost two baby daughters.

The Dancers had moved to town. They built the large square house, always painted white, three blocks south of Main on State Street where Highway 69 later passed it. This was a familiar place to us where Helen and Alberta played and Henry was at home with his old friends. Sister Dancer came often to our home and was like a mother to me.

Two incidents in Helen's school life made us glad to note her sympathy with other children. One day two little boys in her room were kept in at recess. In a whisper Helen asked the teacher if she might stay, too. Having gained permission she kept her seat while the rest were out. She told me at home that she didn't want to be out playing while the boys had to stay in.

On another day when school was out, the children came streaming down Main Street from the East Side schoolhouse, across Linden and on to where two small boys had their wagon caught in a crack of the old board sidewalk. They swung out around the boys and passed on, all but Helen. When she came to the boys she stopped and worked with them to help them free the wagon. When it was loose they all started on together. The boys soon ran on with the wagon, but Helen didn't mind. Two men, standing in a shop door, observed the incident and told what had happened.

When the wind blew cold while on their way home from school, Helen would bring Laura Kelley into the house to warm and wrap her better for the rest of her way up the hill to her home.

Helen's cousins—Carolyn, Herbert, and Edith Jarvis—visited her at vacation time. Their home was in Burlington, and their father was assistant secretary of the Burlington Railroad. His family traveled on passes and this privilege was often extended to Helen and me. On this basis we visited them, sometimes when Helen's father was away preaching.

My sister, Mrs. Cramer, lived with us for one year after her husband died. We wanted her to stay longer, but she said, "No more zero weather for me." Her home was in Florida. Earlier, when her children were small, her two daughters, Tonsie and Adore, had visited us. One day while they were here I was lowering the upper part of a window when it dropped suddenly and caught my hand between the two sashes, causing pain. Tonsie was sympathizing with me. Then I got the oil and applied some of it on the bruised part of the hand. The pain was eased and soon it was gone. Tonsie said: "Oh, we do need some of that oil in our family."

With three boys and two girls someone was always getting hurt. I said: "Yes, it is good to have," and then I explained to her how the help comes from the Lord and we must have faith in order to receive it. Her father was not a member of the church, so they had not had the oil in their home.

Sometimes I have had remarkable help with the use of the consecrated oil, but not always, depending, I suppose, on the need and the degree of faith exercised. Thinking about the right to bless the oil, I traced it back to the authority bestowed by the angel who restored the gospel to earth. From then on I thought how it came down through the succession of ordinations to the elder who consecrated our oil, an unbroken line, to bring us one of the blessings of these latter days.

HELEN AND I had happy times at home together. I read Bible stories to her and taught her the Sunday school lessons. She was interested in some things beyond her age; for instance, the return of the Jews to Palestine and the fulfillment of prophecies by Joseph Smith. When ten years old she was much disturbed by Clark Braden when she went with us to hear him lecture in the church. It distressed her when he repeated the name "Old Joe Smith," discrediting his character and his work. On the way home she gave expression to her feelings and she said, "Doesn't he know the rains have come back to Palestine and that Joseph Smith was a true prophet?"

Helen was in Miss Cazaly's class in Sunday school with others of her own age. Once when the teacher was sick, Helen taught the class. Sister Walker, then superintendent, said: "Mark my words, that girl will be a leader." But she did not live to verify the prediction.

There were not many fences in town, and we did not keep ours after it needed renewing. For many years there were no sidewalks. Then we had board walks and later cement walks. At first, even going to church in the little chapel, we had to wade in the mud. Going out to Brother Joseph's after a rain, we had to pick our way, but if we wanted to go we didn't wait long. I remember going out to see if I could help after David, the eldest son, died.

I think we were most grieved for Brother Joseph and Sister Bertha after their six-year-old Azuba died. Her death was caused by a stroke from a ball bat. On the school ground she ran past the boy just in time to catch the stroke as he swung the bat. It was unintentional, but how bad the boy must have felt! This was a shock to the whole family.

On his way to the office Brother Joseph often stopped in to see us. One day some time later he came to bring for Helen Azuba's little white fur muff and tippet, a tender token of friendship from the sorrowing father and mother. It was after this that he wrote "Beneath the Darkest Cloud." Their daughter, Lucy, born some time later, was a great comfort to them.

Still in the home were Carrie and Zaide, Audentia, Fred M., Israel, and Hale. Carrie married Frank Weld; Zaide married Richard Salyards. I kept their little Richard for three months during his mother's illness prior to her death. His Grandmother Salyards then assumed the care of him.

IN 1892 diphtheria took the life of our daughter Helen. One day near the end she said: "Mamma, I am all you have, and I'd like to stay with you, but I think I'll have to die. You have told me that love is the best thing in the world, and now I know it is. The Lord seems so near I feel as if I might reach out my hand and touch him, and if you will stay with me, I'll not be afraid."

I kept smiling on at her in the midst of my grief until she passed away.

Mother Gillen stayed by us to the last. Her daughter Lulu was one of Helen's playmates.

I was much alone the week after the funeral, but I was upheld in the comfort of the Spirit, and I could sing, "O grave, where is thy victory, O death, where is thy sting?"

After that I was left more to myself, and I suffered with the feeling that my heart was in a vise under actual physical pressure. That continued for a long time.

That spring we attended the General Conference in Independence, and from there we went on to Glendale, California, to visit my sister and family who had moved there from Burlington, Iowa. We also spent some time in the Daniel Garner home near Fresno. Mrs. Garner, the former Mary Cazaly, was our friend. Before returning home we visited Saints in San Bernardino, San Francisco, and other places where Henry preached. At a two-day meeting in Santa Ana a brother was given a message by the Spirit which he wrote for me. In it I was told to be looking for work that would be opening for me.

Shortly after we returned to our home the Daughters of Zion Society was organized; I was chosen secretary. This opened work for me that lasted for a number of years. I kept on with my work as superintendent of beginners, and in giving myself for others the burden was lifted from my heart.

Helen's death was a hard loss for her father, but he kept on in faith, administering to the sick, and in other ways being faithful to his calling. He and another elder were called to administer, after the first prayer meeting we attended, just after the funeral, and I came back to the empty house alone.

Peter (Albert Pierre) Dancer, was the first one buried on the hill west of Lamoni. The plot was laid out by his brother as a cemetery and named Rose Hill. His monument is in the form of a broken tree trunk with a vine twined around it. From the entrance to the cemetery a driveway runs straight up the hill to the north. Near the foot of the hill a drive branches out each side to go around up the side of the hill to the east and to the west. These are bordered by walnut trees. The name Rose Hill, in white letters, appears at the left of the entrance on a long raised mound.

Alex Hopkins had the first furniture store in town. It stood where the drugstore now stands. He bought the first hearse in Lamoni. It was used the first time for our Helen's funeral. Before that a spring wagon had been used.

We attended the wedding of Audentia Smith and Benjamin Anderson, and Henry performed the marriage ceremony in the presence of the family. This was in the parlor at Liberty Hall with the pictures of Joseph's father, and his mother, Emma, overlooking. Here, in later years, the prayer meetings at Liberty Home have been held. In the room next on the north of this one, we have been told, Brother Joseph received revelations for the church.

Audie and Ben and their daughters, Bertha and Doris, born in Lamoni, have been my very dear friends.

SERVICES were held in the basement of the Brick Church until the upper part was ready for use. I remember the first Thanksgiving dinner held in the church. Long tables were placed and chairs brought in. The unfinished west part was used for a kitchen that day. We stepped through the door past the stone foundation onto the bare ground where a stove had been placed. Here Sister Glaud Rodger presided over such cooking as needed to be done. I know we had appetizing hot mashed potatoes, turkey, and gravy. Many of us women were willing helpers. Brother Joseph was present with his family, and the blessing he asked expressed our sincere gratitude that we were to have the satisfaction of worshipping in a real church home.

Graceland Gazette

■ The Acacias have been autographed, and the doors of Graceland have closed for another school year leaving to memory the many activities of commencement week, 1958.

■ The annual freshman class picnic was held Saturday, May 24, on South Campus. After the picnic supper, organized games were played. Skits and other talent features by the students were also presented. To close the campfire theme of "The Old and the New," Dr. Cheville spoke to the group.

■ The same evening the sophomores met for their annual banquet in the Memorial Student Center. Cecil Ettinger, president of the Alumni Association, was special guest of the class. To be admitted to the banquet each sophomore had to produce a letter of expectations and/or predictions concerning his future. This information was sealed in a cylinder to be opened ten years from now. Master of ceremonies for the dinner was Eric Leighton from Detroit, Michigan.

■ Members of the graduating class of 1958 donned their caps and gowns for the Baccalaureate service Sunday, May 25. High Priest John Blackstock, president of Far West Stake, was guest speaker at this occasion.

■ This year the campus picnic and band concert were combined and held Sunday evening. The dinner music provided by the band added a pleasant note to the evening meal. Later faculty and students enjoyed organized games.

■ The women on campus finalized their softball season Tuesday, May 27, with the annual all-star freshman-sophomore games. The freshmen won in a close game with a score of 6-5.

■ The theme for the 7:00 P.M. closing fellowship was "Henceforth I Call You Friends." Officiating were Alma Blair; Dr. Roy Cheville; Pastor Lavern Sivits, North Platte, Nebraska; Gene Painter, Long Beach, California; and Robert Speaks, Independence, Missouri. Jim Nesly of North Platte, was ordained to the office of teacher by Dr. Roy Cheville and Elder Lavern Sivits.

■ Members of the Married Group met together for a final pot luck at North Park. Dr. Roy Cheville led the group of twenty-nine couples and their families in group singing.

A sacrifice offering was taken and sent to the Auditorium fund for the purchase of a seat.

■ A Commencement vesper service was held on May 28 in the Memorial Student Center. The theme, "And in Ages Hence I Yet Shall See," was carried out in testimony by various students representing studentship, athletics, and world service. Apostle Paul Hanson was a special guest for the evening. Four awards were presented: Elbert Harrington, East Moline, Illinois, Silver Seal of Graceland for athletics; Floyd Ayers, Eden, Idaho, Gold Seal of Graceland inscribed "Studentship"; Everett Graffeo, Independence, Missouri, Gold Seal of Graceland inscribed "Studentship"; and Harold Leland, Seattle, Washington, Silver Seal of Graceland inscribed "Student Life."

■ The Graceland Players presented the English Hit, "See How They Run," on May 29 in Zimmerman Hall, under the direction of Miss Celia Schall. This rollicking English farce provided many laughs for the audience. The students particularly enjoyed the performance of Clara Engle who works with James White as assistant to the vice-president-treasurer.

■ The second annual olympic games were held on Friday, May 30. The students participated in such events as tug of war, wheel barrow races, and shotput (balloons filled with water).

■ Saturday, May 31, at 7:30 P.M. the Commencement Concert provided an enjoyable evening for the students and the many visitors who were on campus for commencement. The Graceland Concert Choir, under the direction of Henry Anderson, and the Graceland-Lamoni Orchestra with Harold Neal conducting, presented several beautiful numbers including excerpts from "The Lowland Sea" by Alec Wilder and "In a Persian Market" by Albert W. Ketelbey.

■ Commencement convocation was held Sunday, June 1, in the new outdoor chapel located near the old Patroness building. The Graceland Mothers' Club of Independence, Missouri, donated funds for this permanent structure. The money was raised through a number of projects such as rummage sales, book reviews, and talent funds. At the present time there are three Graceland Mothers' Clubs (Independence, Kansas City, and Joplin District). The college is attempting to organize more clubs. ■ The first intercollegiate baseball team at Graceland in twenty years finished the season on Wednesday, May 21, against Penn College of Oskaloosa, Iowa. The Jackets emerged with two victories, and the last game climaxed the season with John Nelson, Independence, Missouri, pitching a no-hitter game. The Graceland ball team finished the season with a record of four wins and five losses.

■ Four of Graceland's instructors will not be returning to the campus next fall. Mrs. Robert Flanders, communication department instructor, will not teach this fall after having taught for three years. Mrs. Flanders is a graduate of Graceland and the University of Michigan.

■ Dr. Velma Ruch recently received a scholarship for the Danforth Seminar on Creative Teaching, which is a part of the summer session of Pacific School of Religion in Berkeley, California. The seminar is limited to only twenty-five instructors. Its purpose is to give further insight for understanding and strengthening the role of religion and the place of moral and spiritual values in the enterprise of higher education.

■ Returning to the Graceland campus this fall for their third year of teaching on the hill will be Mr. and Mrs. Tom Nowlin. This fall the couple is returning in the capacity of head residents in Gunsolley Hall. Tom and Kathy, who have their degrees in the physical education field, have taught physical education classes. This summer they are in California to begin work on their Master's degrees at the University of Santa Barbara, an extension of U.C.L.A.

■ Bruce Swoffer of Lexington, Michigan, will join the Graceland faculty this fall to teach in the secretarial science department. Mr. Swoffer is an elder in the church and has been active in youth camp work at Blue Water, Michigan. He is married and has two children, ages nine and eleven.

The ministry of music is one of the most outstanding contributions that children can make in the church. The children's choirs that sing every third or fourth Sunday in some of our congregations are among the most anticipated of all groups whose help is needed in the planning of services. Your own children can help in this fine ministry of song if they are trained in the traditions of good hymnody. The Reorganized CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST of Latter Day Saints has available a hymnal for children.

The CHILDREN'S HYMNAL is a clothbound collection of some of the greatest musical literature for children ever written. The words and music have been selected without regard to denomination or source, and represent a good cross section of Christian musical contributions. A section at the back is devoted to fun and action songs.

Summering with the Church in Europe

WHILE in Birmingham we were domiciled in the home of Elder Harold Harvey and his wife, Pearla, who was a guest in our home when she attended the 1948 General Conference. We found them to be as energetic and enthusiastic Latter Day Saints as one could hope to know. What a thrill to meet old friends and to be encompassed with such hospitality that one feels completely relaxed. The British will do that to you. The Harvey cottage lies in an uncrowded locality. There is a fireplace in every room and an electric heater to quickly temper the chill when the fire is not needed. This is an English custom. Pearla's hobby plainly is to see Harold off to his business and church commitments in good order—and not only Harold but also their guests. Harold is the assistant pastor, a quiet, studious man, the only one of his family in our church.

In this home we missed Pearla's mother, Sister Martha Bailey, about whom an inspiring story could be written. We had met her in 1951, but now she has passed on, her life and example remaining as a milestone in the progress of the church work in Birmingham.

This branch seems to have suffered more from emigration than any other in Britain. Those remaining have not wasted time unduly complaining but have perked right along realizing that the hastening time allows for no slumping. The going is hard though when numbers are few and when "actives" leave. There are many small branches in the States which can sympathize for the same reasons. The city of Independence has around 60,000 population. Practically 11,000 are R.L.D.S. which includes a great many who have immigrated from other states or abroad. Success does not always depend on numbers, however, when the truly converted do their best.

Members of the Women's Guild of Billesby, Birmingham, meet on alternate Monday evenings. They are studying the Book of Mormon with Sister Vera Jones, an experienced student and teacher. Light refreshments are served. Bazaars and "jumble sales" are held. The proceeds have been used for rostrum carpeting, linoleum floor coverings, and recurring needs of their church home. They plan outings together. They have sponsored socials and sing in the choir. Occasionally they enjoy an evening at the theatre. Their average attendance is ten.

FOLLOWING the merging of the two districts in Britain into one mission a year or so ago, a change in the organization of the women's department was necessary, and Sister Arthur Mayne (Olive to all) of Stockport became general leader of the women's department in Britain. She with Sister Cyrus Allen (Gertrude—also known as "Pomme") had been leaders of the Northern and Southern Districts respectively; Sister Allen served in this office for about ten years. She has been recognized as outstanding among the women leaders through the years. "I know that she will help me in any way she can," says Olive, "which is a wonderful and comforting thought." Gertrude is a sister of Nellie Arrowsmith, Blanche Mesley, and President F. Henry Edwards. Her gifts and education are varied. She has a collection of gold and silver medals, cups, and prizes for excellence in drama, music, elocution—with degrees in the latter two. She won a tuition scholarship at the Birmingham School of Music and was chosen by the Birmingham University as one of the students to meet Sibelius when he visited England. Besides being an accomplished contralto singer and voice teacher, she taught general subjects in day school for many years and has also served as visiting music and elocution mistress to various schools.

Sister Allen held annual district rallies for the women in a different locality every year. These continue. Also the local women's groups continue to devote the main portion of class time to study. Sometimes the priesthood or civic authorities are invited to address the classes. "The women also visit places of instruction and interest in their home towns and are quite food and hygiene conscious."

Sister Olive Mayne gives much credit to former women's leaders. She says, "During the war Sister Nellie Arrowsmith, who is living in Canada now, made a contribution which is still talked of. Her example of fortitude in the face of adversity was wonderful indeed." Other general leaders have been Sister Doris Kinee, now living in Canada; Sister Walter Dawbarn (Hilda) of Warrington; Sister Gladys Judd of Enfield; and Sister Arthur Munslow (Lillie) of Stockport, all of whom are remembered with appreciation for good foundation work and are at present counted among the reliables by Sister Mayne.

SISTER JAMES BARRINGTON (Harriett) of Manchester was leader of the Beresford Road women for many years until recently. She has always been a "minute man" and has kept "open house" for R.L.D.S. visitors through the years. When we arrived in Blackpool, England, a year ago this summer, we knew Mark's relatives would meet us at the bus, but what neither they nor we knew was that the Barringtons, having our schedule, would be there, too—peeking round a corner, waiting until our family greetings had reached a climax. Suddenly their arms and voices mingled with ours. That was real fun.

The Barringtons have attended two General Conferences. We were privileged to "live" with them this time and also in 1951 when Apostle Blair Jensen, his wife, Delia, and Brother and Sister Frank Fry were also house guests. A conference of the district was going on. Harriett's table was always crowded and could stretch amazingly when another transient or more happened in. The fireside bedtime chats always will be high spots in our memories.

I was very interested to note that the branches borrow workers from each other. The groups are small and are of mixed ages and they exchange talent to keep everyone active. Stockport, near Manchester, is a thriving branch. At the Christmas "fayre" or sale, which Harriett managed for them, the women earned twenty pounds. (Let's see! Twenty times $2.80 equals $56.00. Not a bit bad!) In the States we have the same experience (besides the emigration problems I mentioned). At these bazaars the ladies provide refreshments, purchase each others donations, have a marvelously good time, and turn over the proceeds to the branch funds! All of which keeps the kettle boiling—and that's just fine!

A high spot in our life with the Barringtons was to be participants in a "walk"—which is an annual anniversary celebration, held by any denomination, usually in memory of the organization of their Sunday school or church. Arrangements are made with the city authorities so that no groups which may have chosen the same hour cross each other as they walk. We walked the two miles that June afternoon with dozens of our people who represented our near-by branches, helping to put Stockport "on the map." The procession was headed by a splendid uniformed band which played all the time, and whenever we stopped here or there at an advantageous corner, it was prepared to accompany us in the singing of our hymns. Usually these bands are hired, but this one contributed its services. The audiences filled windows and yards, received neatly prepared church literature, and heard fitting sermonettes. There was a light mist falling when we started the march, but no one turned back. No rain developed. Leading the procession were several of our men who held high a great purple and gold banner. Ropes from the corners helped balance it against the breeze and movement. On it was painted the name of our church and its location.

WHEN WE RETURNED to the church the women soon had a tea party going. Beautiful teacakes, sandwiches, and hot tea for all were most acceptable. Prior to the walk, the large congregation was seated church-like on the lawn to witness a program where their rose queen was crowned, followed by the crowning of the little rosebud queen. Both queens and their coterie of attendants were costumed in well-styled gowns of lustrous materials. Floral-trimmed ropes circled each group, clasped here and there by the starry-eyed girls. The two groups marched around the congregation giving us all a good "look-see." Proudly they later followed the banner, watchful that their performance add dignity to the occasion. The experience was thrilling to us and was a splendid demonstration of the fidelity of our women in interesting the children happily in a missionary effort.

While we were visiting in Birmingham Sister Nellie Schofield contributed much to the pleasure and comfort of our stay there. We were appalled when word came to us the last part of March that on the twentieth she had been called into "the land that is fairer than day." The Birmingham friends here in Independence mourned, "Whatever will the branch do without Nellie!" She was consistently ready with her little auto, seeing that the stranded or handicapped could attend services or be a part of other church activities. She was trained in a number of the arts—a sweet singer, a song leader, an elocutionist. She loved to work with young voices. She was a business woman of much experience. She was a merry person.

Let us keep her mother, Sister Ellen Schofield, in our prayerful thinking. While she is "acquainted with grief," this experience brings both shock and grief to her for the third time. She and Nellie lived together. They were like youthful sisters. Sister Ellen is known and loved all over Britain for her stimulating example. She is truly an "elect lady."

LATER WE LEARNED of the passing of Patriarch William Worth of Birmingham, and I experienced dismay that he would never see the little tribute to his faith and loyalty to the church which had been included in Number VI of this series. Those who have seen such disciples as he was in action and have known the weight of his influence realize to an extent what a loss his life and counsel will be to the British Mission. However, we all know that when we "keep on keeping on," the Lord of the harvest will keep his promise to prosper our efforts.

Home Column

Now to Gloucester, and our hearts grow warm at the very thought of it! I did not know that names ending "cester" are of Roman origin, old Roman localities in Britain. Here we saw the home of Robert Rakes, originator of the Sunday school. The building is still "alive," and I wish we owned it. The Trapps, Bishop Tom and his beloved wife Carrie, lived in Gloucester many years but now have a quiet shaded cottage in Churchdown, which is only a seven-minute train ride away. Their only child, Donald, his wife Vera, and their daughter Carole live in near-by Badgeworth. Brother Don Trapp is the main organist for the Gloucester Branch. His husky frame almost hides the low organ. It is a good instrument and he enjoys manipulating the keys, helping the voices fill the air. Carole is one of the staff at Stroud Hospital, where she is "laying the groundwork for future courses in radiology." In 1951 we made our headquarters with Brother and Sister Trapp and from there traveled hither and yon. We spent several days with them this time too, but that time all the Trapps, the Harveys, and Brother and Sister John Coggen of Nuneaton met our ship at Southampton. Our baggage was stowed somewhere in their autos, and we were all merrily off, stopping at historic Salisbury for lunch. Then on past ancient Stonehenge, the surrounding Cotswolds and home to Carrie who had an American evening meal ready. Imagine her using foods from gift packages sent her from the States, a war time custom with the Trapps. Their home has been headquarters for missionaries and visitors through the years.

I am inclosing a pen sketch of the Trapp cottage made by my brother, Paul. I am sending the original to the Trapps. They attended General Conference in 1948 and stayed the summer. They speak longingly of their memories. Brother Trapp's pride and joy is his garden, while Sister Trapp's potted plants fill the windows of the enclosed porch, which is the cheery entrance to their home.

Don had arranged his affairs so that he could chauffeur for us. We were very anxious to visit Tewkesbury Abbey, and he took us there. It is a magnificent building, erected by the Benedictine monks in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. There are many tombs in this lovely Abbey. It is by far the fanciest one of the sort which we saw, filled with rich carvings, chapels, and altars, yet it is small enough to be homelike. The enchancement to us, however, was the elaborate tomb and cenotaph of Robert Wakeman, last Abbot of Tewkesbury, located in St. Dunstan Chapel. He is a progenitor of Elder Wilford Wakeman of Independence.

Next to seeing Toppesfield, the ancestral home town of the Joseph Smith progenitors (see April 21, Saints' Herald), we had hoped to visit the ancestral home of George Washington. This was another of the treats which Don provided us. The fine, spacious old home is well preserved by the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Herbert M. Scott

I Had an Experience

IN HIS autobiography the incomparable pioneer missionary Parley Parker Pratt relates the incident which drew him into the circle of early church workers. An itinerant nondenominational preacher, he called upon the Hamlin family in Wayne County, New York, to extend an invitation to attend services he was conducting in the vicinity. In the exchange of amenities Mr. Hamlin made mention of a new book which had come into his possession. Parley Pratt expressed interest and was permitted to read it the following day.

This is his testimony: "The Spirit of the Lord was upon me, and I knew and comprehended that the book was true, as plainly and manifestly as a man comprehends and knows that he exists." He read all day long, and with but a few pages yet unread his destiny was formulated and crystallized as he turned his steps toward Palmyra to meet and cast his lot with the Prophet Joseph Smith.

As I read the account of the conversion of this great man I was thrilled with his testimony of the divine affirmation which accompanied his first reading of the Book of Mormon, for I, too, had received a similar blessing in my first reading of the ancient record of the Nephites.

My heritage in the Restoration can be traced to the conversion of my great-grandfather in England. I was "born in the church." One evening in 1936 while studying the first chapter of the Young People's History of the church, I was impressed that I should not only read about the Book of Mormon but that I should read the book itself. I took my mother's copy and turned to page one and read these familiar words: "I, Nephi, having been born of goodly parents, therefore I was taught somewhat in all the learning of my father . . . having been highly favored of the Lord in all my days." As I read I was aware of a "Presence" and felt absorbed in a wave of complete and unmistakable heavenly power which burned in my bosom so deeply that I found it impossible to cease reading. I began reading in early evening, continued to read through the night, reluctantly laid the book down while I rested a few hours, then resumed reading to the accompaniment of the enlightening Spirit of God. In that spirit my eyes and mind raced through the pages of Nephi, Mosiah, Alma, Helaman, Ether, and Moroni. When I finished the seven hundred and seventy-seventh page, the finale of Moroni, and held the book in my hand I felt as though my entire being, body and soul, had been bathed in a thoroughgoing, radiant transformation. A new heaven and a new earth, new purposes of life, and a new opportunity for service had been opened to my vision. My destiny, too, was to preach the message of this divine record.

Prior to this experience the expression "Spirit of God" was but a term, but now it was transformed into reality. No experience in life has equaled it. No criticism of the Book of Mormon by literary scholars has succeeded in minimizing the reality of that heavenly experience; rather the more I read and study the book the more convinced I am of its authoritative message.

"GOOD ENOUGH" PEOPLE

The hardest people to reach with the love of God are not the bad people. They know they are bad. They have no defense. The hardest to win for God are the self-righteous people.—Charles L. Allen in When the Heart Is Hungry.

Mark H. Siegfried

BEFORE I joined the church I served my term several times over as a deacon. I was caretaker of our little country church in Illinois for several years. It was my job to clean the church (for we enjoyed no such luxury as a paid janitor) and build the fires on Sundays and week days when the church was used for various purposes. When funerals were to be held it was my job to see that everything was in order so that the church would be properly arranged for such an occasion. I also served as usher.

We lived one and three-quarters miles from the church. There were no automobiles, no hard roads, and not even graded roads in most cases, so it was often quite a task to get to the church in time to have it cleaned and heated for Sunday school, as it was called in those days.

We frequently had very cold Sundays. Rain usually preceded the cold, making the roads too rough for a buggy. My sister, two years my junior, and I would ride a horse (both on one) leaving home in time to arrive at the church about 8:30 A.M.; this gave us time to get the building clean and warm before Sunday school at 9:45.

Mother was always an inspiration to keep us doing what we had agreed to do, regardless of how difficult the work sometimes seemed to be. She knew also how hard it was to get the fire started so she would dry out the corncobs for us to take as "starter" for the fire. What a help that was! I always had a small bundle of kindling also, which with these very dry cobs formed the basis of our fire.

We would swing our sack of kindling and cobs over the saddle horn. I would climb into the saddle, Clara would get on behind me, and off we would go to our Sunday morning task. (Ask yourself, if you have never experienced it, just how cold and damp a little frame church can be in zero weather after being closed for a week.)

Clara would walk up and down the isles trying to keep warm while I got the fire started. Then I would begin to clean the building, and both of us would dust the seats and pulpit. By time for Sunday school the room was beginning to get warm close by the big stove, but not off in the corners. Classes (there were two or three) would all gather close to the stove. Then following Sunday school came the preaching service, if enough people came to warrant a sermon—and it did not take a large number to warrant a sermon in that community in those days. A half dozen was a congregation. I shall never forget some of the lessons taught me in those days.

I do not wish that anyone should have to travel as we did or go to a church so cold and damp as ours often was. But the fact that I learned to be consecrated to the task I had taken upon myself, regardless of how hard it seemed, has been a big incentive and guide all through the intervening years. We gave ourselves to that humble task with as much devotion as we were capable of giving. We left nothing undone which we could do. That lesson has been a constant guide in all my work in life.

My mother who could not go many times because there was no transportation available, would, as I have said, help us all she could, encouraging us to do our work well. I am sure she stayed home and prayed that our fingers would not freeze before we got fires going and the church cleaned. Her prayers were answered. No harm came to us; but sometimes I wondered whether religion would always be so hard. Then a preacher or teacher would quote something like this: "The race is not to the swift but to those who endure to the end." To me that meant to the time when the job was well done—completed. Then my faith and trust would take on new life, and I would hope that next Sunday I could do a better job than I had done this Sunday.

THE RETURN . . .

of the organization of the church after the martyrdom of Joseph Smith, Jr., is the topic of this newly reprinted edition of the 1952 General Conference address by the late president of the church, Israel A. Letters

A Request for United Prayers

The Herald is the most valued paper that comes into my home. Through reading it I get a broad view of the far-reaching ministry of the church. The testimonies are a source of strength to me. As I read various articles I receive added light and understanding. The wonderful experiences of such men as R. V. Hopkins and C. Ed. Miller confirm my belief that God speaks to individuals and directs their lives. Leonard Lea's "Ministry of Healing" should help to increase the faith of many and cause them to depend upon the Lord for this great gift.

My husband, a nonmember, is an alcoholic. When the time came that I felt I must leave him, I decided first to fast and pray for three days. God then spoke to me through one of his servants who did not know my problem. I was told to remain where I was and continue to serve. God has sustained me and helped me to be more compassionate and humble. My husband is a good man in many ways. I know that God is trying to reach him, and I ask for prayers in his behalf that he might come to know and accept this gospel of Jesus Christ. I know the solution to his problem can come only through the grace of God who loves all of us so deeply.

Mrs. G.

Note of Thanks

My most sincere gratitude is extended to the many friends who have remembered me in prayer and correspondence during the recent injury and operations on my left eye. VARIATION ON A THEME

The man who will not start with humility will quite probably end with humiliation.

—C. F. Banning

Murmur at nothing. If our ills are reparable, it is ungrateful; if remediless, it is vain. A Christian builds his fortune on a better foundation than stoicism: he is pleased with everything that happens because he knows that it could not happen if it did not please God; and that which pleases God must be best.

THAT "UNRULY MEMBER"

I think the first virtue is to restrain thy tongue.

He approaches nearest to the gods
Who knows how to be silent,
Even though he is in the right.

Cato

A WHETTED TONGUE

The Psalmist knew something about the workers of iniquity "Who whet their tongue like a sword" (64:3). Theirs is a common tongue—only one, and it is in the middle of every choice bit of mischief. Some of the ancients saved their cruelist torture for their most hated enemies. They mutilated or extirpated their tongues.

No member of the body is more important to our health and happiness. For communication, taste, and mastication it is indispensable. The gift of song depends on it. Actors and orators would be powerless without this little member. Perhaps James (3:8) was indulging in hyperbole when he said, "The tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison."

Is your tongue whetted?

MISGUIDED CONSCIENCE

Most of our sins are those of which we are barely conscious, if we recognize them at all; but they are heinous and terribly destructive, notably when committed under the guidance and with the sanction of conscience. The burning of heretics and witches was an act of conscientious but misguided men. It was as sinful as if it had been done in sport.

Seventy F. Edward Butterworth, in the August issue of Stride, will present the first installment of a serial feature entitled "Adventures of a South Sea Missionary." In this feature, he will present to the young people of the church an account of his experiences as an appointee in the Society Islands. The young man in the picture above is demonstrating one of the main forms of recreation and work in the islands, spearfishing. As the fish of the Pacific supply a good deal of the food of the people, the importance of the fisherman is obvious. Follow the exciting "Adventures of a South Sea Missionary" beginning in the August issue of Stride.

Lyman Jones

I AM GRATEFUL for the restored gospel which embraces all truth and appeals to both the emotions and intelligence," said Lyman Jones.

"The ever-changing effect it has on my life is that I must be constantly endeavoring to make improvement in every way. While I have much to achieve, I have, nevertheless, been able to broaden my concepts and my perspectives through the blessings received in and through the church."

Brother Jones is a high priest and has been a member of the Kansas City Stake High Council since 1947. Previously he served three years as pastor of the First Chicago Branch, and later, four years as pastor of Prairie Village Branch in Kansas City Stake.

At present he is paymaster for the Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company in Kansas City, Missouri. He has been with the company eighteen years. Formerly he worked for Shell Petroleum Corporation and Standard Oil Company.

In 1922 Brother Jones was married to Violette Ann Lewis.

Rose gardening is his hobby, but Brother Jones says, "My great desire is to be able to render a useful ministry through visitation when I retire."

1958 General Conference Bulletin Will Feature Straight News Summary

New Conference Bulletin Planned

A new "streamlined" type of General Conference news report is being offered this year by Herald House, according to Kenneth L. Graham, manager.

The General Conference Bulletin will replace the old Conference Daily Edition of the Saints' Herald. The new Bulletin will be a compact report of the major Conference news. It will be issued daily, probably in either four or six pages. Page size will be 8½ by 11 inches. The "newsletter" type of publication will be issued eight times during the week-long Conference.

A special feature of the new Bulletin will be its pre-Conference issue of about sixty-four pages. This big issue will carry all available Conference reports in one cover.

The daily issues of the Bulletin will contain complete reports of the business sessions and other daily activities. It will be basically straight news reporting. There will be no advertising.

Chris B. Hartshorn, managing editor, stated that the new publication will "present the story of the Conference, its business, and program. As far as space allows," he said, "we will try to show some of the atmosphere of the Conference by mentioning also what goes on outside the quorum and Conference sessions."

The new publication is being presented this year to speed up the reporting of Conference news to church members who do not come to Independence to attend the sessions. Previously the Conference dailies were mailed second class. Many subscribers did not receive their copies until Conference was over.

The General Conference Bulletins offered this year will be mailed either first class or air mail. It is expected that subscribers will receive their daily issues as soon as they would a letter from a friend attending Conference.

Persons in the United States, Canada, and Old Mexico wishing to receive the Bulletins by mail can have them by first class mail for $1.50 or by air mail for $1.75. Air mail rates to other countries are as follows: Australia and New Zealand, $5.60; England, $3.30; Germany, Norway, and Holland, $3.40; and the Society Islands, $6.25.

Orders should be placed promptly to insure receiving the big sixty-four page pre-Conference issue as soon as it is available. An advertisement in this issue of the Herald provides further information.

Delegates and others attending Conference will receive the General Conference Bulletin as a part of their registration. The pre-Conference issue will be included in Conference registration folders.

The Ministry of Attendance

Gather my Saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.—Psalm 50: 5.

ELDER SIDNEY DAWBARN of Independence, who came here with the benefit of considerable experience in church work in England, has been doing a fine service in missionary work and evangelistic preaching for congregations of this area. He was reminded, in observing some of the congregations, of a statement by the late Evangelist John Worth of England concerning the importance of "the ministry of attendance."

Accepting the principle that every member has a ministry to perform in this life for which he will be held accountable to God, it may be easily understood that one ministry which attaches to every member of the church is this same "ministry of attendance."

There is no doubt whatever that spiritual power is to be found in those congregations where faithful and devout members are regular in their attendance, supporting the services of the church, giving encouragement by their presence and attention to the pastor, the priesthood, and the visiting officers.

What a joy it is to find, when one goes to a church to preach, a chapel well filled with alert, attentive, and enlightened people. God has already blessed such a people, and they provide the most fertile kind of seedbed for planting of new treasures of truth.

The people who come to church minister to each other by their presence, encouragement and friendship. It takes more than priesthood, more than a staff, to make up the ministerial force of a church. An important part of it is the body of members themselves.

Let no member of the church think he can remain away from services without hurting anybody. First of all, he deprives himself of something he needs very much—the instruction of the church, the inspiration of the service, and the fellowship of the people. Second, he deprives the people of himself, of his presence, his friendship, and his influence. An empty seat at church is a zero that accuses the absent member of dereliction in duty as well as default of opportunity.

THE GREATEST single problem of churches—not only our churches, but all churches—is the mass problem of attendance. There are so many who want the label of membership, for fire insurance or celestial social security, and who want all the advantages of Christian grace and divine mercy, but who seek to avoid the obligations that go with these things. One of the principal obligations is attendance.

Certain churches and their congregations have attained a definite and outstanding spiritual quality, not only because of the men who have served as pastors, not only because of the preachers who have led the worship and delivered the word from the pulpit, but more especially because of the good and faithful members who are "always there."

THERE ARE certain churches where I have been invited to speak on occasions. When I go there, I look forward with pleasure and anticipation to seeing certain friends and members in the congregation. If they are sick or absent, for some other reason, I have felt a loss. Certainly those good people have ministered to me on the occasions of my visits, and I am sure that they have ministered through the years to the other members of the congregation. This ministry is open to young and old, men and women, priesthood and laity. All have an equal chance in it.

The church is a meeting place. It is not only a meeting place of people. It is the house of God, and it is there that the Father meets with his children. Many spiritual experiences have confirmed this fact to us. If we did not believe it we would be without hope. But we do believe it, and we have hope because of it.

And we might ask ourselves, how does God feel when he does not find his children there, when he knows that they are shivering outside in the spiritually chill winds of a cold world?

How about your ministry—your ministry of attendance? Have you been taking care of it? Have you made a good record? And what record of you will the Book of Life reveal in the Day of the Lord?

Baptismal Report for April

Four hundred and sixty-eight baptismal reports were received in the Department of Statistics in April, 1958. This is the highest number of baptismal reports ever received in the department in April. It is fourteen more than were received in April, 1957.

The total number of reports received in the first four months of 1958 is 1,318. This is 101 more than were received in the same period in 1957.

In each of the first four months of 1958 more baptismal reports were received than have ever been received in those respective months. However, in March of 1930 and of 1921 an unusually high number of reports were received so that the first four months in those two years show more reports received than in this past four months.

Stakes and districts from which the five highest total number of reports were received in April are as follows: Eastern Colorado District—35, Kansas City Stake—29, Southern Ohio District—28, Pensacola District—17, and Center Stake of Zion—17.

Branches and missions reporting the five highest totals in April are as follows: Denver, Colorado—16; Colorado Springs, Colorado—14; Nelsonville, Ohio—12; Willowdale, Ontario—12; and the following 9 each: Jonesport, Maine; Phoenix, Arizona; Spokane, Washington; and Sweet Home, Oregon.

OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY

Seventy Robert Fishburn writes from the Nauvoo historic properties:

I have just come from one of my richest experiences in church work. In a service this afternoon (June 8) at Fort Madison, five persons were baptized into the church. These have come as the result of the efforts of many people and the devoted prayers of many Saints.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert McNutt of Payson, Illinois, were formerly members of a Protestant faith. Mr. McNutt is the great-grandson of Zenas Gurley of the early days of the Reorganization. Contacts that began through the Nauvoo guide service several years ago were continued during the past three years and resulted in cottage meetings which began last October. During the winter these folks have searched diligently with faith and explored minutely the authority of the church.

Early in January they mentioned the interest of some of their friends, and these also (Mr. and Mrs. William Queen) were baptized this afternoon. The fifth person baptized is the wife of one of our Quincy, Illinois, members—Herman Hansen.

All five of these folks are of the finest quality and will be able to give a good support to the ongoing work of the kingdom. Their support and activity in the Quincy mission will be of the utmost help to this new group.

From Sylvester R. Coleman, president of Hawaii District:

Seventy Richard M. Reid, his wife June, and daughter Carol, arrived at the Honolulu Airport on June 6. A number of Saints were there to greet them in the traditional Hawaiian manner—with leis and warm alohas. On the following day the Men's Club sponsored a barbecued chicken dinner, at which time the Reids were officially introduced to members of the district. They were entertained with Hawaiian music and were given more leis. The response to this aloha dinner in behalf of the Reids was very gratifying; approximately 250 persons were served and enjoyed a fine fellowship.

The Reids have been well accepted, and we are looking forward to his ministry in the islands. They are now settled in their home on the windward side, and last Sunday morning Brother

Israel A. Smith

Editorial, Kansas City Times (Star), June 17, 1958

To the 167,000 members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, Israel A. Smith was the Prophet of God and the spiritual leader whose lovable character set an example to be followed.

Since his ordination as president in 1946 the church has expanded in many directions, for Mr. Smith was the practical builder as well as a guiding spirit. He was driving to a stake conference in Iowa when the fatal motor car accident occurred.

In the community and state Israel Smith was known as the quiet, dignified churchman whose contributions extended far beyond the circle of his denomination. As a member of the Missouri constitutional convention in 1943 and 1944 he was chairman of the committees on public health and welfare and federal relations. Other members recall that he was an influential spokesman for progress and an astute compromiser who could be firm when basic principles were involved.

Tall and young-appearing at eighty-two, Israel Smith was a kindly intellectual. A prophet in his church, he was approachable and considerate as a man, and a force for good in his community.

Reid was installed as pastor of the Kaneohe Bay Mission.

During the month of July I will accompany Brother Reid to each of the branches and missions on the island of Oahu and introduce him to the individual groups.

Men Who Worship God

THE RECOGNITION of Jesus as the Son of God is something which cannot be made by word of mouth, no matter how expressive the mouth, how beautiful the language, for the recognition of Jesus as the Son of God is finally validated only in the life that is patterned upon his.

To the man, the friend, or acquaintance, who has no particular religious convictions, who has no church attachment at all or perhaps a very nominal one, the talk of religion catches his attention only if it meets him at the place of his need. We believe in God because first of all we recognize that man is living in a world situation which is far beyond his own ability to cope with. We don't describe the world situation in terms of international tension and the fears of war, for our world begins with us and our family, our immediate circle of friends; and even that small world has recurring problems which are beyond our wisdom, our capacity to solve by ourselves. Now, if an understanding of my place in my little world can be found, such that I can then in part adapt myself to that world and in part adapt it to me, and then become productive not solely in the sense of turning out more machines but also in the sense of turning out of that little world more of really good living, then I would feel that whatever has made it possible for me to make that adaptation is indeed a good thing. I believe in God because only through an understanding of God have men ever been able over any period of time to cope with their lives.

The God of Convenience Concept

The recognition of this has occasionally led people to suggest that the very concept of God has been invented by men who needed comfort, who were afraid of the complexities of the world in which they lived. I acknowledge that this may be the first contact any person has with God; that out of the depth of misery he has felt the need to be comforted, the assurance that there is a power greater than his which oversees and with which he may so attune himself that he may escape the misery.

I reject as forcefully as may be the suggestion that the existence of God is no more than this type of figment of man's imagination. The God we believe in is far more than any escape mechanism or anodyne for suffering. The God we believe in has much more to do with men than to carry them in his arms until they are comforted and quit crying. We do need comfort—we do on occasion find situations wherein all we need is the encircling of an all-powerful arm which will shelter us. But we don't need to live inside of a shelter all our lives. This sheltering is only one very partial aspect of God.

Creator of Heaven and Earth

By the experiences of men who have tried various principles in guiding their lives, we have come to know that "there is a God in heaven who is . . . the framer of heaven and earth . . . that he created man male and female." That particular bit of language is found in Section 17 of the Doctrine and Covenants. The men who wrote that testimony had a conviction based not on what they read in any book, but on the testimony which was founded on the experiences of their own lives. To those men there came this word from God, not in terms of a formal revelation or prophecy but in the testimony from God that they saw growing and welling up in their own lives. "By these things [that have happened to us] we know that there is a God." And the things that God had set out for them to do, they listed in this particular testimony.

Because He Loves

We believe in a God who has purposes for men because he loves them. We believe in the love of God. We remember the parable of the sheep; and the number of sheep that are mentioned by Jesus in the records of his own lifetime in the flesh is fairly large because he was talking to people all of whom had at least one little lamb running around and many of them were professional shepherds. Thus he met the men of the day when he lived in the flesh; he met men in terms of the things that they lived with. Had we another New Testament based upon the life of Christ in the flesh in the twentieth century, we would find automobiles mentioned in it.

God through his Son has always reached for men where they were, just as he reaches for us where we are now. And he talks about ninety-nine sheep plus one. It may be very hard for the branch statistician to understand that over the one sheep the shepherd sought and found there was more rejoicing in heaven than over the ninety-nine. In terms of congregational administration if we felt that we were effectively reaching 99 per cent, we would congratulate ourselves; we would have a victory banquet of some kind. But not God. For God doesn't love according to statistics; he loves people. Every single one is an object of his love, and he has expressed that love in many ways—in the sending of his Son, the willingness to make himself known.

Revelation and the Will

This is the very basis of revelation, which is inextricably tied up with the love of God. If these did not go hand in hand, then we would not know the kind of God we believe in and worship now. For revelation is the willingness of that loving God to hold before his children the standards against which they should measure themselves in order that they may have the deep satisfactions for which they were created.

The purposes of God are expressed in words like these: "Men are, that they might have joy." "This is my work and my glory, to bring to pass the immortality, and eternal life of man." "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." In order that these purposes might be fulfilled, God has given gifts to men, has invested something of himself in every one of his creatures. I would like to emphasize particularly the gift of knowledge; that is, the capacity to find out things, to collect information, to think about that information and correlate it until it becomes knowledge, until it becomes wisdom, until it grows into experience, until it grows into expertness, until it grows into power, the capacity to do things well.

I remember the first time I ever attempted to read a book in Greek and finally gave up and read the English translation. The first line was "All men by nature desire to know." There will be no knowledge in men except that they exercise the gift of curiosity, the desire to know. This is a gift.

The Gift of Agency

Coupled with that is another of the very precious gifts of God that we call the gift of agency. In the English renditions of the Scriptures as we know them, we find this agency mentioned in many places as something which God has invested in men. It is first mentioned by name in the story of Enoch, and that goes back a long way. The most recent mention by name in the Scriptures (the Doctrine and Covenants) is about fifty years ago. The idea permeates all the instructions that we have concerning the relationship of God with man—the gift of agency, the right to choose, the responsibility to abide by the consequences of that choice, the recognition that we can control to some degree what happens to us, according to the choices we make.

This is a very precious idea, and I suggest that in some ways it makes the development of the worship of this kind of God unique to this country. For in modern times we have had the opportunities of self-reliance to a higher degree than in any other country. In the same way it was impossible for the children of Israel under the leadership of Moses to become a self-reliant people, it is impossible for men and women of modern times who have lived in the pattern of blind obedience to an authority outside of themselves to understand the opportunities and the possibilities that inhere in the gift of agency.

The Power to Become

We also mentioned the gift of growth. One of the very best statements of it is found in John: "As many as received him, to them gave he the power to become the sons of God: only to them who believe on his name." It doesn't set any age limit. It just says that to as many as believed on his name at any time, that belief on his name and the trying out of his ways would cause growth. This makes hope in Christianity: the possibilities of improving.

We also note in passing, all of the physical gifts, the cunning instruments, the machines, the tools, the materials and all fabricated products. These also are the gifts of God.

To what does this lead? The idea of God's creating with purpose for the creatures of his hand. The purposes are founded upon the basic principle of his love for men. What kind of men, then, would respond? What does God expect of people in response to this that he has revealed of himself? What kind of men is it who worship God?

The Search for God

First of all, I would like to suggest our belief that our first response to God lies in the obligation to seek for understanding, to seek to know him. The first response to a God who reaches out to us will be a reach toward him. In a partial count I found thirty-seven places in the Scriptures where there is a direct admonition that we should seek God.

To seek God—now what does that mean? The procedure may vary from one person to another. It does not mean going to church. Going to church is good for some things, but this is not the beginning; people come to church only after their interest in finding some spiritual nurture has already been aroused. My personal opinion is that the search for God begins with an attempt to understand ourselves and to find out what we are good for. We see this process going on in a small child. We can see a development of the child in his experiments of how far he can reach. The baby in the crib who has to stretch to find his rattle discovers suddenly that there are ways of getting it other than just crying—that he can sometimes stretch his arm out and, imperfect though the control may be, he can grasp.

The Need to Understand

This goes pretty far back for many of us to think about in ourselves, but we never outgrow the need to understand our own natures. To understand what we are capable of, the fits of temper, the times of patience, the ability to remember, the urge to help someone in trouble. As we look over these things that come into our lives, we begin to understand a little bit of what kind of creatures we are. Part of this search for understanding carries us into the desire to know why we are here, what we are good for.

The beginning of an understanding of God starts with this very question, "What am I doing here?" This is the feeling recalled by an Abner Deen cartoon. Abner Deen is a man of vision, a cartoonist who appears most frequently in the New Yorker magazine. The particular drawing I am referring to is the one that shows a poor, thin, lanky man without any clothes on, pumping a handcar on a railroad track across the desert. This railroad track stretches clear out to the horizon and probably beyond. There are the bones of cattle lying out there beside the track. Abner Deen puts in this man's mind the question: "What am I doing here?"

Indeed that is the kind of world some of my friends live in—a wasteland, nothing to show purpose or beauty, just an empty track leading off to nowhere, a life that they manage barely to go through, this pumping up and down one day and then another day, and another day. They see no end in view at all. They feel alone, without resources. Such people need understanding, and it is true that to those who feel this way, who live in this kind of world, there comes from God in many voices (especially in the voice of his Son Jesus) the comfort that if they shall seek him they shall surely find him. If they come to him, they will find rest from their labors. They don't always have to be pumping up and down on a handcar. There is another way of looking at the world when some of the light of God shines into that world. There are other ways, other worlds, in which people live . . . worlds fuller and richer than this desert of Abner Deen's.

A Return Investment

There is a world which is viewed by its inhabitants as having been created for their special benefit and delectations and pleasures. The riches of this world are to be spent in the satisfactions of what seems to them to be a good idea at the moment. This world has other people in it, presumably placed there for the pleasures of these men and women; to provide them with company and good times and to get out of their way when they are tired and don't want to be bothered. They are the center of a world whose every event is judged according to the way it affects them for good or evil. Such people do not worship God. They have not gone through the experience of seeking for an understanding of their place in relationship to the world. They see the world in relation to themselves. They adjust the world to themselves, not themselves to the world.

The Lord says that those who seek him shall find him, provided they have first been able to extend the range of their sights beyond that which is immediately pleasing to themselves. The problem is that the finding of God has certain conditions with it. It takes more than the idle wish to find something to do because "I'm pretty bored with life as it is." It takes more than the anguished cry that rises to God only in times of desperation. It takes the expenditure of some periods of thoughtfulness and calmness. It takes a return investment of something of ourselves.

A Grasping of Purpose

The promise of God has been expressed by many men who knew him a little in different ages. There are two in particular that I have in mind. One occasion found in the Book of Mormon recounts some of the experiences of the sons of Lehi. Being perplexed and puzzled and wondering why they had been drawn out of the world they knew into a completely strange wilderness, they felt the need for some kind of guidance and understanding—something more before they could go on at all. Lehi, the patriarch, went out and prayed. To his mind was opened some of the vision of what should be, in order that he could see some purpose in what he was expected to do. This grasping of purpose is another way of stating the first thing that God expects in response to what he has put before us. Lehi expressed this to his sons, and they weren't satisfied; sons so rarely are satisfied with what their fathers tell them is so. Nephi went to ask God, for he had been taught the use of prayer, the recognition of something beyond himself. He had been taught that he should turn it over in his mind, to think it out and then, recognizing the shortness of his own thinking, pray for its extension. On this particular occasion he, too, received some guidance and came back and found his brothers quarreling. He asked them if they didn't recall the promise made to them by God that if they would ask the Father, with diligence in keeping with his commandments and with faith, surely these things would be made known to them.

The Will to Experiment

This names the second of the conditions under which we may expect to approach some degree of fullness of understanding; that is, that we commit ourselves to an experiment upon the ways of God. In short, when a man is concerned with his life and what it is good for, it is no idle or trivial matter. It calls for the willingness to commit himself in an experiment to try to see whether it will work or not. I personally believe very strongly that the experimental approach to life and many of its aspects is a response to the call of God—to try it out and see.

God spoke to the Zoramites through Alma: "If ye will awake and arouse your faculties, even to an experiment upon my words." I am glad that this word "experiment" got into the English translation, for it is a word that I can understand. Along with this formless urge that somehow we ought to try to understand our purpose in life must go a willingness to commit ourselves in an experiment. This isn't an intellectual pastime; this isn't something we will think about and then put away while we eat and work and later draw out again when we have nothing else to do. No. This concern goes clear through our whole lives, and the benefits of an experiment can be realized only by those who commit themselves to participation.

Action That Counts

What is football good for? Why, it is "wonderful exercise," is the first thing they begin to say in justifying football as a part of the university's program. It is a wonderful exercise. Who gets the exercise? Well, eighty thousand people who stand up, sit down, stand up, sit down. But that's not really football. Football is character building. Who gets the character? The man who sits in the stadium and drinks a quart of whisky because it is a cold day? No, the benefits of football come to those who participate.

The benefits of an experiment in godly living come to those who participate in that experiment. Thus, this is a second of the great requirements. We cannot stand on the sidelines by a purely intellectual knowledge and acquaintance with the principles of life and expect to be a part of life with God. God does expect a search for understanding, but along with that must be the commitment that whatever degree of understanding we have now we will incorporate into our lives. This is at the very basis of the lives of men who worship God—the willingness to commit themselves to definite experiments, the approach which says: "I need to know this so that I can try it out and see if it is good."

If you have ever driven an automobile, occasionally you have had an experience with a flat tire. It teaches you self-reliance to change a tire if you have the right tools. After a while you get so you are not afraid to drive out because you know that if you meet tire trouble you can cope with it. Men who worship God learn to change their tires not only on an automobile but on the vehicles of their whole lives. They learn that because they have committed themselves to going in the direction of God's purposes and will abide by the requirements of active participation.

Men who worship God do not stand on the sidelines. The search has been described in other words: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God." I remind you of all of the verses which go with that quotation from the book of James: "Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. . . . A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways." "Let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord." Again we see this need for being committed.

With God All Things Are Possible

The result of such experience is that we begin to recognize that God holds before us possibilities of growth and development that we just don't see at all without him. One of the very finest things that committed men learn is that there is no known limit to the capacities of men who worship God; with God all things are possible. When I am with God, all things are possible; but when I am only human (the excuse that is so very easy for me to make) no wonder I get in trouble. If I choose to disassociate myself from God, I have a very limited capacity, and I reach it very quickly in almost any direction.

There begins to unfold to the man who is searching for an understanding of the ways and the purposes of God in relation to himself a view of what he may do, of the great projects that he may be a participant in, that is so beyond his imagination when he thinks of himself as being only human that he feels almost like comparing a human being with an angel, perhaps not for goodness but for capacity. This is another thing that comes to men who worship God, the sense of power, the extension of their human capacities—not by some sudden supernatural power, not by bowing to the omnipotence of God and receiving favors in return for obedience, but rather by giving all that they have and are to the fulfillment of his will. Then they find deep channels of spiritual resources flowing through their lives.

A God-centered World

Men whose souls have been enlarged by a clear view of his purposes find a new view of their world, their brothers. I look upon any man in a new light. There may even be people in this world more important than I am. When I now choose to live in a world which has God at its center and around whose purposes the events of this human world revolve, when I look to him and accept the standards that he sets as the measure for what I am and can be, and when I offer that same opportunity to you and to other people, then we live in a world in which the strongest line, the lifeline, runs out from each of us to this Being at the center. Then we have a God-centered world—a world whose best purposes we recognize only in terms of the purposes of God. In that world we have the same father, you and I; and that makes us brothers. If you and I choose to have the same father, then we begin to learn about brotherhood.

True Brotherhood

Out of this relation springs all of the richness that comes when men learn to love each other. But this love must be more than a duty. Of course, it is more pleasant to love people with whom we feel congenial and who have similar tastes. Outside of the range of those with whom we feel congenial, loving may seem somewhat of a chore; but when the love of men for each other is on that basis, it is a pretty low level. It seems hard to do an effective job of loving everybody. By the time we have spent what income we have in buying food, clothing, and shelter for our family, there's not too much left; and we can't take care of everybody in that way. But we just don't know what love is until we have learned to pattern our purposes in the light that comes from God, until we have tried to find understanding of him and his purposes. Then there opens up before us a companionship, a partnership which indeed illuminates our lives. Then we are really able to see that there are other people besides ourselves. When two or more of us have chosen to have this same heavenly Father, we understand brotherhood, and our instinctive desire to see the welfare of somebody else is no longer based solely upon congenial personalities.

No wonder Jesus talked about the one hundredth sheep; the 99 per cent didn't encompass the range of his love because the one hundredth one was also created by God. Because the one hundredth is in trouble just now doesn't make him any less an object of concern and love than some of the other people who don't happen to be in trouble.

Push Back the Horizons

No, 99 per cent is not good enough. When we have understood a little bit of the worship of God, we find ourselves living in a world with God at the center, a world filled with our brothers because they have the same father that we do.

As we look for purposes in living beyond the satisfaction of our own desires and wants, we find the horizons of our lives pushed back until they get enriched with views and ranges and experiences and activities that we had no dream of before. We find coming back to us joy and satisfaction and peace and contentment of a kind that we didn't know could be. We find ourselves enriched, enlarged, and enlightened until we begin to know that the world with God at its center is indeed a good place to be.

Youth Music Camp

Open my eyes, that I may see Glimpses of truth Thou hast for me.

PERIODICALLY WE NEED the opportunity to step aside from the routine demands of our normal lives, whether at work or at school, to get a fresh glimpse of the direction in which we are traveling. We need the inspirational awakening to see truths that are even newer and greater than those we presently hold for ourselves. And, finally, we need time for leisure and recreation with those who have like interests in order to restore our mental and physical vigor.

All over the country this summer reunions, workshops, and camps are being offered for just these reasons. One of unique and particular importance to the youth of our church of senior high school and junior college ages is the Youth Music Camp, scheduled for August 24 to 31 at Camp Manitou near Vandalia, Michigan. This is one of the very few music camps on a General Church level being held anywhere by any denomination in the country. It has grown from 48 campers in 1956 to 86 in 1957; some 125 youth musicians are anticipated for this summer.

It is the aim of this camp to bring together the music-minded youth of the church for a week of inspirational experience through the study and performance of music in many of its phases. The camp is designed to integrate the music talent and interest of church young people with the needs and opportunities of the church in this field of music. Using the experience of two previous years' camps, the administration has developed what it feels is almost an ideal course for the church-minded youth with musical talent.

Three courses are required of every camper: (1) "Know Your Church," taught by Maurice Draper, (2) "Understanding Music," by Franklyn Weddle, and (3) "Music for Worship," by Frank Hunter. Then each camper may elect one of the two applied fields of music, either "Orchestra," directed by Dr. Alan Squire, or "Choir," conducted by Frank Hunter. In addition there are three other electives from which the camper may fill out his course: (1) "Conducting" with Henry Anderson or Alan Squire, (2) "Organ" with Bethel Knoche, and (3) "Camp Song Leadership" with Grace Doty.

The staff of instructors and councilors has been selected with great care so that every camper may have the opportunity to thoroughly enjoy himself through camp recreation and fellowship with other church youth as well as to enjoy sound spiritual leadership. Camp Manitou is located in a beautifully wooded spot in southern Michigan, with rustic cabins, a lovely lake with water-front facilities, and sufficient modern conveniences to make it a most comfortable resort spot. Each day begins with morning devotions and progresses through classes, good food, swimming, boating, sports, faculty recitals, campfire stunts, and worship to end in individual cabin devotions. The spirit of service to the church using the God-given talent of music constantly pervades the atmosphere of the week's living.

Write to the Department of Music, the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, for detailed information and registration blanks. Make sure that some young person in your branch has the opportunity to take advantage of this inspirational experience.

Operation Cleanup

Photos by Audio-Visual Department

OPERATION cleanup has been under way at the Auditorium lately, as the huge Conference Chamber nears completion. Large quantities of debris and accumulated remains from the work done are being hauled away, and the vast room is beginning to take on a finished look.

In the first picture, workmen are setting in place the walnut panels behind which the new pipe organ installation will be made. Other pipes will be installed behind the walnut grille at the rear of the main Auditorium. This gives some idea of the size of the instrument which will be set in place early next year.

The first of three walnut panels for the rear of the platform area has been set in position, as can be seen in the extreme foreground of this picture. Notice also the cove above the balcony doors, and the acoustical clouds which house lights and loud speakers for the platform and choir areas.

In the other picture, workmen are cleaning up the floor of the main Conference room. The onlooker is struck by the impressive sweep of the balcony, while high to the right can be seen the area prepared for the antiphonal organ which will be included later with the main pipe organ contract.

Vertical walnut slats blend perfectly with the granite around the walls. At present, plastic sheeting protects these walnut panels until all work is completed. The aluminum doorframes for the new west foyer add a modern effect and will soon be completed also.

In other parts of the building affected by this present contract, similar progress has been made. On the sixth floor, new offices for the Religious Education Department should be ready in a few weeks. At each side of the foyer on the main level, attractive telephone booths are being completed for the benefit of all visitors and users of the building. East and west entrances will soon be finished, and before long most of the work on this main contract should be completed.

Before General Conference, approximately six thousand seats will be brought in the Auditorium and set in place. Many individuals and congregations have already responded outstandingly well to the recent request for funds for these needed seats. Carpets will also be laid in all aisles and on the platform.

The Conference Chamber and other parts of the Auditorium now under contract are rapidly nearing completion, and the building is becoming the place of beauty and utility which it was intended to be. We feel a sense of pride as operation cleanup reveals the beauty of a newly-finished Conference room.

Please don't forget about another operation cleanup that still remains. Considerable funds are still needed to clean up and complete installation of seats, carpets, and public address system for Conference this fall.

We still need your help.

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC

Where Is Our Orchard Today?

ONCE upon a time a wise philosopher suggested that if you want to enjoy an orchard today, you have to plant it a long time ago. The church is enjoying today the fruit of its planting of last generation and is reaping the results of its good nurture in some cases and its lack of nurture in many others. Even with some rose-tinted glasses, we can see that the results are not gratifying enough. There are many problems we could reiterate, but here we will concentrate on one only. Where is our desperately needed fruitage of sharp, devoted, teenage young men?

Out of the fifteen hundred young people who enjoyed the Saturday social mixer at last General Conference, the girls outnumbered the boys nearly three to one. This situation is essentially the same in our Zion's Leagues from Saskatchewan to New Zealand.

In a sense this is simply the result of our complex problems as a church, but for this treatise let us think of it as a very real problem in itself. Why are we not reaching thousands of our young men, and why do we attract so few nonmember young men between the ages of twelve and twenty years?

Before progressing further let me assure you that I am concerned about the girls of the church as well as boys, and I have never consciously showed more concern in programing for the girls than for boys. But the hard facts remain—our church program meets the needs of our girls more readily than that of the boys. Furthermore, when we are able to “pack in” the red-blooded young men, we will never have a female attendance problem.

It is quite probable that the girls would be the first to give 100 percent support to a new and dynamic emphasis on reaching boys. They are especially sensitive to this need. They would agree with this fundamental premise—we must do something now that we have not been doing.

We are in a fortunate position as a church. The Presidency is vitally concerned about ministry to youth. In the Council of Twelve are a number of men who take special pains to minister to the needs of youth wherever they are. For instance, many noticed that Apostle R. M. Holmes rose at 4 A.M. last Easter Sunday to minister to the Los Angeles youth at a sunrise service, soon after he had a painful tooth extraction.

We also have a General Church youth leader of unquestionable ability and youth acumen, plus a Religious Education Department director and a staff who give unstintingly of themselves to this and similar problems. In addition, the key positions of directing our camping program and ministry to college and service personnel are filled by men with education and experience in the field of youth work.

WE have the General Church leadership, now we need to solve our problems. However, we see a lack of “followership,” adequate vision, proper emphasis and hard work in many branches and districts.

One deadening cliché of many adults must be stamped out. That is, that our youth are the “church of tomorrow,” and not today. They are as much a part of church today as are we. If anything, they need better ministry than do we adults. They need better songbooks, classrooms, and equipment. Ideally, consecrated elders trained in youth work should lead the Zion's League, the Scout troop, or the Zioneers. A great deal of vision must be experienced by us adults if His “army” is to become “very great,” and if the endowed leadership we must have in succeeding generations shall come forth. Our young men must be given greater responsibilities in the major tasks of the church, accompanied by adequate supervision.

It is paramount that our children have more good group experiences sponsored by the church. Simply one or two hours on Sunday morning, in often rather incohesive and meaningless group relationships, is not adequate. Let me illustrate. The influence of the home in the life of a child resembles a triangle. Parents and home influence mean everything to the child in the formative years, but as the child grows, this influence becomes minimized, just like the narrowing of a triangle at the top. When the average child is fourteen to sixteen years old, the influence of the home diminishes very rapidly.

Now invert the triangle to rest on one of its points. The influence of the community, the neighborhood children, and the peer group at church is very small. But as the child reaches six to twelve years of age this influence broadens out appreciatively, as does the triangle. In the late adolescent years the “gang” or group to which the youth looks for acceptance and approval becomes extremely important.

We have the God-given responsibility of training our children in the laws and ideals of Zion's home life and the Zion's kingdom. We also have a moral responsibility equally as great to provide, wherever possible, happy productive “gang” or group experiences in church-sponsored programs. Herein has been much of our failure, and we must improve. To be very specific, if our church does not sponsor a good Cub Scout pack, Boy Scout troop, Skylark band, and Oriole circle (or possibly some alternate) we are ignoring our duties to our youth and to Zion.

NOW I AM familiar with most of the problems. I have heard them for years and have worked at them, but many simply will not exist when there are determined parents and one good leader to take the initiative. In some cases it might be wise to provide a good Zioneer Co-Ed program, but not so in most cases. Our children need creative experiences with their own age and sex, at least until they reach the first teen year. A minority of our branches provide that experience.

Brother Richard Lancaster, director of the Youth Division of the General Church Department of Religious Education, will happily correspond with you on solving your problems in the area of boys' work. Sister Edna Easter of the same department in the Auditorium Building in Independence will do the same on problems in programing for girls. The important thing is to move out with good planning and courage now.

In most cities and towns, the national Scout executives are very anxious to find agencies which will sponsor Scouting units. They usually prefer church-sponsorship to that of other organizations for several reasons. All that is required is a few boys in the right age range, some adults willing to take training and work on a weekly program, and facilities for meetings. After organization, the pack or troop belongs to the church, not to the National Scout Headquarters, and you will have one of the best tools for service which the church can possibly have.

Look at a few major advantages:

1. The church is more honestly trying to serve its youth, and many immediate results will accrue from this.

2. The church has another area for serving the community, and has one of the best evangelistic means of interesting nonmember boys and their families in the church.

3. The public relations value of a good Scout unit is excellent.

It is difficult to overestimate the value of a group of friendly boys coming weekly to your church home and becoming intimately friendly with young members, their parents, and other good adults. On a monthly or quarterly basis, all these friends come to the church to participate in special meetings or courts of honor.

I have personally heard several Protestant ministers point with pride to numbers of good families who have become associated with the church through the Scout program. Some of our own Scout-sponsoring churches bear the same testimony. No doubt President Frederick M. Smith envisioned these benefits to the church when in 1920 he commended the Scouting program to the church for its adoption as our official program for boys (G.C.R. No. 812).

Quite often good men of our own congregations or branches are actively engaged in helping some other agency or church run their Scout troop. Although there are some indirect advantages to the church, we still urgently need the direct advantages of their work to remain in the home branch.

A responsible representative of the other church "with the long name" stated in 1954 that in the domestic field of his group nine out of ten boys who were active in his church were also active in Scout units sponsored by the church. An estimate of one out of twenty of our boys of Scout age being active in "our troops" might not be too far afield.

What about our orchard in 1970 and 1990? It depends on our planting it in 1958. Co-operation of parents, pastors, and district or stake officials is all that is needed. The boys are ready and waiting!

This is an important part of our evangelism program which shall be, according to our president, "our slogan and our program." Let's get busy and conserve and win more young men!

Question Time

Question

In the light of Matthew 10: 31, 32 [. . . he who loveth father and mother more than me, is not worthy of me.], where is one's duty when loyalty to God and the church conflicts with one's companion's ideas?

Mrs. F. H.

Michigan

Answer

These verses of Scripture came as counsel to the Twelve as Jesus was sending them on their missions. These words were spoken to offer encouragement that man should never fear to own the name of Christ. The central theme of the Master's teaching was an exemplary life of righteousness to show one's loyalty to God. In our loyalty, we must be willing to suffer persecution to advance the cause of Christ, remembering that faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, humility, and diligence are characteristics of Christian living.

Even though we can never afford to compromise our principles, we must exercise great wisdom and patience in converting others, even our companions, to our high ideals and a better way of life. "Marriage is ordained of God" (Doctrine and Covenants 49: 3), and as such is a covenant with God as well as between man and woman. The keeping of this covenant is vital in Christian loyalties, and it is a bit hard to conceive of a companion's objection to that which makes for solidarity in the marriage relationship.

One's duty where conflict in the home does exist is to be patient and tolerant, always without compromise of principles, while engaging in mighty prayer to be guided with wisdom of God to bring light and truth to the companion. A godly mother has often been the means of converting whole families. The Lord tells us in Doctrine and Covenants 111:4

It is not right to persuade a woman to be baptized contrary to the will of her husband, neither is it lawful to influence her to leave her husband. We believe that all persons who exercise control over their fellowbeings, and prevent them from embracing the truth, will have to answer for that sin.

Thus we see that an obligation to exercise wisdom and charity with respect to all is placed equally upon the believer and the nonbeliever, the results of which can be rewarding or damaging.

Question

How does the church seal indicate our Christian beliefs?

Michigan

M. A.

Answer

The church seal is a symbol that represents the gospel teaching that the highest good for the world and humanity will be attained with the coming of the kingdom of God in power and glory when the millennium is ushered in. The message of St. John the Divine began with the words "grace" and "peace," and it is significant that the seal uses the legend, "Peace." The prophecies indicate that the peace shall be universal and shall reign in the world and in heaven, among men, and even among the animal creations, including the strongest and fiercest of the carnivores, the lion. Descriptions and allusions to the reign of peace are found in Isaiah 11: 6-11; 65: 17-25; II Peter 3: 13; Revelation 21: 1-7, and other places. Phrases such as these are found: "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid . . . and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. . . . And the suckling child shall play on the hole of the asp . . . and a little child shall lead them. . . . They shall not hurt or destroy in all my holy mountain." It is from these sources that the motifs for the church seal have been taken.

My Spiritual Stewardship

OUT OF THE MANY thoughts which come to mind as I think of this subject of spiritual stewardship the most important areas seem to be focused under three headings: My Spiritual Stewardship of Self; My Spiritual Stewardship in the Home; and My Spiritual Stewardship in the Church.

Stewardship of Self

Stewardship of self involves mind, heart, and soul. The stewardship principle is this: all that we are and have are gifts of God. The very qualities of our personality stem from his grace—a part of the divinity within us over which we must be good stewards.

I will not try to be deeply psychological but will bring just a few simple thoughts concerning stewardship of self.

From earliest recollection I have been aware of a faith that warms my heart and lightens my life—faith in the sure love and care of my heavenly Father. It is illuminating to ask one's self the question: When did I first experience God in my life—feel him there—start on the road of faith? It is difficult to pinpoint any special time or year or moment. It seems he has always been there—a part of my life and heart and mind.

One of my earliest recollections was when I was three years old. I stood on a hill back of our cottage home in Lamoni watching the train carry my father away on his first far mission—to the west coast. I knew we would not see him for a year, but through tears and a sense of loss flowered a definite unquestioning faith that he would be protected and we would be kept safe and secure till his return. This faith brought also joy—that he was chosen to be God's messenger.

But I hope and believe that gift of faith has been nurtured since then and has grown, as I grew through youth and womanhood, and then continued to grow during the rich rewarding years of mature living and service that have been my privilege.

Our stewardship of faith as Latter Day Saint women should have deeper foundation, more definite spiritual certainties, as we walk with God through the years. Sometimes the very hardest, most tragic experiences of our lives but open new vistas of understanding God's wisdom and help us to develop a stronger faith.

You've heard the saying, "Write down one day what your concept of God is and put it away in a secret drawer. Take it out ten years from then and read it. If you have not advanced to deeper meaning, higher understanding, and wider vision of God and his purposes for you, you have not been a good steward over the precious gift of faith." Someone has said: "The unity of the essence of testimony of thousands of our people in all lands who have had outstanding experience with God brings the conviction that this is a marvelous work and a wonder." With this nothing can separate us from each other and from the work whereunto we are called.

It has also been said that the great soul prays, "Lord, make me big as my problem," while the little soul prays, "Lord, let me off easy." The large soul says, "Lord, give me strength sufficient for a hard day," as the small soul begs, "Lord, let me have a lighter load." The great heart prays, "Lord, let me stand firm, when the fight is hardest;" the craven heart cries, "Lord, let me escape." The crusader soul sends up the prayer, "Lord, stand with me until I finish my task" (Good Tidings, Tucson, Arizona Yearbook 1957 - 1958).

My spiritual stewardship of love—

Love is a creative thing, the earth was born from it;
Love is a lengthy thing, life is measured by it;
Love is a kindly thing, peace is found in it.

We have to love and respect ourselves before we can warmly love others. We must develop within ourselves ability to love. It's like a snowball—the more we love the larger grows our capacity for love and warmth of personality. Love of self and love of our fellows are both rooted in love of God. We can develop from cold, hard persons to loving, out-giving, understanding personalities, but it takes practice. We need to practice the art of love in all our thoughts, associations, and activities.

And remember, to know is to love.

Stewardship in the Home

I hardly dare begin to write about this since I have studied and read and thought and written so much—including three quarterlies—on this subject.

MARTHA HANDS AND A MARY HEART

My heart would choose the better part—

My eager, seeking, questing heart
Would sit with Mary at the Master's feet and hear his word;

But, oh, the tasks that must be done,
So short a time from sun to sun,
My hands must work like Martha's hands swift as a bird

To cook the meals, to scrub and sweep,
To sew and mend while children sleep
To wash and iron, and try to find a moment free

For quiet and deep searching thought,
For inspiration Mary sought
To fill the burning need within that eyes can't see.

My heart desires with a longing deep
To listen, learn, and knowledge reap;
My heart, with Mary, would learn to know My Master well.

But my hands must race with the tireless clock,

Let down a hem of last year's frock,
Wash little hands, tie little shoes
And make some jell.

Though my hands, like Martha's, must busy be,

My Mary heart has a melody,
And my hands may work to the living notes of a song from above—

Mary's song of a kingdom bright,
Of hands that work from morn till night.
My Martha hands and my Mary heart
Both bring you love.

Merva Bird

Here are a few brief high lights on how spiritual stewardship in the home functions. When a wife and mother is developing her great gift—stewardship in the home—what results? There is family worship, a loving, peaceful, yet stimulating home atmosphere or climate, an interchange of ideas, thought, prayer, mutual service, consideration for each other, the support of all for each in every task, challenge, and problem of her daily life. Especially does a woman's spiritual stewardship in the home function in support of her husband in his priesthood. She has no selfish desire that he devote more time to her instead of to God's work.

Stewardship in the Church

My spiritual stewardship in the church must be undergirded with a rich stewardship of self and home. I must develop a life of faith and love to be able to bring to my church the witness and power and ministry that means creative membership. Also my home and family must be in the process of achievement of a way of life that mirrors high spiritual stewardship. All three areas of spiritual stewardship are co-ordinated in a unity of life and faith and find fullest expression as I work out my spiritual stewardship in the church. I must be aware of my personal responsibility to make my branch or congregation spiritually strong and alive. To fulfill this responsibility I must qualify, where I am, for better service, more creative church membership. I will seek the Holy Spirit and especially cultivate the gifts and fruits of the Spirit in my church fellowship. I will seek to develop the art of living as a fellow member of Christ's church and especially in my women's group seek a high Zionite quality of togetherness in study, work, and worship. I must know my church and develop the art of testimony, know the true inner meaning of the message of the Restoration and be able to witness by effective telling of the gospel story when that is needed, as well as by my "inner life" testimony.

As active church members we should seek full participation in the total life of the church and not be confined to one narrow specialized field. If we learn to be alert to Christ's call we may be led into various avenues of service such as church school, music, girls' club and camps, youth camps, Zion's League, writing—as well as the work of the women's department. As we move from one area to another at the Lord's call it is a blessed and broadening experience. Thus we develop into women of stature in Christ.

May we answer his call to fulfill our full spiritual stewardship, whenever and wherever directed, in love and humility and with steadfast endeavor.

God Is Bountiful

Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God, and to establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.

—Matthew 6: 38

WE sing God's praises. We teach and learn of him. After a fashion, we worship him. We have so often heard the phrases, God is good, God is love, God is eternal. God is all of these and more. He is also bountiful.

But to prove that God is bountiful we must first understand the difference between belief and faith. A banking organization builds up a reputation for being sound and worthy of the public trust. We believe in this soundness because it is the consensus of opinion. Belief in such an organization is sufficient until we are ready to make an investment with it. But when that time comes we investigate the soundness we have heard so much about. Only when we have developed a faith in this institution are we willing to risk such an investment in its care. Our belief has crystallized into a faith.

Likewise, our belief in God must also grow into a living faith before we can experience his bounty. A good way to determine whether we have merely a belief or a faith is to heed the admonition of the above Scripture in which Matthew plainly tells us "to build up the kingdom of God, and establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

We must move out in faith before God can grant these blessings to us. Someone has said, "When we take one step toward him, he runs one mile toward us." God isn't asking us, through this Scripture, to neglect our homes or our families for his sake. He is asking us to become more efficient workers in order that we might have time to share with him.

One busy mother frankly said, "My housework and children require all of my time, therefore I cannot assist with the work of the church school or the women's department."

Another busy housewife hesitatingly stated, "I can help some, but I will have to get back home early to get the work done I have put aside if I give this time to the church."

Another equally busy mother proudly says, "I will be glad to teach the class. I have learned that when I have some work to do in the church, I have more incentive to systematize my work at home. Therefore I seem to have more time to do both without neglecting either."

The third mother, somewhere along the pathway of life, had learned that when she reached out in faith, in a trusting and cheerful attitude to assist in God's work, he reached down to assist her with her work. Her cares were lightened; her chores were lessened. She understood the meaning of God's bounty. Because she had let her belief grow and develop into a vital faith she could say, "God is truly bountiful unto me." She understood what things "shall be added."

"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want," and if I but learn to share willingly my time, my talent, and my resources with him ". . . surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

I Had an Experience . . .

LIFE IS MADE up of a continual sequence of experiences. Mine have been many and varied, good and bad, joyful and sorrowful, with the usual ups and downs.

Most valuable is the experience that caused me to become a member of the church when I was a boy of thirteen. However, in reality it was only the beginning of new and undreamed continuing experiences.

Love for the church grew rapidly with understanding plodding along through the process of time. The church became the most important thing in my life in those early years, and I believe I can say the same now.

It was at a prayer and testimony meeting, following the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, when I bore a short testimony at our small home branch. It was two years, more or less, after I had become a member. A general church visiting minister arose immediately and spoke to me. The words spoken left those impressions that have continued through the years, . . . "study and prepare yourself for the day will come when the Lord shall use you in the full-time ministry of his church." There were other thoughts that have been locked in my heart. At that time I did not fully realize what had happened, but the experience lived within me. The brother's name I did not remember until I met him in later years, but I had not forgotten his face or stature.

About three years later, when I was attending a cottage prayer meeting, the appointee in charge made known my call to the priesthood, then he spoke the same thoughts in seemingly the same words as related before. The former impressions were deepened, and other words spoken should yet become testimony.

Time slipped by with a year at Graceland, a lingering depression, marriage, family, lots of hard work, and a growing church responsibility. I turned down two fine work opportunities for fear that they might adversely affect future service in the church.

During this time my wife and I took a group of young people to a youth conference at Lamoni. The week had been spiritually rich. It was at the closing service and during the hymn of dedication when, above the ring of consecrated singing, a Voice spoke with clarity and power, and seemed to rise above the multitude of voices. Again I heard the same words and was given the assurance that all of the experiences along the way were preparations for work yet ahead.

There had been trying times and there were many more "growing pains" to be experienced. But in all and through all the blessings of God were evidenced.

In the years that followed I had another year at Graceland, more varied experiences and responsibilities, with the continued blessings of heaven. However, church appointment seemed improbable.

Where had I fallen short? Surely somewhere I had not measured up. We felt we must plan a continuing church contribution in the way we felt we could offer the most.

Then it happened. When we least expected it the Apostle of the area talked to us about accepting appointment, subject to the normal procedures. Even as this is written the Spirit bears witness of these experiences.

The "San" is a service of the church to the entire community.

Memoirs of Clara B. Stebbins

BEFORE LONG we were holding meetings in the one large room. This was heated by two stoves which sometimes smoked. Several mornings, just as we were ready to open Sunday school, our eyes filled with tears and we went outside to wait until the smoke cleared away through open windows. But that was soon corrected.

Of those who preached there I especially remember Father Lander, Sister Sal-yards' grandfather, and Brother W. W. Blair. Both preaching and prayer services were held there for some years, and week-night prayer meetings were always held there. There were funeral sermons, Christmas entertainments, Sunday school conventions, and even the 1886 General Conference was held there. In course of time the furnace was put in, and the two west rooms were finished. These were occupied by the beginner and primary departments of the Sunday school. The folding doors connecting them were often open for joint services.

I knew more about Conference appointees and visitors in my home where I was busy with help providing meals for the tableful of guests invited each day. I first met J. W. Rushton as our guest, whom we knew in after years as our wonderful speaker and servant of the Lord. At that time he seemed a retiring young man who sat and listened while others talked.

My husband was then church secretary and recorder, and he had been in correspondence with branch secretaries, some of whom attended the Conference. He also had a wide acquaintance with the ministry. We tried to have as many of these friends at the house as possible during the Conference.

ONE YEAR at General Conference time I was very sick. It was thought that my life hung in the balance, and word went out that the end was near. In one of the morning prayer meetings Sister Mollie Brewster spoke by the Spirit. She said I would live. Brother Hilliard met her as they were leaving the meeting. He said to her, "Now, Mollie, you have put yourself on record." She answered, "It is all right, Brother Hilliard; she will live." By the power of God, in whose name she spoke, I lived.

Brother Pitt and Brother Luff were close friends of my husband. When I was the lowest they and he administered to me and I made the turn toward recovery. I slept and was better. At my request Brother Pitt taught my class of boys the following Sunday.

More than once I have been brought back when close to the end. After the birth of baby Ruth we all thought I was going, but by administration I was restored. Good old Sister Pickle, while praying for me at home in her bed, saw in vision a pair of hands reached out to save me. The next morning when the doctor looked at me she said, "One would never know you had lost any blood."

Truly, by miracle I have received blessings, and in praise to the Giver, I tell about them.

One night in a sudden sickness I woke to feel that I was dying. As I lay wondering, I was conscious of the words "Death—and underneath are the everlasting arms." My soul was filled with peace, and then I prayed. The thoughts that I had at that time are expressed in the following verses, given by the Spirit and written afterward:

When life seemed almost ebbing,
Its duties nearly done,
The peace of God was given
And every fear was gone,
As one his mother comforts,
The everlasting arm
Laid underneath, about me,
Held safe from every harm.

I prayed for strength to finish
A task to me assigned,
For help then quickly given,
I praise the Master kind.
And still my days are lengthened
That I may do his will.
May all my days be ordered
His purpose to fulfill.

Though I can do but little,
Oh, may I faithful prove
To him whose every dealing
Gives token of his love.
My own strength is but weakness,
Alone I faint and fail,
But he has given promise
Of help that will avail.

The Most High is my Shepherd;
He surely will provide.
In pastures green he's led me,
The waters still beside.
And so, this tender Shepherd
I'll trust whate'er betide;
In death I'll fear no evil,
He'll still be at my side.

I was up the next day and continued my work.

SISTER WALKER was our first Sunday school superintendent in the Brick Church. She was followed by Brother George Blair.

Sister Walker soon started a plan for beautifying the church park. She had classes busy planting and tending flower beds during the week. Then bluegrass was sown, and lawn mowers soon were heard. Before long the planting of trees was in order. This was taken over by the branch officers, and soon a beautiful grove was growing, where later picnics and prayer meetings were held. Two reunions also were held there.

I attended the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893 with my sister, Mrs. H. E. Jarvis, and her family. Sister Walker was with us a part of the time. Again in 1934 I was there at the Century of Progress Fair. At that time my niece, Mrs. Edith Jarvis Alden, was living near Chicago and I stayed with her. A friend of hers would go with me down to the city where we would meet Mrs. Alden, and together we would go to enjoy the evenings at the fair. At this late date I do not attempt to comment on the wonders of the fair.

We spent one highly profitable and enjoyable evening at the planetarium, viewing the marvelous movements of the heavenly bodies.

IN FEBRUARY, 1894, Brother Stebbins gave a series of lectures on the Book of Mormon in Independence, Missouri. The lectures were presented on nine successive evenings in the basement of the Stone Church at the joint invitation of the Religio Society and the Sunday school of that branch of the church. There was deep snow on the ground, but the lectures were well attended.

My niece, Carolyn Jarvis, was visiting us that winter. She and I accompanied Henry and were present at all of the lectures. We were entertained in different homes of the Saints.

The lectures were reported in shorthand by Sister Belle Robinson (later James) and their publication was immediately begun in Zion's Ensign. Also one thousand copies in paper covers were issued that summer. They were soon sold and demands for them continued to come in. After some years an edition in cloth binding was issued. This contained the lectures revised and enlarged by the author. Quoting from the preface:

The only wish of the author was to get the work before the people, therefore it was given into the hands of the Board of Publication, to be published without profit to him.

The work was well received, apparently filling a place in the advocacy of our cause which [at the time] no other book did, . . . and taking the various colonies in their order, also therewith giving proper proofs from many antiquarians, historians, and scientists, . . . with the synopsis of the story of the peoples that came to America in ancient times.

Since this book was published there have been wonderful discoveries, and much has been written for church readers to keep them informed of developments.

In one of these early years Sister Christiana Stedman (later Salyards) made her appearance in church circles. How little we guessed the greatness of mind and spirit of this unassuming person. She came from Illinois and made her home with Sister Walker, editor of the Mothers' Home Column in the Herald, and of the children's paper, Zion's Hope. In this home Miss Stedman made the beginning of her lifework in Sunday school quarterly writing. Later her books made a rich addition to church literature; the last one, The Enduring Word, was much appreciated by the ministry and other church readers.

Miss Stedman fitted admirably into Lamoni educational work. She taught in the public schools and in our Sunday school. She and I worked side by side for years, she as superintendent of the primary department and I of the beginners. She made one of a group of friends who often met at Sister Walker's; her niece, Mrs. Lucy L. Resseguie, Mrs. Mary Garner, sometimes Carrie Smith, and I made up the group. It was a sad time for me when Sister Salyards moved to Independence. We corresponded until near the time of her death. No one has ever taken her place, though Sister Hilda Loving was a comfort with the friendship of her family also. I deeply regretted losing them when they moved away. I still hear from them.

Miss Martha Young succeeded Sister Salyards as superintendent of the primary department. In that position she gave such satisfying service that there was sore regret when she had to resign because of failing health. I went to see her in the afternoon of the day when she was honored at her resignation in the morning service at the Coliseum.

I found her at home lying on a couch, feeling that her world was about at an end.

She welcomed me as a fellow sufferer in having to give up the work we loved for lack of strength.

We had worked in rich fellowship in the old Brick Church during the years before I gave out, and our joint work in the reunions was highly gratifying. I remember the time when children wandered over the grounds during the services in the big tent. Some sat with their parents, but others strayed around the edges, looking as if they didn't know what to do with themselves.

ALL THIS was changed when the Sunday school work became better organized and tents were provided for the various departments. Now the children had their own worship homes where together with their teachers they were made happy talking about the way of love and thankfulness. They were led to think of the love of Jesus for them and of the many things God has provided to show his love for us.

One day a group of women happened to come together and we teachers of little children were asked: "How can you bear it to miss the good meetings in the big tent while you are busy with the children?"

It was in the days when Brother E. C. Briggs's "Bless your heart" was familiar to all, and I said: "Why, bless your heart, don't you know that each one gets her blessing where she is doing her own part?" And I am sure they knew we were happy in doing ours.

I had recovered sufficiently so that I gave occasional talks in the children's departments. Also, at times, I addressed young people's or adult classes. I attended Mrs. Hyde's class for a time, and before that I was in Miss Condit's class at the Coliseum. This was a class with enthusiasm for the teacher and for the spiritual matters discussed. A highlight was a visit from Brother Cheville. He came in one day to talk about the important meaning in the name of the church of Jesus Christ. The name "Jesus" refers to his life on the earth as a man; the name "Christ" to his God nature—a perfect combination inspiring our love and devotion. I remember the influence of the Spirit that remained with us in thinking these thoughts after him.

IN THE COLLEGE YEAR 1903-4 my niece, Miss Carolyn Jarvis, as a member of the Graceland faculty was the teacher of English and Latin. In March, 1904, her mother died at her home in Burlington, Iowa, and Carolyn was called home. I had been there with my sister a short time before she died. After the funeral Carolyn and I returned together, and she went on with her work at the college until the end of the year.

Sister Audentia Kelley (then Miss Hayer) who was in her classes speaks very highly of her ability as a teacher. Richard Kelley substituted for her while she was away. He appreciated her plan of teaching the Latin grammar, which he said he had not had at Iowa University.

For a number of years Sunday afternoon prayer meetings were held in the upper auditorium of the Brick Church. This made a full day with two meetings in the forenoon and one at night. Two thirty seemed to come soon with preparing dinner, often for company, and getting the dishes washed. After the hurry was over, if I thought of staying at home, habit and the incentive were too strong to let me miss the meeting. Sometimes after it started I was so tired I couldn't keep my eyes open. Then I relaxed and kept them closed for a few minutes. After that I could brighten up and enjoy the rest of the meeting. We listened to testimonies that built us up in the faith. The hymns warmed our hearts and brought us near to the Lord. One day we heard the testimony of one for whom we had waited; until recently she had been satisfied in the faith of another church. She told how the Lord had shown her the greater light, and we rejoiced to hear how he works with those who will hearken to his voice.

In the meeting far at the back an anxious little daughter arose to ask prayers for her sick mother. She is a grandmother now, still bearing a faithful testimony. We had been told of answers to prayers offered in these meetings.

The Growing Church

Baltimore, Maryland Branch

WANDERING from place to place as did the children of Israel, Baltimore Branch has at last come home. We felt on that first day of dedication in the new church home as they must have felt . . . "A cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle."

Despite the unfinished grounds and incomplete furnishings, the unpainted walls, and the unvarnished wood paneling, we were in! We could now more fully appreciate the long-suffering patience and constant drive of our leader and pastor of six years, Albert A. Mehlich, whose vision had been for a house of the Lord worthy of the God we worship. We were truly grateful for the untiring efforts of the building committeemen who served faithfully: J. Howard Carr, Jack Keller, J. F. Cassiday, John Edwards, Jessie Glick, Don Ross, Jr., and Bob Simpson, under the capable direction of Dr. Paul M. Edwards.

The group was held together by a faithful few for many years as a Sunday school mission. A great hope was fulfilled through the achievement of a church building designed and built specifically for the use of the Latter Day Saints in this area. Ours was somewhat similar to the joy of the child who receives his first new suit of clothes instead of the old hand-me-downs. Our previous meeting places had been scattered and varied, including a large room over a garage. Now our hearts were glad and we rejoiced, for we knew that God had been with us in our building efforts.

In 1951 we purchased fourteen lots on a main thoroughfare. This took most of our funds, but we felt the location was a good one. We worried about the money for building. Most members had pledged to the utmost; some were engaged in money-making projects, and sacrifice was the order of the day. Shortly after the purchase, the location of our lots was rezoned and a home builder bought them; this gave us enough profit to begin construction immediately with the assistance of a loan through the Houses of Worship Revolving Fund. Other lots were made available to us, a gift of the Bethlehem Steel Company in a locale of newly built homes in the same area. This we believed to be an act of God, an answer to prayer.

A downpour of rain prevented the original plans for ground breaking, but the happy occasion so long awaited was not to be denied us and everything went as scheduled indoors. Dirt was brought from the building site and all were given an opportunity to turn a spade.

On February 10, 1957, the day of dedication, the new building was opened to the public. Many friends and visitors participated; among them were district president and pastor of Washington, D. C., John T. Conway, and Apostle Arthur Oakman. We followed the winding path to the double white paneled doors, through the foyer to an interior of carefully selected woods, heightened by gothic beams and surmounted by a cathedral-type ceiling. The rostrum contains matched selected chairs cushioned in crimson velvet; the blond mahogany pulpit is ornamented with the church emblem. A Hammond organ lends its voice to the worship of God. Centrally an archway draped with matching crimson velvet opens to reveal the baptismal font. The front and rear walls are enhanced by large glass-paneled windows. A cry room looks down into the main auditorium, separated from it by plate glass.

In the past many of the halls in which we met were cold, damp, and drafty, leaving us with only the restored gospel to keep us fired with enthusiasm. Now our feet are kept warm with a radiant heating system installed in the floor.

The church is located on a sloping lot and surrounded with young sycamore trees which will provide cooling shade in the near future. The seating capacity is approximately 125. The cost of the building, exclusive of furnishings was $55,000.00.

We had hoped through the years of struggle to see and hear our beloved brother, Elder Adolphus H. D. Edwards, Sr. (age 86), speak from the pulpit of the new church building. The promulgation of the restored gospel in this area and the realization of a proper church home have always been nearest to his heart. His wife died in January, 1958, and it seemed truly fitting that the "mother of the branch" should have the first funeral services to be held in this new building for which she had labored and sacrificed so long. Many times when her husband had been discouraged, she'd say, "Dolphy, you can't give up now; the people are depending on you."

The Baltimore Branch had its beginning in South Wales where a young lad, seeing the changes wrought in an older brother after baptism, eagerly joined the Reorganized Church in 1879. A.H.D. Edwards, Sr., wanted more than anything else a personal testimony of his own. He was called and ordained to the priesthood at the age of fifteen. His life has ever been one of constancy and dedication to the church of Christ and missionary endeavors. Leaving his home and family, he journeyed to America. Wherever he traveled, he preached, for this was his mission in life—to warn his neighbor and to teach the words of Christ. He assisted in the organization of branches located in Cleveland, Ohio; Scranton, Steubenville, Belaire, and Johnston, Pennsylvania. In Johnston he met Lettie Johns whom he married on September 27, 1898.

He journeyed to Baltimore and the steel mills in search of work and remained here where he gathered a small flock, teaching and expounding the Scriptures, nourishing his family and others in the Latter Day Saint faith. Despite hardships of the depression years he continued preaching, with increased missionary duties made possible by extra "leisure time."

Full status as an organized branch was the first sign of growing strength. Organization took place on March 9, 1930, in an Odd Fellow's Hall in Highlandtown, a suburb of Baltimore. For a long time meetings were held in the homes of the members until the group increased in size, whereupon the need of a hall was evident. Various halls were rented, and eventually a small Baptist Church was purchased, but membership continued to increase until the little church was no longer suitable. Its sale marked the beginning of a new building fund.

The branch continues to grow. A Zion's League is striving to fill a need of the youngsters. A La-Da-Sa club brings young married people together for a better understanding of life in the church. Tionas arrange for the young adults to get together for fun and social activities. The Laurel Club for women continues to be a support to the building fund.

At the moment the men are concerned with the interior decorating, which Brother Zepp of Washington, D. C., is supporting with his knowledge and assistance. Already a need is felt for more room, and an educational wing will soon be added.

Many members maintain personal projects to help finance additional costs. Some have made aprons and jewelry. Some sell candy and other items, while others crochet, baby sit, and cut grass. In the past, the Laurel Club operated a gift shop, available rent free in the downtown shopping district during the Christmas month. This brought a profit of almost $500.

Several have been baptized in the new font, and many young babies have been blessed. Two organ recitals have been held to help finance the organ. Recently the color film "Other Sheep" was presented and well attended by persons interested in learning more of the church of Christ in this latter day. The new building promises to be of great benefit to many people in the community.

When Seventy W. T. Guthrie returned to the pulpit, a promise was fulfilled. He had shared our sorrows and expectations for the future, and as he left our district to take up duties elsewhere, he promised to return after the completion of our construction. As we listened to him, our hearts were lifted and tears filled many eyes in thanksgiving that God had healed him and allowed him to return after his accident.

In the Communion service of September, 1957, Brother Clyde S. Rice of Parkersburg, West Virginia, spoke to us in pastoral ministry, and the Spirit of the Lord was so abundant that all present were touched. He said, "More has gone into this structure than wood or stone. Every time I have entered these doors, I have felt the Spirit of Christ. This church shall fill the measure of its creation. Men shall be fed and brought into the fold." He cautioned us, "Fulfill the measure of your creation, be a better man, be a better woman, and you shall have a better church."

Though we have achieved a place of worship, we realize this is not the end but only the beginning of increased responsibilities, missionary efforts, better teachers for our church school, a consecrated priesthood, and dedicated Latter Day Saints.

BOOK REVIEW

Stories for Talks with Boys and Girls

By J. A. Cheley

Association Press

$3.95

Stories for Talks with Boys and Girls by J. A. Cheley is an up-to-date revision of a book by Mr. Cheley's father. Containing more than 700 stories embracing 99 themes, the book accomplishes more than it claims. The stories are, to be sure, adapted for boys and girls because they have been tested through actual experience in Mr. Cheley's years of camping experience with young people. However, the book contains the type of story which can be successfully employed by members of the priesthood for sermon illustrations or prayer meeting thoughts for adult congregations. The stories are of a high moral caliber, given to creative imagery designed to foster character growth, provocative of thought and inspiration.

A typical story deals not in abstractions, but in actual life experiences, quite often from the lives of persons well known to our generation.

This book would be especially helpful to staff campers, pastors, junior church pastors, priesthood members, youth leaders, women's leaders, girls' workers, and Scouters.

Among the themes under which the 700 stories are categorized are these: love, influence, imitation, ideals, enthusiasm, example, sacrifice, self-control, temptation, courtesy, will power, success, prayer, religion, service, habit, duty, education, action, purpose, conviction, and seventy-eight other topics from which to draw illustrations. These are alphabetically listed and cross-indexed for convenience in locating the type of illustration desirable for the occasion.

Evangelist Visits

JOPLIN, MISSOURI.—Evangelist Harold I. Velt held a series of meetings May 4-18. Brother Velt began by asking all who cared to do so to fast one meal a day for three days, and to pray earnestly for the success of the meetings. These prayers were answered in many ways. At the closing dedication service the Spirit of God was abundantly felt. Many re-dedicated themselves to fuller obedience to the laws of the church.

Brother Velt outlined a program of tract-ing for nonmember friends. He also gave patri-archal blessings while in Joplin. Sister Velt accompanied her husband, and they vis-ited a number of homes.—Reported by MARY COCHRAN

First Anniversary

PEORIA, ILLINOIS.—The first anniversary of occupying its own church building was celebrated by Peoria Branch on the eleventh of May. The theme for the services was "What Fruit Have You Brought?"

The fellowship service, in charge of Elder Louis Hancock, was well attended. Quite a number of Saints from Galesburg District and some visitors were present at all the meetings.

W. Wallace Smith of Independence, Mis-souri, a member of the First Presidency, was guest speaker at the family night banquet on Saturday night and at the two Sunday preach-ing services. Since it was Mother's Day, President W. W. Smith paid tribute to all good mothers in his Sunday morning sermon.

The Jay Hattons of St. Louis, Missouri, former members of Peoria Branch, were guests on the family night program. Jay played several violin selections accompanied by Mrs. Hatton.

Pastor William H. A. Norris presided at the eleven o'clock meeting Sunday morning. Special music was furnished by the fourteen-voice choir under the direction of Mrs. Louis Hancock and Jay Hatton accompanied by Mrs. Joseph Brady. Mrs. Brady was organist for the morning service and for the anthem sung by the choir.

A basket lunch was served Sunday noon at Bradley Park pavilion.

A short business session was held before the closing service to take care of district business. District President Louis Hancock was chairman, and at this time the call of Paul Brooks to the office of teacher was unani-mously approved.

Elder Raymond Wrigley had charge of the afternoon meeting and Wanda DePriest was soloist, accompanied by Mrs. Louis Hancock.—Reported by GLADYS L. HEGWOOD

The theme for the services was "The For-ward Movement of Christ's Church." Apostle Jensen presided over the opening fellowship service. Both he and Bishop Livingston were speakers at the morning worship service. Special choral music was furnished by the Phoen-ix Branch choir under the direction of Marion Blakely.

After a basket dinner served by the Phoen-ix women's department, the organizational business meeting commenced. Apostle Jen-son was in charge; Mrs. Ted Beck of Hayden was soloist. Elder L. D. Appreciates Church Services on Air While waiting for our own service to be broadcast I heard another church program. I particularly appreciated the familiar hymns used in this service, and through the days that followed I continued to remember these songs and their messages. I find that in times of trouble, prayer and the comfort of hymns help. Fasting is important, too.

I thank God for the beauty of nature and for his wonderful gospel. I ask for the prayers of the Saints that I may have better health and that I may live my life wisely. My prayer is that God will bless all of his children.

Birthdays with Christ

I arose early Sunday morning, June 22, to prepare for church. The rest of the household had not yet risen, and I relaxed for a moment to ponder the happy event of the past evening when about twenty of our relatives gathered in our home for a dinner in honor of our son's first birthday.

It was indeed joyous to witness our son's actions. Throughout the evening I couldn't help silently reflecting on the individuals around the room. There were aunts and uncles, grandparents, and great-grandparents present. Some were members of our church, but most were not. Like all church members, I looked upon our loved ones there wishing that each might have a knowledge of the plan of God, and that in unity we do our part to realize Zion.

The older ones were concerned about their health and their future, looking for something that they might grasp in their remaining years. I wished with all my heart, as so many of our church members do, that our loved ones would share in our dream of Zion. I determined that I must rededicate my life in a greater service to my Master, that I must be consistent in my efforts to present the Restoration story to all within my reach.

My testimony is that it is necessary to stand to our feet often to rededicate our lives in service to our heavenly Father. I am aware more than ever that time is precious in the eyes of God.

Being isolated is no longer a handicap but a joyous challenge, for the Lord has provided the prospective candidates and has changed the hearts of individuals within our reach. I am reminded constantly that the Lord stands ready to bless and is pleased to pour out his Spirit in abundance that his children might be strengthened, and that Zion shall be more than a dream.

The Lord has given his Spirit to strengthen us as a family. I am thankful that my wife and I are privileged to work together in this great cause, and that our son, David, will witness and be a part of the building of Zion, for "as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord" (Joshua 24: 15).

Peace in the Midst of Turmoil

I wonder at times at the masses of people struggling to get somewhere when actually they are "there." If we—each one of us—would stop right where we are and look around us with the Spirit of God we would see what is needed most and where we fit into that need.

I live in a new housing development and sometimes the noise is more than I can bear when tractors tear into the earth and huge trucks rumble along with their heavy loads of dirt, making the dishes rattle in the cupboard. Then I say a prayer, asking for peace within that I might think clearly enough to continue my duties. After praying I am able to work faster, more effectively, and with a pleasant temperament despite the continued din of "progress" across the street.

Recently I heard a piercing scream, and in a moment of panic I wondered, Is it my child? Is he hurt? Where is he? I ran frantically, praying that none of the trucks had hit a youngster. When I reached the scene of screaming, I found that a small neighbor had not so lightly tapped my two-year-old on the head with a hammer. I soothed him, breathing a prayer of gratitude as I did so. Then I cautioned the lad with the hammer not to hit people. He said, "Okay," and went on with his play. Another crisis had ended peacefully.

How wonderful it is to have God handy. Would I be as quick to answer his call? Would I even hear it? I wonder.

Differences That Persist

Since 1943 this tract has gone through thirteen printings. Its popularity no doubt lies in the desire of members of the Reorganized Church to inform their friends of definite and distinctive differences between their church and the dominant church of Utah.

The tract was written by Presiding Patriarch Elbert A. Smith, Brother Elbert, as one of the descendants of the founder of the church, has had a great interest in defending the teachings of his grandfather. So out of his research into the deviations of doctrine which appeared in Mormonism after 1844 came this forty-eight-page brochure.

There are five divisions in the tract: an introduction followed by a discussion of "Conflicting Views Concerning God," "The Question of Polygamy," "Secret Temple Rites," and "Prophetic Succession and Leadership."

Two of the subjects covered scantily in this tract are now discussed more completely in separate tracts. "Baptism for the Dead," a secret temple rite is fully discussed in a tract of that name. A new tract, "Succession in Presidency and Authority," has recently been written by Seventy Russell F. Ralston. It is now available and will be reviewed in this column soon.

Differences That Persist has a single copy price of 25 cents. Quantity prices are available. Write to Herald House for a free copy of the 1958 Tract List giving quantity prices.

A VOICE OF WARNING

A Voice of Warning is a booklet that was first published in Nauvoo in 1839. It was written by Parley P. Pratt, who stated in the preface to the first edition that "this work is intended as a warning voice . . . to all people into whose hands it may fall, that they may understand and be prepared for the great day of the Lord." It has run through a great many editions, and it is useless to try to determine the number of people who have read it and learned at least a little about the Restoration story. Reprinted in 1950, this booklet is a valuable reference work for the library of every Latter Day Saint. It clarifies many of the circumstances surrounding the Restoration of the church of Jesus Christ and the translation of the Book of Mormon. $1.00

A SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Beginning in October, 1958, the curriculum for the church school classes will be a series of entirely new materials now being published at Herald House. This new material will serve all ages from kindergarten through high school.

With discrimination and care, the Department of Religious Education has prepared, with the help of many willing authors and artists, a completely new series of instruction materials designed to meet the needs of youth and children in the world today, in developing their relationships with Christ and their fellow men.

And Finally...

EVEN GREATER CRIMES

We have sadly devaluated this splendid word, "repentance." The common idea is that it means a sorrow for sin issuing in ceasing to do evil. Looked at in that way, repentance is a dreary business. We hold that repentance consists in giving up this or that bad habit—and that is all. Woe indeed to him who thus views this principle. Such ceasing to do evil is very often the occasion for committing even greater crimes. I have seen people who have overcome some bad habit such as drinking or smoking become very proud of their achievement and despise heartily those who did not seem to have the power to do as well—in that field of action only. Proud Saints they are, and damned Saints—unless they repent.

PUT MY NAME ON IT

Recently an appeal was made to buy a seat for the Auditorium. At least one brother sent in his check for thirty dollars and said, "Put my name on it, please." It would be rather complicated to determine which seat a particular man or family had bought unless his name were on it. It would be even more complicated to use the Conference Chamber for delegates if several people would demand the right to sit in the seats they paid for.

The appeal was to buy seats for the Auditorium and not for a family or for any individual. All of us who have contributed from 1920 on are "owners-in-common" of the Auditorium and not "in fee simple" of a particular stone, panel, or seat. This fine building is "ours," not "mine." Like the disciples of old (Acts 4:32) so far as this joint effort is concerned, "Neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own."

God Giveth the Increase

Clayton H. Condit

CLAYTON CONDIT is the grandson and great-grandson of missionaries for the Restoration church. Last April he began full-time church appointment as missionary for the San Francisco Bay District.

Credit for his interest in the church must go to his parents, Brother Condit said. "My mother and father always presented the church to their nine children in such a manner that we looked forward to Sunday. We wanted to go to church."

The desire to serve the church as a full-time missionary first came to Brother

Condit at a presiding elders' retreat in 1955. President F. Henry Edwards was in charge. Other powerful experiences developed as Brother Condit shared the gospel with friends. "The more people I told about the gospel the stronger became my desire to share it even more," he said.

The San Francisco area has already known Brother Condit's ministry. He was graduated from the University of San Francisco in 1952. He has served as a church school director, district treasurer, counselor to the district president, and presiding elder of the Peninsula Branch.

Before his appointment he worked as an auditor and a cost analyst. His other interests are photography and outdoor sports.

In 1952 he was married to Joann Howard. They have one daughter, Jennifer Louise, six months old.

Many Workers Are Required to Arrange Housing for General Conference Delegates

A THREE-MAN committee has already been at work arranging housing for General Conference delegates and visitors in October.

Committeemen are Chairman Harold Downey, counselor to the Center Stake bishop; Herbert Lively, counselor to the stake president; and Robert Taylor, stake youth director.

The committee is aided by nearly thirty housing representatives who come from the various congregations in Center Stake. Mrs. Ray Moore is chairman of the housing representatives. These representatives personally visit and check every room offered to General Conference visitors. They check the rooms for location, entrance, appearance, neighborhood, bath facilities, cost, and other items. Each home is entered in a record and later matched with a request for housing.

Brother Downey said application forms for persons wishing to obtain housing during General Conference will be printed in the Saints' Herald during the first two weeks of August. Housing assignments will be made the first week in September.

Conference Housing Committee Begins Work

He urged all General Conference delegates and visitors to make their own private arrangements for housing if possible. If persons attending Conference cannot make their own arrangements, he added, his committee will be happy to assist them in finding accommodations in the homes which have been listed.

Brother Downey's committee can also furnish a list of local motels that have been inspected and approved for Conference visitors. The listing includes location and rates of the motels. Only Independence motels are listed, but Brother Downey said people with autos at their disposal could easily stay in Kansas City hotels or motels while attending Conference.

Both member and nonmember homes are used by the committee to accommodate Conference visitors. One nonmember lady wrote the committee as follows after the last Conference:

"The people who stayed with us were lovely, and we enjoyed having them. Thank you for sending them. I am a Methodist, but I enjoyed getting better acquainted with the members of your church."

Brother Downey said some persons have already written to the committee asking for help in securing housing. He said such inquirers are advised to watch for the application forms which will appear in the Herald in August.

The best idea, he said, would be for each Conference visitor to first try to make his own arrangements for housing with friends, relatives, or motels in Independence or Kansas City.

“And They Were Scattered Abroad”

IN a recent issue of “Newsletter,” the official church publication for American servicemen, there are several items which are stimulating because of their implications.

One refers to the tract “Hear Our Story” in the Japanese language. Another announces a retreat in Germany, which of course is not the first occasion that such a function has been held in Germany. The interesting point is that it is to be held at Berchtesgaden. In the decade following the catastrophic happening of war in 1939, who would have been brave enough to have prophesied that in Hitler’s stronghold there would convene a retreat for ministers of the Restoration movement on duty abroad.

Another report in the same issue of the servicemen’s letter is headed, “Move toward First Mission in France.” This, too, is being made by servicemen. They are planning to use a chapel in Joan de Arc near Toul.

As we read these items among others of similar interest the statement of the book of Acts came clearly into focus: “And they were all scattered abroad.” The reason for the scattering was the persecution of the Christians which followed the martyrdom of Stephen. One of the chief persons to cause the scattering was none other than the afterwards great apostle, Paul.

We could not help but reflect upon the ultimate results of the dispersion of the Christians in Jerusalem. They fled to places then remote—throughout Judea, to Samaria, Phenice, Cyprus, Antioch, Greece, Rome, and many other places.

Paul and his fellows unwittingly laid the foundation of the Christian movement abroad, and he was later to build upon the results of his own tragic misunderstanding.

God does not cause but does use the circumstances of apparent disaster. Many men drafted from their home branches and consecrated church activity have no doubt felt that to be drafted to Japan, Korea, or to Europe was an interruption in their work in the church. Events have proved otherwise, for because of their being scattered to the four corners of the earth the gospel is springing up in the lives of men and women of many races and colors.

The causes of dispersion are many. Not only war but economic conditions, health, even men’s being captured and sold into slavery have been the means of the seed’s being planted in far distant places. To those of old time the dispersion was a catastrophe. History sees in it the leavening of the world. Men will yet look back upon our time as one of the most significant in the expanding of the kingdom. We have been told to go. We have not gone. Then we are sent.

Who Wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews?

MOST careful biblical scholars refer to the authorship of this book as “The writer of the Hebrew Epistle.” The introduction to The Interpreter’s Bible says, “Attempts to identify the author of Hebrews all rest on tradition or on inferences from the writing itself; it was anonymous when it came to our earliest witnesses.”

The King James Version carries the heading, “The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews.” This was not “corrected” in the Inspired Version. The English Revised edition (1881) credits it to Paul, but the American Revised Version (1901), done by part of the same group of scholars, does not. The Douay (Catholic) Version (1914) gives Paul as its author, but most of the modern versions do not.

The Westminster Dictionary of the Bible says, “Its authorship has always been disputed . . . though the canonicity and authority of the book were recognized.” Among the early scholars are found champions for such men as Barnabas, Luke, and Apollos as authors of the book. Origen in the third century said, “Only God knows who wrote it.”

The evidence against Pauline authorship is based on both content and style. Quoting Westminster again, “Its language has a large classic element in it, and its style has seemed to most critics unlike the apostle’s, being smoother, often more elegant, and less impetuous. The omission of any address also is unlike Paul’s usage elsewhere.”

The Interpreter’s Bible adds this comment, “But it is the structure and the fabric of the thought which count decisively against Paul.” Then it analyzes certain passages in support of this conclusion.

It is not my purpose in this article to give an answer to the question it raises. I am of the opinion, however, that the book will remain anonymous.

To say that Paul did not write it is not to deny nor to doubt what the Scriptures say. The chapter headings were all supplied by editors of modern days. This is also true of the titles of the books. Since the Scripture itself does not identify the author, the questioning of its authorship should not offend those who have been traditioned on the belief that Paul wrote it. I think that anyone who examines all the evidence will conclude that we do not know who wrote it, but we are reasonably sure of some who didn’t.

Call for Fasting and Prayer

In harmony with our custom, and having in mind the pressing needs of the hour, we request that members of the church shall observe Sunday, September 7, as a day of fasting and prayer. Where wise and possible we suggest abstinence from both the morning and noon meals. In addition thereto we ask that specific time shall be spent by individuals and families in meditation and prayer concerning the needs of the church, the specific business to come before the Conference, and the enlightenment and blessing of the elders and delegates who will be representing the church in General Conference, October 5 through 12.

Let the whole church be united in prayer.

Tithing Statement Filer Count

The tithing statement filer count in the domestic field for the first four months of 1958 totals 15,843 as compared with 14,330 for the corresponding period last year.

This is the largest number of members filing tithing statements in the first four months of any year.

A large number of districts show gains over the preceding year, and at the end of four months five districts have equaled or exceeded their filer count for the full year of 1957. These districts are Northeastern Illinois, Waterloo-Clinton, Washington, D. C., Central Mich., and Rich Hill.

Statistician

Israel A. Smith

(Editorial from Independence Examiner, June 17, 1958)

This is not an attempt to eulogize. It is a statement of facts about a man of simple tastes, a quiet man, a modest man, and a gentle yet forceful man of intelligence and integrity.

Israel A. Smith, at 82, an age when most men have long before retired from their labors, vigorously continued his official duties as president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, whose thousands of members are found throughout the world. In fact, he was on a mission for his church Saturday when his life was snuffed out in a motor car accident.

Officials of the R.L.D.S. Church and men of other denominations alike will tell you that Israel Smith was of a kindly nature and seemed sometimes to have even a timid demeanor. Yet, when he was approached by a person, he willingly and enthusiastically gave advice clearly and concisely as would a seasoned lawyer, which he was before succeeding his brother, Frederick M. Smith, in 1946 as the fourth president in the church's long historical span of years.

Israel Smith was a sympathetic man. He listened to people in all walks of life, and his counsel was sought by members of his church as well as by persons of other faiths. He could be firm in his convictions, and he made them known in high church councils. He contributed sage advice in many groups of the community outside his church.

John F. Thice, Independence city counselor, a longtime admirer of the late church leader, said that President Smith contributed outstanding work in the last Missouri Constitutional Convention of which he was a member. State leaders said his services were invaluable.

Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp said:

"My close acquaintanceship with President Smith was one of the most pleasant experiences of my life. He was considerate of others always; was appreciative of the values in other persons; and was able to bring out the best in them. President Smith set many examples for others. He was always at work early, usually before anyone else at the office, and wanted to get the major problems out of the way early in the day. He carried himself with dignity."

Yes, Israel Smith stood tall in his church and the community. Both will miss him.

ISRAEL A.

His work is finished,
And the grief we bear,
I know our Father
Must surely share.
Yet his joy is great
His followers know
It's such happiness
To leave worldly woe.
The friends he has left
Cannot compete
With the joy he shares,
With the ones he'll meet.
His work is finished;
Is that what I said?
Ah, God only knows
Of his work ahead.

Historical Evidences of the Book of Daniel

I READ WITH INTEREST the article entitled, "Daniel in the Scholars' Den," by J. W. Bradley in the Herald of May 27, 1957. I thought that, while that material was comparatively fresh in the minds of Herald readers, the archaeological supports of the book may be helpful.

This book has been torn to pieces by the critics, and in their hands it becomes useless. The critics claim that the predictions of the four kingdoms, usually attributed to the prophecies of Daniel, do not apply to them at all but refer to the Media-Persian kingdom, the Greek kingdom under Alexander the Great, and the Syrian division of that kingdom, ruled by the Sellenid kings. They claim that all of Daniel's predictions were fulfilled during the existence of that kingdom, also that what we call the prophecies of Daniel were not prophecies at all but accounts written in that way after the events transpired. And so, they conclude, the book must have been written at the very earliest at about 300 B.C., but more probably about 167 or 168 B.C., during the persecution of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, King of Syria, who reigned from 175 to 164 B.C.

One of the reasons they bring forward to support this claim is the fact that there are eleven Greek words in the book. Such was their original claim, but eight of these have proved to be Sumerian or Akkadian. These were the early people of the land; the Sumerians seemed to have been the first, and the Akkadians migrated in later (these last were Semitic and from them arose Sargon I who brought them to power). Hammurabi was also of these people, but the Sumerian language was the court language for hundreds of years and did not go out of use until the time of the Persians. These words are proof that the book was written before the Persian conquest.

The other three words were kitharos—kitharis (Greek for harp, the same word from which guitar is derived); pesan-terim—psalterion [Greek]; sumphoryah—symphonia).

Of Harps and Palaces

Today we have quite a lot of information on these three words. The kitharis was a seven-stringed harp, invented by Tespander, a Greek poet and musician. "He was the first person," says Strabo, "that used the lyre with seven, instead of four, strings."¹

Tespander's harp was invented in 650 B.C. Assurbanipal, King of Assyria, died 625 B.C. Only twenty-five years elapsed between the invention of the seven-stringed harp and the death of Assurbanipal. The significance of these figures will be seen when it is stated that this harp with seven strings is sculptured upon a monument of Assurbanipal²; we are also informed that one of these instruments was buried with him.

Assurbanipal was a great patron of music. Both he and his father Esarhaddon "were in direct contact with the Greeks; for they mention among their tributaries several Greek kings in the Isle of Cyprus—Ituander of Paphos, Irisu of Sillu; Damasu of Curium, etc."³

Nebuchadnezzar also had a corp of Grecian soldiers fighting for him. Among them was Alcalus, the poet, and also his brother. These Greeks carried their musical instruments with them, so they would have retained their Greek names.

Daniel states that when they arrived at Babylon certain of them were selected to be educated in the language and learning of the Chaldees so that they could take positions of authority. The critics claim that they did not treat captives in such a lenient way.

Archaeology refutes their argument.

It seemed to be almost providential, that one of the first great marble palaces discovered, in the ruins of Babylon, was designated by the builders themselves, as "The Place of Learning;" There captive princes were taught the learning of the Chaldea.⁴

No less dramatic and interesting was the accidental experience of the famed excavator Dieulafoy, who fell into what at first sight would have been called an ancient well. When he was rescued by his companions from his uncomfortable, but in nowise dangerous, situation, they proceeded with their work to the point of identification. The well turned out to be a pit, which was used as an open cage for wild animals, and upon the curb was found the inscription, "The place of execution where men who angered the king died torn by wild animals."⁵

Both of these were in keeping with the times, an inscription by Ashurbanipal, King of Assyria, states:

- I. Saulmagina my rebellious brother, who made war with me, they threw into a burning fiery furnace and destroyed his life.
- II. The rest of the people who had rebelled they threw alive among bulls and lions, as Sennacherib my grandfather used to do. So, again following his footsteps, those men I threw into the midst of them.⁶

The Great Image

Daniel states that Nebuchadnezzar built a great image and called on all to worship it. Light has been cast upon this, not at Babylon, but at Ur.

The temple was indefinitely old. Too little was left of the earliest building to show its form, but from the days of Ur-Nammu at least up to and after those Kings of Kuri-Galzu, that is for more than a thousand years, successive builders had respected and repeated its ground-plan. The small five-chambered sanctuary was a thing apart; it lay at the back of the building and was reached only by a passage which ran round the three of its sides, on the other side of the passage there were storerooms and priest-chambers occupying the whole of the rest of the temple area and completely masking the sanctuary—it was hidden away and made as difficult of access as might be. I have said that the sanctuary rooms were very small and would hold but few people at a time; taking this in conjunction with its inaccessibility, we are driven to conclude that E-Nunmakh was designated for a secret ritual such as might be fitting in what was really a harem temple, the special quarters of the god as married; only the priests would enter here and in privacy wait upon the twin deities.

This ancient tradition was completely set at naught by Nebuchadnezzar when he restored the temple. The rooms in front of the sanctuary, storerooms and rooms which, as tablets found in them showed, were for the priestesses specially dedicated as concubines of the god who would naturally be at home in this harem building, were swept away, the whole front of the sanctuary was opened up; where the passage had been, was a raised pavement, in the centre of which an altar rose, a statue-base was erected in the anti-chamber of the sanctuary facing the door, and where had been a maze of chambers the wide lower court afforded accommodation for a crowd of spectators. In the old temple everything had been secret; now a numerous public could watch the priest making his offering on the open air altar and behind him could see through the dim sanctuary's open door, the image of the god.

There is no doubt that the remodelling of the building implies such a change of ritual, but how can this itself be explained? The answer is given by the old Testament story of the three children in the Book of Daniel . . . what was there new in the king's act? Not the setting up of a statue, because each king in turn had done the same, the novelty was the command for general worship by the public . . . so striking is the correspondence between the written story and the facts of the ruins, and so completely do they explain each other, that we must needs accept the background of the legend as historical.⁷

Daniel tells of a madness, medically known as sycanthrophy, that came upon Nebuchadnezzar. For seven years he roamed the country as an animal; this was declared to be but a fabrication of a vivid imagination. "It fell to the lot of the great Sir Henry Rawlinsen to find the original document wherein Nebuchadnezzar tells this episode exactly as Daniel had told it."⁸

Succession of Kings

Daniel also stated that Belshazzar was the king when Babylon fell to the Media-Persians. Until recently there was no record of such a king. The last was King Nabonidus. Ancient historians, such as Berossus (c 250 B.C.) and Alexander Polyhistor, claimed that Nabonidus was the last king and did not even mention Belshazzar.

History tells us that after Nebuchadnezzar, Babylon fell on troubled times; he was followed on the throne by his son Amel-Marduk (562-560), or Evil-Merodach as he is called in II Kings 25: 27. This man was soon slain by his brother-in-law Nergal-Shar-usur (Neriglisar). The latter ruled but four years (560-556) and his son Labashi-Marduk (Laborosardoch) was on the throne only a few months (556) when conspirators made away with him. One of the conspirators, a Babylonian noble named Nabuncua (Nabonidus) then ruled (556-539) as the last king of New Babylonia.⁹

Nabonidus, early in his reign, while engaged in strengthening the fortifications at Sippar, in delving down to strengthen a neglected point, came upon the ruins of an ancient temple, the temple of Samash, which had been built centuries before by Naram-sin, a king that had ruled Agade from about 2488 B.C. to 2450 B.C. He was one of the greatest, if not the greatest of the rulers of Agade. He was the grandson of Sargon I.

This discovery so delighted Nabonidus that he became a confirmed archaeologist from then on. He spent more time in that work than he did in ruling Babylonian.

His eldest and favorite son shared the throne with him from about the time he reached thirty years of age. One cuneiform text states:

He entrusted a camp to his eldest, first born son; the troops of the land he sent with him. He freed his hand; he entrusted the kingdom to him. Then he himself undertook a distant campaign, the power of the land of Akkad advanced with him; towards Tema in the midst of the Westland he set his face . . .¹⁰

The Nabunaid Chronicle contains the following statement:

In the seventh year the king was in the city of Tema. The son of the king, the princes and his troops were in the land of Akkad.¹¹

This statement is repeated for the ninth, tenth, and eleventh year, so it is certain that the son was king in Babylon most of the time.

Testimony of the Clay Tablets

About the middle of the last century some clay tablets were discovered in what was ancient Babylon. These were sent to the British Museum. Dr. Theophilus G. Pinches, a prominent Assyriologist in London, examined many of these tablets. One of them contained the name of Belshazzar; another bore the names of both Belshazzar and Nabonidus, showing that there must have been some connection between these two men. Still another, a contract, contained an oath taken in the name of Nabonidus and Belshazzar. In ancient Babylonian oaths were taken in the name of the reigning king. From this we see that such a man did exist, and that he was actually co-ruler with Nabonidus.

The Prince regent, however, was not able to stand prosperity. He seems to have degenerated into a drunken profligate who spent all of his time in the dubious pleasures of sin. The administration of the kingdom fell on evil days during the brief span of time that Belshazzar was in authority. As nearly as we can build an accurate and credible chronology from the new available records of Babylon, Belshazzar became regent in 541 B.C., and in the year 538 B.C., the Babylonian dynasty disappeared.¹²

Two Stories

There are two records that seem to contradict one another. One said that Darius killed the king, and the other that Cyrus took him prisoner. What happened was that while Nabonidus was away from Babylon, Cyrus the Persian had come to the joint throne of Media-Persia. After conquering the rich kingdom of Sydia, in Asia Minor, he turned his attention to Babylon.

He sent his ambassador to Belshazzar, asking him to submit to him and become part of the Media-Persian Empire. Belshazzar was in one of his drunken orgies at the time and had what he thought was a wonderful idea. He ordered that the ambassador should be cut to pieces, placed in a box, and sent back to Cyrus with a note stating that they would do the same to Cyrus if he came to Babylon.

When this arrived at Ecbatana (capital of Media), Cyrus went wild with indignation. He at once dispatched Darius, the chief of his bodyguard, with an army to besiege Babylon, while he assembled the whole of his army to follow as soon as possible.

Darius advanced rapidly to Babylon, arriving there at night. To his surprise the gates were wide open and the guards drunk. It was Belshazzar's birthday and the whole city was given over to drinking to celebrate the event. The guards also had been given liberal supplies and had forgotten to close the gates.

Darius at once attacked them and, after killing them, left a strong guard there to keep the gates open. Then he advanced to the King's Palace. He very probably was doing this at the time that Daniel gave the interpretation of the writing upon the wall.

Darius killed Belshazzar and then sent Belshazzar's head and a note to Cyrus, stating, "The kingdom is thine. Do thou enter."

Nabonidus hurried to help his son, but when he heard that Belshazzar was dead and Babylon captured, he surrendered.

Cyrus, in his rage against Belshazzar, had his name removed from all the monuments, and so his name was lost to history, except for the one lone voice of Daniel. Darius was made satrap or king of Babylon, the third satrap of the Media-Persian Kingdom.

The Cylinder of Cyrus

The famous cylinder of Cyrus reads in part as follows:

Marduk . . . sought a righteous prince, after his own heart, whom he took by the hand, Cyrus, King of Anshan, he called by name, to Lordship over the whole world he appointed him. . . . To his city Babylon he caused him to go, he made him take the road to Babylon, going as a friend and companion at his side. His numerous troops, in number unknown, like the water of a river, marched armed at his side. Without battle and conflict he permitted him to enter Babylon. He spared his city Babylon a calamity. Nabunaid, the king, who did not fear him, he delivered into his hand.¹³

It was about twelve months after the death of Belshazzar that Cyrus entered Babylon. "The day Cylinder of Cyrus narrates in Babylonian script what took place."

As I entered Babylon in peace, and established my royal residence in the palace of the princes amid jubilation and rejoicing, Marduk, the great Lord, warmed the hearts of the Babylonians toward me, while I for my part devoted myself daily to do his reverence. My troops wandered peacefully widespread throughout Babylon. In all Sumer and Akkad I let no man be afraid. I concerned myself with the internal affairs of Babylon and all its cities. The dwellers in Babylon . . . I freed from the yoke that ill became them. I repaired their houses, I healed their afflictions. . . . I am Cyrus, King of all, the great King, the mighty King, King of Babylon, King of Sumer and Akkad, King of the four corners of the earth.¹⁴

This last statement strikes a familiar note. A number of the prophecies and statements of the Bible seem to be caught up here (for one see II Chronicles 36:23).

The material presented here regarding Belshazzar explains why he said that he would make Daniel third in the kingdom; Nabonidus was first and Belshazzar second.

Alma's Great Challenge

Editor's note: The sixteenth chapter of Alma has been a favorite with many people. The author of this article says, "Verse 151 has been such an inspiration to me it has changed my entire life."

Who, even having a portion of God's Spirit, wouldn't thrill to the wonderful writings of Alma in the Book of Mormon! Alma, through a powerful ministry and keen understanding of human nature, knew both the workings of the Holy Spirit and the tendencies of the natural man. He was seeking for the souls of men with all his might, mind, and strength.

He pleads with us (Alma 16:151), to awake and arouse our faculties, even to an experiment upon God's words, and exercise a particle of faith, even if it is no more than a desire to believe, to let this desire work in us, even until we believe in a manner that we can give place for a portion of God's words.

Then he likens the experiment to a seed planted in our hearts. A good seed will grow if we do not cast it out by our unbelief. He pleads that we not resist the Spirit of God so that this good seed can begin to swell within our breasts.

The Inspired Version

The work of Joseph Smith throws added light on this book. In revising the Bible, when he came to the book of the Songs of Solomon, he rejected it as uninspired, yet the Book of Daniel was left in. On the other hand he was told in regards to the Apocrypha:

There are many things contained therein that are true, and it is mostly translated correctly; there are many things contained therein that are not true, which are interpolations by the hands of men.

Verily I say unto you, that it is not needful that the apocrypha should be translated.¹⁵

It is obvious that the Book of Daniel cannot be classed among the Apocryphal books, because Joseph did correct that book. In chapter 5:28, he writes "apharsim; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians."

The King James Version says, "Peres, Thy kingdom is divided . . ." This word has been one of the problems of the book, so to a degree, Joseph Smith testified to the truthfulness of the book.

We shall know it is a good seed, for it will begin to enlarge our souls and our understanding.

But we must not let the experiment drop there. He continues to plead:

As the tree beginneth to grow, ye will say, Let us nourish it with great care, that it may get root, that it may grow up and bring forth fruit unto us. . . . If ye neglect the tree, and take no thought for its nourishment, behold, it will not get any root; and when the heat of the sun cometh and scorcheth it, because it hath no root, it withers away, and ye pluck it up and cast it out.

Alma's great heart was urging, through the spoken word—and still urges us today, as it were out of the dust—to have faith in God and experiment upon his words that we might not only save our own souls but have success in bringing others to Christ.

He taught the benefit of humbling afflictions that we might be lowly in heart, that we might be prepared to hear the word, "and if so, blessed are ye, that ye might learn wisdom."

He also exhorts that we have diligence, faith, and patience in nourishing the word that it might take root in us, and by and by we shall pluck the fruit thereof which is most precious, that we might feast upon this fruit even until we are filled, that we hunger not, neither thirst.

These are challenging statements. We know they can find their fruition in our lives and in the lives of others we are seeking to help, if we give heed.

The New Kaneohe Bay Mission Church

IN January, 1950, windward resident members of the Makiki Branch of the Reorganized Church met in the home of Captain Archie Gatrost (Air Corps) in Puahala Village for the purpose of praying and studying together. An invitation was extended to members and nonmembers to participate in these fellowship services. Approximately fifteen formed the group that met from time to time under the leadership of A. Orlin Crownover, then president of the District of Hawaii. By 1953 interest in the group activities had gained sufficient momentum for the establishment of a regular schedule of priesthood members of the Makiki Branch to preside over weekly prayer meetings held each Wednesday evening in private homes on the windward side.

In August, 1954, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Harbottle moved to Kailua. Nadine had opened a "day care" at 54 Maluniu Street, and this couple generously donated the use of these premises for a regular meeting place until better facilities could be obtained. Elder Stephen Black, who had replaced Elder Orlin Crownover as district president, appointed Elder Elias Kaawakauo to serve as pastor of the group, with priests Henry Inouye, Sr., and Isaac Harbottle as his counselors.

In February, 1955, Apostle Percy E. Farrow organized the group into a district mission, and Brother Black appointed Brother Kaawakauo to serve as pastor. In October, 1955, Isaac Harbottle, later ordained to the office of elder, was appointed mission pastor.

In August, 1956, Mr. Harold Castle responded favorably to the efforts of Bishop Agent Tsunao Miyamoto, District President Stephen Black, and others in obtaining a land grant upon which to build a chapel. This two-acre location on Kaneohe Bay Drive was obtained. A committee was selected to prepare plans for a building suitable to the needs of the church and in keeping with the standards established by Mr. Castle for homes and buildings in the area.

Mr. John Hutchison, vice-president of a construction firm and a newly converted member, was instrumental in preparing architectural designs, co-ordinating with local city and county officials, and contracting for the erection of the first unit on the site.

Ground-breaking ceremonies on the property were held on July 1, 1956. Apostle Farrow, District President Black, Harry Stroup (public relations representative for Mayor Neal Blaisdell), Seventy Sylvester Coleman (present pastor), and others participated.

In the interim, services were held in the band room of Kailua High School, Kainalu Drive.

On November 13, 1957, Mr. Ward L. Kegin, contractor, began construction on the new building. The first service was held on January 5, 1958, less than two months after the contractor commenced work. An impressive Communion service, with Apostle Farrow present, followed the regular church school hour. During the period January 5-17 each evening except Saturday Apostle Farrow conducted an evangelical series to introduce Christ's church to windward Oahu communities.

During Apostle Farrow's recent visit to the Hawaii District, the official name of Kaneohe Bay Mission was approved and adopted. Previous to this time, it had been known as the Kailua Mission.

In Harmony

Not long ago I sat in an auditorium and listened to the bands from six grade schools play as one. They had never rehearsed together, but here under one director they did very well. Their directors all used similar methods, and as a result the children were able to follow the single director and sound as one band.

We have church groups all over the world that are taught from the same books and literature. They are taught by the pastors and leaders of their groups. If this teaching has been true, we can go from one group to another and find no conflict in belief; or we can gather in one place, as at a conference, and there under the leadership of our church officials be in accord. Where there is this kind of harmony, God will surely be.

"For the Kingdom of Heaven Is at Hand"

"Come."
"Huh?"
"There is a journey we must take."
"What?"
"A journey."
"Do I know you?"
"Do you not?"
"I . . ."
"We shall be friends."
"What do you mean stopping me on the street like this?"
"Come."
"A journey you say?"
"Yes."
"And where to? Outer space, perhaps."
"If you wish to call it that."
"Will we reach the moon?"
"There and beyond."
"Ah, old man, you joke."
"No, my son."
"Will we go by rocket?"
"The speed and power thereof would not be sufficient."
"Then how?"
"You shall learn. Come."
"I have a business appointment with John Brookman. We're meeting on the corner down here. I do not mean to be unkind, but I cannot talk with you any longer. I am a busy man."
"I see. I noticed your heavy brief case."
"It is quite full."
"Yes."
"Now do not look so sad. I would take this . . . this journey with you, but there are many things that keep me from it. My work . . . just getting started and have to stick to it if I'm going to succeed. My family, friends . . . there are so many things. You understand."
"Too well."
"Excuse me."
"There is no excuse."
"Now look here!"
"You must take this journey."
"Must!"
"You do not like that word. The proud never do."
"I . . ."
"You prefer to think that nothing is required of you, to deny that anything must or must not be. As a child too soon released from parents, you shape all things into your own desires."

"I resent . . ."
"But you must! Soon or late . . ."
"Well, then later."
"That would not be wise."
"Why?"
"This journey leads not to an end, but to a beginning. Upon it all things wait. And none know when it may be too late to begin."
"I . . . I must . . ."
"But of your own free will."
"Now . . ."
"And of your own choosing."
"Is it a long journey?"
"Not in time."
"Is there danger?"
"Only in delay."
"You seem to know whereof you speak."
"I do."
"And your eyes invite my trust."
"Nor will your trust be broken. Come."
"I'll have to make some arrangements."
"None are necessary."
"Oh . . ."
"Just leave your brief case here beside this tree."
"I couldn't do that. It's full of important papers. I'll take it."
"It must be left, or you cannot go."
"But . . ."
"Beside the tree . . ."
"Well . . ."
"Good. Now take my hand."
"I suppose you know what . . ."
"Lift your eyes and look above."
"How very blue."
"Keep looking there."
"Strange. The sky is drawing nearer."
"Yes."
"We're . . . we're in its midst."
"True."
"We've left the earth?"
"Look below."
"Ah . . ."
"You gasp. What do you see?"
"I . . . green fields, long rivers, mountains of such height, wide and depthless seas. I . . ."

"What else?"
"Life. A multitude of plants and animals without number. Each abiding in its place. And men . . . of every kind. Those called great, those in need, those of virtue, those lost in their conflict. So many faces, striving, sinking, groping. So many souls. So much of life . . . how great a creation . . ."
"Your voice fails and your mind staggers. Yet so little you have seen. Come."
"Farther?"
"Much farther."
"The earth is fading into a distant planet."
"Around it?"
"There are other planets. And beyond them . . . my eyes fail."
"What have you to say of it?"
"The words marvelous, wonderful, magnificent . . . they are not enough . . . do not begin."
"We shall go a little farther."
"It is growing so bright, so intense. We must be close to the source of . . . of all light . . . and life."
"And your heart rejoices."
"Oh, yes."
"Yet how slow you were to come."
"I . . . I know. I would have let all manner of things prevent me. I held them more dear than . . . than . . ."
"Men often chain themselves to earth, even in their wildest efforts to leave it. How do those dear things measure now?"
"They are as nothing. All my days have gone in seeking vain things. Ill has been done. Sin has been allowed. I have gone astray. I have no merit and cannot stay here. My soul will crush beneath its weight."
"Come."
"Back to earth?"
"No, higher."
"I have no strength and can bear no more."
"You must."
"But . . ."
"My hand."
"The light increases."
"And you see it not with your eyes alone."

"No. It is not only without but comes within. It fills my flesh and overflows my heart."

"And does the weight lift?"

"Yes, yes, it is gone!"

"And in its place?"

"Joy. And a strength . . . not of myself. And . . . and so much more . . ."

"We have completed this journey; it is time to return."

"To earth?"

"You are reluctant."

"I would prefer to remain here always."

"Man is on earth to deal with man. So must your purpose be fulfilled. But you may journey here often. In fact, you must do so. Until the path is familiar and well worn."

"I will."

"Good. Then we must be on our way."

"I am ready."

"The earth already draws near."

"A strange journey. So great a distance and yet no distance at all."

"So it is to those who will go."

"There's the street where I met you."

"One moment and we shall be standing upon the same spot."

"Why . . . why there's John Brookman. He's just getting to the corner for our appointment. Look at him. Look how he hurries, how tense his face is. I know all the things that are going on in his mind. How foolish . . ."

"My son, your words are sharp."

"Well, how wrong he is . . ."

"Even as you were?"

"But . . ."

"You have traveled far on the highway of repentance. So must you go to the ends of compassion, or all will be in vain."

"I . . . I will go wherever you lead."

"So be it. But now you must keep your appointment."

"Yes, John is waiting. But I hate to say good-by."

"We will meet often. As often as you wish."

"Good. Then . . . then . . . I better . . ."

"My son, you forgot something."

"What?"

"Your brief case. It is by the tree where you left it."

"Oh, yes. Strange that I should forget it."

"Not so strange, my son."

Norma Anne Kirkendall

Across the Mountains

ONE OF THE BEST sellers and long-to-be-remembered movies of the former decade was Lost Horizon. I can easily recreate the scenes which showed the kidnapped travelers struggling through the snowstorms in the mountain passes and finally arriving at a serene and happy land of peace and plenty which was located in a sheltered valley. The name of this much-to-be-desired spot was "Shangri-La."

Most of us at some time have dreamed of our own private Shangri-La. When everyday activities become mere shells of routine, or our petty and not-so-trivial troubles weigh heavily, we dream of a place and a condition which assures rest of body and mind. But to most of us this is merely a dream.

On a recent return visit to Mexico I found a real Shangri-La in San Jose de Perura. From the main highway it is possible to look down into a deep valley and glimpse a few scattered buildings. The signs warn that a steep mountain road awaits the intrepid traveler. But we decided to see for ourselves. The beginning was that forewarned "steep mountain road," but soon we found that it had degenerated into an almost impassable rough stone pathway which had been hewn out of the side of a sheer rock cliff, not protected in any way except by a few wispy ferns and tropical trees. Once having started downward, we were unable to turn, so we continued with misgivings . . . down, down, down.

Finally we arrived at the last curve and, rounding it, found this spot of peace. A small hotel is perched on a plateau, surrounded by steep mountain walls of brilliant colors. The tropical growth is lush and varied, and one can revel in the color of bougainvillia or exist on bananas and coconuts. A warm mineral spring feeds two fine swimming pools, and tiny thatched cabanas dot the mountainside. A sign assures the traveler that this is the true fountain of youth, sought but never found by Ponce de Leon.

We wandered in awe for many minutes around this spot. There were no sounds except those of nature. The breeze blew through our hair and the ripple of the mountain stream below almost served as a lullaby. We all remarked about the peaceful atmosphere.

My first inclination was to think of the comparison of having to go through the mountains of life to arrive at the peace of living. And I conjured up ideas for writing an article about this subject. There were no flaws in my argument, for this was exactly what everybody is seeking—peace and perfect relaxation after hardship.

And then suddenly I realized that there was an error in this thinking, for in spite of the beauty and calm . . . I was becoming bored. I was eager to continue the journey. I had taken my photographs (which will always remind me of this glorious spot) and now had my fill. Somehow the upward trip along that treacherous mountain road did not look so bad as it had coming down.

So I mentally discarded my original manuscript and write these words: "If peace is to consist of inactivity, then I do not seek peace. If peace is beauty alone without participation in beauty, then peace is not for me. If my earned rest is to become a restless longing for more strife, then rest is not my goal."

And now I'm persuaded that heaven is not a spot of Shangri-La qualities but rather a way of living which employs work and satisfaction in accomplishment. And when those hard climbs appear in my path from now on, I don't believe I shall look forward to a valley but rather pray for the strength to follow the path. Peace will come with reaching one summit and starting forward to the next, not with settling in a valley.

For I Am a Student Nurse

*I Help the Sick—
My Rewards Are Many*

WITHIN my hand I hold, perhaps, the means by which a life may be lengthened as I pass from room to room carrying a tray of pills.

As I walk down that corridor I answer the call of one in need. I stand at the bedside of a dying man, wishing that the miracles of medicine could once again restore life. My silence expresses to the family the empathy I hold.

I assist the skilled physician as he works a marvelous wonder before my eyes. I see the spark of joy kindle in a mother's face as a bundle of new life is placed in her arms. All these are my burdens, my rewards . . . for I am a student nurse.

My mind absorbs those facts which are necessary to becoming a good nurse. Struggles, to me, are the basis for my growth. I learn and profit by my experiences. My disappointments, at times, are so very great, yet my rewards are innumerable. That extra squeeze of the hand . . . the grateful smile from a gentle old lady . . . the whisper of "thanks" from one of weak physical strength . . . the constant teasing of a patient to see me blush . . . all these make up my day's pay, for I am a student nurse.

Each day brings encouragement as well as discouragement. I worry and wonder if that day will ever come when

I can confidently carry out my tasks. It seems far off. And still, it's such a short part of my life to give for the vast returns. I train myself in many fields of nursing. I like some better than others, but this is only natural. My confidence increases as I repeat performance of skills. Repetition, here, brings about the mastering of my skill. That first clumsy attempt to hand the doctor the right instrument weeks later becomes the smooth, automatic reaction to the call for "hemostat." The suture that once became a tangled mass in my gloved hand, now is neatly threaded and ready for use.

The nights I once lay awake wondering if I would be "called out" for an emergency are now slept, and "call duty" is taken in its stride. The key to confidence is the mastering of these skills. This is expected of me, for I am a student nurse.

My concern for a patient does not end as I walk to my room at night. Constantly they are on my mind. I cannot forget the pus-filled lesions of a bed-ridden man, the shrill cry of a child in pain, the joyful smiles of an amputee who, with his new prosthesis, learns to walk again. At times, my concern becomes a burden, and I realize my need to call on a higher Source of power. I utter a prayer, in hope that I will be able to give the help that is needed; or my plea is for a blessing beyond my knowledge. As I pray my soul is calmed. The power manifested in a few words of prayer is nothing short of a miracle. I hold in my heart a prayer for the precious life in my care. Thus, prayer becomes part of my daily living.

To study, to practice my skills, to give my best to those I serve, to pray to my heavenly Father—all this is required of me—for I am a student nurse.

WHY GIVE?

I gave—but grudgingly—and wondered where the satisfaction was in giving.

I gave my all—willingly—and found the joy that fills the heart to overflowing.

A Faithful Steward

JIM is going to put my typewriter on a chair by my bed, and I'm going to try to peck out the stories with one finger. Then I'll read them over the phone for someone to type so the editors can get them in time."

These were the determined words of Sister Berde Rooney, well-known church author. We were talking over the phone just the day before I was to leave on a vacation. She had not been feeling well for months, and now she believed she had the Asian flu. As usual she was working on an assignment of writing that needed to be done for a church publication. This time it was for Zion's Hope.

Two weeks later when I returned home to Independence, Missouri, I learned that Sister Rooney had died on September 7, 1957. Death had immediately followed a stroke.

She left behind many friends in the church and many people who have been influenced and aided by her kindness. "She worked wherever she was needed, and she was needed in many places," declared one leader in the Center Stake. She is and will continue for many years to be missed among those serving the church.

Berde Rooney was a tall, slender woman with a pleasant ever-ready smile and a voice that bespoke her gentle, unobtrusive nature.

For over twenty years she was active in the girls' program of the General Church. The verse "Oriole Girls" in the front of the Oriole Handbook was written by her. At various times she served as counselor, storyteller, and instructor. She was a genius in teaching handcraft and nature. The girls with whom she worked were inspired by her enthusiasm.

For over three years she worked on committees preparing vacation church school material for the General Church and for local use in Missouri. Practically all the stories in the primary department material for 1958 were either written or revised by her. Some of the kindergarten stories were also her creations. She wrote many of the stories used for the general assembly service in vacation church school. She did liaison work on this general committee, helping to correlate the productions of the various committees preparing material for vacation church school use. It was necessary for her to attend meetings of these three committees—primary, kindergarten, and general—in order to know the themes being used. Members of the committees would tell her the theme of a lesson and the point they wanted stressed. She would build her story on that foundation. Anyone who has done creative writing will recognize that this is a difficult task.

She attended various reunions in recent years. At times she served as storyteller or counselor. At reunions she also assisted with the projects of her local women's organization.

She had been an active member of the Creative Writers' Guild of the Center Stake since its origin a few years ago. In fact, the organization gained numerical strength because she enthusiastically enlisted new members. She assisted in the setting up of workshops and in organizing classes of instruction. She was a contributing member of the Stake Council of the organization. Sister Rooney never considered herself above the menial task of going early to a meeting in order to "arrange the chairs." Often she was the congenial hostess who greeted members at the door. She was leader of the Zion's Hope workshop and co-leader of the Stepping Stones workshop. Shortly before her death she was instrumental in arranging for a class of instruction in writing for children. That class, sponsored by the Guild, is now known as the "Berde Rooney Memorial Class in Writing for Children." She was a close associate of the Herald House editorial staff.

Because of her work in the Zion's Hope workshop many people were taught to serve and were given opportunities to serve the church through creative writing. Berde Rooney considered a talent for literary work to be a literary stewardship. She made it an issue to help new authors and to give friendly criticism to established authors. Some manuscripts passed through her hands between author and editor many times before their publication. If an author did not have a typewriter, she typed the manuscript for him. Every monthly meeting of the workshop found her ready to serve, yet she expected no plaudits or praise.

Her writings have appeared in the Saints' Herald, Daily Bread, Guidelines, Stride, Stepping Stones and Zion's Hope. Perhaps she was best known for her Zion's Hope material. By using either the spoken or written word, she was able to reach the small children. She also wrote poetry for both adults and children.

HER LIFE on earth was not an easy one. Born Luella Berde Crayne, July 29, 1885, at Lowry City, Missouri, she united with the church there June 16, 1901. When seventeen she married, and several years later the marriage failed.

Sister Rooney was never one to sit back and nurse her sorrows. She had to make a living for herself and two small sons. She secured employment in a restaurant but found the environment there beneath her plan for Christian living. She determined to become a schoolteacher. This meant sacrifice and unlimited effort, for she had not completed grade school. She went back to grade school, where her older son attended. Her mother cared for the younger boy. Grade school completed, she attended night school and summer sessions until she received her teacher's certificate, third grade. And all this time she had to earn her living.

She taught school for a few years. By continuing to attend night schools and summer sessions she obtained her teacher's certificate, second grade. Among the children in a school she taught were three Negroes. When Berde was criticized for letting them put their arms around her affectionately, she replied, "They are God's children, so I should love them as such."

She married again, and another son was born. In this community she served on the school board and was director of it at the time a new school was built. Often the people of their neighborhood met at her home for community "sings" led by Sister Rooney. She attempted and succeeded in working into these programs information concerning the church and its doctrine.

Again she was left alone, this time with three sons to support. She obtained work from a local sports shop, polishing fish spinners in her own home. Pay was meager, but she was with her most valuable possessions, her three sons. At Christmas her sons' only gift were balls that she had crocheted with their names on them. Years later her eldest son said, "Mother met any situation, no matter what it demanded, and she met it through her religion."

ON APRIL 3, 1930, she married James Rooney, now living in Independence, Missouri. I have heard her say frequently, "No person on earth could be better than that man. He's ideal." They had a close companionship. Her sons had an understanding father in him.

Both were members of a group that built up a small mission in Missouri. James Rooney went first to church on Sundays to build the fire, if needed, and to prepare the room of the local schoolhouse where meetings were held. Sister Rooney came later to lead the songs and teach a class.

In James Rooney she found a companion who liked to study and do research, and who recognized the church's need for her creative writing. He encouraged her to serve the church by this talent, often insisting she type while he did the housework.

Berde Rooney was keenly interested in people. She was willing to be a "listening ear" for others' troubles and gave advice with the skill of a trained psychologist. A common expression of hers was "Bless his heart." And to her the expression was meaningful. I recall one time when I was complaining about a certain person with whom we were both working, and she challenged my complaint with, "But in spite of that, hasn't he done a lot of good?" She was a dotting grandmother and considered it her prerogative to "spoil them just a little."

In spite of the hardships of her life, she had an outstanding sense of humor. She schooled herself to find joy and beauty wherever possible. Her sons look back to their childhood and recall incidents when her philosophy and humor made their lives brighter.

She understood and appreciated nature. The Independence Examiner carried feature articles about her interest in nature. Flowers, both wild and domestic, grew in the yards of houses where she lived and on the inside window sills. She recognized birds by their songs. It is recalled that in years past a wren built a nest on the back porch of a house where she lived in such a position as to make it impossible for her to get her washboard unless she injure the nest. Until the eggs were hatched she washed on a borrowed board.

Five years ago one of her sons made it possible for her to have a "pass" on an airline. Since then Brother and Sister Rooney had "indulged" once a year in the luxury of visiting relatives in Arizona and California. Each time she came home full of interesting experiences and with a collection of ideas to develop into stories, poems, and articles.

Sister Rooney has gone from us, but her influence is still with us. Her service is missed among church workers in Independence. It will be a long time before people can be found to carry on the many unfinished assignments of this noble woman.

Tithing Our Housekeeping for Service

AS WOMEN, we may well consider our first and greatest talent our housekeeping ability. This is a gift of God, the same as our material possessions, and we should manage time for service to church and community, the same as we account for our tithing.

"A woman's work is never done" is true in a sense, but it is possible to make our housekeeping work for us, rather than our becoming slaves to it. The secret of this is planning. First, though, we must remember that our homes should be places of beauty and comfort. A house is the shell or picture frame for home. Our first thought in planning a house should be, will it work for us, or will we work for it? Will it supply the needs for our home? Sometimes we forget so involved keeping our houses looking nice that we become they are requiring too much of us.

If we are lucky enough to be building a new house we can plan for it to require less work. However, in old houses it is usually too costly to remove such hard-to-maintain features as vast expanses of woodwork to be scrubbed.

We often hear the cry: "Oh, if I just had more room," but frequently we have wasted space, so why add more territory to clean when planning better use of the present space can relieve the need?

Well-planned storage solves many work hours if our families are trained to use it. Miles can be cut from kitchen work by good planning, such as group units. We should be able to stir up a cake without walking one step for ingredients. A cart eliminates steps of carrying dishes from dining table to kitchen. A coat closet for wraps by the door is good.

Storage facilities can be fitted almost anywhere and often enhance the decorative scheme. We can use shallow shelf storage behind extended drapery, which will increase the beauty of the room—especially if the windows are narrow. In fact, the more storage we have the less furniture we need. If our homes are permanent, built-ins can work for us.

We can develop wantitis to where our homes become cluttered with unnecessary furniture and bric-a-brac, which indeed require valuable time to care for, as well as detracting from the beauty of our homes.

We should use all the miracle fabrics to cut down on washing and ironing in our homes. Why slave over materials which require work when there are available to us beautiful materials that require little work? Window curtains can even work for us. Pull drapes eliminate the need for Venetian blinds, which seem to require constant cleaning.

In planning our meals we can cut time by cooking them in one pot. Of course this would soon grow old if constantly followed, but if we analyze our cooking methods we would find room for improvement. Wholesome food, attractively served, need not require hours of work.

In buying furniture and appliances, we should analyze how much time they will require for care. Will a portable mixer do the same for us as a large mixer, which has more surface space to be wiped off?

Our families should share responsibility so we aren't the worker for all. Being a good wife and mother doesn't mean we are charmaid, cook, nurse, and seamstress all in one.

When we have money to spend on our homes we might ask, "Is what I want going to improve my home for beauty and service and eliminate work?" Maybe an automatic washer would be a wiser choice than a room full of furniture—or even a new room!

It might be well for us to consider our homemaking abilities in the light of tithing.

I Had an Experience . . .

MOST OF US are unaware of how the intervention of God in the experiences of life lead us to him and his church or to some high and noble purpose which in his mind will be best for us. Such was the pattern of my early life. Never did it occur to me that he was preparing me for service which would come to pass, even as Doctrine and Covenants 85: 18 reveals so clearly, "in his own time, and in his own way, and according to his own will." Although I did not have the privilege of being a member of a religiously inclined family (my mother was an inactive Lutheran; my father and brother were not interested in religion of any kind) I showed, during high school and college, an inclination to want to search for things of a religious nature. At times I attended churches of different denominations but never joined any.

While in college I pursued some public speaking courses and was interested in drama, for no particular reason known to me. After graduation from the university I became an active member of a prominent fraternal order and in that organization held various offices, including that of the chief presiding officer. In all of these various turns of events I had some excellent experiences which were later to become valuable in my service in the Lord's work. I am now convinced that through all of these the hand of God was over me, preparing me for a time of his own choosing.

Probably the most outstanding spiritual experience of my life came in late October, 1935. Elder J. J. Ledsworth of Port Huron, Michigan (now an evangelist living in Detroit International Stake), was completing a missionary series in the small struggling branch at Fort Wayne, Indiana. Meetings were held in a one-room store building. It was on a Sunday morning. Church school classes were finished. It was time for the preaching service to begin—the final sermon in Brother Ledsworth's series. Just before the service was to open he arose and said that he felt led by the good Spirit to suggest that instead of having a preaching service the time be spent in prayer and testimony. And so it was. Apparently an unusually fine spirit prevailed, although I was unaware of it at the time. As usual I was sitting near the rear of the room on a chair next to the aisle. Shortly before time to close Elder Ledsworth arose and spoke to the people. Almost immediately it was clearly evident, even to me a nonmember, that he was speaking in prophecy. He spoke for a few minutes to the congregation, after which his words were directed to me. I was distinctly and definitely commanded to go forth and be baptized, being told that throughout my life God had watched over me and preserved me for service in his work. I was further told that he had a special work for me to do, that I would occupy in both the Aaronic and Melchisedec priesthoods, and that I would be abundantly blessed if I would but give myself in baptism and then offer myself for service.

I went to church that morning with no thought of being baptized—but now there was no longer room for doubt. Under the Spirit which was there, I knew it was a voice from heaven. Many things went through my mind within a matter of a few minutes.

Brother Ledsworth finished speaking. The meeting was in process of closing. The last hymn was being sung. During the singing I motioned for Brother Ledsworth to come back to where I was standing. "I'd like to be baptized this afternoon if it's possible," I told him. He returned to his place with the brethren presiding, made the announcement, and the benediction was offered.

That afternoon I was baptized in the Maumee River at the edge of Fort Wayne with Elder Ledsworth officiating. Never have I regretted it. Always have I been grateful for that experience. As I obeyed the commandment and went forth to be baptized, and as I have endeavored to serve with devotion and dedication since then, the promises of the Lord have been fulfilled. I'm convinced that blessings will come to anyone who endeavors to obey the commandments of God. Truly the function of his holy priesthood in the ordinances of the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to those who will believe and obey.

The Church Directory* Helps

Myron E. Lassen, a serviceman in Iceland, writes, "The Church Directory booklet was my biggest help, I think, while I was in the States. I visited many branches in Ohio, Indiana, Texas, a few in New Mexico and Missouri. I just wanted to make mention of that booklet and the good it is doing. I've benefited greatly by visiting other branches of our church and did it often before I joined the Air Force."

Memoirs of Clara B. Stebbins

MY FRIEND, Sister Mary Garner, returned to Lamoni after the death of her husband in California. She brought her daughter, Callie, my namesake, then two years old with her. She built a house just north of the west side schoolhouse, where I was a frequent visitor. She did some canvassing to help with their living, and when she was away from home she left Callie with me. Her mother expected her to have a nap in the afternoon, and I tried to see that she got it. She would lie on the couch in different positions, but it seemed increasingly difficult for her to get to sleep. One day I asked her, "Callie, don't you like to take a nap?" "No," she said. "It makes me feel like hitting the world."

But as a rule she finally succeeded. I admired her self-discipline in her effort to heed her mother's wish. If I had known about relaxing as I do now, I might have helped her more. She grew to seem like my own. In 1922 her mother died and then she lived with me, but not for long. She was married in my home, and from here she went to live in Kansas City.

Sister Walker and all my friends who met at her home are gone. Sometime before she died she stayed with me for two weeks. She had a great desire to write a tract on the atonement. She hoped she might do this while with me so I could help her, but her strength was too far spent and she had to give it up. She said: "Well, if I don't do it, someone else will."

She went from here to her daughter's home in Los Angeles, California, where she died. I have the love of her daughters, and Fantie writes me as "Mother's dearest friend."

Sister Glaud Rodger and her daughter Dollie were often with us, helping us over hard places, coming close in sympathy for each other. After his wonderful mission in Australia, Brother Rodger was with them a year while he built for them the one-story square house south of the Barrows' home. After they were settled in their new home he went to Nevada on his last mission. He died out there, and his faithful wife and children were left to mourn. A monument for him and his wife stands in the Lamoni cemetery.

While Sister Walker was staying with me she received an ovation by the college faculty and students. We had word of their coming, and she sat on the front of the porch while the student body and instructors spread over the lawn. In unison they called, "Greetings to the Mother of Graceland." There was singing and a short address by President Briggs for the college. Sister Walker could respond only very briefly. After a few personal words with Sister Walker, they were gone, leaving a pleasant memory for her few remaining years.

WE NAMED our last baby Alfreda, from Alfred, her father's middle name. She lived only six months. All our hope and care were in vain, and so we have three laid away in Rose Hill Cemetery.

Except while the babies were small I taught in Sunday school. Before Helen was old enough to go with me a neighbor kept her so I could go. I had read in the Doctrine and Covenants, "Who-soever desireth to thrust in his sickle and reap, the same is called of God." I felt this same desire, but I thought the call was to men only. This made me sad until I read that "All are called of God according to their gifts," and I was happy in believing that I was called to this work with little children.

One Conference when Brother Thomas Chatburn was passing through the roomful of children he asked, "Sister Stebbins, are you the mother of all these children?" I answered, "Yes, Brother Chatburn, to the joy of my heart, I am." I felt that I was blest and had been led in my work. When I needed a song to fit my purpose, it was given to me to write one, though I never before had written poetry nor a tune. I was indebted to others for the harmonization. My songs were published in the Sunday School Exponent where I had a department. I gave Sister Salyards some help with primary quarterlies.

As cradle roll superintendent I visited the homes of the babies, talking with the mothers and leaving the cradle roll paper published by David C. Cook. We had a little white cradle in the Sunday school room. When we had word of a new baby we laid a card, bearing the baby's name, in the cradle. Two children from the room touched the cradle lightly while we sang:

Rock the cradle softly,
Sing with tender love
For the precious baby
May he learn of Jesus,
Like him may he grow,
Love and truth and goodness
In his life to show.

Then we transferred the card to the wall roll of member babies.

For visiting babies we sang:

Welcome to Sunday school, baby dear,
Welcome here, welcome here;
Here where we learn of our Father's care,
We welcome you, baby dear.

On the street one day I came near to Baby Ruth Grenawalt sitting with her mother in their pony cart. She said: "See, Mama, Sunday school baby dear."

Little minds carry more impressions than we realize. It is good to impart pleasant ones to tie them to the church we love and want them to love.

WHEN the Daughters of Zion Society was organized I was made secretary, and I held that office after the name was changed to the Women's Auxiliary. I wrote articles to be read in their meetings. These were published in the Herald's Home Column.

I was secretary of the Children's Home during the time of its existence. I worked closely with Sister Marietta Walker, who was the prime mover in its organization. We had received children from many states, but a state law was passed which allowed us to receive children from Iowa only, so the Children's Home was closed.

Sister Minnie B. Nicholson and I were alternately president and secretary of the local women's group. When she was president I was secretary, and vice versa.

For a time the whole Sunday school met in the upper auditorium. After the opening exercises all but the senior classes went to the rooms below. It was found inconvenient for the small children to march down the stairs, so the juniors and all lesser grades met in the large basement room and from there the primaries and beginners passed to their own rooms.

Preaching services were held in the upper auditorium morning and evening on Sundays. Looking back through the years I might say, "How highly favored we in Lamoni have been, as we have been given spiritual food from week to week by men of great minds whose background is the truth of the everlasting gospel restored to earth in these last days!" There was William W. Blair, of benign countenance, who testified of the inspiration in the reorganization of the church after the apostasy. And Joseph Smith III who by revelation came forward to take his father's place as president of the church. One night after he had preached a wonderful sermon I said to his daughter Carrie, "Aren't you proud that he is your father . . . and aren't we happy that he is our 'Brother Joseph'?"

I remember Heman C. Smith's masterly refuting of the misrepresentations by Clark Braden, who lectured in the church. It left the assurance that the Lord's work is invincible, and that Heman Smith was an able defender.

OF the singing in the church, I best remember at the close of one service Brother Joseph's fine tenor voice as he sang the "sweetest carol ever sung, Jesus, Jesus, Holy One."

From early times the Lamoni Branch had a choir. Always there were good voices and there were some members with ability to lead. Of these Brother Amos Chase was among the early ones.

In 1923 when our cousin, Paul Craig, was with the Graceland faculty as a voice teacher, he had charge of the choir. He was succeeded by Miss Mabel Carlile, who served in this capacity for more than twenty years, the last two years as Mrs. Charles Hyde.

The name of the choir was changed to the Lamoni-Graceland Oratorio Society. This Society became famous for its rendition of the great oratorios, Elijah and The Messiah. At one time the members of the society numbered one hundred and eighty-five. Those were great occasions when The Messiah was given in a Christmas concert. At times during the summer months the choir was directed by Sister Wallace Blair or by Sister Cyril Wight.

IN the upper auditorium of the church there was a balcony across the east end and part way up the sides. Raised seats were provided for the choir across the west end, extending from the back of the speaker's platform high against the west wall. Choir members met in the rooms below and came to their places by the stairway on each side. In General Conference time these seats were occupied by the leading quorums of the church.

After the church burned in 1931 the singers occupied the balcony in the Coliseum. For the concerts they were seated on the rostrum. Guest soloists added to the enjoyment of the concerts.

For some time after the upper auditorium in the church was ready, the General Conference was held alternately one year at Independence and the next at Lamoni. The seating arranged for the choir was good for the Conference.

Members of the First Presidency were seated on the speaker's platform, the Presiding Bishopric in the choir seats just back of them, the order of bishops at the left, the high priests at the right, the Seventies at the front in the body of the church; other quorums farther back, delegates and other members on the sides.

This was an orderly arrangement, and the Conference was presided over with dignity and fairness for many years by President Joseph Smith, succeeded by his son, President Frederick M. Smith.

In April of 1901 the Lamoni Stake was organized. This included Lamoni Branch and Decatur District, of which Lamoni was a part. John Smith, an Englishman from the East, was the first president. He had been in Lamoni for some time and was highly esteemed in the new office. He was followed by John F. Garver, whose life and work are known and appreciated throughout the church. Cyril Wight was ordained president of the stake when Brother Garver was called to the office of Apostle. Cyril threw himself wholeheartedly into the work of his office until other obligations caused him to resign. Wilber Prall, who had been his counselor, was his successor. He became pastor of Lamoni Branch, which office is included with that of stake president. Brother Prall won appreciation then and later.

Stake organization provides for two counselors to the president, and for a high council composed of twelve men. With this fuller organization the church is better prepared to advance the work of the Lord. Succeeding presidents of the stake have been R. A. Cheville, T. S. Williams, David Dowker, Blair Jensen, D. B. Sorden, E. J. Gleazer, Jr. and Robert S. Farnham.

A notable event in the old Brick Church in Lamoni two years before it burned was the marriage of Nelle Weldon and Roy A. Cheville. It was the more notable because everyone was invited. This was unusual at the time. Since then, in the new church, it has become a pleasant custom.

Other weddings had taken place in the church after the morning preaching service, when those to be married stood in front of the pulpit. The people were surprised and pleased, and the ceremony was impressive as always. The congregation was there, but it had not been invited.

There was widespread interest in this young couple, not only at the college where he was teaching and she was college nurse, but throughout the branch because of his church activities. They had been observed during the time of their engagement, and now their many friends were invited to share in the happy occasion. The invitation warmed every heart.

The people gathered in the afternoon at the time appointed and the beautiful marriage ceremony was witnessed. The happy pair as they left were followed with sincere congratulations and good wishes.

ONE YEAR for a Christmas entertainment in the upper auditorium of the church we trimmed a Christmas tree, placed at the right of the speaker's platform, with silver-winged fifty-cent pieces. (All contributions were put into fifties.) These were to be sent to the Presiding Bishop for the Sanitarium, which was new at that time. The children as well as adults were enlisted with sympathy for the sick, and a talk was given during the program in regard to the purpose. The shimmering wings of the silver pieces gave the tree an attractive appearance.

Much thought and planning were given to our Christmas entertainments in which all ages took part. I was especially concerned with the small children, and we had happy times practicing together. Some of those children, now with grandchildren of their own, remember those times with pleasure and the parts they took.

12,000 Attend Campus Series

TWELVE thousand persons attended the week-long missionary series preached by Apostle E. J. Gleazer in Independence June 8-15.

"A Revealing God" was Brother Gleazer's subject for the annual Campus series. More than four hundred nonmembers heard his sermons.

Seventy Eugene A. Theys, director of missionary work in Center Stake, presided each night. Herbert C. Lively, a member of the Center Stake presidency, was in charge of the music. A new Baldwin organ was a definite contribution to the success of the series.

Apostle Gleazer preached with power and spiritual insight in the missionary series. His preaching was appreciated by both the members and nonmembers. A great spiritual uplift has been given to the Center Stake members. Apostle Gleazer's preaching inspired them to greater activity and fuller devotion to the cause of Christ. The effect of this missionary series should be felt in Center Stake in the months and years ahead.

Almost $2,400 offering was taken during the week. All money over the expense for the series will go to a missionary revolving fund to help new congregations get started in the stake.

Preparations for the series included a mailing of invitations, door-to-door canvassing by the members of all twenty-two congregations, and advertising in newspapers, on signboards, and radio.

Six weeks prior to the series Brother Theys and his missionary corps met to plan and organize the series. About four weeks before the series, five hundred priesthood members met in the Stone Church Education Building to hold a special prayer meeting for the success of the series. The series was also the point of emphasis for many congregational prayer meetings in the weeks before it began.

Never in history have so many members of the church in Center Stake joined together in such a complete coverage for a missionary series. The many missionary teams in the stake have already organized and are now in process of conducting cottage and patio meetings with the assurance that many persons who attended the series will soon become members of the church. A number have already reached a decision and have asked for baptism.

Question

How could it be possible that Lehi of the Book of Mormon was of the tribe of Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) when all of the house of Israel were carried into Assyrian captivity about 721 B.C., at which time only the tribe of Judah remained in Jerusalem prior to the Chaldean captivity in 604 B.C.?

D. F.

Michigan

Answer

Not all the people of Israel were carried into captivity in 721 B.C. We are informed in William Smith's Bible Dictionary (Teacher's Edition) that the "greater part of Benjamin, and probably the whole of Simeon and Dan, were included as if by common consent in the kingdom of Judah" (page 270).

Also in an article on "Manasseh" the same source informs us: ". . . half of the tribe of Manasseh settled east of the Jordan. . . . They, first of all Israel, were carried away by Pul and Tiglath-pileser and settled in the Assyrian territories (I Chron. 5: 25, 26). The other half tribe settled to the west of the Jordan, north of Ephraim (Joshua 17)" (pages 377-378).

We find also: "No doubt many of the kingdom of Israel joined the later kingdom of the Jews after the captivity, and became part of that kingdom." (page 271)

Lehi, a descendant of Manasseh, left Jerusalem before the Jews were carried captive to Babylon, which, according to Josephus, was 589 B.C., not 604 B.C. as stated in the question. (See Ibid., page 761, article "Zedekiah.")

See the following Scriptures for evidence that people of Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, Ashur, and Zebulum mixed with Judah: I Chron. 9:3; II Chron. 15:9, 10; II Chron. 30:11; I Kings 12:21; and Luke 2:36.

HAROLD I. VELT

Question

The Book of Mormon states that Jesus "commanded the multitude" to "kneel down . . . and bowed himself to the earth." It further states, "As I have prayed among you, even so shall ye pray in my church, among my people who do repent and are baptized in my name." (See III Nephi 8:14, 16, 48, 20, and 28.) Do these verses mean we are to use his words as we pray, or that we should kneel as he did? We understand that he is our example.

E. E. M.

Missouri

Answer

The key to this situation is found in III Nephi 8:56, "have commanded that ye come unto me, that ye might feel and see." Feeling and seeing in a spiritual sense involves the communion of the total man with God. Kneeling may be an instinctive responsiveness to the leading of the Spirit. However, there are many occasions on which prayer is very desirable, but which may not permit the kneeling stance. The fact that we do not always kneel should not preclude the act of prayer.

Jesus meant for all people to have the experience of intercessory prayer. These Scriptures portray Jesus searching the hearts of the people and petitioning for their needs. We would not use his words unless we could express them meaningfully. As we allow the Spirit to minister to us, we may discern the needs of our fellow men. Perhaps this is the best expressed in Romans 8:26, "We know not what we should pray for as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us."

Organized into Branch

PASCO-KENNEWICK, WASHINGTON.—Friday, June 6, was a memorable day for the Pasco-Kennewick mission when at a meeting in the Richland Church, the group was formed into a branch. For the past five years the mission has operated under the guidance of the Richland Branch. Membership increased to the place where the original meeting place of the Lewis and Clark basement was not large enough, so in February the group moved to the IOOF hall.

Apostle Percy Farrow was in charge of the service. He spoke on the preparation for the organization of missions into branches, of the requirements a mission must have to become a branch and that it must be sufficiently strong to proceed on its own without the aid of the branch.

Paul Crinzi, president of the Spokane District, was in charge of the short business meeting which followed. A charge was given to the Pasco group at that time.

Wayne Rodgers, pastor of the Pasco Branch, gave a history of the group. He reported that the mission was organized June 18, 1953, with twenty-four members. The late Steve Bowerman was elected pastor at the time and served in that capacity for two years. Hank Chapman reported on the activities of the priesthood. Mrs. Albert Piert gave a resume' of the women's work and the church school. Miss Janice Rodgers reported on the Zion's League activities for the past five years.

Concerning the Lord's Prayer

Not too long ago I asked through the Question Time of the Herald why the Lord's Prayer was not corrected in the inspired translation of the Book of Mormon plates if the testimony of David Whitmer were true. Today I read a statement by Elder Isaac N. White in Journal of History, Volume 10, pages 205-206 that gives a new thought to me. It reads as follows:

"During this time I ordered an Inspired Translation of the Bible. In perusing it I ran across what I thought at the time was a 'snag.' In the Lord's prayer it reads, 'Suffer us not to be led into temptation'; while the King James Version has it, 'Lead us not into temptation.' In this particular the Book of Mormon and the King James Translation were in agreement. I was unable to account for this. I took the matter to the Lord in fasting. After beginning the fast I retired the second night without an answer, but soon after retiring I was awakened. The room commenced to fill with light and two personages stood before me, neither of whose feet were touching the floor. The one next to me had a Book of Mormon in the left hand, and I perceived at once the book was my own. The messenger stretched out the hand that held the book toward me and said, 'Isaac, doubt not this book; it is of God. God suffered it to agree with the King James Translation in some places that he might bring a just condemnation upon the Gentiles, but in the own due time of the Lord all things will be made right.' The messengers then departed."

Suggestions for Sermon Delivery

Men of the priesthood are called to preach the gospel of Christ. They are admonished to "lift up your voices as with the sound of a trumpet." If a speaker does not speak plainly, or speaks so loudly that he cannot pronounce his words distinctly, he does not get his message across to the listeners. On the other hand, if he speaks so softly that the listeners cannot hear him, he does not get his message across, and the hearers fail to get the full meaning of his statements. The minister who screams in one sentence and drops to a whisper in the next is difficult to listen to. These extreme pulpitisms are confusing, for when a few words in a statement are missed, the meaning of the whole discourse may be distorted.

Many of our ministers are addicted to some of these faults, and it discourages the hearers. If anything should be plain, it should be the preaching of the gospel.

Another thing that a speaker should do is try to make his voice reach to all present. This should be done in a medium tone of voice and with clear enunciation. I have been discouraged, disappointed, and disgusted by poorly delivered sermons. We have a right to hear, and the speaker has a responsibility to talk plainly.

BOOK REVIEW

The Children's Choir
By Ruth Krehbiel Jacobs

Augustana Press
Rock Island, Illinois
1958
$4.95

Here is a book that every children's choir director will want in his library. It is a comprehensive work in the nature of an encyclopedia with an abundance of material on every phase of the children's choir. It is both inspirational and practical. There are detailed "sample" programs, numerous games with specific explanations for choir parties, minute descriptions of rehearsal techniques, lessons in sight reading, and quantities of equally helpful material on other subjects. There are apt illustrations to make the excellent suggestions more graphic.

Besides many practical aids the book includes some very refreshing, inspirational messages that give new thoughts and vision to the choir director. Unusual story material relating to music and the Christian religion should be most valuable.

I believe this to be the best book of its type on the market. It should indeed be a significant aid to the children's choir director. ALETA RUNKLE

COUNT DOWN

The following verse appeared in Tokyo Mail-sack:

At Christmas Island
And in Siberia
And in Bikini
And in Nevada
Scientists count seconds:

"ten"
"nine"
"eight"
"seven"
"six"
"five"
"four"
"three"
"two"
"one"
(then) "ZERO"

In heaven
Methinks Gabriel must have trumpet to lips
And God be counting;
I hold my breath—
Aye, the whole world holds its breath.
Will God be soon saying,
"Zero"?

CORRELATION

The chief of the U.S. Public Health Service, Dr. Leroy E. Burney, has announced a government educational drive against excessive cigarette smoking. He says that there is conclusive evidence of a close correlation between heavy smoking and lung cancer. It is well to sound the tocsin against this habit-forming product. We hope he discovers the close relation between light and heavy smoking. One does not set the control and have it produce "light, medium, or heavy" smokers as a toaster does toast.

If I might have a second hope it would be that he will also discover the close correlation between drinking—light, medium, or heavy varieties—and death on the highways. He may disclaim responsibility on the grounds that it is not a matter of health when a person is dead. But the maimed and debilitated road accident victims outnumber the fatalities by some two million annually. Mr. Chief, that's a matter of health. Surely you can correlate that to your job. C. B. H.

William S. Bennett

WILLIAM S. BENNETT joined the church in 1949. Two years later he was ordained an elder. In 1955 he was ordained a high priest and became a member of the Kansas City Stake High Council.

These events represented a radical change in Brother Bennett's life. The change began when he met Floy Lorene Roberson one summer at the University of Missouri.

"Her way of life came to mean much to me," Brother Bennett said. "On one occasion during our early acquaintance, I asked her to sing some of the songs of her church. She sang 'Redeemer of Israel' and 'The Old, Old Path.' The message of these hymns impressed me deeply.

"Even though I had earlier held considerable prejudice against the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants, I felt I owed it to myself and to my wife to know something about the contents of these books. As I read them I became aware that they reinforced the truths I had learned from the Bible and that there were instances of fresh emphasis which were rewarding to me in an intellectual as well as a spiritual way. As I studied these books I came to believe them."

Five months after his baptism, Brother Bennett was asked to be church school director. It was a responsibility he was well suited for. He had been a school administrator for seventeen years.

In 1924 he was graduated from Springfield, Missouri, State College. Later he earned a Master's degree in secondary school administration at the University of Missouri. He has also done graduate work at Columbia University in New York.

In 1941 Brother Bennett became a supervisor for the State Department of Education in Missouri. Later he served in the U. S. Air Force and then worked for the Veteran's Administration in Kansas City. Now he is a claims authorizer for the Social Security Administration in Kansas City.

The Bennetts have one daughter, Martha, fourteen.

"My acceptance of a new way of life and my work in the church have enriched our home immeasurably," Brother Bennett said. "We recognize a closer and finer companionship as we work in our various church assignments, each helping or sacrificing, often praying, for the others as the need is sensed. It is good to feel that we as a family are one in Christ.

"I am thankful to God and his many servants and witnesses who showed me the way to greater usefulness and a happier way of life."

Youth Camps - 1958

EIGHTY YOUTH camps are being held this summer, according to Carl Mesle, director of youth camping. The same number of camps were held in 1957.

From the camps held last year the youth camping office has assembled the most comprehensive survey of youth camping ever made in the church. The survey shows 4,550 young people attended camps in 1957. They were guided by 1,338 staff members. Among the campers were 572 nonmember youth.

The report notes that in one junior high camp of fifty-three campers, twenty-two nonmembers attended. As a result, three young people were baptized at camp and three more were ready for baptism soon after camp closed.

At one senior high camp of sixty campers, twelve nonmembers were in attendance. One fourth of the campers at another senior high camp were nonmembers.

Camp Norsvedan in Norway had sixteen campers, fourteen of whom were nonmembers.

New camp helps are being used this year by both junior high and senior high leaders. They were planned for use by staff members in organizing and conducting youth camps. They include materials on organization, schedule, classwork, devotions, recreation, and crafts.

The 1958 Senior High Youth Camp Helps are entitled "Make Love Your Aim," with daily themes on "What Kind of Love?" "Marks of Christian Love," "Our First Loves," "Who's in Love?" "How Big Is Our Love?" and "Growing in Love."

The Junior High Youth Camp Helps for 1958 are titled "New Frontiers," with daily themes on "New Frontiers,"

"The Guiding Light," "The Bread of Life," "The Living Water," "Fishermen," "Kingdom Builders," and "The Trail Ahead."

The Spirit of Cain

Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him. And Cain gloried in that which he had done— Genesis 5: 17, 18.

THE CRIME of murder (a premeditated homicide) is as old as the human race. It is the fruit of ugliness—jealousy, covetousness, and hatred. The Scriptures reveal that this first murder was motivated by the desire to get gain. Cain coveted the flocks of his brother.

Many of us fall into easy generalizations and declare that the world is getting worse. We may offer as evidence that murder is on the increase. Even allowing for the great increase in the population, and the increased facilities for reporting the news, there is statistical evidence that crime has mounted out of all proportion. J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, says that major crimes in the United States have increased 52 per cent over the last eight years. In 1956 it was shown that 46 per cent of the arrests for major crimes involved persons under eighteen years of age.

In my youth I was greatly impressed by the pulpit references to the warning of Paul to Timothy (II Timothy 3: 1-13). He declared:

This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God. . . . Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived.

Some may choose to pass this off as one of Paul's moods or bad days.

Some have no faith in the doctrine of the second coming of Christ and a day of Judgment. However, Peter believed in it and warned that "in the last days there shall come scoffers, walking after their own lusts. Denying the Lord Jesus Christ, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things must continue as they are, and have continued as they are from the beginning of the creation" (II Peter 3: 3, 4).

WHETHER PAUL AND PETER were prophets and speaking according to the spirit of divine revelation, each person must decide. But the facts seem insurmountable that human life is not regarded as sacred by many people today. Murder is the climax of many movies, TV shows, and stories. You and I are opposed to this social menace, but we tolerate it. We join the chorus of those who say, "What can I do to change the commercially profitable exploitation of crime? They ought to pass a law . . ."

Laws are never passed against entrenched business without an aroused public conscience which will not be silenced. Attempts to stop the flow of crime literature are denounced as an abridgment of the Constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press. Isolated protest against the frequent portrayal of homicide is answered with the claim that these are chapters from the book of life. The people demand this type of stimulation, and producers obligingly supply it.

Assuming that Paul was right when he prophesied of our day that men shall be "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God," it may not be of much consequence now to call attention to Scriptures. Yet there is no better counsel; no verdict can be more final. Those who premeditatively take human life are forever barred from heaven. When an individual puts his trust in a gun or other lethal weapon, he should reckon with the possible outcome. John said, "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer; and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him" (I John 3: 15). Revelation 21: 8 says: "murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers . . . shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death." The latter-day prophet declared (Section 42: 6), "And now, behold, I speak unto the church. Thou shalt not kill; and he that kills shall not have forgiveness in this world, nor in the world to come."

Let it be made clear to those we can influence: a human soul is precious to our heavenly Father. After giving the parable of the lost sheep, Jesus said, "likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, who need no repentance."

THIS IS NOT pretty writing; it will offend the tenderhearted. Adults have to deal with some ugly facts. Murder is the venom which overflows from the hearts of hate. There is a very active political cult today which spreads the doctrine of hate, and it will murder to gain its ends. The only antidote for this poison is the gospel of love and service. Neither more laws nor war will heal the nations. The love of God can.

Across the Desk

President W. Wallace Smith writes from Jonesport, Maine:

We closed the Maine Reunion yesterday afternoon (July 13). There was a large attendance. Our experience at Deer Park the week before was good. From what I could learn, the attendance was the best yet.

We are spending a day here before going on to the west New York reunion at Alleghany Park.

Word has been received that C. L. Olson, general counsel for the church, is continuing his convalescence in the Royal Prince Alfred Hospital in Sydney, Australia.

Brother Olson suffered a heart attack early in May on his trip to the South Sea Islands and was taken to Sydney for treatment and convalescence. Brother Olson's progress was very satisfactory until the last week of June. At that time he suffered a slight setback causing him considerable pain in his shoulder, a condition which often follows heart attacks.

Brother Olson stated, however, in recent correspondence that the pain had now diminished, that his heart has returned to normal size and appears to have completely recovered, and that he is sitting up and walking around without any difficulty or pain.

He stated that he will be in the hospital approximately two more weeks and then, following a brief period of convalescence in the home of Apostle and Sister Roscoe Davies and pending final approval by the doctor in Australia, he will be released to continue his trip to Tahiti to attend to at least a portion of the business for which he was sent.

William F. Horn, Netherlands Mission President, writes of the annual institute held June 14 and 15 at Zwaagwesteinde, Fr. Holland:

All of the branches and groups in the mission were represented this year. The total attendance was approximately one hundred and sixty. It is worthy to note that among those attending, there was a large group of young people. There were also three visitors from the United States: Brother and Sister L. O. Brockway from Michigan, and Sister Omohundro from Washington, D. C.

We were fortunate to have as special ministers Apostle A. A. Oakman and Dr. L. O. Brockway. They were ably assisted in classwork by Sister Oakman, Bishop A. Compier, and Brother P. Laban, mission youth leader.

Among the people of Zwaagwesteinde who worked in preparation for the institute were H. Postma, S. de Hoop, D. Henstra, W. Postma, Sister B. Steringa, members of the women's department, and many others.

Early Sunday morning Pastor W. Postma baptized a person, completing another of our church families. On Sunday afternoon A. Mosterdijk and Y. Hoekstra ordained Wim Pije to the office of deacon. After learning of the death of President Israel A. Smith, those in charge of the institute closed it with special prayers for the guidance of the church.

Auditorium Acoustics

Some time ago when in Detroit we had the privilege of visiting the Ford Auditorium with Brethren Blair McClain and Kenneth Byrn. We learned that in the building there were some problems with acoustics. Since that visit, Brother Ralph Moore has favored us with reports of steps taken to correct the acoustical difficulties. Just recently he sent us a newspaper clipping from the Detroit

News of Thursday, July 3. This was a report on the plans developed to correct the acoustical problem. The newspaper article stated:

"According to preliminary designs made by the famous acoustical firm of Bolt, Beranek and Newman, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, the shell will extend the width of the stage, will be 30 to 35 feet high, and will weigh approximately 75 tons."

We thought it would be interesting to our church members to know that the firm of Bolt, Beranek and Newman, to which the article refers, is the same firm that we employed to design the acoustical treatment of our Auditorium. This same firm did the United Nations Building at Lake Success, New York.

School of Nursing Again Receives National Accreditation

The School of Nursing received a letter from the National League for Nursing on July 11 announcing that the School of Nursing remains fully accredited by the National Board for Accreditation of Schools of Nursing.

The school first received national accreditation in 1955. In February of this year a surveyor visited the school to check up on the status of the school and to determine progress. The National Board did not meet until June. Students, faculty, and administration have waited anxiously for the report from the Board. Miss Morgan, Director of Nursing, said, "Of course we thought we would remain on the fully accredited list, but the school never knows until it receives the formal report from the board."

There are one hundred and nine students in the School of Nursing. Having their school nationally accredited assures them that it has a high standard of progressive faculty and administration. The School of Nursing Day, which each branch observes annually with moral and financial support, has made it possible for the school to achieve this national status.

Help Them See the Need

*I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord.
Our feet shall stand within thy gates. . . . Because of the house of the Lord our God I will seek thy good.—Psalm 122: 1, 2, 9.*

*And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together.—
Hebrews 10: 24, 25.*

SCRIPTURE INDICATES that going to church regularly is one of our greatest duties to God, ourselves, and others.

Even Jesus himself went to the synagogue consistently on the Sabbath day. It was a part of his early training received from his parents. Later, after beginning his divine ministry, Jesus said, "I will build my church," and he did. The church was one of his great concerns, a living part of him. The Apostle Paul once said: "Christ . . . loved the church, and gave himself for it" (Ephesians 5: 25).

Jesus prayed for the people of his church "that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us" (John 17: 21).

And the reason he prayed for unity was "that the world may believe that thou hast sent me" (Ibid.).

Reasons—and Excuses

There are many good reasons why we need to attend church regularly: 1. The strain and stress of our modern way of life alone demand some resources that are beyond ourselves. 2. Our families and neighbors need the good influence that radiates from the church in its people. 3. We also need the consistent fellowship of the Saints, for strength can be received from the lives of others. 4. Perhaps one of the most important reasons is the fact that each member has made his covenant through baptism to follow Christ and his church to the utmost of his ability. To neglect this vow is nothing short of betrayal. 5. Our support in attendance, prayers, offerings, and personal talents is also needed. 6. The church with its message works toward a better community life that can eventually spread to make a more desirable world. 7. The church itself stands as a force of righteousness against that which is evil. 8. It also provides in many ways the religious training needed for mature living. 9. Because the church is a living organism composed of people seeking to do God's will, its very existence depends on the loyalty of its members.

However, it seems as though some people can think of more excuses for not attending church than for any other activity they might wish to avoid. Some become real experts in the art, and it often takes patient counseling to help them remove the debris (excuses) that has gathered around them for years and see why they need to go to the house of the Lord.

One who is trying to win an inactive member back to active participation must demonstrate understanding and friendliness in his treatment of the situation. It may be that the inactive person hasn't really seen himself or his spiritual needs for a long time and may be unaware that he needs help.

Examples

The following are examples of typical excuses the church worker often hears as he makes his rounds and some answers that may be helpful in knowing what to say in reply.

Excuse

I don't like to go without my husband, so I'm waiting until he makes up his mind to go with me.

Answer

I see. But while you're waiting for him to make up his mind, you are depriving yourself of the opportunities and spiritual food which the church provides. I'm sure if you will start going to church yourself you will find it easier to influence him to follow.

Excuse

I'm really too tired to go to church any more. It just seems I never feel well when Sunday comes around.

Answer

Many times our physical tension, nervousness, and ailments are brought about because of spiritual starvation. Most doctors agree this is true. There are times when physical rest and all the pills money can buy won't give us what we really need. They can never take the place of the church with its people singing hymns that minister to the soul, or the word of God as it is preached by his servants, and the satisfaction of knowing that we've done what God wants us to do. Let's be honest with ourselves. We all need to go to church for the ministry of good health, spiritual and physical.

Excuse

We send our children when we can. Of course it's rather hard sometimes to get them to go. Seems they would rather stay home and play.

Answer

Perhaps they feel that if mother and dad don't need to attend church, they don't either. Children are much more effectively influenced if parents will take them to church and be with them as a family instead of just sending them. The Christian example found in good parents will long be remembered and felt in the maturing lives of children.

Excuse

I simply can't find the time to get to church any more. It's my work and responsibilities here on the farm. The chores are important, you know, and must be done.

Answer

I believe the big problem here is not finding the time, but rather arranging your work so that opportunity for church attendance will be available. The church has many farmers who are some of its most faithful members. Some are priesthood members, even pastors, who carry great responsibilities. I'm sure you will agree that most of us find time to do the things we really want to do. Some attend the Saturday night movie, whether it's good or not, and the yearly carnival when it comes to town. And to others, hunting and fishing come before everything else. We need to make sure that the activities of greater worth are not excluded. The things God has asked us to do mean the most in life and bring the greatest blessings.

Excuse

Well, I don't care for old Brother and Sister ————. They have that "holier than thou" attitude at church, but you ought to hear their tongues waggle in gossip when they're home or visiting someone!

Answer

Perhaps they are doing wrong. I won't argue that fact. But your rejecting fellowship is also committing a wrong. Two wrongs don't make a right. I admit there are imperfections among church attenders, but your duty to God, his church, and yourself should come first in spite of what you may not like in other people.

Excuse

I feel I can live a good life without going to church—as good as any member who goes regularly.

Answer

You should be careful before making a claim like that, for you don't really know the lives of others as God does. It is wonderful, however, to hear that you do live a good life; but I'm sure you can see that Jesus Christ is the standard of life, not men who might be good or not so good. None of us have achieved all the highest qualities in living. Therefore we are never "good enough." The church needs the good influence you can give, and you need the influence of the church to help you toward the highest ideals found only in Christ. Jesus himself was a churchgoer. In fact, he organized the church and admonished all to come and learn together.

Excuse

All right, you win, I'll go—but I just happened to remember . . . I don't have a way to get there!

Answer

My wife and I will stop by and pick you up each Sunday and bring you home again. It will be a pleasure.

God's Masterpiece

WHEN GOD MADE man, he reached the zenith of creation. Since then any imperfection besetting the human race can be charged to man.

A famous painting, the masterpiece of a genius of art, had been admired for centuries. A dark overtone brought out the mood of the scene, thereby seeming to make the difference between a mediocre picture and the superior workmanship of a great artist.

Eventually the curator of the museum where the painting was displayed decided to have the masterpiece cleaned. The cleaner was greatly surprised when he discovered the dark overtone vanishing as he worked. Alarmed, he thought he had somehow injured the painting. Reluctantly, not knowing what else to do, he resumed his work, timidly cleaning another small portion of the picture's dark area. His heart leaped and his breath came in short gasps as more of the painting seemed to be spoiled. "I've ruined the painting," he mumbled plaintively. "I must have carelessly used the wrong cleansing agent." But then, as he clasped his moist palms together and wrung his hands, his wretched feeling began to subside. "What's this?" he asked, spying a bright color which appeared to be filtering to the surface. As he rubbed away a little more of the dark surface, a bright red appeared. "I have it," the man said excitedly, explaining the riddle. "That dark surface which seemed to be a part of the painting is only dirt which must have accumulated over the centuries. No wonder it came off as I cleaned it." Then in a sad tone, which also seemed to smack of disgust, he continued, "So this is nothing but an average painting, which had the good fortune of being covered with dirt in such a way as to make it look impressive."

But another surprise was in store for the man. As he exposed more and more of the hidden color, the painting took on new beauty until finally, when his task was completed, there stood revealed a greater work than it was ever known to be. The dirt, although it seemed to add a certain charm to the painting, had really done nothing more than hide the real work of the artist and deceive viewers.

When God made man, he created his masterpiece. He had high hopes for his creation, set him in the world, and awaited the day when man would fulfill his mission. However, during the centuries, man has become entangled with sin and become filthy. Even so man has remained God's greatest creation. But the human race has become so accustomed to sin that mankind is hardly aware of it. If we would pause to learn of the high aspirations God has for us and then, through repentance and righteous living, clean sin from our lives, we would expose our better selves—God's real creation—and then would far surpass anything we are at present.

The author with his wife and two sons standing beside the family car in which they made the trip to Honduras.

IN THE Herald of last October 14, we observed this heading: "Blumenscheins to Latin America." This was our first knowledge of a venture which, in our humble opinion, may well prove to be one of the most significant steps taken since the early days of the Restoration.

As we read of their hopes and goals—"to bring the good news of Zion to Central America"—and their assertion that "as a doctor and teacher we feel we have something to offer to the Indians of Central America, and we feel we have a call to minister to them," we found ourselves thrilled by the very fact that there are still Saints today who are willing to give up many of the physical pleasures and comforts (which we have almost convinced ourselves are necessities) in response to the commission of Jesus Christ, "Go into all the world." Here were Saints who evidently believed Jesus meant just what he said then, and also when he challenged, "If any would be my disciples, let them deny themselves . . . and follow me."

We avidly read their reports in the columns of the Herald throughout the winter months, and one day as we were discussing them someone said, "Wouldn't it be wonderful to visit them and see firsthand just what they are doing?" My wife and I had enrolled in an extension course in Spanish from Northwest Missouri State Teachers College, and the prospect of such a trip gave real purpose to our study.

So it was that on May 10 this year we headed south in the family car. Letters had been exchanged with the Blumenscheins, and we told them we hoped to see them soon. Some thirty-five hundred miles and eleven adventuresome and spine-tingling days later we entered Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras. The Blumenscheins had told us to wire them when we had come this far, and having done so we headed out over the last hundred-odd miles which, like so many of the previous miles, were either up or down. The Central American countries are very small by our standards, but we decided if it were possible to spread them all out on the level, they would be a great deal larger.

Finally in the dark and rain, we found the Agua Azul Restaurant and motel on Lake Yojoa, which the Blumenscheins had mentioned in their Herald articles. Next morning at sunup we had our first view of Lake Yojoa. It was every bit as beautiful as Marian had described it. Certainly what Central America lacks in bridges and roads and road markers (there are none) is more than compensated for by some of the most beautiful scenery to be found anywhere.

After breakfast we began discussing plans to find "La Suiza," the name of the old Spanish land grant where the Blumenscheins had located. Our host informed us that it would be impossible for us to drive there in our car because of recent rains, so eventually we hired a boat to take us several miles across the lake to the tiny village of Perdenales. There we hoped to hire a native guide to take us the remaining five kilometers (about three miles) over mountain trails to La Suiza. Our first view of Perdenales was certainly not inspiring—just a small collection of mud huts with pigs in the yards and street and most of the ladies of the village down at the lake shore doing their family laundry. In the village we met Francisco, a cheerful fellow who agreed to show us the way to the home of the "Gringo doctor with the long beard." We could only assume and hope that this meant Dr. John Blumenschein. The day was warm and humid, and our guide soon proved to be in better shape physically than were we.

After frequent rest stops and what were undoubtedly the longest three miles in history, Francisco indicated we were getting near to our goal, and suddenly we could hear voices through the trees. Even in Spanish those voices had a Missouri accent, and we knew we had arrived. Our weariness forgotten, we hastened into the clearing and were soon shaking hands with the seven Blumenscheins and their friend and co-worker, Brother José Lopez.

Any misgivings we may have had about our welcome were soon laid to rest by the friendly hospitality these good Saints extended. We inspected their temporary living quarters and then moved over to see the site for their permanent home where they had most of the foundation footings already laid. This home is being planned so that it will be large enough to accommodate a number of people. Perhaps others, such as Graceland students, will want to go down during the summer months to work on the various agricultural projects envisioned, and in time do missionary work in the surrounding areas.

We saw the garden area which the Blumenscheins were busy fencing and learned that an earlier planting had been eaten up by the livestock which runs free range in the area. The custom there, we learned, is to fence livestock out rather than in. All kinds of fencing materials are used—log, stone, and brush fences predominate. A small tractor and necessary implements had been secured, and as fast as they can fence in well-drained areas in their narrow valley, they plan to bring them under cultivation and to experiment with various crops which may be used to better the economic conditions of the region.

One of their first and most necessary improvements was the digging of a well. This of course required a great deal of hand labor, but a satisfactory water supply was provided. This well is quite a curiosity to the neighbors who still carry all their water from streams and springs. They observe the Blumenscheins pumping the well and want to know where all the water comes from.

Their temporary house is a 10 by 20-foot floor area with a roof of corrugated sheet iron sloping in from the floor to a sharp peak. At noon we all crowded into this small area, where Sister Blumenschein fed us most royally. They assured us that because they didn't have a calf, they had killed the "fatted goat" in our honor. We ate our first bite with some trepidation but found that it was quite delicious. So were the avacados, mangos, and other dishes Marion had prepared. When we learned that she bakes all the bread for eight people, does their laundry on a washboard, tutors the four oldest children in their daily "school," and still finds time to help haul sand and gravel from a near-by creek for their new house, our admiration and respect for her grew by leaps and bounds. And a similar schedule holds true for the rest of the family.

There was no forty-hour week here, we decided.

In response to our questions we learned that Dr. John cannot as yet practice medicine. He must first pass an oral medical examination in Spanish. He hopes his Spanish will be adequate by the end of this year to enable him to do this. Then he would like to build a little clinic where he can provide some much needed medical ministry to the area. At present the nearest doctor and hospital is some thirty miles away over roads which are untraversable a great deal of the time.

We were thrilled to learn that the Blumenscheins have been holding regular church services since March. They live about an equal distance from three small villages and were then having the services in the village of Mogote, which is also their mailing address. One of the influential women of the village had provided a building for their use and was encouraging her neighbors to attend. Truly it would seem that God had led them to this place, for already attendance was running from thirty to thirty-five each Sunday. They have only two classes with Marian and daughter Beth teaching one class for everyone under twelve years old, and Dr. John teaching the other for all above twelve years.

They expressed their great thankfulness to Seventy Clair Weldon who had provided them with some teaching materials in Spanish which were most helpful. They of course still feel very limited by their meager Spanish, although to us, as we listened to them talk to some neighbors, they sounded quite fluent. All members of the family seemed happy and cheerful, secure in the knowledge that they are doing the work to which their heavenly Father has called them. Knowing this more than compensates for the lack of electricity and running water and all the modern conveniences which they must do without.

All too soon the day passed, and it was time to walk back to the lake where we had made arrangements for our boatmen to return and pick us up. The Blumenscheins and José walked with us all the way back to the lake, just so we could continue our visit on the trail.

As we said our good-bys on the lake bank our hearts were made sad by the parting, and yet we rejoiced at the prospects evident for the furthering of the purposes of God among these Lamanite descendants in Central America.

I know there are those who think the Blumenscheins are very foolish to give up all the comforts of their fine home and a lucrative medical practice for their expressed purpose of taking "the good news of Zion" to Central America. No doubt there were also those in King Mosiah's day who thought his sons were foolish to give up their father's kingdom to "go up among the Lamanites to preach the word." But the Lord said to Mosiah, "Let them go up, for many shall believe on their words, and they shall have eternal life" (Mosiah 12: 11). Certainly we believe that the prayers and faith of the whole church should be united on behalf of these modern "sons of Mosiah" that many might also "believe on their words" and thus come to know the true God and Christ of the Restoration.

Passport to Paradise

Verily I say unto thee; Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise.—Luke 23: 44.

HOW THESE WORDS shine out amid the gloom of the spectacle of Jesus, the spotless one, being forced by wicked and brutal men to become the companion of criminals in suffering and ignominious death! On the wings of these words of Jesus there develops out of this dark scene the unquenchable spark of the gospel's power, even in the midst of Satan's seeming victory. A humbled and repentant companion in suffering and death proclaims his Master's innocence as well as his own guilt (for which he willingly pays the penalty) and, applying the faith of a true convert, becomes His companion in life eternal.

Thousands, perhaps millions, of the professed followers of Jesus Christ who are familiar with the story of the last few hours of His life here on earth would have been thrilled to hear him direct this statement to themselves. Instead, these outstanding words carried their wealth of blessing to one classed as a criminal and therefore an outcast from among his people. Convicted of the felony of stealing, he was condemned to pay the penalty in the form of one of the most awful kinds of death ever devised by man. By our present standards this penalty was unnecessarily brutal and heavy for mere thievery, but, whatever the crime, this particular victim acknowledged his guilt and claimed his punishment just (Luke 23: 42, I.V.). Whatever his past might have been he had become contrite and humble and, like the publican of our Lord's parable, he abased himself and asked consideration of his Lord (Luke 18: 13).

This incident has provoked much controversy down through the years. Perhaps some have thought, "If a thief can get to paradise why not any other criminal?" and "Why must I (who am no criminal) take such pains to prepare myself for the life to come?" Moreover, this episode has been used to support the idea of all kinds of deathbed repentance, and, doubtless, in the case of cynics, it has been twisted into another excuse to dismiss the whole Christian philosophy.

FOR the earnest seeker after truth there is much to satisfy him which is not at first apparent but nevertheless is highly rewarding. To those who love real justice, it blossoms out in the kind provisions of our heavenly Father and his Son.

As indicated before, it will not do to infer that the thief may have been the victim of a miscarriage of human justice or false accusation, for he acknowledged his fault.

As to "deathbed repentance" it would be erroneous to state that there is no such thing. It is actually a type of such repentance but of the kind that was clearly acceptable by our Lord. Absolute sincerity and honesty is a first requirement in dealing with Him who knows the "thoughts and the intents of the heart" (Doctrine and Covenants 6: 7; I Chronicles 28: 9; II Chronicles 6: 30; John 4: 26, I.V.). Hence a nominal deathbed repentance based not on godly sorrow but on a selfish sorrow due to the sinner's time having run out on him cannot possibly be of any value. This thief was sincere; he acknowledged his guilt and expressed the conviction that he was paying a just price for his error. Besides this he displayed a faith in and knowledge of the Lord and his kingdom beyond that of many of his fellow citizens.

Many have believed that because this thief indicated such a faith and knowledge of the mission of Jesus he must have been a believer at one time and perhaps even one of the seventy which, of course, would also mean that he had been baptized. The question also arises whether or not the thief could have been inspired as was Peter when he said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." One thing stands out plainly in this connection; he called Jesus, "Lord." "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost" (I Corinthians 12: 3). But let us leave off speculating and turn to the salient and essentially true aspect.

ONE UNDENIABLE FACT stands out boldly; Jesus did promise the thief that on that very day the latter would not only be in paradise but would also be in companionship with his Lord therein. Who could ask for a greater blessing? Here was a man who, by present day standards, was suffering an excessive penalty for thievery. (Apparently no loss of life was involved in his misdeed.) Regardless of all our speculation, however, it is clear that he felt he was paying a just penalty for his sin. If that is not true repentance, I don't know the meaning of the word. Repentance is not only saying, "I am sorry," but also restoring or making good whatever damage had been done by the sinner. In this case, taking the thief's life on the cross did not restore stolen goods, it is true, but as in the case of all public punishment of malefactors, the witnessing of such things by the public tends to deter at least some who otherwise might become predatory toward their fellow men. At all events the penalty paid was lawful for those times.

Here was a case of true repentance plus an appeal to the Head of the kingdom with faith in that kingdom's grand provisions (the gospel plan), and it brought instant and sure response from Him who said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me" (John 14: 6).

Now what about this paradise? What did the repentant thief actually attain in his Divine assignment? To begin with whatever the characteristics of it, it is for those who overcome evil and weakness, and they who enter may eat of the tree of life (Revelations 2: 7). Also the companionship of Christ is assured (Luke 23:44; John 17:24; John 12:26; John 13:36; II Corinthians 5:8). This is about the extent of descriptive references to paradise as found in the Bible. The Book of Mormon is more complete in the matter, although both books tell us that at death the spirits of all men return to God who gave them life (Ecclesiastes 12:7; Alma 19:43). The prophet Alma then goes on to say that the spirits of the righteous at death enter into a state of happiness called paradise, there to enjoy rest and peace, with complete absence of all care and trouble and sorrow. (Alma 19:44). This is a temporary or intermediate state (Alma 19:56).

For whom was paradise created? Certainly not just for nominal Latter Day Saints of either priesthood or laity, nor for Christians of any stripe who are long on profession but short on performance, nor yet for many thousands who would be counted worthy by mere human judgment. Who among the milling throngs present at the Crucifixion of our Lord would have thought the thief a candidate for paradise? Paradise is for all those who have demonstrated by their works and desires their complete loyalty to that which they felt was right. No others can attain to it, because no others can be trusted with the virtues and powers of such a celestial abode. Works or effort is indeed the real criterion of faith and desire in any department of life. So in paradise there will be all those who have worked to the limit of their capabilities under the gospel banner in all ages. There will also be those who never heard of the gospel in their earth lives but have lived up to all the light they had at the time (Church History, Volume 2, page 16). What more could they do, and, being what they are, how could they fail to apply the gospel principles as soon as they came in contact with them, whenever and wherever that might be. They have demonstrated that they are the kind of people who naturally incline to the way of righteousness in all cases according to their understanding. Among them will be former heathens, savages, pagans, and perhaps a large number who rated as criminals among their earthly companions. Of necessity they all have this in common; i.e., the principles of their beliefs actively carried out in their lives according to their best understanding, being basically honest and sincere, zealous, fearless, full of love for all truth and godliness, and very teachable. Whatever educational forces are met in paradise will be appreciated and applied, for the rebellious cannot enter there.

And what of the prison house or hell? Is it just for murderers and adulterers, and other criminals who knew better than to commit the crimes they did? Is it just for the filthy of mind and spirit? Or does it receive nominal Christians of all denominations including Latter Day Saints who are always "going to" do so much tomorrow and who allow themselves to be deceived by refusing to study and show themselves "approved unto God" and waste their time of probation in folly and even worse? (Both hell and paradise are temporary according to Alma 19:47, 56.)

While this article will not cover all the details of the subject, a number of Scripture references indicate a possibility of various divisions in the prison house, and possibly there are some gradations in paradise. Our knowledge is limited, and no attempt is made now to be exhaustive. Certainly God is just and merciful, and we can well rely upon that as the anchorage in our searchings for more light, remembering that God's ways are higher than ours (Isaiah 55:8, 9).

One thing seems sure. This life will determine whether we go to paradise or prison. When we die, the glory we

I Had an Experience

ONE DARK afternoon recently I was aboard a nonscheduled United States plane bound for Redstone Army Ordnance Arsenal, Alabama. Our group was traveling to witness the building of the Army's satellite launcher and other types of modern weapons of war. The trip began in fog and darkness, but our weather report was that better air lay ahead. After an hour, however, the darkness and fog closed in; then came the rain, and later the wings iced over. Our small plane began to pitch and toss, and of the forty-five on board, forty-two were soon air sick. As plane commander, I held out as long as possible to set a good example, but the elements were against me, and I followed the rest. Then the full storm broke, and our plane dropped eighteen hundred feet on two occasions. The pilot and his crew were wet with the exertion of their labors, and I was afraid. I have been afraid before—in Korea, on the ocean, and at other times—but this was a desperate fear.

I turned to God and reminded him of my prayer as we took off on this trip, again asking that we be kept safe from harm. I heard a still small voice reply, "Oh, ye of little faith, would I have sent you had it not been safe? Do ye not believe me?" Then the voice was gone, but I had my answer.

I wish I could say that the storm ended immediately and that the sun was warm and bright and assuring, but it was not so. Still, the wind did seem less rough, and what was more important to me, I was calm again. I know God is with us when we ask him to be. My wish is that all who have need can indeed believe in him.

(The pilot of this plane said this was the worst trip he had made in twenty-four years of flying. He said, too, that he thought God must have been with us.)

Prayer Reveals Our Nature

WE REVEAL OURSELVES to those about us as well as to God when we pray. The observant listener in our prayer services can tell what we are, what we think, and what we hope for from what we say as well as from our attitude when we pray.

Christ pointed this out to those about him in Luke 18: 11, 12 when he related the incident of the Pharisee: "The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself; God, I thank thee that I am not as other men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers; or even as this publican. I fast twice in the week; I give tithes of all that I possess." The Pharisee revealed a nature of self-centeredness. His entire prayer pointed out how much he thought of himself.

The publican revealed a contrasting nature: "But the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God, be merciful to me a sinner" (Luke 18: 13). The publican revealed a nature of one who is humble and feels his unworthiness for what he has received.

Lehi in I Nephi 1: 13 demonstrated his great love for God as a result of the love and mercy which God first showed toward man. "Great and marvelous are thy works, O Lord God Almighty! Thy throne is high in the heavens, and thy power, and goodness, and mercy are over all the inhabitants of the earth; and because thou art merciful, thou wilt not suffer those who come unto thee that they shall perish!"

Nephi revealed an inquiring spirit in I Nephi 5: 71. He had been commanded to build a ship and had need of material to build it when he prayed, "Lord, whither shall I go, that I may find ore to molten, that I may make tools to construct the ship?"

DURING THE SERMON of King Benjamin, the people were moved upon by the spirit of repentance. As a group they cried aloud as with one voice, "O have mercy, and apply the atoning blood of Christ, that we may receive forgiveness of our sins, and our hearts may be purified: For we believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who created heaven and earth, and all things, who shall come down among the children of men" (Mosiah 2: 3, 4).

Alma was preparing to baptize in the waters of Mormon and felt his unworthiness to perform the ordinance. He revealed his need for more cleansing power, of God's Spirit, when he prayed, "O Lord, pour out thy Spirit upon thy servant, that I may do this work with holiness of heart" (Mosiah 9: 43).

After the death of King Benjamin, there were many adults who were small children at the time of the great conversion under King Benjamin. Many of these adults had turned from the way of their parents. They revealed their nature by the fact that they did not pray. "And they were a separate people as to their faith, and remained so ever after, even in their carnal and sinful state; for they would not call upon the Lord their God" (Mosiah 11: 109).

Alma revealed his great dependence on God for strength and at the same time his desire to serve God by serving his people. "O Lord, have mercy and spare my life, that I may be an instrument in thy hands, to save and protect this people" (Alma 1: 88). He was fighting with Amlici and knew that he could not do the Lord's work without His help.

The Lamanite king in Alma 13: 52, 53 revealed his great yearning to know more concerning the reality of God, of whom Aaron had been telling him. He prayed, "O God, Aaron hath told me that there is a God; and if there is a God, and if thou art God, wilt thou make thyself known unto me, and I will give away all my sins to know thee, and that I may be raised from the dead, and be saved at the last day."

Nephi, the son of Helaman, was in great despair shortly before the time for the coming of the Lord as a child into the world. He preached, but no one would listen. He disclosed his great despondency, "If my days could have been in [those] days, then would my soul have had joy in the righteousness of my brethren. But behold, I am consigned that these are my days, and that my soul shall be filled with sorrow, because of this the wickedness of my brethren" (Helaman 3: 8, 9). The very fact that he prayed revealed to unbelievers who saw him that he was a man who depended on God for strength.

CHRISt revealed his nature by the prayers he offered. He was concerned about the welfare of people and knew the greatest gift that could be given the Book of Mormon people at the time of his visit was the abiding comforter. "Father, I thank thee that thou hast given the Holy Ghost unto these whom I have chosen" (III Nephi 9: 20).

I heard the prayer of a young lady in a prayer service in Central Church in Kansas City that was offered with such a spirit of sincerity that I completely forgot what was said, but I could never forget the way it was said. It revealed to me that the intent of this person was to worship God in spirit as well as in truth.

Since prayer is a manner of revealing ourselves, we might then ask, What do we reveal to those who hear us pray—the humility of the publican, the love for God of Lehi, the spirit of inquiry of Nephi, a need for repentance of the people of King Benjamin, a need for more of God's Spirit as did Alma, or a lack of concern or desire by not praying as did the people in the time of Alma?

We cannot reveal something that we are not. We sometimes try harder to hide our true natures from ourselves than from others—and with a good deal more success. However, we pray from what we are. If our soul is full of concern for others it will naturally reveal itself.

It might be well for us to recount what we have said in our prayers and evaluate it against what we ought to be. This will be the beginning of our seeing what we are, and the first step toward being something different.

If we want to reveal a different nature than we have, our next step is to determine what we want to be. This will find its way into our prayers, which in turn will help us to reveal a different person than we have been in the past.

Christ has given us as our goal to reveal the nature of God.

Our prayer experience offers an excellent opportunity to assist in that mission of revelation when we develop "unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Ephesians 4: 13).

Summering with the Church in Europe

Part VIII

THE WOMEN of our church in Gloucester, England, have had an active organization for over twenty-five years. Their first leader was Sister Edith Jarvis, who served eighteen years. She was converted from an active life in the Methodist church. Her leadership included a five-year period during World War II when, through bazaars and various type sales projects, efforts of the women's department were climaxed by the payment of the debt on the Gloucester church building. "The stresses and strains of life were heavy upon us," says Bishop A. T. Trapp, who gives the women's department its full share of credit.

Sister Trapp (Carrie) led the women for the next five years, during which time they raised funds to buy a good organ, draperies, and carpets for the aisles and the rostrum. Through the postwar years that was a great accomplishment. These women have been able to interest their nonmember friends, who attend classes and help in financial projects. One has been baptized. "We appreciate the interest shown in us by the General Women's Council," says Sister Trapp, and "We rejoice in the wonderful blessings we have received from the Lord." The Trapps attended the 1948 General Conference and were guests of Sister Doris Oakman. They spent several months in Independence and made many lasting friendships.

Another of the Gloucester women who has attended General Conference is Sister Elizabeth Harris. She has attended three Conferences and has spent a part of the following summers in Independence, so she has a really wide acquaintance in the States.

Near Gloucester is a small settlement called Maisemore; it is lovely and timeworn. Here, in a cozy rambling brick cottage, live Sister Trapps' bachelor brother, James Young, with his two sisters, Beatrice Young, and Annie with her husband, Elder Ted Sykes. The other member of the family, their daughter, Shirley Sykes, left home a year or so ago and is a practicing registered nurse. She sent us flowers on our fifty-first wedding anniversary, which was spent with the Trapps at "Coal-Wharf," Maisemore, the distinguishing name of the Sykes-Young homestead, which is situated right on the banks of the poetic River Severn. I could hardly believe my eyes—such beauty, quietude, and peace, flowers, and cherished old china! The appreciation of the antique is congenial with Britons; but with the Trapps and the Youngs, it is a love. The "Coal-Wharf" buildings adjoin the Sykes home and house the coal for the vicinity. The county has built a splendid rock wall which separates the business from the home. A fine modern cement bridge has been built across the Severn and seems like part of their premises, for it joins the passing highway.

Living in quarters in the Gloucester "church home" are the Harry Youngs. After service get-togethers occur often in this hospitable home. A new churchlike front has been added to the building, and the women keep the interior cheery and inviting. The "Coal-Wharf" folk are part of the Gloucester congregation. In fact, Borthor Sykes has been pastor for many years.

The church at Nuneaton is similar in size, and here again we found a very active group of members and nonmembers. Brother and Sister Frank and Zeta Fry live in Nuneaton in the same house which they occupied when under European appointment for several years, prior to 1951, where we visited them. This time we were domiciled with them as were also Franklyn and Doris Weddle of Independence. This comfortable church-owned house has three rooms downstairs and three with a bathroom upstairs. Brother and Sister John and Ann Coggan live in Nuneaton, too, but not in the same house where we were their guests in 1951 and spent those wonderful weeks with them when we traveled part of England and Wales together in their auto; we also took a week's bus tour of the Lake Country of Scotland together. Their present home is a pretty, modern cottage with a large living room and a talking parakeet!

At that time Ann was in much better health and was leader of the women's guild, taking the place of their daughter Florrie (Sister Ted Parker), who with her husband and children, Madison and Maribeth, had just emigrated to Independence. In fact our ships passed in mid-ocean one late afternoon. We had left our countries on the same day. Imagine our excitement when a radiogram was delivered to us from them. It seemed eerie. We rushed to the ship's deck and there was the pretty greenish blue "Corona," cruising along between us and the horizon—it and the Parkers so close, yet we'd have to wait until our return home to meet them!

BACK to the guild. At that time Ann had the assistance of Zeta Fry at the organ. The women's class was keeping a steady pace studying and raising money to beautify their church home. Although they were and still are mostly older women all have continued doing their part. We were happy to remember their faces six years later. Ann served as leader for about four years; John has been their faithful pastor for a long time.

Sister Parker, Ted's mother, succeeded Ann as women's leader and has been followed by Sister Brown. Now again they have Zeta's fresh outlook and personality to spur their efforts. The majority of the guild members are not Latter Day Saints, but through the years they have been faithful to classwork and have supported the sales projects, doing handwork all year, which includes rug making, for the annual bazaar. The guild looks after all the needs of the auditorium. It keeps a supply of light bulbs on hand, has purchased all new chairs for the auditorium and the rostrum, and has carpeted the aisles and rostrum.

As in most of our churches abroad, the Sunday school brings in the children from the neighborhood, and some parents follow them. Nuneaton's light shines brightly through the co-operation of its women. One of the converts of this group is now living in Independence. As Irene Adams she emigrated in March, 1952. She became a doctor's receptionist within three months, which position she has held until recently. In July, 1954, she married Brother Paul Christiansen. Together they toured Europe and England last summer. Paul, Jr., arrived last April 2. Now he weighs fifteen pounds, and "Rene" says that going to the grocer seems like an outing these days.

One evening when we were in Nuneaton this time Brother Tom Worth and Betty drove the thirty miles from Birmingham ham and joined the Coggans, the Weddles, and us to drive to Stratford-on-Avon, some forty miles farther. Stratford always has occupied a fairly tale place in my heart. We played around the beautiful area a while, dined, and then went into the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre and saw "Julius Caesar." That was a once-in-a-lifetime thrill to us from the States. One other day we enjoyed a launch ride with the Worths on the tranquil Avon. The flocks of tame white swans and the exquisite private gardens, cultivated down to the water's edge, are pictures never to be forgotten.

I KNOW that the women of England have been looking forward to the coming of Apostle and Sister Arthur Oakman. We have heard of their pleasure in having Elva with them and of her ministry to them. They thirst for contacts with the church over here, and of course the Oakmans are a special treat to them.

The women of the Wigan Branch have Sister William Entwhistle (Margaret) for their leader, which means that they work. They, too, have fund-raising campaigns, parties which take the form of "bring and buy" sales, an art gallery, where they feature pictures of people and places they know or have known, mock campfires, "fancy dress parties," bazaars, and so on. They have furnished the linoleum for the church floors and have carpeted the main auditorium and aisle in blue. They paid for one of the new stained glass windows, and dedicated it to all of the women of the church, past and present. The upper floor is one commodious room, which has various uses and which will be further adapted as time goes on.

These women furnish the pulpit flowers, as is usual with our oversea women's organizations. The Wigan women send the flowers to the sick and the absentees. They have a very special program on Mother's Day, which was repeated last year by request at the Methodist Church. They were highly complimented and the pastor commented, "You have a beautiful name for your church," as he invited them to come again. The Entwhistles have attended two General Conferences and stayed in the States quite a while each time. Their children, Brian (now married), David, and Judith Ann, accompanied them. We stopped at their home one day when driving with the Barringtons and were the only ones surprised to find a dinner party ready; it was a most enjoyable occasion, full of cheer and reminiscence.

IN THE March 24 Herald I told of the London-Enfield Reunion, but omitted a third women's class which was taught at this time by Seventy Eric Rowe. Sister James Everett (Ardis) offered a sweet and humble prayer. She and her husband and little girl, Mary Lynn (two-year-old Randy stayed at home with "Grandma" Fossum) had come from their mission in Oslo across the North Sea by ship to England and then by train to London. Brother Rowe is well known in the States, since his mission among us. He is a practical man and likes to speak from experience, so he is known for his visits in homes and his understanding of family problems. His talk was good for us.

We especially enjoyed being cared for again at the home of Brother and Sister Franklin Schofield. He is now Bishop of the British Isles. (In 1951 we had been their guests for about a week. Part of that time they had to be out of town and left the house to us and the Frys. Together we "did" the British Exposition and rode the Thames down and back from famous Kew Gardens.) Brother Franklin and his brother Fred (now deceased) had been our guests during the 1951 General Conference. Being with Freda Schofield, leader of the Enfield women, was a real privilege. President F. Henry Edwards was a guest also, and instead of "fireside talks" we enjoyed "the President at the breakfast table." Fun every morning.

The work of the Enfield women is notable. The group numbers around forty out of a branch of one hundred and fifty members. They meet on Thursday afternoons except for once a month, when they gather on the first Tuesday night for the convenience of their business and professional women. Two of the afternoons are spent in the study of the Doctrine and Covenants and of "I Am Aware," by the General Women's Council. The other two programs are arranged by members who schedule talks by the priesthood, socials, and readings or discussions on various subjects (picture appreciation for instance). There is a catering committee of three, which serves all branch and group affairs, and a social committee which plans the social and fund-raising events. There are five friendly visitors, who are outstanding in visiting the sick and the absentees. The women raise at least one hundred pounds (money!) at their annual bazaar, for which they knit, sew, and embroider all through the year. Non-member contacts are made and lasting friendships are formed by these means in our European and British Missions.

I WANT to pass on a few highlights from Brother Tom Worth's talk to the women at the Enfield Reunion. The Reunion theme was "The Way, the Truth, and the Life." I quote: "Jesus described his relationship to us when he said, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life . . . I am the vine . . .'. It is one thing to know the fact of these statements but another to experience their meaning in one's own life. . . . To discover God's purpose for us in life, and to conform to it, is the primary duty and business of living. . . . Christianity is more than a religion. It is a revelation. It is the revelation, the revelation of God. . . . As we see Jesus we see God. . . . As the Way, the Truth, and the Life, he demands loyalty and allegiance, our declared intention to renounce evil. He removes the old barriers which sin has erected between heaven and earth and invites us to share his life. . . . John experienced his companionship and exclaimed, 'The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory; the glory as of the Only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth' (John 1: 14). . . . Nothing but this view of him is satisfactory: the image of the invisible God. . . . He invites us to this fellowship. He invites us to partake of his divine nature which he imparts to us. . . . He requires our obedience and our worship. . . . The heart of his invitation is the true spirit of his fellowship—I call you not to be servants but friends.' . . . This work of God has to be translated into the language of everyday living—we are to be not hearers but doers of it. . . . To refuse to follow him is sin! . . . The more we fill our minds with an understanding of God's purpose in us, the clearer becomes our place of service. . . . He doesn't have to shout at us. His influence is quiet and compelling. . . . In him our names are written in the Lamb's Book of Life. What of him whose name is not there! . . . This theme—The Way, the Truth, the Life—carries an appeal and an invitation. What is our response?"

Church Consecrated

THE new church was consecrated on Sunday, January 26. Apostle Arthur Oakman delivered the consecration address to a capacity crowd of about 230 persons.

Elder John W. Blackstock, Southern Ohio District president, was in charge of the service. Other officials participating included Elder Ralph Bobbitt, who gave the call to worship; Elder Kenneth Kriebel, former pastor, who gave the invocation; Evangelist Floyd T. Rockwell, who gave the prayer of consecration; and Pastor Evan W. Ervin, who gave the benediction.

Special music was provided by the choir under the direction of Mrs. Homer Summers, Jr., with Mrs. Evan Ervin and Mrs. Carl R. Dickerson as soloists. A Hammond organ was obtained to use for the service.

Preceding the consecration service, open house was held from 1:00 to 3:00 P.M. At 5:00 P.M. ten children were baptized and two babies were blessed.

As the building now stands, it is the result of the devotion and labor of many people. Several nonmembers as well as Saints donated money and labor. The building was purchased in August, 1956. Elder Robert Smith was pastor at that time.

Architects for the remodeling were Bryan Cassill and Sons.

Question Time

Question

By what right do we refer to the hill in New York state as hill Cumorah?

I am referring to the last paragraph of the answer by Harold I. Velt, Herald of April 28, 1958, page 17 (401)

I have failed to find any authentic reason for referring to the hill, where the Prophet obtained the plates, by that name.

A. D.

Michigan

Answer

We do not know definitely by whom and by what authority the name "Cumorah" was first given to the hill in New York State where the plates of the Book of Mormon were revealed.

There are vague statements issued long after the Book of Mormon was published, such as David Whitmer's reported statement to Orson Pratt and Joseph F. Smith in 1878, concerning the "old man" who disappeared mysteriously after saying, "No, I am going to Cumorah." This was in answer to David Whitmer as he, Joseph Smith, and Oliver Cowdery were journeying to Fayette. Nothing in the statement suggested where Cumorah was located.

There is also a statement by the Prophet's mother in her book, Joseph Smith and His Progenitors (Lamoni Edition 1912, page 113), to the effect that Joseph referred to the hill as the hill Cumorah in a conversation with his father. This was in respect to a rebuke he had just received from the angel while visiting there, before obtaining the plates for translation.

We are not unmindful that this was written many years later, and that Sister Smith's emphasis was upon Joseph's experience, while the name of the hill was merely incidental—and that, after a great many years of its having been called Cumorah by the Saints.

It seems evident that the name "Cumorah" was applied by church members from very early times to the hill in New York State. This was doubtless because of records having been deposited there as Mormon had deposited records in the original hill Cumorah, whether or not they believed it to be the same hill. Many apparently did believe it to be the same hill, as did Oliver Cowdery, according to statements ascribed to him; though there was nothing in the angel's message to Joseph, as recorded, to indicate such.

Apparently, then as in later times, many overlooked the fact that the Book of Mormon plates had not been left in the original hill Cumorah with the rest of the plates deposited by Mormon, but were carried away from there by Moroni after the last Nephite battle (see Mormon 3:8, page 701; Ether 6:83; Moroni 1:1-4).

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. The answers are the opinions and interpretations of the panel members signing them and do not commit the Herald nor the church.

Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Address questions to Herald editors rather than to panel members. Only questions with the contributor's full name (not just initials) and address will receive attention. —Editor.

Memoirs of Clara B. Stebbins

THE HOME of my grandfather, Hugh Fletcher, was in Erie County, Pennsylvania. I have heard my mother and her sisters tell of their wonderful peach orchard overlooking Lake Erie.

Solomon Spaulding of mistaken Book of Mormon fame lived in this Pennsylvania neighborhood. He had borrowed money of my mother's two uncles, Erastus and Ciprion Rudd. He was writing a story about the Indians of Ohio and Kentucky.

I have heard my mother speak of the near-by Conneaut Creek where, in his story, Mr. Spaulding placed a cave in which ancient records had been hidden. He hoped, when finished his story would bring him an income, and then he would repay mother's uncles the money he had borrowed of them.

Naturally they were interested in his story, and as he wrote it, chapter by chapter, he would come to spend the evening and read to them what he had written.

My grandmother and her two brothers, Erastus and Ciprion, were members of the early church, and they were believers of the Book of Mormon, having no idea that the Spaulding story would ever have any connection with the Book of Mormon.

In his story Mr. Spaulding mentions Conneaut River. Near the river he found a shallow cave or excavation in which were twenty-eight rolls with writing in the Latin language. He translated this into English and then wrote of the wars between neighboring tribes, also of their progress in ways of civilization.

Mr. Spaulding died, leaving the manuscript of his story with a printer in Painesville, Ohio. The contents of this printing office, with a lot of books and manuscripts, were sold to Mr. L. L. Rice, who later took them to Honolulu. The President of Oberlin College, while visiting there, learned of the Spaulding manuscript. The paper wrapper was marked, "Spaulding Story, Conneaut Creek."

This manuscript was placed in the care of President Fairchild to be held in the library at Oberlin College. Some time later, under the direction of President Fairchild, a verbatim copy of the story was made for Bishop E. L. Kelley with permission to have it printed. This has been published and has been available since 1885.

For more than fifty years representatives of the Latter Day Saints Church had to meet and refute as best they could the story that the source and inspiration of the Book of Mormon was the Spaulding Story. Elder Mark H. Forscutt, grandfather of Roscoe Faunce of the Graceland family, was for many years a church appointee and had this claim to meet. Three of our family were baptized by him.

ONCE when he was in Burlington he heard of the early experiences of the family in Pennsylvania with the uncles and Solomon Spaulding when some of the family were members of the church and believers of the Book of Mormon. Brother Forscutt thought this would be good evidence to refute the Spaulding story as the basis of the Book of Mormon. He asked that an affidavit of the story be secured for him for use whenever the Spaulding story might be presented to him.

After the publication of Manuscript Found, of course that seldom was necessary; still the story kept cropping up and had to be refuted.

Brother C. Ed Miller tells of the time when he killed a chicken while his little daughter was with him. When it kept flopping around the child said: "The chickie doesn't know it's dead, does it, Daddy?" He thought, "Like the Spaulding story, it doesn't know it's dead."

Among the women who came to Lamoni, Iowa, with the Herald Publishing House were some who had been members of the Mite Society in Plano. They soon decided there should be a Mite Society in Lamoni. The society was organized in 1882. One who came at that time was William Deam, son of one of the original members of the Reorganization. His wife was the daughter of William Marks, counselor to Joseph the Martyr.

Mrs. Glaud Rodger, who was the first president of the Mite Society, was the wife of our missionary to Australia. Mrs. Phoebe Smith was the vice-president, and Mrs. Viola White the secretary. Mrs. Katherine Gaulter was the first treasurer; later she became secretary-treasurer. After serving for a number of years, she gave up the job and I became secretary.

Mrs. William Marks was a very efficient helper. Her experience with the work in Plano added to her fitness as an adviser.

From the start the purpose of the society was to aid the needy and contribute to the church. It began with few members and no money. At first the women sewed rags for carpets or rugs. They did sewing or mending for needy families. Then they made sunbonnets and aprons. The sale of these articles gave them a working fund. Later they took up quilting, and their price is still one and a half cents a yard for the thread used. Through the years they have had expert quilters, and their work has become famous. Quilts to be quilted have been sent to them from California, Minnesota, Florida, and even from Honolulu.

When the old Brick Church was built, they paid for the bell that called Saints to worship for over forty years. Also they paid for the board sidewalk from the depot to the church. After some years they bought a building and had it moved to its present site at the corner of Linden and Eighth streets.

MEETING AT FIRST in the homes of the members, they increased in numbers and met for a time in the Herald building. Then in their own commodious building they expanded in numbers and amount of work and were recognized as a force for good in the community. They paid for the cement paving on two sides of their building, contributed regularly to the church, and in two years, while the new church was being built, they turned in $600.

The Mite Society is now affiliated with the women's department of the church, as a unit of the general organization. The name Mite Society has never been changed, and its members' work has always been a labor of love. They turned over their building to the church, and it is now occupied by the Commodity Shop. The Mite Society is conveniently located in the kitchen of the new church where cupboard space is accorded them for the storage of their materials.

For a number of years I was a regular attendant of the Mite Society, serving as secretary, conducting the devotional program, and reading books and articles to them.

Numerous clubs of good purpose have engaged the attention of many of our women, but the Mite Society and our women's group meetings have been sufficient for my time and strength. In late years I have been a shut-in most of the time.

When my husband was president of Decatur District, he often made the rounds of the branches, and I sometimes went with him to places where he preached. Lucas was an old established branch with many good members. Henry enjoyed his work among them. A number of young men he worked with there later became active in the ministry of the General Church. I visited with him there and we made friendships that have lasted through the years.

Allendale was another place where we often went. This was a small branch where the faithful few kept the work going against strong opposition; they were glad for Henry's help. The branch grew and in later years many of our ministers labored there.

At Lone Rock (with the Charley Jones family), at Davis City, and at Pleasanton we made lasting friends. At Allendale there was one hotel kept by Sister Hunt, and we were given a room in it when we went there. I think of that room as a place where I received a blessing. One night I was suffering from a strange nervous condition, distressing to endure. Henry administered to me, and soon I was free from the affliction; I had wonderful peace of body and mind. We were there to help others, and the Lord was mindful of us.

WE ATTENDED different General Conferences in Independence, staying once in the Mark H. Siegfried home with my cousin Madge; and at other times in other homes. In 1891 we attended Conference in Kirtland, Ohio. In a program at that time I read a paper written by Miss Anna Stedman (later Salyards).

At one time I was in the Independence Sanitarium for a minor operation, staying before and after with my good friends, Brother and Sister Clifford R. Smith. Tessie's mother had been my dear friend and close associate in the Daughters of Zion work.

On one of our trips farther from home we visited several places in Wisconsin. I remember members of the DeLapp family. In different homes we were made welcome and were kindly cared for. This we have remembered with appreciation. We visited Brother and Sister W. A.

McDowell, parents of F. M. McDowell. In Janesville we were made to feel at home with Sister Effie Hield, my Daughters of Zion associate and mother of the Hield brothers who are now giving wonderful service to the church.

Some miles out in the country was the home of old friends of my husband, the family of Ormond Dutton, father of Jasper. Years before this, Henry had attended business college in Janesville and had spent much time with the Duttons. They had made him feel like one of the family, and now they accepted me in a similar way.

When Henry was president of the Northern Illinois District his work sometimes called him into Wisconsin and earlier his relatives had lived in this state, so it was familiar ground to him.

At a later time, when he was staying at the Duttons without me, he became very sick with a throat infection. It was so serious they feared he would die, and they sent for me. I was in Sandwich, Illinois, where Brother F. G. Pitt lived; he went with me to the Dutton home. No elder had been in reach, and if needed Brother Pitt could administer to him.

When it had seemed that his breath would be cut off, before we got there, he was healed. He told us he thought how he had laid his hands on the heads of others and they had been healed. He put his hands on his own head and asked the Lord to do the same for him, and instantly he was healed. When we came in he was breathing with ease, and he told us how the help had come.

"The Lord is a present help in trouble."

attain will have been determined (Alma 16: 228-236). There may be divisions and gradations within the various glories. We cannot yet be sure about that, but at death the main boundaries of our future state shall be set, whether it be celestial, terrestrial, or teletial (or no glory at all, as in lake of fire and brimstone). It is comforting to know that the death of the righteous shall be sweet unto them, but the wicked shall find their death bitter (Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12).

Thus we have one more evidence that the righteous need have no fear of death nor of that which comes after death. Neither should we think the price of godliness too high. We are persuaded that it is ridiculously low. In the words of Micah 6: 8, "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" And in Doctrine and Covenants 59: 5: "In nothing doth man offend God, . . . save those who confess not his hand in all things."

Now what about that thief on the cross? Whatever men may think, he was celestial material developed through the process of faith and repentance with complete honesty in spite of past errors. Whatever discipline intense suffering develops, he had doubtlessly absorbed that also. At any rate who would dare say the Lord was deceived in him and erred in consigning him to paradise? Here is another case among many wherein the only answer to various queries concerning it must come by way of the words and acts of Jesus. Whatever our judgment might tend to be in this episode, Jesus consigned a condemned criminal to the abode of the spirits of the righteous. We have no choice but to conclude that the Lord saw in him that which the average human failed to see; namely, the basic characteristics of a citizen of Zion, the city of God.

In all of our blunderings and perplexities may we learn to append to our own feeble judgment, always and without fail, the wisdom that comes from the careful observance of that which Jesus said and did. How else can we receive a passport to paradise?

C.P.R. Trainman Appears in Court as Lawyer

A SON OF Saskatchewan who combined railroading with his legal studies to achieve his ambition of becoming a lawyer was recently introduced in Queen's Bench Court. He is Arthur Campbell McMurdo, of the legal firm of Rees, Reynolds, and Shmigelsky. He is also trainman on the Canadian Pacific Railroad passenger run to Wilkie.

Arthur was born at Weyburn in 1925, and received his early education there. He began working for the C.P.R. as trainman in 1944, a job he has held since that time with the exception of a year in the Royal Canadian Navy.

In his spare time, this ambitious young man arranged to attend Brandon University, where he received his B.A. degree in 1949. Then he turned to law, attending the law school of the University of Saskatchewan. He received his degree from there in 1954.

In October, 1956, he joined the firm of Rees, Reynolds, and Shmigelsky, and was admitted to the Saskatchewan bar on January 2, 1958.

He was baptized in 1939 and ordained a priest in 1944. In 1952 he married Muriel Gore. They are parents of four children: Larry, five; Kim, four; Sharon, three; and Beth, one year.

In a letter to the editor, Sister Lottie Clarke Diggle wrote, "He is an excellent speaker in the pulpit and a loyal church man. To realize his ambition, he worked two nights and one day each week as a trainman, with little rest between attending classes and studying."

Brother McMurdo now has an appointment as Crown prosecutor and assistant to the attorney general of Saskatchewan. The family will live in Prince Albert.

I Believe

by Gerald Kennedy

Abingdon Press, 1958

Price, $1.25

This is the first book in an inspirational series by well-known religious leaders. Other titles in the series will include I Believe in God, I Believe in Jesus Christ, I Believe in Immortality, and I Believe in the Holy Spirit.

Gerald Kennedy is bishop of the Los Angeles area for the Methodist Church. He is the author of other books and a frequent contributor to religious periodicals. This book on "belief" is like a series of devotional talks on what a Christian believes, why he believes, and the enrichment faith can bring to life. This book is purposely written in simple language and directed toward helping any Christian answer questions about his beliefs and to aid in strengthening his faith.

Dr. Kennedy points out that the first step in our spiritual life is to acquire a belief in God. When we have gone far enough to say "I believe in God," we stand at the beginning of life's great adventure. He speaks as one who is humbly seeking the goal toward which the Christian faith would lead us. One of his summary paragraphs reveals his point of view.

"I believe in the Christian faith. I believe it is the ultimate truth about God, man, and life. I believe that Jesus Christ is the truth. I believe that the history of the Christian faith proves that it comes from God. I believe that every event of the past two thousand years supports what the Christians have said. I believe that God in Christ saves men and saves the world. I believe the gospel is not one way among many, but the Way to the good life. I believe the gospel is the answer to the most profound questions man can ask, and it gives enough light for him to live by."

Leading in Public Prayer

by Andrew W. Blackwood

Abingdon Press

Price, $3.00

Many sincere prayers bring spiritual ministry to our people throughout the church. Unfortunately, however, we often offer public prayers that do not meet the needs of the waiting congregation. Many times they become an uninspired collection of overused phrases. Or they do not express the aspect of worship which a particular point in the service calls for. Thus the invocation becomes a pastoral prayer; and the benediction becomes a resumé of the sermon.

Leading in Public Worship is a book to help ministers grasp the importance of public prayer, appreciate the different types of worship prayers, and inspire them to make the preparation necessary for the effective utterance of these verbal offerings to God.

Parts of this book will be of very little help to ministers of the Reorganized Church, except, perhaps, to give them some insight into the forms of prayer which the more liturgical churches use. Nevertheless, a careful reading of other parts will benefit greatly the serious priesthood member who wants to improve his ability to serve the church through the offering of more effective public prayers.

Letters

Note of Thanks

I desire to express my deepest appreciation for the many letters and cards, and especially for the many prayers offered in my behalf during my recent critical illness. It is indeed comforting and reassuring to know there are so many faithful friends and Saints who, in this busy world, take time to remember those who are in need to our heavenly Father. Their compassion and devotion have been appreciated ever so much.

Help Wanted—in the Nursery

As I read the article, "Don't Let This Happen at Reunion," I thought of the statement of a disappointed sister last year who said, "I'll never volunteer again." It seems she offered her talents for one evening in the nursery and three days' assistance to the teacher of the eight-year-olds. Each day the teacher needed an assistant, but only this one sister came to her aid. There were far too many children for the size of the staff of nursery assistants, so this sister stayed on. (The men's and women's classes each morning were crowded with able-bodied people.) Pleas for more help went unanswered. Some of the sisters had not heard one morning or evening sermon. Is this fair?

This year you moms, dads, and teen-agers offer a day or two of service as assistants. Don't leave it up to a few. You can be blessed by a combined prayer of the five-year-olds as well as the ministry of the priesthood.

A SISTER IN FAITH

My Daughter Was Baptized Today

Today one of the fifth generation of my family united with the church when my daughter was baptized and confirmed.

At the time neither my daughter nor I realized the extent of this marvelous event. For this generation has received a greater blessing than all of the former ones. We have been endowed with the privilege of caring for four daughters. In the past there has been one lone woman in each generation who has remained strong and steadfast in the faith of the church. Only a few of the men have united with the church and become active in the priesthood. Of these none have left any direct descendants.

What a truly great responsibility and opportunity has come to me. If I remain faithful to my heritage the opportunity for me in this generation is limitless. If my children can become aware of the tremendous tasks that lie before them and are willing to work diligently in the building of the kingdom my cup of joy shall be filled to overflowing.

In the past I have prayed for a son that I might be able to help strengthen the priesthood. I realize now that I have an even greater responsibility in these, my daughters. I thank God daily for the incentive he has given to me, and I truly realize he has blessed me beyond my fondest hopes and dreams.

As my children establish their homes and become a part of the kingdom, I shall know of a surety that greater work hath no woman than this, that she give her life for the building up of Zion.

From a Friend in Iran

It is a great joy for me to receive the Saints' Herald which started coming to me a few months ago. Maybe someone of the Saints (probably Brother R. L. Amsberry) took it upon himself to help me in this way. Thank you all. May God bless you to help more earnestly in establishing Zion through this useful instrument.

It is my desire that the people over here will someday have the opportunity to hear the gospel as it is in the unchangeable Christ.

A Plea for Rescue Missions

I have been thinking for some time about writing my testimony to the Herald. I was baptized last November at San Diego, California. We were visiting our daughter there at the time Apostle Holmes was holding a meeting. We did not miss a one of his sermons.

I have been very happy since coming into the church. Since my baptism it seems God has opened the windows of heaven and poured out many blessings in health, employment, in other ways.

I was reared by good God-fearing parents back in the Ozarks of Missouri. My father, a musician, was a member of the Church of God (not Pentecostal). My mother died when I was a small boy. When I left home I went a long ways in sin. I never found happiness in anything I did.

I would like to say to the young folks, Seek the Lord in your youth and start working for him. It will save you many heartaches, and, oh, the happiness in a life of service for the Master! My greatest regret is that I did not find and accept the gospel in my youth.

While I was working up in the big woods of Oregon, one Saturday I went to Portland. While there I decided to call a friend. I looked for a phone and noticed one in a building. I went in to ask permission to use it. The man in charge not only said I could use it but also asked me if I needed money to make the call. Then, after I made the call, he asked me if I would have a bowl of hot stew (the weather was cold and damp). I thanked him and said, "No," but I became interested in just what kind of place this was. It had a long table where people ate, beds for folks to sleep in, a storeroom with clothing for the needy, and a chapel where one could rest, read, or pray. There was preaching every night.

I went back to my work in the woods, but I kept thinking of this place. I was sure Christ would approve of it, for he said, "Do good to all men." This old man was trying to help everyone. He seemed to have time for all who came to him, no matter what was wrong or how low they had gone in sin. He said, "They all have a soul to save, and God wants me to help them." When I had another day off I went back. I liked it—the singing, the music, the prayers. My soul was so starved for Christ and the gospel that the more I went the more I wanted to go. God was with me, and I went to the altar and prayed. I "accepted Christ," as the Protestant church put it. I asked God to help me cleanse my life of everything I was doing that was not right—and I was doing many things which were not pleasing in his sight. I know he helped me, for I could not have given up the habits I had if he had not come to my rescue. I was completely delivered from the habits of tobacco and drinking. I was happy and wanted to go out and tell the whole world what God had done for me.

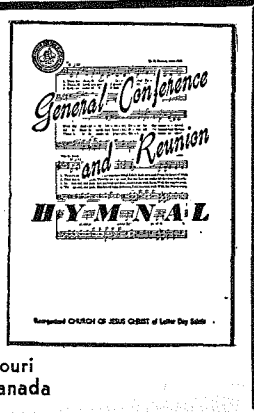

I had done a lot of reading in my Bible, and I did not seem to agree with the churches, so I got ministerial papers with a nondenominational organization that issued licenses to preach. I went out and preached Christ to the people. I was happy in a way, but I felt that there was something missing. I know now that it was the gospel. You see, I had Christ preached to me, but not the power of God unto salvation. I did not know I could talk to someone about Christ and still not give him the gospel. In I Corinthians 15: 3, 4 Paul says, "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received." As a witness for Christ one must see to it that those who are being helped have a clear understanding of the gospel. I can see now what the Bible means where it says, "Many are called, but few chosen." I had been called but not chosen. Now I feel that I have been called out of darkness unto a marvelous light. I will always praise God for leading me along until I found the truth, but how much better it would have been if I had found his church in my youth! The old man was doing all he could for the people, and I know he will in nowise lose his reward, but he was not preaching the full gospel.

Now there are a lot of things I don't understand about the church. It has many auxiliaries in it—Sunday school, young people's department, women's department, men's clubs, but no downtown rescue mission like the one I found in Portland. What I'm trying to say is this: If it had been our church mission I would have found the church sooner, and how do we know that others would not have found it, too? Don't we have anyone in the church who wants to minister to the down-and-out person? I believe if Christ were here we would find him right down on the skid row helping the people who are not able to help themselves.

Now I hear someone say, "They should not be in that condition." We are not to judge. Christ said we would always have the poor with us. Everyone of us has a soul to save, and we are to take the gospel to people not just out in the residential section but everywhere—the man that is passing by, the young boy away from home with no friends in town, the young girl who needs a helping hand, the family that lives in a hotel room and doesn't have the right kind of clothing to wear to the big church but could cross the street almost every night and listen to the songs and the message in a downtown mission. I know how their souls are starving for the word of God. I was like that. But are they getting the wrong message as I did?

Don't we have any mission-minded people in the church who would be willing to go downtown once a week or month and stand on a street corner and tell the story of the gospel as it should be told? Are we ashamed of Him? If so, he will be ashamed of us (Mark 9: 38). These people need the gospel to free them, for they are held in the snares of Satan, being drawn to spiritual death. Are we going to help them? I sometimes think of Amos 6: 1, "Woe to them that are at ease in Zion," and also "They that are whole need not a physician; but they that are sick." "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance (Luke 5: 31, 32).

In my missionary work of about twenty years, I preached in churches and missions in almost every city in the United States, but not one time did I find a Latter Day Saint rescue mission. I help to open many missions, helped to organize seven, and was superintendent of a Baptist rescue mission in Phoenix, Arizona, for a while. These institutions are doing a good work in helping materially, but we know they don't give people the fullness of the gospel, and that is what they need.

I don't believe we can be saved in our sins. Christ came to save us from our sins, and I believe I could fall from grace. I did not make many friends among the church people because of my beliefs. I remember on one occasion I was asked to deliver the message at a certain church at the eleven o'clock service. There was a large crowd of nice-looking people. I believed in just opening my mouth and letting God fill it. In a few days the pastor came to me and told me that I had just about torn up his church. Well, I still say sin is sin no matter where we find it.

I'm just "eight months old in the church," and have a lot to learn about this great Restoration movement, but I know God is no respecter of persons and that if I come to him in faith he will guide me into all truth.

I'm asking for every one of you to pray for me that God will have his way in my life, and that if the time ever comes when the church is led to open rescue missions I will be permitted to have a little part in it. My heart goes out to these poor people who can't help themselves. I would be willing to spend the rest of my life working in such a mission. I know we have lots of people now in the church who would gladly do this kind of work, but they are waiting to be sent out. There is a great price on one soul—the lost sheep (Matthew 18: 12).

We are isolated members living forty-seven miles from the church. I work seven nights a week and don't get to be in the services often. I'm thinking of making a change where we will be close to a branch. Pray for us that we will not make a wrong move and that we will go onward and upward to the mark of the high calling.

Small Group Builds New Church

ATKINSON, NEBRASKA.—A small group of Saints has accomplished the herculean task of building a church. The twenty-five members held special services on Sunday, May 18, and an open house introduced the church to the community of Atkinson. Approximately three hundred from the community and surrounding towns attended the opening.

Construction began last fall, under the direction of a building committee. Most of the labor was donated by members. The site is adjacent to U. S. Highway 20 in the north-east part of Atkinson. Anticipating growth, the members provided the chapel with pews for seating 110 people, and it will accommodate about 150 with the addition of chairs. One wing of the L-shaped building will house the church school department.

District President Arthur F. Gibbs was in charge of the opening service, and Emery Jennings, president of Far West Stake, was guest speaker. The mayor of Atkinson, Willard S. Linville, presented a brief welcome on behalf of the community. Ralph Schrank, mission pastor, offered the invocation. Others participating in the opening service were John

He was baptized into the Reorganized Church at the age of nine and was ordained to the office of elder in 1952. He served as pastor at Oregon City until he was transferred to Medford in 1956. On July 24, 1937, he was married to Isabelle Kalland, who survives him.

Besides his wife he leaves two sons: Robert and Darrell; and five daughters: Marlene, Jo Carol, Judy Kay, Raine, and Lana, all of the home; his parents of Medford; three sisters: Mrs. Ora Pankow, Mrs. Charles Sweeney, and Mrs. Donna Lohr, all of Madison; and a brother, Merlin, of Urbana, Ohio. Funeral services were conducted by Evangelist Miles Whiting and Pastor James Davidson. Interment was in Siskiyou Memorial Park in Medford. Elder J. L. Verhei gave the graveside prayer.

HEAVILAND.—Alvin Lawrence, was born March 1, 1918, in Flint, Michigan, and died July 5, 1958, at his home in Independence, Missouri, after four months of illness. On April 8, 1938, he was married to Muriel M. Kinsfather, whom he met at Graceland; three children were born to them. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church at the age of eight, was ordained a deacon on October 13, 1940, a teacher on October 26, 1945, and an elder on March 26, 1950. In 1949 he was appointed bishop's agent in the South Crystler congregation, which office he held until his death. He also served as a member of the building committee and was active in Scouting; for several years he was institutional representative and later, neighborhood commissioner. For the past eight years he was employed by the Westinghouse Corporation as a departmental inspector.

He is survived by his wife; a daughter, Brenda, and two sons, Gary and Brent, all of the home; his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Heaviland of Detroit; a sister, Mrs. Harry Randall, also of Detroit; and six brothers: Lloyd of St. Joseph, Missouri; Clarence and Ralph of Detroit; Leon of Eau Claire, Wisconsin; Carl of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; and Lewis of Mountain View, California. Funeral services were held at Speaks Chapel in Independence, Elder Grant Dobson, Floyd Hirst, and Dr. F. M. McDowell officiating.

RUNKLE.—Leroy Franklin, son of Frank and Chloe Sherer Runkle, was born April 16, 1909, at Pisgah, Iowa, and died July 8, 1958, at his work as a switchtender for the Sante Fe Railway in Argentine, Kansas. He grew to manhood in Pisgah, but following the death of his father moved to Independence, Missouri. It was here on June 4, 1944, that he was married to Pauline Flowers, who survives him. At the age of eight he became a member of the Reorganized Church, and on January 17, 1954, he was ordained to the office of priest. At West College congregation he had served as junior church pastor, Boy Scout committeeman, and branch solicitor.

Besides his wife he leaves two daughters: Bonnie and Joyce, both of the home; his mother and a sister, Aleta, of Independence; and a brother, Jerry, of Lamoni, Iowa. The funeral was held at Speaks Chapel in Independence, Elders Chris Hartshorn and Herman Chelline officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

WEIR.—Florence Mable Kelmel, was born October 18, 1922, at New Milford, New Jersey, and died March 25, 1958, at the U. S. Army 98th General Hospital in Neubruecke, Germany. She was married on October 23, 1947, to John C. Weir, an elder, at Sacramento, California. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since August 8, 1948. She leaves her husband and a daughter, Carolyn.

Correction

The list of survivors in the James Amend obituary (June 23 issue) should be as follows: his wife, Bertha; two sons: Wilbur J. of Hazelton, Idaho, and J. V. (Pete) of Cody, Wyoming; four daughters: Waneta Williams of Bell Gardens, California; Mary Wortman and Dollie Hayes of Bozeman, Montana; and Bertie House of Rupert, Idaho; two sisters: Mrs. A. J. Moore of Bozeman, Montana, and Mrs. William Dale of Long Beach, California; one brother: William of Modesto, California; and fourteen grandchildren.

Golden Wedding Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Conyers, Cameron, Missouri, quietly celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary on June 20. As all members of the family were unable to be present on that day, a dinner was held on Sunday, June 15, at the home.

James Leroy Conyers was born on April 19, 1886, at Pisgah, Iowa. Mrs. Conyers, the former Margaret Josephine McCutchan, was born in Richmond, Missouri, on January 22, 1886. They were united in marriage on June 20, 1908, in Cherokee, Oklahoma. Many years of their married life were spent in Oklahoma, and they also lived in Arma, Kansas; Independence, Missouri; and Lamoni, Iowa; before moving to Cameron in 1942. Both are members of the Reorganized Church and Mr. Conyers has been an elder for many years.

They are the parents of three sons: Rex Conyers, University City, Missouri; Roland Conyers, Independence, Missouri; and David R. Conyers, Brookfield, Missouri. There are seven grandchildren and three great grandchildren.

DIVIDED INTERESTS

The Scripture brings out some interesting life situations as hypothetical questions. This one may strike you as tragic or funny according to the side of the shield facing you.

The Sadducees asked Jesus about a woman who had married seven men, all brothers, and one at a time (Matthew 22:23-28). "In the resurrection whose wife shall she be of the seven?"

This sect did not believe in the resurrection from the dead. They were trying to confound Jesus or hoping to ridicule his answer. However, the Master treated the question seriously and gave them an unexpected reply: "You do err, not knowing the Scriptures. . . . For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven."

Like many modern Sadducees they were not concerned with right living in their time, but were speculating on otherworldly things. Having one's mind on things which might happen after this life is over, speculating on the meanings of things which the Lord has not seen fit to reveal, and probing the "mysteries of the kingdom" are interesting diversions; but they do not build character nor the kingdom. Concern over whose wife she shall be in heaven is as unprofitable as reading cartoon strips or crossword puzzles in a geometry class.

The Psalms of David *

An unusual and very effective recording, just recently made available, is The Psalms of David, composed and played by Ralph Hollander and recited by Agnes Moorehead. The reading of these Psalms against the music of Mr. Hollander's solo violin is sensitive and dramatic and altogether effective and appropriate. Mr. Hollander's music creates poignant and tender moods for the words. The music is more than mere accompaniment, it is rather an intensification of the words in a dialogue where voice and violin have equal status. A speaking chorus is also used in four of the Psalms in the second cycle (Side 2 of the record).

The recording is by LYRIC ARTS and is acoustically and electrically of excellent quality.

Mr. Hollander and Miss Moorehead have done a most skillful and beautiful work. I wholeheartedly recommend their recording to all who would appreciate those marvelous outbursts of the human spirit which were the basis of Hebrew worship long before Christ, and are even yet the basis of a large percentage of contemporary musical worship, The Psalms of David.

Glenn Sivits

A member of the Kansas City Stake High Council, Glenn F. Sivits has served in this position since March 16, 1947.

Brother Sivits was born May 22, 1908, in North Platte, Nebraska. He was reared "in the church" but, he comments, "When I was younger I never realized that it meant much to me." It wasn't until he reached adulthood that the significance of the church dawned upon him.

After graduation from Iowa University he secured his first position as a school-teacher at Merna, Nebraska. There his religious experience in the small country town directed him back to the church. Of this experience he writes: "In the town there were only two churches. Teachers were expected to show a good example by attending church. So my wife and I would attend one, then the other. Finally it dawned upon me that what I wanted most of all was to be located where my own church had a group. For a year and a half, my wife and I prayed continually that God would help us locate in such a place. God answered our prayers.

The answer came when Brother Sivits was employed in the school system of Kansas City, Kansas.

The Sivits family includes Sister Sivits (formerly Violet May Coakley); a daughter, Jo Ann, and a son, Dennis Lee. Brother Sivits, in addition to being a graduate of Iowa University, is a graduate of Graceland College. He has taught school since 1935, and has served as pastor of three different congregations in Kansas City.

Construction Work on the Headquarters Building Will Be Completed This Summer

Auditorium Visitors Will See Chamber

VISITORS at the Auditorium this summer will be able to see the new General Conference Chamber, according to G. Everett Berndt, supervisor of the guide service.

Construction work on the huge room is nearly completed. As soon as the construction workers finish, installation of the new seats will begin. Brother Berndt said the seats should be in by the end of August.

The carpeting on the platform and aisles of the chamber will be laid as soon as the seats are installed. This will probably be the last step in the completion of the present work and should be done around the first of September.

Visitors will be able to view the General Conference Chamber from several vantage points, but most visitors will not be allowed on the main floor of the room because work will still be in progress there.

The guide service is expecting to receive many visitors at the Auditorium this summer. At the end of April this year over 2,000 more persons had visited the headquarters building than during the first four months of 1957.

The construction work presently under way at the Auditorium is credited with the increased number of visitors. Brother Berndt said many persons from the surrounding area have stopped at the Auditorium to see how the work is progressing. He expects the number of visitors to keep increasing as summer vacations begin and persons from more distant areas have an opportunity to come to Independence.

Visitors this summer will also see the new porticoes and the shops area at the Auditorium. The new offices for the Department of Religious Education will not be included in the guided tours.

The first service to be held in the new General Conference Chamber is scheduled for the second Sunday in September.

Brother Berndt suggested that Auditorium visitors utilize the parking spaces available on the lot northeast of the building and enter through the front foyer. A receptionist is on duty in the foyer during the weekdays and the guide office is located there to assist visitors in seeing the building.

The Upswing in Evangelism

It's time to point out the great strides forward that are being made by missionary-minded members. Under the leadership of the missionary quorums of the church (especially the Seventies), a period of emphasis on training local missionary workers is beginning to produce good fruit.

Of course, the church leaders have always known that the motto "Each one win one" was a must in any major advancement in membership; but only in the past ten to fifteen years has the know-how been successfully passed on from full-time missionary to local member. There is, of course, a long period of training still ahead; the trained personnel in the local churches is still small. And many areas have not been touched. But results are beginning to show in statistical reports.

Below is a chart summarizing the yearly totals of baptisms over the past thirty-eight-year period. All the figures except for the year 1921 rather accurately reflect the missionary trend. (The year 1921 includes some cumulative reports which had been relayed from foreign missions after World War I.)

1920—3,827	1939—3,540
1921—5,477	1940—3,238
1922—3,640	1941—2,834
1923—3,349	1942—2,721
1924—3,944	1943—2,512
1925—3,181	1944—2,531
1926—2,853	1945—2,491
1927—2,973	1946—2,674
1928—2,584	1947—3,489
1929—4,665	1948—3,706
1930—4,208	1949—4,738
1931—3,188	1950—4,771
1932—3,072	1951—4,952
1933—3,197	1952—4,462
1934—3,358	1953—4,906
1935—2,987	1954—5,308
1936—2,887	1955—5,554
1937—2,798	1956—5,345
1938—3,375	1957—5,705

Placing these figures on a line graph brings into focus the picture of our years of acceleration and deceleration. It becomes quite clear why our progress numerically during the past nearly forty years has moved in "jerks" instead of steadily.

The mid-twenties saw a period of internal strife in the church which took its toll on our increase, then the church made an all-out effort in evangelism just prior to the Centennial Conference of 1930. But the depression cut our full-time missionary force drastically; baptismal figures skidded down quickly and remained low during the thirties. They were just beginning to build up again when World War II hit. Down went the baptismal effort again, with the low point being hit in 1945. Since that date the missionary arm of the church has grown steadily in a period of church unity and relatively stable world peace.

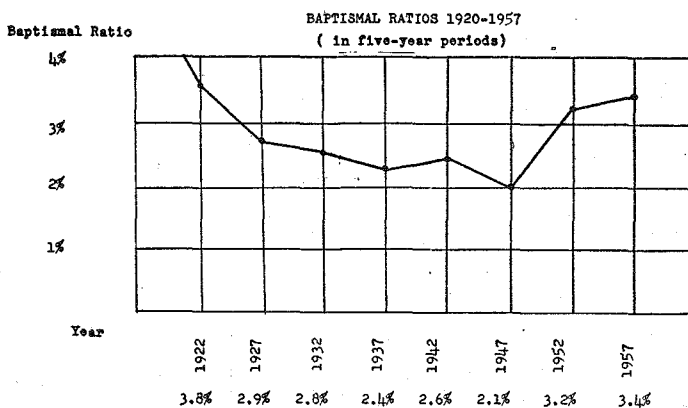

The full-time appointee ministry has in the last two years reached about the same total that was under appointment prior to depression days. It now surpasses two hundred in number. But the ratio of baptisms to full-time ministry has raised from an average of 17 new members per appointee prior to 1931 to 25 new members per appointee during the past ten years. If you consider only the year 1957, this ratio goes on up to approximately 29 new members per appointee.

But this doesn't mean that today's full-time missionary is necessarily any more skillful at getting decisions than yesterday's. Rather it means that the average branch is doing a better job of "setting the scene" for his entry into the local missionary endeavor. It also means that these trained local men and women are using more individual initiative in pressing missionary efforts while the full-time missionary is out of their midst.

Local people are taking advantage of materials and techniques available and adding these helps to their desire to win people to Christ. "Know-how" is overcoming many feelings of frustration in doing missionary work.

The chart below shows the ratio of baptisms to total church membership during this same thirty-eight-year period.

In 1920 our baptismal increase ratio was about 4 per cent. This decreased to 1.9 per cent in 1945. But in 1957 the ratio had increased back to 3.4 per cent. It has been said that a "living" church must maintain more than a 3 per cent increase in baptisms. Recently we've begun to "live" again!

The call is being made each day for more volunteers to join the ranks of the local missionary training corps. You are invited to be one of them. The upswing in evangelism will continue, but it needs your help!

No Older Young People's Conferences Labor Day Week End

There will be no church-wide older young people's conference on Labor Day week end this year. This is due to General Conference being held in early October, and the involvement of General Church personnel in Conference preparation. Plans are being made for the resumption of the older youth conferences in 1959.

We would like to encourage those who are interested to plan district or regional conferences this year to include older youth. Suggestions for a theme and its development are to be found throughout the Pastor's Handbook; additional helps and ideas may be obtained from the Youth Division of the Department of Religious Education.

Tithing Statement Filer Count

During the first five months of 1958 a total of 18,465 members in the domestic field filed tithing statements. This compares with a count of 16,617 for the same period last year, a gain of 1,848 filers.

Sixty districts and stakes have a larger total of filers at May 31, 1958, than had been achieved at the same date last year. Eleven of these sixty districts have already exceeded the total count for the full year of 1957. These districts are Eastern Colorado, Northeastern Illinois, Miami-Pittsburg, Washington, D. C., Central Michigan, Lansing, Joplin, Rich Hill, Columbia River, Utah and Southeast Idaho, and Seattle.

Waterloo-Clinton, erroneously reported last month as being in this group, is only one filer below the 1957 total, and several other districts have almost equaled last year's count at the end of the first five months of this year.

These figures are most encouraging, and ministry and leadership on the part of priesthood members should enable the church in the domestic field to maintain the substantial gains already made this year.

Proposed Amendments to Rules and Resolutions

Delegates to General Conference Missions Abroad

The basis of representation at General Conference is set forth as follows:

CHURCH ARCHITECTS AND ENGINEERS ORGANIZE

The First Presidency is happy to call attention to the announcement by Brother Larry Smith concerning the organization of a church association for engineers and architects. This appears on page 20.

Each stake and district shall be entitled to one delegate for every one hundred members of said stake or district, and one vote in Conference for each delegate.

Regularly organized branches of the church not included in a district shall be entitled to at least one delegate, who shall have the same privileges as other delegates. When the membership of such a branch exceeds one hundred, that branch shall be entitled to one delegate for each one hundred members. The selection of these branch delegates shall be made in regular branch business meetings or in special business meetings of which due notice shall have been given as to time, place, and purpose.

The enrollment upon which representation at General Conference shall be determined for the various missions, stakes, and districts, and for the branches in unorganized territory shall be the total membership thereof as indicated by the monthly balance in the office of the Department of Statistics two weeks prior to the date of the conference at which delegates are to be elected.

—“Rules of Order” 24:

Rules and Resolutions, page 16.

In missions abroad, where no district organization exists, the spirit of the rule here set forth seems to require that delegates to General Conference shall be selected as though the mission was organized as a stake or district. This interpretation is emphasized by the inclusion of the term “missions” in the third paragraph quoted above. However, missions abroad are not included in the first of these quoted paragraphs. To make this matter clear we recommend:

That the first paragraph of Section 24 of the Rules of Representation be amended by the substitution of a comma (,) for “and” between the words “stake” and “district” and the insertion between the words “district” and “shall” of “, and mission abroad not otherwise organized,” and that after the second “stake” and before the second “district” a comma (,) shall be substituted for “or” and after this word “district” there shall be inserted “or mission abroad not otherwise organized” so that this paragraph shall read:

Each stake, district and mission abroad not otherwise organized shall be entitled to one delegate for every one hundred members of said stake, district, or mission abroad not otherwise organized, and to one vote in Conference for each delegate.

Becoming a Healthier People

A venerable prophet, who gives us our first recordings of God's will, spoke forthrightly the words of the Lord, and not the least of the commandments issued in that day are two which apply now. Those simple words, "be fruitful and have dominion upon the earth," are directives for the use of his gifts, that which we survey and our own living substance. These commandments come echoing down to us through the times of man, and when the Lord speaks now the tones have changed. There is a note of chiding, "He that doeth not anything until he is commanded, and receiveth a commandment with doubtful heart, and keepeth it with slothfulness, the same is damned" (D. and C. 58: 6).

It is as if we expect to be spoon-fed all our lives even though sources of enrichment are at every hand and each has been given talent to reach out.

So it is in the area of health. Longer life, more joy in living, and greater ease of accomplishment in life's tasks lie ahead for us if we take his commandments willingly and search with wisdom the way of abundant life. Rightly directed efforts in this field will bring their reward; conversely, we cannot always expect to ride in the arms of the Lord with our eyes closed or we will come to a rude awakening.

In any venture certain rules must be observed. If they are not observed the goal is never reached. So before moving out in the hope of health more abundant let us lay the ground rules before us. These rules give us our bearing.

1. God is the ultimate source of all good gifts.
2. God is a God of law and order.
3. His laws have the quality of being constant, therefore they are always reliable for our use.
4. His body of laws governing good health have not been wholly revealed.
5. The means of revelation has been both direct and by study.
6. The body of laws governing health are interrelated and depend on each other. To single out but one law as our whole guide is foolishness.
7. The laws of health are but a part of those forces that have to do with the well-being of man, so it will benefit us to have a background of God's other laws.
8. One must acknowledge the Giver of the law. That is to say the dividends of following his laws—abundant life—necessarily shall be given to his service. If they are used to selfish ends they become negative forces.

Specific Problems

BIRTH

One would like to think that a new life is perfect, that perfect health is had at the time of birth, if at no other, but alas the heritage is not perfect. The parents have broken health laws and the new life has not had perfect shelter. Each new life carries at least some defect, some handicap, some lack of resistance. Each is born with the Achilles heel that will bring him to his grave.

It is not a happy thought, but it sets us to thinking. We are made to realize that health is not just a personal problem but will have its reflection on our progeny. In fact there are a few who might ponder as to the wisdom of having children (such as the man who is a hemophiliac). Should two who are diabetics marry and have children? There are laws of inheritance here that operate dependably, and anyone confronted with such a problem should understand fully the laws that govern lest he be foolhardy. Everyone should seek good health, for there is some correlation between healthy parents and healthy children. A heritage of good health is to be coveted, something to be passed on to our children's children. There is hope if our eyes are open to the problem.

THE EARLY YEARS

The early years of life are those of rapid growth and at the same time the years of dependency. A foundation of good health and good health habits must be laid in these years or the productive years will be lean. Any young couple should be aware of the part they play in the future of their children. Out of love they will improve their own health habits and cultivate better ones; example is an admirable teacher. They will seek competent counsel as a means of preventing childhood diseases, many of which are crippling. They will regard parenthood as a prime task and will devote time and study that they might better practice that task. Parents who provide a healthy atmosphere at home because of the love they have for their children are only doing their Christian duty.

THE YEARS OF ADULTHOOD

At some age most of us will have the God-given task of decision making. Many decisions concerning health matters are made in the course of a lifetime. How these problems are answered will in part be the measure of our capacity in all areas of life, so a critical look at some of the common health decisions that beset us is not amiss.

When should I see the doctor?

If in doubt, always. Most people accumulate some medical judgment with passing years and can apply common-sense home remedies to run-of-the-mill problems such as colds, abrasions, and mild sunburns. Seeing the doctor is not necessary if return to normal is rapid and one is sure the remedy applied will do no harm. But if one doesn't recognize the disease or the "cold" is not quite true to form, or a symptom lingers, or if questions are running around in his mind, he should consult a good doctor.

Who is a good doctor?

A good doctor is one who has a good knowledge of the human body and the healing arts. This means he should have at least four years of formal training in a medical school and a continual part-time study program thereafter. He is morally sound and can be trusted. It may take some time to find this man, but find him. A family physician is your friend and his medical training will guide you through most of your illnesses.

Should I have surgery?

You probably can't rely on your own knowledge but will defer to a competent physician whom you feel you can trust to say "yes" or "no." It is best to know the man and to have had previous dealings with him if possible. Otherwise a second entirely separate consultation may be advisable. A call to your county, medical society may help you find competent counsel if you are at a loss as to where to go for a good judgment.

Remember that surgery is an acceptable or an only method of treatment for some diseases. Somewhat akin to the surgical method is the throwing of a rotten apple out of the barrel or replacing the broken slat in the bed. We accept these curative practices, and surgery is very much the same.

When should I call for administration?

Call the elders if there is an affliction of some gravity and if there is the abiding faith that God's knowledge excels that of man. When and how often to call the elders requires wisdom. One shouldn't flog the Lord into making man's way His way, for the way of earthly mortals can be wrong at times. Wise application of the principle of laying on of hands will bear fruit physically and spiritually. And don't forget that if you are doing all that is earthly possible, His beneficent smile is easier for him to give.

Should I be vaccinated?

Yes, if the vaccine is one that provides good protection, has been proved safe, and the disease to be vaccinated for is a threat where you live or travel. Some examples of safe, effective vaccines are tetanus, diphtheria, whooping cough, smallpox, poliomyelitis, yellow fever, and typhoid. Smallpox vaccination alone has saved thousands upon thousands of lives in the United States because so many of its citizens have been immunized that this massive plague killer cannot find fertile enough ground to become virile and spread like wildfire. The true Christian will co-operate, not only because he wants to protect his own life, but also because his being immune in some measure protects the lives of others in his community.

What foods should I eat?

There are certain general rules that are quite reliable for selecting food.

(1) Have a variety of foods. This not only adds to the delight of eating, but also is some insurance against missing out on some valuable substances to good health. Remember there are vitamins that we still don't know about. And don't be ensnared by the food faddists who preach "nothing but whole-wheat bread" or "alfalfa tea is the elixir of life." Most of us wouldn't like to be thought of as lopsided, so let's be sensible. The Scriptures say "reasonable."

(2) Let the staple food in the diet be of high quality, that is to say those foods that have a good variety of the substances necessary to support life.

Two excellent staples are whole wheat and milk; two fair staples are brown rice and beans; two poor staples are corn and potatoes.

(3) Fit the menu to the energy needs. The secretary can eat lower calorie foods, such as salads, to advantage. The lumber jack can utilize high calorie foods such as sardines in oil.

(4) In either serious or chronic illness seek competent nutritional advice, for the food needs are often very different from the normal. Food supplements may even be advisable to make up for deficiencies. Normally a good diet fills the bill.

(5) Use wisdom where you find it, and that includes Section 119 of the Doctrine and Covenants and your state extension agent as well as Section 86. Be sure to read Section 86 with wisdom, or you'll end up saying that the Doctrine and Covenants says, "Don't drink carbonated beverages" or some other unwarranted assertion. Let us not pervert the words of the Lord.

(6) Eat everything with a sprinkling of enjoyment and thanksgiving, the two best condiments.

Can I be a factor in promoting good health in my community?

Yes, there are opportunities that arise occasionally. Vote affirmatively for such health measures as fluoridation of city water (now amply proved effective and safe after twenty-five years of careful study) and adequate sewage disposal plants. Make a donation to the community health center if it is feasible. Do active battle against the common health sins of society such as keeping late hours, eating too much, smoking, developing drug habits (e.g., laxatives). Promote outdoor games and activities rather than acquiesce to the hypnotism of TV. Be well informed by including Today's Health in your magazine list, and you will be less likely to pass on shoddy health advice. Help the poor in your community to have adequate medical care. See that they have opportunity for rehabilitation.

This enumeration of ideas may touch you at some point and help you in becoming a positive factor for the good health of your community.

What advice do I give if a son or daughter is thinking about medicine as a career?

The answer is simple. Say neither aye or nay, but help your boy or girl to gain insights in the field of medicine as compared with other vocations. Maybe a summer's work as a nurse's aid or an orderly will give proper perspective. Some have been guided by personal acquaintance with nurses and doctors. After he or she ponders and looks at the question from all sides, the decision is his or hers. If the answer is yes to a medical profession, then gently urge him or her to gain competency and hold fast to Christian ideals, for there are battles to be won by Christ's church in the field of medicine; it needs leaders. As a side light, remember the church has a good school of nursing with a devoted and competent staff.

A Mission to Fulfill

This sampling of problems that often confront us in some measure should convince us that we, as a "chosen" people, bear some responsibilities in the field of health if we are to become vigorous, full of joy, fruitful. A blight can settle upon us, His church, if we choose to be slovenly servants. God wants to find a people who will be the salt of the earth. Let us fulfill our mission and be a light unto the world.

The First Fact of Salvation

OUR SOCIETY has become enthralled with the panacea of group activity. As a result, we have become unmindful of certain facts. For example, aims, ideals, and achievements of any group of people accrue only from the aims, ideals, and achievements of individuals encompassed by the group. Our civil law declares that a corporation is an artificial man set up by law. Regardless of lawful status, or of the esprit de corps that a group may possess, it has not a soul of its own.

Christ said, "I will build my church," but he did not give it a soul. The church has life only as the Spirit of Christ gives its members—"the lively stones built up"—life. Jesus knew men could not be raised from sin en masse. Though he dealt with and taught his disciples as a group, he ministered to them as individuals. The church, then, is God's family group similar to an earthly family group, not having a soul of itself but a composite of individuals. It is the receptacle that shields God's work and preserves the atmosphere in which the Holy Spirit can move and work in the souls of men.

The world can produce technicians and hire teachers, but by its own admission it has not the dynamo that produces creative scientists and citizens. Likewise, the church can produce numerical membership and an atmosphere conducive to valiant Christianity—but not discipleship. Discipleship is produced in the individual souls of men by the indwelling spirit and a growing Christlikeness.

One of man's greatest gifts is his plasticity, reformability, moldability, and capacity for regeneration. When a man becomes "crusty" and "stiff-necked," he is surely lost. God, out of love for man, drove Adam and Eve from the garden, preventing them from eating of the tree of life and living forever in sin; thus he preserved man's opportunity and capacity for regeneration. This act of love reserved to man a day of salvation.

The church of itself cannot recreate or regenerate as some have supposed. It depends wholly upon the Creator of the souls of men—the power of God, the Father; the mediation of Christ, the Son; and the gift of the Holy Ghost. The church must ever be viewed as a medium, an avenue, and never as an end in itself.

You and I should be thankful that the Holy Spirit never lets the full weight of the Devil's power bear on us, or we would be completely crushed. How foolish are some who systematically withdraw from the holy shield and are engulfed in the filthy flood.

Woodrow Wilson stated, "Liberty belongs to the individual, or it does not exist—the individual is the first fact of liberty." By extension, then, salvation belongs to the individual, or salvation is not in the church. As God is the first fact of creation, so is the individual soul the first fact of salvation. There are helps, guards, ordinances, and administrations in the church, but they or the members collectively are not the ultimate factors in man's relationship with God. Salvation is his gift to mankind through his Son. Man alone can be the recipient and faithful user of that gift. "Be ye converted and turned about. Be ye doers of his word." Then and only then is the church edified, the gospel preached, and the kingdom built.

In Christ was the kingdom come, as he expects in your life as his disciple it shall come. The power of the church in your private world begins with your relationship with God and ends in a relationship between God and you. Salvation is not a destination or a condition but a lifelong and growing sonship under God.

Second-Mile Saints

IT IS COMMON TO HEAR people say, "I just love pickles," or "I really love that Southern fried chicken," when they actually don't love these things at all. This general abuse of the word "love" in our everyday conversation helps bring man's noblest feeling down to the ordinary and commonplace.

In a very forceful sermon Priest Herbert Smith recently illustrated the need today for us to take stock of ourselves and see if we fully understand what Jesus meant when he said, "Love God and love one another." In the highest meaning of the word, love is a giving thing, a placing of ourselves last in relation to our concern for others. This form of love becomes complete when an interaction takes place and love is returned to the giver. A pickle or a piece of fried chicken, no matter how tasty or well prepared, can never respond to our love and affection.

On the other hand, our neighbors and friends will usually respond to a heartfelt "good morning" or something so completely simple as a smile. It comes natural to an outgoing person to be friendly and interested in people. For the shy individual such friendliness may require real effort, often accompanied by some embarrassment. How much greater is this expression of love because of the conscious effort made to give it.

A real love for our fellow man, the kind of love that Jesus spoke of, requires us to "bear one another's burdens," "to go the second mile" when we are required to go only the first. Walking the second mile is not always easy, but it is the place where duty ends and service begins. Our Lord set the supreme example for us as he struggled the last bitter steps to Calvary. There, nailed to a cross and burdened under our sins, he offered the ultimate sacrifice—with nothing but guileless love and incomprehensible forgiveness in his heart. Here is love as Christ wishes us to love, and here is giving as only true love can give.

The road to the kingdom of God on earth is hard only because our Savior wishes us to share the joy and gladness that comes from complete giving, to know the sweetness of victory after the dark hours of conflict. If we would enter the rest that he has promised we must become "second-mile Saints," and only love can overcome the trials that bar the way.

School Takes on New Tone

Third Summer Session Is "Best Yet" At the School of the Restoration

A new tone seems to be developing at the School of the Restoration, according to L. Wayne Updike, director.

"The school seems to be taking on a more collegiate atmosphere," he said. "The June 16-28 summer session was the best session yet. The quality of classes was excellent. The level of work done was definitely on the college level."

Fifty-six students from Missouri, Iowa, Pennsylvania, and Canada attended the summer session this year. Seven courses were offered: Book of Mormon, Old Testament, Life of Jesus, Life and Letters of Paul, Basic Beliefs, Child Development, and English Composition for Speakers.

Instructors at the third annual summer session were Roy A. Cheville, William Clinefelter, Herbert Scott, Alfred Yale, Harley Morris, and Ann Barnard.

1,350 Students

The summer session lifted to 1,350 the total number of students who have studied at the School of the Restoration. About half of that number have studied by correspondence.

Brother Updike said the most popular courses at the summer session proved to be Life of Jesus taught by Dr. Cheville and Book of Mormon taught by Brother Scott.

Brother Clinefelter, who taught at the school for the first time this summer, said he is very much interested in the progress of the School of the Restoration.

"I definitely feel the school is a step in the right direction for our church. It is needed very much," he said. "Our people should take full advantage of the school's offerings. The only disappointment to me was the small attendance at the session. More people should have received what was offered this summer."

"The school has an excellent place for its classes to meet. We couldn't ask for a better place. There is no reason why the school can't become a marvelous thing for our people."

Promising Future

Brother Scott, who has taught Book of Mormon at the school several times previously, said, "I think the school has a promising future. It seems to be exactly what the church needs. The courses have been carefully prepared by Brother Updike, and he has done a fine job of choosing a college-level staff also. The physical plant is beautiful. I'm very enthusiastic about the school."

The next session of the school is scheduled to begin September 8. Classes will be offered one evening a week for twelve weeks during the fall session. Plans already call for classes in German, Spanish, and Book of Mormon. Others will be added later, Brother Updike said. He hopes to see classes offered in all seven of the school's departments. They are communications, education, history, practicum, psychology, Scriptures, and theology.

August 10-22 has already been set aside for the school's summer session next year. During the summer sessions, classes meet daily for two weeks.

Further information concerning the School of the Restoration and its residence sessions or its home study program can be secured by writing to the School of the Restoration, 9900 Winner Road, Independence, Missouri.

ROGER YARRINGTON

Alfred Yale taught a class on the Life and Letters of Paul and another class on the Old Testament.

Herbert Scott leads a class in Book of Mormon. His class was one of the most popular and has already been scheduled for the fall session beginning September 8.

The Aesthetic Needs of Society

Within the Zioniac Structure

PRIMITIVE man's first drawings on the walls of his cave, perhaps to depict the huge animal he had slain, were tangible expressions of what he felt when he recalled an event. Primitive man's first attempts with simple rhythmical patterns, perhaps clapping his hands and stamping his feet, pleased some basic sense within him; soon was born the first musical instrument—the drum. From his beginnings man has released his inner feelings through some form of what we call artistic expression.

In these modern times contemporary artistic expression of civilized man still is the product of inner feelings; however, through exposure to education, refinement, technical "know-how," and cultural pressures, art today reflects its own civilized status.

Excellence of quality within any art medium demands two things of the artist: certain inherent faculties or gifts plus his attainment of varying degrees of instruction or education in his specialized field. These are essential in our modern critical evaluation of artistic expression. For example, with or without instruction in linear design, perspective and color harmony, I cannot draw or paint. I have spent several years going to choir practice week after week and my innate sense of direct musical expression does not extend far enough for me to carry the alto part of a hymn alone. I have a friend who plays the piano well and composes "serious" music. This necessitated long years of study plus a feel for the expressional medium of music. A young person with a flair for creating figures from a clay lump will enhance his work immeasurably with a study of the anatomy of the human form.

Excellence of quality in all major art mediums—architecture, literature, poetry, drama, the dance, music, painting, sculpture—requires of the artist a recognition of his talent and the pursuance of technical skill in his chosen medium.

Appreciation of the Arts

Most humans do not fall into the category of artists as discussed above. Despite their inability to express themselves directly, academically, or technically in the arts, they do possess the ability to appreciate or to enjoy. They are highly capable of being emotionally touched and stimulated and refreshed by their perception and their awareness of the objects created by the artists. Ideally, they are able to experience a communication with the inner feelings of the artist.

It is this indirect facet of expression through appreciation that I want now to champion, foster, and defend, if necessary, because I feel clearly that society has a very basic and fundamental need of both creative art and the appreciation of it.

I am going to base this need on the theoretical concept commonly accepted in modern medicine that the structure of man's personality is composed of three major areas. One of these areas, identified as "id," we could characterize as being the animal or the strictly physical part of us. There are only two things this part of us is interested in: (1) being loved, (2) being aggressive (the primal urge to live). This part of us is not even vaguely interested in the Ten Commandments, let alone the higher law of Christ.

The second area of the personality I would like to use is called the "ego." It is the part of me that you recognize as me.

It is the part of you that I know as you. It is the part that causes me to love my parents, my husband, my children, and the members of the church which I attend. It is the part of you that others recognize as you—your interest in and your activity and love for the Church of Jesus Christ.

Id vs. Ego

The first or id part of ourselves is continually throwing and bombarding the second, or ego part with needs that demand to be satisfied. It isn't the least bit considerate of ego; it has only one thought: I want this! You get it for me!

This puts ego on a terrific spot, for ego likes to do things rightly and properly. Ego must satisfy those wants thrown to it by our unconscious selves, but only on a basis that is acceptable by society. It is the extent to which ego is successful in finding socially acceptable ways of expression that determines our relation or our level of communication with God.

The highest form of love expressed by ego is that for our creator and our fellow men. This love causes men to try to translate God and mankind's nobler efforts into human terms and understanding. This expression of love takes many forms, such as dedicated lives in the fields of medicine, religion, science, economics, education, and family. They are deliberate intellectual approaches. If this expression of love should take the form of artistic expression, then it is an imitation of life as the artist feels it—an intuitive approach. In case you are tempted to class "imitation of life" as second best or as a poor substitute for the real thing, remember that our very lives are patterned after the Christ and at best are a poor imitation of God.

These two approaches to life are forms of knowledge that we use to express our basic motivations in acceptable ways. "It has been said that there are only two forms of knowledge, the intellectual and the aesthetic. The highest form of intellectual knowledge is science, the affirmation of universal concepts. The aesthetic form of knowledge is intuition or the imagination."¹

I was very much interested in the following statement made by Nehru, political leader of the Indian government. "It may be that the scientific method of observation is not always applicable to all the varieties of human experience. . . . When both science and philosophy fail us, we shall have to rely on such other powers of apprehension as we may possess. For there appears to be a definite stopping place beyond which reason, as the mind is at present constituted, cannot go.”²

The Need for Aesthetic Expression

So perhaps we cannot always express our basic motivations by reason or the intellect and so express ourselves in another manner—aesthetically. Then our basic motivations clear through the channel of our conscious selves and give expression in created art forms. I feel that this is a highly legitimate reason for the need in a Zionite community of aesthetic expression.

Oddly enough, in our scientific age, aesthetic expression is probably less socially approved than any intellectual approach we have so far mentioned. Artists are often dubbed as queer, rebels, bohemians. Those who voice appreciation for the arts are called long hairs, squares. Why?

Just for a moment let's delve into the history of graphic art for a partial reason. During the Middle Ages and later during the Renaissance, art had been commissioned by the church or state to serve a religious or social purpose. Gradually with the growth of science and the capitalistic structure, Europe went through a long period of social and economic readjustment. Art was no longer thought of as integrated with the life of the community, and slowly it became more and more separated from the general public and society. During these centuries the artist moved from the center to the periphery of life. This withdrawal of the artist reached its culmination about the time of World War I. Caught in their tight little circles, bitter because of their separation from society and its largess, many artists took off on tangents deliberately designed to confuse the viewer. This social exclusion of the artist, coupled with another reason I feel is much more prevalent and dangerous, makes of all forms of art an ignored stepchild.

Society's Responsibility

This second reason is the laxity and reluctance of the general public to understand and appreciate the good art that is produced. It is a public which encourages the indoctrination of our youth with low-grade “body” music. It is a public which patronizes the recent national mushrooming of so-called “art” theaters that depict womanhood in its most degrading aspects. It is a public with a tremendous apathy to the trash published in comic books and on sale at the corner newsstand. It is a public succumbing to basic motivations with scarcely a thought for social acceptance based on the laws of God.

Noble efforts are being made to redeem art. At one time even governments stepped in to help. Some years ago Mexico subsidized native artists to develop the famous Mexican mural art for the sole purpose of educating the masses. This government interest was apparent during the Roosevelt administration when the New Deal Art Relief Projects and the New Deal Mural Program were begun. Art is being used more and more by industry to advertise business. Museum attendance is growing. The magazines that find their way into many of America's homes, such as Life and Look, devote much space to the subject of art. Basically, the concept of art is changing to that of a service and not just a luxury for the rich and educated.

Art and Religion

This then is the principle which I feel will be present in the aesthetic nature of the Zionite community. Art of all forms will function as a service and yet lower none of its aesthetic standards. “. . . every form of art—the poem, painting, temple, novel, dance, or musical creation—was intended when first created to serve a useful purpose and second, that the simplest craft object becomes a work of art when its creator has added to it the transcendent quality of imagination.”³

Back in the 1830's some Latter Day Saints had a desperate need of a temple for worship. To this need they added imagination and love and created the most distinctive art creation of the early Restoration—Kirtland Temple. This was great art as a service. Consider the broken china in the mortar, the nocturnal weeping over the unfinished temple walls, the inspiration of the architect who designed those unique priesthood pulpits. Would you agree that “great art may be defined as that art which deals with the deepest human emotions and appeals to the greatest numbers over the largest period of time”?

As a young church we are slowly building our aesthetic distinctives. The recent additions to The Hymnal express succinctly and beautifully our doctrine and our message. We have a deep need for Latter Day Saint art forms in every medium. Last Communion Sunday I sat in the service with closed eyes waiting to be served the emblems. I was aware of the faint musical tinkle of the wine glasses as they passed from hand to hand. I knew then that someday one of our people would express artistically this feeling we have for the Lord's Supper.

Not only as a church but as individuals we need to be building our own aesthetic distinctives. Franklyn Weddle says, “A beautiful Zion can be established only by people who know and appreciate beauty—people of culture. A culture which is not superficial, but one which is deep and genuine and basic. We must become a people able to discriminate between the good and the noble, the ordinary and the cheap. We must become intimate with the good and the uplifting. The abundant life includes an appreciation of the fine arts and the ability to actively participate in artistic endeavors.”

The Church Is Positive and Dynamic

IN A WORLD of turmoil, doubt, fear, and confusion the church stands like a rock in a weary land. Like the pyramids it is ancient, yet it is as new as the morning newspaper. Its principles are the same yesterday, today, and forever; this is true no matter where it is or what language men speak. Its articles of faith and philosophy are based upon the teachings of Jesus Christ which are true and about which there is no uncertainty—no question.

The church is positive, affirmative, creative. It reconciles, constructs, and encourages manly dignity and uprightness. Its victories are over selfishness, vice, apathy, and indifference. It will be content when men are free from sin, love God and their fellow men with all their heart, and labor for the uplift and salvation of mankind.

Can we not say that out of convictions comes a feeling of self-respect, assurance, and mutual confidence from which flow powerful spiritual and mental energies? These undergird and direct the forces that make for progress and civilization, enlightenment, and culture.

The church is positive and dynamic evidence that the Spirit of the living God is at work in the hearts and minds of men to bring about the kingdom of our God.

FEED MY LAMBS

A Message for the Older Women of the Church

Part I

MOST OF US at one time or another have expressed deep concern about the children of this generation. Juvenile delinquency alarms us as mere babes destroy public and private property, commit holdups, and even murder. The news of their escapades screams from the front pages of our newspapers.

While we concern ourselves about the wayward youth, we should not forget the many good youngsters who strive to grow up righteously, and who reach maturity as fine young men and women.

The Master was concerned about the children even in his day two thousand years ago. After his resurrection, Jesus appeared to his disciples on one occasion and, after a miraculous draught of fishes, sat down to eat a meal of fish and bread with them.

Having eaten, Jesus said to Peter, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" Doubtless Jesus indicated with a sweep of his hand the great catch of fishes which meant a livelihood to Peter. Peter answered, "Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee." Then Jesus said simply, "Feed my lambs."

All children, the good and the bad, the docile and the headstrong, the obedient and the rebellious, the tidy and the tousled, member and nonmember, all are the lambs of the Master.

Was this commission to "Feed my lambs" given to Peter only of the generation in which Peter lived? No, the summons is to every begotten son and daughter of the Lord in whatever age they live.

For the older woman to "feed the lambs" she must understand the modern child. She cannot serve one she does not understand and for whom she has no sympathy.

It has been said that a problem child is a child with a problem—a problem which he does not understand, lacks the experience to solve, and which is too big for his frail shoulders to carry. As a result he strikes out, tries to get even and to find compensations.

TODAY'S child is a by-product of the times. The normal life of the average child tends to create problems. The TV and movies acquaint the child with the seamier side of life, with glimpses into experiences beyond his understanding. The modern theory that a child must not be crossed lest he become frustrated has taken a horrible toll as children who have never been denied anything suddenly come upon a situation which demands an emphatic "no."

There is a lack of what the older woman calls "old-fashioned discipline," or the learning early in life that a misdemeanor carries a sure punishment. Too many homes rely solely upon the church school to provide the religious training that a few generations ago was learned at mother's knee. City children in particular have too few chores; there are few routine duties which absorb time and give the child a sense of being needed.

Then there are the working mothers. I have heard many women condemn the working mother, saying, "If she'd just stay at home and take care of her child and not be so concerned with the extra money."

But I present to you the fact that mothers have always worked to supplement the family income. The pioneer mother spun the wool, wove the cloth, knit the socks, and even tanned hides to make clothing for her family. Were they not working mothers supplementing the family income?

Later the working mother helped to buy the extras in the home with her butter and egg money or income from her vegetable garden. Often she made and sold wild fruit jelly or hearth-baked bread. Now the working mother goes off to the office or factory. She, too, augments the family income, but the difference lies in the relationship between her work and her children.

The working mother of fifty years ago took her children with her as she fed the chickens, weeded the garden, picked blackberries, shelled peas, or pitted cherries. As she stirred a cake in the mixing bowl, the child and mother talked to the rhythm of the mixing spoon. A day-by-day companionship was experienced as they did these duties together.
